An admirably illustrative example of the situation is afforded by the proceedings of the House on Thursday. Charges were made with regard to the conduct of the recent by-elections in West Huron and Brockville. In this case, of course, it is not the administration of the public service which is impugned, but the constitution of the parliament, which is the ultimate governing authority of the country. A good deal might be said on the subject of procedure; the method of investigating such charges which for years has been chiefly favoured, is that of sending them before the courts. But the very life of the House of Commons is at stake in the conserving of the purity of its mandates from the electors, and it is not well that there should be hesitation in yielding to red tape in the proving of charges of corruption in elections. Mr. Borden made definite charges, and within five minutes from the time that he had taken his seat he and all of the House of Commons knew that the investigation for which he had asked was granted. More than that, it was granted in the precise form in which he had asked. One is tempted to dwell upon the fact that investigation has been accorded so instantly, with such an absence of cavilling or of debate, not because there is special merit in showing solicitude upon a point so vital to our political life, but because instances leap to mind of days when such solicitude was not to be found upon government benches, when charges far graver, supported by far weightier evidence than that in the West Huron case, let alone the much weaker Brockville case, were received with impatience, were subject to every delay which tactical expedients could provide, were actually granted, and in the end had to be pronounced unproved by the mere weight of a party majority.

What is the position of the government to-day, and what is the position of the right hon. gentleman? Last year he at once accedes to the motion of my hon. friend, and he does it with a flourish of high principles, and the country was glad to hear. The committee met, and what happened? I will not say the right hon. gentleman is responsible for this, but it may throw light on what has taken place this session. When we went into the committee and began to prosecute the inquiry, ministers of the Crown, one of whom is before me, and one of whom is away in Europe, threw every difficulty they could in the way of inquiry; and prominent supporters of the right hon. gentleman, such as the junior member for Halifax, and the member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), resorted to all the arts of advocacy to protract and mar the inquiry. What was the result? The inquiry was not finished last year. The present situation is a striking instance that in politics, as in other matters, honesty is the best policy; for if they had gone honestly to inquire fully into that matter, and no hindrance had been put forward, it would have finished; and if the theory put forth by the Solicitor General and by the member for Kingston be correct, that the nine witnesses who had not been examined could add anything new, why the thing would have been all over last year, and the right hon. gentleman would have had all the kudos that belonged to the course that he had taken. But they did not carry out that inquiry with bona fides, and what is the result? When we met here this year, and my hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax, proposes to continue the inquiry, as the committee contemplated—the closing words of the chairman's report being 'that the House may take such action as to continuing and completing the investigation as may be deemed best,' he is met by the right hon. gentleman himself with a blockade, and in this House we have quibbling arguments and pettifogging ratiocinations to bar us out from that inquiry which the right hon. gentleman said was of the utmost importance, and involved the sanctity of the ballot. Why, Sir, what has happened? Last year it was a matter of the first importance, this year it is not worth taking up the time of the House. Last year the sanctity of the ballot must at all hazards and at all costs be safeguarded; this year the sanctity of the ballot spoiler and the saintship of the ballot thief must at all costs be guarded, even at the hazard of political infamy. Last year everything should be done that could be done to secure that the expression of the will of the people should be free; this year any attempt to secure such an expression is to be frowned down. What has happened? Is it the right hon. gentleman who has turned back on himself? This we cannot get over, that he is enacting a diametrically opposite part from what he enacted last year; and his face is turned this year to a directly opposite pole to that of last year. Last year he led us and he led the country on to a road of honour, on to that road that is pointed to by political honour, and by a proper regard to the constitution and to the rights of the people; this year he turns us back, and he is in full retreat from that position taken then with so much applause. What has happened, I say? Is it that the right hon. gentleman has turned his back on himself, or is it that when he was about to encounter the monster of corruption, when he was lifting his spear against that execrable shape, is it that his own colleagues and his friends took hold of him and asked him what he was about to do? Was he about to commit the fratricidal act of striking at the paternal author of his being—as a statesman and politician? Is that what happened when he was in act to strike corruption? Do we now see him chained to the car of a rabble, who have all their own way, and who can jeer him in this very House? Why, Sir, in his absence here last night, one of the humblest of his followers, the member for East Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Bell) attacked the course taken by the right hon. gentleman last year, and said he hoped such a course would not be taken again. Last year the whole country, with the Globe leading, was cheering the right hon. gentleman in his course of honour; this year he is bound to one of the cars of this rabble, of this unholy and criminal rabble, going on its criminal way, and one after another of the camp followers and stragglers jeer at the leader, jeer at the Premier. The Laurier of last year is attacked, and to-day he is perfectly helpless in those sinister hands. That is the situation to which I call attention, and on which the eyes of the country will be fixed.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. McClure), has read some telegrams. But what do they amount to? Would the men who are ready to commit such crimes as these men are charged with hesitate to send a lying telegram? Men who would spoil a ballot, commit fraud, slip and switch ballots, take money for their votes, would they hesitate to send lying telegrams? You can go to the St. Lawrence Hall in Brockville, and find Pritchett registered there; you can go to the hotel in Goderich and elsewhere and can find these men registered. And surely, Mr. Speaker, we, in this parliament and the country to-day, are not concerned to regard the question merely whether a criminal should be punished for his criminal conduct. The right hon. gentleman saw the real issue. The real issue goes to the life of this parliament; it goes to the foundation of the constitution; it goes to the strength of this Dominion of Canada. That is the real issue, not the little petty issues brought forward by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, whether we are going to punish certain criminal persons or not. What we want now, is to take the first step towards ridding the body politic of the danger which menaces it, towards tearing out the ulcer of the new Liberalism that is eating into its vitals. The first thing we want now, is to have a thorough diagnosis of the extent to which this terrible corruption has extended; and then we want to add clauses to the criminal law, we want to add clauses to the Controverted Elections Act, so as to try and bring within the grasp of public justice the men who are much worse than the brigand, much worse than the burglar, and much worse than the thief, who are serving sentences in our penitentiaries.

The hon. gentleman has confined himself to the technical standpoint. Not one word has been said about the broad question: How we are to rid the country of the terrible plague, this white political plague, that now is proved to exist? One of the hon. gentlemen, I think it was the Solicitor

General, objected that we should refer to the local elections. Why, Sir, the evidence is cumulative that all over this country now, there are trained men in the employ of the leaders of the Liberal party, of which Smith, the organizer, is the head. And we find certain ministers in close touch with Vance, Smith, Preston, Pritchett and others, when their nefarious ends are being accomplished. What do we find? We see Organizer Smith, who is again and again mentioned in these affidavits, steal quietly from Room 16 to the room of the hon. acting Minister of the Interior, and from the room of the hon. acting Minister of the Interior back, and the presiding genius of all this infamy has been haunting, with his evil shadow, the corridors of this parliament ever since it has been in session. It brings it very close. Is it to be supposed for one minute, when we read in these affidavits that money is paid by Preston, that money is paid by a man named McDonald, who is in the employ of the government of Ontario, that money is paid by Smith, or by Smith's lieutenant Vance, that the all-seeing eye of ways that are dark, politically, and tricks that are vain of the hon. acting Minister of the Interior does not know what is going on? Is it to be supposed, for one minute, that, when Smith almost sleeps with the hon. acting Minister of the Interior, the Minister of the Interior does not know of all this infamy which has been going on. What we say is that there is a banditti established in this country. I believe myself honestly, that last year, the leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) did not know it; it was only after he had granted this inquiry that his ministers came to him and said: Do you know what you are doing, do you know how you got into power, do you know how we have been returned in the by-elections? It has been by these rascals; they are our colleagues, they are our friends and workers together with us in the unrighteous cause. Then came the turning back, and when my hon. friend from Halifax tried to move his motion we had the lamentable spectacle of the right hon. gentleman going back on his past, going back on the just position which he had taken up. I have another affidavit, which I am going to read for the reason that it is full of detail. Like the rest, it is full of detail, it is full of particularity, and as hon. gentlemen are accustomed to refer to their legal knowledge in this House, I say, as a man who has had some legal training, that nobody can read that affidavit without saying this—it may be the affidavit of a ruffian—how could he be a colleague of Preston, of Cap Sullivan, and of Farr, an imp of Vance, or a confidant, an acolyte and an apostle of Smith, without being a scoundrel and a ruffian. He could not help but be so. I fling him aside. I am not going to defend this man's character. How do honest men come to their own except when thieves fall out? We know that he is a bad character by his associates, but now he has turned Queen's evidence, and light is shed on the rascaldom on which the new Liberalism is built:

State of Michigan,
City of Detroit.

To wit:

I, John G. Pritchett, of the city of London, in the province of Ontario, contractor, presently of the city of Detroit, make oath and say:

1. I have for several years taken part in municipal affairs and in politics in the said city of London, and have acted as deputy returning officer in the municipal elections, and also in the elections for the legislative assembly. I always acted with and on behalf of the Liberal party. In 1893 I was elected an alderman for Ward No. 6 in the said city.

Mr. TAYLOR. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. That is easily tested:

2. In the general election for the legislative assembly of 1898 I took an active part as a canvasser for votes on behalf of Col. Leys, and was appointed by Sheriff Cameron his deputy returning officer for the said election at polling division No. 3, in the Sixth ward of the said city of London.

3. From my experience, obtained in the various elections, I had formed the opinion that elections could be more easily and surely won by manipulation of the ballots than by buying votes; and after the said election I, in conversation with friends, used words to that effect.

You see what this man is doing, and has been doing, and has been training the Liberal manipulators to do. When they found that they were imperilled in their positions, even after taking the money they got here, there and everywhere—from Yukon deals and Drummond County deals—to spend in buying the corrupt voter, they say: The corrupt voter alone will not keep us in power. We must destroy the honest voter, too. We must steal the ballot of the honest voter. After the honest voter has put in his ballot and has, so to speak, in his own person, registered the will of the community, we will go and steal the precious diadem from the shelf and put in a corrupt ballot.

4. In the fall of the year 1898 a by-election was about to be held in South Ontario, the Hon. John Dryden being the Liberal candidate, John O'Gorman, of London, came to me and—

Now, let me say that you will find this John O'Gorman taking part in at least three other elections. This John O'Gorman takes part in the election in West Elgin, in West Huron and in Brockville. You will find that they are all dovetailed together, and that you have an organized and trained banditti throughout the country.

John O'Gorman, of London, came to me and asked me to go to South Ontario to instruct the deputy returning officers.

To instruct the deputy returning officers! He does not need to explain to him; they know what his profession is.

He said he had been told I could instruct the deputies how to manipulate ballots. I said, 'Where did you get your information?' He replied that did not matter, and asked me was I willing to go to South Ontario and help to elect Mr. Dryden. I asked him how much there was in it. He said $100 and expenses. I agreed to go. He said anything he promised would be carried out. He told me to meet him at the Walker House in Toronto.

You may get the register on that day and test that statement.

I went to Toronto and to the Walker House on the evening of the second Saturday before the election and had supper there. I met O'Gorman there, and he gave me $20. I also saw there Alexander Smith, the chief organizer of the Liberal party. He said he would be in Whitby in a few days, and he asked me to meet him there. He told me to stay at the Royal Hotel at Whitby, as that was the Conservative house. I went that Saturday night from the Walker House to the house of my brother-in-law in Toronto (Wellington Brock), and I slept there on that night and Sunday night.

You see how particular this man is.

On Monday morning I went to Whitby and stayed at the Royal. On nomination day, Tuesday, I saw Alexander Smith at the Commercial Hotel, after the nomination. I went upstairs with him to his room. He gave me some more money, $30, I think. He told me to go to Port Perry, where I would meet Mr. Threlkeld, who, I understood, was an assistant organizer under Smith. He (Threlkeld) would introduce me to the deputy returning officers. I had not said anything to Smith about such officials; he seemed to know that my business was to be with them.

You see that these things are thoroughly understood. Organizer Smith does not want to talk with him at all. He knows why the man came there; he knows that his class of work is to instruct the deputy returning officers.

I saw Mr. Threlkeld at Whitby that afternoon. Some one made us acquainted at the bar. On Thursday morning I went by train to Port Perry and stayed at the Oriental Hotel, another Conservative house. Then I walked to the Liberal committee rooms and there met Threlkeld. I told him I had come by Alexander Smith's orders to help him out, and that he was to introduce me to the deputy returning officers.

If a man came here as a lobbyist, and if he began to interfere with members of parliament, you know very well that some of us would rise up here and call attention to the fact; but is there any comparison between the dreadful danger to the community of a mere lobbyist compared with the danger of a man like this Smith, who is at the head of all this organized scoundrelism, and who is hand in hand with the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland)?

Mr. TAYLOR. And the Postmaster General.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, and the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock).

He said that they were not yet appointed. I told him he would have to get a hustle on, as I had only a short time to work with him.

Mr. DAVIN.

He said he was waiting for the sheriff, who was to be up next day to make the appointments. He went out. I remained in the committee rooms. In a little while he returned and said he had seen the chairmen of some of the divisions, and they had given him the names of one or two men who were to act as deputy returning officers. I then arranged with Threlkeld to have these proposed deputies meet me that afternoon, but they did not turn up. On Friday one of them, an elderly man, a grain buyer, whose name I, at this moment, cannot recall, came to me at the committee rooms. I talked to him for some time, and showed him a few things in the way of manipulating ballots. He said he was willing to do all he could to help the election, but seemed nervous or timid about trying the manipulation. He promised to try the spoiling of ballots. He practised it for a while, and said he would try it again at home. The other thing, slipping a ballot, he was afraid he could not do; but he became quite handy at spoiling. He left me, saying he would do a few.

This man was an instructor in 'spoiling' ballots as well as in 'switching' them.

Threlkeld had promised to send some more deputies to me, but he got drunk and did not do so. I saw him at his hotel, opposite to the Oriental, that evening. He was then drunk. A man whom I knew as Macdonald, and who afterwards told me he was an employee of the Ontario government, had arrived to meet Threlkeld. Macdonald went up to Threlkeld's room, and was there about fifteen minutes. Threlkeld had then been drinking, but was not so drunk as he afterwards became. Macdonald told me some days later that when he went up to the room on that occasion he left $200 with Threlkeld.

This, of course, brings the whole work home to the Ontario government. Where did he get that $200? A clerk in the employ of the Ontario government; we know very well he could not get away without the sanction of the Ontario government, and it is a fair inference that leave to depart as well as this money, had been furnished him by the government.

Macdonald did not speak a word to me at Port Perry. Some time after Macdonald came downstairs the landlord went up, and when he came down he said to me, 'That damn fool is as drunk as a fiddler; he has considerable money on him, and you had better look after him.' I was then with a man who was to act as a deputy. I asked him to go up with me to Threlkeld, as I wished to ask him about this man's appointment. We went up. Threlkeld was so intoxicated that he could not talk business. I asked Threlkeld did he know this man. Threlkeld was lying on the bed.

I may say this as a critic: That all these details have the stamp of truth, no matter what Pritchett's character is. Look at the picturesque expression that only the memory of truth can give.

He grunted something which was not intelligible, and we both left the room at once. I am not sure about this man's name. I think it was Craig, of Craig Bros., carriage-makers. He said, 'I don't see why they trust such things as that in elections. They do more harm than good.' We talked together for some time, but he had no evidence of his appointment, and I did not talk about ballots. I went back to my hotel.

On Saturday morning I went by the early train to Brooklyn, as Smith had directed me to do. There I saw Mr. James Vance at the hotel. Smith told me I would meet Vance there. I had met Vance on nomination day at Whitby, and we then became acquainted. When I saw him at Brooklyn he asked me to drive out to Myrtle to see a young man there who was to act as a deputy returning officer. Jack Brant, a newspaper man of Whitby, drove me out to Myrtle. He knew the young man and introduced me. I took the man aside, and told him my mission was to see him about his duties as deputy. He was then working in a field with another man. He said he had no notice of his appointment, and did not want to talk about it until he should get notice. Brant and I then returned to Brooklyn. I remained there until evening. Vance took me that afternoon to an office in the town hall, and there introduced me as Mr. Garrett to Mr. Halliday, the township clerk, who was to act as a deputy.

He was Johnston in another place, here he is Garrett, introduced by Vance as Garrett, so that the change of name and the fraud running through the whole man's action is sanctioned by the first lieutenant of Smith the Liberal organizer.

Vance left us together. I talked to Mr. Halliday, but said nothing about manipulation. I did not think it prudent to approach him. I hired a livery horse, and that evening drove to Whitby and put up at the Commercial Hotel. After supper Charles King drove me to Pickering. There was a Conservative meeting there that night. My object in going to Pickering was to meet a Mr. Richardson, township clerk and issuer of marriage licenses, whom I had seen in Whitby on nomination day, and to whom, as he used to be a deputy returning officer, I had explained the meaning of manipulation. I had then promised to see him again. At Pickering I was in his office with him about half an hour. He said he had practised what I had shown him at Whitby, and was pretty good at it. Neither of us did any of the work or practised on this occasion. We talked about the prospects, and as to how many ballots he thought he could fix. We agreed he could easily handle ten in his division. Charles King had taken me to Richardson's office, but remained either below or in another room. That night at Pickering I met Sim. Hewitt, of Brantford, who was working for the Hon. Mr. Dryden. He told me a lot of the farmers were out for the money, and that he had good luck with them. Charles King drove me back to Whitby. I slept at the Commercial Hotel that Saturday night. On Sunday morning the proprietor of the hotel drove me to Oshawa, and I remained at Oshawa until the morning of Tuesday, the election day. On Sunday morning I saw Vance at the hotel. He said he had arrived that morning from Brooklyn, and that the young man I had been out to see at Myrtle would be down to see me. Shortly after that the young man drove in. He said to me, 'I suppose Mr. Vance told you I was coming.' Then he and I went to my room. He said he had now got his commission and if I had anything to tell him I could do so. I showed him how to spoil and slip ballots. He practised and succeeded very well. He was with me about an hour. He said he would keep at it until election day, and would do all he could and use his own judgment.

Now, I call the Prime Minister's attention to this: That the evidence given before the commission, and the evidence of the other affidavits is to the effect that young men in ones and two and threes were brought to this man, so that what we have is a horrible spectacle of this man instructing the youth of Canada how to destroy the foundation of political liberty. Mr. Speaker, it is most serious thing, and I put it to parliament, must we not find means to destroy this plague?

On Monday, the day before the election, Mr. W. T. R. Preston arrived in Oshawa.

You see, how all the leaders and organizers come together. Just as where the carcass is there will the eagles be gathered together, and just as vultures swoop down on the battlefield, this man Preston, while he was in Canada, wherever there was evil work to be done in an election, was to be found. And the wretched man, the unhappy and abandoned man, the other day, when in the witness box, when asked why he took the ruffians from outside into these election fights—what is the meaning, Sir, of taking outsiders, men who do not belong to the constituency, into an election contest?—what does he say? 'Because I find I can get better work out of outsiders.' Can it be honest work that he could get better from outsiders? Would a stranger have more influence with a voter? It is the voter's neighbour who has the influence with him, if it is honest influence. The abandoned man, in another part of his evidence, says he took these reptiles in to put down the bad, to put it out of the way, to frown it down. These men—why, Sir, Cap Sullivan, Farr, Pritchett, the whole gang, with one or two ministers—they are like eels in an eelhole, all rolled up together. You look down into the eelhole and see a head move, and it is the head of Cap Sullivan; then another head, and it is the head of Preston; then another head, and it is the head of Pritchett; then another head, and it is the head of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock); then another head, and it is the thoughtful brow of the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland). There they are, a lot of eels in a mud-hole of such corruption as never disgraced this country before.

Monday, the day before the election, Mr. W. T. R. Preston arrived at Oshawa. He told me he had come from Whitby. I had seen him at the nomination, and we knew each other when we met at Oshawa.

I should think they did know each other. They were birds of a feather—men of the same kidney. I do not know whether Pritchett sings psalms or not; but the other sings: 'My soul is full of sunshine to-day.' I do not know whether Pritchett has another line simply to express his devout aspirations after spoiled ballots to corrupt the electors of Canada.

Jack Brant and he had driven over from Whitby. As I stood in the hall at the foot of the stairs, Preston said to me: I want you to go down to Whitby. I want some help there to-night.

Why did Preston say this to this man who you now all say is a ruffian? Preston knew him as a friend and a brother.

I said I would go. That evening I drove to Whitby and met Preston in his room at the Commercial Hotel.

Not in the parlour or in the rotunda of the hotel, but in his room. Probably it was to have a word of prayer. Perhaps the two pluggers went down on their marrow-bones and thanked God for the apostle of purity, in the shape of Jim Sutherland, and for the charming embodiment of political holliness, in the shape of Organizer Smith. He went to Preston's bedroom in the hotel. It shows the intimacy, at any rate.

Brant was in the room. He had gone up either with me or just before me. Preston said: 'I will be ready for you in a minute.'

You know, these men have a language of their own, as thieves have. 'I will be ready for you in a minute'—they knew what that meant.

Brant and I went into a room near-by. In a few minutes Preston came into that room, and handed me $50 in $2 bills. He said nothing and went out again.

That silence is significant.

Then Brant said there was a party we were to meet. We went downstairs and out into the yard. As we did so, Brant said: 'Here he is now.' I did not know the man. I handed him the $50. We made some apology for keeping him waiting. He said, 'I am damn near frozen.' Another man was with him. Brant said this was a party worker to take the man with the money to the right people.

Mind, to the right people. Please note that.

Brant and I returned to the same room. In a little while the man called McDonald, Ontario government employee, came in. He handed me another $50 in twos. He did not say anything. You see, he also observes silence. With these gentlemen speech is silver, and silence is golden—they are students of Carlyle.

Brant and I went downstairs again. Brant introduced me to a young fellow to be my guide. This young fellow told me he was a delivery boy on a grocery wagon. The boy had a list of persons to be seen. He took me to the houses and told me how much I was to pay at each place.

Another boy corrupted; another boy debauched by those acolytes of the new Liberalism in behalf of which the right hon. gentleman has turned his back on the Laurier of last year, the Laurier that the Globe praised. Oh, the pity of it!

I went in and paid the money; the arrangements had already been made. The highest sum I paid was $6, the lowest $4.

You see again the system. These have all been arranged by somebody else.

I went to six or seven places. Only one man was absent. I paid each of the others. I returned to the hotel about midnight and met Brant. I said I was tired and had to return to Oshawa, and wanted no more of that.

I may say that this remark seems to me, from a careful study of the affidavit, to show that in this army, just as soldiers are proud of being hussars or mounted riflemen or infantrymen, this man is proud of his superior function. This man seems to take special pride in his own wing of the army of scoundrellism, and he regards mere direct bribing as beneath his artistic mind.

I gave the boy $4, and handed the remainder of the money to Brant, telling him he could see the few names still on the list. I got to Oshawa at two o'clock in the morning of the election day and went to Toronto by that morning train. That was the only occasion on which I used money for votes. On the Saturday night before the election I met Alexander Smith at the Commercial Hotel, Whitby.

Again the organizer.

I showed him the items of my expenses in my memorandum book. He said that was all right, and gave me between $70 and $80, which was the balance due to me under the arrangement made by O'Gorman, after deducting what had been paid to me on account by O'Gorman and by Smith.

Showing that Smith pays the debt incurred by O'Gorman. Fancy the amount of money that these people must have been dispensing when all this money goes to one man. How much was paid out to the others acting in a similar fashion?

Mr. TAYLOR. And, where does it all come from?

Mr. DAVIN. It comes, in the end, of course, from the pockets of the honest farmer, the honest mechanic, and the honest storekeeper.

The method of spoiling ballots which I was employed to explain, and did explain, to deputy returning officers in elections for the local legislature, is worked by the deputy himself, and at the time of counting ballots after the close of the poll. When the ballots are turned out of the box upon the table, it is usual for the scrutineers to assist the deputy in opening out the ballots and laying them face downwards in a pile upon the table. The deputy then takes up one with his left hand, looks at the cross, and holds the ballot paper at one end with the finger and thumb of his left hand, and at the other end with the finger and thumb of his right hand. If the ballot is properly marked and if he does not wish to spoil it, he lays it face downward on the table and calls out the vote. He proceeds thus with each ballot in succession. But he places ballots spoiled by the voter in a separate pile, also face downwards, until he has so examined all the ballots. So often as a deputy wishes to spoil a ballot, he selects one properly marked on behalf of the other parties, and while looking at it and holding it as described, with finger and thumb of both hands, he makes a mark or scroll upon it with a bit of lead secured under the thumb-nail of his right hand. Any mark will answer his purpose, for he himself is to be the judge whether or not it spoils the vote. He places each one thus spoiled by himself with the pile of ballots spoiled by careless voters. At the conclusion of his examination, all the spoiled ballots are exhibited in rotation to the scrutineers, the objections are discussed, and of course the deputy decides that the votes spoiled by him cannot be counted. He can thus take from the other party as many votes as he chooses to spoil. A deputy, with little practice, can spoil a ballot without danger of detection. The danger is rather that he may overwork the scheme.

Last night we had the hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) make what, in the light of these revelations, was an impudent argument. He quoted the number of Liberals elected at the general elections and the number of by-elections that the government had gained, but is it not marvellous that we should have gained a single by-election when we had a regular army of scoundrelism, such as this, working against us? Those electors who could not be debauched by bribery—a sufficient percentage of these honest voters had their ballots stolen to destroy the election. Is it not a wonder that we carried any election?

A deputy officer, with a little practice, can spoil a ballot without danger of detection. The only danger is that he may overdo the scheme.

9. The slipping of a vote is, in elections for the legislature, accomplished thus: When the deputy is calling off the good votes he does not permit the scrutineers to look at the face of the ballot. He contends that he, as deputy, is alone entitled to examine the ballot, for, if a scrutineer could examine it, he might also discover the numbers, and so trace the voter. Therefore, he decides that he alone can look at the ballot counted. When calling off the ballot vote to one or other of the candidates, he from time to time calls to his own side a vote really given to the opposite party, and thus changes or slips the vote and refuses permission to check what he may be doing. This does not require an expert, but it does require a little nerve, and the selection of some men as deputies who at need can be daring and take some risk.

(Sgd.) J. G. PRITCHETT.

The above-named deponent, John G. Pritchett, being duly sworn, says that he has read the foregoing affidavit by him signed and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true in substance and in fact of his own knowledge. Subscribed and sworn to at the city of Detroit, in the state of Michigan, one of the United States of America, this 29th day of December, 1899, before me,

(Sgd.) WILLIAM L. CARPENTER,
Circuit Judge,
Third Judicial Circuit, Michigan.

(Seal of the Circuit Court.)

If you take that affidavit alone, it discloses a state of things perfectly alarming. You cannot get over its substantiality. To say that Pritchett is a scoundrel does not affect it at all? If he was not a scoundrel, would he have done the things he says he did? Is the man who turns Queen's evidence, and thus enables conviction to be brought home to criminals, not to be believed when his evidence is corroborated? Take the other affidavits, take the evidence which was given before the committee, and we are face to face with one of the most fearful conditions of things that any free community could contemplate.

The Globe newspaper, on August 4 last, after the evidence was taken before the committee, thus spoke of this West Huron election:

Although the inquiry is not yet completed, enough had been elicited to cast very grave doubts over the manner in which the election was conducted.

Was the election a fair election, or was it carried by fraud? If the latter, there ought to be no hesitation about resigning the constituency, and thus effecting the same result as if the sitting member had been unseated by the court.

I do not want to say anything against the character of one of our colleagues in this House, but an argument has been based on his reputation. Let me read, in this connection, the evidence of Mr. Holmes, examined by Mr. Russell:

Q. Mr. Hoimes, a statement has been made here at second-hand about some conversation you had with Farr, the deputy returning officer at No. 3, Goderich, after the election; did you meet Farr?—A. I did.

Q. Just relate the circumstances?—A. I was in Goderich a day or two after the elections—I don't remember exactly how long, but not long—I was in Goderich a day or two after the election, and as I was passing along with a friend he said: 'That is Farr, the man they are talking about,' or words to that effect, and he said, 'I will introduce him to you,' and he introduced him to me.

I think it very extraordinary that at that time, when the people were saying that Farr was one of the men that plundered the ballot boxes in the town of Goderich, this hon. gentleman was quite ready to meet him. The only witness who would dare to face the evidence of Pritchett is a man named Lewis, and he traversed the statement made by Pritchett. But, here is what Chief Justice Meredith said of this man Lewis in the Waterloo case:

That the witness Lewis was a party to it is also established—notwithstanding his denial by oath—by an overwhelming weight in quality as well as quantity of evidence. After hearing his own evidence, one is not surprised to hear of his being engaged in bribery and other corrupt practices.

I would like to have time to go further into this matter, but I have to go away; but, we have now such a state of things revealed that unless the government will inquire into the charges made and probe them to the utmost, it will stand condemned before the people. It will not do for the government to set up a clever lawyer, such as the hon. junior member for Halifax, to make a nisi prius defence of these scoundrels; it will not do for the government to have a clever lawyer, like my hon. friend the Solicitor General, get up and make a kind of defence of Pritchett, as he did last night. Of course, he did not actually take a brief from Pritchett, but he made a kind of defence of him. That will not help him at all, and certainly it will not help the government.

Let me call attention to this fact, that as soon as the Committee on Privileges and Elections met last session, for some reason or other the government appeared to have come to the decision that the men who were accused of these corrupt practices were persons who had to be shielded by prominent Liberals and ministers of the Crown. The proceedings of these hon. gentlemen in the committee at once revealed that course of action, and why was such a course taken? No doubt because these men were workers in the interest of the Liberal party. That is the only inference that can be drawn, and we find that the leaders of the Liberal organization, such men as Smith, were here in close consultation with one of the ministers of the Crown, and we can readily conceive his exclaiming: What are you doing?

Cummings! Why, this man Cummings is a worker for the Liberal party; why are you going to level the thunders of inquiry, the thunders of parliamentary reprobation at him? So, we had the spectacle of ministers of the Crown and leading Liberals trying to burk that inquiry when it was going on; and now we have a government taking its stand on a position which can never get the approval of Canada. For Canada is sound at heart; the mass of the Liberal party are sound at heart; and, Sir, you will never get the old Liberal party, the party whose heart found expression in that leader in the Globe that I have just quoted, and the leader in the Globe that I quoted, to back up the government in the stand it takes with the Pritchetts—for Pritchett was driven out by accident from the ranks of the party—the Vances, the Smiths, the Farris, and the Cap Sullivans. And, as I say, what we are face to face with to-day is that what should be the proud government of the greatest of England's colonies is so closely associated with these electioneering scoundrels that they are like eels in that mudhole I described. There they are in that mudhole of political corruption. And their conduct will meet with the condign punishment and reprobation of the people of Canada.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the House will agree with me when I say that the dramatic effort to which we have just listened has seldom been equalled in this House. When Dante in his old age used to go through the streets of Florence, the Florentines would say: 'There walks the man who walked through hell.' When I heard the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Davin's) dramatic effort in reading that affidavit, I felt: Ah, you have been there; you have been through it all. And I will show, before I sit down—and I trust the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) will not leave—by witnesses from his own constituency, that he is here by purchased votes. It is a well-known maxim, that the man who goes into court to seek equity must have clean hands. Now, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) may want to go away, I will refer to the matter first.

Mr. DAVIN. I will stay until six o'clock to oblige you.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I will not detain the hon. gentleman. This is a late revelation. Two days ago, the hon. gentleman insisted that certain papers should be brought down. As they related to a Nova Scotian, I was curious to see what they contained. They related to the case of Mr. Gass, a native of Nova Scotia, and a man of very respectable family, who was postmaster at Moosejaw, in the constituency of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPROULE. What has that to do with the question before the House?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) will listen—well, no, I should not. The papers were brought down, as I said, relating to the dismissal of that postmaster. For the reasons I have explained, I wanted to know why he was dismissed. I discovered, on reading the papers, that he had been dismissed for partisanship of a very reprehensible character. And, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), in place of protecting this man, has brought attention to himself, and so, to these matters, he will understand why I refer to the case. Mr. Gass was accused of having done certain things—for example, celebrating the withdrawal of the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Davin) petition against return; canvassing; being chairman of the Conservative committee; and lastly, writing for 'the stuff' on behalf of the hon. gentleman. All I need refer to is one letter written by Mr. Gass to Mr. Hamilton, a barrister in Regina, who was a friend and supporter of the hon. gentleman, to see a Mr. Hamilton, who, I understand, is the chairman of the Conservative Association in that district. The letter is as follows:

Moosejaw, June 17, 1896.

Dear Sir,—We received word from Wood Mountain to-day by a man from there who said there was only about four or five there going to vote for Mr. Davin, and the rest was for McInnis; you had better wire Thompson, also send what we were speaking about by morning's mail, or lend some.

Yours in haste,
(Sgd.) C. A. GASS.

Mr. Hamilton,
Barrister, Regina, Assa.

I took the trouble to look up the Wood Mountain polling district. There were twenty-nine voters there. Of these, twenty-seven voted. One ballot was rejected, leaving twenty-six votes to be counted. I discovered that not four or five, but sixteen in that election voted for the hon. gentleman, leaving only ten for his opponent, and putting the hon. gentleman in the constituency equal with the man who opposed him. Now, I draw the inference, a much clearer inference than any the hon. gentleman drew, that 'the stuff' went into that district, and that the difference between five votes and sixteen, that is eleven votes, represented the effect of it; in other words, that eleven votes were purchased with 'the stuff.' And this man rises here and talks like a moral cyclone! He would give us to suppose that in him was contained all the morality of the world. But, the inference is clear, clearer than any inference he drew from the affidavit he read, that 'the stuff' that went into Wood Mountain polling subdivision, had its effect, that flagrant corruption was practised, that this is a purchased community, and that he sits here as the representative of purchased votes.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I appeal to hon. gentlemen on this side if that is not much clearer than the wild declamation we heard a few moments ago. As the hon. gentleman closed his hands like a saint in prayer, I said to myself: What an exhibition? You would think that this man never had any 'stuff' in his elections, and that a Hamilton and a Thompson never had anything to do with his election. Now, all that I am going to say about that is, that I am not in favour of corruption, but I am not going to be a hypocrite and say that this country is so pure that corruption is a new and almost unknown thing. The truth is, and a man will admit that if he is honest, that, unfortunately, there is not an election run in Canada but there is something wrong about it.

Mr. DAVIN. There never was a cent improperly spent in West Assinibola.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). How does that statement compare with this letter by Mr. Gass? He says that they were talking about the money and begs Mr. Hamilton to send it; but, if it had all gone out of his hands, if it had been all paid over to the man who was running, he should lend more. When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) says that there never was a cent improperly spent in West Assinibola, I will not accept his statement or that of any member of the House of Commons who says the same thing. I can understand the case of the man who has fifteen hundred or sixteen hundred majority, but there is no man who runs in a close constituency but, at times, his friends do things that are wrong. And the man who says that not a dollar has been spent improperly in the constituency, will not be believed in this House or in his constituency, because the facts are against him. I am only showing how easy it is to talk morals when a man does not take his own conduct into consideration; how easy it is for a man to pose as a purist when he has so short a memory as to forget his past, or so dull a conscience as to ignore it. I only show the consistency of the man who, as I say, with the fury of a moral cyclone, thunders his philippics against corruption in this country. If he is satisfied with what he has brought upon himself, I think the House is. Now, where do we stand as regards this investigation? I want first of all to emphasize what my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) has said. He threw out a challenge. Every student of English history knows that the English parliament was at one time a court as well as a parliament, and that when the functions were divided, the one went to the judicial and the other to the legislative body. Now, my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax said that we could inquire into anything, but the result would be inoperative because we could not put it into execution. Suppose, for example, the case of the member for Assinibola West (Mr. Davin), this House could inquire into the fact that he received $175 of money that he never gave any consideration for; we could inquire into that, but our trouble would be that we could do no more than inquire and show it was wrong. We could not get the money back, there is no method of execution by which we could get it by civil process or criminal process. Therefore, the whole thing would be inoperative. The hon. gentleman does not seem to understand the functions. I suppose he might be prosecuted for $400, but I am sure of this, that he is thankful there is no power in his parliament that can collect it or enforce a verdict, should such a verdict be given. Therefore where do we stand? One year ago we were asked to investigate the case of two returning officers.

Mr. DAVIN. I want to ask the hon. gentleman a question. Does he say here that I received $400, for which I gave no value?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I said no such thing. I stated a supposititious case,— 'supposing the hon. gentleman.' I know a little too much to refer to what has taken place before a committee in another place, you will not catch me on that. I was stating a supposititious case, and I would make it $200, or I would make it $403, but I took $400 in place of $403. Now a year ago we were asked to investigate two cases in West Huron and two cases alone, and only as against deputy returning officers. We were asked to inquire into the Brockville election without any specification of any officer. We did inquire, and in reply to any charge that may be brought against this side of the House or against the Premier, the Premier distinctly said: Yes, inquire into that. Now we can inquire into anything. There is nothing to prevent this parliament from inquiring into the debts due by every man in Canada to another man; there is nothing to prevent this parliament from inquiring into a case of murder, nothing at all. We can do what we like; but when we have done it we cannot give any kind of force or execution to our work. Hon. gentlemen opposite are forgetting that distinction, which was pointed out by the junior member for Halifax.

Well, we went into that investigation, and we spent many days over these two cases. I thought this year we were to have something new. I thought this year there were other deputy returning officers who did not do their duty. The hon. senior member for Halifax and his friends had the whole year to find out if there was anything else wrong in West Huron, and the whole year to find one specific charge in Brockville; and I thought this year we were to have a specific resolution setting out new things and asking this committee to inquire. But when I found it was the same old resolution that we had to inquire into, the same resolution that we had already spent days inquiring into, I said to myself: What, we did inquire into this, and nothing was proved; and now we are going on to spend the time of members of parliament inquiring into a thing that the fullest opportunity was given to inquire into, and nothing was proved. So far as the evidence that was given before that committee was concerned, I want to refer to what the member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) said, namely, that not only every voter got a ballot from the returning officer, went into the room, marked the ballot, came out, delivered the ballot to the returning officer, saw it in almost every case deposited in the box, and both the Conservative and Liberal scrutineers were there looking closely at everything that was done. But that was not all. When the poll closed the box was opened and counted in the presence of the Conservative agents, the result was totted up and returned to the presiding officer for the riding, and, he took away that list, and that list stands to-day. Now I ask any man in his senses, supposing himself to be a juror, and throwing aside for the moment all his political views, what conclusion would he come to on those facts?

Mr. DAVIN. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I think the hon. gentleman won't object to the fairness of my asking him to read the report of the inspector. I think he ought to read Inspector McLeod's report.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I will before I sit down. As I was saying, the ballots were all counted, and all parties agreed as to the number, the box was closed, the ballots put back again, and the number as found then is the number to-day. I ask any man, if he can throw aside his political prejudices for a moment, whether he would not come to the conclusion that so far as that deputy returning officer was concerned there was no wrong-doing.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Did not all that take place in West Huron? Were there not scrutineers, and were not the ballots put in in presence of the scrutineers?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I know nothing about West Huron, it was not before the committee, and I prefer not to go into a discussion of a subject that was not before the committee. I do not need to find any explanation at all for those men who gave testimony, that is not the business of this House. I want to emphasize that this committee had to do with Mr. Cummings, and I ask any honest and honourable man in this House to put himself in the place of the man that was watching the box in the interest of the Conservative party, who swears that he saw all that was done right up to the time the last vote was polled, saw every ballot counted, saw the returning officer take away the list, which list remains to-day; and I ask any hon. gentleman if he could listen for a moment to anybody telling him that he was either blind, or careless, and that the polls were manipulated. I can understand that if the same ballot that was given was not shown to have gone into the box, there might be something. And remember, Mr. Speaker, we were only trying this one thing—the wrong-doing of the presiding officer. There was nothing else beyond that. I know that hon. gentlemen opposite did not start out for that. I think there is no lawyer on the other side of the House but will admit that when a case is specifically stated, if he wants to go into that he is confined to it, and I feel pretty sure that the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) never intended anything except looking into these two cases. I believe that he did not, but moved by the forces from behind who wanted either to cover their past or to lay the foundation to work themselves back into power, and they will have to do that if they ever expect to get in, he was shoved forward, and he tries to make out by his speech an entirely different case from that which he made out before and he makes an entirely different case from that which he specifies in his resolution. I may be asked: What about these voters? Well, if I have to say anything, I will say, that, as a juror, I come to the conclusion, as was said before, that these men are mistaken. I will not say deliberately mistaken, but, there is not a lawyer who tries a case in a court but finds this to be true that a witness begins by saying that a certain thing took place; he repeats it to a neighbour, and he goes on repeating it until what did take place may be entirely different from what he honestly thought did take place. He will go into court and swear that what he has stated is true, and if he is dishonest, he will do it all the more willingly. You must remember, as was pointed out, that these voters were men in an ordinary condition of life. They did not understand, in the first place, what they were signing, and there is always, in a man's positive statement a fear that his neighbour will find out how he voted. Consequently, after having made the statement, he must swear to it. It is a common expression, 'I will swear.' Once he has made a statement, he says, 'I will swear to it,' and he does. It happens every day in court. There is not a lawyer in this parliament to-day but has had the same experience again and again in court. Our minds are deceptive. Our minds take in certain ideas, and after a couple of days, or weeks, these ideas become to us realities, which, at first, were only shadowy things. But, added to that, is the fact that there is the reason that they should swear as they sign. They felt that their honour was at stake and they feared that they would be the laughing-stock of the community. Men could say to them: You signed a paper, but you did not swear to it. And I can understand how it is that these men say: Perhaps, after all, it is the case. At least, it is the safest thing for us, all around to do. They are like a Scotchman who one time amazed even his confederate in crime by swearing distinctly that his confederate was not there. He said, knowing the judge, who was a fearful man in his punishments—and these men have the fear of public opinion as the Scotchman had of the judge—that he had sworn as he had because he said: 'I would rather trust my destiny with a merciful covenant-keeping God than you judge.' We, who have practised in the courts can appreciate how these things come about. The hon gentleman said that there were two things required. First, we ought to inquire into a system of corruption, and secondly, we ought to amend the criminal law. This parliament cannot inquire into a system of corruption. The courts are for that, or a commission. This parliament, as I said, has the inherent power to do it, but you might as well expect that the power given to the courts in other things would be exercised by this parliament as that jurisdiction should be exercised in this case. My second point is that if the hon. member for Western Assinibola (Mr. Davin) is not very busy he can frame, in a few minutes an amendment to the criminal law, submit it to parliament and it can be passed. If he does that I will promise him my support, and if he mentions in that change anything about this Mr. — I forget the gentleman's name whose affidavit he so dramatically read—Pritchett, I would suggest that he might strike at him too. It struck me that the very circumstantiality of that affidavit of Pritchett is the best proof that it is a lie. Any person who has read what has been said in regard to the affidavits of Titus Oates will remember that there it was said that there never were any written papers that went into a matter with greater circumstantiality than these did. They were so circumstantial and they went into such detail that actually the judges could not conceive that any man could lie as the affidavits of Titus Oates did. Not only that, but the affidavits of his confederates were of the same character. Let any man read the accounts of these trials. I am sure my hon. friend must have read them. He must have forgotten a strong point brought out in them, and it was that their very weakness was disclosed when it was discovered that the affidavits were so precise and so circumstantial in every detail. An honest man does not go minutely into details. It is only a man who has studied who does that. I wish that this affidavit of Pritchett had been taken in Canada. I am not acting as counsel for any of the men that he speaks about, but I will guarantee to the hon. member, or to any hon. member on the other side of the House, that, if Pritchett's affidavit is made before a competent authority in Canada, where he can be prosecuted I will resign my seat, if not less than a dozen of these people cannot have him in jail and prove him to be a perjurer.

Mr. BENNETT. Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Yes.

Mr. BENNETT. Is the hon. gentleman not aware that a week ago this same man Pritchett, in the town of St. Thomas, gave evidence of a similar character against a large number of men, and furthermore, is he aware, or will he not agree that having given that evidence under oath he is now liable to prosecution in the province of Ontario by the provincial government, who have the conducting of criminal prosecutions?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The hon. gentleman is attempting to run away to another county. I am talking about these two counties. I am not going to turn aside and go into Ontario government matters. The hon. gentleman thinks that when a man is speaking of Dominion matters he is going to introduce local elections on the same ground. I am speaking of an affidavit which is made in reference to an election held in Brockville, and if that affidavit is made in Canada I will guarantee that he will have enough of it. The strange think about it is where the affidavit was made. I want to say further, that it was stated and not denied—I make the exact statement which was made and not denied—that there does exist a warrant issued by hon. gentlemen opposite or their friends for the arrest of that man, and they have it or they have destroyed it. Now, is that the kind of men who want to bring criminals to justice? Put that one fact alongside of all their vaporings and moral ravings that we have heard this afternoon, and where do they stand? It was very strange indeed that the affidavits of this man Pritchett were got in the United States.

Mr. TAYLOR. He was over there working for the Liberal party.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Indeed. Why does not your party take an affidavit from Pritchett here, where he could be indicted for perjury. Oh, no, the Conservatives took very good care to follow the man to the United States, and not to get his affidavit in Canada.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). The Liberal party paid him to stay there.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Then the Tory party must have paid him more to induce him to come back.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I reached a point in discussing the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), where I was attempting to show that the result of our investigation last year proved clearly, that in the two cases specified there was nothing to indicate that the two deputy returning officers were guilty of any wrong-doing. I have mentioned, that acting as a jurymen on that occasion. I could only come to one conclusion, and that is, that so far as they were concerned they did nothing that was wrong. Whatever might be said about what happened in West Huron, I believe that the two specific cases that were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections were not proven. Therefore, if I am correct, there was an absolute failure before the committee last year to prove the charges specified. I had hoped this year, when the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) spoke about bringing up this case, that he would have acted as he would in court, and have consented to a non-suit upon the cases he laid last year, and then specifically made new allegations and a new case this year. I can understand very well how, after the investigation made during the year, he might have discovered new evidence (if there was any to discover) and if the affidavit he read this year were true, it gave him sufficient basis to make out an entirely new case this year to send before the committee. I am bound to say that had he specifically made new allegations this year, and dropped those of last year, that we would feel on general principles that, following the precedent of last year, they ought to go before the committee. But even with that affidavit, the hon. member (Mr. Borden) did not feel that there was one new statement in it, that would warrant him in making one other charge so far as West Huron was concerned. He either must have felt that the affidavit did not contain in itself any evidence on which he could formulate a charge against any other returning officer in West Huron, or—and this is what probably occurred to him—he felt that the affidavit was of such a character that it could not be believed, and that no charge could be made on it. There was another course that I thought perhaps the hon. gentleman might take. Failing to make a new statement on the lines laid down by last year's motion, then if the statement is correct that there was widespread corruption, so ruinous in its tendency, it would seem to me that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) would have made a motion calculated to stop this corruption that is stalking all over the Dominion, and that he would have put the government to the test by asking them to appoint a commission of judges to inquire into it. He would have at least the action of the Ontario government to quote in favour of that course. Not that such a commission would as a matter of course be granted; but it would at least put him upon the ground that would appeal to both sides of the House and, I think, to the country, as indicating, first, his belief in the existence of widespread corruption, and, secondly, his earnest and prayerful desire that it should be put down. But what does the hon. gentleman do? With that shrewdness for which he is noted, he says: 'I will do just what I did last year; I was safe in doing that; I did not prove it last year, and I will be limited by the narrow bounds I laid down for myself before the Committee on Privileges and Elections last year; and I will make it appear to the country that when we went before that committee, we had no opportunity.' The country would not understand until the explanation was given, that the inquiry was limited to the very words he chose himself to attach to that inquiry, and consequently no House, as no court that consulted its own dignity, would for a moment permit this motion to go beyond it. We stand, therefore, just where the hon. gentleman's motion now puts us. He moves just as before:

That the poll books, voters' lists, and all other papers, letters and documents and memoranda relating to the last election for the electoral district of Brockville and the last election for the electoral district of the west riding of the county of Huron, which were referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections during the last session of the House, and also all proceedings and evidence had, given, taken or received by or before the said Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections during the last session of this House respecting the matters aforesaid, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections appointed during the present session of this House, for further consideration, and for the purpose of inquiring into and investigating the conduct of the respective returning officers and of the several deputy returning and other officers at and in connection with the said several elections respectively, and of reporting thereon with all convenient speed.

This limits the inquiry in the same way as before ; therefore, we cannot go beyond that just now ; we are bound by that. Now, is it worth insisting on what the result would be, if we went into an inquiry into the conduct of every returning officer both in West Huron and in Brockville ? I was amazed when my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax, asked the opposition, what would you do, provided you inquired and discovered that there was a wrong ? He said, what I thought was not only good common sense, but good law. 'The most you could do, would be to imprison, and your imprisonment would end with the termination of the session.' Now this is a remarkable thing, and I call the attention of the House and the country to it. Was there an hon. gentleman opposite, who ever attempted either to find out that we could do that, or to support their position by showing when it was ever done ? And there are abundant opportunities for them to find out what has been done from time immemorial in this respect. Previous to confederation, all election petitions in Canada were tried by parliament ; and previous to fifty years ago, I believe, every election petition in England, was tried before the House of Commons itself. So that, there would be many cases tried and decisions had, and if any case could be found to support the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite, there would be no difficulty in finding it—that a returning officer had done something wrong, and parliament had dealt with him. As a matter of fact, they could not find a case, because parliament would not put into effect any punishment outside of construing the party's conduct as a contempt and imprisoning him. What end would be gained, then, Mr. Speaker ? What end is desired to be gained ? It does seem to me that the whole purpose of this is not the purifying of the electorate of this country, but attempting to find, in the present bankrupt condition of the Conservative party of any issue, some little matter which they could bring before the electors to show that something was wrong with the government. Need I repeat, Mr. Speaker, what has been said so often, that if this widespread state of corruption had prevailed, why did not the hon. gentleman go into court ? Why did not the party as a whole, do so, in the interest of the purity of the electorate, in the interest of themselves, if their statement is truthful, that the party now in power are debauching the electorate of this country, in order to maintain themselves in power ? Might I suggest that if they were honest, and if that was the state of things, they would have conduced much more to their further advancement as a party, if they had taken that course, instead of simply speaking here without taking any action ?

I was very much amused at the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler). For a gentleman who has on more than one occasion proclaimed himself as independent, he is the strangest exhibition of independency I ever saw. Here is a man who says he is so independent, and before he was done he made a more bitter speech than I have heard made even from the oldest sinners on the other side, who have lived in their—

Mr. CASGRAIN. Their juice.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I would not speak of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken in that way, though I believe he did take a hand in local politics in the same direction, and I do not think he has been here long enough to learn all that he will learn from his associates around him. But fancy a man rising in his place to proclaim himself independent, and making this bitter speech. Was it fair for him to indicate that there was something wrong, for example, in connection with the Drummond road ? These were his words : 'The Drummond deal,' he called it, 'an iniquitous transaction.' Fancy if you can, Mr. Speaker, an hon. gentleman of his ability, surrounded by other hon. gentlemen of great ability, moving and having a being with such a brilliant man and lawyer as the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), and coming from that province, and not a single step taken to bring that iniquitous transaction to light ? Just fancy, for example, a man saying, crime is everywhere, I saw it committed,' and standing by and making no effort to prosecute it ? And fancy the condition of this independent member who sits in this House and permits an infamous transaction of that kind to be committed, which only means that this country has been robbed, and not having the manliness to push an inquiry and see the parties brought to justice ? Does he think that the country is going to accept a statement so sweeping and strongly put, and which is contradicted by his own conduct in sitting in this House in silent and slavish inaction ? Might not he himself be charged with criminal conduct in that regard ? One would suppose that the hon. gentleman would have been careful to guard himself against admitting that any such transactions occurred while he sat in this House and drew no attention to it. When I heard him make that statement, I could not understand what was the matter with him. I felt that he was not himself at all, and that somebody must have provoked him into forgetting himself. I would not, I trust, bring charges like that across the House and then confess that I was imbecile enough and helpless enough to sit here during five sessions, without having had the manliness of endeavouring at least to have some action taken to bring the perpetrators of the wrongs now complained of to justice. It is very curious, when one comes to sift these things down, to find how easy it is to make statements, and how easily hon. gentlemen will content themselves with making general statements. Here we have hon. gentlemen opposite making such wild statements, and not one of them with sufficient manliness to take his political life in his hands by rising in this House and making a direct, specific charge. I should think that when guilty of such want of manliness, of such imbecility, to remain silent would be their best course. For, after all, is it not more manly to act well than to speak ill? Is it not rather an indication of the pluck and ability of a man that he should bring to justice the wrong-doers, than that he should simply content himself with vague and general allegations of wrong-doing? I see very little difference between making a general statement about one man and making it about a whole party. Suppose, for example, I were to say that all hon. members on the opposite side were corrupt, and yet was not manly enough to stand up in my place, and make a direct specific charge and attempt to prove it—

Mr. CRAIG. You did say that we were all corrupt a while ago. The hon. gentleman said that there was not a member in this House who was elected except by corrupt practices.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I did not say anything of the kind, but I did say this, and this even the virtuous member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) will not deny, that there is not a member elected for this House, in whose election some of his friends did not do something to contravene the law. I make that statement and let there be no misunderstanding about it, and let not the hon. member for East Durham draw his cloak of political morality around it. I would venture to say that even in his county, in his election, there were violations of the Act committed by his choicest and best friends.

Mr. CRAIG. You would venture to say anything at all.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I will not only venture to say that of the hon. member's election, but will venture to say it concerning the election of any member of this House. I would not charge any hon. member with violating the law. I never said that a member of parliament would do that.

Mr. CRAIG. The hon. gentleman has spoken about other hon. members making general statements, and all that sort of thing, but what is he now doing? No man has the right to venture to say anything unless he knows it.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Let me, first of all, draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that I am not uttering a single word against any hon. gentleman on that side. I am simply making the general statement, which applies to any county in the Dominion of Canada—which applies to myself as well as every other hon. member in this House—namely, that no member of parliament ever ran a contested election in which some violation of the law relating to elections was not committed by some of his friends. And when the hon. member for East Durham poses as a virtuous man, seized with righteous indignation on hearing such a statement, he only brings himself into contempt. Such is the state of things in this world that you cannot have it otherwise, and I only made this statement to show this House what little value we can attach to these general charges of corruption. Let me make this further statement to show that I am not actuated by any personal animus. I had an election petition over my head, on which 120 witnesses were heard, and I was sustained in my seat.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
By a close shave.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Not at all. The chief justice and Justice Maher, who tried the case, were two as good justices as we could desire to try any case, and they had no possible sympathy with me or my friends, and I mention this to show that I am not talking about any man in particular, but about all members of parliament—and I have no doubt in my election, some of my friends did things—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
Oh, no.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Oh, yes, and the hon. gentleman knows very well of a great many things that are done in elections. What else could be expected? All I have to say is that the Act of parliament relating to elections is so drawn that it is as impossible for a man to run an election contest and keep exactly within the law as it is for any man in this House to keep within the moral law as there laid down.

Mr. CLANCY. That would be a very convenient thing for the hon. gentleman to announce to his constituents.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). There would be nothing inconvenient at all about it.

Mr. CLANCY. I said convenient.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Or convenient. No doubt the hon. gentleman who interrupts me would not make such a statement concerning himself, for fear he might be called upon to account for it. But let us understand the position I take. What I have said was not intended to cast a reflection on that side or this, but simply to show that what occurred in West Huron, even as indicated by hon. gentlemen opposite, is not beyond what occurred in hundreds of cases not inquired into. Let me give you, Mr. Speaker, one case down in the county of Cape Breton. This is what happened in that particular case. Two cargoes of oats were bought, one of which was paid for by the then member for the county—I do not know whether its present representative was then the member or not—and the man who paid for it got his money back. But the second cargo was shipped direct to the hon. member, and was distributed for nothing among his electors, and the poor man who sold the cargo said he never got a dollar for it, although the party opposite got the benefit. But will it be said that corruption was rampant in the province of Nova Scotia because of that individual case? And even admitting that all that is alleged to have occurred did occur in West Huron, and even supposing that wrong was committed in Brockville, are we therefore to conclude that this country is corrupt from end to end? I only mention these things to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that when they make the wild statement they do, they show simply that they do not understand the conditions that will be found to exist in every country, or are simply wilfully misunderstanding them in order to try and be effective.

We ought not to go into this matter because we went into it last year and the case failed completely, and because there is now before us no new statement which would warrant our bringing the case again before the committee. Because, I agree with the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), that this was not the proper tribunal before which to try such a case. I am ready to maintain that this House is as good as any House of Commons or any House of parliament in the world. Yet, I will venture to say that there is not a member here, not even excepting the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), who is absolutely free from party bias. There are hon. gentlemen opposite who are apt to think that nothing outside of their own party can be good. The way in which hon. members on both sides fly at a question indicates that we are not of the character of independent judges. So long as we are in politics, we cannot try a party question in this House free from party bias. Any man in this House who said we could would be laughed at even by his own friends. If a question relating to an election comes here, you cannot have it treated from an independent point of view, no matter what party is in power. Hence, the wisdom of this parliament delegating this work to the courts, which were absolutely outside of politics and can take an independent view. Does any man deny that that was a proper course to take? I did not object to following up the question so far as the conduct of these officials was concerned, though I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that these were officials of this parliament. But, I am not going so much into that question; but when I hear such speeches as I have already heard from hon. gentlemen opposite and as will probably be repeated, I cannot but feel that party feeling prevents this from being a proper court in which to try such questions as are involved in these cases. It is difficult for a man in politics to forget his party, just as it is difficult for a man to be uninfluenced by the fact that he was brought up a Baptist, a Methodist or a Presbyterian.

I oppose this motion also because I think it would not be wise for this parliament to spend more money and occupy more time with those matters that should be devoted to other purposes. Do hon. gentlemen opposite think that they are going to help their cause simply by making these general statements and using hard words? I ask, in all candour, if these general charges of bribery, criminal acts, dreadful corruptions, ulcers of corruption—if all these charges and hard words are going to serve any useful end? Do these hon. gentlemen think that the people of this country are so ignorant as to believe that, even admitting, for the sake of argument, that there was wrong-doing in West Huron—none has ever been shown in Brockville—this shows universal corruption throughout the country? If hon. gentlemen opposite think that they are furthering the good of this country, the purity of election or their own advantage in making these general statements, I can only say I do not agree with them. If I were unkind enough, I might retort in kind. I might show wrong-doing in various counties represented by hon. gentlemen opposite, giving instances from every province of the Dominion, and might infer from that that there was general wrong-doing throughout the country. But, I forbear from that for two reasons—first, that that would not be an excuse for wrong-doing by others; and, second, that it would not prove any general corruption. But the people know that, even if the two cases brought forward had been proved to the hilt, that is not sufficient reason for putting in a party with such a record as that of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite. But, I will not go into that. I say they have not made out a case, and, therefore, I believe we should not enter upon it. Hon. gentlemen opposite may think differently; that does not make my position right or theirs right. But, holding the views I do, I shall oppose the motion in favour of sending these cases again to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, where they failed so ignominiously last time. I suppose we must bear these general statements and these violent charges. For my part, I am perfectly content to do so. But, I maintain that I can make out a stronger case against the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) who preceded me than he has made out against those whom he has attacked, even if his strong language was all supported by testimony. I do not say for a moment that, strong as that case is, the hon. gentleman was elected by corruption, but only—

Mr. CLANCY. Order.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). What is the point of order?

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser, Guysborough) is referring by innuendo to proceedings in a committee of this House.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) is mistaken, I made no such statement. If he had been here he might have understood what I said. A little more attention and discretion would save us time. I said that I can establish a much stronger case to show that the hon. member for West Assiniboia was returned by corruption than any statement he made, even if it had been supported by evidence. But, had I the right, even though I had the evidence there, to say: You were returned by corruption? I have ten thousand times a better case and a better right to make that statement than has any hon. gentleman to make the statement about the state of things that exists with respect to elections. Therefore, in that view of the matter, having regard to the best interests of this country, we will not any further proceed in this matter. The courts, as I said, are open. I said to the hon. gentlemen opposite that it was a strange thing they did not have the evidence of that honourable man who they say made that affidavit, sworn to in this country. I pledge myself if they got a new affidavit exactly like that sworn to in this country, that every man he has lied about will see to it that he will soon find himself behind the bars. I am talking about the affidavit he made relating to the matter under discussion, and I pledge the hon. gentlemen opposite that if they will get this man to repeat that affidavit in so far as West Huron and Brockville are concerned, he will be behind the bars in twenty-four hours. But they dare not do it. Let them put in our hands the evidence they can give, they seem to be able to get an affidavit from him, and an honest man should not be ashamed to make a second affidavit to confirm his first one.

Mr. SPROULE. Bring him before the committee and make him swear to it.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Bring him before the committee? Why didn't the hon. gentleman have him up last year? And so they expect that upon an affidavit made by a confessed perjurer and swindler they will show such corruption in this country as will arouse the people. Well, if they can do nothing better than that, I wish them God-speed, and even that speed won't save them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I trust that we should soon get to an end in this matter, and that we should proceed to do the business of the country which we were sent here to perform. If any end could be served, any good purpose gained, any punishment inflicted on the guilty by the proposition of the senior member for Halifax, I would assist him. But this whole thing will be abortive, and I refuse to be carried away to spend my time in investigating that which never can amount to anything. I refuse to do it just as much as I would refuse to attempt to try a criminal case in a court that had no jurisdiction, or try a civil case in a court of criminal jurisdiction only.

I promised the hon. member for Assiniboia to read, as I did in his absence, what the committee said about Mr. Gass's statement. I went on to show that the case was stronger than even the untrammelled statement made by the hon. gentleman himself, and on which I might found, if I were so inclined, a strong case showing that the hon. gentleman was returned by corruption.

The charge that Mr. Gass wrote a post card to Mr. Davin at Regina asking for 'more stuff' was, in the main, sustained. The communication was not by postal card to Mr. Davin, but by letter card, asking for 'what we were speaking about' to a Mr. Hamilton, barrister, who, it is understood, was chairman or president of the Conservative Association at Regina, the card itself marked 'Exhibit B.', was produced, and is herewith sent you. Previous to its production, Mr. Gass, whose evidence regarding the part he took in election matters was not as open and frank as it should have been, swore, as will be seen, as follows:

'I did not have any communication with Mr. Davin or any party in Regina in connection with the running of the election. I do not know who Mr. Davin's representatives on the committee in Regina were. Mr. Hamilton may have been one, but I did not write him or any other person on the subject, to the best of my knowledge.'

Upon being shown the card, he recognized the writing as his, admitting sending it, and that it was upon election matters, and stated that he had nothing to say in explanation except that he had forgotten about it.

That was the statement which the member for Assiniboia asked me to read, and I do so with the greatest pleasure, because I wanted it to become part of the record. I regret that a good friend from Nova Scotia should have been put in that position, and I regret all the more that the member for West Assiniboia should have insisted upon the production of a paper which I think, to say the least of it, would be better kept back, and which the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) did not want to bring down. If such friendship as that is exercised by hon. members on behalf of their constituents, I do not think it results very much to their advantage. Having these views which I have just expressed on the question before the House, I need scarcely say that I should vote against the resolution of the hon. the senior member for Halifax.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). I have been rather struck with the fact that in these serious charges made against the government by the hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), and endorsed by other members of the opposition, the defence has fallen, not upon the members of the government because we only heard one of them attempt to defend the course that they are taking—but upon a number of gentlemen who, it is asserted rightly or wrongly, are looking for the ermine to be placed upon their shoulders. I think, Sir, I would have had more confidence in their integrity, and in their good judgment, and in their knowledge of the law, if they had not spoken as they have on this question now before the House. What does the member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) tell us? What does the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) tell us, when confronted with the statements of this man Pritchett, one of their colleagues, one of their servants, one of their trusted agents in the past? The member for Guysborough says: Why don't you bring him here, why don't you get him to make these affidavits on this side of the line, and if he does, within twenty-four hours we will have him locked up in jail. Sir, it was pointed out that he is in the country now, that he had appeared in St. Thomas and gave his evidence, which they say was untrue. Why not lock him up in jail? The answer of the member for Guysborough is: Why did not they bring him before the committee last year? A nice answer to give. Don't he know that last year we had not this information, that this man Pritchett had not turned Queen's evidence then, that he was in the pay of somebody at the rate of $100 per month hiding in a foreign country, and that we could not get him here. But when the member for Guysborough pledges himself that before twenty-four hours they would have him locked up in jail if he makes certain affidavits, we refuse to accept the pledges of those hon. gentlemen. They have made pledges before which they have not redeemed, and therefore we refuse to accept their pledges until they redeem some of those that they have already made. In this very case what did they pledge themselves to do? They pledged themselves that they would have this matter investigated. The right hon. First Minister tells us what? He came before the House and earned the plaudits of the country by telling us that he was going to see that justice was done if the very heavens should fall. He said:

The purity of elections must be guarded at all costs. Such is the sanctity of the ballot, such is the sanctity of the rights of the people which they must exercise whenever they are called upon at the polls. . . . If wrong has been done at these elections, nobody ought to be shielded. If any one has contravened the law, it is fair and right that this should be investigated, and that we should know henceforth and for ever that the will of the people must be expressed as the people wish to express it, however severe the consequences may be on one side or the other.

There was the pledge made by the right hon. leader of the government himself to the parliament and to the people of Canada. How has that pledge been redeemed? To-day they utterly ignore it. As the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) says, that was a too hasty conclusion; that was a wrong conclusion. They must come to a different conclusion to-day, and the conclusion they have come to to-day is that no investigation shall be permitted. Why? Because the investigation last year showed the rascality that has been perpetrated. The investigation showed last year that the ballot had been tampered with. I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is no crime greater than interfering with the free judgment of the people. You may steal a man's money, you may steal his property, but in stealing his ballot and substituting another of an opposite kind you steal something that he cannot replace and for which he has no redress if the parliament of Canada, being appealed to, as it has been appealed to, refuses to give him satisfaction or redress. The parliament of Canada is appealed to to-day. The government have been appealed to since almost the first day of the session, since the 13th of February. By various means they have burked inquiry up to to-day, and the people of Canada will hold them responsible and charge them with the responsibility if this investigation is burked and prevented. Why is it burked and prevented? I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, before I am through. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) says: This is not a very serious matter after all. We are all poor, fallible mortals; we all do wrong. If you investigate men's careers politically you will find that there is no election in which some wrong-doing cannot be detected, and therefore we should not pursue a case like this. But, Mr. Speaker, we shall prove, and as we have proved, that this is a most widespread conspiracy, a most skilfully concocted plot by which the rights, the liberty, and the freedom of the people have been taken from them by a band of thieves, a band of robbers, and we shall connect that band of robbers with the ministers of the Crown and with the hon. First Minister himself. Have we not seen the First Minister and the sinister-looking Alexander Smith in this building in close communion during the present session? Have we not seen all these things? Cannot we connect them with the ministers of the Crown that I see here to-night and with some who are not here? We can connect the other ministers of the Crown with this band of thieves in the closest way, so that the conclusion is irresistible why these men are refusing an investigation. The hon. member for Guysborough says that there are strong party feelings in this House, and that this House is not a competent judge in such matters. He says that where these men commit crime it is to be regarded as a political question. I say that where a man commits a crime it should not be regarded as a political question, but that the people of Canada will expect that their representatives in parliament will rise above party prejudices, will rise above party strife and will pursue, as the right hon. First Minister pledged himself that he would pursue these men no matter what consequences might result. They did permit the investigation to be pursued up to a certain time. Last year 99 witnesses were summoned, they were brought before the committee, particularly for one thing—to show how they had voted in the election so as to confirm the affidavits that 43 men had made that they had voted for Mr. McLean. I remember the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) getting up and protesting against the hon. member for Kingston taking up the time of the committee and protesting that he was simply killing time by the examination of witnesses, not for the purpose of eliciting evidence, but for the purpose of blocking the investigation, and that was evidently his purpose just as the purpose of the hon. gentleman to-day is to block any further investigation. He has declared so, and other hon. members who have spoken have also declared their intention to prevent further investigation. The hon. member for Guysborough told us that we should not spend any more time over it, and that we should not spend any more money over it. He said that we would not be justified in taking any further notice of it. Let it go; it is only a trivial matter anyway; we have devoted a good deal of time to it, and we should not devote any more. The hon. member for Guysborough and the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) asked: What about this warrant that was taken out by Messrs. Fleming and Barker? And they asked: What was done with that warrant? I am not a lawyer, but I think I know enough of law to say that these hon. gentlemen do not display very much knowledge of the procedure in the case of a criminal charged with any crime. So far as I know the law, when a man is charged with a crime, the charge is made against him, and the whole case goes into the hands of the officers of the Crown. The prosecuting attorney, or the county crown attorney takes charge of it, he puts the warrant into the hands of the sheriff, or the bailiff, or their officers, and they have full charge of it.

Mr. COWAN. The county crown attorney never sees the warrant.

Mr. WALLACE. The county crown attorney has charge of the proceedings which are under his direction. In Ontario the Liberal government are in power, and in Ontario the Dominion government have control of whatever justice appertains to the Dominion government. The whole machinery of the law is in the hands of the Dominion and local governments, in the hands of the Liberal party, so that they have the control and management of the men who have charge of the warrant. The warrant, if any such warrant was issued, is in the hands of their own officials and we might ask them: What has become of the warrant? What have you done with this warrant, because you have it? Your officers have it and therefore we want to know what was done with this warrant by yourselves. The hon. member for Guysborough said that there was no wrong-doing in Brockville and that wrong-doing cannot be proved. How does the hon. gentleman know that there was no wrong-doing in Brockville? Was he there? Had he control of the forces? Does he know everything that occurred in Brockville during the election? Here, we have the declaration of Pritchett, one of themselves, their trusted agent up to a certain period, and what does he say? He makes a string of affidavits, making specific, definite and particular charges, not beating around the bush, and here is something to investigate. He says:

O'Gorman also brought to me a Mr. King, who, as I understood, was a book keeper in Mr. Comstock's employment. He was to act as a deputy returning officer. O'Gorman introduced him and left. I had only one interview with King. I instructed King how to substitute false ballots, and showed him four or five times how it was done. He did not try it in my presence. I gave him fifteen false ballots. He initialled them in my presence. I removed the counterfoil, marked the ballots for Comstock, folded them up, and gave them to King. I did not mention money to King, and did not see him again.

14. A man named Smith, who was to act as deputy in Elizabethtown, was brought to me by O'Gorman. I instructed Smith as I had done with the others. He practised the work in my presence and agreed to do all he could. I agreed that he should be paid $5 for every ballot he substituted. He asked for twenty ballots and initialled them. I took off the counterfoils, marked the ballots for Comstock, folded them and handed them to Smith. The night of the election he returned the whole of them to me. I was so busy that I had no time to get his explanation. He promised to see me again. I have not seen him since.

And so on, with a whole string of definite statements as to the rascality perpetrated in the constituency of Brockville, which was stolen from the Conservative party, and handed over to the Liberals. We know that there was a regular brigade of these men, and that they went from one constituency to the other. They started their career in the first by-election at North Grey. I would like the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), to tell us all he knows about North Grey. I would like the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), to tell us all he knows about North Grey. Our friend from East Grey

Mr. WALLACE.

(Mr. Sproule), was there, and I was there for a week myself—

Mr. McMILLAN. Tell us all you know about it.

Mr. WOOD. What did you go there for ?

Mr. WALLACE. I went there and addressed a meeting every night, and the Postmaster General went there and he did not address a meeting every night, and the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) was there, and I can assure you that he did not address a meeting every night. Well, Sir, after they had finished at North Grey, the whole of the gang went to Cornwall, and from that to East Simcoe, and from thence to North Ontario. The Postmaster General was in these two constituencies, and he was devoting his attentions between them, lying as they do side by side. He denies that he met with a Mr. Hanna there, but the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), says he knows he did, and he made that statement outside of parliament, and is amenable to the law of the land, but that law has never been invoked against the hon. member for East Simcoe, and there is no danger that it ever will. I think the gang divided their forces then, and the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland), went up there. Then came West Huron and Brockville, and the history of these two elections, if it were written, would astonish the world. Well, Sir, it will be written, and it will be investigated, and if the government think they are going to burk investigation. I tell them there is a stronger power than they are, and that face to face with the electors of this country, they will have to justify their refusal to grant an inquiry, after the First Minister had pledged his sacred honour, and the honour of his party, that there would be a thorough investigation, no matter who was hurt. They were quite content so long as Mr. Boull and Mr. Pritchett and Mr. Cap Sullivan should go to jail, but when it came to the ministers themselves, and their scalps were in danger, then they must be protected, and the investigation must be burked, and the majority at their back must be called upon to say that the pledge given by the First Minister last year shall not be redeemed, that no investigation shall take place, and that the rascalities, such as were never before heard of in Canada, shall not be exposed. Who are these men anyway, Mr. Speaker? The first of them is Mr. W. T. R. Preston. And who is Mr. W. T. R. Preston? He was the parliamentary librarian in Ontario, then he was the Liberal organizer, and then the parliamentary librarian again. He is a man with not a very good record. His uncle, Mr. John Rochester, for many years a member of this House of Commons, was forced to swear in court, that he would not believe W. T. R. Preston on oath. That is the sworn statement of his uncle in the city of Ottawa. Preston brought in this whole gang into the elections, and here is what he swore in St. Thomas, the other day :

Q. Where did those men you brought in get their money?—A. I gave it to them.

Q. Where did you get it?—A. Collected from friends in St. Thomas some two or three hundred dollars.

Q. What did you do with this money?—A. With the exception of $5 or $10 to pay the band, it was given to these men for purely legitimate work.

Of course. Does any man on the other side of the House believe that this gang were brought from the four corners of Ontario for honest purposes? These men who were condemned and reported by the judges. Here is what Preston said in a speech he made in St. Thomas, not long ago :

They speak of the men who are here, as if they were gamblers and blacklegs. Not a man of them but has come here openly and at his own expense, and only out of love for the cause of good government.

That is the statement made by this man in a speech in St. Thomas, and then he swore the other day in court, that he gave them $200 or $300 to pay their expenses, so that they would see that there was an honest election. It reminds us of that memorable saying of John Maddiner, of London : 'Come along John, we have lots of money, and we are going to put down bribery and corruption.' This same man, this Preston, is swaggering around the corridors of parliament to-day, and why? We know, Mr. Speaker, if you do not know. It is because he has told the members of the government that they dare not prosecute him, for he knows too many of their secrets. And so they dare not put a finger on W. T. R. Preston, and they had to give him the office he demanded, with his $3,000 a year and his travelling expenses, and his trips across the Atlantic, and his good time generally. That is the punishment the government inflicts on this man, who has been proven in the courts to have committed wrong, and who we only want an opportunity of proving was with Pritchett, was the man who manipulated all these things, and was the mouthpiece and the organ of the government of the day, for carrying on these nefarious proceedings. The next man is Mr. Alex. Smith, the organizer of the Liberal party to-day, and a man who is standing in close consultation with the government to this very hour, and a man who was spoken of by the judges in the strongest condemnatory terms. Who are the others? James Vance, McDonald, Hoppins, Thompson, Cap Sullivan, Lewis, the whole crowd. There is one man of the gang who has been brought up to contradict the statement made by Pritchett. Tom Lewis, of London, has gone into the box and has sworn that the statement of Pritchett is false. Well, Sir, Tom Lewis has been engaged in other ventures. Tom Lewis was in the Waterloos, and what does the evidence say about Waterloo and Tom Lewis?

A. R. Shantz deposed, in substance, the following:

I was poll clerk at No. 2 division, Berlin, for the election. Wildfong came to see me previous to the election, and wanted to know if I was still a good Grit, and said he wanted a lot of young men to act as deputies, and that there would be a very good thing in it for me if I would act. He told me to meet him that night, and he would take me to one of the men who was here to instruct me about it. Next night I met Wildfong, and he told me to go to a room in the Walker House, No. 3 or 38, and he followed with Tom Lewis, of London. Wildfong introduced me to Lewis, and said Mr. Lewis would give me instructions.

Lewis sat down and proceeded to tell me what was to take place. He said they proposed to pay $5 apiece for every ballot spoiled or switched. He took a piece of paper and put a piece of lead under his thumb, and showed me how to pick the ballot up, so that when seen it was a spoiled ballot. He showed me how to switch the ballots also, and said they would be worth the same. He said he should get all in the room to handle the ballots, so then all might be said to have a hand in what was done if there was any trouble. He said he would not pay for any more than twenty, so that $100 was the limit a man might make in this way.

This is Tom Lewis, the only man they could get to swear that Pritchett was not telling the truth. I could quote further evidence about his man, but I will just quote the evidence which the judge, Chief Justice Meredith gave in the North Waterloo case:

That the witness Lewis was a party to it is also established—notwithstanding his denial by oath—by an overwhelming weight in quality as well as quantity of evidence. After hearing his own evidence one is not surprised to hear of his being engaged in bribery and other corrupt practices.

This is Tom Lewis, one of the precious gang who went to every local election in the province of Ontario and to every Ontario constituency in the Dominion that was opened. And, Sir, after they had stolen the ballots, after they had been guilty of every crime in the calendar, they turned round and said: 'Look at what we have done, the whole country is with us; we are sweeping the country;' and we were told the other night how many constituencies they had carried since the general election. Here is the reason why they carried them; here is the exposure of the nefarious practices by which they carried them; and yet the majority of this House are to be asked to vote to prevent any inquiry being made into the rascality that prevailed, and the wrongs done to the electorate of Canada.

Now, we are told that Pritchett is a scoundrel of the lowest type. Well, Sir, we are not going to dispute that. He was with that crowd. He was taken into every constituency where rascality was to be done; he was one of them; and the worst character they can give him we are not going for a moment to dispute. We will accept their statement of their confrère and colleague. But Mr. Pritchett had an invention for which he could not take out a patent. He discovered a plan, which was cheaper and more certain than the old plan—a plan that was absolutely certain. He knew that when he took out twenty Conservative ballots and replaced them with twenty ballots marked for the Grit candidate, there would be a difference of forty votes in a polling subdivision; and that was easier and cheaper than buying up voters, hustling them to the poll and all the laborious work attendant on that procedure. So he made an invention; and you know, Mr. Speaker, that every inventor, in order to be successful, has to associate himself with a capitalist. The inventor is a poor man, and he associates himself with a rich man in order to succeed. Who was the rich man in this case? Was it some member of the Conservative party? Was it my friend the leader of the opposition? Was it our friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan)? Not a bit of it. Those gentlemen had never seen Mr. Pritchett, did not know him, had not heard of him until recent disclosures had been made. But there were some in this House who did know him. Our friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) is reputed to be a man of great wealth. I wonder whether he was the capitalist that Mr. Pritchett associated himself with so as to utilize his invention. I wonder whether the Postmaster General took any of his own money for the purpose, or whether, acting as a trustee and an agent for the people of Canada, he used his trusteeship in order to make the best use of this new and valuable invention of Mr. Pritchett's? Will the Postmaster General tell us all the particulars about this? We will rely upon him when he gets up to make his statement, to unbosom himself, not to leave anything untold, but to tell us the whole story; and if he does, it will be a very interesting story indeed. But, Mr. Speaker, here is a list of men who went all over this country; they were the machine; they were the brigade who went wherever there was a by-election: Preston, Smith, Vance, D. F. McDonald, Hoppins, Thompson, Cap Sullivan, prince of pluggers, reported for corrupt practices in South Ontario; Tom Lewis, of London, who shares honours with Sullivan, reported in North Waterloo; J. G. Pritchett, ex-alderman of London, who prefers the name of M. B. Johnston, a reputable St. Thomas citizen to his own, labouring for honest government in North Waterloo, till the Conservatives, to use Mr. McNish's complaint, pursued him with a persistence worthy of a better cause. Then we have Croden and Duncan Bole. Who is Duncan Bole? One of the most finished and accomplished artists of the whole gang. Mr. Duncan Bole was a government immigration agent, fishery and fur inspector, with a good salary and every chance of promotion until the exposures were made, until he was arrested, until he absconded on straw bail, and went to the other side; and he is drawing his salary to-day from the Grit government while he is an outlaw and a fugitive from justice. But they say Mr. Pritchett is a scoundrel too; he is an outlaw and a fugitive from justice. What did he do that he had to be a fugitive from justice? What wrong has he committed? We do not hear of his having been a burglar or a sheep stealer?

Mr. WOOD. What was the warrant you got out for him?

Mr. WALLACE. Who got out the warrant?

Mr. WOOD. Why, you did.

Mr. WALLACE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I never got out a warrant for anybody in my life.

Mr. WOOD. The Conservative party did.

Mr. WALLACE. It must be an individual who gets out a warrant, and the warrant, as I explained when the hon. gentleman was not here, I presume, goes into the hands of the officers of the government. The man who swears out a warrant has no control over it. It is the officers of the Crown, who are all Grit officials, who have control over it to-day.

But, to come back to the question. This man, these hon. gentlemen say, was a fugitive from justice. What did he do? They told us that he was a fugitive from justice. Then, what did he do? Something wrong, something criminal, some crime against the laws of Canada—let them tell us what it was. They must tell us what it was. He violated the laws of the land, he stole the ballots of men entrusted with the franchise. We know that every crime in the calendar—fraud, personation, forgery, theft and arson—were committed by those gentlemen in order to shield themselves and to elect their supporters to parliament. Mr. Pritchett was guilty of those crimes on behalf of the Liberal party. They furnished him with the money to get out of the country. They furnished him with $100 per month while he was out of the country. They had him under control, he was their agent, and they say he is a villain of the deepest dye. We will accept their statement, but he was one of this crowd that they employed. Roughly, you may divide this crowd into three parts. There was the Cap Sullivans and the Pritchetts and the Duncan Boles, and all of that crowd—all men who were clever manipulators of ballots. Our friend Pritchett was a famous inventor, as I have pointed out. The others of that crowd were clever manipulators, who assisted the government to carry many elections—to carry every election in the province of Ontario. Then, we come to the next class—W. T. R. Preston and Alexander Smith. These are the known and recognized agents and organizers of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario. They get salaries for the performance of their work, and it is their duty to organize the party, and this crowd I have referred to was a crowd that they organized. What were these men doing this for? Where does Preston get his salary, and Alexander Smith? From the Liberal government of Ontario or the Liberal government of the Dominion—evidently from the ministers, evidently from those who subscribed certain sums in order to pay these organizers of the Liberal party. These men were paid large sums of money. They went into the constituencies, they organized this crowd of personators and pluggers and practitioners of all sorts of deceit. They required a large amount of money for that purpose. That money did not come like manna from heaven. It was furnished by somebody, the work was done in the interests of somebody. By whom and for whom? Take our friend, the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes), I do not know his circumstances, but I assume that he is not a millionaire, that he could not pay the hundreds and thousands of dollars required to carry out the scheme outlined for those men to do, and I assume that he would not. He was the beneficiary to a certain extent, but the gentlemen across the floor are the principal beneficiaries in the rascalities practiced. They are kept on the Treasury benches by the work of these men. Well, take the three classes. There was the lower crowd—this dozen or two of men who came in and swarmed over the constituencies. There were the two organizers, Preston and Smith, both salaried officers of the Liberal party and the governments of Ontario and the Dominion. Who was behind these two classes? Last session we proved right up to the hilt that the ballot boxes were manipulated, we proved up to the hilt that these ballots were taken out and others substituted, we proved conclusively that the greatest fraud and villainy prevailed in those constituencies. Who are the beneficiaries of this fraud and villainy? Who are the men who supplied the capital to accomplish these villainies, because capital was required? Thousands of dollars were required to accomplish what was done in any one of these constituencies. Point out to us who it was. In West Huron it was not Mr. Holmes, I am quite satisfied, but somebody else. Who was that somebody else? That is what we want to know, and what we are going to know. We know it now, and the people of the country will know it. Point out to me anybody else it could be other than members of the government. Why, the Globe says that the Postmaster General is the prince of canvassers and campaigners. He goes into a constituency, and it is sure to be carried for the Liberal party. Success crowns his every effort, and the Globe dubs him the prince of campaigners. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, this, that there must be somebody on whom the responsibility rests. Who employs Mr. Smith and Mr. Preston and the rest of the crowd under their care and manipulation? There must be some men who pour out the tens of thousands of dollars requisite. Who are those men? It is not anybody on this side. It is not the rank and file on that side, for they have enough to do looking after their own constituencies. There is something rank about all this business. The responsibility must rest on the members of the government. The members of the government from the province of Ontario cannot get away from their responsibility. If it is not the members of the government in that province, then let those gentlemen say who it is. These men are employed by them. Smith and Preston are in their pay and under their orders and control. These men are instructed, regulated and managed by the members of the government, and the members of this government must take the responsibility for all that they themselves and those under their control do. You have the chain, the incontrovertible chain, from the ministers of the Crown down to those men who commit those rascalities in the various ridings. You cannot get away from it. You cannot place the responsibility on anybody else, and you have to place it on those ministers. If they deny that responsibility as they will, they cannot get away from the responsibilities of being the men who have benefited by those rascalities, commencing with North Grey, where in Owen Sound, they bought it right out, and going to other constituencies, where, if they could not buy, they manipulated, fixing the ballot papers and resorting to practices such as Pritchett tells us he taught to so many people as we know he did. And Pritchett is prepared, if he gets an opportunity to go before the Privileges and Elections Committee, to tell the whole story of the proceedings in the West Huron and Brockville elections. But, this is the thing that has alarmed hon. gentlemen opposite. They dare not permit Pritchett to come here; they will not permit their own servant, their own agent, one of their trusted employees who taught them all the tricks—no, I will not say that, for I am of opinion the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) and some other members of the government knew several tricks before they met Pritchett at all, so he did not teach them from the alphabet up. What we want and what we are going to have is an investigation. If these hon. gentlemen are going to prevent the Privileges and Elections Committee from investigating, we will have an investigation of our own. These men are like the Boers to-day—they are on the run; they are prepared to turn Queen's evidence;—and we will have the whole crowd, those who have been the manipulators, those which have furnished the money, those who have been directing these vile men and are as guilty as the others—worse because as between the man who procures these things to be done and the poor tool who does them, the greater culprit is the man who plans it out and furnishes the means to corrupt these men and lead them from the paths of virtue if they were inclined to walk in them. I say that if the parliament of Canada will prevent an investigation before the Privileges and Elections Committee, the investigation will still go on and the culprits will be brought to justice before the great jury, the electors of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). Mr. Speaker—

Mr. COWAN. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. RICHARDSON. I only propose to take a short time, if the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) will allow me.

Mr. COWAN. I do not propose to take much time myself.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) has the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I express my thanks to the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) for giving place to me for a brief time. I shall not speak at length, though I regard this question as one of the most profound importance. As to the question whether this is a vote of want of confidence or not, I do not suppose that any observations need be offered by me. That is a question that was settled by precedent, when the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) moved, in amendment to supply, his resolution with respect to the preferential tariff. It is a mere matter, so far as I can judge, of how the government regards it—if they choose to accept the amendment, it is not a motion of want of confidence; if they choose to reject it, it is. It does not appear to me that the House need be specially concerned over the question whether or not the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) moved in this matter as soon as he should have done. He tells us that he moved at the earliest possible moment. Some speakers on this side have intimated that that is not correct. So far as I am concerned, I take no stock in the importance of that point. So far as I can see the question for a layman and for all the members of this House is whether or not there should be an investigation into these very serious charges that have been made. Speaking as a young member, I would not like to be guilty of the bad taste of criticising the conduct or utterances of any member of this House; but it does seem to me that we have wasted a great deal of valuable time in discussing this question. It seems to me that there ought to be no question in the mind of any hon. member in this House, or of any citizen of this country, as to the desirability of holding a thorough investigation and bringing the guilty parties to justice. I do not see that we are bound to inquire whether Pritchett is a scoundrel or whether he is an honest man. He makes these charges under oath; and the charges are so serious, they are so circumstantial, giving dates, names, and amounts of money involved, and so on, that it seems to me absolutely undesirable that we should not go into the most thorough and searching investigation in regard to this matter. It would seem to me rather inconsistent for members on this side of the House to say that an investigation should not be held, for we had the promise of the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), last session when the charges were originally made, and which were certainly not more serious than these read by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), that these charges should be investigated, accompanied with the declaration that the ballot box should be held sacred and should be protected to the furthest limit. I may say that, as a Liberal, I accepted that prompt offer of investigation with the keenest pleasure; and I do hope, even yet, that before this debate is concluded, we shall have such a statement and such a promise as will satisfy the House that a thorough investigation will be held. Now, as I say, I do not propose to discuss the merits of the various speeches made on this occasion. If the inquiry was deemed desirable or good when the charges were made, it seems to me, speaking for myself, that it is equally desirable that an investigation should be held now, or rather, that the investigation which was then held and was not concluded, should be continued. I entirely disapprove of the policy of using the tu quoque—you're another—argument. I do not think that Liberals should take as their criterion of political ethics, the standard that was set up by the Conservatives in the old days. Speaking for myself, the standard which I set, and which, I think, every good Liberal should set, is what the Liberals in opposition promised they would do when they got into power. I may say that I took the deepest interest in the inquiry held last session before the Privileges and Elections Committee. I did so largely because of the corruption that had been unearthed in Manitoba during the general elections, and previously. I may also observe that for doing my duty as a journalist in exposing the corruption then perpetrated, I was placed under arrest several times. However, I did not mind that. When the facts came to be inquired into the police magistrate promptly discharged me, believing I had done nothing more than my duty in exposing the frauds and corruption that had been practiced. In one case in Winnipeg we had a man named Chamberlain arrested in the act of personation; if I remember rightly he personated no less than four or five men in the course of an hour. He was an adept in changing his clothes, and certainly he acted in such a manner as to deserve the severest punishment that could be meted out to him, and he was condemned to the penitentiary for three years. Since that day we have had no personation in elections in Manitoba, so far as I know. I think there can be no more effective remedy applied to stamp out corruption and scoundrelism than severely to punish the men who have been guilty of it. Unless we as a parliament see to it that this scoundrelism is stamped out with a strong hand, how can we hope to have better methods prevail in this country?

Mr. CAMPBELL. In whose interests did Mr. Chamberlain go to Winnipeg?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I may say that Chamberlain came to Manitoba from Toronto, and he was convicted of personating in Winnipeg in the interest of the Conservative candidate.

Mr. Speaker, in discussing this matter I propose to be perfectly frank. I took a prominent part in denouncing the corruption that was practiced by the Conservatives, and to be consistent I do not propose to-night to defend corruption that has been proved to have been practiced by the Liberals. After the Winnipeg frauds, came the frauds practised in the electoral division represented by my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford). I think, Sir, that the history of political corruption would be searched in vain—even if the Pritchett affidavit in regard to Brockville is correct—for a parallel to the scoundrelism and scallawaggery that was practiced in the electoral division of Macdonald. We had there a man named Freeborn, who came to Manitoba recommended by no less a personage than Mr. Robert Birmingham, the organizer of the Conservative party at that time. I myself had in my possession for a year or more a telegram furnished me by the counsel for the prosecution, signed by Robert Birmingham, saying that Freeborn was a good man in North Bruce, or that he did good work in North Bruce. I am not exactly sure of the words. But we had this man Freeborn there who, like Pritchett, turned Queen's evidence, and he exposed an amount of fraud that was simply appalling. We had card sharpers sent into that constituency hired in Winnipeg, for the purpose of destroying ballots and manipulating ballots. I think 15 or 20 arrests were made in that connection. Freeborn gave all the information possible to the Liberals which would lead to the discovery of the guilty parties.

Let me explain that the then legal representative of the Crown for the provincial government communicated to the right hon. leader of this government that a conspiracy had been unearthed against the liberties of the people in that constituency, and he asked that this government should bear the expense of exposing those frauds. The present government promptly accepted the responsibility, and engaged to pay for the exposure of those frauds and for the punishment of the parties guilty of perpetrating them. I speak subject to correction, but I think I am within the limit when I say that $20,000 of the people's money were expended for the purpose of bringing to justice the men who were guilty of these crimes. Now, I take this position, that if the money of the people of Canada is to be used for the purpose of bringing to justice men who commit crimes in the interest of the Conservative party, surely no reasonable man can object that in the present case the money of the people of Canada should be used for the purpose of bringing to justice frauds committed in the supposed interest of the Liberal party. In the Macdonald cases success did not always attend the efforts to bring these men to justice. I think a conviction was secured in only two cases, and one of the criminals made a confession. In other cases the juries divided on partisan grounds, the Conservative members of the jury taking the view that they were not going to sit there for the purpose of making political capital for the Liberal party, and in that way justice failed to a considerable extent.

In the prosecutions that took place in Manitoba, I may mention that the evidence of men who had voted was regarded as good evidence in securing convictions. For instance, a certain number of witnesses, far in excess of the number of ballots that appeared in the box as cast for the member for Macdonald, swore that they voted for the present member for Macdonald, and we took the view then that that was perfectly good evidence. Now, having taken that view as a Liberal in Manitoba, I absolutely decline as a representative from Manitoba and as a Liberal, to say that precisely similar evidence should not be considered good in the present case. Time and again some of my friends have said to me: Are you going to believe these men who swear that they voted for McLean in the late election? How do you know that a man who received a dollar or two dollars for his vote will not perjure himself in the box? Well, I am not prepared to say whether they did perjure themselves or not. My own opinion is, having watched the proceedings carefully, that they did not perjure themselves. They looked like a lot of very respectable men, and inasmuch as I assumed that these men in Manitoba who gave evidence as to their votes spoke the truth, I assume that the men who gave evidence last session before the Privileges and Elections Committee as to how they voted, equally spoke the truth.

It seems to me that it is a mistake to palliate any of these crimes. I regretted to hear the statement of my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) when he said, and I took his words down, that there was something wrong about every election. I am prepared to believe that probably that is true, but I do not think any member of this House should use that argument for the purpose of excusing frauds when they are discovered, or for the purpose of palliating the act of the criminal. Now, as to the evidence given last year before the committee, I repeat that I took the very deepest interest in it largely in consequence of the fact that I had taken a deep interest in similar scandals exposed in Manitoba. I attended almost every session of that committee and for my part I was absolutely satisfied that the grossest corruption was practiced in connection with the election of West Huron. I examined for myself that ballot pad off which the fourteen bad ballots were supposed to have to have been taken—I forget the name of the polling booth. Would some hon. gentleman be kind enough to give it to me?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). No. 4, Colborne.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I examined that ballot pad very carefully, and I claim that the conclusion was irresistible that these fourteen ballots never came off that pad at all. If my memory serves me correctly, there were some 150 ballots on the pad, and the majority were torn off, but these fourteen ballots—and I took the trouble to compare them very carefully—were a shade wider at the perforated line than the good ballots, about which there was no dispute. I made that examination two or three times and perfectly satisfied myself. If there was any possible dispute as to these stubs and ballots, surely a silent instrument could make no mistake in its register. We had an expert from the Eddy mills, who came there with his micrometer. He tested every stub left on the pad, some 150. I think.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). One hundred and twenty-five.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And if my memory serves me correctly, there was not the slightest variation with regard to these stubs. Am I right?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is right.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then he took the ballots that had not been torn off and we found that these ballots corresponded exactly in thickness with all the stubs. Then he took the ballots about which there was no point raised, that they were not good ballots, and he found that these ballots were identical in thickness with the possible exception of one with those on the stubs. Then, in reference to the fourteen ballots, about which there was a dispute, and that I have satisfied myself never came off that pad, he found that they were 4-1000ths of an inch in thickness, while the others were 2-1000ths in thickness, so that the fourteen ballots were double the thickness of the other ballots. Is any man going to ask me to say, or can I be expected to say that these fourteen ballots were good ballots, and that they came off that pad? It is flying in the face of reason, of honesty, and I might almost say of decency, to expect me to believe anything of the kind, and I absolutely decline to do so.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I might also say that this expert proved that the paper was made on a different machine.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, I had forgotten that point, but he doubtless stated that.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Who was the expert?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not recall his name, but he was an expert from the Eddy mills.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Harvey.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Was it Mr. Ames?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then there was the other point as to the initials on these fourteen ballots. I think, and I speak subject to correction, that Mr. Cummings swore in the first case, that these initials were his. I think in cross-examination he said that they looked like his. The conclusion is irresistible that if these initials are his, John Cummings could not possibly be an honest man. If these initials are his, and the ballots never came off that pad, then, the irresistible conclusion is, that Cummings initialled these ballots before he went to the poll. And if the affidavit made by Pritchett, in regard to the wholesale initialling of ballots by deputies in the electoral division of Brockville, is correct, this furnishes the sequel that the ballots were initialled in advance in West Huron. I want to say a word in regard to the general corruption that seems to have grown up in the country. I believe the time has come when parliament should act, and act promptly, in regard to it, and should wipe it out altogether. I quite realize the force of appeals that are always made by party leaders and party men, that it is only affording capital and comfort to the opposite party to facilitate any exposure of wrong-doing committed in the supposed interests of party. While realizing the force such appeals are sure to have, I am strongly persuaded that they are unsound, even in the interests of party, and certainly in the public interest. I am convinced that all rational, fair-minded and independent-thinking men of both political parties, who have, say for the last decade, followed closely the exposures of frauds and corruption in connection with the politics of Canada, will agree that 'honours' appear to be pretty evenly divided, and that it is hardly consistent for either party to attempt to make too much political capital against the other in connection with more recent developments. Even in politics, we should not forget the force of the scriptural admonition: 'My brother, first take the mote out of thine own eye, and then thou shalt see clearly the beam which is in thy brother's eye.'

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson), has misquoted scripture.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is no point of order. Sir, it is not an abstract question of political ethics with which we have to deal at present. We are face to face with a concrete issue. Election corruption has, in my mind, been fully proved, and such charges made under oath, have been presented to this House in connection with this issue, as are sure to shock the country. I knew it would be said that Pritchett is a scoundrel and probably a fugitive from justice, but that is not a sufficient answer to the charges which he makes under oath. The affidavits contain the names of a score or more deputies, and others alleged to have participated in the crimes. Most of them have doubtless, up to the present, enjoyed a good reputation amongst their fellow-men. They are all available and can be called upon, either to affirm or deny, under oath, the charges laid at their doors. If guiltless, a fair-minded public will expect them to demand the fullest inquiry. Failing such action on their part, will the public not naturally assume guilt? If guiltless, is the government not doing them an irreparable injury by not pressing for an immediate and thorough investigation. And now a word as to the duty of the government and parliament under the circumstances. For my own part speaking as a Liberal, it would afford me especial pleasure to see a Liberal government effecting expose and deal with the corruption that has recently manifested itself in our midst. Thinking as I do, it afforded me the keenest pleasure last session, when, in response to charges of corruption in West Huron and Brockville—certainly no more grave or specific than those presented by the member for Westmoreland—(Mr. Powell), the First Minister, and leader of the Liberal party, promptly accepted the motion to investigate, declaring that the ballot box must be protected at all hazards, and held sacred. I can now see and appreciate the difficulty and sensitiveness of the government's position. When it took the ground the other day that it was unwise and unnecessary to continue the investigation, it was not aware of the further revelations contained in the Pritchett affidavits read to the House Tuesday. I suspect that the opposition, for the purpose of attempting to score a point for that accursed political effect, purposely held the affidavits back with the hope that the government would refuse to continue the inquiry. This conclusion, if correct, leaves the opposition in the position of subordinating the suppression of crime to the accumulation of political capital against the Liberals. It seems to me that the production of the new affidavits affords the government an opportunity of making a proposition which would, I think, be generally acceptable. We all know that inquiries before committees of this House are always more or less unsatisfactory and inconclusive, owing to the partisan nature of the committees. If the government will declare its willingness to appoint forthwith a commission composed of say three Queens Bench judges of Ontario with instructions to conduct a searching and thorough investigation into the charges made and into the conduct of the two elections named, and will allow the Liberals to nominate the counsel for the defence, and the Conservatives the counsel for the prosecution, the entire cost to be borne by the public, I for one will vote against this motion, as I much prefer an investigation by the courts to one before a committee of the House. Inasmuch as it is public liberties that have been assailed, and public liberties which we desire to have protected, I think the funds to accomplish this purpose should be provided by the public, and not by any party. In conclusion I would like to ask if it is not the highest function of parliament to protect the liberties of the people, the liberties for the acquisition of which our forefathers spent their substance and laid down their lives. The giant of corruption has been stalking over this continent; he has not overlooked our own Dominion, and if we are to be true to the traditions of our forefathers, and to the interests of our fellow-citizens as well as our own, we will bend every energy to slay the monster now. Why do we send our children to Sunday schools, and why do we maintain churches and day schools, if it is not that we hope thereby to train the rising generation along lines of moral and intellectual development? I would ask if there is any use continuing the work, unless we, the parliament of Canada lead the way and set the example? The gospel of public morality must be preached by the body that represents the public. It is surely inconsistent with the best traditions of Liberalism that we should fail to pursue and punish these crawling creatures, these slimy assassins of our liberty, together with the greater criminals who inspire, lay the plans, and pay for the execution of these crimes. Unless we throttle the monster, he will assuredly throttle us and we will deserve the fate which is sure to overtake us if we fail in what the people of Canada will regard as our clear duty. Let the parliament of Canada strike and strike with deadly intent at political corruption, and its action will meet with the hearty approval of a grateful people who would welcome such a course. That in my mind would be the best political move and the best political tactics which any party could adopt in this country. For every heeler whom it would alienate it would gain scores of friends. What the people most need is to be honestly led, and to the party which so leads, their gratitude, when they realize the results, will not be in stinted measure. For these reasons, unless such a judicial investigation as I have outlined is promised, I shall feel compelled to vote for the motion of the hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden).

Mr. M. K. COWAN (South Essex). Mr. Speaker, I have listened, and listened with considerable interest to the essay which has just been read by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). I would have thought that any gentleman rising in this House to speak upon a great and important issue; upon a matter of such vital importance to the electors of Canada as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) told us this is, upon a question in reference to which the public morality of this country has been stirred, as he states, from its lowest foundation; I would have thought that he would have at all events endeavoured to accomplish some results by reason of some inquiry. There must be two things which every man in this country should want: either that the seats which are held by Brockville should be vacated, or that, if those seats were stolen, then the culprits who stole them should be brought to justice. As one member of this House, I desire to go on record as objecting most strongly to being a party to any fake proceeding, or any abortive inquiry, that will not get to the root of this matter. If the hon. gentlemen from West Huron and Brockville hold their seats in this House by reason of fraud perpetrated by any men on their behalf, then I would like to see these men put out of their seats. On the other hand, I would like to see the men who actually did steal these seats—if such men there be—from the actual owners punished as they should be. I say that any man who is responsible, or who connives to defeat either of these two propositions, is not the man who should stand up in this House to lecture any one on political purity or political morality. If the hon. gentleman from Lisgar is sincere, and if he wants an investigation that is going to be effective then he should stand upon that ground, and support an investigation of that character.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I may just tell the hon. gentleman that it is just such a judicial investigation as he contemplates that I have suggested.

Mr. COWAN. There is no attempt made in this investigation to declare vacant the seat of the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Comstock), or of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes). I turn to the speech of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) (page 5487, Hansard), and speaking of Sir Louis Davies, he says:

The hon. gentleman says that this House, according to his view, has denuded itself of the power of investigating the legality of the return of members to this House except under one set of circumstances. I know not what pertinence any hon. gentleman can see that has to the discussion of this question. But I am sure that there is not a member in this House besides himself who ventures the opinion that it has the slightest connection with the matter that we are discussing. If the object of the hon. member for Halifax was to refer this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for the purpose of contesting the legality of the election of the hon. gentleman who sits for West Huron and of the hon. gentleman who sits for Brockville, then this inquiry might be pertinent; but there is no such attempt on the part of the hon. member for Halifax, and there is no such intention on the part of the hon. gentlemen who are associated with him on this side of the House.

There is the bold declaration by one of the framers of the charges, practically the seconder of the charges: that there is no attempt to attack the seats of these gentlemen, and the hon. member (Mr. Powell) admits that this parliament, under the form in which this charge is made, has no jurisdiction whatever to affect either of these seats. That being settled by no less an authority than the hon. member for Westmoreland, what does the hon. gentleman say that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) wants to pursue this inquiry for. He says:

The object of this investigation is entirely foreign to the matter which is raised by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the simple object of this investigation is to investigate the conduct of the returning officers and of what I may call the condition of politics in the country generally.

Therefore the only reason this investigation is to be held, is for the purpose of investigating the state of politics in this country generally. Then as to the men who are alleged to have committed these frauds, it was shown by the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) that if the Privileges and Elections Committee sat until the last day of the session, and if they found that every word in the affidavits of Pritchett was absolutely correct, then this parliament has no power to imprison the culprits (no matter how great the crimes they may be guilty of), beyond a day after the close of the session of this parliament. That has not been contradicted by the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who followed him, nor was it contradicted by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain). No gentleman opposite can contradict it, and therefore if this investigation were carried on it must come to naught, for the reason that parliament cannot vacate the seats, and for the further reason that this parliament cannot punish the culprits even if they found that wrong had been done.

Therefore, I would like to know what this investigation is for. The hon. member for Westmoreland says it is to investigate the state of politics in Canada. If there is anybody who is responsible for the bad state of politics in Canada, if there is a bad state of politics in Canada, it is the hon. gentlemen opposite who, knowing as they say they did, that these gross acts had been committed, that the grossest violation of the election laws had been carried on, that these culprits had stolen two seats, sat in their places in this House, and never said a word, or took one step for the purpose of punishing the guilty parties, or placing us in such a position that they could be punished, until the last hour had passed. Hon. gentlemen swore out an information in West Huron, upon which a warrant against Pritchett was issued. They know that another warrant could not be issued on that information. They know that the statute of limitations stepped in, and that the crimes which Pritchett himself says he was guilty of, were practically outlawed in one year.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me? The crime is outlawed unless the criminal absconds from the country. If the hon. gentleman will consult the statute, he will find that.

Mr. COWAN. The hon. gentleman knows that the warrant was issued, and the warrant was over one year old.

Mr. CASGRAIN. That is not the question.

Mr. COWAN. The hon. gentleman knows full well, that that warrant was in the hands of the constable, and that it was got out of the hands of the constable by Mr. Samuel Barker, the organizer of the Conservative party. He knows full well that that warrant was in the possession of Mr. O. E. Fleming, a Conservative lawyer in the city of Windsor, and the chief organizer of the Conservative party in the county of Essex; and he knows that Mr. Barker and Mr. Fleming had that warrant in their possession when they made the contract with Pritchett that they would keep it and would not punish him provided he would make this affidavit.

Mr. CASGRAIN. That is not the question, however.

Mr. COWAN. I am quite free to admit that in one sense it is not the question. The hon. gentleman must have gone asleep while his worthy confrère, the hon. member for West York, was trying to explain a procedure in law, which had not a particle of existence. The hon. member for West York said that the warrant was handed to the county crown attorney, something that is never done. The county crown attorney is the man who prosecutes after the man is under arrest. The hon. member for West York need not rise to contradict that statement, because he repeated it twice.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not make such a statement. I understood the hon. gentleman, when he interrupted me, to make that statement himself. What I stated was that when a person laid an information against another person for criminal act, the whole proceedings went out of his hands and into the hands of officials of the Ontario government; and I say so yet.

Mr. COWAN. There again is just where the hon. gentleman, when he opens his mouth, puts his foot in it; but I did not think that the hon. member for West York would have put his foot in it quite as deep as he has in that statement. The hon. gentleman ought to know that an information is sworn out before a magistrate, who is an appointee of the Ontario government, that upon that information the warrant is issued, and that that warrant is handed to a constable, who is an appointee, not of the Ontario government, but of the county officials. But the hon. member for West York went a step further, and, as the records of Hansard will show, repeated the statement twice, that the county crown attorney got the warrant afterwards. He says this warrant was in the hands of officers of the Ontario government. Well, let me tell him that every man who has risen on that side of the House in this discussion, has declared that Pritchett told the truth. If Pritchett told the truth in that statement, then the hon. member for West York is very far astray. I have before me the evidence of Pritchett; I have before me his own bald, bare statement on oath, as to the consideration he got for making that affidavit. Let me tell the hon. member for West York, what Pritchett himself has sworn to, not in an affidavit drawn by the Conservative organizer, who, Pritchett says, afterwards inserted clauses which he never swore to at all; but I am reading Pritchett's evidence, question and answer.

Mr. SPROULE. What are you reading from?

Mr. COWAN. I am reading from the Toronto Globe.

Mr. SPROULE. Oh, oh.

Mr. COWAN. I can well understand that that is not an authority for the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and I can say, as a compliment to the Toronto Globe, that I would be extremely sorry if it were. This simply shows that to the hon. member for East Grey, in a matter in which the honesty or the honour of the Liberal party is concerned, even the mention of as fair a newspaper as the Toronto Globe, which reports fully both sides of a case, is like shaking a red rag before an animal whose name or kind I will not mention. I will read it all for the benefit of the hon. member for East Grey, if he will only possess his soul in peace:

Mr. COWAN.

Mr. Watson next introduced the question of the Detroit affidavits, read by Mr. Whitney in the legislature. The first one was, the witness said, made by Judge Carpenter on December 29 last. It was prepared by Mr. Barker.

Mr. Barker is the paid organizer of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say here, in the presence of this House, that the statement that Mr. Barker receives one farthing from the Conservative party, is untrue.

Mr. COWAN. I accept, Mr. Speaker, so far as the hon. leader of the opposition apparently knows, the statement which he has made. But will the hon. leader of the opposition, a man who has been in public life for the number of years that he has been, a man who has been associated with political partyism as long as the hon. leader of the opposition has been, a man who knows as much about organization as the hon. leader of the opposition does—will he stand up in this House and let the statement go forth to the country, that Sam Barker is parading up and down from one end of this province to the other at his own expense?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say, Mr. Speaker, in the presence of this House, that Mr. Barker, while consenting to assist me at my request, in the organization of the province of Ontario, placed his services unreservedly at my disposal, but on condition that he was not to receive one farthing, directly or indirectly.

Mr. COWAN. I commend the hon. leader of the opposition to the pupil that he has got in Mr. Barker; I commend the hon. leader of the opposition for his childlike and bland innocence; and I want to go one step further, and tell the hon. leader of the opposition, that if he has made that statement and argued it out to his own satisfaction, he is a very long way from arguing it out, or making it clear to any other member of this House. Why, Sir—I say it in all candour, in all sincerity, and in all honour—a more ridiculous statement never emanated from the mouth of a politician, than to say that a man like Sam Barker, who has been in different lines of business, as he has been, who has abandoned the legitimate practice of the law, parades up and down this country organizing for the Conservative party, a party out of power and with no chance in the immediate future of coming back—and we are told that that man is doing this out of pure love and affection for hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to a point of order. I wish to know, Mr. Speaker, if it is not the duty of the hon. member to accept the statement of the hon. the leader of the opposition, and whether he is not out of order when, after accepting it, he declares that a more ridiculous statement never was made in this House.

Mr. COWAN. I have already said that I accept the statement of the hon. the leader of the opposition, and have even complimented that hon. gentleman on his bland-like credulity. I am not an old member of this House, but I sincerely hope that I have sufficient common sense to know that when a man rises in his place and makes a statement concerning something of which I have no personal knowledge, and asserts that he makes it on personal knowledge, I must accept his statement. I do accept it, and accept it unreservedly. But I say, at the same time, that I leave this House to judge how much reliance they can place on that statement.

Mr. TAYLOR. I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on the point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that the hon. member should not have made use of that last phrase.

Mr. COWAN. What phrase?

Mr. SPEAKER. How much reliance can be placed on the statement made by the hon. the leader of the opposition. I think that is hardly fair to that hon. gentleman.

Mr. COWAN. I most cheerfully withdraw that phrase, because I can very readily imagine the reliance that the hon. members of this House will place on that statement.

But, Sir, I want to ask another question. When hon. gentlemen have stood up on that side of the House, not by one or by two, but by the half dozen, and said that Mr. Alexander Smith was the Liberal organizer, under a salary, nobody, I fancy, is going to dispute that statement. I certainly am not, although I do not know whether he has a salary or not. But I have sense enough to believe that he has. I do not believe that the chief organizer of the Liberal party is travelling up and down this country, paying his own expenses, wearing out his own shoe leather and clothes, without any remuneration, as the good, virtuous, charitable Sam Barker, of Hamilton, is doing for the Tory party. But I would like to ask one more question. The hon. member for West York, and the hon. member for West Assiniboia, and the hon. member for Montmorency, and the hon. member for Westmoreland, all spoke about the different gentlemen whom Pritchett named, and I would ask them what is their idea of the position of Mr. Samuel Barker? They scorn the idea of a Liberal doing anything out of affection for his party, but I would ask them whether they believe that the chief organizer or the second organizer of the Conservative party, out of the four in Ontario to-day, Mr. Samuel Barker, is doing what he does for the Tory party out of pure love and affection. I do not want the hon. the leader of the opposition to misunderstand me. I do not deny, for one instant, that the conversation he mentioned did not pass between him and Mr. Barker. I have never made any such denial. The hon. leader of the opposition says it did, and I accept his statement, and accept it unreservedly; but I want to tell him that if Mr. Sam Barker has imposed on him in that way, he has not imposed on the hon. member for West York, and the other gentlemen from Ontario, who could give the leader of the opposition a very good idea of where the funds come from, out of which Mr. Barker is paid.

A few moments ago I was discussing the question of the warrant which hon. gentlemen opposite had in their possession, when I was diverted from that subject by being taken to task by the hon. leader of the opposition. I had said that the Conservative organizer—for now Mr. Barker is the admitted Conservative organizer, admitted to be hand and glove with the leaders of that party, and whose services the hon. the leader of the opposition tells us are given solely out of love and charity—was the man who got that warrant and who took with him Mr. O. E. Fleming, of Windsor, who is practising law in that city—and with reference to whom I have nothing more to say than that he is the leading Conservative organizer in that city, that he is a strong and life-long Conservative, that there is no man in Essex, not even excepting the candidate, who takes as strong an interest in politics as he does—and now I am going to proceed with the history of this matter:

It was prepared by Mr. Barker, a lawyer of Hamilton, a tall, thin man. The document was written in the Hotel Cadillac.

That is Sam Barker, their organizer.

The parties met by appointment, a note being left with Mr. Spence, with whom witness was staying, fixing the place of meeting. Mr. Spence went with him; they met Mr. Barker and Mr. Fleming, of Windsor.

Mr. Fleming, of Windsor, was with Barker.

In reply to Barker, witness said he would make an affidavit under certain conditions.

They asked him for an affidavit, and he said: I will make it under certain conditions. Like a man who has a bushel of wheat to sell, and who brings it to the auction market, and if he has to sell it he will do so at the best price he can get, but if not, he will barter and haggle about the price.

Q. Under what conditions?—A. That they would withdraw the warrant that was out against me; they would protect me.

Those two gentlemen, both lawyers and both Conservatives, said that they would withdraw the warrant against Pritchett and would protect him. Mr. O. E. Fleming, I am bound to say, is a good lawyer, one of the leading practitioners of Windsor, and the head of a large firm there. And Mr. Fleming would not go to Detroit and tell that man that he would withdraw that warrant and protect him unless he was in a position to do it. Samuel Barker was there with him. Either of two conclusions the leader of the opposition must accept. Either that these gentlemen deliberately lied to Pritchett, or else Pritchett told the truth and they were prepared to carry out their promise. The hon. gentleman can choose whichever horn of the dilemma he pleases.

Q. How?—A. By allowing me to go home; have the warrant withdrawn and not prosecute me, or something to that effect.

The hon. leader of the opposition knows that that warrant was issued by a magistrate in the county of Elgin. I am not saying this to his detriment at all—who is one of the strongest Conservatives in the riding of West Elgin, and was put into the hands of a Conservative constable, who handed it over to the Conservative organizer.

Q. In consideration of what?—A. That I would tell them what I knew about the West Elgin election.

Q. Have the warrants been withdrawn?—A. So far as I know. I would not be here if they had not been.

Q. Have you seen the warrants since?—A. I saw them once in Windsor in Mr. Fleming's office.

What has the hon. member for West York to say to that? He stands up in this House and seeks to make party capital, tries to smirch a great political party, tries to settle on the Liberal party and on this side of the House the acts of every cut-throat who may chance to vote Liberal, or who may, by hook or crook, thrust himself into the Liberal ranks. This, that I have referred to, is not the case of an ordinary rank and file man of the party; this is the organizer of the Conservative party whom the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) accepts as the organizer. And he knows, and the hon. member for Westmoreland knows, and so does the hon. member for Montmorency know, aye, and the hon. ex-Minister of Justice knows full well, that if Pritchett's statement is correct and that act had been done in the Dominion of Canada that was done in the city of Detroit. Mr. Barker and Mr. Fleming became common felons under the Criminal Code, which forbids the compounding of a felony. Now, Sir, further on, he says:

It was Mr. Fleming made the promise that I should be allowed to come home if the affidavits were signed.

That was the consideration given. Now, what is the evidence on which this House is asked to grant an investigation? What is the ground on which the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) feels that an investigation should be had? I say that if we were in a court of law where these men could be punished, well and good. But, these gentlemen know, and know full well, that if they had filed a petition against the return of the hon. member for West Huron and the hon. member for Brockville, that these charges could have been tried out in another form, that a commission could have issued, and these judges could have punished for bribery and corruption, and we could have got the trial away from all biased committees, and these men would have been punished as men were punished in South Ontario and elsewhere. And let me digress for a moment to note the fact that the hon. member for Lisgar said that in the province of Manitoba, when juries were got to prosecute for political crimes, those juries divided straight on party lines. Mr. Speaker, if that is the case among the laymen of this country. Conservative, Liberal and Independent, how much greater must be the political partisanship that would exist in a committee of this House? But, there was an opportunity offered to hon. gentlemen opposite. That opportunity was to have filed an election petition. Then there might have been a report for corrupt practises, and every one of the wrong-doers could have been punished, the trial being removed from political partisanship and carried on by the judges themselves. Or they could have taken the third course—they could have made the charge under petition as provided in the statute, as was stated by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, a point which I am not going to argue. Or, they could have taken a fourth course—they could have sworn out an information before a magistrate in the county in which the crime was committed, charging these men with the crime committed by them. There was the fifth course—this ineffective proceeding they now propose. They got the warrant, but the organizers of hon. gentlemen opposite got possession of that warrant and used that property, illegally, and wrongly acquired from the constable, for the purpose of making an illegal and criminal bargain with this man Pritchett. I am not here to stand as an apologist for Pritchett; I am not here to stand as apologist for any person or party guilty of political corruption. But you and I know, Mr. Speaker, and every member of this House knows, that no matter how clean or pure a candidate may be, he cannot do all the work that is to be done in his election, and, on election day, in thirty or forty different polls distributed throughout the constituency, he must be represented by agents. These polls may be miles away from where he is; and we know that sometimes political zeal carries men into actions that cannot be approved by honest men. No one knows better than hon. gentlemen opposite that sometimes party feeling runs high in localities, and large sums of money are wagered on majorities in different towns; and then, the men who have put up their money put up more with it to corrupt the electorate and win the bets that they have made. No man can wholly stop that; but no Liberal, and no man who has a spark of manhood in him, will stand up and defend it. But, I say, if ever there was a class of men who deliberately and almost criminally set their faces against using the last opportunity of punishing those who were guilty of wrong-doing, they were those who had this affidavit in their possession on December 29. McNish's election, the election at which these crimes were supposed to have been committed, was not then a year old, and the alleged violators were all in this country except Pritchett. The point raised by these hon. gentlemen, that when a man gets beyond the jurisdiction of the court, the statute of limitations ceases to run, could not apply in these cases. But the organizer of hon. gentlemen opposite, with that warrant in his possession, gave forth no sound, did not place it in the hands of any law officer, did not even give forth one word to the public press until after the last hour had passed and the year was over, and these men were safe and could not be prosecuted. Then they draw forth the affidavit made by the cut-throat Pritchett and try to father on this side of the House and upon the Liberal party the responsibility of not prosecuting these men. The year had not expired when they got that document; and yet, they kept that document a secret and let the criminals escape. It is like the man who knows that the door of the felon's cell is unlocked and has the key, yet refused to lock the door—their sin is not a sin of commission, it is a sin of omission, and they know it. They sprung one affidavit the other night. We telegraphed to West Huron to contradict it. They saw the affidavits that were coming in in contradiction to Pritchett, and they knew very well that we could not get the affidavits from West Huron in time. And they kept the last affidavit and put it into the hands of the hon. member for West Assiniboia to-day to read, referring to South Ontario. It was too late then to prove Pritchett a liar in this case by securing the affidavits of responsible men from that constituency, as we have already done from the constituency of Brockville. Yet, Sir, these are the gentlemen who stand up and pose in this House and this country as political purists, as men who desire to put an end to corruption in public and political life, by permitting the guilty culprit to escape, and then conniving to get hold of the last document by which the culprit could be arrested, and then they bring him back into this country.

Now, there are one or two points I propose to analyse in connection with the Pritchett affidavit. I said last year that I was proud of the Liberal party, that I was proud of the leader of the Liberal party, that I was proud of the parliament of Canada, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that we must have an investigation because these hon. gentlemen opposite had made some strong statements in connection with West Huron. But when we had that investigation, when we examined ninety-nine witnesses, when nearly every voter in the polling district was brought down here and put on his oath and asked how he voted—something which is directly contrary to the spirit of the Act which protects secret voting—then the hon. gentleman undertakes to say that because they were beaten in the battle therefore ballots were switched, and ballots were forged, or stolen. If there is an hon. gentleman on that side of the House who can tell me that he has not found more than seven liars in one polling subdivision in his constituency, I would like to know it. Now, Sir, who is this man Pritchett? We have not a single particle of evidence adduced in this case more than was adduced last session. Let us analyse these affidavits of Pritchett. I can readily understand that liars sometimes do tell the truth, but they are not often believed when they do, especially when they put their foot in it as often as friend Pritchett has done. Now, what is the position of this man Pritchett? I read his own affidavit where he says he was the deputy returning officer in 1898. In clause 3 of his affidavit, not placed on the records by us, but placed on the Hansard by the hon. member for Westmoreland, to make out the strongest case he could, Pritchett says:

From my experience in the various elections I formed the opinion that elections could be more easily and surely won by the manipulation of ballots than by buying voters, and after the said general election, I, in conversation with friends, used words to that effect.

There is the confession of a criminal. The heart and sympathy of juries and of judges on the bench goes out to the unfortunate man who, by reason of strong inducement, by reason of hire or hope of reward, passes from right to wrong and makes the first step in a criminal career. But here is a man with no inducement, nothing held out to him, sitting quietly as a deputy returning officer, and thinking the subject over in 1898, and he says: I formed the conclusion that elections could be won more easily by deliberately falsifying my oath as a deputy returning officer, by switching ballots and substituting others for them, rather than by the purchase of electors at the polls. That is the statement of the man himself. Now, what was his next step? Did he stop there? I find, on looking over the evidence, that he says this:

Q. Did you ever practise slipping ballots before?—A. No, I never had done it. I practised it quite often but never performed it.

Q. Then you had practised tricks for the purpose of changing votes or changing the count of votes?—A. For my own satisfaction, yes.

This preliminary practice the witness said he had done at his own house and alone. He did not think it required very much skill. In actuality his tricks were done after the poll closed.

There is a man who stands up and admits that it occurred to him to break a law, unsolicited and unasked. And then he proceeded to carry his criminal thought into effect, and practised the fraud in order to perfect himself in that particular line. That is not the act of a man who had been approached by another. That is the confession of the criminal himself who originated the trick. Then what is his next step? His next step is to try to corrupt his fellow men with the scheme which he had devised; his third and fourth step carry that nefarious scheme into effect, and when he is found out he flies the country. In addition to that, he goes and makes three or four affidavits for a consideration, the consideration being that which is dearest to a man, his freedom. After he makes these affidavits and gets his freedom, he goes into a witness box in West Elgin and says that the affidavit that he had sworn to in the city of Detroit before Judge Carpenter, was wrong, and that Mr. Barker had written something into it that he had never said. What were those two statements? The first said that he had a conversation with Frank Hunt about it, and the second that he had a conversation with John Lyle about it. Why were the names of Frank Hunt and John Lyle put into that affidavit by Mr. Barker, if they had never been mentioned by Pritchett? How did Barker know this free gratis organizer of the hon. gentlemen? How did he know the names of Frank Hunt and John Lyle, in West Elgin? One of two things must be true: Either Barker deliberately inserted them, or else Pritchett did. I am inclined to believe that Pritchett did tell Barker, and there is where Pritchett and Barker made the first false step in this affidavit. He stood in the witness box and said: I never swore that Barker put that in himself in the state of Michigan,—because he was going to follow these affidavits by his evidence in West Elgin. Then it was that Judge Morgan says this man is a self-convicted liar. Now, what ground did he have to go on? He had the fact that Pritchett's freedom had been purchased by the organizer of the Conservative party for the purpose of getting this affidavit, and when one affidavit said one thing and he went into the box and stated deliberately another thing, then Judge Morgan said that he is a self-confessed and a self-convicted liar.

What was the reason? Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and none better than the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), and the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) know it. I will not, at this moment, discuss the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), for apparently, he did not know the law about perjury. Any legal gentleman on the other side of the House knows that in order to prosecute a man for perjury you must have corroborative evidence. If you read over the affidavit of Pritchett you will find that on every material point he had talked with a man alone. He had talked with a man alone, and no matter how low Pritchett may be you cannot convict a man except you have corroborative evidence. When Pritchett stated that he had talked with Frank Hunt and John Lyle, there was a case in which there was corroborative evidence, because there was the oath of two against the oath of one. Pritchett, or his legal friends, saw the position in which he had placed himself, and when the affidavits were read before him in West Elgin, he said: I did not do it. If he did not do it, he swore to it, and it was then that Judge Morgan called him a self-convicted liar. Notwithstanding these circumstances, hon. gentlemen opposite say that this man's oath should be sufficient to induce the people of this country to spend $10,000, or $20,000, for the purpose of investigating—what? Punishing anybody? No. For the purpose of investigating the state of politics in Canada upon the evidence of a man of that character. Now, I am not going to follow the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett). I do not want to discuss the matter in the way in which the hon. member for East Simcoe discussed it. The hon. member for East Simcoe, because Judge Morgan had made a remark on the bench, as judges frequently do, that a man 'was a self-convicted liar,' as Pritchett was, and a self-confessed perjurer, thought to throw dirty water upon no less a man than Judge Morgan, of Toronto. I knew Judge Morgan when I was a student at law in Toronto, and everybody knows that Judge Morgan practiced law in the county of York for years, and that notwithstanding all the applications for the junior judgeship of the city of Toronto and the county of York, Judge Morgan was singled out by the late Sir John Macdonald as a man who was fair and honest, and as a man who was capable of performing the duties that were assigned to him as a judge of that judicial district. Judge Morgan has occupied that position for over fifteen years, at all events, he has sat on the bench for over fourteen years, to my personal knowledge. Notwithstanding that fact, notwithstanding that he was appointed by the then Premier of this country, Sir John Macdonald, notwithstanding the fact that he was a strong, straight-line Conservative before he was appointed, but as fair a man as ever graced the judiciary of the Dominion of Canada, the hon. member for East Simcoe, to score a point for his party, got up and tried to smirch the character of Judge Morgan in connection with this investigation. Sir, if he had tried to smirch the character of a judge appointed by Liberals there might have been some chance to save a political point by saying that his party politics had carried him beyond the line when politics should cease and judicial impartiality commence. This is not the first time that the hon. gentleman has been guilty of an act quite as unparliamentary—I was going to say—at all events, it is not the first time that he has been guilty of an act as unmanly as he was guilty of in endeavouring to smirch the character of Judge Morgan. Last year, he tried to smirch the character of Judge McDougall, a man whose name has only to be mentioned to be known all over Canada. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) rose in his place, followed the hon. member for East Simcoe, and told him in this House that Judge McDougall was a fair man, and one of the best county court judges that ever lived in Canada, that he was a man above such insinuations, and it caused the Prime Minister to reply that no man was above the insinuations of the hon. member for East Simcoe. Now, we are asked to believe this man Pritchett, who is advocated by a man of the type of the hon. member for East Simcoe. There is just one further point. In addition to the four crimes that I have mentioned, Pritchett goes further and says: I went to the returning officer and told him that I was M. B. Johnston. I told him that I was M. B. Johnston for the purpose of getting possession of the poll books and ballot box and ballots. He there committed an act of personation. That was crime No. 5. If he followed the ordinary line of the law he took the oath prescribed by section 65, form 8, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, page 207, which says that a man shall conduct the election fairly, honestly and impartially, and if he took that oath and then slipped the ballots he committed deliberate, wilful and corrupt perjury when he did it. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that he has sworn to this in Canada, and they say: Why do you not prosecute him? Hon. gentlemen opposite know the law, and if they do not know the law they ought to. They know that when a man makes two positive statements, one directly contrary to the other, of something that is within his own knowledge alone, you cannot convict that man of perjury because you cannot prove in which one of these statements he has committed perjury. That is a proposition of law that no man can dispute, and if any man does dispute it, Taschereau's 'Criminal Law,' which will be found in the Parliamentary Library, will tell him that that statement of the law is correct. (Hon. gentlemen were safe, then, when they challenged us to prosecute this man, because they had lost the opportunity, they had kept the information in their pockets, because they deliberately kept hold of the only document upon which punishment could have been meted out to this man.) It is upon the affidavits of this man that we are asked to spend the peoples money by thousands. I am not even averse to that providing anything can be got out of it. But, hon. gentlemen themselves admit that you cannot take the seat, you cannot punish the criminals, but, with evidence like that given by Pritchett, they ask the people of this country to vote money for the purpose of having an investigation to discover how the politics of this country stand. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), and different hon. gentlemen who have spoken, have said, as lawyers, that the mere fact that they have got down to the particularity of detail which this man gets down to in these affidavits, proves that his statements must be correct. If that proposition is correct in one instance it must be correct in others. We have another affidavit, that of Mr. Farr, and there are some twenty-seven paragraphs all paragraphed out. In it Mr. Farr makes two statements, and I am going to read them for the benefit of the House.

Mr. McALISTER. Did Mr. Farr make that declaration?

Mr. COWAN. This is the original I am going to quote from.

Mr. McALISTER. Yes, but is it a declaration made before a police magistrate?

Mr. COWAN. No, before a commissioner of the High Court of Justice of Ontario, Henry Meikle, I think, of the firm of Blake, Kerr, Lash, Castle & Meikle.

I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that he is still within the jurisdiction of Canada; I tell them that Farr was in Toronto, and is in Canada, and if this statement is false then they can arrest Mr. Farr. But they have not done it, and why? It is because the statement is true. It is because Mr. Mitchell, the town clerk of Goderich, a Conservative, a man appointed by the Goderich town council, swears that he saw Farr's ballot and that it was marked for Mr. McLean, the Conservative candidate in West Huron. I am not going to depend upon the evidence of a man named Farr; I am not going to ask this House to believe the uncorroborated statement of even Farr, even though he has not been proven a self-convicted liar and perjurer as Pritchett was. But we will see what Farr has to say:

Dominion of Canada, Province of Ontario,
County of York. To wit:

In the matter of the by-election in the constituency of West Huron, held on February 21, 1899.

I, James Farr, of the city of Toronto, in the county of York, carpenter, do solemnly declare:

1. I am the James Farr who acted as deputy returning officer at No. 3 polling subdivision, in the town of Goderich, at the by-election held in West Huron on February 21, 1899.

2. For eighteen years prior to the month of April last I was a resident of the town of Goderich, where I carried on business as a carpenter, and from about the year 1893 until the time I left Goderich, I acted as a deputy returning officer at the municipal elections for the same section of Goderich as the subdivision for which I acted as deputy returning officer on February 21, 1899.

3. A post card received by me from Mr. Lane, the election clerk, was the first intimation I had of being appointed deputy returning officer at the said election, and I had not been previously spoken to by any one about being appointed, though on account of having acted as deputy returning officer so frequently, I fully expected to be appointed.

4. I appointed Henry Armstrong, a friend of mine, and a Conservative, as my poll clerk.

5. During my residence in Goderich I had frequently done carpentering work for Robert McLean, the Conservative candidate at the said election, and had been well paid for it, and on account of my personal acquaintance with him, and having been canvassed by him personally, and having promised him to do so, I fully intended voting for him at the said election. I took no part whatever in the Liberal campaign, and stated openly that I intended to vote for Mr. McLean.

6. I remember James Yates coming to me the night before the election and advising me to resign my position as deputy returning officer, and to return the ballot box and papers, the reason given by him for asking me to do so being that I had been drinking and would not therefore be able to properly perform my duty, but I believed his real reason for asking me to resign was that he feared I was a supporter of Mr. McLean, and on that account I refused to follow his advice.

7. The night before the election, William Mitchell, the town clerk of Goderich and a prominent Conservative, interviewed me, and as a result of the arrangement then arrived at between us I, on the following day, when the said Mitchell came to the polling booth to vote, showed him my ballot, which was marked for McLean, and which I deposited in the ballot box in his presence.

8. I had no conversation with any body as to my duties as deputy returning officer and received no instructions in reference to the same from any one except the printed instructions in the ballot box.

9. I conducted the poll in a fair and impartial manner, in the best of my judgment, and every ballot handed to me by the voter was duly deposited in the ballot box.

That is the affidavit of Farr. I do not know whether that affidavit is true or not, but I do know, and every gentleman opposite knows that Mitchell swore in the box that he was a Conservative. Mr. Mitchell holds the respectable position of town clerk in the town of Godrich; he goes into the box and swears that Farr is absolutely correct because he saw his ballot, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite have risen in their places and have scorned at the idea that Farr voted for McLean. In making such a statement, these gentlemen opposite say that not only is Farr a liar, but that their own supporter Mitchell swore falsely when he swore to this circumstance which was within his own knowledge. Every man and every lawyer knows that when a fact is against the interest of a man, and he swears to it, then that can be given double weight because he is swearing against his own interests. Mitchell was swearing against his own interests and against the interests of his own party, for he knew he ought not to have seen Farr's ballot. But, Sir, when it comes to scoring a point against the Liberals of this country, hon. gentlemen opposite have no scruple in saying that Farr is a liar and that Mitchell is a perjurer, and that Farr was our special tool and voted for Holmes. Here is an affidavit with a minute particularity of detail, that must carry the conviction of truth, as gentlemen opposite argue. Farr swears:

Thomas Marshall and James Nelson, who gave evidence before the committee at Ottawa, were not correct in their statement as to when they last saw me before giving their evidence at Ottawa. I saw them on the same day as they left for Ottawa, and was told by Nelson that they had got some easy money from Mr. W. D. McPherson, the lawyer, on Sunday afternoon, and that the said McPherson wished them to make a statement of their evidence so that he could take it down and post them what to say at Ottawa.

That is what Farr swears. I do not know whether it is true or not. All I know is that he swears to it, and that it is set out in 29 or 30 paragraphs of the affidavit with minute particularity of detail, and if, as gentlemen opposite say, that an affidavit is to be taken as true because it is set out with minute particularity of detail, then that affidavit is true. And who is W. D. McPherson? He is a lawyer in the city of Toronto; he is the counsel of the Conservatives in nearly all their election trials, he is one of the most prominent Conservatives in the city of Toronto, and he is an ex-president of the Young Liberal-Conservative Association, and presides over the Conservative ward meetings in that city. According to that, these two men told Farr that they had got some easy money from W. D. McPherson, and that McPherson wanted to take down their statements so as to post them what to swear when they got to Ottawa.

I asked Thos. Marshall how much they had got, and he said $26, with a promise to make it more if the evidence was good and strong. The said Marshall and Nelson have informed me since their return from Ottawa that they each got $13.20 at Ottawa as witness fees, and as they were away ahead on the transaction they had each bought a new suit of clothes. Nelson also said that it had been a godsend for him, and he hoped he would get a chance to make another raise in the same way. He also told me that W. D. McPherson, just before bidding them good-bye at the train on the Sunday evening when leaving for Ottawa, had impressed upon them the necessity of telling a story that would look all right and that if they did that he would not forget them.

Now, gentlemen, I put in that affidavit of Mr. Farr for what it is worth.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. COWAN. 'Hear, hear,' says my good friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) is apparently afflicted with these words, because when the affidavit of Pritchett, the liar and perjurer, was read, and his friends said that because of its particularity of detail it must be true, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) said 'hear, hear,' and he says 'hear, hear' now when I point out the particularity of detail of this affidavit. I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) agrees with me. Now Sir, this man Pritchett made the statement that Robinson, Cowan, Jones, Smith, Truesdale, Bates, with others, he had met, and posted how to switch ballots in Brockville. We have filed the affidavits of seven, flatly contradicting that statement of Pritchett's in every way. We have affidavits from every man who served in the town of Brockville with one exception, and that is a man who is lying at the point of death with typhoid fever. The rest were out in the country. By tonight's mail I received two more affidavits. Mr. Elmer W. Jones gave an affidavit the other day upon the mere statement that he had heard the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) had made certain allegations on the floor of this House, but when he is able to read the declaration in the Montreal Gazette, he makes this statement:

Dominion of Canada, Province of Ontario,
County of Leeds. To wit:

In the matter of the election for the electoral district of the town of Brockville, held on April 20, 1899, at which William Henry Comstock and Hon. Peter White were the candidates.

I, Elmer Watson Jones, of the town of Brockville, in the county of Leeds, barrister-at-law, do solemnly declare that:

1. I have read in the Montreal 'Gazette' what purports to be a copy of the affidavit of John G. Pritchett, made in this matter.
2. I say that the statement therein made, accusing me of fraudulent and improper conduct with respect to the ballots at the said election, are utterly false and untrue.
3. I do not know the said Pritchett and have never seen him or spoken to him.
4. I performed my duties as deputy returning officer strictly and impartially.
5. I did not change or tamper with any of the ballots, and I did not put in the ballot box any ballots save the regular proper official ballots as they were handed to me by the electors.
6. The charge made in said affidavit by said Pritchett that I changed or substituted ballots is a deliberate falsehood and entirely without foundation.
7. I never told said Pritchett that 'I had got in twelve' or had substituted or changed any ballot, and said Pritchett's statements as to alleged conversations with me upstairs in the polling place are false and untrue.
8. The statements contained in said affidavit that I was promised $5 for every ballot fraudulently substituted or worked in are false and untrue.

I never told Pritchett I had received any money for any such purpose, and the statement that I did receive such money is false and untrue.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of 'The Canada Evidence Act, 1893.'

ELMER W. JONES.

Declared before me at the town of Brockville, in the county of Leeds, this 17th day of May, A.D. 1900.

W. S. BUELL,
A Commissioner, &c.

There is the affidavit of Mr. Elmer W. Jones, a respectable legal practitioner, who was born and raised practically in the town of Brockville. I now take up affidavit No. 9:

Dominion of Canada Province of Ontario, County of Leeds. To wit:

In the matter of the election for the electoral district of the town of Brockville, held on April 20, 1899, at which William Henry Comstock and Hon. Peter White were the candidates.

I, James D. Truesdell, of the township of Elizabethtown, in the county of Leeds, farmer, do solemnly declare that:

1. I was the duly appointed deputy returning officer at polling subdivision No. 2 for the township of Elizabethtown at the said election.
 2. I have read the statements reported in the newspapers to have been made by Mr. Borden, M.P., in the House of Commons recently relating to the said election, and I say that as far as I am concerned and as far as I have any knowledge of the actions of the other deputy returning officers the statements imputing improper conduct to the deputy returning officers are false and unfounded.
 3. I do not know the man Pritchett referred to by said Mr. Borden.
 4. I received my instructions solely from the returning officer.
 5. I conducted the said poll in a fair and impartial manner and I know no such frauds as are alleged were practised there.
 6. I have lived in this riding for thirty years.
- And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of 'The Canada Evidence Act, 1893.'

JAS. D. TRUESDELL.

Declared before me at the township of Elizabethtown, in the county of Leeds, this 17th day of May, A.D. 1900.

ELMER W. JONES,
A Commissioner, &c.

In addition to that, there was read to-day a telegram from Mr. Horton—not a scapegoat, not a crook, not a man who is living on this government, not a man who is drawing any government salary, but a man who is appointed by the residents of Goderich as the town treasurer. This man says that the statement of Pritchett implicating him is absolutely false. Does it strike this House as reasonable that a man occupying the position of Mr. Horton would ever sit down with this confirmed crook, and there and then, for five dollars a ballot, agree to go into a scheme that would land him in the penitentiary?

Mr. BRITTON. And he was on the stand, and was examined at great length.

Mr. COWAN. I am glad to be informed by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), that Mr. Horton was examined as a witness and I place the statement of a man of that character against the affidavit of Pritchett, sworn to in Detroit, got in the manner in which it was got, and kept in the secret pocket of hon. gentlemen opposite down to the present time in order to avoid a prosecution. I now come to the evidence of Mr. Grant—not a crook, not a slick aleck, not a man who makes his living by his wits, but a high school teacher in the town of Goderich, a man to whom I have no doubt the children of the Conservative candidate go to be taught. We are asked to believe that Pritchett took this man to the back room of a hotel in Goderich and approached him for the purpose of getting him to steal ballots. Then comes the statement of Mr. Gundy, the deputy sheriff, who also contradicts Pritchett's statement in regard to him. Notwithstanding the fact that Pritchett admits himself that he was a crook, that he had committed perjury by making an affidavit in Detroit that he would not swear to in the city of St. Thomas, notwithstanding the fact that his freedom was purchased for that consideration, and notwithstanding the fact that nine honest people in Brockville and three in West Huron have contradicted his statement and have said it is untrue, hon. gentlemen opposite say that this cut-throat Pritchett's evidence should be taken because it described everything with minute particularity of detail.

Now, Sir, if this matter had stopped where it was left with the hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Borden), I should certainly not be on my feet to-night. But hon. gentlemen opposite gradually widened the discussion. The next speaker, the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) widened it by reading the confession made by Mr. Donald McNish, the Liberal candidate in a local contest in West Elgin, which had nothing whatever to do with this government, and nothing to do with a single man who sits in this House. Would the hon. member for Westmoreland argue that because something wrong was done in West Elgin in a local election, that was evidence that crooked work was done in Brockville and Huron?

Following the hon. member for Westmoreland, the mantle fell as it generally does, on the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). The hon. member for East Simcoe widened the scope of the discussion still further. He said that the hon. Postmaster General was up in West Huron, and was closeted behind a door with a man named Hanna, who, as I gathered, was a railway detective. The hon. Postmaster General denies that statement. Even if it were correct, how is there anything against the Postmaster General if he sat down in a room with Hanna and others? The hon. member for East Simcoe had a motive, however, in this statement. The hon. member for East Simcoe, backing up, I have no doubt, the policy which was laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite in their political caucus, to widen this matter as much as they could in the hope of smirching the whole Liberal party of Canada by means of Pritchett's statements, every time he rises has something to say with reference to the Postmaster General. The hon. member for East Simcoe says: 'The Postmaster General can sue me for slander outside.' If a Cabinet minister pays attention to everything said about him, either in this House or outside, he will be kept pretty busy. If the hon. leader of the opposition had taken that position when he was described by the organ of his party as the prince of political cracksmen, as a man who was in the field of politics the same as a burglar after a man's goods after midnight, the hon. member for East Simcoe might have been able to point to an example. I do not say that the article of the Mail was correct, but I say that if the reasoning of the hon. member for East Simcoe is right it would tell against his own leader, and it would have been well for his own party to have purged their own skirts of charges that have been made against them before they come into this House and try to blacken the reputation of the Postmaster General because he has not commenced a slander action against the hon. member for East Simcoe for something he said in the back townships of Huron. But the hon. member for East Simcoe has a purpose and a reason for his attack. It came out in this House two sessions ago, that the hon. member of East Simcoe had a brother feeding at the public crib; and the Postmaster General, administering his department as he does wisely and well, reformed the service, and then found that there was no more need for the hon. gentleman's brother in that service, than there was for a dog to have two tails; but he said to him: 'Because you are a brother of the hon. member for East Simcoe, I will not dismiss you, but I will shift you down to where you can do some work.'

He would not be shifted, and the Postmaster General finally superannuated him, and he is drawing, I believe, $600 to-day superannuation money. The hon. member for East Simcoe—I do not wish to burden this discussion with outside matters more than to show the motive behind these attacks—attacked the Postmaster General on that subject for hours in this House, and ever since he takes every opportunity to rise in his place and, as the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) once expressed his opinion of him by characterizing him as a squirt gun, and trying to throw dirty water on every one.

Then the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) addressed the House. So far as that hon. gentleman's statements are concerned, while I do not agree in his conclusion that the particularity of detail in an affidavit is guarantee of its proof, I must admit that he was honest and candid. He went back into the record of the Liberal party, and in so doing, let the cat out of the bag. He went back to 1876, in order to discover the first and only charge against any member of that party who ever held the position of a representative of the people in this House. He went back to the election of Mr. Laflamme in 1876, and said that in that election the ballot box was put into a sideboard, in the bottom of which there was a trap door, and that the box was stolen out of the sideboard by means of that trap door, and the ballots tampered with. However, while, in his anxiety to put up the best case he could, in going back to this election, he was honest and frank and candid and manly enough to say that he wished it to be distinctly understood that he made no charge against Mr. Laflamme in connection with the fraud in question, and that he did not believe that Mr. Laflamme knew anything about it. So that after going back over the record of the Liberal party from 1876 to 1898, the only thing which he could bring and put his finger upon and bring up against that party was the act I have just mentioned. I would, therefore, ask the ex-Finance Minister, who advised the young men of the city of Toronto to read the history of the Conservative party, to advise them to study that of the Liberal party, and they would then find in that history something which would give them better hope for the future of this country.

But the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) forgot to make one statement in connection with the election of Mr. Laflamme, and that was eight years afterwards, when the leading organ of the Conservative party in the province of Ontario, the Toronto Mail, came out and said that Mr. Laflamme had been a party to that criminal act, Mr. Laflamme went into the courts of this country and recovered in the city of Montreal a verdict of several thousand dollars against the Toronto newspaper for the slander they had inflicted on him. So that when these hon. gentlemen attempt to smirch the record of the Liberal party, we can well reply that the only man on this side against whom a charge of political corruption was brought, had that charge ventilated in the courts, and the parties convicted who made public that unfounded slander.

Before I sit down, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour and the length to which this debate has been prolonged, I must crave the indulgence of the House while I try to prove the statements I am making. Who next followed on the opposite side? It was the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and I am not going to say very much about him. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) has dealt with that hon. gentleman. My hon. friend read a statement—not a statement brought out by us, in trying to prove our case, but a statement reflecting on that hon. gentlemen's political purity. The hon. member for Assiniboia asked the hon. member for Guysborough to give the evidence, and my hon. friend complied with his request. I am sorry that the hon. member for Assiniboia is not in his seat, but I am informed on most reliable authority that he was a man who associated himself, not with an unconvicted felon, not with an unconvicted crook, but with a convicted criminal. He consorted with Chamberlain, who had been convicted for personation in the Manitoba elections of 1896.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Excuse me, it was a by-election.

Mr. COWAN. Very well, thank you. The hon. member for Lisgar says it was a by-election. I am glad to see that the hon. member for West Assiniboia is back in his seat. Chamberlain was convicted of personation at a by-election. He was sentenced to two or three years in the penitentiary or the jail, and put in his time.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Not his full time. He was sentenced for three years, and they let him out after two years.

Mr. COWAN. He was sentenced for three years, and then this man, who was a convicted violator of the election laws of Canada, was released by hon. gentlemen opposite, and after his release, he was associated and in close conversation with the hon. member for Western Assiniboia. That hon. gentleman was told by an hon. member of this House that he had associated himself with a political criminal, with a man who had done time for his criminal offences, and the hon. gentleman dared not deny it.

Mr. DAVIN. There is not a word of truth in what the hon. gentleman has just said. I never had any close conversation with the gentleman in question.

Mr. COWAN. Were you not in conversation with him in the presence of the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), and did not that hon. gentleman tell you, at the time, that you were arranging for a political trip with Chamberlain, and asked the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) for information about the running of the train through the west, and he then told you that you were associating yourself with a criminal?

Mr. DAVIN. The statement is entirely untrue.

Mr. COWAN. I give as my authority the hon. member for East Assiniboia.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. COWAN. I withdraw the statement, but I have given my authority, and I repeat now—

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am prepared to make the statement here, that on a trip on the railway south, from Winnipeg, during the provincial elections, the two gentlemen were in close conversation, arranging a political trip.

An hon. MEMBER. What two gentlemen?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and Mr. Chamberlain, the impersonator. I wish to give further details. At the time, I was in conversation with Judge Ryan of Portage La Prairie. The hon. member for Assiniboia and Mr. Chamberlain were both speaking so loud that it was not difficult at all to hear their conversation, and I was asked by the hon. member (Mr. Davin) for information as to the special train arrangements for certain districts in my constituency. I told him that I was not an authority upon the train arrangements, but that I had a guide in my pocket, and I was quite willing he should use that guide, even though he should use it against my political interests. And these two gentlemen arranged that he (Chamberlain) should visit certain districts in my constituency and in the constituency of Mr. T. O. Davis, and also that of Mr. Frank Oliver. When he returned me the guide, I said to the hon. member for West Assiniboia: Like some Conservatives that I know, you are quite ready to consort with jail-birds and impersonators: and he being caught in the act, he had nothing to say in reply. The conversation took place in the presence of another gentleman, who was seated beside me in the train. He also declared that this was Chamberlain who had been incarcerated for crooked work in the Manitoba elections.

Mr. DAVIN. So far as that statement relates to any Mr. Chamberlain, it is utterly untrue.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. Speaker, in making the statement, I did not know that the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) would deny it. I owe an apology to the House for having brought forward a matter leading to dispute. But, I felt that when I gave as my authority the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), a gentleman who, since he came into this House, has shown himself entitled to be regarded as one whose name would carry respect and whose word would be believed by all, I was stating that which would be accepted by everybody as true. And when the statement was challenged, I felt that I might so far strain the rules of the House as to seek to verify my statement. The hon. member for East Assiniboia has made the statement, the hon. member for West Assiniboia has denied it—I leave this House to judge.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have continually widened this discussion, and they have done that for a purpose, and that purpose not creditable to themselves. But, in the researches that have taken place, it has been shown that hon. gentlemen opposite—through their organizer, Mr. Barker, who has been given a certificate of character by the leader of the opposition—connived at defeating any attempt that might have been made to punish the criminals. They ask: Why do not the Liberal party punish them? Well, the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) read an affidavit from South Ontario. He read it in the dying hours of this debate, when it was impossible to bring out contradictions to it. He read it with all the dramatic expression of which he is capable. At the same time, he must have known, or ought to have known, that there had been two investigations by a commission of judges into these charges in South Ontario. These judges were not the appointees of the Liberal party; they were not county court judges; they were no less distinguished men than Mr. Justice Ferguson, one of the High Court judges of the Chancery division, and Mr. Justice Osler, of the Court of Appeal, two of the ablest jurists in this country. I was surprised, I may say in passing, that the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) did not attempt to smirch the character of these men. This investigation was carried on under commission issued, not by a Conservative government, but by the Liberal government of the province of Ontario. These judges found Cap Sullivan innocent—I do not, for my part, know whether he was innocent or not—at all events, they did not find him guilty. I want to be frank about it. It was said that Sullivan had been introduced under a name not his own. But the man who said that Cap Sullivan gave him $15, when confronted with Cap Sullivan, said he was a blonde man with a red mustache, while Cap Sullivan was dark. As a result of that investigation, certain culprits were found guilty of wrong-doing in that provincial election. But, if hon. gentlemen opposite will look over the records, they will find that just twice as many Conservatives as Liberals were found guilty of corruption practises. It is true that even if the whole Conservative party was corrupt to the core, that would not justify one Liberal doing wrong. But, when you stand up, for the purpose of politics, and compare the record of the two parties, these are points that should not be forgotten. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) told the young men: Read the history of your party. When the hon. gentleman undertakes to study the question of purity in public life and politics, I ask him not to forget the history of his party as written by the two High Court judges in South Ontario.

Now, the hon. member for West Assinibola made an attack upon the hon. acting Minister of the Interior. I may have been mistaken, but I did not hear one tittle of evidence offered against that hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) has been in this House for a great many years. He has been through a great many election contests of his own, and he has been for years to the Liberal party—only, I am glad to say, upon a higher plane—what the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has been to hon. gentlemen opposite. As leading Whip of this party, he has been through many political contests. Search the records, and find, if you can, where any man has ever fastened, or even charged—or, if charged, attempted to prove—a single act of dishonesty or corruption on the part of the hon. member for North Oxford. Why, these hon. gentlemen talk about North Grey. I was in North Grey myself. I saw the hon. member for West York there. I saw the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) there. The hon. member for South Leeds was there, and he had the Conservative organization—or rather, I should say, he had a portion of it. There were reasons for that. It was immediately after the election of 1896, and the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) was not in such good odour with his party as he is to-day. The hon. member for East York and the hon. member for South Leeds had dropped the leader of the opposition as their leader. They were riding the Protestant horse with the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and Orangeism was their cry. They took with them George Moir, who had a long history, having been organizer for the Conservative party. He has gone to his long rest, and I will not refer to him further. The hon. member for West York knows that for every man we had in North Grey, they had a man in North Grey. And I can tell the leader of the opposition something else that may be a small piece of secret political history of this country—that when a protest was filed against the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), it was not withdrawn at the request of the Minister of Customs. But, there is certain information which a certain bank could give as to why somebody on the opposition benches did not want that election protest to go on. It rested with the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) to perform the last act in the drama, it was for him to do the cleaning up process. There are depths to which certain men won't go in this House. The member for East Simcoe, the member for West York, and the member for South Leeds are sometimes called upon to make statements and accusations against men in public life which men—I was going to say more respectable in the party, but I will not—at all events, which other members of the party do not care to undertake. It was left to the hon. member for West York to intimate that the Premier of Canada knew all about it. And why? Because Mr. Alexander Smith, the organizer for the Liberal party, had walked with the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier down to his room in the House of Commons. Well, that is the last straw. In Pritchett's evidence he says that he saw Alexander Smith, but because he saw Alexander Smith would these hon. gentlemen attempt to play upon the imagination of the people of this country as to argue therefrom that Smith was corrupt? They take the people of Canada to be greener than they are. But if that argument is correct which was made to-night in the presence of the hon. leader of the opposition, what has he got to say of his leader, who associates with Barker, whose gratuitous services he accepts, and therefore he is under a strong obligation to him, accepting the services of a man who connived at an act that would have placed him behind prison bars if it had been done in Canada? I am going to mention one more point. Last night the ex-Minister of Justice, the senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) pointed his finger across the floor of the House at the Postmaster General, and he said: The Postmaster General and the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) are under a cloud. Why? Because these two gentlemen, as he states, appeared upon a public platform in Brockville and the only thing he has to connect them with that election was the fact that this man Pritchett had made an affidavit that corrupt practises had taken place in Brockville, although eight responsible men have sworn that Pritchett was a perjurer and a liar. Because these two gentlemen stood upon a public platform in Brockville and made a speech the ex-Minister of Justice argues therefrom that they must be corrupt. I might have expected that from some hon. gentlemen opposite, but I did not expect it from the hon. member for Pictou. I fancy he is ashamed of it himself, and that he would not repeat it again. I simply mention these facts to show the depth to which the hon. gentlemen will go in order to try to besmirch the Liberal party. If he believed what he said, then he must believe that every cabinet minister who stands up in a public meeting where some thief says political corruption existed, he must therefore be corrupt, or be under a cloud. Now, that being the case I propose taking up here and now some of the matters that were exposed in 1896, and in doing so I want to ask the member for Pictou what he thinks of his worthy sire the leader of the opposition. I want it to be understood that I am not opposed to investigating where the culprits can be punished. I will go further, and say I am prepared to support with my vote and my voice any inquiry that is likely to get at the foundation of ballot box stuffing, and find out how it happened, where it existed, and what remedy can be applied to the disease. It seems to me that if the member for Lisgar had been sincere, as he stood up and read his essay, he would have said: Let us get to the bottom of this thing, and find out how it originated. Let us find out where it started, try to get hold of the men who did it, who first gave instructions how to perpetrate these frauds, find out where the disease is, and then apply your salve to the festering sore.

Now, I am not going to say anything about what was done in 1891. I am not going to take up South Wentworth, or North Middlesex, or West Northumberland, or South Grey, in every one of which constituencies ballots were stolen from the box after the election, and for some of which men sat in this House for years by reason of these tampered ballots, after they had been counted in the presence of the different scrutineers. And when it came to a recount before a judge, in the middle of the bunch they found ballots marked for both candidates in close constituencies; and these men sat for years as supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite, and some of them are sitting there to-day. I am not going back to 1891, but I want to show what was done in 1896. In the constituency of Bothwell, whose representative (Mr. Clancy) I see in his place, in the city of Chatham, on election night, after the election was over, there were six good genuine ballots, all marked for the present member for Bothwell, found on the streets of Chatham. That was in the election of 1896. We had nothing to do with the printing, we did not appoint the deputy returning officers. Beyond that I can give this House no information; but I leave this House to draw its own conclusions as to whether they were ballots that fell from the pockets of the deputy returning officer who had them for the purpose of substituting them for ballots marked for Mr. Mills, and that he either had more than he could use, or he was watched so closely that he could not use what he had, and they fell from his pocket accidentally on the street. And these ballots are still in existence. Now, I will diverge here for an instant. Fortunately, Liberals who desire to make accusations of deliberate violation of the election laws in 1896 by hon. gentlemen opposite need not rely on the affidavits of a man like Pritchett. I am not going to say that a single man sitting on the opposition benches knew what was going on in 1896. If the Liberal party is to be held responsible for the wrong-doing of every culprit who may chance to vote Liberal in an election, if it is to be held responsible for every act that may be done, if that is the position of the hon. gentlemen opposite, then they must accept it for themselves, because what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander; they must relegate to themselves their own culpability for all the corruption and wrong-doing that was committed throughout the country in 1891 and 1896. But, when it came to 1896, hon. gentlemen opposite became so bold that they placed their instructions in print, and will go one step further and tell these hon. gentlemen that the man who stuck the type may yet be alive, and that the printing machine that printed these instructions, may not yet be broken. If we are going to investigate, let us come down to the fellows who wrote the instructions. I will read them for the benefit of this House. Where did they come from? I will, before I sit down, prove where they came from, and I tell the House, that this man Freeborn, who is just as good a man and better than Pritchett, because he originated nothing, and Pritchett did, says, they came from Robert Birmingham, the chief organizer then, and the chief organizer to-day, of the Conservative party. This is what they are:

We have the printing of the ballots, therefore a sufficient number should be printed extra to enable the deputy returning officer to have them marked for our candidate and ready to use after the count to replace those read out wrongly to the scrutineers. Or the deputy returning officer can have them marked and folded in his pocket to slip into the box in place of an opposition ballot if the opportunity happens. This, of course, will occur quite frequently if we have control of both scrutineers.

I am not surprised at the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), laughing. I am not surprised at the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart). If that proposition stopped there I would laugh too, but, unfortunately, it does not. These instructions tell how to get control of the scrutineers:

To get control of both scrutineers have one of our men, not a prominent one, but a supposed kicker, for instance, apply to the opposition to be put on as scrutineer inside. They are generally short of workers, and a few plausible men will turn the election in a close constituency. Or the man can write to their headquarters for scrutineer papers if he lives in the country.

Efforts should be made to make these methods work in wards that give the heaviest opposition vote.

Having control of both scrutineers, a large vote can be polled—dead and absent voters, &c., can have their ballots marked—there is no redress; both scrutineers were present.

A friendly constable should be present to keep the poll clear of loungers and inquisitive people.

The deputy returning officer should be a reliable, sharp and plausible man, so that if we do not get control of the opposition scrutineer, he can, when the counting-time arrives, ask both scrutineers to take a piece of paper and record the vote of their candidate as he reads the ballots, which have been emptied on the table. He will then have a chance to read out wrongly, so that a majority can be secured for our candidate. The ballot should be put back into the box as quickly as they are read. The extra ones will do to fix things correctly when he goes home.

Spilled ballots can be made sure by a little doctoring. Opposition ballots can be spoiled by the lead out of a lead-pencil, fastened under the little finger with beeswax, drawn across opposite our candidate's name in opening the ballot.

If you cannot get control of opposition scrutineers, have your deputy returning officer announce that he is against you, so as to lead him astray if possible.

Where did this statement come from? It was produced in 1896, it was produced in the province of Manitoba, it was produced by a man named Freeborn, who, to their knowledge, had done that nefarious work in 1891. He says: It came from Robert Birmingham, the Conservative organizer. I ask any House, I appeal to any jury, and I ask them, where did it come from—from a Liberal or a Conservative source? But, Sir, that was not all. I want to say that certain members, who were members of the Conservative party, knew of the existence of that kind of a scheme. They knew of these things that were being carried on, because when that man, Freeborn, went to Nathaniel Boyd, formerly the member for Macdonald, and at this time the candidate—and I am not taking Freeborn's word for it—Boyd sent a telegram to Birmingham about Freeborn. What do you suppose he telegraphed to Birmingham? Did he tell him that this man wanted to substitute ballots? Not much. I have no doubt that he wired, was Freeborn reliable, and the answer came back, and it is one of the things that we can speak about with certainty, because the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), said that he had it in his hands: 'He was a good man in North Bruce in 1891'—signed by whom? Signed by Robert Birmingham, the Conservative organizer, the organizer of hon. gentlemen opposite, the chief organizer of hon. gentlemen for years, their chief organizer to-day. So that, if hon. gentlemen want to investigate. I tell them that they do not have to go farther afield than the opposition benches, in order to find out what the position of affairs is, and there is the documentary evidence, a telegram from their chief organizer, to prove and back up the assertion. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), is not in his seat. The majority of the hon. member for North Bruce in 1891, was 30. Freeborn, the expert ballot manipulator, ballot switcher and ballot box stuffer, at a time when it was not known, when nobody ever looked for that sort of thing—'He was a good man in North Bruce in 1891.' I do not know, but I leave this House to judge. How that majority was obtained? If the Liberal party hold the seats of West Huron and Brockville by majorities of over one hundred because the ballot boxes and the ballots were switched, how does the confrère of hon. gentlemen, that esteemed Britisher, the great man of British fair-play, hold his seat, and I do not say that he knew anything about it. I have not yet been able to ascertain how he holds his seat. Whether it is by virtue of this man, I know not. History does not tell. He has never denied that he knew Freeborn. I never heard it. He may have. But surely some of the hon. gentlemen opposite have heard him if he has, and they apparently haven't or they would say so. Now, to come down to something definite, I know that in the constituency of West Kent, there was one of the biggest schemes that was ever organized to defeat a candidate. The hon. member for West Kent (Mr. Campbell), who sits in this House, tells me, that the returning officer, Mr. Lambert, of Chatham, actually got extra ballots, that he handed them to the deputy returning officers, that he previously marked them for Ball, and that he asked them to initial them and to substitute them in the ballot box, for the genuine ballots. I hold in my hand, not the hearsay of a man named Pritchett, I hold in my hand the ballots that were placed with a Conservative deputy returning officer for him to substitute, and if hon. gentlemen opposite want to see them, I will tear off the back which is marked, as an exhibit, with the man's name, and let these gentlemen see them. These are the bogus ballots that were made for Kent in 1896. Here they are:

Ball, William, city of Chatham, county of Kent, lumber merchant. X

Campbell, Archibald, of the town of Toronto Junction, county of York, miller.

There are the ballots—that is no fake, they are marked for Ball. These were ballots that were given to the deputy returning officer for him to substitute, and in order that there would be no doubt about it, they marked them previously for Ball. This deputy returning officer, to his credit be it said, refused to substitute them. There were over 100 such ballots used against the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), and if Kent had been a close constituency, Mr. Ball would have been sitting here instead of Mr. Campbell, and Mr. Ball would be feeling that he was honestly elected, because Mr. Ball is a decent man, I believe, a respectable man in Chatham, who would frown down that sort of thing. Mr. Ball never knew, but the returning officer, Mr. Lambert, a 'pop' manufacturer in Chatham knew. I have got his envelope with his writing on the back of it, in which the bogus ballots were inclosed. That was in 1896, and if gentlemen opposite want to investigate, why not start at the foundation of it. If it is possible to punish the culprits, let us punish them, and every man on this side of the House will vote for the money to do it, whether the culprits are Liberal or Tory. The hon. gentleman from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) laughs. I can understand him laughing. He cannot conceive a Conservative government willing to investigate itself, but the Liberal party can conceive a Liberal government doing such an act, and is the only party that ever did investigate itself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. COWAN. Tell me the Conservative government that ever did vote one dollar to investigate itself? The Ontario Liberal government did. Now, Sir, in the matter of the election in the county of Kent, I want to read an affidavit, and I want to explain first to the House that I have scored out the name of the man who made it. I have the original declaration here in my desk—

Mr. GIBSON. Better not leave it there then.

Mr. COWAN. I do not want to give his name unless there is going to be an investigation, and if hon. gentlemen want it, then I will give the name. Here is the declaration:

ONTARIO: COUNTY OF KENT. TO WIT:

In the matter of the election of a member of the House of Commons of Canada for the electoral district of Kent, in the province of Ontario, held on the 23rd day of June, A.D. 1896.

do solemnly declare:

1. I acted as deputy returning officer at the above-mentioned election.
2. Warren Lambert, of the said city of Chatham, pop manufacturer, was returning officer for the said electoral district of Kent at the said election.
3. Before I was appointed deputy returning officer for the said polling subdivision, I was asked by the said returning officer how many illiterate voters there were in the said subdivision, and I replied about ten. He told me that deputy returning officers would be expected to use marked ballots where the illiterate voters voted 'wrong' (meaning for Campbell), and that they would be of no use if they could not do so.
4. Afterwards, and within a day or two before the day of the voting at the said election, the said returning officer shoved an envelope under the blotting paper on my table, which envelope was endorsed with the word 'private,' but with no other writing.
5. The said envelope is now produced and shown to me and marked as exhibit 'A' to this, my declaration.
6. Upon opening the said envelope (exhibit 'A') I found within it eight ballots, each marked in pencil with a cross opposite the name of William Ball, the Conservative candidate at the said election.
7. Five of the said eight ballots so received by me are now produced and shown to me attached together and marked as exhibit 'B' to this my declaration.
8. The said five ballots exhibit 'B' and the said envelope exhibit 'A' have been continuously in my possession since the time I first received them as aforesaid, and are now in the same plight and condition as they were when I so first received them save for the creases caused by the folding of them and for some slight discoloration on the envelope exhibit 'A'.
9. The other three of the said eight ballots were delivered by me to three gentlemen after the said election.
10. None of the said eight ballots were used by me at the said election.

Mr. COWAN.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act 1893.

Declared before me at the city of Chatham, in the county of Kent, this 25th day of April, A.D. 1900.

There is the affidavit, and there are the ballots. That was done in 1896, under the printed instruction which I have read. Where did these ballots come from that were sent to the deputy returning officers? Did they come from the Liberal party?

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan) has not given us the name.

Mr. COWAN. No, Sir, I expressly stated that this man says: I do not want you to give my name unless it is necessary.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan) must know that he cannot read a letter in this House without giving the name.

Mr. COWAN. Does he? The hon. member for East Grey can know that the copy which I have here, and which I have read, I will put in Hansard.

Mr. SPROULE. Then I appeal to the Speaker for his ruling on that point.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Ask the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

Mr. SPROULE. I raised the point of order, and I ask the opinion of the Speaker, whether an hon. member can read a letter to this House without giving the name.

Mr. COWAN. Can the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) quote any authority in support of that?

Mr. SPROULE. I am asking the ruling of the Speaker.

Mr. COWAN. That, Mr. Speaker, has been decided before in this House.

The PRIME MINISTER. Again and again.

Mr. COWAN. That has been decided before in this House by the late Mr. Speaker Edgar, in connection with a letter read from the original document—not from a copy—by the hon. member for Algoma, and it was decided that he need not give the name. As I say, I am reading a copy, and I will give it to the Hansard, just as it is.

Mr. SPROULE. I want the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. My recollection of the rule is that a minister who reads a document which is official, or in support of an official statement is required to produce that document. With reference to documents quoted by private members, my memory is they are to be taken for what they are worth.

Mr. COCHRANE. That is not much.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the House wants a ruling, I shall look into the matter, and give it officially.

Mr. SPROULE. I can only say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, sit down.

Mr. SPROULE. I can only say that the contrary has been ruled in this House time and time again.

Mr. COWAN. If the House undertakes an investigation into the matter, there will be no order necessary for me to produce the affidavit. I will produce the original, and the man who made it. Now, I will state something that is public history for the benefit of gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentlemen opposite know that in North Ontario in 1896, the county now represented by the respected gentleman (Mr. Graham), when it came to a recount before the judge, they found in the ballot boxes, ballots that had never been folded, that were perfectly uncreased, and that were marked for Mr. McGillivray, the Conservative candidate, and now an ex-member of this House.

Mr. Graham applied for a recount. Upon opening the envelopes containing the ballots, it was found the ballots in five different polling subdivisions had been tampered with. No. 4, Thorah, No. 18, Brechin, No. 19, Town Hall in Mara, No. 27, Bracebridge, and No. 33, Draper. In these polls twenty-one ballots marked for Graham were, after the election and before the recount, extracted from the ballot boxes and twenty-one marked for McGillivray substituted therefor. These twenty-one bogus ballots were unfolded, uncreased and perfectly smooth and in marked contrast to the genuine ballots in the same envelope, and it was impossible for them to have passed through the slit in the ballot box. His Honor Judge Burnham, before whom the recount was held clearly expressed the opinion that they were fraudulent and bogus and had been put in the box after polling day. Yet Mr. McGillivray sat in the House for a whole session with the hon. gentlemen opposite, supported them during the session, and drew his sessional indemnity, and no man on that side asked for an investigation; but we went before the proper tribunal, the election court, and proved our case. Now, as this is a case of public notoriety, I will give the hon. gentleman an affidavit in regard to it:

Dominion of Canada, Province of Ontario,
County of Ontario. To wit:

In the matter of the election of a member for the electoral district of the north riding of the county of Ontario, holden on the 16th and 23rd days of June, 1896.

I, Robert Moore Noble, of the town of Uxbridge, in the county of Ontario, barrister-at-law, do solemnly declare as follows:

1. That I was an elector in the above-named electoral district and voted at the said election.
2. That I was present at the declaration of the returning officer at said election.

3. That I attended at Whitby at the recount of the ballots cast at the said election, and I was also solicitor for Mr. Duncan Graham, one of the candidates at the said election, in the matter of his petition, to declare the said election void under the Dominion Controverted Elections Act.

4. That at the above-named recount, upon opening the envelopes containing the ballots marked for the said Duncan Graham, it was found that twenty-one ballot papers therein were marked for John A. McGillivray, the other candidate at the said election; these were found among the ballot papers for the following polling subdivisions, namely: Nos. 4 (Galloways, Thorah), 18 (Brechin), 19 (Town Hall, Mara), 27 (Bracebridge), and 33 (Draper).

5. That the said ballots presented the appearance of never having passed through the slit in the ballot box, but were unfolded and uncreased and smooth, in marked contrast to the genuine ballots in the same envelopes, as I was informed by the said Duncan Graham and the late Mr. Dalton McCarthy, who acted as counsel at the said recount for the said Duncan Graham, and as I verily believe.

6. That I have had conversations with one or more of the persons who were present at the counting of the ballots at the close of the poll in the said election at each of the polling subdivisions above-mentioned, and I was informed by the said persons, and verily believe that all the ballots put into the envelopes purporting to contain those marked for the said Duncan Graham were so marked for the said Duncan Graham.

7. That I have good reason to believe, and do verily believe that twenty-one ballots cast at the said polling subdivisions for the said candidate, Duncan Graham, were unlawfully extracted from the said envelopes after the said polling and before the said recount, and that twenty-one ballot papers fraudulently marked for the said candidate, John A. McGillivray, were unlawfully substituted therefor, and this was the expressed opinion of His Honour Judge Burnham, before whom the said recount was held.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

R. M. NOBLE.

Declared before me at the town of Uxbridge, in the county of Ontario, this 13th day of July, A.D. 1899.

V. M. HARE,
A Commissioner, &c.

There is the affidavit of the solicitor who was there. The deputy returning officers themselves swore that they had sealed up the ballots in the envelopes marked for Duncan Graham, that no ballots were in it except those marked for Duncan Graham, but when they opened the box they found twenty-one new ballots that had never been creased or folded, which is necessary to get them into a ballot box, in Duncan Graham's envelope. How did they get there? Did any Liberal put them there? There is no man on the other side of the House who will insinuate anything so absurd.

Now, Sir, I come down to the election in Lincoln in 1896, represented in this House by the respected whip of the Liberal party

(Mr. Gibson). We had a peculiar state of affairs in Lincoln, because we had a peculiar opposition candidate—a pastmaster of political corruption, a man who had been practically driven out of this House for it. The returning officer was a partner of the secretary of the Conservative Association, who with other Conservatives, performed the duties of returning officers. A number of shady characters, one of them an ex-convict were appointed to act as deputy returning officers at various points in the riding. The names of about ten of these deputy returning officers were not disclosed until after midnight of the night before election day and only then after repeated requests on behalf of the Liberals. About two days before the election these men met by appointment at a hotel in St. Catharines where they were instructed how to substitute ballots for the notorious J. C. Rykert in place of ballots honestly marked by the voters for Gibson, the present member and for that purpose were supplied with a large number of duplicate ballots previously marked for Rykert, to enable them to carry out the fraud. They were each paid a sum of money on account with a promise of a bonus to the man who would steal the largest number of ballots. The man who gave the instructions was imported from the United States for the purpose. Over three hundred duplicate ballots previously marked for Rykert were given to these deputy returning officers and a large number of them were used.

Let me deviate here for a minute and ask the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) if he is surprised where they got all the details for the declarations that were made by Pritchett, keeping in view the fact that those declarations were prepared by Sam Barker, the organizer of the Conservative party, who had been through this nefarious business in Lincoln. I have no doubt, following the printed instructions to pay for the work as it was done.

Mr. McCLEARY. Who made that statement?

Mr. COWAN. Wait a moment till you hear me through. I will answer the hon. gentleman. He wants to know the deputy returning officer who turned and told of the nefarious business. His name does not appear here. We have the original, however, and if there is any investigation, we will supply it before this House is prorogued:

Dominion of Canada. To wit:

In the matter of the election for the electoral district of Lincoln, held on the 26th day of June, 1896.

I, _____ of _____ in the county of Lincoln, do solemnly declare:

1. That I was resident in the city of St. Catharines at the time of the above election, and personally know of the matters herein referred to in connection thereof.

2. The returning officer for the said election was William J. Carroll, of the said city of St.

Mr. COWAN.

Catharines, a member of the firm of Potter & Carroll, real estate agents, the said Potter being at that time the secretary of the Conservative Association for the said electoral district.

3. During the said election the said Carroll was intoxicated for a considerable part of the time, having been kept so by the said Potter and other members of the Conservative party, and the said Potter and other members of the Conservative party discharged the duties and acts relating to the said election that should have been done by the returning officer.

4. The ballots for use at the election were printed at the 'Star' office in St. Catharines, and a large number were printed in addition to what was required for the election, such extra number being of 500 or more, and these extra ballots, as well as the ballots for the election were left in the office of the said Potter & Carroll in their safe, both the safe and the office being unlocked and free to any one who might wish to enter.

5. About ten persons, residents of St. Catharines, were appointed to act as deputy returning officers at the various polls in the county and not in the city, and principally in the township of Pelham and Gainsborough. These parties, generally speaking, were not responsible persons, and in many cases were not at all qualified to act as deputy returning officers. The names of these ten or so deputy returning officers were not disclosed to anybody, but were kept secret, until late on the night prior to the election, and their names were then published only on the written order from Mr. Rykert, the Conservative candidate at the election.

6. About two days before the election these ten deputy returning officers were instructed to meet, and did meet, at the Breen House, in the city of St. Catharines, kept by one John McNulty, a prominent Conservative, now residing at the village of Merriton. They were told to go there by the said Potter, and they were met there by a man named Quackenbush, formerly of Port Dalhousie, then and now a resident of Lewiston. At that meeting the said Quackenbush gave instructions to the deputy returning officers how to substitute ballots marked for the said Rykert for ballots given to them by voters marked for William Gibson, the other candidate of the said election, and on the evening and on subsequent occasions, the said Quackenbush, Potter and McNulty gave to these ten persons who were to act as deputy returning officers a large number of duplicate ballots. Each deputy returning officer was to mark the duplicate ballots for Rykert, and to put his initials on the back, and when a voter known as a Gibson voter came to vote the deputy was to place in the ballot box one of these duplicate ballots marked for Rykert, instead of the ballot marked by the voter.

7. At the said meeting each of the said persons so appointed as deputy returning officer was paid the sum of $10 to induce him to carry out this scheme, and the said Quackenbush promised a further sum to the one of the said ten who would have substituted the most ballots pursuant to the arrangement above-mentioned.

8. The said persons so appointed all acted as deputy returning officers in the polls where they were appointed, and a considerable number of duplicate ballots were substituted by them, as set forth above.

9. The names of the said deputy returning officers are known to me, and the facts hereinbefore stated are from my personal knowledge. The names of the said deputy returning officers, so far as I remember them, are as follows: James Flack, jr., Percy Nelson, Geo. A. Bauers, Richard Newman, James A. Livingston, E. McGowan, Fred. House.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

Declared before me at the _____ this 14th day of July

There is the declaration, with sufficiently minute particularity of details; and I want to ask this House and hon. gentlemen opposite, especially one question, and that is: When you go back to Pritchett's affidavit, remembering what occurred in 1896, having the printed written instructions given in 1896 contained in these affidavits I have read, and having the knowledge of what these hon. gentlemen opposite did in the province of Manitoba, why was that paragraph inserted in Pritchett's affidavits, saying that it occurred to this man in 1898 that that thing could be done? Why, Sam Barker knew that that had been done in 1896. These gentlemen had the printed instructions in their hands, but in order to lend colour to their story and attempt to show that it was the Liberal party which had invented this mode of tampering with ballots, after this government were in power, they put that paragraph in the affidavit, that it originated with these men in 1898, in order to throw the responsibility if they could, on the Liberal party, while in point of fact it was their stock in trade in trying to carry the elections for many years.

I want to go back to the statement of the ex-Minister of Justice, the senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). I want to ask him what he has to say in justification for his leader's going into the constituency of Lincoln and speaking for Mr. Rykert. The hon. leader of the opposition spoke, I have no doubt, in Kent. He spoke in Lincoln, and I have no doubt he spoke in Bothwell. I am also informed now that he spoke for Mr. McGreevy in the city of Quebec. I ask that hon. gentleman if I am wrong in that statement? Does the hon. the leader of the opposition deny it? No. Then, Sir, if that fact is true, what has the ex-Minister of Justice to say? He has told us that a cloud rests on the Postmaster General and on the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), because these men stood upon public platforms in Brockville where corruption is alleged by a confessed criminal, Pritchett, to have been practised.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman want an answer?

Mr. COWAN. I will listen to any explanation the hon. gentleman may give.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I say without hesitation that if the House were requested to pass a resolution, such as the one now before us, to inquire into the conduct of those officers who had acted in that corrupt manner in a constituency, where the leader of the opposition or any of his colleagues had taken an active part, and he had refused to vote for and support a thorough and searching inquiry, I would not support the leader of the opposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. COWAN. I will take up the hon. gentleman where he left off. I hope I understood him, and do not want to misstate his case. I understood him to say that if an investigation were called for, until the charges were cleared up, any minister who spoke in the constituency concerned, is under a cloud?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am afraid I cannot make the hon. gentleman understand plain English. What I said was a direct answer to this question, and it is this. If the leader of the opposition had taken an active part in a constituency, in which the returning officers were solemnly charged on the floor of this House with having been guilty of corrupt practices, and a committee of investigation were asked for, and the leader of the opposition endeavoured to burk the inquiry, I would say that there was a strong suspicion that he was afraid something else than the corruption of the returning officer would come out.

Mr. COWAN. I appreciate the explanation of the hon. gentleman, and I think I thoroughly understand it, and that is, that wherever dishonesty is charged it should be investigated. That if there had been dishonesty committed by deputy returning officers, then that should be investigated, and that he would support a vote of censure upon the leader of the opposition if he refused an investigation into the conduct of an election where there was a corrupt returning officer, and in which it had been charged on the floor of parliament that that returning officer was corrupt. I think that is the position the hon. gentleman takes?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. COWAN. I am glad that the hon. gentleman assents to that. Then, if the ex-Minister of Justice is so jealous of the purity of a deputy returning officer, that he is ready to censure whoever will not investigate the charge of corruption against that officer in the conduct of an election, how much more jealous must he be of the honesty and purity of the candidate himself who was running in the interests of that party? If this is the case, the only thing the hon. gentleman wants to know is that, if there is crooked work, the hon. gentleman is the first to denounce it. Then, he censured the Postmaster General for speaking in an election in which it was alleged on affidavit that corruption had gone on.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Nonsense! I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. COWAN. Well, if he did not censure the Postmaster General he said he was under a cloud.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Never—not for speaking in the constituency.

Mr. COWAN. For speaking in the constituency and refusing to have it investigated. And, what must be the position of the leader of the opposition who goes into a constituency and calls upon the Conservatives great and small to rally around the standard of a convicted criminal in public life. I do not want to dig up this skeleton—but Thomas McGreevy was a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, and was a convicted criminal as a man who had trafficked in public money. So clear was it that a crime had been committed that his political affiliation could not save him, even though defended by most eminent counsel, when he got before the jury. He was tried, he was convicted and he was sentenced to imprisonment in jail. And these political purists are the men who asked their followers to rally around the standard of the criminal whom they themselves had prosecuted. If that is the standard of purity the hon. member for Pictou wants to raise, he is welcome to the position he has taken.

There was an election held in Parry Sound, three men ran there, W. H. Pratt, George McCormick, Conservatives, and Colonel O'Brien, McCarthyite. Mr. McCormick was declared elected. Some time afterwards over forty ballots were discovered in one ballot box which had been marked for Pratt and O'Brien and plainly tampered with. In some cases the crosses opposite Pratt's and O'Brien's names were erased, but done so clumsily as to be easily detected with the naked eye. In other cases a cross had been put opposite McCormick's name on the same ballots from which the crosses marked for one of the other candidates had been erased. The conspirators found that the work had been done too clumsily and substituted new ballots and failed to destroy the original ones. When over forty ballots are stolen in one polling subdivision is it not a fair inference that there was an organized plot which resulted in the seat being stolen for the Tory candidate? That is a serious charge. I will give the hon. gentlemen authority for it:

I, Thomas Kennedy, of the town of Parry Sound, in the district of Parry Sound, registrar, do solemnly declare that I was returning officer, in the district of Parry Sound, for the province of Ontario, election of 1898, and having need of additional ballot boxes communicated with Mr. Joseph Malkin, of the village of Spencedale, who was the returning officer for the electoral district of Muskoka and Parry Sound, in the Dominion general election of 1896, for the purpose of procuring from him some of the boxes which were used in the last mentioned election; that in pursuance of my said communication with said Joseph Malkin, I received per express, from Spencedale, ten of the ballot boxes used in the said Dominion election in said electoral district, and in opening these ballot boxes, in the presence of my deputy, Mr. W. E. Foot, I discovered in one of them about forty ballots marked for the different candidates in the said election, Mr. Pratt, Mr. O'Brien and Mr. McCormick; a considerable number of which on close examination appeared to me to have been tampered with.

THOS. KENNEDY.

Declared before me at the town of Parry Sound, in the district of Parry Sound, this eighteenth day of July, A.D. 1899.

R. E. STONE,
A Commissioner, &c.

Now, what does that mean? It means that within that ballot box were forty ballots that had been marked against the present member for Muskoka and Parry Sound. The attempt had been made to erase the mark, but they failed to make a good job of it, and no doubt substituted new ballots, but failed to destroy the old ones. I leave the House to say how the hon. gentleman holds his seat.

I am not going much further into this sort of thing. But the case of Manitoba has been referred to. It was proved before the Public Accounts Committee that wholesale frauds were perpetrated in Manitoba during the Dominion general election of 1896. One Freeborn was expressly sent from Ontario to Manitoba to instruct deputy returning officers in different parts of that province to stuff the ballot boxes in the interests of Conservative candidates. Freeborn stated that he was sent up from Ontario by Mr. Robert Birmingham, the chief organizer of the Conservative party. Mr. Nathaniel Boyd, the Conservative candidate in Marquette, to whom Freeborn was sent, telegraphed to Mr. Birmingham about him and Birmingham wired back in reply, 'He was a first-class man in North Bruce.' After receiving this certificate of his skill from the chief organizer of the Conservative party, he was employed by them for the express purpose of teaching deputy returning officers how to switch ballots. In this nefarious business he was helped by two men, named Anderson and Waller. These three worthies went through the province into several constituencies and it was clearly proved during the investigations that followed by incontrovertible evidence that they instructed many deputy returning officers, who subsequently confessed that they had substituted hundreds of ballots cast for Liberals with ballots previously marked for the Conservative candidate and with which they had been previously supplied by the Tory machine in Manitoba.

Subsequently, when that fraud came out, the Liberal party did not wait until parliament met for the purpose of raising a furore on the floor of this House. They set the provincial machinery in motion to try to bring the guilty parties to justice. They did not start it with the idea of making political capital for the Liberal party, they started it with the idea of bringing the guilty parties to justice. The ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) tried to score a point against this government because we had spent the money along this line. We all remember how he rose in his place time and again and denounced the government of this country because they spent the money in trying to prosecute these men. But the hon. gentleman who was zealous for the share of public money in 1896 after the work had been done and it was proved and one of them was actually convicted—the hon. gentleman opposite, instead of being glad of the exposure, instead of commending the government for trying to bring the culprits to justice, censured the Liberal party and tried to censure the Minister of the Interior because he endeavoured to see that justice was done and the criminals were punished. And he spent four or five thousand dollars of public money in the Public Accounts Committee in an effort to show that these prosecutions ought not to have taken place and that they were too expensive when they did. So, this desire for investigation and punishment on the part of these hon. gentlemen comes too late. In the city of Winnipeg there was fraud of another kind; whereas six or seven thousand ballots would have been sufficient in an honest election there were ten thousand printed, and yet all had been used up at two o'clock and the polls had to be closed while they got a fresh supply printed. Altogether, the Manitoba election will live in political history as the boldest and most colossal election fraud ever perpetrated by any party. Yet these gentlemen squandered $5,000 of the public money trying to censure the government because they had exposed rascality.

Now, there is another matter that I am sorry to have to go into; hon. gentlemen opposite have mentioned it, and that is the South Ontario election. If I were in the place of the hon. gentleman it seems to me that if there was one thing that would bring a blush of shame to my cheek, it would be the mention of South Ontario. In South Ontario, Mr. Calder defeated the Hon. John Dryden by ninety-six votes. As high as $15 and $20 each were paid for votes in the Conservative interest. In that constituency the Conservatives spent over $7,000. They admitted it. In the election trial which followed, one Barker admitted that he had undertaken to make a change of twenty votes in one polling subdivision for $100, and that the money was paid to him by one Luke on the written order of William Smith. Now, I want to ask, Who was William Smith? He was the Conservative ex-M.P. But that is not all. I want now the attention of the hon. leader of the opposition for a moment while I make a statement to him. In 1896, Wm. Smith was the M.P. for the county of Ontario, for the south riding. He was a supporter of the hon. gentlemen opposite in 1896, and the leader of the opposition promised a committee of prominent gentlemen from South Ontario that after the election, if Mr. Smith was returned, he would make him Minister of Agriculture. The leader of the opposition visited the constituency of South Ontario, and that statement was made, I am advised, in his presence on the platform, and was not by him contradicted. I want to go one step further, I presume I am right, if not, the leader of the opposition will contradict me. Mr. Henry Parsons, proprietor of the Conservative party organ, and one of the deputation that visited Ottawa, the editor of the North Ontario Observer of Port Perry, made this statement, as I am informed, in his paper, at least made it upon the public platform: 'I got the promise of the leader of the opposition to that effect.' The Oshawa Vindicator, a Conservative newspaper, said the same thing. I hold in my hand the Whitby Chronicle of May 11, 1900, which says in regard to that matter:

The election of 1896 was interesting. The question before the people was, should Manitoba be coerced or not. The Conservative party took the affirmative, and the Liberal party the negative. In fact Mr. Burnett found himself face to face with the announced fact that Sir Charles Tupper had promised to make Mr. Smith, M.P., Minister of Agriculture.

That is what was used in the campaign in South Ontario, that is what the two party organs said, that is what the deputation said who came back, and I am advised that is what was said in the presence of the hon. gentleman. No doubt that Mr. Smith would have been the Minister of Agriculture if the Conservative party had been returned, because I believe the leader of the opposition prides himself on carrying out a promise made to a party friend. On the 9th day of January, 1900, the whole matter of bribery came before the courts, and this man Smith, this would-be Minister of Agriculture in the Conservative government, practically admitted the whole thing, and made what was known to be the most pitiable exhibition of political corruption and human depravity ever witnessed in Canada. Now, Sir, let me prove this statement. I will not ask you to take the evidence of a Pritchett, I will not ask you to take the evidence of a political renegade, of any political criminal or cut-throat; I will not ask you to take the evidence of a single Liberal. But, Sir, I go into the records of the court, and I drag forth the evidence taken upon the investigation before their lordships, Mr. Justice Ferguson and Mr.

Justice Osler, two gentlemen, Conservatives in their proclivities before they were appointed, and two of the most eminent jurists we have ever had in the Dominion of Canada. This is what this man White says :

Cross-examined by Mr. Lount :

Q. Did you see any money during that election ?—A. I did.

Q. For what purpose ?—A. I suppose for buying votes.

Q. How much money did you use ?—A. I cannot tell you.

Q. About how much ?—A. I cannot tell.

Q. Over $100 ?—A. I never bought a man personally.

Q. Over $100 ?—A. Yes.

Q. Over $200 ?—A. It might be.

Q. Over $300 ?—A. It might be.

Q. Over $400 ?—A. It might be.

Q. Over $500 ?—A. It might be.

Q. Over $600 ?—A. It might be.

Q. Over $800 ?—A. It might be.

Q. Over $900 ?—A. It might be.

Q. Over $1,000 ?—No answer.

By Judge Osler :

Q. It might be over $900 ?—

Mr. Lount a former member of this House who was prosecuting, asked :

Q. Over $900 you used for buying votes at that election ?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then you are willing to say that you used money for buying votes at that election ?—A. Yes.

Q. Did I understand you to say that you did not pay out any money yourself ?—A. Not to the individual voters.

Q. How did you work it ? Did you select the persons to pay it out ?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you give the persons ?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you decline to name the persons ?—A. I do.

Q. Do you know the persons but decline to name them ?—A. I do.

Q. How many persons were there that you gave money to ?—A. I do not propose even to tell that.

Mr. Lount.—I ask Your Lordship's—

Judge Osler.—I think he may be asked that question.

Mr. Lount.—How many persons were there to whom you gave money ?—A. Half a dozen.

Q. How much to each ?—A. I cannot tell that from memory.

Q. Have you a memorandum ?—A. No.

In answer to further questions witness admitted that Baker showed him a list of money that would be required in Cedardale to the extent of $ Judge Ferguson.—Can you tell us how much more than $900 you paid ?—A. No, I can't.

Q. Can you say not as much as $1,200 ?—A. It could not be more than $1,200.

This question was not in his election at all, but in a provincial election in which he was engaged in support of Mr. Calder, who was going to support Mr. Whitney.

Q. Will you say it was not more than $1,200 ?—A. No, I cannot.

After some further questions, Judge Ferguson asked : Have you any means of saying where Baker got the money that he actually did spend ? Does he own a bank ?—A. No, sir.

Mr. COWAN.

In the course of the argument of Mr. Patterson, counsel for the accused, he claimed that Mr. Smith, this Conservative ex-M.P., this gentleman who was listed for a portfolio in the government of the hon. gentlemen opposite, had given his evidence in a candid manner.

Judge Osler.—I shouldn't call Mr. Smith's manner candid.

Mr. Patterson.—He showed no disposition to fence with the counsel.

Judge Osler.—I should call it brazen ; that is the word.

In giving judgment, Judge Ferguson remarked :

I look upon the evidence of Smith as being a brazen, distinct, strong denial, a denial that I do not believe—

That was on another point. He admitted that he had spent $1,200 corruptly, but he was trying to save another man. Judge Ferguson says that it was a distinct, brazen, strong denial, that he did not believe :

—and I prefer to take the evidence of Baker as against the evidence of these other two. I think Mr. Smith's evidence cannot be too strongly condemned as it bears on the question, it is discredited by his admission that he was guilty of this gigantic corruption.

Judge Ferguson said further :

I have some regrets that this large offender, Mr. Smith, is not before us. I have nothing to say to him but that his evidence is the most glaring piece of corruption I ever heard.

That is not the political corruption of a Grit. It is in South Ontario that hon. gentlemen mentioned the other day.

Mr. LANDERKIN. This gentleman is to be their Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. COWAN. Well, they will have no need of a Minister of Agriculture for many years to come. I do not intend to detain the House much longer, but, before I close, I want to say, that looking at it from the standpoint of a lawyer, no lawyer on the other side of the House, if he is candid about it, will say that the Privileges and Elections Committee is an unprejudiced and unbiassed tribunal. I want to ask if there is any hon. gentleman who would say that he would be satisfied to go before this committee to try out his sacred rights, or to try out the sacred rights of character, or of the franchise. How would he like to go before a jury, when six men composing that jury had stood up and proclaimed in the strongest language that it is possible for the human voice to give vent to, that these men were guilty before they had ever heard a word. What kind of an exhibition have we had in this House ? The hon. senior member for Halifax, the hon. senior member for Pictou, the hon. member for Western Assiniboia, the hon. member for East Simcoe, the hon. member for Westmoreland, and the hon. member for Montmorency, six of them, have stood up in this House, members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and said that Pritchett told the truth. If Pritchett told the truth, then every one of these men charged, is guilty. They say they believe it, and they have advanced their reasons before a word of evidence has been given. Are these hon. gentlemen green enough to suppose that this country will believe that they are unbiassed judges to try the sacred rights of man? Again, as was quoted by the hon. Solicitor General last night, it is not necessary to give our opinions on the impartiality of the Privileges and Elections Committee, because the hon. member for Pictou has expressed it already. I say that the Committee on Privileges and Elections is a biassed tribunal. The hon. senior member for Halifax and the hon. member for Westmoreland were the two counsels against the Liberal party in that committee. What would the hon. senior member for Halifax say to submitting his client to the decision and the judgment of the Privileges and Elections Committee? That is what these hon. gentlemen ask us to do here, without being able to carry out a decision, even if one were arrived at. But, to see the ridiculousness of the situation, all we have to do is to recall the history of the past. The Privileges and Elections Committee has existed in this parliament for some years, and cases have gone before that committee, and with what result? I do not purpose to detain the House in order to recount these cases with any minute particularity of detail, but, I may mention the Queen's County, N.B., case, which has already been alluded to. Hon. gentlemen all know that Mr. Baird was not elected by a majority of the votes of the people. The returning officer who took the deposit of Mr. Baird from his agent, let his name go on the ballot, instructed the deputy returning officers, gave them the ballot boxes, and all the paraphernalia necessary to carry on an election, and when the ballots came to be counted, and it was found that Mr. Baird was some forty votes behind, he turned around and said that his opponent's deposit was put in by his agent, and, therefore—

Mr. MILLS. He resigned, though.

Mr. COWAN. And, therefore, the other man was entitled to the seat. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), has told me that he resigned. True, he did. But, Sir, be it said to his credit, he was more jealous of the rights of the franchise than hon. gentlemen opposite, because, after they had voted that he was entitled to the seat, he became ashamed of it and resigned. This impartial tribunal, these unprejudiced judges of whom I do not know whether the hon. member for Annapolis was one or not—

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Mr. COWAN. You were? The hon. member for Annapolis was one of those who voted to give him the seat, and the gentleman became so ashamed of it afterwards, that he actually resigned, but the hon. member for Annapolis has never expressed his regret.

Mr. MILLS. No.

Mr. COWAN. I will tell him what was said at that time.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan), allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COWAN. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule), want to set me right?

Mr. SPROULE. I want to ask the hon. gentleman if he does not know that Dunn, the returning officer, acted upon the advice of one of the leading Liberal lawyers in the province?

Mr. COWAN. Very well. I am not blaming the returning officer Dunn, but there is the fact that he did it, no matter on whose advice he did it and let the facts speak for themselves. At this very hour, the hon. member (Mr. Sproule) is so ashamed of his party, that he tries to shift the act of a returning officer over on a Liberal lawyer in New Brunswick, who is not a member of this House. If it is necessary for him to rise in his place to apologize for the returning officer, how can he apologize for his Conservative friends who afterwards ratified that conduct with the full knowledge of the facts.

Mr. SPROULE. I am making no apology.

Mr. COWAN. I am glad of that. If there is one man in this House for whom I have a kindly regard, and who I believe wants to get down to what is honest and what is right, with the light he has, it is the member for East Grey. If there is a man in the Conservative party who wants to render justice where justice is due, that man is the member for East Grey. But I must tell him, that I hold that opinion, because he refuses to defend the act just mentioned. The hon. member (Mr. Sproule) is too jealous of his reputation to rise in his place and make any apology for the leader of the opposition. There was a man in that parliament by the name of J. C. Patterson, afterwards a minister in the Conservative government, and at present Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. It was too bitter a pill for Mr. Patterson to swallow and I will read what he said. Mr. Patterson said (Hansard, June 1, 1887, page 691):

I cannot be a party to any vote other than that which will give Mr. King, the gentleman elected on the 22nd of February last, the seat in this House. It is a question of the rights and privileges of the honour and dignity of this House.

In 1883, when a gentleman having the minority of votes in King's, P.E.I., was declared a member of this House I think an injustice was done in that case, and the course I then pursued is the course I have always pursued. I have always had a strong feeling against countenancing returning officers in taking powers such as have been used by the returning officer of King's.

That was not a vote for the purpose of investigating cut-throat affidavits; that was a vote for the purpose of stealing a seat, for the man elected had confessedly a majority and yet every one of the Conservatives, except Mr. J. C. Patterson voted for it—and as the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) says I won't apologize for them. Mr. Patterson proceeded to say Hansard, April 28, 1887, page 177 :

I think the conduct of the returning officer for the county of Queen's, N.E., was the greatest outrage in connection with elections in Canada that has come to public knowledge for thirty years. I think it is a disgraceful thing if a minority candidate, by trick or quibble, by any lawyers playing upon the mind of an ignorant and credulous returning officer, can obtain and hold a seat in this House against the majority of the will of his constituents.

That was the opinion of Mr. Patterson who was elected a Conservative, who was one of the confidential men of the Conservative party for many years, and who was afterwards taken into their cabinet, and afterwards again entrusted by them with the responsible position of Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. That is what this Privileges and Elections Committee did. Now comes King's County, P. E. I. The present member for that constituency (Mr. Macdonald) was returned in the seat by that election committee with a Conservative majority in committee. The facts are that Dr. Robertson, the Liberal candidate for King's, polled 2,002 votes, and that Austin C. Macdonald, polled 1,940. The duty of the returning officer was to return the Liberal candidate elected by sixty-two of a majority, but on the strength of a statement made to him that Dr. Robertson had not resigned his seat in the local legislature, he made a special return. No returning officer has the right to pronounce on the qualifications of a candidate who has been duly elected at the polls. That is a question that should be relegated to the courts. In this case it was relegated to the Privileges and Elections Committee, with a large Conservative majority, and these gentlemen voted to give Mr. Macdonald, Conservative candidate, the seat, although the people of his constituency had voted to leave him at home by sixty-two of a majority, and five years afterwards Mr. J. C. Patterson, whom I have already quoted, stated that it was an outrage against the honour and dignity of the House and that an injustice was done. That is the history of the Privileges and Elections Committee. That is the unbiassed tribunal. A returning officer takes it upon himself upon election night to say this man has not properly resigned his seat in the local legislature—very few lawyers in this House would venture to give an opinion on it, and if they did give an opinion I venture to say that under these facts some of them would disagree. The facts were that Robertson had written out his resignation, had placed it in the hands of two members of the House, or mailed it, and the question was that they did not receive it soon enough or did not hand it to the Speaker, I do not know which. But the Privileges and Elections Committee with a majority of Conservatives decided that Mr. Macdonald was entitled to the seat although the people had voted to leave him at home. There was no renegade criminal affidavit about that, but undisputed facts, and that is what the Privileges and Elections Committee did. Now, I come to the last statement I will make on that score. The hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) was charged by a member of this House with having trafficked in public offices. The facts were shown that that gentleman was liable for over $600 of election debt in a provincial election. There were some jobs along the canal in his constituency and he handed over the patronage to a committee composed of his chief workers, the solid backbone and wheel horses of his party. This solid committee of influential men—I suppose the chief man in his party from each township—proceeded to sell these jobs at from $150 to $200 apiece. The money which they received went into the bank to reduce the indebtedness for which the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) was liable. A man named Gooderich positively swore—and these are admitted facts—that he had paid $200 over to the member for East Northumberland or his son; that the member for East Northumberland had counted the money, that the son had taken it to the bank and deposited it as a reduction of election debts. Gooderich gives this evidence and it was shown that money criminally obtained went to reduce indebtedness for which the hon. member for East Northumberland was liable. The hon. member for East Northumberland never went into the witness box to contradict it; but this unbiassed Committee on Privileges and Elections, on which he had a majority, voted that the hon. member for East Northumberland knew of no wrong-doing, although he had counted the money and his son had carried it to the bank; but they said that the conduct of the committee was most reprehensible. I do not know whether the hon. member for East Northumberland was perfectly clean and pure and unsullied as the driven snow, or not, as far as those charges were concerned. I have cited these cases to show this House the past record of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. When hon. gentlemen opposite had a majority on that committee, they voted to unseat men who were returned by forty and sixty-two majority respectively. When that committee was willing to steal the seats from these men and vote that the candidates of the minority should sit here. I have no confidence in a tribunal so partial.

Now, to state my position in this matter, I say that I am satisfied that I voice the sentiments of every man on this side of the House when I say, that from the Prime Minister down to the humblest member will ever condone political corruption. In support of that I say that hon. gentlemen opposite are unable, and never have been able to tax one representative of the Liberal party in this House with corruption and make it stick. I defy them to show that the Liberal party has had any Billy Smith who was going to be the next Minister of Agriculture. They will search the history of the Liberal party and the history of Canada in vain to find anything against the Liberal party down to 1896, except the one solitary instance mentioned, that of Mr. Laflamme, who needs no certificate of character from me as he got it from the hon. member for Montmorency, and from the courts of this country, which mulcted the Mail newspaper in $10,000 damages for its insinuations against him. I say I voice the sentiments of every true Liberal in this House, whether he sits on this side or in the colony on the other side, when I say that every man among them is prepared to frown down political impurity, political immorality on the first tint or taint or corruption. I believe the whole Liberal party will endorse the sentiment I express when I say that if we had had those affidavits in our pockets, we would have followed the example of the Ontario government, and would have investigated the charges, and punished the guilty parties. We would not have sat down on the charges until the statute of limitations had counted us out, and then got up in this House with gusto and said, let us investigate. There would have been no conniving Alexander Smith, against whom no stigma attaches in connection with any of the elections which he has gone through, except on the statement of this man Pritchett, of whom nine persons in one constituency and three in another say he is a liar, and who admits that he is a perjurer himself. If Smith had had that document, there would have been no occasion for this discussion. No Liberal organizer would have compromised corrupt acts or villainies by putting the affidavit in a desk and leaving it there until the statute of limitation counted us out; but punishment would have followed. There would have been no letting slip four golden opportunities for punishing corruption, and then seizing on one for the purpose of making political capital. Whether or not Pritchett was a Liberal I care not. If a man commits a crime, no hon. gentleman should attempt to hold the whole party to which that man belongs responsible for it, unless he is willing to assume for his own party responsibility for all the political corruption which has taken place in the party which he supports. I say from the organizer up to the Prime Minister, will the Liberal party of Canada ever feel the blush of shame upon its cheek. The Prime Minister will never have to go on a political platform to defend and ask votes for a man who is a political criminal. The Prime Minister will never have to go into a constituency and raise his voice and call upon the Liberal party to rally round the standard of a J. C. Rykert or any man of the Rykert ilk, a man, who, driven from this House, practically resigned when he was going to be attacked; and as to whom correspondence was published showing that he had mulcted people out of thousands of dollars on a timber limit which he had got from his political friends for $5 a mile. I say to the Liberals in this House and to the Liberals in this country, and I say to the hon. leader of the opposition, thank heaven the Liberal party can stand up without any blush of shame on its cheek on account of its leader. If shame is drawn to the Liberal party, it is because of the hangers-on like Pritchett, who are found in its lowest depth, and not because of its standard-bearer and leader. When the hon. member for York again asks the young Conservatives to read the history of Canada and the history of the Conservative party, I hope he will ask them to read it in the light of some of the facts I have stated tonight, placed side by side with Pritchett's affidavit, so that the people of this country may see just what the relative positions of the two political parties are. If it lay in the power of this House I would say prosecute Pritchett, if you can, and get the evidence to prove the case against him. If you cannot, then I say do not put the case before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, a tribunal of which six of the judges have risen in their places in this House and prejudged it, and a seventh, the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), has done it before by act in the Baird case. Do not refer to these people for the purpose of trying the sacred rights of the humblest individual in Canada, but go before an impartial tribunal—not a tribunal of which the judges have risen in their places and have expressed the opinion that that affidavit bears truth on its face because of its particularity of detail. If any Liberal were to rise in this House for the purpose of scoring a point against the opposition by any argument of that description, I would never follow the Liberal party as far as hon. gentlemen opposite are evidently prepared to follow the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), in the motion he has placed before the House.

Mr. T. D. CRAIG (East Durham). The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) referred to me, Mr. Speaker, as the virtuous member for East Durham, and also charged members on this side, who are supporting the amendment before the House, with posing as purists. I make no claim to be more pure or virtuous than hon. members on either side, but I do claim to stand just where the right hon. the First Minister stood last year on this question. At that time, when the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) made his motion to refer this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the right hon. gentleman rose in his place and said without hesitation that he would accept this motion. He said he was quite ready to do that, even although, in the case of the Brockville Election the evidence was exceedingly weak. I wish to say further, that the right hon. gentleman received a great deal of praise all over the country and especially from the Liberal organs for the course he took on that occasion.

My attention has been called to what the Globe said about him at that time, and I shall quote a few words from that article. The Globe of July 7, 1899, said :

The Premier, without hesitation, stated that a prima facie case had been presented in the West Huron case, and although the case was very weak in the Brockville matter, he readily consented that this also should be investigated, affirming the determination of the government to guard and preserve the sanctity of the ballots and the rights of the people.

All the members of this House, on both sides, applauded the right hon. gentleman on that occasion, but since then a remarkable change has taken place in his conduct. He was then quite ready to have this matter referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but to-day we find him taking the very opposite position and for what reason I cannot understand.

There is another article in the Globe of July 8, 1899, headed 'Investigations,' in which that organ spoke about the action of the government in refusing an investigation into the Yukon matter, and justified their action because the charges had not been proved, and the Globe went on to say :

An admirable illustrative example of the situation is afforded by the proceedings of the House on Thursday. Charges were made with reference to the conduct of the recent by-elections in West Huron and Brockville. In this case, of course, it is not the administration of the public service which is impugned, but the constitution of the parliament, which is the ultimate governing authority of the country.

A good deal might be said on the subject of procedure.

I would call special attention to this because we have heard a great deal in this debate on that very same point.

A good deal might be said on the subject of procedure; the method of investigating such charges, which for years has been chiefly favoured is that of sending them before the courts. But the very life of the House of Commons is at stake in the conserving of the purity of its mandate from the electors, and it is not well that there should be hesitation or yielding to red tape in the probing of charges of corruption in elections.

Mr. CRAIG.

Those words express the opinion of members on this side exactly, and they express, I am sure, the opinion held by the First Minister last session, but which apparently he does not hold to-day.

Mr. Borden made definite charges, and within five minutes from the time he had taken his seat, he and all the House of Commons knew that the investigation for which he had asked was granted. More than that, it was granted in the precise form in which he had asked.

Later on in the same article, the Globe says :

Definite charges against the conduct of by-elections will be investigated by the House, whose independence is threatened by the prevalence of such practices as are alleged to have existed.

I have read this article to the House because I fully endorse it. I do not always agree with the Globe, but what is said in that article I agree with most emphatically, and so, I think, do most of the members of this House, although I am under the impression that they will not give evidence of their belief by their conduct on this occasion.

I ask why this change. The right hon. the First Minister has not told us, but I hope he will before this debate is ended. Last year he was ready to accept at once the motion of the hon. member for Halifax, but this year he refuses to take the same course that he thought proper to take then.

Some reasons were given by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the junior member for Halifax and other supporters of the government, why the reference asked for should not be made, but in my opinion the reasons given—and I am speaking without reference to party at all, because I think an investigation of this kind should not be made a party question—were not at all satisfactory. I have carefully listened to most of the arguments made by hon. gentlemen opposite but have failed to find any satisfactory reason for their present change of front. One reason given was that nothing was proved last year. But in reply to that argument, I could quote from the Globe, but will merely give a paraphrase of the article, as it would take up too much time to give it in full. On August 4, The Globe said that although all the evidence had not been taken, it had been shown that some frauds had been committed in the election and there were great doubts thrown on the seat. I do not know how hon. members, in the face of such a statement, made after the evidence had been published, can take the ground that nothing was proved and on that ground refuse to refer this matter again to the committee.

The other argument used is that this matter should be left to the courts, but the article I have cited from the Globe deals conclusively with that contention. It shows that the correct procedure in so vital a matter as this, in which the independence of parliament is at stake, is to refer it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Another argument used is that the Committee on Privileges and Elections is essentially political and biased, but if any one should resort to any such plea it certainly ought to be hon. gentlemen on this side, because hon. gentlemen opposite are in a majority on that committee. In my opinion hon. members are not in that committee to make this a party investigation, but to inquire and find out the truth and determine really how the elections were conducted. Charges were made that certain frauds existed, that certain irregularities had been practised by deputy returning officers; and it was asked that these be investigated by this committee, so that the facts might be known to the House and to the country and steps might be taken to prevent such things occurring again. I think that is a sufficient answer to the charge that the committee is prejudiced. But, I am not so filled with party spirit that I would be prepared to say that the Committee on Privileges and Elections would not seek to do what is right. I do not deny that members, at times, are influenced by political feeling; but, I do not think so little of any hon. member of this House as think that he would be anxious to prevent the truth being known. But there is one argument against all this that is conclusive, and that is, that if there was anything in this plea, it should have been raised last year. Every hon. member on the other side, including the Premier, agreed to refer this to the committee last year. If the committee is prejudiced this year, it was prejudiced last year, but not a word was said of that then. I am not a lawyer; I look at this question, as I believe the ordinary, common-sense elector will look at it, whether Conservative or Liberal. The question will arise with him why this should not be sent to the committee as it was last year, and he can see no reason for it. But some of those who have spoken have taken a different ground. They blame the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) for delay and want to know why he brings this matter on at the last stage of the proceedings. The answer to that is, that the government themselves should have moved to have this investigation resumed. Why did not they, as soon as the House met, bring forward that proposition? It was the business of the government, and particularly of the Premier, and not of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden). Why? Because their honour is concerned. The names of cabinet ministers have been mentioned in connection with this matter. It has been hinted that they were in the riding and more or less associated with these men who are spoken of as 'the machine.' I have not used the names of these cabinet ministers, but, I say that their names having been used, they are more interested in having this investigation go on than any others. On their own behalf, and on behalf of the Liberal party, and on behalf of this parliament of Canada, they should have demanded a full investigation of the matter. The reasons that have been given for failure to go on with this investigation do not satisfy me. I think I may safely go further and say, they do not satisfy the country. There is no doubt that the country is aroused on this question. I believe the reason why the Prime Minister agreed so readily to refer these matters to the Committee on Privileges and Elections last year was that he knew there was a great feeling in the country against corruption in elections on account of the West Elgin case. He felt that public opinion was behind him, urging him to consent to this investigation. And why he has changed his views, I cannot tell. But, I know that the country will not be satisfied with any reason given by hon. gentlemen opposite for not taking that course this year. There are, I am glad to say, two parties in this country. But, there are many men who may be called independent voters, and they are the men who turn out governments and put in others. And I believe that the independent voters demand that the sanctity of the ballot shall be protected. Some persons are bound to their party no matter what happens; but, there are many who are more independent, who read the papers for themselves and judge for themselves. And these men are the salvation of any country. Such men will not be satisfied with the reasons that have been given. They agree with what the Prime Minister said last year and what the Globe said last year. In refusing to refer this matter to the committee, the right hon. gentleman is not expressing their sentiments, and, if I know them they will show that when they are appealed to at the polls.

In seeking for the real reason why this investigation is refused, I can only come to the conclusion that it is because too much was brought out in the committee last year. If it has been shown that everything had gone right, they would have said: Let us go on with the investigation. But too much was proven—unfortunately for every one of us. I am not one of those who will exult and applaud when corruption is proved against hon. gentlemen opposite. I regret and deplore such a state of things. There are men all over this country who deplore this political corruption. They do not look at politics as many politicians are apt to do, as a mere game between the two parties.

Let us see what the government are resisting. Many long speeches have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and words have been spoken which have merely beclouded this question. I do not say that that is the purpose, but that has been the effect. But, the plain fact is that what the government are opposing at this moment is the reference of these questions of the Brockville and West Huron elections to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It is said that this is a vote of want of confidence. But that is no excuse for voting against it. The government could accept it, and if they did, it would not be a vote of want of confidence. I believe that hon. members would vote for this amendment if they were unprejudiced. I believe more, I believe many members on that side of the House will be glad to vote for this amendment and have that referred again to this committee, because they feel they are placed in an awkward position in resisting the investigation and opposing the amendment of the member for Halifax.

Mr. Speaker, I hold that in this matter, the Liberal party is on trial; they may not think so, but they are on trial before the country. In what position are they placing themselves to-day? Are they going to stand by these men of the machine? That is the question that occurs to all of us. Are they going to stand in front of them? If so, I say that the independent Liberal voters of this country will not stand by them, and in saying that, I pay a compliment to these Liberal voters. There are independent Liberal voters as well as independent Conservative voters. At the last election, the Liberal party was returned to power in a great measure by independent Conservative voters, who would not stand by their party. I know men who voted that way, for certain reasons, because they were independent, and there are likewise independent Liberal voters in this country. I am speaking now in their praise, when I say that such men will not support the government and the members of this House, who vote to quash this investigation.

One great argument that has been used in this debate, has been that the Conservatives are just as bad. A more puerile argument I never listened to. We are not discussing the political methods of the Conservatives, we are discussing this amendment. It is a straight amendment, asking to refer the irregularities in the West Huron and Brockville elections, to the Committee of this House on Privileges and Elections. I am not going to say whether the Conservatives are bad or not, because that is not the question under discussion. I am not saying that the Liberal party are bad; that is not the point. But I say that if anything is true which has been charged against the Conservative party, that is a strong argument for referring these two elections to this committee. I have not studied the evidence particularly, and I am not going to argue about the Conservatives being just as bad, because that is not the question before the House.

Now, what are the people of the country?
Mr. CRAIG.

going to think of this? To my mind they see the Conservative party in this House trying to expose these irregularities. I think no one will deny that. If there are irregularities, we want to expose them, and by so doing prevent them from occurring again. Some ask: What good does it do? I say it does a great deal of good to let the light in on these matters. If anything is going to prevent these things being done again, it is just what has been brought out in these investigations. The people of this country see to-day the Conservative party in this House trying to expose these irregularities, and I am sorry to say they see the Liberal party in this House, trying to hide them. Now, I want to trouble the House to listen for a few minutes to an article in the Ottawa Evening Journal of this day. The Journal is an independent organ, but it generally supports the present government. I do not think it would write as it does, unless it felt compelled to do so in the interests of the country, and, I may say also, perhaps, in the interests of the Liberal party. I will read the article:

Political Rottenness.

Members of the Liberal party who are honourable men need apparently to stop to ask themselves where their party stands in the matter of honesty and cleanliness. Evidences of political fraud in connection with many of their leaders and electoral organizations are becoming more numerous than should be pardoned in any party. Much as people may hope for tariff reform, or admire Imperial tariff preference, or dislike the old tendencies of the Conservative party, or feel dubious about its present leadership, these things one and all may well be argued to be secondary issues compared with the public desirability of condemning and punishing widespread party rottenness, if such be apparent.

In Ontario the courts have recently been compelled to lead with frauds perpetrated with the aid or connivance of the salaried official agents of the Liberal party. Ontario judges have stated from the bench that it had proved useless to report frauds to the Liberal government, because the government ignored the reports. In Prince Edward Island the Liberals have been holding to precarious power, first by corrupting a Conservative legislator whose vote would have decided the issue against them; latterly by breaking pledged faith and defying constitutional practice in order to prevent the honesty of a member of their own party from resulting in their defeat. In Manitoba, investigation of the provincial finances proves that the late Liberal government was a government dominated by either unscrupulous liars or credulous fools, who proclaimed honesty and solvency while making secret dishonourable engagements and swamping the province with deficits. And now in the Dominion parliament, presented with strong evidences of electoral rascality which the party stood fairly pledged to investigate, there appears to be an intention on the part of the Liberal government to disregard the pledge and prevent any parliamentary inquiry.

If this latter prove to be the case, if the West Huron and Brockville electoral inquiries are refused by the government, after the delays which peculiarly enough have taken place in getting the subject formally before the House of Commons, the inference will be legitimate that nothing which is alleged in these matters is much worse than the truth; that the Liberal party fears to face the truth, and that the Liberal leaders and party here may reasonably be judged by the performances of late of the party leaders and machines in Manitoba, Ontario and Prince Edward Island.

In a number of moral respects, the Conservative party made a pretty bad showing prior to the party's defeat in 1896. But we are inclined to doubt if at any time in the history of the Conservative party there was quite such a consensus of testimony derogatory to the character of the party as there is at present against the good name of the Liberals—who pledged such improvement!

Now, Mr. Speaker. I think I have done a service to the government, by reading that article. I have said that I thought the independent people of this country would condemn them for not referring this matter to a committee, and I think that is borne out fully, by this article in an independent journal. Now, all the speakers on the government side have said they are anxious for purity. Well, I have no reason to doubt it. I think that if they were left to themselves, they would vote to refer these matters to a committee; but they feel bound to stand by their party and by the decision of the government. I think the government are making a great mistake in leading their followers into this hole at the present time. If the government are sincere in their professions, and I have no reason to doubt that they are, they will shake off these men of the machine. I will not say anything about these men of the machine, except this, that they are a disgrace to any party. When we find them associated with the Liberal party and working for the Liberal party, I would be glad to see the Liberal party shake them off; and I hope that when the next elections come round, we will not find any of these men who have been employed by members of the Liberal party in the past, getting any employment at all. So far as I am concerned myself, I hope the Conservative party will take good care that none of this class of men get among them. Speaking for myself, I may say, that I have ran three elections in East Durham, and I never had any outside men to help me. If outside men did come in I would tell them: I do not want you at all, we can run our elections without any outside organizers. So I say that if the government are sincere, they will shake off these men, and let the country see it. I go further, and I say that if they are sincere in their professions of purity, I believe that even at this moment they will consent to this amendment and assist in this investigation. After all this investigation would not hurt them; all we want to do is to get at the truth. The people of the country want the truth brought out, and the right hon. leader of the government received great credit last year for saying that he wanted the truth brought out. The position he is placed in to-day is that he does not want the truth brought out. He says: We are not going to grant this investigation, we are going to vote down the amendment which we supported last year, although we said that the case then was not very strong. If the Liberal government will not do what is their duty now, I am satisfied that the country will have very little faith in their professions.

Mr. GEORGE E. FOSTER (York, N.B.)
Mr. Speaker, I regret that the speech of about four hours that was delivered at what we thought was the closing period of this debate has made it necessary for me to ask the attention of the House at two o'clock in the morning. I had understood that an arrangement was made that we should come to a vote at something like a reasonable hour, and that it should not be prevented by long speeches, but that arrangement, though made, does not appear to have resulted in its being carried out. However, I have a few things to say and I propose to say them even though I have to do it at this unseasonable hour. Just one word, and one word only in reference to the speech delivered at such length and to which the House has just listened. I do not suppose that there could be packed into the latter two hours of a speech more irrelevant matter and more unsustained assertions than we had given to us in that speech. I am not going to follow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan) in this, but I may mention two of them as samples of the whole. He based an argument on the assertion that the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) spoke for Mr. McGreevy in the constituency in which Mr. McGreevy ran in 1896. There is not a word of truth in it. The hon. leader of the opposition did not speak in Mr. McGreevy's constituency nor did he speak in favour of Mr. McGreevy. I am simply combatting a statement of fact, or what purported to be a statement of fact. A statement was also made in reference to a document that was said—absolutely said—to have been issued by the Liberal-Conservative party as instructions to returning officers. It was read by the hon. gentleman, and upon it an argument was based. Now, Sir, did it not appear peculiar to the members of this House that such a document as that should have been issued and should have been used in 1896, and that it never reached the light of day until March, 1900, because in March, 1900, it appears first in an eastern paper, the Almonte Gazette, in the same words as were read here by the hon. gentleman who used it. Immediately after it appeared the hon. leader of the opposition wrote to Winnipeg where it was to have been used, and the following is the answer that he received:

Winnipeg, March 31, 1900.

My dear Father,—I return herewith editorial published in the Almonte 'Gazette' referring to instructions alleged to have been given to the Conservative workers in Manitoba. I never heard of anything of the kind, and I saw Mr. Haggart,

Mr. Andrews, Hon. Colin Campbell and Mr. Bonner, all lawyers here who acted in the cases brought against the Conservatives charged with manipulation of the ballots in 1896, and they all informed me they never saw any such letter. If the Grits had had anything of the kind, they could have secured convictions by producing them. Hogue defended most of our men, but he is in Vancouver. However, I am satisfied the thing is a forgery, and never saw the light of day in this province. I had an article written by the editor of the 'Morning Telegram' and sent you a copy of the paper yesterday.

Your loving son,
(Sgd.) WILLIAM J. TUPPER.

In the Winnipeg Telegram of the 30th of March, there appears an editorial in which it is publicly branded as a forgery. I am not going to ask the House to listen to the reading of it, but it is taken up by the public prints, it is publicly branded as a forgery and there is not a paper in Manitoba, not even the Free Press of Winnipeg, that comes to the rescue of this bantling of 1900, which is now said to have been a vigorous child in 1896.

Mr. COWAN. Freeborn produced that in court.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a fact that the hon. gentleman tried to draw away the attention of the House and more particularly the attention of the country from the main and only question which is being discussed in this House to-day, and which has been discussed in this House for the last two or three sittings. I have one answer simply to make, and I make it to the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). You have had a list of these irresponsible statements without the hon. gentleman who made them vouching for their truth, without his giving the names of the persons who made the affidavits—

Mr. COWAN. Oh, yes, I gave them.

Mr. FOSTER. And furnished him with the information—we have had these statements—

Mr. COWAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to say.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. We have had these statements made by this hon. gentleman absolutely unsupported, and the hon. gentleman has not said that he would vouch for their truth himself—

Mr. COWAN. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. FOSTER. I have but one single answer to make.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I must have order.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. COWAN. I extended no such discourtesy to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. I make my answer—

Mr. COWAN. If the hon. gentleman does not want me to correct him well and good.

Mr. FOSTER. I make my answer to the responsible head of the government in this House. Let the right hon. gentleman provide a judicial commission, let him appoint it at once, let him make that a commission of judges of well known standing and reputation in this country, let him ask a vote at the hands of this parliament for the prosecution to the very furthest extent and to the very lowest depth of an investigation into all these matters which have been discussed whether they affect the seats of West Huron, or Brockville, or any of the seats which have been mentioned in this House, and the opposition, to a man, will support the action. The opposition will provide a counsel who will give his work and his effort in conjunction with counsel to be appointed by my right hon. friend opposite in sifting this out to the very bottom and in punishing, afterwards, by every process of law, every man who has done crooked work and who has been convicted of crooked work. I do not care whether it goes back to 1876, or how far it goes back. We are not here, on this side of the House, to burk inquiry into a cancer which is eating out the honest heart of the electorate of this country because it is alleged that Conservatives have done crooked work. We are here to plead with the government; a Liberal government, and we have been pleading with that government for three or four or five days, that they will have sufficient care for the honour and good name of the members who sit in the House, and of parliamentary government in this country, to provide a tribunal which will make this fair and impartial investigation into these charges which have been made and partially substantiated, in order that the guilty may be punished and the good name of this country may be placed where it ought to be. But, let that commission be appointed at once, and let it do its work at once, and let the people of this country, in the general elections that are to come, judge as to parties if they wish to, and judge as to individuals, as they can if these facts are investigated.

Mr. BRITTON. That is not what the motion is.

Mr. FOSTER. It is true it is not what the motion is, but the motion goes as far as the Prime Minister's express statement of last year, and the motion was made with the idea that it would have the unanimous support of all parties in this House. Sir, this action of the government, of a Liberal government—is it the action of a Liberal government? It gives occasion for pause and for thought in this country. A Liberal government actually and absolutely imposing the whole front of its support in this House of Commons between ballot stuffers and an investigation. A Liberal government doing that? It is instructive in this the opening of the twentieth century, and it makes one pause and think. This action of the government is unexpected. Why? Because of the past history of all governments, and especially because of the past professions of Liberal governments and of Liberal leaders in this country. Shall we have to call to the mind of this House once more the professions that were made by the Liberal leader, and consequently by the Liberal party not later than last year. Before the elections of 1896, what was the position put forward by the Liberal party more than any other. It was that they were the party which stood for the purity of the ballot and the straight deposit of the electors' will in the ballot box. It was that they were the party par excellence which stood for purity in politics; that they were the men that championed the right of individual electors—made the franchise broad at first, and made it secure afterwards. So that the broadened franchise could find its way into legislation without intimidation and without fraud. That was the claim of the Liberal party; that was the claim of the right hon. gentleman who leads it. That was his boast twelve months ago, and when my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) moved his motion this year it was with no other idea than that that motion would be accepted by the same Liberal leader and the same Liberal party as twelve months ago. The change of front was unexpected. Here is what the Prime Minister said in the House last year:

But such is the sanctity of the ballot, such is the sanctity of the right of the people which they must exercise, whenever they are called upon at the polls, that this case must go to inquiry at once. If wrong has been done in these elections nobody ought to be shielded. If any one has contravened the law, it is fair and right that this should be investigated, and that we should know now, henceforth and for ever, that the will of the people must be expressed as the people wish to express it, however severe the consequences may be on one side or the other.

These are noble words. These are the words of a Liberal statesman. These are in the line of Liberal precedents, and especially of Liberal professions. My hon. friend (Mr. Borden) had no reason to suppose, that a change of front diametrically opposite to this would meet his motion this year. And the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), I could see them last year applauding this statement of their leader, and saying to themselves: There speaks a Liberal leader, that is the doctrine; let us have electoral purity and let us at once have an investigation to secure it. It is unexpected to say the least that we should not meet with the same reception on the part of the Liberal party this year. Last year alongside the leader of the government sat the man (Sir Richard Cartwright) whom he eulogized not more than a week ago at a banquet given to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, by his parliamentary friends in this House. Directly after the Prime Minister had spoken that hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) rose and said:

I fully subscribe to the doctrine that, even if you do not choose to go to the courts, this House has not divested itself, and should not divest itself, of control over its own officers. Sir, the government invite investigation. . . . Let hon. gentlemen opposite, make themselves responsible for the charges, let them state their evidence and what they can prove, and they shall have their committee, they shall have their inquiry, they shall have their investigation, with full powers to bring forward their witnesses and their evidence—and we shall see what they will make of it.

Where is the Minister of Trade and Commerce to-night? Has he too gone back on the professions of a short year ago, and above all things on professions which are intimately connected with the purity of the electorate and of the security of the ballot. Yet, Sir, if he were here to-night, he would vote with my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) against an examination going on, against a principle he professed to be devoted to last year. If there was a prima facie case last year, is not the case infinitely stronger to-day. Was there much more than a statement of a suspicion of wrong last year and this year have we not irregularities proved in the committee of last session, and still more in the courts of the province of Ontario, where case after case before the judges showed dark doings parallel in method, in manner, in spirit, and in result with the cases of West Huron and Brockville, which we seek to have investigated. On what ground does the Prime Minister change his base? Last year a mere prima facie case was sent to the committee. Was that case completed last year? My right hon. friend knows it was not. Why does he interpose into a case which he declares should be investigated and when it is little more than half through prevent any further investigation?

That is what the hon. gentleman has done—burked it with all the power he possesses as the leader of his party, burked it against the wishes of men who sit behind him, tried and true Liberals; burked it in the most petty of ways; burked it until three months and more of the session had passed; and then it came on because he could not prevent it any longer, or we would not have it even yet. These are the reasons we did not expect what has taken place. This action was unexpected not only in the House, but in the country. The country listened to my hon. friend when he made his election speeches, the country listened to the professions of him and his Liberal party for fifteen or eighteen years; and the country listened and applauded him when last year he said: Bring on your charges, bring on your witnesses; there is the committee, and it is open for you to try your case. The country at large felt, when the hon. gentleman took the position he did this year, that it was an unexpected action on the part of the government, and the country through and through was surprised once more at the astonishing rapidity with which the right hon. gentleman is able to go back on the courses of policy he defines at one time, in a very short time thereafter. I venture to say that the action of the government was unexpected by another class. I believe in my heart that it was entirely unexpected by the organized gang of ballot-stuffers and ballot-switchers whom we seek to ferret out and punish. I believe that that gang looked upon this action of the government as an unexpected action; for they never believed, I think, that such good fortune awaited them as to have the right hon. leader of the Liberal party in this country drag his whole party after him to prevent them being punished.

Well, Sir, this question derives a greater importance from certain things that have happened since last year. What are these things? The question we are debating here to-night is not an isolated one. It is one of many questions; it is one of many phases of the same question seen everywhere? Seen in the province of New Brunswick at the last general local election, when Dominion influence, under the leadership of the Minister of Railways and Canals, backed by unlimited cash given by supporters of this government and by people who had benefited at the hands of this government, swamped the vote in that province and elected men who but for that influence would have had no chance of taking up the reins of government again in that province. It was seen also in the province of Manitoba, the recent history of which is well known to the members of this House, and therefore need not be given in any detail by me to-night. But it may be summed up in one word, that the Liberal government in the province of Manitoba went so far away from Liberal principles and proved itself so recreant to Liberal pledges and Liberal policy, that it drove away from itself the best, if not the larger part of the true Liberals of Manitoba, and brought upon itself the overwhelming defeat which it suffered at the hands of Hugh John Macdonald. More than that, Sir; there is an instructive phase of this question in the province of Prince Edward Island at this very moment, an object lesson, not only to that island, but to the whole country. What is it, Sir? The Liberal party and a Liberal government, supported and backed by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in this House, reduced to what straits? I shall not tell all of them, but I shall come to the latest phase. Reduced to these straits, that one gentleman elected to support them finds that their doings are not according to his liking, refuses longer to support them and offers to resign his seat and challenge a contest in the riding for which he was elected to prove who is right in the opinion of the electorate; and he is promised that if he will resign, his constituency will be opened. He resigns on that promise, the constituency is not opened, and when he goes to the session of the legislature, he is refused his vote, is imprisoned and is turned out of the House. They have, therefore, one less. What more, Sir? A contest takes place in another constituency after party nominations. The Conservative party nominates its man, he runs in the Conservative interest, he is supported by Conservative influence, and he is opposed by the whole power and influence of the Liberal party in that province. He beats his opponent, and is elected as a representative of the Conservatives. What happens, Sir? They have got rid of one friend by lying to him. They get rid of this enemy by buying him over; and to-day Liberalism in the province of Prince Edward Island is reduced down to a majority of one; and repudiation of promise and sale and purchase are the only weapons on which they rely for power. What more, Sir? Shall I say anything with reference to the province of Ontario? Is that not read and known of all men? What have the courts been doing in the province of Ontario. What has the Liberal government in that province been doing? The Liberal government has been doing little until at last public opinion, which rose stronger and stronger, forced one man out of the government, and forced the leader of the next government to try to propitiate it by doing what? By appointing a commission to examine into and report upon the cases of corruption in several constituencies. That commission did not carry out what the friends of electoral purity in the province of Ontario wished to be carried out. It is a partisan commission, before which no counsel for the prosecution is allowed except the Liberal counsel appointed by the government itself. No one is allowed to cross-examine, and the whole examination has proved to be inadequate—I think it is not too strong language to say—has proved to have been something of a farce. But, Sir, reputable judges did get hold of some of these constituencies in the law courts, and what has been proved? A system of organized ballot-stuffing, organized ballot-switching, organized personations, organized lying, and putting men at the polls to act as officers who were unknown to the localities. It is not a question of the mere fraud of a man here and a man there, acting through real love of deviltry. No, everybody knows that that work is done by an organization, at the head of which is the trusted servant of the Liberal party, the organizer for the time being in the province of Ontario, and by his trusted helpers, all the way down to Cap Sullivan, and Mr. Bole, and Mr. Linklater, and Mr. Pritchett, and all the other confraternity.

Mr. McMULLEN. There are two Tories to one Conservative.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a little plea of my hon. friend, which proves him a very small man indeed. So my hon. friend soothes his sensitive conscience by simply saying that the Conservatives are bad as well and crooked as well. Does that satisfy my hon. friend?

Mr. McMULLEN. No.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not. Then why does my hon. friend use it? In times of yore, he would not have admitted an argument of that kind. Once he stood like a tall pine for purity, once he hewed right straight to the line, no matter where the chips might fall, standing straight for purity and economy and all the other virtues. But today what does he do? He salves his bruised reputation and quiets his uneasy conscience by simply getting up on his feet and saying: Yes, it was crooked, but then there was a crooked Conservative around, too, or may be there were two crooked Conservatives. That is far too thin. It will not suit the people of this country, though it may satisfy my hon. friend, nor will it suit his constituency. Of that I am quite certain. In the province of Ontario, during this last year, iniquities have been proven and punished by the judges on the very line of these which are outlined in the charges made here concerning these two constituencies, and into the truth of which we wish to have a committee of inquiry appointed. But what are you to expect? Are you to be severe upon what may be called this under strata? I think we have to look to the upper strata to get a reason for it. If at the head of the government and in its leaders, if at the head of the party and in its leaders, you have political perfidy, and repudiation—absolute and brazen repudiation—of the most solemn pledge and promises, what are we to expect from the lower strata. Are the criminals all in the one stratum? Oh, no; and if you have the spoils system, if you have contracts given without tender, if you have go-betweens, as thick as blackberries in a corn field, without whom no great enterprise can be undertaken and carried out, who swarm up to the ministers at Ottawa and who can influence, and if necessary interest ministers and put through all that they are required to put through, what are we to expect? Their names are known to hon. gentlemen on the front benches, and it has become a by-word and a proverb all over this country, this system of go-betweens, between the ministers and those who are promoting great corporations. You have a Minister of Militia and Defence—that department which is one of the most important and which, above all others, should be kept free from the taint of political partyism—who so far defied public opinion as to declare in this House that in militia contracts and appointments, other things being equal, he will favour his own friends, and so introduce the spoils system, in its absolute entirety, into the militia system and management of this country. Is that all going to be on one side and with one class? Political deception, political repudiation, the baldest and boldest going back on the most definite pledges that could be given—are all these to take place among the leaders of the party, and shall there be no carnival break out amongst the under strata? That down below, which all of us abhor and condemn, is due very largely to the lack of propriety, lack of consistency, lack of truth, lack of political honesty, which characterises the men upon the front benches and the leaders of the Liberal party in their administration and carrying out of the government of this country.

There has to be an answer. This question never came up in this way in this House before. We are solving a question and making an answer in this parliament we have never been called on to make before. Up from the provinces, up from all these contested elections, from all this wholesome discipline of the courts, from all these fines and imprisonments, up from all these comes the call to destroy and blot out and prohibit as far as we possibly can this kind of machine and corruption work, has come a case into this highest parliament of Canada. What is that case? Similar in charges, similar in methods, similar in results, and the high court of parliament is asked what its answer shall be? The government has signified what the answer will be. The government say: We wash our hands free of it. You have the process of law, the courts to go to; and if you cannot satisfy yourselves there we are not going to facilitate the operation of satisfying you. That is the answer of the government. Let that be their answer, but what answer will this House give? The answer will ring out to this country as championing the undoubted rights of the electorate, will give heart to those who believe in a pure ballot, or else it will rejoice instead of discouraging the heart of every boodler and machine dealer in this country from one end to the other. An answer must be given; and this answer will either disappoint the two classes I mention first, or rejoice the class I mentioned last. It will either rejoice the hearts of the electors all carry dismay and discouragement into the ranks of those organizers of political corruption, or it will have an effect exactly the reverse. If the action of the government has been unexpected, how shall we characterize the defence of their supporters? Petty, trivial, technical and unworthy of any great government or of any party. That I shall prove. What did the hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) say. He is possibly the custodian of the honour of this House next to the Prime Minister, at least the legal custodian of its honour. He said to my hon. friend: You should have moved sooner last year.

Suppose that my hon. friend had moved sooner last year, and suppose that, even then, the investigation had not been finished, should we have been any further ahead this year, the government having taken the decision that investigation shall cease? My hon. friend began as soon as he conveniently could last year, and he made such progress as was permitted to him. But it does not seem to me that it lies in the mouth of the Solicitor General to taunt my hon. friend with not getting through the investigation last year. And why? Because, as I say, the Solicitor General is the man who ought to be the custodian of the legal honour of this House, and it was his duty to have been at that committee last year, to have guided and facilitated its work. Instead of that, where was he? Paid $5,000 a year to look after that work here, he was attending to private business in the old country. Never once, if I am rightly informed, was he known to be in that committee. But the Solicitor General says: Last year you summoned and examined 99 witnesses, and you did not finish your case or prove it; therefore, you ought not to go any further. That is an odd argument. I wonder if the hon. gentleman conducts his criminal cases on that principle. I wonder if he, as Solicitor General, after he had examined fifty witnesses, and was then prevented from going on, even though he had more evidence to offer, would say: I have summoned and examined fifty witnesses and haven't proved my case, therefore I will go no further.

Now, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), and the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) brought forward one argument, and I am glad to say they are the only two members of this House, so far as I can remember, who have descended to such reasoning as they then used. They said that my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) had been trying to baulk and burke his own motion. Two grown men, two men learned in the law, two experienced public men, take up between them an hour of the time of this House to attempt to prove to the House and the country that the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) had done everything in his power to baulk and burke his own motion. I think I have only to mention that argument to show the absurdity of it. The history of that case this year and last year is spread on the annals of the House. The man who burked that case this year is the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who leads the government—he and no one else. As the guardian of the honour of the House, I should think it would have been his duty at the first available hour of the session to come down of his own accord, and move to send these cases for completion to the committee, which, with its own good will and consent, began the examination last year. He did not do that, but sat there day after day, week after week and month after month, using the technical rules of the House and all his ingenuity to keep my hon. friend from getting his motion even considered by this House. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries said also: You should not have joined the two cases together. Which two cases? Brockville and West Huron. What did he mean by that? Would he have allowed either of them? Would the right hon. gentleman who leads the government have allowed either of them? The argument could not have had any meaning unless it meant that they were willing to let one of them go; but the two were joined and the amendment could not be amended, and so they would have to vote against the whole motion. Did it mean that? The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will not stand in his place and say that if they were disjoined, the West Huron case would be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. He was estopped from saying so by his own action, and by the argument of every one who have supported the government in its action in this House. But, he says also: You cannot punish, even if you do convict. That was a long and much laboured argument, and evidently one that was considered very strong by the hon. gentleman. But, suppose you cannot punish—is it not a great thing to investigate and convict? Would it not be a most important thing for this country if, by investigation and conviction you were to hold out two lessons, one that the government was ready to protect the purity and inviolability of the ballot, and the other: Here are the men whom we have convicted of attempting to destroy the purity and inviolability of the ballot. Even though this committee and this House had no power to do more than investigate and convict, it would have been an inestimable advantage that they should have investigated and should have convicted. It would have taught a wholesome and necessary lesson. But, this House has the power to punish. As my hon. friend says, it has power to punish by imprisonment, while it is in session. But as these hon. gentlemen made this argument, were their memories so short that they did not recollect what had taken place in 1896 and 1897? Then the government assumed power not only to prosecute but to convict, if they could get the evidence, and power to punish by all the machinery of the courts. And before my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was Prime Minister, and before his Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) had had a seat in the cabinet, he pledged without vote of parliament or authority in any way, the public funds of this country to prosecute and convict if he could, and to punish by all the processes of the law, men who were suspected, and suspected only, of tampering with the purity and sacredness of the ballot. Are principles different in 1900 from what they were in 1896? Could you do that in 1896 because you were following what you supposed were the opponents of your party? And is it an altogether different thing when some of your supporters of your party may be the persons who will be convicted in the inquiry and will have to be punished? But the right hon. gentleman and his government exercised for themselves the right to prosecute and to convict and punish, by the action which they took in the Manitoba cases in 1896.

It does not lie in their mouths now to plead inability to prosecute, or to punish after conviction, on inquiry being made and the facts being brought out before the committee of this House. Well, but the junior member for Halifax says that the Committee on Privileges and Elections is not the right kind of a committee. It is partisan, it is unequal; to-day you will have three members, to-morrow ten or twelve, and the next day you will have five or six; it is a partisan body and therefore it is not a tribunal before which to make this investigation. Was it not partisan last year? Was it not unequal last year? Had it not the same disabilities last year that it has this? Last year the right hon. gentleman declared that in the interest of the sanctity of the ballot these matters should be sent down to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. This year its constitution is exactly the same, it has the same disabilities, the same excellencies, exactly the same powers that it had before. This year it is not changed, the right hon. gentleman is changed, and when he changed the junior member for Halifax changed as quickly. Last year he applauded the action of sending this to the tribunal of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, this year he applauds equally the action of saying that that committee is utterly inadequate to carry to completion what it was entrusted with, and which it carried out to a certain extent. But my hon. friend has powers over and above that. He and his government have power to grant a royal Commission of judges and to entrust them with the duty of making a full inquiry, and he has the treasury of this country at his disposal so far as it is necessary, in order to carry out that laudable object. He refuses both; he and all who have spoken on that side of the House have refused both. They have simply put their whole length between the malefactors and the court which is competent to investigate into their wrongdoings and to convict them, if evidence is found.

Now, Sir, the Pritchett affidavit is brought in. You would think, to hear some gentlemen talk that that was the only document upon which we based our demand that the committee should carry out to completion the work which it began last year. Everything we had last year is just as strong this year, and made stronger by the actual evidence taken and the actual irregularities so far proved. The Pritchett matter is simply an addition which, in the opinion of many, has great weight and which, despite all that has been said, has great weight because of the multiplicity of dates, names of persons, and circumstances which are definitely stated in the affidavit. But they say: Pritchett! why, Pritchett is a scoundrel. How long since Pritchett became a scoundrel? Why, Sir, he was a long-trying worker in the Liberal ranks. Was he any better then than he is now? But he was good enough then. He, with his co-mates, with Mr. Vance, with Mr. O'Gorman, with Mr. Tom Lewis, with Mr. Linklater, with Mr. Bole, and all these others, they were all of them good enough then, good enough for Mr. Preston to work with, good enough for Mr. Alexander Smith to work with, good enough for the Liberal government in Ontario to work through, good enough for my right hon. friend and his party here to work through, as an organized machine which they used in the by-elections for this Dominion. Now, when Mr. Pritchett has repented and confessed, he becomes a scoundrel, but when he was guilty of wrong doing he was a boon companion, a hale fellow well met, invited to meet the leaders when they went hither and thither, a confidential man to carry out their work. What has been done with Mr. Preston who worked with him? Given one of the best offices in the gift of the government. He holds it to-day, created for him, a reward for his party services. But Pritchett is a scoundrel; Mr. Preston, who took Pritchett by the hand and used him to filter out his money and to do his nefarious work, to frown down the irregularities in different constituencies. Mr. Preston is in a high and honourable position, while Pritchett has become a scoundrel. That won't cut much ice with the people.

Now, when we come to ask what brought the change of front of the right hon. gentleman, each man has his own theory. I have mine, other gentlemen have theirs. But I think there will be a consensus of opinion upon this theory, that my right hon. friend commenced to change—or was he forced to change? Did he really want to change this year from last year, or was he pushed to do it by some persons behind him, or alongside of him? But whether he did it of his own free will or whether he was forced to do it by other members of his cabinet, whichever it was, when did the change take place? It began to take place when the law got at the gang in the Ontario court last year and began to show them up. It gained still greater strength when it came nearer and nearer to men who sit upon the front benches, to the leaders and members of the government themselves. For you will never persuade the people of this country that Tom Lewis, and Pritchett, and Linklater, and Duncan Bole, and all that fraternity, work hard to earn money and then, out of pure deviltry and mischief, go to work and spend it the way they did in the constituencies, all for love of and for the promotion of certain gentlemen in high places, to keep them in power and to give them the positions that they have. Sir, the Postmaster General knows where that money comes from. The Prime Minister don't.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). That is an absolute misstatement.

Mr. FOSTER. The right hon. gentleman walked side by side with Mercier through the purlieus of Quebec, midst corruption the most awful and gigantic that was ever known in this country, and he smelled nothing but pure air, saw nothing but blue sky. And he is going along now in the same way. May be he does not know where this money comes from, but his Minister of Public Works does, his Minister of Railways and Canals does, his Minister of Interior does, and his Postmaster General does. They know that elections are not made with prayers. They cast out an anchor to the windward, they know where the funds come from, and they know to a large extent where they go; and the Pritchetts, and the Boles, and the Linklaters, are simply the small fry, while the large fry give them the means, the only means they have, of being either mischievous or effective in the work they are doing. And so when it comes closer and closer to the government, and to the members of the government, they stand upon an opposite platform from that upon which they stood last year, and whereas last year they were hot for investigation and conviction, this year they are hot against investigation and conviction. That is the theory. It may be a mistaken one.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. But I will venture to tell the right hon. gentleman that the country will hold that theory, and that they will vote upon that theory when the time comes for it to express its opinion.

Mr. WALLACE. There is no other theory.

Mr. FOSTER. There cannot be any other theory. Now, cannot we make a truce to this mode of argument, this trivial and technical argument? What is the real question? Cannot we simply look at the real question? Has this House the power? Is there a man sitting on the treasury benches who will deny it? Not one. This House has now the power to refer this case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Then, what is the use of arguing that you should have done it in some other way, or that you should have done it sooner, or that you should have prosecuted it more speedily, or that you should have done this, or done that, or done the other thing? We have the power; why cannot we use it? Is there a prima facie case? Will any man rise and deny that? Not even the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) will deny that there is a prima facie case.

Mr. BRITTON. I deny that there is a prima facie case to go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. FOSTER. You do?

Mr. BRITTON. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Why did you support your leader last year when he declared that a prima facie case had been made out and vote to send it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. BRITTON. I did not have the slightest idea of the character of the evidence that would be admitted.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman is right in his answer.

Mr. BRITTON. No, you quite misunderstand me. The character of the evidence which was admitted would not have been considered as evidence by any court or judicial tribunal in the country.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend says that he had not the least idea what was going to come out; therefore, he did not care very much. He found that certain things did come out, he found that other things would come out if power were given to go on with the investigation, but, as to the matter of the evidence who should look to that but my hon. friend and his party who are in control of the Committee on Privileges and Elections? They had everything in their own hands. They were in control of the committee, and the only restriction there was upon the dominant party in that committee was the restriction as to the view that public opinion would take of the manner in which they conducted the business before that committee. That healthy, wholesome public opinion was sufficient last year and will be sufficient another year to make the committee carry out about what is right in the matter of taking evidence and carrying on investigations before it. Then, there is a prima facie case; this House has the power and the other question is: Is electoral purity and the sacredness of the ballot worth preserving? No one doubts that. Then, what argument is there against sending it to the committee? If there is any valid argument as to its not being sufficiently extensive in its powers the government have the right and the power within their own hands to place the whole matter before a commission of judges who will have the undoubted right and the undoubted power of investigation, the power to convict, the power to punish and these powers they can exercise in their plenitude. Much has been said affecting Mr. Pritchett's affidavit as to its reliability or otherwise. Singularly enough, I have had placed in my hands to-day three documents which I am going to read. They are affidavits of credible men and they all hinge on one polling place mentioned by Mr. Pritchett. I will just read Mr. Pritchett's affidavit in that respect. It is in regard to polling place No. 1, in the town of Brockville.

It is as follows :

I acted as scrutineer for Comstock at Jones' polling place.

That is Elmer Jones :

I saw him work several of the false ballots. A man named Lee voted; Jones fumbled his ballot. I thought he was trying to work in a false one. A ballot fell on the floor. The Conservative scrutineer was very sharp and vigilant. He tried to stand up to see what was going on. I obstructed him by getting up at the same moment. He seemed very angry. Some time later he said he would not give much for Lee's vote. I said, 'Why?' He replied, 'You know why.' I said I did not see how I should know. He replied, 'Oh, you are not so slow.' In the course of the day Jones made an excuse to go upstairs. I went also. I told him he was doing first rate, but to be more cautious, as the Conservative scrutineer was watching very close, much more so than usual with scrutineers. Just before five o'clock everything was very quiet, and Jones went upstairs, and I went also. Jones told me he had got in twelve.

And it goes on. That is the only pertinent part of the affidavit that I wish to read in connection with what I am to read now. Here is a man whom certain people on the other side say never was in Brockville at all, never was at the polling place and had nothing to do with it. Let us notice the particulars to which he refers: I was at Jones's polling place, I saw Jones fumbling the ballots. I thought he was putting in a false one; the Conservative scrutineer was very sharp, he got very angry. Jones went upstairs, I went up also, and I had a talk with him there. Now, let me read these three affidavits. The first is the affidavit of George Henry Weatherhead, of the town of Brockville, and I think he was last year mayor of Brockville.

Dominion of Canada, Province of Ontario,
County of Leeds. To wit :

In the matter of an election of a member of the House of Commons of Canada, for the electoral district of Brockville, held on the 13th and 20th days of April, 1899.

I, George Henry Weatherhead, of the town of Brockville, in the county of Leeds, and province of Ontario, insurance agent, do solemnly declare :

1. That I was president of the Conservative Association of the Brockville riding during said election, and am president of the said association at the present time. On the said 20th April, 1899, about ten o'clock in the forenoon a complaint was made to me that there was some difficulty at polling subdivision No. 1 of the East Ward of the town of Brockville. I went there for the purpose of ascertaining the difficulty, and found that Conservative voters were being prevented by some parties inside the polling place from voting. I then went inside for the purpose of having this corrected. I saw one E. W. Jones, the deputy returning officer, Mr. W. W. Richardson, and a stranger appeared to be acting as agent for Mr. Comstock. I remained inside said polling place for some time, during which time I saw the deputy returning officer, the said E. W. Jones, and the said stranger go upstairs, where they remained a short time and returned together. The booth was cleared, and as the difficulty seemed at an end, I came away.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

G. H. WEATHERHEAD.

Sworn before me at the town of Brockville, in the county of Leeds, this 17th day of May, A.D. 1900.

JAS. A. HUTCHESON,
A Commissioner, &c.

Dominion of Canada, Province of Ontario,
County of Leeds. To wit :

In the matter of an election of a member of the House of Commons of Canada, for the electoral district of Brockville, held on the 13th, and 20th days of April, 1899.

I, Hugh Alexander Stewart, of the town of Brockville, in the county of Leeds, barrister, make oath and do solemnly declare :

1. That at the said election one Elmer W. Jones acted as deputy returning officer at the polling place for polling subdivision No. 1, of the East Ward of the town of Brockville and at said polling place the scrutineers or agents appointed on behalf of the Hon. Peter White were one William W. Richardson, then of Gananoque, barrister, and one William Stewart, of Brockville, butcher and fireman.

2. The said W. W. Richardson brought to me immediately after the close of the said poll the book containing the names of the voters for said subdivision which had been prepared for and used by him at the said polling place.

3. The said W. W. Richardson complained bitterly of misconduct of the said E. W. Jones and of the treatment he had received at his hands during the day.

4. He also informed me that he was satisfied that the said E. W. Jones had substituted a ballot for the one given him by one William Lees, a voter well known to be a Conservative, and that the said E. W. Jones had put the ballot marked by the said William Lees in his pocket with the counterfoils.

5. I asked the said W. W. Richardson, to make a memorandum of what had occurred in his said book, which he did within the next day or two. The said book has been in my possession continuously since handed to me by the said W. W. Richardson, immediately after the close of the said polling place, and is exhibit 'A' to this my declaration.

6. The following is a true copy of the memorandum made as aforesaid by the said W. W. Richardson: 'In this ward, E. W. Jones was Deputy Returning Officer, when poll opened ballots were counted and found O.K.' I was immediately informed that I would not be allowed to address my remarks to voters, but must allow Deputy Returning Officer to do all the talking. When first vote was polled Deputy Returning Officer put counterfoil in right hand pocket. To this I objected and pointed out statute to Deputy Returning Officer. He, although a lawyer, held that putting counterfoil in pocket complied with statute. He refused to let me see ballot when returned by voter, and although I made vigorous protest he held this to be right and later was confirmed in both of his holdings by the sheriff, Deputy Returning Officer. About 10.30 Wm. Lees came in to vote and voted. While he was marking his ballot, Deputy Returning Officer sat with both hands in coat pockets and when ballot was handed to him, he placed his left hand on table and pushed ballot under it, then tore off counterfoil and put it in his right hand pocket. He then took one ballot out from his left hand and pushed it into box, and I distinctly saw him put a ballot in his right hand pocket with counterfoils. I was the only one who saw it. I said nothing to him but conveyed to him by a glance,—

7. The said W. W. Richardson had previously been a student in the law office of Wood, Webster and Stewart, of which said firm I was a member, and I am familiar with his handwriting and swear positively that the memorandum in the said book is in the handwriting of the said W. W. Richardson who now resides as I am informed and verily believe in the city of Winnipeg in the province of Manitoba.

8. Several other scrutineers or agents on behalf of the said Hon. Peter White at the said election complained to me that the Deputy Returning Officers at their respective polling places insisted upon putting the counterfoils in their pockets, were insolent, overbearing, and conducted the affairs at their respective polling places irregularly and dishonestly.

And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath, and by virtue of 'The Canada Evidence Act,' 1893.

H. A. STEWART.

Declared before me at the town of Brockville, in the county of Leeds, this 17th day of May, A.D. 1900.

JAS. A. HUTCHESON,
A Commissioner, &c.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it stated that this W. W. Richardson lives in Winnipeg.

Mr. FOSTER. The deponent states that he now believes he is in Winnipeg.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There was a W. W. Richardson living at Portage LaPrairie, who—

Mr. TAYLOR. This is W. W. Richardson, a young lawyer, who has gone up there lately and is in with Coleman.

Mr. FOSTER. The House will notice the points of agreement upon which Mr. Stewart makes the affidavit. Now here is the affidavit of the other Mr. Stewart.

Mr. FOSTER

Dominion of Canada, Province of Ontario, County of Leeds, To Wit :

In the matter of an election of a member of the House of Commons of Canada for the Electoral District of Brockville, held on the 13th and 20th days of April, 1900.

I, William Stewart, of the town of Brockville, in the county of Leeds and province of Ontario, fireman, do solemnly declare:—

1. That at the said election I acted as one of the scrutineers on behalf of the Hon. Peter White, the Conservative candidate at said election at the polling place for polling subdivision No. 1 of the East Ward of the town of Brockville, at which said polling place one Aylmer W. Jones, of Brockville, barrister, occupied as deputy returning officer, and one William W. Richardson, of Gananoque, barrister, also acted as a scrutineer on behalf of the said Hon. Peter White.

2. Shortly after the said poll was opened the said W. W. Richardson objected to the said A. W. Jones putting the counterfoils in his pocket. The said A. W. Jones refused to give effect to the objections made by the said W. W. Richardson, and continued to put the counterfoils in his pocket, and when asked by Mr. Richardson the reason for doing so replied, 'that is my business,' and continued putting the counterfoils in his pocket all day. The returning officer, Sheriff G. A. Dana called a little later and was spoken to about the counterfoils. He upheld the decision of the said A. W. Jones.

3. A stranger whom I do not know, and whom I have never seen before or since, acted at the said polling place as a scrutineer on behalf of W. H. Comstock. I have resided in Brockville for about eleven years, during about eight years of which time I was a driver of a butcher's wagon delivering meat, etc., and know by sight nearly all the people in Brockville, and I verily believe that the said stranger who acted on behalf of the said W. H. Comstock is not a resident of Brockville.

4. During the day I noticed the said A. W. Jones manipulating the ballots in, as I thought, an improper manner, and I was suspicious that he was changing the ballots. I remember that the said A. W. Jones and said stranger went upstairs together, remained a short time, and came back together.

5. I know William Lees, a voter at said polling place, and remember his coming into the said polling place to vote. When the said William Lees was voting the said A. W. Jones had at least one hand in his pocket, and when the said William Lees came out he withdrew this hand from his pocket holding it in a peculiar manner, as if concealing something, made some peculiar motions with his hands on the table, put something in his right hand pocket, then put a ballot in the ballot box. A little latter, the said W. W. Richardson said he did not think Mr. Lees' ballot had been put in the box or something to that effect, to which neither the said A. W. Jones or the said stranger replied, 'Why should you say that,' to which the said W. W. Richardson made some reply which I cannot remember. The said W. W. Richardson seemed very angry, and I thought there would be trouble between him and the stranger.

6. I have not spoken about this affair since said election. I have not read or heard read an affidavit made by one Pritchett in this matter or a copy thereof, and I have not read the declaration made by W. W. Richardson in this matter, nor has any person told me the nature or contents of either of said affidavits, nor have

I discussed the matter with any person whatever before the making of this affidavit, and this affidavit is made by me voluntarily.

7. I have been out of Brockville on my engine performing my duties as fireman since about 10.30 a.m. of the 16th instant, and got to my home about 8.30 this morning.

8. I have been informed by several persons, and verily believe, that the said A. W. Jones has been endeavouring to see me for the purpose of having me make a declaration in connection with this matter.

And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously, believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect, as if made under oath and by virtue of 'The Canada Evidence Act, 1893.'

WILLIAM STEWRT.

Declared before me at the town of Brockville, in the county of Leeds, this 17th day of May, A.D. 1900.

(Sgd.) A. STEWART,
A Commissioner, &c.

These are affidavits which establish at least, in a very circumstantial way, the main points of Pritchett's affidavit as to what took place in the poll at which Elmer W. Jones was a polling clerk. On these three points, which Pritchett could not have known of, could not have guessed at, he could only make an affidavit from personal knowledge; and on these three points he is corroborated by every one of those affidavits, to a greater or less extent, and by two of them he is entirely corroborated with regard to going upstairs with Elmer. You may say what you like of Pritchett's affidavits. Here are affidavits of equally reputable men with those who made the affidavits which were read in this House last night and to-night. The only way you can get at the truth is to put all these men together before a competent authority to take their evidence and cross-examine them. That is what this committee can do, and would do, if it were allowed. This is what a commission of judges could do and would do, if the hon. gentleman and his party would allow a commission of judges to be appointed.

Now, Sir, I do not propose to take up any more time of the House at this late hour, although, of course, I have a perfect right to take it up and discuss this question as it seems proper and right to do. I have not taken a very large amount of time compared with the time that has been taken by some other speakers during the debate. That it is an unseemly hour in the morning is not my fault, but rather the fault of circumstances at which I hinted at first. I have simply to say, in closing, that no action could take place in any parliament of Canada will be more closely scanned in the country, be more thoroughly discussed, and have greater weight with all thinking people, than the action which this government has declared it is going to take on this matter to-night. If it goes forth to the country that a Liberal government, led by my right hon. friend, with his colleagues about him and his supporters behind him, is determined to burke any inquiry by a competent court in this House, or a competent court outside of this House, into well-established election irregularities, not single cases, but cases which have supervened on others occurring over and over again, with convictions made and penalties apportioned—if it goes forth to the country that this government proposes to throw in its lot against the sanctity of the ballot and the undoubted rights of the electorate and the purity of government in this country, and with the gang whose dealings have been partly unfolded, but whose whole work can only be thoroughly exposed by a most thorough examination at the hands of a competent court, then I am certain that the people of this country will have their own opinion about that, and will express it at the polls adversely to the government that takes that stand. I know, and my right hon. friend knows, that no consideration of party politics ought to be allowed for one moment to obscure this great and fundamental question as to the sanctity of the ballot and the purity of the conduct of our elections; and the people of this country are fully seized with that view. They are more than usually alive to that view of the case at the present time from what has happened and been unfolded within the last year or two.

Let me repeat what I said before, that the opposition are here to vote you any sum of money you require for a thorough investigation. They are here to help you to inquire, no matter how far back you go. They are here to help you to convict, if the conviction is made, to punish, if the punishment follows, and to carry out to its utmost limits the penalty which ought to be imposed upon those who act corruptly and wrongly, as these men have acted, and as many of them have been convicted of having acted, no matter whether the actor has worked for this party or for that party. We are here to help as best we can—to protest, in the first place, against burking this inquiry, and to demand, in the name of the people of this country, that a full investigation be held, and to unite with you in making and carrying out this investigation to the utmost possible limit.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Foster) opened his remarks by rebuking my hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. Cowan) for having travelled out of the record; but, after having inflicted this rebuke upon my hon. friend, he had not himself spoken fifteen minutes before he travelled far and wide outside of the question we have before us at the present time. At this hour of the night, I do not propose to follow my hon. friend in these new issues which he has brought in. I do not propose to discuss his honour, nor my honour. I have simply to tell him this, that he must not suppose that because he was long associated with Tom McGreevy and politically profited by his malfeasance, that the same system is to prevail at the present time. I will not proceed further in this direction, but if it pleases the hon. gentleman at any time, when it is not four o'clock in the morning to have a discussion of our respective records, he will always find me ready. I wish now to come to the matter under discussion, and I will simply say to the hon. gentleman that, in defending the case he has undertaken to defend, he has not adhered to the lofty tone he assumed at a certain portion of his speech. The question has been asked two or three times during this discussion: What were the reasons which impelled the government last year to assent to the motion of my hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), and what are the reasons which this year impelled the government to dissent from a similar motion? That is a fair and legitimate question, and I rise to answer it: and I rise with the full sense of the responsibility which attaches to the position which I occupy in this House. I have to say this to my hon. friend and to the House, that the question this year is presented to the House under circumstances far different from the circumstances which were brought to the attention of the House last year. I have to say this, and I venture to hope and believe that I shall make it clear, that last year the question was not fairly presented to the House, the whole truth was not placed before the House. I will not assume to criticise the hon. member who made the motion last year. I do not impugn his honour. I am led to believe that he acted within the knowledge of the facts as they were placed before him; but the hon. gentleman well knows, and the House remembers that when the hon. gentleman made his motion on the 9th of July, 1899, complaining of facts which had taken place on the 21st of February, 1899, at the time of the election in West Huron, when he brought to the attention of the House that irregularities, nay, frauds had been committed at that election, he never enlightened the House upon the material fact that these acts of fraud had been discovered, not at the time he brought them to our attention, but within the forty days which followed the election and during which the parties who committed them could have been brought under the jurisdiction of the Controverted Elections Act. The hon. gentleman saw the objection before him. He saw the objection which confronted him in the existence of the Controverted Elections Act, and he anticipated it both by argument and authority. He cited the opinion of Sir John Thompson amongst others. So much importance did he attach to the opinion expressed by Sir John Thompson, and which he quoted when he first presented his case to this House, that again this year he repeated the quotation: and in order to do him full justice, in order to give every advantage to the views which he expressed upon this subject, I will repeat the quotation which he made last session and which he gave again this year. This is the language which was used by Sir John Thompson in the famous Queen's County case:

Notwithstanding the general operation of the principle that a man ought not to be punished twice for the same offence, it is a well-recognized principle that the enactment of various penalties sometimes has merely the effect of establishing cumulative penalties against the offender, and not substantive penalties. The effect of that would be, in this instance, that a returning officer who offended against a provision of the Elections Act, would be, in the first instance, liable to the public for the wrong done to the public by indictment or by any other suitable procedure, for an offence against the Elections Act, and he would, in addition to that, be liable for the pecuniary penalties which the Act declares may be recovered by any individual aggrieved, and notwithstanding the establishment of those penalties he might still be liable at the hands of parliament for contempt committed against its privileges. I might illustrate my view of this question by changing for a moment the offence for which the person at the Bar is charged, by supposing it was a case of libel, in order to give an illustration more familiar to the House. Assuming that you, Mr. Speaker, or any individual member of this House acting as such, had been libelled, it would be quite clear that the offender would be liable, first, to criminal prosecution for libel; second, to a civil suit, at the instance of the person aggrieved; and, third, the offender could be summoned for contempt against the privileges of this House. Under these circumstances I, as one member of this House, entertain this view: that this House should persevere in the question proposed; and I only presume to express these opinions now because it may be convenient on both sides of the House, according as questions of law arise, that those conversant with such questions should express their opinions and consequently, lead the House more clearly to a decision.

The inference to be drawn from this, separated as it was from the subsequent opinions expressed by Sir John Thompson, would be that cognizance could be taken of the matter brought by the hon. gentleman to the attention of the House by several methods of procedure—by indictment, by civil process, by motion for contempt of court before this House, and also by petition under the Controverted Elections Act. But in point in fact, Sir John Thompson did not express that opinion, so far as the merits of the Queen's County case were concerned. He expressed that opinion when the culprit in that case, Mr. Dunn, the returning officer, was at the bar of the House and objection was taken to questions put to him on the ground that this House had no jurisdiction over him to compel him to answer. Sir John Thompson used the language already quoted to affirm the jurisdiction of the House. But when the House came to deal with the facts and the conclusions to be drawn from these facts, he maintained the opinion that the only method by which these facts could be ascertained was by taking proceedings in the courts under the Controverted Elections Act.

The Queen's County case has been several times quoted in this debate, and can be quoted once more, in order to make clear why I take a position this year on the matter now before us differing from that which I took last year. In the elections of 1887, there were two candidates in Queen's County, N.B. One was Mr. George King, a most honourable man whom, I am happy to say, this government has done honour to itself by appointing to the Senate. The other was Mr. Baird, who is now departed, and against whom I have nothing to say. The result of the polls showed that Mr. King had received 1,191 votes, and that Mr. Baird had received only 1,130, thus giving Mr. King a clear majority of 61. But what took place? The returning officer, Mr. Dunn, coolly gave the seat to the minority candidate. These hon. gentlemen opposite talk of secret machinations to steal elections, to use the language we have heard very often from them in this debate, but they were not so particular under the old regime, for then they stole elections openly in the light of the day. They talk of Donald Cummings, with his honest hand, hardened by the rude labour of the farm, performing tricks of legerdemain which would baffle the efforts of professional conjurers. But Mr. Dunn did not take any such precautions. He went at it boldly, and simply made a report giving the seat to the minority candidate. And for what reason? For the reason forsooth that the deposit required from Mr. King as candidate had been made by Mr. King himself and not by an agent. When this silly pretense was brought to the attention of the House, we contended that this was an offence so clear, that this was a case so palpable, that there was nothing to inquire into, but that the duty of the House was simply to summon the clerk in Chancery and make him amend the report and give the seat to the man who had the majority of votes. This would seem to be a clear case, yet on that occasion Sir John Thompson, speaking for the government as Minister of Justice, said that even so glaring a case could not be interfered with in any other way than by a petition under the Controverted Elections Act. He gave his reasons, and let me give them here as they apply to the case before us with great force. This was the language used by him on that occasion:

If, notwithstanding all that has been said with regard to this question on previous debates, I refer at all to the line of argument that was then presented from this side of the House, it is not by way of repeating or even insisting upon what was then urged but merely by way of reminding members of the line of argument which was used. It was well stated, both in that debate and in the discussion which took place before the committee that, during the early period of parliamentary history, the power of trying election petitions was repeatedly exercised by the House of Commons in England.

It was shown that on every question of that kind which came before the Commons of England a decision was arrived at by a strictly party vote; and so fully was it recognized, in the disposition of election cases by the House, as being a purely party vote, that on one occasion, a ministry went out of office because it had failed to carry the vote of the House in the disposition of a controverted election. At a subsequent time, recognizing the injustice of that system, the Grenville form of procedure was adopted. Under that it was necessary a petition should be presented, that it should be accompanied by security, and that a committee whose decision should be final, should be struck by ballot, that their report should be final, without a vote of the House being taken, and that they should be sworn. Subsequently, some sixteen or seventeen years ago, the legislation was adopted in England by which that procedure was abolished, and the election petition was to be presented to the courts. I showed on a former occasion that we have adopted that statute, we adopted it in 1874. From that time forward, as I then stated to the House—and it has not been controverted since—from the hour when the parliament of Great Britain adopted the mode of trying controverted elections in the courts of the country, and from the hour that that procedure was adopted in Canada, there has not been a single instance in the records of either parliament, of an election return having been disturbed, or a contested election having been tried in the House in Great Britain or in Canada.

This was the doctrine laid down by Sir John Thompson in 1887—that no matter how glaring the offence might be, no matter how open the fraud might be, yet, in every case where facts were to be inquired into which might lead to the loss of a seat of an hon. member, those facts had to be inquired into in a court of justice and in no other manner. Now, having this precedent before the House, let us look at the case that was brought up last year and that comes before us again this session. The election in West Huron was held on February 21, 1899. On July 9, the senior member for Halifax brought to the attention of the House that frauds had been committed in two polls—No. 4 of Colborne, and No. 3 of Goderich. There were a number of men who declared that they had voted for Mr. McLean, the Conservative candidate and that this number exceeded in each case the number of votes recorded in favour of the Conservative candidate. I was led to believe, the House was led to believe, that this discovery was a recent one, that it had been made about the time the motion was presented, and at all events after the period for contesting the election had elapsed. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) had stated to the House that these facts had been discovered within the time prescribed for a petition under the Controverted Elections Act, would the House have been ready to give a commission of inquiry? Would not the House have told him: Why did not you file a petition? But the hon. gentleman failed to give that information; and, for my part, I am free to confess that the matter gave me a good deal of anxiety because I was left with the impression that this was a recent discovery and too late for a petition, and that a villainy had been perpetrated against the laws of the country and that unless investigated by the House the truth of the matter might not be discovered. This carried so much weight with me and with the government, that we determined to give the inquiry. And what has been the result? I will not insist upon my own view of the matter wholly. Certain irregularities were discovered, no doubt, but I do not think that the result has been such as to show that these irregularities were committed by the deputy returning officers. Take the man Donald Cummings. Here is a man somewhat advanced in age—over fifty years, a farmer, accustomed to the rude labour of the farm. He is examined, and swears that he has committed no irregularity. His neighbours testify that he is an honest man. Even the scrutineers of the Conservative party have nothing to say against him and believe in his innocence. Nevertheless, the fact remains there were only thirty votes recorded in the poll in favour of Mr. McLean, the Conservative candidate, whereas forty-three electors declared they had voted for him. As to thirty of these men, there seems to be no doubt how they voted, but as to the other thirteen, as I read the evidence, there would be as much reason to believe they voted one way as to believe they voted the other. One thing is certain—not one of these thirteen men is a more respectable man or more entitled to credit than Mr. Cummings, in fact, he is more entitled to respect than some of these men. Under these circumstances, suppose that the matter had been before a judge and all this investigation had taken place before a court of justice, is there a man who would say that the court would have even censured the deputy returning officer? There is not a court of justice that would have done it.

Now, with regard to the other poll, which was presided over by James Farr. Undoubtedly, there were irregularities committed here. But, who is the author of these irregularities? First of all it is strange enough, to find ten blank ballots in the box. Who put them there? That is a circumstance which it is impossible to explain. Another strange circumstance is that there are more ballots in the box, blanks and all, than there were men who recorded their votes as shown by the poll vote. But, perhaps the strangest circumstance of all is that by the very witnesses brought by the prosecution—if I may use that term, I mean brought by the hon. member for Halifax—Farr is proved to have been a supporter of the Conservative candidate. Under such circumstances, can you draw any conclusion against that returning officer? I venture to say that a court of justice would not have condemned him on such evidence. Now, Sir, such being the facts that have been elicited, about a hundred witnesses having been examined, you are asked to re-open the case. Now, again I put the question: Why is it, as all the facts were known to the opponents of Mr. Holmes in the riding in time to protest the election, that the election was not protested? What reason can be adduced for it? And I say more—what right have they to come before the House when they have refused to go before the courts? There is one thing that I have noticed in this debate—and I have followed it as closely as I could, having listened to nearly all the speeches and having read those that I did not hear—and that is that in almost every speech, of hon. gentlemen opposite, except one or two, the statement was made that this investigation would imperil the seat of the hon. member of West Huron. I do not see how that can be done under the law nor under the facts. But, at all events, one thing is certain—that the object sought by hon. gentlemen when they try to bring this case before parliament is to imperil the seat of the hon. member for West Huron, whether they can do it successfully or not. Now, I ask in the name of everything sacred, I ask in the name of British fair play, when the opponents of Mr. Holmes, the hon. member for West Huron had, under the law, the right, the privilege and the duty of going before the court which had been established for the protection of every citizen and having failed to do so, ought they to be allowed to drag him before a court which, by the experience of ages, has been shown to be insufficient, uncertain and dangerous—so pronounced by a Minister of Justice in whom they had great confidence. They had the temple of the law before them with its doors open to them, but they refused to enter. When they refused to go before the courts, what right have they to claim now that we should give them a court which, for the protection of the accused is not as secure as the other courts established by law? Sir, the appeal to the people has been heard several times during this debate. I accept the challenge and the issue. I accept the challenge to this country, and, knowing something of that British fair play which has been brought into this country with the institutions we now enjoy, I am not afraid to meet the issue in the presence of any body of electors.

So much for that question so far as it affects the county of West Huron. Now I come to the case of Brockville. Last year when the case was brought up I remarked to the hon. gentleman who brought it up that it was weak, very weak. If I had said that it was childish in many respects, that would have been a more proper qualification. A ballot had been found in the street by a little boy, forsooth, other ballots had been found in a box folded in a certain way, mysterious circumstances both of them, upon which a case was based. We would have been fully justified in rejecting and ignoring that request altogether, but so strong was our desire to see the light thrown upon this matter that we agreed to have an investigation. But what was weak last year does not exist at all this year. There is not a thread or a patch left of the accusations brought by the hon. gentleman as to the Brockville case. I have no doubt in my own mind that when the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) brought these slim charges, these petty charges, before the House last year, he imagined with perfect candour that he was on the surface of a terrific scandal, and there was something very bad beneath it. We are all constituted, my hon. friend from Halifax as well as others, in such a manner that we are prone to believe what we desire; and there is on the other side of the House such a desire to see the Liberal party besmirched as the Conservative party have besmirched themselves, that they are always ready to see fraud where they cannot otherwise explain circumstances. They could not explain the defeat they had met in Brockville, therefore they said there must have been corruption, there must have been bribery, there must have been tampering with ballots.

Now, Sir, my hon. friend is not the only man who believed that. Parties there were in Brockville who believed the same thing, and they entered prosecutions against the supposed offenders. They had a man arrested on a charge of tampering with ballots, he was tried before a jury of his peers and was acquitted. Another man was charged, and immediately the whole Conservative press took the cue and repeated one after the other: Here is evidence of the corruption which took place in Brockville. It so happened that the man who was thus accused was the intended victim of blackmailers, he resisted the demands made upon him, he allowed himself to be arrested, he faced his accusers, and his accusers, when they saw the game would not pan out, left the country and have not been seen since. Such was the case when the present session opened, such was the case on Friday when my hon. friend brought it again before the House. Oh, but I must not forget, there is something more, there is an affidavit of Mr. Pritchett. My hon. friend brought the affidavit of Pritchett on Friday night, but he did it in a very timid manner, he did it in a very gingerly manner, he did it without daring to take upon himself the responsibility of the affidavit which he quoted to the House. Let me read to the House the language that was used by the hon. gentleman on that occasion:

I have a sworn statement to this effect: That an expert was employed and paid to train deputy returning officers to steal ballots and substitute forged ballots in their place at that election. I give it for what it is worth. I give it as an inducement why this matter should be investigated before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I do not vouch for it. I say it is a sworn statement which this man has made, and if his sworn statement is untrue it is right and proper that he should be prosecuted and punished severely for making such a statement. If, on the other hand, his sworn statement is true, and these men were trained to substitute ballots at the Brockville, or any other election, it is right and proper that the men who were concerned in that should also be tried and punished for their conduct in that respect. Whether or not the statement in that affidavit is true, I do not know.

Well, Sir, I have heard accusations made on the floor of this House before. I heard Mr. Tarte in 1891, sitting then for the County of Montmorency, make charges against certain members of this House, and he did it in these terms: I am credibly informed, I have reason to believe that I can substantiate by evidence such and such facts. I heard Mr. Edgar, in the session of 1892, make certain charges against members in this House. He did it in this way also: I am credibly informed and I have reason to believe that I can substantiate by evidence such and such facts. But here is my hon. friend from Halifax not daring to take the responsibility of the affidavit upon which he asks the House to take action. 'I give it for what it is worth. I do not vouch for it; whether or not the statement in that affidavit is true I do not know.' And upon the strength of this affidavit which he will not vouch for, the truth of which he will not affirm, he asks us to put men upon their trial. Sir, the hon. gentleman will not take the responsibility of this affidavit, and I give him credit for it. He will not cover with his respectability this man Pritchett. There was good reason for it. This man has been branded by a judge of the land as being a self-convicted liar. He has confessed himself a forger and a personater. No wonder then the hon. member for Halifax shunned the responsibility of attaching credence to the words and statements of that man.

But the task from which my hon. friend from Halifax shrank with honour was boldly taken up by my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). He took the affidavit, he read it to us with gusto, he gave us this nauseous literature with evident relish, and having read these accusations made by Pritchett against respectable men in Brockville, he concluded: Now investigate these charges. Well, Sir, I ask in fairness to any man in this House—I appeal not to passion, not to prejudice, but I address myself to the common sense, to the fairness, to the intelligence of members on both sides of this House—would they really advise us, would they think it just to have honourable citizens of this country brought to the bar of this House to be tried upon the indictment of such a man as Pritchett? Is that their idea of justice, is that their idea of fair play? For my part I cannot conceive that any charges whatever can be based upon the testimony of such a man as Pritchett. Suppose that to-morrow we had one man arrested on the testimony of that affidavit. We bring him before a magistrate for the offences therein stated; for having violated the election law, supposing that we are still within the time limited to investigate these charges. We bring the accusation against him, we bring forward this man Pritchett who tells his story. Then he is asked: Are you a personator? Yes, he says. He is asked: Are you not in your own confession a forger? Yes, he answers, I am. Would any judge convict a man on such testimony as that? Is there anything so odious, so repugnant to our sense of justice as to suppose that a man could be convicted upon such testimony as that? Well, then, if there is nothing in the testimony of this man upon which we can hang a charge, I want to know by what principle of justice we should re-open this case and send it back to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I say further that we refuse to send this case again to that committee because it is not right, it is not fair, that the honour, the dignity and the seat of a man in this House should be placed in the hands of such a court, under the circumstances disclosed.

But I may be told that our friends are in the majority, that our friends are in power in that committee. So they are, but if my friends in that committee were to insist upon having the laws of evidence observed they would immediately be charged with burking the inquiry. Therefore, I say, that, for these reasons, this tribunal is not satisfactory, and for these reasons we cannot accept the motion which has been made by the hon. senior member for Halifax. But, the case is not concluded here. That is not all. There is more than that. I do not accept the affidavit of Mr. Pritchett. I do not accept other statements that have been made. But looking at the unfortunate record we have had for some years, especially during the last year or so in this country, one must come to the conclusion that there has been for years prevalent in this country a system of ballot manipulating and of tampering with the sacred rights of the people. This system has been in existence. I do not say that it did not exist in West Huron, I do not say that it did exist I do not say that it did not exist in Brockville, I do not say that it did exist, but it is undeniable to-day that we have it in the press, in the courts, in the very air in this country, that there has been prevalent in certain sections of the country a system, deep and well organized carried on for years of tampering with the ballot, of preventing the will of the people from being expressed at the polls as it exists in their own hearts and in their own minds. If that be the case something must be done because the case is stronger than that which has been brought to the attention of the House. The evil is deeper than that which has been brought to the attention of the

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

House, the evil is general and calls for the action of the government and of parliament. Some investigation must take place, deep, searching, complete, penetrating everywhere so as to ferret out the evil, to search out the criminals, and if legislation be necessary, to punish them and to punish them adequately. If I understand aright the language of the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), he is disposed to agree with us in this that there should be an inquiry full and complete, taking West Huron if need be, taking Brockville if need be, taking every other place in which these offences have been committed. If we agree on this it is settled; the government is ready to do its part. Now, a tribunal must do this work. What shall it be? Do you think that this work can be adequately performed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections? No one believes that. Do you think that this work can be adequately performed by any committee of this House? Nobody believes that. What body other than a tribunal, or a court should do that? It must be a judicial court, a judicial enquiry of the fullest character, and this is the policy which I have to offer to friends of the government and to opponents of the government as well. We must have, at an early date, immediately, a tribunal composed of the best judges of the land so as to have the fullest, the most complete, the most searching inquiry into all that we know, into all that has come to the attention of the House, of the press and of the courts, and into what also has not yet come to the attention of the public to ferret out that system, to expose it and to eradicate it for ever from this land of ours. I said last year, and I have no reason to repent my words, that the sanctity of the ballot must be maintained at all hazards, and that the will of the people is to be expressed by the ballot as the people have it in their own minds. I do not want, for one, to succeed by any other method than this. If the time comes when this government has not the support of the electorate given by reason of what is in the heart and mind of the electorate, I do not want to remain in the government of this country. We have not changed our view that we should have the sanctity of the ballot preserved, as I said last year, at all costs and at all hazards.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the House and I congratulate the country upon the fact that firmly as my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) takes his position, he is amenable at last to an overwhelming public sentiment. The right hon. gentleman finds himself face to face with the position in which he knows that the attitude that he assumed yesterday had arrayed the public sentiment of this country against him, and that no mechanical majority behind him could protect him from the just vengeance of the people. He has been compelled by the attitude of the Conservative party and by public sentiment to, reconsider and to change his attitude on this most important subject. The right hon. gentleman is compelled to-night, in the face of the declarations made from this side of the House, to abandon the attitude that he held yesterday because he found hon. gentlemen behind him telling him that they would desert him if he maintained the attitude that he held yesterday.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The interruptions of hon. gentlemen opposite will not prevent the intelligent people of the country from knowing the compulsion under which he acts. What is the position of the right hon. gentleman in this debate? He has admitted that here a year ago he accepted precisely the same motion which is now offered. What was his excuse for doing it? He says that he did not then know what the circumstances of the case were. He was not aware that the accusations were so well founded that even the Committee on Privileges and Elections, partisan as they are declared to be by the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) and by other hon. members of this House, found that the position they were compelled to take in the presence of the minority of that committee in investigating that subject, was going to lead to the conviction of his friends and to a decision that would leave no doubt in the minds of the intelligent people of the country as to the scandalous corruption which must have prevailed in this country. The right hon. gentleman puts up the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) and then he is able to call to his aid a learned professor of the law, whose name is now connected prominently before the country with an early judicial position. He puts up this learned professor of the law to declare that what was law last year is not law this year, that the motion for which he voted a year ago should not be supported this year by his party and by the government in this House, because he has discovered that the interests of the government of which he is so pliant a supporter and whose influence last year secured from him the action which he took, would be injured. Now, he is required to make a somersault and to turn around and support a different policy this year in the interest of the same government. This learned professor of the law with all his professions of judicial impartiality in dealing with great and important questions, finds that he can change his opinion just as fast as the leader of the government can change his.

No wonder that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) and the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) were condemned upon their law by the Solicitor General, who is the legal authority of this House. He told them that he was bound to declare that this House was a tribunal that could properly deal with the question, and so he had to differ from them. If this House was a proper tribunal a year ago, why is it not a proper tribunal now? The hon. gentleman stated the inquiry would fail in its object because the House could not punish the culprits, but he knew right well that, under the practice of this House, the testimony adduced before a committee was a sure road to that punishment which would necessarily follow. The Prime Minister told us to-night that a year ago he did not know that the information was not placed recently in the hands of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), but the Prime Minister ought to know that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) told him last year when the information came into his hands. He read this:

Declared before me at the township of Colborne, in the county of Huron, this 30th day of March, 1899.

With this statement of facts set clearly before the Prime Minister, he did not know of it, or he would not have put his foot in it as he has done. There is no member of this House, there is no intelligent man in Canada who does not know that the volte face which he induced the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and his docile supporter behind him, the learned professor in the law, to make, was not because he did not know last year all the facts when he sent it to the committee. We well know that if my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) was able to make the case last year, that he was this year, there would have been no committee granted. Every one knows perfectly well that my right hon. friend would never have permitted it to go to the committee, if he had known what was to come. But when he found the toils closing around him; when he learned, before the House met, that my learned friend (Mr. Borden) was able to deduce testimony that would overwhelm him and his party, testimony that would drive the colleagues at his side out of this House and out of the government, then the right hon. gentleman set his face hard as flint against the proposal that this should go back to the committee. It was not a proposal that it should be referred to the committee, but it was a proposal to continue the investigation to which the Prime Minister had pledged himself in the most solemn terms that ever a public man pledged himself in. Why has the Prime Minister found it necessary to reject the motion? It was because he knew there would be placed before that committee and the people of Canada overwhelming testimony that this government was corrupt to the core, that this government owed its possession of power to the most shameless frauds that ever disgraced any country. That is the reason the Prime Minister found it necessary to use his mechanical majority on wheels to back him up in denying an investigation. There never existed in any country in the world conditions that made it more imperatively necessary for every man who does not want to see everything in the shape of respectable government crushed into the ground; there never was a condition in any country in the world that made it more indispensable for every man who wants to maintain that purity of elections without which all representative institutions sink into utter contempt; there never was a condition in any country that made it more incumbent upon every man to maintain free and independent elections against one of the foulest conspiracies that ever existed, backed up and supported by gentlemen on the Treasury benches. Every one who has given any attention to this question, as it stands before the House, knows that the reason that the Prime Minister called upon his supporters to vote down any further investigation was because they knew that that testimony of Pritchett, their old friend and ally, would be sustained to the letter. Hon. gentlemen opposite will at least admit that Pritchett is a man of considerable sagacity; they know it full well because of the valued services he has rendered to the Liberal party in the past. He gives day and date for those rascalities, and he gives the names of 29 men, every one of whom, if Pritchett told a lie, could convict him of perjury and send him to the penitentiary. You may talk as you please about Pritchett being a scoundrel. He was a scoundrel, and it is due to his scoundrelism and his associate scoundrels that the government owe half a score of their seats in this House to-day. But it was not because he was a scoundrel that they did not want his testimony; it was because they were afraid of him, and it was because they knew, from the circumstantial character of Pritchett's affidavits, that he would be able to confront these 29 men and to defy any one of them to shake his testimony in a single particular. Let me complain here that the right hon. gentleman has treated me most unfairly. Last night he agreed with me that he would repress speaking on that side of the House, so that we might have a division to-night, and yet a man was put up that every one knew was speaking against time, to continue the debate until half-past four in the morning, before I could have an opportunity to answer the Prime Minister. I ask the right hon. gentleman whether that was good faith. I ask him whether that is treating me as I am entitled to be treated: when he told me that he was willing to reach a division to-night, and yet so conduct the affairs on his side of the House that at nearly five o'clock in the morning I am compelled to speak. But, being called on at half-past four in the morning to answer a speech—

The PRIME MINISTER. If my hon. friend will permit me, he must remember that I told him that we would be ready to come to a vote at any time—that I would undertake, if he wished, to close the debate at any moment, and I would ask my hon. friend to refrain; but he never conveyed to me any intimation that he wished to do so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not understand my hon. friend.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am sorry that my hon. friend complains, because I would not be guilty of bad faith to anybody, especially to my hon. friend. We agreed that we would take a division to-night, and I told my hon. friend that I would be ready at any time to take a vote, and I would shut off debate on this side of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My right hon. friend kept that pledge by putting up a man to speak four hours on the last night of the debate. I do not know that my right hon. friend could have prevented that; but I am sure he will not say that that is carrying out the agreement he made, and it was not in my judgment just to me. Now, I do not propose at this early hour of the morning, to go into any very elaborate examination of what my hon. friend said. He was not asked by this motion to re-open the inquiry. That was all settled a year ago. The inquiry was then entered upon, and it could not be closed, for reasons that have been stated. A mass of testimony, the most damning testimony, as to the conduct of my hon. friend's party placed that matter beyond controversy by the examination as far as it went, and it was not proposed to re-open it. It was proposed to do that as to which every person in this House believed perfectly and confidently that not a question would be raised. My hon. friend said that it was only on Friday that Pritchett's affidavit was produced. He knows right well that the hon. member for Halifax was ready to move at the earliest possible moment, in the most direct manner, and that he was thwarted by the right hon. gentleman himself from the moment the House met, knowing as he must have known that testimony was to be placed before that committee which would drive these two men out of the House of Commons.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). What nonsense that is.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is nonsense.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If that is all that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) can raise in protection of their position, I pity them. When I say that these gentlemen would be driven out of the House, I do not mean to say that the House has power to touch their seats; but I say that in the face of the testimony that has already been produced, brazen faced must be the man who would retain his seat which he knows was stolen from honest electors. The hon. gentlemen by their action with regard to this motion have confessed before this House and the country that they know that those two seats belong to Mr. McLean and to Hon. Peter White. They know that if ever men were honestly and fairly elected to this House, those two men were, and their seats were stolen from them by that infamous machine gang that had been co-operating with the Postmaster General and other members of this government. Therefore, I assume that if they had a spark of honour or a spark of manly character in their nature, they would not for one day offend this House by their presence, but would voluntarily leave it, as honourable men should, the moment they learn that they have no right to sit here and occupy the seats to which other gentlemen were honestly and fairly elected. Why, Sir, what can be more frightful than this exhibition which we have had in the province of Ontario? Talk about having carried by-elections. What value is it to a government to carry by-elections in the face of the exposure of the means by which by-elections have been carried? Who does not know that the government of Ontario, the right arm of my hon. friend, only exists, has not been cut off at the shoulder, because that machine gang has given it the entire majority which supports it to-day? That is no secret, Sir. Under the miserable pretext of an appeal against the decision of the highest court in Ontario, they have been protected from losing two more seats and being reduced to a mere nominal majority. That is the position there: and so it is everywhere else. This corruption, the most gigantic, the most disgraceful that ever lowered the character of any government in the world, has reached such a climax that there is a widespread and all but universal revolt against it. The independent electorate of Canada have reached a point at which they are determined to have a different state of things than that which has existed. The hon. gentleman brings a score of affidavits to this House—what for? He says affidavits are worthless. We have a most systematic and elaborate affidavit made by a man, who gives 29 evidences to convict him of perjury if he is not telling the truth. The Solicitor General puts up the plea, which is an insult to every intelligent man in this House, that the time has passed for that because this affidavit was made in a foreign country. Who was preventing Pritchett from coming here before the Committee of Privileges and Elections and swearing to that which would have placed him in the hands of justice tomorrow if anybody would proceed against him? The hon. gentleman knows the ground on which Pritchett stated his immunity and his readiness to face these hon. gentlemen—that all he feared was the Conservatives if he told the truth; that he knew too much of hon. gentlemen opposite to fear that any one of them would raise a finger against him, because he knew enough about them to drive them out of public life. The hon. gentleman talks about the by-elections which they have carried. What by-elections have they carried? There were forty-five by-elections, they carrying all but three. Why, Sir, they did not tell the House that there are only fifteen constituencies which were held by Conservatives at the last election, and which they have carried, eleven to three. But, Sir, when we learn the means by which they have carried them, one is only astounded that we were able to carry any under these circumstances, and that the government with all the power of the local Liberal governments converged in the different provinces were not able to do better. They have got a majority of eight out of the by-elections in four years, and if you will look at the history of previous governments you will find that there is not in that much cause for boasting.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We could not have got a great many more.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman had better look at his own province and see what he has done there. One of the strongest Liberal constituencies in that province has shown him that it has turned its back upon him, and he knows right well that were it not for the gigantic means of corruption used in the province of New Brunswick in connection with the local elections, he would have been paralysed more completely than he has been. And he knows that at an early day, when the electorate has an opportunity of passing on his conduct, he will probably disappear altogether or come here with a small and very ragged regiment behind him.

We have the most indisputable evidence that although these hon. gentlemen have carried by-elections in Grit hives, where they had overwhelming majorities, when we count up the majority of by-elections that they have carried in four years, we find that it is utterly insignificant.

What more? You have only to look east or west to find that the word 'Ichabod' is written over the doors of this government, and they have received notice to quit in a most unmistakable manner. Was there a province that they held more securely than Manitoba? But how do they stand in that province now? Why, notwithstanding the most gigantic corruption that could be used by a man of boundless means and resources, the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), notwithstanding the co-operation of a man who had been prime minister of that province for many long years, notwithstanding that they had one of the most corrupt election acts possible for a government to have, they are all but wiped out of existence in that province. The majority in the legislature of that province, which they induced to pass the resolution dictated by them, for the abolition of the Senate, has passed out of existence. Take Prince Edward Island, what happened there? The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries went down there to the local elections, and said to the electors, with a bludgeon in his hand: You must vote as I say, or you will not get a railway built or have the public moneys expended that have been already voted by parliament. He got his answer to that threat. The high spirit and independent men of that province were not willing to be dragooned even by the Hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and where is he now? He knows that the electors having struck down both his candidates—one an attorney general in that province and another filling a vacancy,—he has been compelled to resort to means so discreditable as to utterly preclude his having the slightest chance of winning his own seat again and coming back here with a single man behind him. If anything more disgraceful than the hon. gentleman's conduct in this respect could be imagined, it was his purchase of Mr. Pineau who had been elected against his opposition and whom he brought up here by a letter from the deputy of his department.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That statement is an absolute untruth, and I give it a most unqualified denial.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I ask the hon. gentleman to say if he had not Mr. Pineau, who is pledged to support the Conservative cause, hidden away in this town, and whether he did not bring him to this town by means of a letter from the deputy minister, so that Mr. Pineau might get an appointment in Paris?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I say again that the whole statement is an absolute fabrication, without a shadow of foundation. I never saw Mr. Pineau, and never invited him here.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Was he here?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know. The hon. gentleman says I brought him here or my deputy brought him here on my written statement. The whole story is a coined lie.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Without even the ghost of a shade to justify it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if it is within the rules of this House for an hon. gentleman to meet a statement I have made by saying that it is a coined lie.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not say that the hon.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

gentleman coined the lie, but that it is one. I say that the alleged fact which he has given to the House is false and without a shadow of foundation to justify it. The whole thing is absolutely false.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are persons within the precincts of this House who saw that man in Ottawa, when no Conservative could find out where he was or have any communication with him.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I never saw him and did not know where he was.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman may have found it convenient not to see him, but he dare not say that he does not know he was here.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I know nothing about him, but what I heard.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say that that is the position to which these hon. gentlemen are reduced. What more? The hon. gentleman will not deny that a Liberal member of the legislature of Prince Edward Island gave notice to the leader of the government there that he would support him no longer, and voted against him just before the House rose at its last session, and that he was seduced into giving his resignation because he said: I do not want to vote against you without the authority of my constituents, but I am determined to oppose your government, and if you will pledge yourself to issue a writ immediately I will resign my seat. He did resign his seat, but made his resignation conditional upon a writ being issued immediately to fill the vacancy. But so deplorable is the position of the hon. gentleman's party in Prince Edward Island that the leader of the government falsified its word. He went to the man the next day and said to him: The Speaker cannot possibly accept your resignation because it is conditional; but if you will give me an unconditional resignation, I will give my word of honour to issue the writ immediately. They got that resignation and held it over until the House met. And when that man was entitled to take his seat, considering the condition on which he gave his resignation, they inflicted personal violence on him and drove him from the precincts of the House. Could any party be in a more deplorable and humiliating position than the Liberal party in the province of Prince Edward Island in view of these deplorable facts. To-day that party is sustained by the vote of a man who, I believe, has been promised a position in Paris for having deserted his party.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not a word of truth in it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. These gentlemen talk about carrying by-elections. Why, they are reduced to the most pitiable and humiliating condition in the face of this country that any party has ever been. They knew they had obtained power by false pretenses, as I have said, and they knew they could not get back by the votes of the constituents from whom they had received power. And so they introduced a change of franchise in this country with the hope of saving themselves. But finding that something more was necessary, we find this humiliating confession made by McNish, in Elgin. Then, the country waked up. We found the work of the McNish gang, these men who trampled under foot honour, character and fair-play with respect to elections, running the same machine that, under the direction of the Postmaster General of Canada and other members of the government, had procured a triumph in Brockville and West Huron. And then we came before this House and asked that this ruthless tide of electoral demoralization should be stopped and the control of the electorate taken from the hands of this most degraded scum of the population. Bribery is bad enough, but it reaches only the corrupt element. But the system that has been established tramples down the rights of every independent elector. A majority in West Huron and Brockville voted for the Conservative candidate. But who were returned, and by whose machination? The opponents of the Conservative candidates were returned, as the result of the working of this infamous machine which tramples down everything in order to maintain Liberalism pure and undefiled.

But all this requires money. Where does the means to carry on corruption on this gigantic scale come from? Take the first instance. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) was the first man who showed the members of this House and the people of this country that plenty of money could be furnished on call. He did it by making a bargain with a political heeler in Montreal to pay a million dollars more for bringing the Drummond County Railway into Montreal than the parties themselves were willing to take for it. What became of the money. Why, Sir, a man who was a bankrupt the day before was able to pay $30,000, by the cheque of the person from whom he bought the Drummond County Railway, for La Patrie. When we are face to face with such gigantic corruption, it is criminal on the part of any one knowing the facts as they stand out upon the pages of the history of our unfortunate country not to expose and denounce it. There is no crime in the political calendar that will compare with that of robbing the independent elector of his vote which represents his share in the control of the affairs of his country. But, more money was required, and then we see the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) exploiting the Yukon. This House was startled with a proposal to sell a kingdom of mineral land, a territory of four million acres, for 150 miles of tramway. And then the elections could take place and the dissolution could come in the province of Ontario—the machine beautifully oiled with the products of this deal could be set to work to hold up the right arm of the Prime Minister. We have evidence, we have proof of the most gigantic corruption in the Department of Interior that ever disgraced a public department. Several hon. gentlemen on the other side were not prepared to vote for so gigantic a job, but nearly all of this mechanical majority on wheels were wheeled into line and supported it. But still, the scheme miscarried. When it was moved to refer one of the most glaring scandals that ever disgraced any country, the maladministration of the Yukon to an independent court of investigation, I told my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier): You may use your mechanical majority here to protect your colleague, but there is an appeal to a higher court, to the great independent electorate of Canada, which will strike down all this defending of corruption and mismanagement in public affairs. The right hon. gentleman went into Ontario and declared that the Minister of the Interior was a most charming man and one of his most valued colleagues. But that did not save him. And where is he now. He is where they will all be—struck down by the independent electors. And to-day, he may seek from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but he will not find a constituency that will degrade itself by electing him. That is what has come of corruption, the most open, scandalous and unqualified that ever disgraced any country in the world. And who was this Minister of Interior? He was a man who came into this government having compounded with his creditors at 50 cents on the dollar. He owed a large amount of money to a municipality in Manitoba, and he came here with the brand upon him of bankruptcy. Yet he is able to live as no Prime Minister in Canada has ever been able to live.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Shame!

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will these hon. gentlemen tell me that Sir John Thompson or Sir John Macdonald or any other Prime Minister has ever been able to drive a magnificent pair of horses through the streets of Ottawa? Not one. I say that there is no man who has ever been premier in the government of Canada that has been able to undertake the expenditure of this man who came into the government as a bankrupt after his proposal to exploit the Yukon. Is not that a legitimate inference? It is evidence as plain as noon day, and will strike every man that the whole story is a story of corruption of a most shameless character. The Minister of the Interior may drive his carriage and pair of horses, but he cannot drive himself into a constituency in the Dominion of Canada. Now, Sir, where is he? Why a gentleman here said he was a fugitive from justice of this parliament. I believe he is not here because he knew the time had come when the Prime Minister, knowing from the sworn testimony that could be adduced before the Committee on Public Accounts in reference to his expenditure.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say that I believe his objects in visiting the other side of the water were two-fold; first, to escape from the investigation that he was bound to submit to as a public man, challenged as his action has been as to the integrity of his conduct upon the floor of this House. I say he was bound to stay here and to submit to such an investigation on sworn testimony. The time had come when he would no longer get private supporters of the government to back him up, although the right hon. gentleman declares that he was one of his most trusted and valued colleagues; the time had come when, in the Public Accounts Committee, his officers could be called and sworn testimony could be adduced that would show in the most clear and unmistakable manner, in my judgment, the maladministration of which he had been guilty.

Sir, that is the condition to which this government have reduced the parliament of Canada. It was bad enough in all conscience when they declared by a vote of this House that they would permit no judges, not even of their own choice, to investigate the giant maladministration of its Yukon deal. That was bad enough, but when they proposed to prevent a committee of this House from investigating the most glaring attempt to strike down the independence of the free electors of Canada, the hon. gentlemen soon found that there was a limit to their efforts, and that the majority that is behind them to-day would cease to exist to-morrow if they did not adopt the request of this side of the House to refer this matter to a judicial committee. Now, Sir, I thank the hon. gentleman from the bottom of my heart for declaring that he will submit this question, and submit promptly, to an independent body of judges who should be in a position to take this matter up at once and deal with it at once, upon the abundant evidence which can be placed in their hands; and I am confident that there will be revealed, on indubitable testimony, the mass of corruption by which this country has been overwhelmed and submerged. If the hon. gentlemen will promptly name that committee and allow it to enter at once upon its duties and pursue them steadily until it is brought to a conclusion, then I say we will accept his challenge to meet him in the presence of the great electorate of Canada, and to fight this battle out at the polls.

Mr. DOMVILLE. You will get beaten whenever you do.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think that the House will attach a great deal of value to that opinion from such a source. I say we are ready, we accept the challenge thrown out to meet the hon. gentleman and his friends at as early an hour as will suit their convenience, and we will try out this issue between the great Conservative party who stands to-day as they have always stood, the determined upholders of purity of elections—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Why do you laugh? Why, Sir, is it not written on the law and on the testimony, do not the journals of parliament show, that whenever hon. gentlemen opposite have ventured to bring a charge of corruption, of maladministration of any kind, they have met with the cordial support of the Conservative government, and of the Conservative party in Canada? Point to me a single case in which we have ever shrunk from referring such questions to a committee, and to follow up the action of that committee by such action as would visit condign punishment upon any person who was guilty of corruptly using the public money placed in his charge. The Conservative party stands to-day, not only as the party who have achieved everything for Canada that has been accomplished up to the present hour, but they stand before the country as a party which has never refused a challenge, however contemptible or insignificant the source might be, to hold a public investigation, and to place their fortunes, their character and their reputation in the hands of the parliament of Canada. I say that when it was found that the parliament of Canada had not power to inflict punishment, we brought the parties into the courts and we never rested until we vindicated the reputation and the independence of parliament and the purity of administration.

I do not intend to detain the House at this late hour of the morning for any longer than to say that we hail with infinite delight the position to which the right hon. gentleman has been forced by the opposition in this House.

Mr. McMULLEN. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well there is not much argument in that. But let me ask the hon. gentleman? Was there the slightest indication on the part of this government yesterday that they would adopt such a course? No, Sir, it was when they found the rising tide of public indignation was going to overwhelm and submerge them that they were compelled to adopt that policy which I told my friends—I think many of them heard me—that the moment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) asked the House to go into Committee of Supply I would move to refer this whole matter to a judicial commission. I suppose the government had learned that, and they have taken advantage of the suggestion. They have learned that Canada and the Liberal party especially, are a long suffering people who will submit to almost anything. They have learned that there was a point where they were told: Thus far shalt thou go and no further. I hail with joy the proposal of my right hon. friend to refer this matter to a commission of judges. But it must be done promptly, there must be no attempt to delay or evade this issue. This commission must be appointed at once. I would infinitely prefer it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections after the character which the junior member for Halifax has given it, when he showed that the members of the committee were so partisan that no confidence could be placed in the action of a majority of that committee, which is composed of their own supporters. He goes further than I do, and he says on the floor of this House that they were so partisan that they would always respond to the crack of the whip; and that when the right hon. gentleman who leads this government says: You must say that black is white, they say, white it is. And the next day when he says: You must say that white is black, my hon. and learned friend from Halifax (Mr. Russell) will immediately say in stentorian tones and in the most judicial manner: I was all wrong, white is not black but black is white. Sir, I need not say any more than this, that after the declaration of the right hon. gentleman there is no necessity for pressing this amendment to a division. It has already been carried. When that great hunter pointed at the coon with his rifle, the coon said, Don't fire, and I will come down. Well, he did not fire, but he brained the coon when he got him on the ground. So I say to my right hon. friend that, having yielded this motion, he has given us that which we prefer infinitely to carrying this motion, that is, an independent judicial tribunal, that may go back as far in the history of Canada as they choose. The further they go back the more it will redound to the honour of the Liberal Conservative party and of Liberal Conservative governments. But, we must have it at once, and we must have it pushed to a rapid conclusion in order that the great electorate of Canada may have the report of the judicial committee before them before they are called upon to decide between hon. gentlemen opposite and ourselves.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I am glad, Mr. Speaker, to know that at last, for once, the government has been able to bring both delight and joy to the heart of the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper). Nothing but that statement from him would have satisfied us of the intense pleasure and satisfaction which we have conveyed to him by proposing an effective measure for the elucidation of truth. At this hour of the night, and at this stage of the debate, I do not intend to address myself to the general subject that has been before the House; but, inasmuch as hon. gentlemen here have from time to time hurled insinuations and made statements against me, I desire, somewhat briefly, but nevertheless as clearly as possible, to make my attitude known. A short time earlier in the debate, the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) appealed to the House for a hearing. I will not make an appeal, but I will exercise my rights as a member of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. And you will find that this side of the House will not stream out and leave but a handful of members to listen to you.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I wish to say, as briefly as possible, what I have to say. Since I took my place as a member of this government, I have deemed it my duty upon all proper occasions to make known what I conceived to be the policy and the record of this government, and, accordingly, in the discharge of that duty and in the exercise of my right to address the electors before rendering their constitutional verdicts, I did discharge my duty as well as I could, by going to the various constituencies where these elections were held, for the honourable and proper purpose of discussing the public questions of the day. It is somewhat difficult to deal with general statements, especially as in the case of the remarks made by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who stated that, for his purposes, it was of no consequence whether or not I was rightly or wrongly accused, that, for his purposes, it was immaterial. He added that as far as he was aware, there was no foundation in testimony for any of the innuendoes that have been made. He admitted that there was no testimony and no foundation, yet the hon. leader of the opposition, getting bolder as the discussion proceeded, did not so qualify his statements, but made some very broad assertions. Another hon. member of this House also made what he called a statement of fact. I refer to the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), and I propose to deal with one point in his remarks, because it is a tangible one. The hon. member for East Simcoe asserted that he had, on the public platform, accused me of associating with a very disreputable character of the name of Hanna, in connection with the East Simcoe by-election. The time that I speak of was at the nomination meeting in Goderich. He painted the character of the man so black that I certainly failed to recognize any person of that name whom I had ever met. At a later period this session, he again alluded to this same man, and I ascertained that he had reference to an officer of the Grand Trunk. In the by-election in East Simcoe, I can recall meeting Mr. Hanna, and the occasion was as follows: I had arrived in Orillia from speaking, I think, at Midland, the night before, and, after leaving the dining-room and going into the public hall, I saw there a number of gentlemen, some of whom I knew and some I did not know. But it is customary for public men to be free in making introductions and receiving introductions, and on the occasion in question Mr. Hanna was introduced to me as an officer of the Grand Trunk Railway. There was nothing in his appearance to indicate that he was the disgraceful man that the hon. member for East Simcoe had declared him to be. On the contrary, he impressed me as being a particularly respectable man, striking in personal appearance, one that you could not see once and easily forget. My interview took place with him in the public hall. It was casual and but for a moment. There were persons present whom I did not know. I had not a word of confidential conversation with him to my recollection. I had never seen him before that moment; I have not seen him since. The hon. member for East Simcoe states that I went through the riding with him, that I drove through East Simcoe and suggested that we were engaged in improper work. If I did, there will be people in East Simcoe to testify, but the hon. gentleman will fail to find any human being to sustain him in that statement. I here state, unqualifiedly, that I have described and stated the full extent of my acquaintance with Mr. Hanna. The other night, he referred to him again as a dismissed Grand Trunk Railway spotter. I did not happen to be in the House, but when, in March, he spoke of Mr. Hanna, I wrote to Mr. Wainwright, of the Grand Trunk, to ask who this gentleman was, and, in justice to him and to myself, I may be permitted to read my letter and the answer:

Ottawa, March 6, 1900.

Dear Sir,—Mr. Bennett, M.P., has made unfavourable references to the character of a Mr. Hanna, who, I understand, is in the service of the Grand Trunk Railway. If there is any such officer in your company's service, I would be glad if you would inform me what position he holds; how long he has held it; whether it is a position of trust; what has been his record as an officer of your company; what is his standing in society; does he bear a good reputation; and generally inform me, if you are at liberty to do so, fully as to Mr. Hanna's character.

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) W. MULOCK.

William Wainwright, Esq.,

Assistant General Manager, G.T.R.,
Montreal, P.Q.

I received the following reply from a Mr. Wainwright, dated March 15th, 1900:

Dear Minister,—I have your letter of the 6th inst., making some inquiry about Mr. Hanna, who is connected with this company. Mr. W. D. Hanna joined our service in November, 1881, and since that time has held various positions, all of which he has filled most satisfactorily. His official position is that of inspector in connection with my department, and is one of responsibility. He is a man of the highest respectability and has brought up a nice family, his sons holding responsible positions in the United States. Mr. Hanna is a man in whom I place entire confidence and have done so for many years.

Yours truly,

W. WAINWRIGHT.

The other evening the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) again alluded to Mr. Hanna, and I sent a telegram to Mr. Wainwright to inquire if this Mr. Hanna was still in the service of the Grand Trunk Railway. The following was the telegram:

Ottawa, May 16.

Wm. Wainwright, Montreal.

Mr. Bennett, speaking in the House last night, referred to Mr. John Hanna as a dismissed Grand Trunk spotter, being in East Simcoe in last Dominion by-election. Was there a John Hanna, a spotter in your company's service and dismissed?

Mr. FOSTER. Was that a telegram or a letter?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. This is a telegram, there is more of it and I will read it all, but the latter part has no bearing on the case. It happened that when the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) spoke of Mr. Hanna, some hon. member beside him asked the Christian name, and the hon. member gave his name as 'John.' That does not appear in Hansard, and as the letter which Mr. Wainwright sent me referred to him as W. D., I desired to know whether the Mr. Hanna that Mr. Bennett referred to was the one Mr. Wainwright referred to or not. The following is the telegram:

Mr. Bennett, speaking in the House last night, referred to Mr. John Hanna as a dismissed Grand Trunk Railway spotter, being in East Simcoe last Dominion by-election. Was there a Mr. Hanna, a spotter, in your company's service and dismissed? During that election Mr. Hanna was introduced to me in Orillia as being an officer of your company. Was he the person to whom your recent letter referred, as being W. D. Hanna, and is he still in your company's service?

WM. MULOCK.

To that I received the following reply:

Message received. We have had no John Hanna in this company's employ, and therefore no such man was dismissed, during the election you speak of. We had a W. D. Hanna, who has been in this company's service for many years and is still in our employ.

WM. WAINWRIGHT.

I met Mr. Wainwright to-day and he said Mr. Hanna was still in their service, a most trusted man and upon his certificate the Grand Trunk Railway paid out large sums of money annually amounting to a couple of million dollars. That is the gentleman who it is suggested was engaged in unworthy practices in East Simcoe.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) spoke of West Huron and Brockville, and named other people who he said, I knew, were present in West Huron. What the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) has stated is unqualifiedly incorrect. He named Capt. Sullivan, Bill Molloy, John Ferguson, John Gorman, Thomas Pritchett and Thos. Lewis. Now, Mr. Speaker, I had never seen any of these men, to my knowledge, in my life. I do not know these men. I was billed to speak at several places in West Huron, and I was there for three or four days. I devoted myself faithfully and honestly to the purpose for which I went, namely, the holding of public meetings and laying our case before the public. I discharged my duty in that way, and that way only. That is the only part I took in the election. I had not been in that county for many a year. The people were strangers to me, and if there were a dozen men came there, I would not be able to identify them as strangers. As to these men mentioned, I had never seen them in my life, and I have no knowledge except what has been stated as to whether or not they were there. I can state with reference to Brockville in the same unqualified way. Hon. gentlemen opposite make allegations of which they have not the slightest knowledge. No human being has dared to say anything he knows, and although these gentlemen opposite have been engaged in circulating slanders, there is not a man in Canada who has dared to make the suggestion of a pretended fact to connect me with any wrong-doing.

Last year the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) ventured to make some observations with reference to West Huron, and I then gave a challenge to him, and that challenge has been on the pages of Hansard for him to take up every day since, and up until to-day neither he nor any of his friends has dared to take up the challenge, nor will they dare to take it up now. The hon. gentleman made insinuations as to my being in West Huron, and this is the report of my reply (p. 9482 Hansard):

To the first specific statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) I have given an emphatic denial. As to the insinuation that my action in West Huron consisted in secreting myself in a hotel, I say that my sole action in that riding consisted in addressing meetings of electors publicly, openly and honourably, and discussing the issues of the day; and I here challenge the hon. member for West York or anybody else to prove what he has insinuated. I challenge an inquiry.

I challenged inquiry then and I challenge inquiry now. Mr. Speaker, there is a way and a proper way to indict a member of parliament. There is a fair and a manly and an open way. Let the man who thinks he has a case stand up in parliament as men of courage have done before, and on his responsibility as a member of this House formulate a charge and make it here. Then, Sir, he will not have to wait for an inquiry. If he desires inquiry by a committee of this House he shall have it, and if some other tribunal suits better he shall have that. And Sir, we will put the honour of the accuser and the accused in the scale—and there are consequences to the accuser as well as to the accused. The leader of the opposition has been bold as he always is. Let him formulate his charge against me on his own responsibility. He is a Privy Councillor; he is member of this House; he aspires to be a leader of public opinion, and we will see whose honour will suffer, and we will see which man is to be driven from public life. Sir, that is my attitude with regard to all these charges; that is my attitude in regard to all these insinuations. I here say as a member of parliament; I here say as a member of the government; I here say as a member of the Privy Council; I here say on my honour as a citizen and in every other capacity that I occupy: that these insinuations, these slanderous, malicious, cruel and heartless insinuations, that these gentlemen have been filling the air with against me are as baseless as a vision. Under what circumstances are these slandering men appearing here? I am saying it in the sense and knowledge of this, and let them take warning by it. I am telling it to them because in a short time they shall have an opportunity to confront me and make good their charges. Let them not misunderstand that. And there will be no packed jury. As the Premier has said, the men to hear these things will be men in whom the public will have confidence. Can I say more?

Mr. WALLACE. We cannot have it too soon.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No, the hon. gentleman has been free like some others in filling the air with these slanders, and it has been most unmanly, especially as coming from men professing such a desire for political virtue; most inconsistent with their professed desire for justice and fair play. Is it fair play, is it manly, for a man to stand up in this parliament and say that for his purpose he cared not whether I was rightly or wrongly accused or whether or not there was any testimony to support the charge, and yet was not above adding to the circulation of these slanders. Now, Sir, members opposite have a challenge, and I shall not take up any more of the time of the House at this hour; and that challenge must be accepted in some place. They profess to be in a hurry to have an inquiry. So far as I am concerned, they have only to formulate their charges, and if they desire a tribunal in this House they shall have it. I leave the question there, Mr. Speaker. I have suffered under these lies for many a month. They are lies, unqualified lies. I characterize them as such, and the public will characterize the men who utter them as very much the same. I will not be unparliamentary. Mr. Speaker. The hon. leader of the opposition professed great joy at the turn of events to-night. My own impression was that he was a most disappointed man. Instead of addressing himself to the subject of debate, he had to draw upon that extensive vocabulary of his, playing various roles, and at last he claimed himself to be a David Crockett. I think if the public require any more proof of his true role, they have been furnished with it by his remarks to-night, and they will call him a Munchausen, and not a Crockett. Mr. Speaker, I want just to put a question to the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart). I want to apply to him not unkindly and not unfairly, for I have none but kindly feelings towards that hon. gentleman, and I have never known him to play an unmanly part. There was an election in North Ontario in 1896. Mr. McGillivray was declared elected. There can be no doubt, I think, that that election was the result of fraud, that the ballots were falsified, and that Mr. McGillivray was declared elected when he had actually been defeated. There were several Ministers of the Crown taking part in that election, amongst them my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals. What would he have thought if I had accused him of being a party to those frauds because he had discharged his duty in addressing the electors who were about to be called upon to record their verdict? Other hon. gentlemen went to other constituencies; and yet because I did it, and it serves the purpose of hon. gentlemen opposite to repeat these misstatements until they believe that by constant repetition they may create what may be considered as proof for the purpose of a political campaign, they have resorted to these unworthy methods. Now, Sir, I leave the matter there. I have made my statement; and if there is anything to be added, if my language does not cover what is in my mind, I would allow any gentleman to add to it to the fullest extent necessary in order to give the most emphatic and unqualified contradiction to every one of these vile lies and insinuations which have been hurled against me across the floor of this House or outside of this House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the Hon. Postmaster General allow me to ask him a question?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. So far as meeting the statements in regard to West Huron is concerned, speaking for myself, I think the hon. gentleman has met them very squarely. Will he allow me to ask him whether he would apply the same statements to Brockville? For instance, I refer to his statement, which he confined to Huron, to the effect that the only part he had taken in the election there was from the platform. Will he say that in the election in Brockville the only part he took was from the platform and not elsewhere? Because the statement is made, which I venture to repeat, having no personal knowledge, and having stated that I had none, but merely stating to the hon. gentleman man-fashion what I heard, and it is only fair to him as well as to myself to know what the issue really is.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Speaker, I am only too glad to have a person put a question to me. When I say I spoke from a platform, that involves of course a number of other things, such as going to meetings, returning from meetings, ascertaining the time of the meeting, seeing the local people to arrange for it, and so on. That is all part and parcel of the legitimate purpose of taking part in the campaign. In Brockville, I went once or twice, I think, with the candidate to call on some electors. I went down to their committee rooms, and I think that is all except speaking. But whether in mere words I have covered the point or not, so far as any accusation of wrongdoing is concerned—because that is the point which the hon. gentleman states is in the air—I wish him to understand that I have given the most emphatic and unqualified contradiction to any charge of wrongdoing, and I invite the fullest inquiry. I demand the fullest inquiry, and when that is over and the result turns out as I know it will, because I know what the facts are, I hope hon. gentlemen will have the manliness to make restitution for the injury they have done to me.

Mr. M. J. F. QUINN (Montreal, St. Ann's). Mr. Speaker, there is no trait of character in man more justly prized, more highly appreciated and to which more tribute is paid than that of courage, whether physical or moral. We remember the names of our patriots, of those who have bled for our country, of those who have sacrificed their lives for the advancement of a cause or the advancement of a people, and we erect to them grand statues wherever we can. If this be so, there is also no more despicable quality in human nature than that of cowardice. For the last two or three days, we have been entertained by learned gentlemen on the other side, who attacked the hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) because he demanded that there should be sent before the Committee on Privileges and Elections the case which had been permitted to go before that committee last year by the right hon. the leader of the House. He simply asked, in accord with the report which has been sent to this House by that committee, and which certainly had in view a return of the case to it, that that case be again referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I shall read the last few lines of the report to bear out the statement I am making:

The proceedings of the committee being thus incomplete the committee do not feel warranted in reporting any conclusions.

Your committee therefore report herewith the evidence given by the witnesses who were examined that the House may take such action thereon and as to continuing and completing the inquiry and investigation as may be deemed best, and they recommend that the said evidence and exhibits be printed for the use of the members of the House.

All which is respectfully submitted.

Three principal reasons were given by these learned gentlemen—three of whom I believe are intended, at no very distant date, to occupy eminent positions on the bench—why these charges should not be sent back to the committee. The first was that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) had not begun early enough in the session to make his motion; the second was that that committee had no right to investigate; and the third was that nothing had been proven. These gentlemen laboured for days on these three grounds. They proved to their own satisfaction at any rate, but evidently not to that of the right hon. leader of the House, that this committee had no right to resume its investigation. They proved also, likewise to their own satisfaction, but again not to that of the right hon. the First Minister, that nothing has been proven in the case. They proved further, equally to their own satisfaction, and still not to the satisfaction of the hon. the leader of this House, that nobody was guilty. Yet to-night we have the spectacle of the right hon. gentleman declaring that the air is full of corruption, that so much has been shown up, particularly in the cases which were sent last year before the committee that he now proposes, at the last moment in this debate, to refer all these matters to a commission of judges. Why was not this done before? Why was not this done yesterday? Why was it not done when the hon. member for Halifax first made his motion in amendment to the motion to go into supply. The hon. the leader of this House told us this evening that he informed the Minister of Finance that if this motion was defeated, he would then move that all these matters be referred to a commission of judges. Why then did not the government come out and declare, some time before three o'clock in the morning, that they were going to take this course?

I do not propose to discuss the three reasons given by these learned gentlemen why the case sent to the committee last year should not be referred to it again this session, but I wish in a few words to draw the attention of my leader to the position taken by the right hon. the First Minister, and give utterance to one word of warning: 'Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes,' which, freely translated means: I fear these Grits even when they appear to grant what we desire. I ask the hon. leader of the opposition to see that it is well and thoroughly understood that this commission will enter upon its duties at once. I ask him to see that the commission will prosecute its work immediately, so as to be in a position to send in its report or decision before parliament rises. If not, what then will be the position? The government will certainly appoint a commission, but every obstacle will be put in the way of the judges to carry out their work, and before they will have done anything, before any of these charges made in the West Huron and Brockville cases will have been investigated, we will, in all probability, have the general elections sprung upon us and have the government posing before the country again as the heroes of purity, when in reality, if these investigations go on, there is no doubt that every charge made in connection with the West Huron and Brockville elections will be proven to the hilt.

I do not intend to detain the House at any length at this hour, but desire simply to make this suggestion to the leaders of my party, because I fear that the offer of the government has not been made in perfect good faith but rather for the purpose of misleading the opposition and the electorate of this country.

Mr. JAS. CLANCY (Bothwell). I have a word to say to the right hon. the Prime Minister. I called his attention last session to a statement made with regard to alleged irregularities, which a member of the other House said took place in the riding I have the honour to represent. The right hon. gentleman prevented my going any further by saying I was not in order, and therefore paid no attention to my remarks, but the statement made in the other House is invested with some seriousness by reason of the fact that it was given expression to by one of his own colleagues. Some reference has been also made to that matter by a somewhat less respectable member during this debate, to which I intend paying no attention, but I desire to say to the right hon. gentleman that if, in the face of the statement made by one of his own colleagues in another branch of this parliament, he does not refer this matter to the commission of judges he intends to appoint, I will consider that he and his government are stamped with a stigma which I will not describe as I might this morning. The statement was absolutely unfair. I have personal knowledge, as hon. members usually have, of the manner in which elections are conducted in their ridings, and I must say that I have never heard in the riding itself, which I have the honour to represent, any Liberals or Conservatives make any such declaration, not even my strongest opponent, and I call on the right hon. gentleman—and I think he will admit that the demand I make is a fair one—that when that commission is appointed he will set its machinery in motion to make an inquiry into the conduct of the officials and all concerned in my election and into my own conduct, so far as that is concerned, in the riding of Bothwell.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think, Mr. Speaker, under the peculiar circumstances in which we are placed at this moment, that I must ask my right hon. friend to state a little more succinctly what he proposes to do. I have already expressed the pleasure with which we accept his proposal to have a judicial commission appointed immediately and one that will promptly investigate all the charges. Its first duty undoubtedly would be to deal with the question before the House, namely, the Brockville and West Huron elections. We are quite ready to have the commission extend its operations so as to cover as much ground as possible, but as these elections are in question before this House at present, it is those which I have particularly in view. If my hon. friend is prepared to say at once that he will name that commission and have it enter promptly upon its duties, with directions to bring its work to as early a conclusion as possible, it will be quite acceptable to this side of the House, and I would ask my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden), with the consent of the House, to withdraw his amendment. In regard to counsel before the commission, I presume the hon. gentleman will at once see the propriety of our being able to name counsel on the one side, as the government will on the other.

The PRIME MINISTER. For my part, I do not desire this motion to be withdrawn. I did not make the statement which I did to the House with the view of making any bargain with my hon. friend. I made this statement on my responsibility, with the advice of my colleagues, in order to meet what we believed to be an evil of great magnitude, deeply rooted. I stated that the examination would be prompt, searching and thorough.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think, then, when we accepted promptly his proposal, that the right hon. gentleman was wrong in allowing the members of this House to separate under the impression that there would be no vote on the question. We accepted unreservedly the proposition which rendered the passage of this amendment absolutely unnecessary. We infinitely prefer a judicial commission to investigate these election matters to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, after the character that has been given to it by the right hon. gentleman's supporters. I think the right hon. gentleman ought to have informed us at the time that he intended to force us to a division, notwithstanding his fresh proposal. There is no question of a bargain. The hon. gentleman has been compelled to this course in the face of a hostile vote, in the face of a threat of his own supporters behind him, that they would vote against him, if he did not consent to the appointment of a commission. Under these circumstances, he is bound to state frankly to the House that he will carry out what he led us to believe would be the case, that the commission should be promptly appointed, and be composed of judges of the highest character, who should enter upon the discharge of their duties immediately. I do not see what the hon. gentleman has to gain by forcing a division. However, he is entitled to do so.

The PRIME MINISTER. I stated that I did not want the question to be withdrawn, but it is optional with my hon. friend to call a division or not.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will see that this is a very unsatisfactory position in which to leave the question. The hon. gentleman and his government must have made up their minds as to what they proposed to do. Now, does he propose to give us a commission at once and to allow them to go on at once with the investigation in West Huron and in Brockville? He can answer that, and, if his answer is affirmative, it fills the bill exactly as we want it, and is infinitely preferable to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. But to ask us either to give up our motion or to prosecute it with nothing definite ahead of us, he will see, is not treating us quite frankly. This is either a sudden resolve come to without consultation and under the stress of circumstances, or it is a policy that the government have settled. If it is a policy the government have settled, surely the right hon. gentleman can give the House the benefit of the statement that was made, and tell us just what they propose to do. But if the hon. gentleman proposes to take his own time and appoint whatever commission he pleases, without telling us definitely what he means to do, it is not satisfactory to this side of the House, and I do not think it will be satisfactory to the House at all.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am taking no advantage of the hon. gentleman; I offered nothing. I stated what I intended to do; the statement is quite fresh—that we should have an inquiry, prompt, searching and thorough.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A judicial commission?

The PRIME MINISTER. What else can it be? The hon. gentleman did not ask anything, and I offered nothing. I stated what we would do. In face of that, the hon. gentleman should be satisfied. That is his own business. But I do not want to have this motion withdrawn; I want to have the question put, and it is for the hon. gentlemen to call a division or not, as they please.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman is taking a most disingenuous course. The hon. gentleman stated that he was prepared to appoint a commission immediately, who would enter upon its duties at once; and in my reply I stated that we were prepared to accept that.

Mr. GIBSON. After you spoke an hour.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, after in reply to a four-hour speech. I said I was prepared to accept that, and, under that impression, a large number of the members of the House went away. Nothing could be more inconsequential, after the right hon. gentleman had offered us more than we asked for, to press this amendment to a division. I think, therefore, that the hon. gentleman has violated the understanding upon which—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, he has violated altogether the understanding upon which the motion was to be taken, and I think there is no alternative but for the debate to proceed.

Mr. SPROULE. Since the leader of the House has seen fit to withdraw from the position—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Will the hon. gentleman permit me for one moment? I happened, in my remarks, not to embrace East Simcoe, to which the hon. member for that riding (Mr. Bennett) alluded, and, in case there should be any other by-elections in the mind of hon. gentlemen opposite with which they desired to associate my name. I wish the remarks I made in regard to the two ridings named to extend to all other by-elections.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Under the circumstances, I will ask my hon. friend not to address the House at six o'clock in the morning, and we will take the vote that is forced upon us by the right hon. gentleman, in violation of what I consider to be the understanding made by his own proposal. But I can tell the right hon. gentleman that if he thinks he is going to gain any advantage by this course, he is grievously mistaken. Neither in regard to the business of the House nor in any other respect will he gain anything by departing from a proposal made across the floor of this House and accepted by both sides. We are quite prepared for the question.

The House divided on amendment (Mr. Borden, Halifax).

Amendment (Mr. Borden. Halifax) negatived.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I do not imagine that at this hour the House has any desire to go into Committee of Supply. I move that the Committee of Supply have leave to sit at the next sitting of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) what business he intends to take up to-day and also to make the suggestion that committees should not meet this morning.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I think I will accept the suggestion of my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) that the committees should not meet this morning. As to the business, we will take up the Criminal Code this afternoon and all the other bills on the paper.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I would ask the right hon. Premier to reconsider his decision as to the committees. There are a number of gentlemen from a distance in attendance, and the meeting is called for 11 o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no committees.

Motion (Mr. Fielding) agreed to.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If a convenient moment can be found, the House will be asked to consider special estimates in regard to legislation.

ADJOURNMENT—QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY RECESS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). As this is Friday, and as there are two holidays in Ontario next week, I would like to ask if the government has made up its mind what we may expect in the way of holidays next week.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) answers that question, I would mention that, as he is quite aware, the Legislature of Ontario have made May 23 a statutory holiday as Empire day; and as that comes immediately before the Queen's birthday, I would suggest whether it would not be desirable to adjourn on the night of the 22nd over the Queen's birthday.

The PRIME MINISTER. Mr. Speaker, the season is so far advanced now and we are all so anxious for prorogation that I believe I shall best consult the wishes of the House by insisting that we celebrate no other day than the Queen's birthday.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 6.20 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, May 18, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

WEST HURON AND BROCKVILLE ELECTIONS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to read a telegram which speaks for itself, and which refers to a matter that I think the party is entitled to be heard upon. This is a telegram directed to myself and received this morning from Mr. William David Macpherson. He says:

Toronto, Ont., May 18, 1900.

Sir Charles Tupper, Bart.,
Ottawa, Ont.

Referring to Cowan's speech yesterday and to Farr's declaration, read by him, regarding me, published in 'Globe,' August 16 last, see my published reply in 'Mail,' August 17; also declaration of Marshall and Nelson answering Farr, and unqualifiedly contradicting him, published in 'Globe,' August 21; also 'Globe' editorial, September 9, apologizing for publishing Farr's original declaration, and exonerating me completely from his slanderous charges. Please answer Cowan fully in House, so the declarations in answer and editorial apology will appear in full in 'Hansard,' and greatly oblige.

WM. DAVID MACPHERSON.

I do not wish to take up the time of the House to carry out the last part of this telegram, but I think it is due to the gentleman, who is not here, that the facts to which he has drawn attention should be brought to the notice of the House.

REPORTED OUTBREAK OF DIPHTHERIA AT REGINA BARRACKS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, a statement was published in the press yesterday in regard to an epidemic which is said to have broken out in the barracks of the Mounted Police at Regina. I have a statement from the Comptroller of the Mounted Police on this subject, which, I suppose, the House will be glad to hear, and which may dispel the fears which have been occasioned by that report. The Comptroller of the Mounted Police writes :

Last evening's papers have an alarming report of an outbreak of diphtheria at the police barracks, Regina. There are three cases, not serious, among recruits recently arrived from the lower provinces. They have been isolated and every precaution has been taken. However, a number of men have been put in hospital, and the barracks buildings are being disinfected. There are about ten men in hospital with colds and other ailments, but nothing contagious, and there are only three cases of diphtheria.

Mr. DAVIN. I am very glad to hear that from the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), because I had a letter from Regina which would seem to indicate that it was more serious than that; but, no doubt, the ten cases were supposed to be all diphtheria cases.

CRIMINAL CODE (1892) AMENDMENTS.

House again resolved into committee on Bill (No. 137) further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.—(Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 166a,

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the reason why this clause should be replaced? A man may be negligent and yet not criminally negligent. A man may escape from an officer when the officer is doing his best, and yet some witnesses might come forward to say he is negligent.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There might be witnesses the other way also. The law as it stood formerly, made this offence a misdemeanour, which was punishable by fine or imprisonment at the discretion of the court, and, therefore, the offender was liable to five years' imprisonment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, but if you made the alternative of a fine here, I would not see any objection to it. What was the reason for dropping the clause in 1892; there must have been some reason?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There may be a reason, but I have read the debate and I could not find it. If a man be negligent and allows a prisoner to escape, surely we ought to punish him.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If he allows him to escape intentionally, the punishment ought to be very severe, but if it is unintentional negligence, I do not see that the punishment should be imprisonment.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It would be left with the court and the jury to say whether the culprit is criminally negligent or not.

On section 179,

Mr. DAVIN. Will the Solicitor General accept my amendment?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The general law at present provides for the case my hon. friend desires to meet by his amendment.

Mr. DAVIN. Would my hon. friend explain where it is provided for?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I will ascertain that, and in the meantime we will let the clause stand.

On section 183,

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). I would like to ask why subsection b is restricted in its scope to women in factory employment. Should it not cover the case of any employment, such as that of a household servant?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The amendment widens the operation of the section to women employed in a shop or store. There was an amendment added by the Senate providing that no person shall be convicted of an offence under this section by the evidence of one witness unless such evidence is corroborated. The Senate evidently overlooked the fact that section 684 provides for this corroboration, so that I cannot see that there is any good reason for repeating the provision here.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). I would like to call the attention of the Solicitor General to the fact that section 684 includes section 190 as a section which requires corroborative evidence, which seems to me to be rather absurd. In that case a witness might be a person entirely disinterested, who might know of the offence by happening to pass a tent or wigwam. It seems to me that this would be a good time to omit section 190 from section 684.

On section 183a,

Mr. DAVIN. This seems to me to be a monstrous thing, and contrary to every principle of the law of evidence that I ever heard of—to throw the burden of proof of previous unchastity on the part of the girl or woman upon the accused.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). When the relationship of the parties is considered, I think the clause should pass. One can understand the relation in which a girl working in a factory stands towards her master. She might be the very best character in the world, and yet under those circumstances might yield more readily than otherwise. This clause does not refer to general cases, but to specific cases, and I think it is only just and fair that it should be added as a deterrent in such cases.

On section 687,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would call particular attention to subsection 2, which reads :

In this section the word 'deposition' includes the evidence of a witness given at a trial.

The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) agreed to draft some amendment to that. I would suggest off-hand to add the words 'before the same court, and for the same offence.'

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). But why should you not limit it to the deposition taken expressly for the purpose of being given in evidence ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Supposing there was a new trial, for some reason or other, because the jury disagreed or because on appeal a new trial was ordered, why should we not be able, if the witness examined at the first trial is not available at the second, to use his evidence taken at the first trial, if it is used in the presence of the accused ?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). There might be evidence given before a judge and jury that was not taken in the preliminary examination at all, an entirely new witness. What formality would you have to show it was the same evidence given before ?

Mr. POWELL. That would be a matter of identification by the judge or the stenographer.

Mr. BRITTON. I think these words will cover that: 'Includes the evidence of a witness given at any former trial upon the same charge.'

Amendment agreed to.

On section 744,

Mr. POWELL. I would move that section 744 be amended as follows :

By repealing subsections 1 and 2 thereof and substituting the following:

744. If the court refuses to reserve the question, the party applying may move the court of appeal as hereinafter provided.

2. The Attorney General or party so applying may, on notice of motion to be given to the accused or prosecutor, as the case may be, move the court of appeal for leave to appeal. The court of appeal may, upon the motion and upon considering such evidence (if any), as they think fit to require, grant or refuse such leave.

The point is this: The law as it stands requires an application to be made to the Attorney General; he gives his consent for application to be made to the court of appeal to determine whether they will entertain a motion to appeal or not; and then, a third application is made to the court of appeal to allow the appeal. This amendment does away with one of these proceedings. I have been asked by several members of the Bar of the province of New Brunswick to have this done, because experience has shown that the Attorney General is rather convinced that he is right, and is sometimes rather averse to granting appeals, as he wants to vindicate his own judgment, which might be overturned on appeal. So, complaint is made of the existing state of affairs and they want application made to the court of appeal in the first instance for leave to appeal. I think that the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will agree with the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) and myself that this amendment should pass. Take, for instance, the case of a man convicted of receiving stolen goods or of stealing goods—if he is sued civilly, where he is only responsible for the value of the goods and some incidental damages, then, he can appeal; but if he is convicted in a criminal case, where he is liable to be sent to penitentiary, and it is far more important to him that he should get the benefit of the law, if any, in his favour, he is not entitled to appeal. This is one of those traditions from the Dark Ages when criminals were not given the same degree of fair-play that men were given in a civil case, and the quicker it is put on some good civilized basis, the better for the reputation of our country. The matter was brought forward by the hon. member for Kingston, and, certainly, I think the lawyers of the House will agree that this ought to pass without amendment or modification.

Mr. BRITTON. I was not able to follow exactly the section as read by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) to know whether it was just the same as the one I moved.

Mr. POWELL. It was the same.

Mr. BRITTON. I think it is important that it should pass. And, in addition to what has been said, I may say that I suppose the Attorney General, in most cases, would grant leave to apply, and that is all that the section provides for. It would still remain with the court to say whether leave should be granted or not. But there are many cases where, perhaps, it is most important for the accused that he should be allowed to appeal, while it may be of comparatively little importance to the public. For instance, in a case which is not a serious one from the public point of view, not a case of murder or the larceny of a large amount of money, it yet may be a matter of great importance to the accused. In all such cases, the Attorney General, ordinarily, gets his information of the case from the local prosecuting attorney, and he might be led to think that leave to appeal should not be granted. The administration of justice is fully protected by the accused being required to get the leave of the court. I do not think it should be put upon the accused that he should first get the leave of the Attorney General to apply and then get the leave of the court upon a formal application.

The amendment, as I understand it, is striking out the leave of the Attorney General.

Mr. POWELL moved that section 744 of the Criminal Code be amended by repealing subsections 1 and 2 thereof, and substituting the following :

If the court refuses to reserve the question, the party applying may move the court of appeal as hereinafter provided.

2. The Attorney General or parties so applying on notice of motion to be given to the accused or prosecutor, or as the case may be, move the court of appeal for leave to appeal. The court of appeal may, upon the motion and upon considering such evidence (if any) as they think fit to require, grant or refuse such leave.

Mr. BRITTON. Would it not be better to strike out the clause altogether and re-enact a new clause as amended ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Section 744 of the Criminal Code will now read as follows :

If the court refuses to reserve the question, the party applying may, with the leave in writing of the Attorney General, move the court of appeal as hereinafter provided.

Then will follow the subsections proposed by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). Then, the remaining sections remain as they are. There is another amendment suggested by the junior member for Halifax, but, as he is not prepared to discuss that now, the committee could allow the clause to stand and take it up at another period.

Mr. POWELL. What about that clause covering an assault ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am willing to adopt the hon. member's suggestion with reference to that. I move that section 864 of the Criminal Code be amended by substituting the following therefor :

864. Whenever any person is charged with common assault, any justice may summarily hear and determine the charge.

(a) If the justice finds the assault complained of to have been accompanied by an attempt to commit some other indictable offence, or is of opinion that the same is, from any other circumstances, a fit subject for prosecution by indictment, he shall abstain from any adjudication thereupon, and shall deal with the case in all respects in the same manner as if he had no authority finally to hear and determine the same.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). There is an amendment to clause 526 of the Criminal Code. I propose that the following clauses a and b are added :

(a) Every money-lender is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year or a penalty not exceeding $100 who lends money at a rate of interest greater than 10 per cent per annum.

(b) The expression money-lender shall include any person who carries on the business of money-lending or any party who announces himself or holds himself out in any way as carrying on that business, and who makes a practice of lending money at a higher rate than 10 per cent per annum, but shall not comprise registered pawnbrokers.

I would move to reinstate in section 205 the section of the Bill introduced in the Senate, as it was first introduced in that body, and which I think is better than the change made subsequently in the Senate. The clauses I have proposed are those which were first introduced in the Senate. It will be remembered that there was a Bill introduced in the Senate last year, and which passed that body, containing the two clauses I have given notice of ; but which we had not time in this House to pass. They are again before the Senate this year ; and if passed, there will be no need of these amendments, but I propose them in case they should meet the same fate as they did last year.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The amendment will stand.

On section 934,

Mr. GILMOUR. This section provides that any boy of, or under, the age of sixteen years and above the age of ten years, who is convicted of an offence, for which a sentence of imprisonment for a period of three months, or longer, but less than five years, may be imposed upon an adult convicted of a like offence, may, in lieu of, or in addition to, any punishment which may otherwise be awarded for such offence, be sentenced to be privately whipped by a constable in the presence of the convicting magistrate, and also of the parent or guardian of the boy, if he desires to be present. I am one of those who do not think that whipping is a good corrective for a boy, or yet a man. There is another feature of this clause that I like less. The person to whom this punishment is entrusted, is a most important feature of the punishment. I do not think that some of the magistrates that we have, are fit persons to be entrusted with punishments of any kind, and they certainly are not fit persons to be entrusted with the responsibility of saying that a boy, or a man, shall be corporally punished. Further, the Bill says that the punishment shall be inflicted in the presence of the parents. I think that the punishment meted out to the man, or the boy, is more severe on the parents, or the friends of the one upon whom it is inflicted.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I think that so far as the boy is concerned, the hon. member for East Middlesex is right. But I think that one of the best correctives that can be administered to a criminal, is to whip him, and to whip him publicly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not a boy.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). No, I think the line should be drawn at a boy, although there are cases in which nothing but a whipping will help a boy. Take that case at Toronto, the other day. Supposing that boy had not succeeded in killing his father, I do not know of any more salutary punishment for that boy, than to be whipped every three months for a year or two. But it is only in extreme cases that such a punishment should be inflicted. In dealing with criminals, I think we are far too lenient and I think if they were publicly whipped it would have a good effect. I saw the salutary effect of dealing with criminals publicly in Dawson City. There, justice is administered in a way that tells. It does not matter who the man is. Men who come up to Dawson City and break the law, gamblers and others, are fined heavily and sent to jail, not to jail in the way in which they are sent here, but they are simply taken out and made to saw wood two or three weeks in the presence of the public, and the humiliation of it has more terror for them than all the conjured places of future punishment would have. There are many cases in which persons are led in a more innocent way than others into crime, but if a person, for instance, commits an indecent assault, I know of no more salutary punishment than for that person, before the whole community, to be whipped. As far as boys are concerned, I think it is a cruel suggestion, to say that he may be whipped in the presence of his parents, as if they were to go out on a holiday to see their child whipped. It has a very bad influence, and to even suggest that the parent shall be present to see an amusement of that kind, is something that cannot be acceptable to us.

Mr. GILMOUR. Then, when that punishment is put into the hands of such men as we have administering justice, it is worse yet. Many of the magistrates who are acting as such, for the mere purpose of making a living, and who know nothing of justice, or yet of the law, are altogether unfit to be entrusted with this authority. I think it is a most serious thing that they should be entrusted with such punishment, as I, for one, believe, is not proper to be inflicted for almost any offence.

Mr. FLINT. I think that this clause is to meet cases of what are called incorrigible boys—boys whose parents cannot do anything with them. Of course, I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Gilmour), that there are a great many magistrates to whom it would be dangerous to entrust this power. I know of cases in which, with the consent of the parents, boys have been whipped, rather than be dealt with by the magistrate, and this mode of punishment has been very useful. There are boys, that, if this class of punishment be imposed upon them, it would be a very excellent thing. The object is that a boy can be punished severely enough to impress his mind as well as to impress the mind of those who are aware of the punishment. The other alternative is also a painful one, and it is that the boy goes into prison for from three to ten months, where all the influences are against him, and the hon. gentleman can easily see that there might be many occasions on which a good, smart whipping would have sufficient effect, while the other punishment might possibly make the boy worse than ever.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough).

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think there is a great deal in the objection which has been made by the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Gilmour). There are two reasons why you inflict punishment; one is a matter of revenge, if I may so term it, and the other is for its corrective influence in order to make the boy better. If a man is a hardened criminal, such as the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), referred to, I do not think there is any more effective punishment than a public whipping, and I think under these circumstances, it is in the best interests of society to inflict such a punishment.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). And in the best interests of the man himself.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And of the man himself. In a case of indecent assault, I think it ought to be applied more frequently than it is. But, here is the case of a boy of the age of sixteen years.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And under the age of sixteen years, too.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, it applies to the case of a boy from ten to sixteen years of age, which makes it all the worse. It is a monstrous thing to place in the hands of any magistrate the power of possibly ruining a boy for life of from ten to sixteen years of age, by ordering that that boy shall be publicly whipped.

Mr. FLINT. The whipping is private.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It will soon become public if it is under the law. Once a boy is whipped for an offence by a constable, I think there is very little chance of reclaiming that boy. His conscience is seared, all his respect for himself is gone, and if a boy loses self-respect, and if he is not able to hold the good opinion of his seniors, and of his associates, there is not much hope for him. He is jeered at, as the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster), says, by his associates, he is practically an outcast, because we all know that the term 'publicly whipped' is a term of reproach that not one can stand up against in society at the present time. Then, it says that the instrument to be used shall be, if practicable, a birch rod. Well, it appears to me that this is getting back a good many years.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). You and I got it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Sad and tender memories.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have tender memories, and I think we all have. But, we have advanced from the birch rod to more artistic and less humiliating forms of punishment, and I think it is beneath the dignity of the parliament of Canada to say that a birch rod shall be brought back again, as a means of public punishment, especially of a boy. I do not think that the hon. Solicitor General can do better than drop this clause.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We will have to consider it carefully. It was introduced in the Senate, in the original Bill.

Mr. GILMOUR. The Senate are followers of the old school.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). And there is no man there who would ever be punished in that way. There are no boys in the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. Young boys in the Senate! Where is the young boy from Sunbury eighty-eight years of age?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You must remember that, perhaps, the old boys have spared the rod less than we do, and have spoiled more children.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Solicitor General is behind the age. The experience is that the most successful management of childhood is the keeping furthest away from these offensive forms of punishment that were used years ago. There can be no question about it that the effect is beneficial so far as our schools are concerned, compared with twenty-five years ago.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). And our homes too.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, and our homes too. I am sorry that the Solicitor General thinks that the same form of punishment that was meted out to him most severely, and that failed to make him a very excellent boy, is deserved by boys nowadays.

Mr. QUINN. While I do not subscribe to any of the mawkish sentiment prevalent as regards the treatment of prisoners, yet we ought be careful about introducing whipping, especially in the case of young boys. I can imagine cases where whipping ought be inflicted.

Mr. MONTAGUE. On hardened criminals.

Mr. QUINN. Yes. For example, the crime of attacks on females is unfortunately quite prevalent in some parts of the country, and I think whipping ought be inflicted in cases of that kind. Another case would be where any particular crime is prevalent in a particular district, and it ought to be left to the discretion of the judge to inflict the punishment. But to say that a boy of fourteen or sixteen years old ought be whipped for some paltry offence is not proper. The whipping of such a boy either privately or publicly, instead of being a deterrent, would certainly degrade the boy so low that society could not hope for anything from him in the future. It would be the greatest mistake in the world for us to introduce anything of this kind into our law. I would like to see whipping introduced in the cases of attacks on females and garroting, and I would like, if possible, if some means could be used through the Department of Justice or otherwise to impress upon the judges of our country the necessity of inflicting the punishment of whipping in many of these cases, but certainly not to introduce it in the case of boys.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not share the sentimental objection often heard against whipping as a punishment for certain crimes. I believe that for certain crimes there is no more deterrent punishment than whipping. In this clause introduced by the Senate, it should be provided that the punishment of whipping could only be inflicted by discreet and experienced judges. But here you place it in the hands of magistrates who often have no judicial discretion, and who may be called upon spasmodically to exercise their duties.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And sometimes influenced by local considerations.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, living in isolated localities and more liable to be influenced by local and sometimes, unfortunately, personal considerations, which are not possible to judges sitting in open court. I object to give these magistrates power to inflict this punishment of whipping upon boys between ten and sixteen years old. For my part, before I assent to a clause of that kind, I would like the offences specified, and the court which can fix the punishment specified.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I share in that idea. I know incorrigible boys, that nothing less than a whipping would suit, but under this section boys that ought not be whipped may be so punished. Greater harm would be done by trying to catch one bad boy out of twenty, than if you allowed all the others to escape this punishment. I know that magistrates often carry their personal prejudices very far. Suppose they have a quarrel with the father, and they cannot lick him, they may say: I have the boy, and I will punish him. Although this House is composed of members of the highest intelligence, there is not a gentleman in the House who could not point out the man whom he would like his boy to be whipped by. If that be the case here, you can see what might occur amongst justices of the peace in rural districts. I say nothing against them, but I know of no persons but judges of the Supreme Court who ought to be allowed to inflict the punishment of whipping, and they would not do it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And in a court of that kind, you would have it open to the criticism of the press.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). We ought not to pass this section. There may be a little animus in it as coming from the Senate, and they may have had their eyes on some boys they would like to see whipped.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And this section does not specify the offences for which whipping should be inflicted.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Yes. If boys go into an orchard and steal apples, that is entirely another thing from boys breaking into a house and stealing, but a magistrate might say the law made no distinction. A boy may steal apples, which, of course, is wrong, but most boys do it in their young days if they get a chance.

Mr. FLINT. It seems to be the general view of the committee that this clause should not pass, and I therefore move that it be struck out.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I second that.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BRITTON. Perhaps I ought to be satisfied, as a matter of compromise, that the Bill as now before the committee contains half of the amendments suggested by my Bill No. 28, but there are two or three clauses in that latter Bill that I would like the Solicitor General to consider. Let me point out what these are. Section 684, subsection c requires some additional evidence to that of one witness. I suggest that section 189, which relates to an offence committed upon an imbecile or insane woman, be excepted from that provision. In such a case the offence must be proved by some person other than the person herself, and yet if there were an eye-witness to the offence, it would be impossible to secure a conviction unless his evidence were corroborated.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What about the evidence of an eye-witness and the evidence of a physician?

Mr. BRITTON. It has been held time and time again that the corroboration must be with reference to the material part of the charge.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough).

Mr. MONTAGUE. Suppose you have the evidence of an eye-witness as to the act, and then the evidence of a physician as to such an act having been committed?

Mr. BRITTON. You might not have the evidence of a medical man.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It would be very difficult for such a crime to be committed without there being some traces of it, the evidence as to which would to my mind be material. I think the hon. gentleman is going a long way in his amendment. He does not point out to the committee that there is any great crying need for this change. I do not think he has cited any cases where difficulty has arisen for the want of it; at least, it is not a common difficulty.

Mr. BRITTON. It is not a common difficulty. I know it has arisen in one case.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think the House should make such a change because of one case. It would be opening the door to blackmail.

Mr. BRITTON. I will abandon it if the feeling of the committee is against me.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There might be cases of exceptional hardship such as the hon. member for Kingston has hinted at. It is not proper that the public should be at the mercy of designing individuals who might lay complaints in ordinary cases of this kind; but in the case of an imbecile or insane woman or girl, who could not give evidence, even if there were an eye-witness to the offence, it would be impossible to secure a conviction.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That eye-witness might be perjuring himself to wreak revenge on the man charged?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is the difficulty, of course; but at the same time it is possible that what I suggest might occur.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend the Solicitor General sees that there is always some corroborative evidence required, but in these exceptions, such corroboration would not be required.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would not agree to accept the change off-hand, but at the same time it is worth considering.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The section covers imbeciles and deaf and dumb women. The second class can give evidence, and if you remove the necessity for corroborative evidence, any man would be at the mercy of any one of these people.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The difficulties are as great in the one case as in the other. A perfectly innocent person may have had an assault committed on her and testify to it, but if her evidence is not corroborative she cannot obtain any redress. We will let that stand.

On section 789,

Mr. BRITTON. Under this section a magistrate can try summarily the actual theft of an amount not exceeding ten dollars, but where there is only an attempt to commit theft, there is no limitation. If the Solicitor General will consent, I would move that in the case of an attempt to commit theft, the value should also be limited to ten dollars.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Take the case of a pickpocket, he would be attempting to take whatever he could get.

Mr. BRITTON. But take the case of breaking into a bank, the intention would be to steal a good deal more than ten dollars.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. How do you know?

Mr. BRITTON. There could be no doubt about it in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, and there would be no difficulty in determining the amount in the case of an attempt to commit theft any more than in an actual theft.

Mr. RUSSELL. I wish to move an amendment giving the date on which this Act would come into operation. There are a great many changes in our Criminal Code made by it, and some little time should be given the legal profession and the public to become acquainted with these changes before putting them into operation.

Mr. POWELL. I know of a very humorous case which illustrates the necessity of this proposed amendment. The New Brunswick Supreme Court, which was one of the ablest courts in Canada at the time, gravely went to work and quashed nineteen convictions, in entire ignorance of the provisions of a statute which had not at the time got into the hands of the judges. Fortunately, somebody had a copy of the Gazette, and showed it to the judges and thus saved our courts from serious reflection.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would suggest that it do not come into operation before the first of January.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This Bill to amend the Criminal Code was introduced in the Senate by the Minister of Justice, and I would not like to add this amendment without previously consulting him.

Mr. MacLAREN. Before the committee rises, I would like to ask the hon. Solicitor General if he has considered Bill No. 62.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is the Bill introduced by my hon. friend providing for the punishment of those who go into lodging houses and then leave them secretly without paying. I am afraid that he is asking us to go a little too far when he asks us to make that an indictable offence, punishable by three months' imprisonment.

Mr. MacLAREN. With all due deference to the opinion of the hon. gentleman, I think that this amendment should be accepted if possible. There are many cases in which lodging house keepers are defrauded by people going to them and then leaving before paying their bills, after they have lived in them several weeks. I know of a case in my own town which shows the necessity for some measure of this kind. A man came off the train and took up his lodgings in a boarding house. But, during one Sunday evening, when the landlady was away at church, he packed his grips and left the place, leaving unpaid a bill for five weeks' board, thus defrauding this poor widow who was keeping a boarding house to maintain herself and her children. There was another case in one of the hotels in our town. A man came and stopped seven weeks. He had a trunk, which he did not take with him when he left, as he did very unceremoniously and without paying his bill. After waiting for some time, the hotelkeeper opened the trunk and found it filled with books for the blind. I thought that was a pretty good blind.—at any rate the man got away without paying his board. I think that if this Bill were passed, it would frighten this class of people and prevent frauds of this kind. These hotelkeepers and boarding house keepers should be protected in some way.

Mr. DAVIN. I would urge the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) to consider my hon. friend's (Mr. MacLaren's) Bill. There was a case in the North-west Territories of a man stopping at one of our leading hotels and shipping without paying the bills, leaving behind him some boxes. But when opened, the boxes were found to be filled with bricks. There are certainly cases calling for legislation, as proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. MacLaren).

Mr. FLINT. I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. MacLaren) if he has consulted any counsel or taken any steps to ascertain if the cases he referred to are not fairly well provided for under the present law?

Mr. POWELL. That against obtaining goods under false pretenses?

Mr. FLINT. It seems to me that the cases mentioned might possibly be reached under the present law, but I would not like to give a definite opinion without further considering it.

Mr. RUSSELL. Unless the case is covered by some section of the existing code, I am entirely in favour of the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. MacLaren). It is not sufficient to say that we are providing for one case. If we can conceive or imagine of a case as possible, this is the time to provide for it. Of course, our system has been based upon the principle of never providing for a case until that case occurred—let people fall into the ditch before you make provision to keep them out. But the modern theory of legislation is to anticipate these and provide against them. Even if we know of no actual cases, it would be entirely proper for us to provide for those that we can think of as likely to occur. Very ingenious devices have been resorted to, to accomplish the destruction of the hotel-keepers. In the Criminal Code as it exists, we find a number of special cases already provided for. I think it ought to be our endeavour, as much as possible, not to let every private member who has a Bill before the House struggle with it as best he can, but, now that we have this general amending Act before us, we should receive suggestions and, if they are found to be good, should make them part of the law. I think that is exactly what we are here for. Instead of discouraging suggestions that are brought forward, wherever there is a suggestion that has the semblance of value, it ought to be carefully considered. There will be cases arise that we cannot think of now: but, if we provide for those that we can think of, it is manifest we shall make our legislation all the better.

Mr. FLINT. I see that it can hardly be claimed that this case referred to by my hon. friend is covered by sections 356 and 358 by the code. But section 362 provides:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to six months' imprisonment, who, by means of any false ticket or order, or of any other ticket or order, fraudulently and unlawfully obtains or attempts to obtain any passage on any carriage, tramway or railway, or in any steam or other vessel.

If the law provides for a case of that kind, I do not see why the criminal law should not be used for the protection of proprietors of boarding houses and hotels. I favour the inclusion of my hon. friend's (Mr. MacLaren's) Bill.

Mr. POWELL. So far as the section cited by my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) is concerned and the sections relating to obtaining money under false pretenses, there is a well defined distinction between those cases thus covered and the one now under discussion. These are all based on fraud. Fraud involves a misrepresentation of a fact. Intention is not an expression of fact. When a man goes to a hotel, if he misrepresents the facts—says, for instance, that he has money to pay his board bill when he has not, and obtains board on the strength of that misrepresentation, that might possibly be held to be obtaining victuals under false pretenses. But in the case cited by my hon. friend (Mr. Flint), the presentation of a false ticket involves the implied representation that it is a genuine ticket, and is an effort to obtain something by false pretenses. It is true that in the cases sought to be met by the Bill of the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. MacLaren) the victims are often women keeping boarding houses, who are not used to business and are imposed upon by shrewd sharpers; and it would almost seem that these cases should be compassed by the criminal law in some way. I admit that it is stretching the criminal law to such an extent as has never been done before.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Other debtors might be equally regarded as criminals.

Mr. POWELL. Yes; there is no essential difference between getting credit for board and getting credit generally. The fact that a man gets credit and is unable to pay his bill, it does not subject him to criminal prosecution unless he has misrepresented some fact on the strength of which credit has been given. It is opening up what has hitherto been exclusively the territory of the civil law to the criminal law.

Mr. FLINT. The fact of a trunk being taken into a hotel or boarding house or hotel which looks like a trunk full of clothing, is equivalent in its way to the presentation of a false ticket on a railway. It is taken, in a general way, as assurance that the traveller has the wherewithal to meet an ordinary board bill. The landlord thinks he has security for the bill, but when the boarder leaves unceremoniously and the trunk is opened, it is found to be filled with the proverbial bricks. I think that the principle of my hon. friend's (Mr. MacLaren's) Bill is precisely the same as that involved in this section against the presentation of a false ticket on a railway. With the majority of these people who defraud hotelkeepers it is impossible to reach them by civil process. When the loss is discovered, they are beyond the jurisdiction, and they have no property to respond to civil action.

Mr. QUINN. Does not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Flint) think that this is covered by the provision against obtaining goods under false pretenses?

Mr. DAVIN. It would be very easy to construct a clause that would obviate the possibility of bringing within it a man who is not a criminal. But when a man goes to a hotel and has two or three trunks, supposedly filled with good clothes, on the apparent security of which he is treated well, and remains for a week or fortnight and then goes away leaving his bill unpaid, and the trunks are found to be filled with brick, it is perfectly clear that he has used false pretenses to gain board and lodging.

Mr. RUSSELL. There is no danger of a man being prosecuted as a criminal because he is poor, under the proposed amendment. It is the intention to defraud that is the gravamen of the charge, and it would have to be proved to the satisfaction of the jury that convicts, that there had been that intention. There is no possibility, it seems to me, of maintaining the argument that you are amending the criminal law in such a way as to punish a man for being poor.

Mr. QUINN. There was a case in the town of St. John, in the province of Quebec, where a man under the law as it stands to-day, was indicted for obtaining goods by false pretenses. He was convicted, and upon appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench in Montreal, the conviction was maintained. He had gone to the hotel and brought a trunk with him, and left without paying his bill. He left after a week, and it was found there was nothing in the trunk. Now take the other view of the case. Suppose a man goes to a hotel and has several trunks and remains for several weeks, or two months. The hotelkeeper is so dilatory that he makes no demand for payment, but, at the end of two weeks he drags this man to the criminal court and charges him with having obtained goods under false pretenses under this Act. It seems stretching the criminal law very far, and if you pass the Act as it is to-day, you are going to put a man in that position. There is a vast difference between that case and the case of a man who goes as a transient visitor to a hotel. The difficulty is in making this apply to boarding house and hotel keepers generally, because you put it in the power of a boarding house keeper who has not been paid for board for a couple of months, to arrest any of his boarders and send them to prison for having obtained goods under false pretenses. But where the law has been construed by the Court of Queen's Bench in Quebec to apply, is where a man goes to a hotel, presumably as a transient visitor, and there obtains, on the strength of the baggage that he has with him, board for a couple of days, he lights out without paying his board bill. He has evidently gone there with the intention of paying that board in the security of what is supposed to be in that trunk. He has done it with the intent to defraud, and was convicted under the law as it stands to-day.

Mr. RUSSELL. My suggestion was, that we ought not to adopt this if it is already provided for in the code, and that is the whole question. If it is not provided for in the code, it is a very proper subject of legislation, and the section ought to be submitted to the draughtsman of the code for his judgment about it. I do not think it is right in any case to accept a clause drafted by one hand and incorporate in it a piece of work done by another hand, because you are bound to have the work badly done. I think this clause is one of sufficient importance for the Solicitor General to take up and see if it is already covered by a provision.

Mr. POWELL. So far as food is concerned, that is covered by Acts dealing with false pretenses, and this may be provided for by the criminal law now. Then, the first section is covered. The new matter is the lodging and other accommodation, that is not provided for by the statute. Now, as respects section 2:

Proof that such person obtained such accommodation by false pretense, or by false pretense as to baggage, or that he absconded or left the premises without paying or offering to pay for such accommodation, or that he surreptitiously removed or attempted to remove his baggage, shall be prima facie proof of the fraudulent intent mentioned in subsection 1 of this section.

There is no change in the law there. In the first place it is applying it to other subject matter; in the second place, it declares it to be prima facie evidence. The only difference between that and the law as it now stands is this, that the jury can take that and infer from it. Well, that may be the only effect that is given to it by declaring it to be prima facie evidence. If you take that view, there is no change except the extension of the principle. There is an English case in which it was decided and upheld on appeal by the twelve judges that intention is a fact. If a man misrepresents his intention, that is a fact which can be the basis of a complaint for obtaining money under false pretenses. Here is an illustration. A man goes to a clothing store and gets a suit of clothes. He gives a cheque for the clothes, but he has no money in the bank, and he knows it. That is a clear case of obtaining money by false pretenses, although he says nothing at all about his cheque. Now, take another case which goes a little further. A man goes and gets a suit of clothes, and tells the party that he will be in next morning and pay for it. He does not come next morning. If he bona fide intended at the time to return, there is no fraud, if he did not intend to return at the time, if he misrepresented his intentions, that was called a misrepresentation as to fact, and the party would be punished under the criminal law. It is different from a promise, it is a misrepresentation of a fact, and the fact is, whether the man had a bona fide intention at the time. If he went simply to commit a trick, he could be convicted under that statute.

Mr. QUINN. It is a breach of a promise to perform something in the future.

Mr. POWELL. If it is a mere breach of promise to perform something in the future, it cannot be reached by the criminal law. I agree with the member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) that it is not pushing the law much further than it really is, it is simply extending it to cases that are not now covered.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the Solicitor General is going to consider this question, there is an interesting case mentioned in Burbidge's book on the Code. The authorities are rather against the view taken by my hon. and learned friend as to the condition of the law now. Here is a case altogether similar to the subject we have been discussing, the case of Regina and Gardner :

A, by falsely pretending to be a naval officer, induces B to enter into a contract to board and lodge him at a guinea a week, and under this contract is supplied with food for a week. This is not obtaining food by false pretenses, as the supply of food in consequence of the contract is too remotely the result of the false pretense to be the subject of an indictment.

I do not quite catch the reason of the decision in the word 'remotely' ; for instance, whether it means by the false pretense that this weekly contract was made to get the food. It may be that, and it was held there that it was necessary to show that food was got by a false pretense, whereas a contract was obtained, and that was not covered by the language of the code.

Mr. POWELL. In that particular case, you will find, on looking at the facts, that the woman or hotelkeeper who gave the credit was perfectly willing to trust him whether he was a naval officer or not, and the case failed because the fraud was not the means of obtaining the accommodation.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is not the statement of the case.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It says that it is not obtaining food by false pretenses, and these are the reasons given:

A, by falsely pretending to be a naval officer, induces B to enter into a contract to board and lodge him at a guinea a week, and under this contract is supplied with food for a week. This is not obtaining food by false pretenses, as the supply of food in consequence of the contract is too remotely the result of the false pretense to become the subject of an indictment.

Mr. BRITTON. If you push the case any further I suppose you might make it apply to a lady who is well dressed, and who wears jewels, going in and getting credit in a store to whom the storekeeper gives credit on the appearance of the woman, her dress and belongings.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It seems to me that the Bill simply makes it criminal for every boarder throughout the country not to pay his board.

Mr. FLINT. No.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, it makes it criminal for any person to be at a hotel, or a boarding house, without paying his board bill. The section goes on to provide that there must be an intent to defraud, and the second subsection expressly provides that not paying a hotel bill shall be prima facie evidence of an intent to defraud. So that a person who does not pay his board shall be liable to indictment. I do not see why any special criminal law should be made applicable to boarders who enter into a contract with boarding house keepers. If any special circumstances of a criminal nature mentioned by the hon. member for St. Ann's division of Montreal (Mr. Quinn) arise, the Criminal Code, as at present framed, covers them, but in ordinary cases if boarding house lodgers happen to be behind in their board, and are unable to pay, to make the fact of their being unable to pay, an offence under the Criminal Code is pushing the thing to an extremity. If the Criminal Code, as at present framed, covers all reasonable cases, I do not see why the criminal law should be invoked to apply to the ordinary case of a boarder failing to pay his board, and I think such cases may be very well left as they are. There are not a great many cases that we have heard of. You cannot make the Criminal Code apply to all commercial dealings between one man and another, but we are going so far now, that it will be a criminal offence to buy or sell or do anything. I think we are going altogether too far in the direction of designating everything as a criminal act for a failure to perform a contract. I think in making such thing a breach of the criminal law, we are going too far. It does not commend itself to my mind, unless there are some stronger arguments advanced than I have yet heard, to make it a criminal offence for a boarding house lodger not to pay his board.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. After listening to the discussion that has taken place, I cannot see that I can very well change my mind as I expressed it at the beginning. We must not make a criminal court a debt-collecting court. That must be guarded against, but in looking at this Bill it seems that the first portion of the Bill would provide for the punishment of any one, having gone to a boarding house, or a hotel, who, after a certain time, left without paying his bill. The second part provides that if the man goes with an apparently well-filled trunk, and as a result of his being in possession of this trunk succeeds in obtaining credit he comes under the classification of having obtained money under false pretenses. I would be disposed to agree that he should come under the clause of obtaining money under false pretenses if it is that the law does not now provide for this, then we may provide some amendment to meet that case, which is certainly one of special hardship, because we have to take into account that a hotel-keeper is not in the same position as the ordinary man who sells goods. He is obliged to receive any person who chances to come to his hotel.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not without pay.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, not without pay; he may fix the terms of payment as he chooses. But, the law provides that if a man comes to him he has a lien on the goods of the man who comes to his hotel. If a man comes to a hotel and brings what is apparently a well-filled trunk, upon the faith of which a hotelkeeper allows him to remain there, being under the impression that he would have a right to collect his money out of the goods contained in the trunk and the goods are not there, it strikes me that if the criminal law does not reach that case there should be some provision for it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That would not apply to the case of a boarding house keeper at all. The boarding house keeper is not licensed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, but the man who is licensed is obliged to receive any person.

Mr. MacLAREN. I think the hardship is that there are lots of landladies who have lost their husbands who start boarding houses, and who are trying to make their living in that way. They are not business women, and they are not able to protect their interests. People go to their houses for four or five weeks, and then do not pay them. I think something should be done to provide for the protection of these landladies. It is not so serious for business men who are selling goods over the counter. But people take advantage of poor widows and others who are keeping boarding houses. I think the point should be considered very seriously, because it is an important matter.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Chairman, before you rise, I should like, with the view of helping the hon. Solicitor General to a decision as to the amendment to section 179, to tell him that since we were discussing that I have looked up some matters referring to it. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) made a statement, in the course of the debate, that a clause, as I suggested, was actually in the penal code of New York, and that notwithstanding that such a clause was in the penal code of New York, it was not possible to convict the actress and manager who put Sappho on the stage. I have in my hand the New York Penal Code, and as a fact, it has no clause whatever in it that would apply to such theatrical exhibitions as we seek to suppress. I will hand it over to the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). The United States and Canada are the only two civilized countries north of the equator, in which there is no supervision of the theatre. England, I suppose, will not yield to other countries in regard for liberty; liberty or public liberty of exhibition, liberty of the subject in all respects, but in England, from time immemorial, the theatre has been under supervision, and is to this day under the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain. In France, we know that the government is intimately connected with the theatre, and in consequence of the interest the government takes in the management of one theatre in Paris, the Theatre Francais, you have had in that theatre for centuries, the highest drama represented. To this day, a girl who plays the smallest part in a role on the boards of that theatre, is an artist. Everything from the strongest part to the smallest detail of the caste, is regulated so that the tout ensemble is perfect, and all is related to a general conception. I have not the least doubt that that would be impossible but for the fact that the government of France, recognizing the immense importance of the theatre in the social and artistic progress of the community, has endowed that theatre, and has supervised it up to the present time. I have had a number of letters written to me since the discussion in the House recently, and some of them coming from some of the most eminent men in Canada. I have had a letter, amongst others, showing the interest in this question, from a man that in his line, stands on the pinnacle of culture and intellectual power—Mr. Goldwin Smith—who has done me the favour of giving me his views. The papers in the United States have taken this question up, and I have editorials from them which, with the permission of the Solicitor General, in order to help him to give a decision, I will read to the committee. This is from the Bridgeport Union:

The Revolt Against Vile Plays—Stop the Nasty Farces.

(Bridgeport 'Union'.)

There is one field in which the managerial hand has been allowed to great freedom—with too ready tolerance by the public. There is ample scope for the efforts of the true reformers who have at heart the real interests of the playhouse—they should get to work to 'squelch' the nasty French farces, which while sometimes slightly cleansed in the translating process, still retain sufficient of the venom of lasciviousness to exclude them from presentations outside the brothel. The trouble was bad enough in 'The Foundling' and 'The Gay Parisians,' but worse and worse it became with each succeeding play. There was 'Never Again,' which told of the happenings in an assignation house; 'The Proper Caper,' which treated of the efforts of an artist's model to create in a mild-mannered old man something of her own sort of animal passion; 'A Night Session,' which presented a brothel rendezvous—and its outcome; 'The Conquerors,' wherein was shown an attempted criminal assault upon a country girl; 'Zaza,' which tells how a mistress rebukes her lover because he does not prefer her lewd affection to that of his wife; 'The Cuckoo,' 'Make Way for the Ladies,' 'Wheels Within Wheels,' 'The Degenerates,' and so on—all follow along equally suggestive lines.

We had 'The Degenerates' here a few evenings ago. I did not go to see it. I would not go on two grounds, first: I would not sanction the play, and for other reasons I would not sanction the representation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I was glad to learn that the offensiveness of 'The Degenerates' was, as represented in Ottawa, absolutely minimized.

An hon. MEMBER. Did you see it?

Mr. DAVIN. No, but it was reported to me by a person I have confidence in. At the same time, from the incidents connected with it—I will not dwell upon them, because I cannot do so without making personal remarks—there were incidents connected with the play of 'The Degenerates' here, which were not creditable to some of the society people. I continue to quote:

'The Surprises of Love' told of a man and woman being locked in the same hotel room over night, and being discovered next morning by the woman's fiancée. 'The Girl from Maxim's' was close to the limit—and that limit has apparently been reached in Coralie & Co. (now running in New York, and against which no efforts at suppression have yet been directed) and which admittedly eclipses in suggestive immorality any of the foregoing examples of stage offerings.

The Fountain Head of Filth.
(Chicago 'Tribune.')

All the filthy farces of Gallic importation have New York for the starting point of their American travels—and they start with laudatory press notices as a part of their equipment. There is running in New York at this moment a farce so vile that its action cannot be described in print—that is, outside of New York. It is not being played. 'Zaza,' which is as bad as 'Sapho,' did not inspire a Gotham spasm, newspaper or otherwise. If New Yorkers actually desire light on the source of stage depravity of the day they have only to look into the workings of a speculative mechanism—headquarters New York—behind which stands a manager who with one hand writes that he 'presents an actress who never appeared in a part offensive to public morals,' and who with the other pens an endorsement of one of the most evil-smelling farces of the season. Under the title, 'Lewdness on the stage—the flood of filth in the theatre and who is chiefly responsible for it,' 'The Dramatic Mirror' publishes a list of fifteen plays of production within the last five years—seven of them within the year—for which this influence is directly responsible. The list includes 'On and Off,' 'The Conquerors,' 'The Cuckoo,' 'The Girl from Maxim's,' and 'Make Way for the Ladies.'

The Evil Should be Fought.
(Rochester 'Democrat and Chronicle.')

The public can put a stop to stage indecency if it chooses to take the trouble. There is plenty of law to reach this evil, and the officials whose duty it is to enforce the law can be moved to do so. Persistent resort to the law, whenever and wherever an attempt is made to present such theatrical exhibitions as 'Sapho,' will end by effectually discouraging them. We are regarding 'Sapho' solely as a typical case. We have no desire that Miss Nethersole shall be specially persecuted. She is no worse offender nor more conspicuous offender than others against whom the law has not been invoked.

Mr. DAVIN.

There is Mr. Charles Frohman, who during the last five years has 'presented' at least fifteen plays probably quite as objectionable as 'Sapho,' unmolested and almost unrebuked. There is the New York Casino, every one of whose productions for years past has been more or less in violation of public decency. We hope soon to read that 'Coralie & Co.' has been 'raided' by the police. We hope that the law will be impartially brought to bear on all offenders against it, in New York and in every city in the country where there is an ordinance relating to public morality and a police force. We want to see this evil fought earnestly and persistently with more efficient weapons than talk.

As the success or failure of all drama in the United States is supposed to hang upon the verdict of the New York theatre-going public, it is well to note from time to time what this arbiter is doing for the elevation of the American stage. It has given its seal and sanction to Mrs. Leslie Carter in 'Zaza,' to Mrs. Langtry in 'The Degenerates,' and to Mrs. Kendal in 'The Second Mrs. Tanqueray.' It has lent a helping hand to 'The Girl from Maxim's,' has giggled over 'Papa's Wife,' and has now accepted Olga Nethersole in 'Sapho.' The New York 'World' is not quite satisfied with this layout of art and moral purity, but suggests the addition of one more play. The star of this is to be the St. Louis young woman with 'drooping blue eyes' and 'a splendid form,' who was arrested the other day, and whose trunks were found to be packed with the proceeds of recent burglaries and highway robberies which had baffled the St. Louis detectives. Her advance agent has already announced that when arrested she exclaimed through her sobs: 'The news of this will kill mother!' Nothing further is needed—except a release from her present engagement—to assure her a brilliant career on the New York stage at the hands of the critical public which is acting as censor for the drama of the theatrical trust.

And, Sir, in our own country 'Bystander'—I do not want to go behind the well-known nom de plume under which a great critic presents his views to the public—on this subject, says:

Mr. Davin is moving for increased restrictions on the Canadian stage. There is room for such legislation without trenching on legitimate freedom. Nobody expects or wants the theatres to be a Sunday school; at the same time, we do not want it to be a vestibule of the brothel. Let it present human nature frankly, but without alluring to vice. That some of the plays and ballets now presented do allure to vice cannot possibly be denied; they, in fact, have no other attraction. Of such ballets especially as are often exhibited the object can only be vicious; probably no other object is intended or even professed. A cultured spectator may possibly be able mentally to separate the grace of motion from the sensual allurement, as he may be able to read a French novel for the art, not for the lubricity. But the mass of spectators are not cultured. These exhibitions often involve the most deplorable degradation of woman, and it is impossible that in the minds of those who have gloated over them respect for the sex should not suffer. We are in danger of descending, though, perhaps, by a somewhat different road, to the level of the infamous drama of the Restoration. If Mr. Davin could strengthen the checks on theatrical posters he would do a further service. We do not want to be squeamish, but beastliness is not manliness or freedom.

It is an advantage which London has hitherto kept over Paris that in Paris things are displayed which in London would be torn down by the police.

Both in Canada and in the United States, have the leading papers taken the same view of this question as I do. I need not say, as 'Bystander' says, that nobody wants squeamishness. What we want is the theatre so regulated as to show that the government of the country has some regard for art and some regard for public morals. As 'Bystander' says, there are some ballets which are simply bestial, in which the degradation of woman is complete. When I was in London, I was accustomed to see the ballet from the Royal Theatre in Denmark. The King of Denmark, as we know, took a great interest in the stage, and the danseuses who came from Denmark, exhibited all the grace and poetry of motion that could delight an artistic eye, with nothing suggestive or degrading, either to the spectator or the artist. Here is a special from London to the New York Sun, of May 16:

In the House of Commons to-day Mr. Samuel Smith, member for Flintshire, raised a discussion of the character of the plays recently placed on the stage in England. He moved for a stricter supervision. He complained that foul, corrupting plays were increasing in London and the provinces. Some of them, were so low, he said, that no honest actor would touch them with a pitchfork. He particularly attacked 'The Gay Lord Quex' and 'Zaza,' the latter recently attended by the Prince of Wales, who presented the star, Mrs. Leslie Carter, to the Princess. Mr. Smith quoted a critic who described 'Zaza' as a display of disgusting ribaldry. He said it was a cruel thing to put a pure woman to play the part of a harlot, yet this was becoming a common thing.

Whether a pure woman is put to play it or not, what about the spectator, and what about the possibility of respectable people taking their wives and daughters or sisters to the theatre and having a dramatic representation placed before them, which could be thus described?

Mr. ELLIS. Where was the English censor then?

Mr. DAVIN. The English censor had not done his duty, but wait until you see what comes later on:

Mr. Smith also attacked 'The Belle of New York,' which he had seen described as of the most vulgar order. The debauchery of the plays produced in London had, according to Mr. Smith, disgusted the American and colonial friends of England. Such plays marked a decline in national life. The speakers who took the opposite view twitted Mr. Smith with accepting his views at second-hand, he having admitted that he had never been in a theatre.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor maintained that the tone of the drama has risen, not sunk. It would be a bad thing, he declared, if it was not possible to show the dark as well as the bright side of life on the stage. Mr. T. G. Bowles asked whether Mr. Smith proposed to make a tour of the picture and sculpture galleries of Europe with his pockets full of fig-leaves, placing them where he thought them appropriate.

Without question, Mr. Bowles showed his ignorance of art. Any man or woman can go to the galleries of sculpture all over Europe and not have any sense of fitness or morality outraged. Take, for instance, the Greek statues, you will see in the Louvre the nude, but, Sir, these are the sculptures of great artists, and a great artist, whether in literature or on the canvas, or on marble, presents the object that he imitates with the most perfect purity. Why, the modern French school of painting, for instance, errs, and why these dramas depart from all true art is because they do not imitate nature. They are suggestive. Take the ballet girls, whose movement on the stage are contortions, and do not imitate anything in nature, are their movements in accord with the ideas of grace? Not at all. They are motivated by a desire to cater to sensual imagination. Nothing can be more refining than to go through the Louvre or the National Gallery. Take the statue of Venus de Medici, a man who can look on that without his sense of beauty receiving that high order of delight which stimulates the intellectual craving for the ideal and thus raises the whole man even morally, would, in my opinion, be constituted on an inferior plan.

Sir Matthew White Ridley, Home Secretary, said in behalf of the government, that it was unable to accept the resolution, but he hoped the debate would have some effect in purifying the stage. He added that he had conferred on the subject with the Lord Chamberlain, who seemed to think that a discussion would strengthen his hands, though Sir Matthew deprecated the declaration that stricter supervision was necessary as casting a reflection on the Lord Chamberlain.

He also opposed Mr. Smith's demand that the licensing of plays be transferred to the municipal bodies. It was, he said, most difficult to decide what play ought and what ought not to be permitted. It should be remembered that an inoffensive play might be made most offensive by the manner of its presentation. He thought that Mr. Smith exaggerated the condition of affairs.

The debate was then adjourned. I say that with the evidences of public opinion that I give the House, both in Canada and below the line—

Mr. BRITTON. I have to leave town, and will the hon. gentleman allow me the favour to make a motion in committee, as he will no doubt go on after recess?

Mr. DAVIN. I was making remarks simply for the benefit of the hon. Solicitor General, and am for the present done.

Mr. BRITTON. I want to make a motion with reference to a matter of great importance in connection with this code. It will be noticed that by the amendment the Court of Appeal in Ontario is changed. Instead of the Divisional Court being a Court of Appeal, the Court of Appeal of Ontario is the one, but there are pending cases before that court, and I want to move an amendment which, I think, the hon. Solicitor General should accept, and it is this:

That nothing in this Act shall affect cases pending at the time of the passing of this Act.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL moved that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

ADMISSION OF CANADIAN SECURITIES ON THE LIST OF BRITISH TRUST FUNDS.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) moved that the return relating to the admission of inscribed stock of Canada to the list of securities in which trustees in Great Britain are authorized to invest trust funds be printed for the use of members, and that Rule 94 be suspended in relation to such return.

The PRIME MINISTER. I thought it was printed. It was a misunderstanding, and I accept the motion.

Motion agreed to.

THE GRAIN BILL.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When does the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue intend to go on with his Grain Bill?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I wanted to go on with it this afternoon, and am ready to go on with it after six o'clock, if hon. gentlemen are anxious to proceed.

The PRIME MINISTER. Perhaps everybody will not be so ready as my hon. friend to proceed with business; and if agreeable to the House, I will move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FOSTER. What will be the business on Monday next?

The PRIME MINISTER. We will try and clear the paper of the government Bills, so as to send as many to the Senate as possible.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 6 p.m.

Mr. BRITTON.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, May 21, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE BANK ACT.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 163) to amend the Bank Act. He said: Perhaps the House will desire, at this stage, that I should offer some explanation of this Bill. The time has arrived when it is necessary that further legislation should be enacted with respect to our banks. It will be generally admitted that the existing Bank Act, so far as it goes, is an excellent one. We think that in the light of experience some additional provisions may be made, but, so far as the present Act goes, I may say that in the main it has worked well, and the House will not expect that there should be any extensive changes in it. The bank charters, under existing legislation, will expire in the year 1901. The main purpose of this Bill, so far as it amends the existing law, will be to carry forward these charters for a further period of ten years; expiring in 1911.

We make some changes in the schedules respecting returns to the government; whereby fuller information may be given, without, however, disturbing that continuity of statement which is desirable for the purpose of comparison. We also make some provision in regard to the information to be furnished by the directors to their shareholders. What we propose in that respect is, that wherever the shareholders by by-law require a certain class of information to be brought down, such information shall be furnished at the annual or at a special meeting. We think that is a case that might properly be left to be regulated by a by-law of the shareholders, provided, however, that a bank shall not be at liberty to give information with regard to the accounts of its customers, as such, of course, would be at variance with the whole spirit of the Bank Act.

We propose that there shall be an enactment to prevent the issue of bank notes after a bank has suspended. It is believed that under the present Bank Act—excellent as it is—after a bank has suspended, if the directors were so minded, they might issue their own notes to their depositors.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Has that been done in any case?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am not aware that it has, although it is one of the things which seemed to be possible, in considering the recent unfortunate bank failure. At all events, it is well to guard against it.

The House will see that, inasmuch as the notes have a prior lien, if the directors, after the suspension of the bank, could issue their own notes to a certain class of depositors, they would thus give them priority over the other depositors. That, of course, is not desirable. I am not aware that any occasion has really arisen for it, but it is well we should safeguard a matter of that kind as far as possible. With regard to the business powers of the banks, we make some slight change. We include among the things upon which the bank may lend its money, standing timber, which has hitherto not been expressed in the Act, although, possibly, it is contemplated in its general provisions. We propose that the bank may take security for a liability to be incurred, such, for example, as in the case of a letter of credit, where money does not actually pass, but whereby the credit of the bank is pledged, which is, of course, equivalent to the money being paid.

We propose also that the products of the quarry, as well as the products of the mine, shall be included among the things upon which security may be taken—a mere verbal change which, of course, the House will not object to. We also use the expression 'wholesale dealer' as well as 'purchaser' with regard to certain transactions in respect of which security may be taken.

Another provision of some importance is in regard to the holding of land. Under the present Bank Act it is provided that a bank shall not hold land—except for purposes of its own business—for a longer period than seven years, but there is no provision as to what shall happen after that. It would, no doubt, be contended, as a matter of law, that the title remains in possession of the bank, but that is a point upon which the Act is silent. We propose to follow in this respect the legislation adopted last year in relation to loan companies. There, the power to hold land was extended from seven years—or, rather, to be more correct—provision was made that the Treasury Board might extend the power to hold land from seven to twelve years, provided it could be shown that, under exceptional circumstances, the enforced sale would be a matter of sacrifice. We provide, therefore, in the case of the banks, that they may hold land for a period of seven years, or for such further period, not more than five years in addition, as may be determined by the Treasury Board. We have a further provision, filling in the blank which now exists, that after the lapse of the time—whether it be seven years or the extended time by order of the Treasury Board—after the lapse of time for which the bank may legally hold land, proceedings may be taken to forfeit the land to the Crown.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Does that apply to lands that have already been held for more than a period of seven years?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The effect of this Bill is, that the land already held for seven years or more will be liable to forfeiture, but we do not propose to exercise the right of forfeiture until after six months' notice. The main purpose of this provision will not be to forfeit the land, but to oblige the bank to dispose of it, and in this way the banks shall have ample time to sell it, so as not to subject themselves to forfeiture.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Where banks have already held land for more than seven years and desire to sell it, they are required to give a covenant for title. Sometimes they prefer not to do that. If afterwards any proceedings should be taken against the persons to whom they sell, would the title be made good? Is my meaning clear to the hon. gentleman?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Therefore, if it could be provided in some way that lands might, within the period of six months, still be sold, it would be advisable.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think the effect of the amendment will be that land which, possibly, now has a cloud over its title, will remain the property of the bank until it is forfeited, and this forfeiture can only take effect after six months' notice. I think it will remove the doubt that there is in the hon. gentleman's mind, and which has existed in the past.

We propose that unpaid drafts issued by the bank shall, after a lapse of five years, be the subject of a return to parliament, in the same way as we now require return of unpaid balances. Circumstances might arise under which drafts are issued and are lost, and in regard to them the parties interested may, possibly, have no knowledge. If after the lapse of five years, the parties interested have not claimed these moneys, we think the banks should make a return of them in the same manner as the banks now make a return of unclaimed balances.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Do you make any provision that after a certain number of years the unpaid balances should be escheated to the state?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We do not touch that feature. The main purpose is, that the parties who may possibly suspect that drafts have been issued, shall have an opportunity of knowing from this return, and can claim the money. But the question of escheating is not touched by this Bill. There are a few other minor changes, largely verbal, which make the Act perhaps, a little clearer, but which do not materially alter its provisions. These are all the changes we propose to make as respects the existing Bank Act.

But we propose to add one or two new provisions which we think may be found useful. We think it desirable, in the light of the experience of recent years, that where a bank suspends there should be some better supervision of its affairs than now exists, and we think the best medium we can employ for obtaining that supervision is the Canadian Bankers' Association, which, for that purpose, we have asked to become incorporated. The Canadian Bankers' Association, as hon. members are aware, have already submitted a Bill to the House for the purpose of being incorporated, and it is only right to say that the government desire them to be incorporated, feeling that that association might be used as an instrument for the purpose to which I have referred. The banks, under a very valuable amendment, which was some years ago made to the Bank Act, are more or less partners as respects their circulation. There is a note redemption fund for which they are responsible, and to which they all contribute. We think that for that reason they have a special interest in seeing that a bank which has suspended is conducted in a proper way. We propose, therefore, that the Bankers' Association shall, immediately on the suspension of a bank, appoint a curator, who shall take possession of the bank. It is quite possible, where a bank has been brought to disaster owing to mismanagement on the part of its officials or directors, that it should remain for a certain period in the hands of these officials. We think that if the affairs of the suspended bank are in such a position, that a curator can do no useful service, the Bankers' Association shall withdraw him. If, on the other hand, the affairs of the bank are in such a position that they cannot be properly left in the hands of the directors and officers of the bank, then the curator will be left in charge.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is to be the judge of that?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The curator, as the matter now stands. If my hon. friend can suggest any way by which we can put a guard or check over that, we shall be happy to have his suggestion. We think an officer appointed by the Bankers' Association would be satisfactory to the public at large; and while he does not represent the depositors, every step he takes would be as much in the interest of the depositors as of any other class.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In case of his misfeasance, would the Bankers' Association or any other body be responsible? What provision is made as to that?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We have not provided for that, but that point is worthy of consideration. The powers of the curator are defined in section 26 of the Act, which I shall read:

The curator shall, on being appointed, at once take charge of the assets and affairs of the bank, and shall assume the management and control thereof, and shall receive and collect all moneys and debts due to the bank, and shall make all necessary arrangements for the payment of the notes of the bank issued for circulation then outstanding and in circulation, and generally shall have and possess all the powers that may be conferred upon him, and shall take all steps and do all things that may be required of him by by-law of the association, or that may be necessary or expedient to protect the rights and interests of the creditors and shareholders of the bank, and to conserve and insure the proper disposition, according to law, of the assets of the bank, and the curator shall remain in charge, management and control of the affairs and assets of the bank until he is removed from office, or until the bank resumes business, or until a liquidator is duly appointed to wind up the business of the bank.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). It would seem to be very reasonable that the parties who appoint this curator with such supreme power to control the whole matter, should be responsible for his actions.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is a very proper subject for consideration, and ought to be considered later on. Then, we think it is desirable that there should be, as far as feasible, some further control over the circulation of a bank. A bank is permitted to circulate its notes up to the amount of its paid-up capital. The only guard and check we have at present is the return made to the government. If that return is false, we can prosecute, as was done in a recent case. We think there should be, if possible, some additional guard or check on the circulation; but we have not attempted to work out any scheme further than to propose that that matter shall be regulated by rules and by-laws made by the Bankers' Association. We think that their interest will be in the interest of the public, and that they may be able to make such regulations as will follow the circulation of a bank from the moment a note is printed until it is destroyed. We propose, therefore, by section 30, as follows:

The association shall have power, from time to time, at a meeting thereof, with the approval of two-thirds in number of the banks represented at such meeting, the banks so approving having at least two-thirds in par value of the paid-up capital of the banks so represented, to make, amend and repeal by-laws, rules and regulations respecting—

(a) All matters relating to the appointment or removal of the curator, and his powers and duties;

(b) The supervision of the making of the notes of the banks which are intended for circulation, and the delivery thereof to the banks;

(c) The inspection of the disposition made by the banks of such notes;

(d) The destruction of notes of the banks; and

(e) The imposition of penalties for a breach or non-observance of any by-law, rule or regulation made by virtue of this section.

No such by-law, rule or regulation, nor any amendment nor repeal thereof, shall be of any force or effect until approved by the Treasury Board.

There is another class of provision which we propose to insert, that is, with regard to the purchase of the assets of a bank.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Before the hon. gentleman goes to that, I did not catch clearly whether those regulations of the Bankers' Association are to be embodied in a law, or subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, or whether they are to become effective simply by being made by the association.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is a provision that they shall have no force or effect until they are approved by the Treasury Board. If it is thought desirable to make them subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, I see no objection. We propose to have a provision with regard to the purchase of the assets of a bank which desires to go out of business. It is thought desirable to provide a convenient method whereby a bank which is perfectly solvent and desires to dispose of its business, shall be able to do so without loss of time. The provision in the Act is to the effect that a bank which desires may by a vote of two-thirds in value of all its shareholders, sell and dispose of all its assets to another bank. If the assets happen to be very large, such as would require an extension of the capital of the purchasing bank, it is provided that the shareholders of that bank also, shall have to be consulted. Of course, in such a transaction, proper provision would have to be made, and is made in the clauses of the Act, for the protection of the note-holders of the selling bank, and also to see that all the liabilities of the selling bank are properly covered; and any agreement for the purchase of the assets of a bank shall have no force or effect until submitted to and approved of by the Governor in Council. Such in the main, are the provisions of the Bill which I have the honour to introduce to the House. I may say that while, as a general rule, it is thought not desirable to send government Bills to the committees, I think occasionally there are exceptions when we can most advantageously deal with them in a large committee; and I shall propose with the consent of the House, at the proper moment, to move that this Bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, where I shall be only too happy to receive every suggestion of hon. gentlemen whose knowledge and experience may enable them to add anything to the information we all possess on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. Might I ask the hon. minister if he has made any attempt at all to strengthen the petition of depositors in those banks by way of increased government supervision in any way.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, Mr. Speaker, I think that the Finance Ministers who preceded me found great difficulty in adopting any system of government inspection, and the difficulties which then exist seem to continue. We hope that the action which we propose shall be taken, through the medium of the Canadian Bankers' Association, will operate for the benefit of depositors as well as note holders and others interested, but have made no special provision of the character indicated by the hon. gentleman.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

VACANCY.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the resignation of W. W. B. McInnes, Esq., member for the electoral division of Vancouver, in the district of British Columbia. I have accordingly issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, to make a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—MR. DAVIN.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call attention to a matter of privilege, and if I should be obliged to go more fully into the question connected with it, I shall put myself in order by concluding with a motion.

I find in the Hansard of Friday, the 17th inst., that the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), is reported as having said:

All I need refer to is one letter written by Mr. Gass.

And then the hon. gentleman quoted a letter of Mr. Gass, and said:

I took the trouble to look up the Wood Mountain polling district. There were twenty-nine voters there. Of these, twenty-seven voted. One ballot was rejected, leaving twenty-six votes to be counted. I discovered that not four or five, but sixteen in that election voted for the hon. gentleman, leaving only ten for his opponent, and putting the hon. gentleman equal with the man who opposed him. Now, I draw the inference, a much clearer inference than any the hon. gentleman drew, that 'the stuff' went into that district, and that the difference between five votes and sixteen, that is eleven votes, represented the effect of it; in other words, that eleven votes were purchased with 'the stuff.' And this man rises here and talks like a moral cyclone. He would give us to suppose that in him was contained all the morality of the world. But the inference is clear, clearer than any inference he drew from the affidavit he read, that 'the stuff' that went into Wood Mountain polling subdivision, had its effect, that flagrant corruption was practiced, that this is a purchased community, and that he sits here as the representative of purchased votes.

I have to denounce all that as an infamous misstatement. That is all founded on a postal card.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not know that my hon. friend is entitled to apply the term 'infamous misstatement' to what has been said by another member.

Mr. DAVIN. I will withdraw that, and put it this way.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I rise to another point of order. My hon. friend is referring to a past debate. Of course, he is entitled, without motion, to offer any personal explanation he has as to any misrepresentation made of himself, if he deems it advisable.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). That is, I understand, what he is doing.

The PRIME MINISTER. But he is not going into a personal explanation, but into a discussion which took place the other day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understand that my hon. friend was about to place the facts before the House which would show that the hon. member for Guysborough was mistaken in the inference he drew from certain facts.

The PRIME MINISTER. If the hon. gentleman goes beyond a personal explanation, he is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would ask the hon. gentleman to confine his statements, as far as possible, to a concise recital of the facts. It is pretty evident that he is reopening the question, and a number of other members might feel disposed to do the same.

Mr. DAVIN. That is founded on a postal card from Mr. Gass to Mr. Hamilton. Would he write about money to be improperly spent on a postal card?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Order.

Mr. DAVIN. I am quite in order. I say that the implication which is drawn, that Mr. Gass went down to Wood Mountain, is not correct. He never went there.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is not a personal explanation. Whatever Mr. Gass may have done is not a personal explanation, so far as my hon. friend is concerned.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is a fact bearing on the explanation.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend may say that he had nothing to do with that, but whether or not Mr. Gass went to Wood Mountain, cannot be a personal explanation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is an evidence of the inaccuracy of the statements made.

The PRIME MINISTER. But it is not a personal explanation. It is going into a past debate.

Mr. DAVIN. I will not go into the debate, but I appeal to my right hon. friend, whether I am not within the bounds of order if I say that I never communicated with Mr. Gass with regard to Wood Mountain; that neither for me nor for anybody else did he go to Wood Mountain, that the Hamilton he wrote to never had from me a cent of money, and I do not believe he was ready to spend any money of his own; and the whole conclusion is a most extravagant one, built upon a postal card. Would a man write about money on a postal card?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman said:

I promised the hon. member for Assiniboia to read, as I did in his absence, what the committee said about Mr. Gass's statement.

He never read it in my absence, and although I requested him to read it, he never read it at all. I will put myself in order by moving the adjournment of the House. I desire to show what has happened in Moosejaw.

The PRIME MINISTER. If I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), that is another matter.

Mr. DAVIN. It is another matter I am going into, if that will satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite.

The PRIME MINISTER. I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) has no right to move the adjournment of the House except for one purpose. Having stated that, he cannot proceed to debate other matters.

Mr. DAVIN. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is smiling. He knows very well that he is not taking the point of order properly. When I rose I said that I was rising to deal with a matter in the nature of a matter of privilege; but I said: If it goes beyond that, I will put myself in order. I am going to still refer to Mr. Gass's case. It is perfectly clear from the interruption, that I shall not be able to do it except by moving the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) not to do that. Let him make his explanation brief, and not go so far as to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DAVIN. I can bring this matter of Mr. Gass up at another time; but, before I sit down I wish to say, in regard to the statement, that corruption obtained at that election in West Assiniboia, there is not a tithe of foundation for it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. You are much braver than you were when the protest was against you.

Mr. DAVIN. There is not a shadow of foundation for it. I did not hear what my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) said.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. You are ready to make accusations against other people without evidence.

Mr. DAVIN. No, I do not do anything of that sort.

WEST HURON AND BROCKVILLE ELECTIONS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to make a remark regarding a matter that has attracted some attention on the part of the public press. James Nelson and Thomas Marshall, who have been referred to in the public press in connection with a debate in the House, made declarations some time ago which, I think, in fairness, should be considered by the House in connection with statements that are now being dealt with in the public press.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Order.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I shall conclude my remarks by moving the adjournment of the House. I can recognize the anxiety of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that this matter should not be put in the position in which I think it should be put in common fairness. Notwithstanding that, I shall endeavour to do what I can to place it in the position I think it should occupy. Now, we had before the Committee on Privileges and Elections—

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps this is hardly the time for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) to bring this matter up in this form. I can understand that if the hon. gentleman proceeds to make an elaborate speech on this question, it will call forth a debate, which seems to be hardly right at this stage.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not propose to make any elaborate statement at all. I propose simply to make a statement to the House necessary for the purpose of enabling the House to understand a matter which, I think, certainly, should be placed right in common fairness to gentlemen who are not members of this House, and who, therefore, are not in a position to justify themselves here. Now, before the Committee on Privileges and Elections last year, a witness by the name of Priest, I think it was, made reference to James Nelson and Thomas Marshall as persons who could give certain information with respect to the whereabouts of one James Farr, whose presence before that committee was very earnestly desired, but who could not be found. Very shortly after that investigation had been closed, Farr made a statement which purported to be a solemn declaration and which was published in the columns of the Toronto Globe. That statement contained certain allegations with respect to Mr. W. D. MacPherson, Toronto, barrister, and sought to create the impression that Mr. MacPherson had been guilty of some improper conduct with respect to these two witnesses. Before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I had already stated exactly what Mr. MacPherson's connection with the matter was. My language was this:

Mr. Borden.—I might make a statement in reference to this, and I would like it put on the minutes. I say that when the names of Priest and Marshall came up in the evidence of Harry Ross, I sent a telegram to Mr. MacPherson asking him to interview these witnesses and see whether they could give any evidence material to this case, respecting admissions or statements by Farr. I received in reply from him a telegram stating that Priest was absent, but that Marshall and this witness could probably give material evidence.

I then moved on Saturday for summonses for these witnesses, James Nelson and Thomas Marshall.

The witnesses we examined before the committee with regard to Mr. MacPherson's connection with the matter showed exactly what that connection was. Notwithstanding that, we had this statement of Farr, published in the columns of the Toronto Globe after the investigation was closed, which sought to throw some discredit upon Mr. MacPherson, who had had no connection with the matter except what he had done at my instance as a member of the committee in order to procure the evidence of Farr before that committee. One would have supposed, after the declaration of Farr had been published, and after Mr. MacPherson had made the denial, and after Mr. Nelson and Mr. Marshall had made a statement which had the value of an oath with regard to the matter, we would have heard no more of it, particularly in view of the statement I shall read, which found its place in the columns of the Toronto Globe, with regard to the relative value of statements from Farr and Mr. MacPherson. However, it has been thought proper, I suppose on behalf of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads the government, that the matter should be brought up again and that statements should be made in the House for the purpose of casting discredit upon Mr. MacPherson.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) is trying to make comments on a previous debate, and doing it under cover of a motion to adjourn. If this extreme extension of the privileges allowed to members is permitted, no progress can be made with the business of the House. If every question can be reopened on a motion to adjourn, there will be continuous debates from one end of the session to the other. The hon. gentleman is commenting on what has been said in a late debate and proposing to read a lot of extraneous or new affidavits to vindicate the character of certain gentlemen, which, he thinks, have been impugned during the debate. I submit that that is out of order. The hon. gentleman has more or less commented on that debate already.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, if my remarks have amounted to a comment on a previous debate—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Or review.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Or review—well, no, I will not go so far as to say 'review.' I say 'comment' or 'reference'—I think that is the language of the authorities. I do not desire to refer to a past debate. I do not wonder that the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) does not desire it, and I am particularly amused—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Order.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax)—that he is so much exercised over the matter. I say I am perfectly in order in reading these statements. I should not be in order in referring to a past debate, and I do not propose to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER. My hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax), if I understand him, commences by referring to statements published in the newspapers that, he thinks, reflect on certain parties. I think the House will be willing to accept the affidavits, so as to put these parties in a fair position if they feel they have been wronged; but I appeal to my hon. friend if it is not unwise to proceed to found an argument and open a discussion on newspaper articles. We know from experience how wide a field for debate may be opened in that way.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Where a statement has been made, assuming that it is at the close of debate, reflecting upon the character of gentlemen outside of this House, it seems to me to be an extraordinary position that no means should be allowed them of having the facts stated in this House that would entirely demonstrate the absolute want of accuracy in the statements made in the House. That has been the invariable practice in this House. I had occasion to make a statement to this House in regard to a gentleman who was outside of it, and the right hon. gentleman produced a communication from the party and placed it before the House. I did not raise the question that the right hon. gentleman was referring to a past debate, and therefore he had an opportunity of placing the statement before the House, and not only that, but of commenting upon it and explaining the position in which the question stood, in his judgment. It appears to me that every member of this House has the strongest possible interest in upholding a rule under which members of the House may vindicate themselves when attacked in their absence, and the same rule applies to any person outside. Why was I not stopped from reading a telegram from Mr. MacPherson in this House on the last day of our meeting? No objection was taken to it, and that telegram was produced, controverting in the clearest terms, a statement that had been made by an hon. member of this House in a past debate.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend forgets that when he reads that telegram from Mr. MacPherson, it was pending a debate which was still before the House.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). No, it had been concluded then.

The PRIME MINISTER. Perhaps so. But I appeal to my hon. friends opposite that we should endeavour, as far as possible, to observe the rules of the House. When we observe the rules of the House we are always on safe ground, but the moment we depart from them we are apt to get into trouble. The adjournment of the House is moved, and objection is taken that it is moved to refer to a past debate. Another objection is taken that it is moved to bring before the House a matter which is not of urgent public necessity. Now, I insist on this rule, that the adjournment of the House should not be moved before taking up the Orders of the Day except it is to bring before the House a matter of urgent public necessity. That has been the rule in England for a long time. But in England they have implemented that rule by another one which we have not adopted, and that is one which requires any hon. gentleman who wants to move the adjournment of the House, to give notice thereof to the Speaker, and then it is in the discretion of the House to say whether the motion shall be made, unless a certain number of members ask for it. But under such circumstances the old rule has been maintained, that the adjournment of the House should be moved only for specific purposes.

That no motion for the adjournment of the House shall be made until all the questions on the Notice paper have been disposed of, and no such motion shall be made before the Orders of the Day or Notices of Motion have been entered upon, except by leave of the House, unless a member rising in his place shall propose to move the adjournment, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance.

Now, this is the qualifying ruling. We have not the rule providing that an adjournment of the House cannot be moved without the request of forty members; but the spirit is the same, that the adjournment of the House cannot be moved except upon matters of urgent importance. Even in England a member cannot move the adjournment of the House, even if it is asked for by forty members, and to discuss certain specific motions, unless the motion is made in a certain manner. I call the attention of the House to page 263 of May's Parliamentary Practice.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is no authority in this House, on questions on which we have our own rules.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is a rule of this House, that an adjournment shall not be moved except on a matter of urgent importance, but we have not adopted the English rule, which was introduced in the early part of the 80's, I think, that an adjournment should be moved only when it is asked for by forty members.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Why quote something that has no bearing on this question?

The PRIME MINISTER. I say that we still have the rule prevailing in England that an adjournment shall not be moved except upon matters of urgent public importance. This is what I find in May, page 263:

The motion should be placed, in print or in writing, in the Speaker's hands,—

We have not that:

—as except in the event of any informality in the form of the motion, which may necessitate the Speaker's intervention—

We have not that, but we have this:

—or may compel him to decline to put the question from the Chair, the Speaker proposes the question in the words of the mover. Certain matters cannot be debated, save upon a substantive motion, which can be dealt with by amendment, or by the distinct vote of the House, such as the conduct of the sovereign, the heir to the Throne, the Viceroy and Governor General of India, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, the Speaker, the chairman of Ways and Means, members of either House of parliament and judges of the superior courts of the United Kingdom, including persons holding the position of a judge, such as a judge in a court of bankruptcy and of a county court. These matters cannot, therefore, be questioned by way of amendment nor upon a motion for adjournment under Standing Order No. 171 (see p. 242). For the same reason, no charge of a personal character can be raised, save upon a direct and substantive motion to that effect.

The hon. gentleman is forgetting that in order to bring up a matter of a personal character, a member must move a substantive motion and not a motion to adjourn.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the right hon. gentleman think that under the rules of this House it is competent for him to put up a gentleman here to make a four hours' speech at the close of the debate, after two o'clock in the morning—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am now putting the question to my right hon. friend, who does not require the protection of gentlemen behind him. I ask whether he thinks the rules of the House should prevent an answer to a gentleman who makes a dozen palpable misstatements—

Mr. COWAN. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, I do not say whether intentionally or otherwise, but I say it has already been proved. Here is a gentleman who had been assailed in a manner that, if true, would reflect greatly to his discredit, and show him to have acted in a dishonourable manner. He was absent from home, and I received his communication showing that the hon. gentleman who made the statement here ought to have known that he had no foundation in fact for making it, because it had been completely refuted already by this gentleman. Now I ask the right hon. gentleman whether he thinks it should be denied to members of this House to put before the House facts which will refute a statement that has been made in this House reflecting upon the character of gentlemen, whether in the House or outside of the House? I do not think the right hon. gentleman will feel that it is fair or just to adopt any procedure here that will prevent that which is absolutely a matter of privilege from being discussed on a motion to adjourn. The object is not to enter into a debate, but merely to state facts that are absolutely necessary in order to defend the characters of gentlemen outside of the House that have been assailed by members of the House. This is, I think, a legitimate question of privilege and one which, I say, it is in the interest of hon. members of the House that we should not adopt any rule that would preclude taking any action in this regard.

The PRIME MINISTER. If it be a matter of privilege, there are many ways to bring it to the attention of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does my right hon. friend regard it as a matter of privilege?

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, if it be a matter of privilege, it is not a matter for the adjournment of the House. If it be a matter of privilege, let it be treated as a matter of privilege. On a motion to adjourn the House, I contend that it cannot be brought to the attention of the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) bases his claim, in support of the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), on the ground that the question now raised is a matter of privilege. That surely cannot be the case. A matter of privilege which is contemplated by the rules of the House is a matter of personal privilege attaching to the members of the House as members. It is not a privilege in respect to anybody else, it is a matter of privilege in respect to a member of the House, so that the hon. senior member for Halifax cannot be brought within the rules of this House in attempting to take the course he is now proposing to take. The rule of the House is, that no hon. gentleman may review a past debate, or comment on matters which have occurred in the House in this form. In conformity with that rule, can the hon. gentleman take up the subject which he is now proposing to take up? A moment's consideration will satisfy any hon. gentleman that that cannot properly be done. What would be the result, where will hon. members be landed and what will be the effect on the transaction of the business of this House if such a course were permitted? My hon. friend will see that the same privilege would have to be granted in respect to references made to persons and to gentlemen outside of parliament, but who have friends on this side of the House. I presume that rule would have to apply to references made by hon. gentlemen on that side of the House to persons outside of the House, as well as references made by hon. members on this side of the House, and what could be done on one side could be done on another side, so that, any hon. member on this side, in exactly the same way, could raise the same class of question as the hon. senior member for Halifax is raising now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no intention to comment on the debate; it is a question of fact.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not care. The fact that the hon. gentleman does not propose to comment does not help it in the slightest degree. What occurred the other day? An affidavit was read by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), in which the person making the affidavit reflected upon the conduct and imputed criminal actions to some twenty, or thirty, or forty, or fifty persons. Now, if the hon. senior member for Halifax has a right, in this case, to pursue this course, because some of his friends, or some of those whose cause he is desirous of espousing, were reflected upon unfavourably, if it is not open to every other member on this side of the House to ask permission to read affidavits rebutting what was said in the statements read by the hon. member for Westmoreland? Certainly, if the hon. member for Halifax can do it properly in one case it can be done properly in the other, and the consequence would be that at every session of this parliament, instead of parliament proceeding with the public business, somebody, or it may be, half a dozen hon. members, would be prepared with affidavits in answer to something that had been alleged in some other affidavit, or prepared with a statement to rebut every statement made by every hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who had spoken in a previous debate. Disorder would be no name for it, the public business would be hung up, and it would be impossible for parliament to carry on the affairs of the country at all. I think there is no rule under which the hon. gentleman would be entitled to read any statements he has to read or any affidavits he has in his hands. It is not open to him to do it. There are ways by which he can bring them to the notice of the public without absorbing the time of parliament and without violating the rules of parliament. The thing is perfectly clear that if the hon. member for Halifax can read affidavits, which are really answers to allegations made in this House, every one of the returning officers and deputy returning officers mentioned by Pritchett can have members of the House read their statements so as to relieve them from the reflections placed upon their conduct. How are you going to put such statements as these on record without violating the rules and practices of this House?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). I would like to remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) who has just taken his seat where the beginning of it was.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not care where the beginning of it was. That does not alter the case.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will mention a case not so very far back, and the hon. gentleman did not seem to think that we were introducing a dangerous practice. A certain gentleman had been attacked in this House, and I have never known of a case where any member was permitted to attack a gentleman—

Mr. COWAN. I did not attack Mr. MacPherson.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And that person who was attacked was not allowed to defend himself through an hon. member on the floor of the House whether there was a strict rule against it or otherwise. Take the very extraordinary case of General Gascoigne, who was the subject of a debate—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He was an officer under the government.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He was a man all the same. He was an outsider having no rights in this House over those of any other private person. He had none so far as the rules of the House are concerned, yet, that gentleman was not only defended by having a letter, written by him, read here, but that letter was read when the gentleman who had referred to him was not only out of the House, but on his way across the ocean. When, for instance, the member of this House who had brought up that subject had left the House, a letter from General Gascoigne defending himself, and criticising, at the same time, the member of this House for making the remarks he had made in regard to him, was read by the right hon. leader of the House. He was permitted to do it. Then, there was the case of Major Walsh. The observations that I had made reflected upon his private character. He was an officer of the government at one time, but he was not an officer of the government at this time, and no one suggested that his letter should not be read in this House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That was not on a motion to adjourn the House. There is no objection raised to reading letters.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am dealing particularly with one of the arguments made by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Neither of these cases was on a motion to adjourn the House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals will understand that my references are in point, not as to this particular motion, if you like, but they are in point as to one portion of the argument which he made, and that was that we were introducing a dangerous precedent. He will not claim that we were taking advantage of a particular motion to do this, but that we were reading, and you, Mr. Speaker, were allowing to be read affidavits or statements made by parties outside of the House whose characters had been attacked. That is the point, and I am showing that this had been a practice long indulged in. I think it has been a sense of fair-play which has induced the House to permit this to be done, and if there has been, in a debate in the House, an attack made upon a man's character who is not here to defend himself, the House will, whether rules exist to control us or not, unanimously agree—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is the point.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes. I say will unanimously agree to allow that gentleman to defend himself so long as he does not make criticisms upon members of this House for exercising their undoubted rights. It is a question of fair-play.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In this case it is not a question of the House granting a privilege as a matter of indulgence. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) here claims his right on a motion to adjourn to refer to a past debate and to rebut statements made in this House.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) is perfectly within his right according to the rules of the House. He asks no indulgence from the House at all. He has stated that certain statements were made in newspapers and he wishes to correct them by affidavits. The hon. gentleman did not say he was going to refer to a past debate in the House; and there is no possible way in which he can bring up the question except by moving the adjournment of the House. When the hon. gentleman opposite quotes from May's new book, he is referring to rules which have been revised in the English House of Commons and which we have not at present adopted in this House. We all know that speeches on a motion to adjourn have been limited under the new rules in the English House, but we stick to our own rules here. In no other way can the question be brought before this House except on a motion to adjourn, and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) is perfectly in order.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I have not the slightest intention of referring to any past debate. I expressly stated that on the 16th of August last a statement was published in the Toronto Globe purporting to have been made as a solemn declaration by one James Farr, who had been subpoenaed to attend on the Committee of Privileges and Elections. That statement contained certain references of an impertinent and insulting nature to Mr. W. D. MacPherson, a barrister of Toronto. Mr. James Nelson and Mr. Thomas Marshall were referred to in that statement of Mr. Farr's, and after it had been published in the Toronto Globe they made declarations, in which they stated that so much of Farr's declaration as related to them and Mr. MacPherson was untrue. Mr. MacPherson himself also made a similar declaration, and the Toronto Globe which had published Mr. Farr's declaration stated that Mr. MacPherson was completely exonerated and in that way stated that Mr. Farr is not to be believed. That is the matter which I desire to bring to the attention of the House. That is a matter which I claim to have the right to bring to the attention of the House on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SPEAKER. The reason I stopped the hon. member (Mr. Borden) was that in making his argument, it seemed to me that he was inevitably opening up a discussion which had recently been concluded in this House. It occurred to me there was going to be no end to that, and I think the House will agree that under the rules the hon. gentleman cannot refer to a past debate. The House I conceive is indulgent towards a man outside, who considers he has suffered a wrong; and it is because it seemed to me that the statement which the hon. gentleman was making could not be made without referring to a past debate, that I interfered. I presume we follow largely the English practice in that respect. Denison's and Brand's Decisions lay this down:

It is out of order to read observations commenting on what has taken place in the House.

It is not in order to read a letter commenting on what has taken place in the House.

It is not in order to read a letter commenting on a debate in the House.

It is irregular to read from newspaper reports.

If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) can, within these decisions, present his explanation on behalf of the parties who, he feels, are aggrieved, I am sure the House will listen to him.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I could very easily have carried out what you suggest in about half the time taken up in discussing this question of order—however it was possibly not to save time that I was interrupted. The first statement which I propose to read to the House is the declaration of Mr. James Nelson, in which he says :

I, James Nelson, of the city of Toronto, in the county of York, do solemnly declare :

1. That I am the James Nelson who gave evidence before the Committee on Privileges and Elections at Ottawa in connection with the West Huron election.

2. That I have read over the declaration of James Farr, published in the 'Globe' newspaper of August 16, 1899. The statements contained in said declaration relating to what passed between Mr. W. D. MacPherson, Thos. Marshall and myself are untrue.

3. The facts are that when Marshall and myself were telegraphed for from Ottawa to attend there for the purpose of giving evidence before the parliamentary Committee on Privileges and Elections, we applied to Mr. MacPherson for a loan of $13 each to purchase return tickets from Toronto to Ottawa, and he loaned each of us this amount, we at the same time giving him an order in writing directed to the clerk of the Privileges Committee at Ottawa for $13, the amount to be paid us by the committee to cover our railway fare from Toronto to Ottawa and return.

4. While in Ottawa both Marshall and myself endorsed the cheques for $13 each, made out in our favour to cover said railway fare, and we left the same there to be forwarded to Mr. MacPherson, as arranged, in payment of the money borrowed from him.

5. Mr. MacPherson did not accompany Marshall and myself or either of us to the train on Sunday evening, or at any other time, nor did he attempt to influence our evidence in any way whatever, either by a promise of money or otherwise.

6. The statement contained in Farr's declaration that I told him that Mr. MacPherson had impressed upon Marshall and myself the necessity of telling a story that would look all right, and that if we did that he would not forget us, is utterly false and without any foundation in fact.

7. I never told Farr that Mr. MacPherson had told me that if I would come forward and make the proper kind of declaration the Tories would see me through all right, and it would be money in my pocket, nor did I tell him anything to such effect. Mr. MacPherson never suggested that I should make a declaration of any kind or give any evidence before the committee except the truth, nor did he make any promise or representation that it would be in any way to my advantage to make the proper kind of declaration.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

(Sgd.) JAMES NELSON.

Mr. SPEAKER.

Declared before me at the city of Toronto, in the county of York, this 19th day of August, A.D. 1899.

(Sgd.) SAM. S. MARTIN,
Commissioner, &c.

Mr. COWAN. What is the date of that ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The 19th of August, 1899. It was made three days after the publication in the Toronto Globe, and I supposed that every gentleman in this House was aware that these declarations were made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No doubt they were.

Mr. BORDEN. I repeat, that I supposed that every gentleman in this House was aware that these declarations had been made and published in the Toronto Globe.

Mr. M. K. COWAN (South Essex). Would my hon. friend give me one word here ? The argument was made that on account of Pritchett's affidavits being set out in detail, that, therefore, they should be believed. I read the extract from Farr's affidavit concerning Mr. MacPherson, showing that it contained thirty paragraphs, and arguing that if the one ought to be believed on that ground, the other ought to be believed on the same ground ; but I expressly stated that I put them in for what they were worth ; I made no comment upon them. When the hon. leader of the opposition says that I made a dozen misstatements of fact, I beg to say that I made none, but that every statement of fact I made, was absolutely correct.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Of course, my hon. friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), should have called the hon. member who has just taken his seat to order, for referring to a past debate.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. As the Speaker has permitted the hon. gentleman to go on, I bow to the Chair.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Minister of Marine and Fisheries is discouraged as to the conduct of the business of the House. When my hon. friend interrupted me, I was about to read the declaration of Mr. Marshall :

I, Thomas Marshall, of the city of Toronto, in the county of York, do solemnly declare :

1. That I am the Thomas Marshall who gave evidence before the Committee on Privileges and Elections at Ottawa in connection with the West Huron election.

2. That I have read over the declaration of James Farr, published in the 'Globe' newspaper of August 16, 1899. The statements contained in said declaration relating to what passed between Mr. W. D. MacPherson, James Nelson and myself are untrue.

3. The facts are that when Nelson and myself were telegraphed for from Ottawa to attend there for the purpose of giving evidence before the parliamentary Committee on Privileges and Elections, we applied to Mr. MacPherson for a loan of $13 each to purchase return tickets from Toronto to Ottawa, and he loaned each of us this amount, we at the same time giving him an order in writing directed to the clerk of the Privileges Committee at Ottawa, for $13, the amount to be paid to us by the committee to cover our railway fare from Toronto to Ottawa and return.

4. While in Ottawa both Nelson and myself endorsed the cheques for $13 each, made out in our favour, to cover said railway fare, and we left the same there, to be forwarded to Mr. MacPherson as arranged, in payment of the money borrowed from him.

5. Mr. MacPherson did not accompany Nelson and myself, or either of us, to the train on Sunday evening or at any other time, nor did he know what evidence we intended to give before the committee, nor did he attempt to influence our evidence in any way whatever, either by promise of money or otherwise.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

THOMAS MARSHALL.

Declared before me at the city of Toronto, in the county of York, this 18th day of August, A.D. 1899.

ARTHUR W. BURKE,
A Commissioner, &c.

With respect to the same matter, Mr. W. D. MacPherson, who was absent from Toronto, engaged on professional business at the time this statement of Mr. Farr was published in the Toronto Globe, at once, when he was informed of it, sent the following reply by telegraph, as a public statement on his behalf:

Replying to your telegram, I have just seen to-day's 'Globe.' Statements in Farr's declaration relating to me are false. At request of Marshall and Nelson, I loaned each of them $13 to enable them to go to Ottawa to comply with the telegraphic summons they had received to attend before the parliamentary Committee on Privileges and Elections. This amount is the expense of return railway fare from Toronto to Ottawa, which their telegrams stated would be paid them at Ottawa, and at the same time I took an order in writing from each man, directed to the clerk of Privileges Committee, for repayment to me, and forwarded same to Ottawa, and these amounts were within two or three days thereafter repaid through the clerk of the committee to me by a government cheque, endorsed at Ottawa by each man. Was never asked by either man for any more money, and no more was promised to me, or even spoken of. I did not, as Farr's declaration states, accompany either Marshall or Nelson to the train, nor have I seen either of them since their return from Ottawa. I absolutely and unequivocally deny the statements made in Farr's declaration that I at any time promised either man any money for his evidence, or in any way suggested what evidence he should give. Mr. Borden has already stated publicly before the parliamentary committee, in reference to this matter, that he, as a member of that committee, requested me to see Marshall and Nelson, which is true.

The paper which published the declaration, exonerated Mr. MacPherson completely in these words—this is from the Toronto Globe, of September 8, 1899:

In our issue of the 16th ult., we published a certain sworn declaration made by James Farr, of Goderich, who acted as one of the deputy returning officers at the recent by-election for the House of Commons in West Huron. We published the declaration in the usual course, as Farr's defence in relation to the charges and assertions which had come out in reference to him before the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the pending investigation at Ottawa. Paragraphs 27 and 28 of the declaration consisted of what were said by Farr to be statements made to him by the witnesses Thomas Marshall and James Nelson, relating in part to their evidence and the circumstances under which the same was said to have been given, and particularly to Mr. W. D. MacPherson, from whom, after they had been summoned by the committee to appear at Ottawa, they had each borrowed the sum of $13 to pay their railway fare from Toronto to Ottawa and return, in order to comply with the summons. In Farr's relation of what he said was Mr. MacPherson's connection with the matter based upon the statements which he said were made to him by Marshall and Nelson on their return from Ottawa, a colour was given to the incident, which somewhat seriously reflected upon Mr. MacPherson's standing as a professional man. These statements have been unequivocally denied by Mr. MacPherson, also by Marshall and Nelson, who have both made statutory declarations, which we have already published.

I ask the attention of the House to what follows, and I ask the House to consider how much importance should be attached to Mr. Farr's declaration after a leading newspaper, the Toronto Globe, the acknowledged organ of hon. gentlemen opposite has made the following statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is drifting into what will inevitably cause discussion. I have tolerated his reading so far, because I think it only fair, but I will have to ask him to confine himself to his statement.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) (reading):

After careful inquiry and investigation, we are satisfied that the reflections upon Mr. MacPherson were quite unwarranted and should be set right. We believe Mr. MacPherson's published statements relating to the matter to be true and correct, and consequently we do not believe him to have been guilty of the slightest misconduct or impropriety; indeed, we think he has emerged with credit from an affair which at the outset and uncontradicted would have been likely to have left him in an undesirable position.

What I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, is this: That so long as publicity is given to Mr. Farr's declarations in the public press of this country, I trust that no one will feel justified in attaching any importance to his declarations since the Toronto Globe, which published his original declaration, saw fit, after carefully considering the matter, to say that Mr. Farr is not to be believed, and that Mr. MacPherson is to be believed; and I trust that any reference made in the future, in the public press at least, to Mr. Farr's declarations, will be accompanied by the statement that the Toronto Globe has taken the position with regard to it indicated by the article I have just read, and also that any newspaper which sees fit to give publicity to Mr. Farr's delaration, will also see fit, in fairness, to give publicity to Mr. Marshall's and Mr. Nelson's declarations. I now move the adjournment of the House.

Motion negatived.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 55) to incorporate the Canadian Bankers' Association.—(Mr. Britton.)

Bill (No. 81) to incorporate the Accident and Guarantee Company of Canada.—(Mr. Penny.)

Bill (No. 100) respecting the Buffalo Railway Company.—(Mr. Gibson.)

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 153)—from the Senate—respecting the Western Alberta Railway Company.—(Mr. Richardson.)

STR. EUREKA.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

1. Did the government purchase the steamer 'Eureka'?
2. If so, from whom?
3. What was the purchase price?
4. For what service is she required?

5. Where is said steamer now employed?
6. What sum has been expended for repairs on said steamer since purchased by the government?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I beg to reply: 1. Yes. 2. North American Transportation Company. 3. $26,000. 4. In connection with Ship Channel—between Montreal and Quebec. 5. Same as above. 6. $7,953.57.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES BEARING INTEREST.

Mr. WILSON asked :

What are the names of the railway or railways that have received subsidy or subsidies on condition that they pay interest on the said subsidy or subsidies at 3 per cent per annum or at any other rate of interest?

When was such subsidy or subsidies granted to said railway or railways, and how much interest has been paid by the said railway or railways?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The following are the names of railway companies with which subsidy agreements have been entered into, subject to such provisions.

The hon. gentleman, I understand, alludes to sec. 8, of chap. 7, of Vic. 63, and if so, I give names of railway companies to which subsidies have been given, subject to such provisions.

Date of Contract.	No. of Contract.	Names of Railways.

May 12, 1896...	12421	The Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company..	40,000 "

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Mr. HAGGART. Do I understand that there is any railway in Canada that receives a subsidy on condition that it shall pay interest on that subsidy at 3 per cent per annum?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I asked the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wilson), who asked the question, what statute he alluded to, and he stated that he referred to the Act which I have quoted, section 8, chapter 7, of 62-3 Victoria. That is what he had in mind. But he said also, that there were some companies that received annual subventions for a certain amount for a term of years, and asked me to furnish the names, which I have done.

WHARF AT PERCÉ—WHARF AT GASPÉ.

Mr. BERGERON asked.

1. Have the government decided to construct a wharf at Percé?

2. Have the plans and specifications been prepared?

3. Have they been filed at Percé and other places?

4. Have the government received tenders; and if so, how many, and which tender is the lowest?

5. Has the contract been signed; and if so, on what date? What is the amount, and who are the contractors?

6. When are the works to be begun, and what amount of work is to be done this year?

7. When is the wharf to be finished?

8. If it has been decided not to do any work this year, what is the reason?

9. When do the government intend to do this work?

10. Have the government abandoned the idea of constructing the wharf at Gaspé; and if so, why so?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Yes, at the earnest request of the member representing the county of Gaspé, Mr. Lemieux, M.P. 2. Yes. 3. Yes. 4. Yes. Three tenders were received, the lowest being that of Heney & Smith. 5. The work was awarded to Heney & Smith; the contract was signed on April 17, 1900. Contract price, $25,792. 6. The amount of work to be done this year depends upon the provisions of the contract, the same to be begun on execution of the contract. 7. April 17, 1901. 8. No such decision has been reached. 9. Work is now under contract. 10. The department has no appropriation for a wharf at Gaspé.

PERMANENT CORPS—PENSIONS.

Mr. PRIOR (by Mr. Dugas) asked:

Is it the intention of the government to bring in a Bill this session making provision for granting pensions to the officers and men of the permanent corps?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The matter is still under the consideration of the government.

Mr. BLAIR.

SOLICITOR GENERAL AND ADMINISTRATION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE.

On the question:

If the Solicitor General holds no official position at the criminal assizes in the provinces, is it the intention of the government to prevent him for the future from compromising the dignity of the Crown by allowing him to appear against the Crown in the provinces while receiving a salary as an officer of the Crown at Ottawa?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I would call your attention to this question. It is clearly out of order. The matter referred to is a question of opinion.

POSTMASTER OF ST. BRUNO AND ST. CŒUR DE MARIE.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Dugas) asked:

1. Whether Xavier Letourneau, postmaster of St. Bruno, and Ferdinand Larouche, postmaster of St. Cœur de Marie, in 1896, have been dismissed, and why?

2. Have they been replaced?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Xavier Letourneau, postmaster of Pasteur (locally known as St. Bruno), ceased to be postmaster of that office in October, 1896, the office having been removed to a more convenient situation. Ferdinand Larouche was removed from the postmastership of Delisle (locally known as St. Cœur de Marie), for being an offensive political partisan. 2. They were succeeded by Messrs. Joseph Tremblay and Alfred Gagné, as postmasters of Pasteur and Delisle, respectively.

DR. SAVARD, OF CHICOUTIMI.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Dugas) asked:

1. Is Dr. Savard, of Chicoutimi, in the service of the government as paymaster or otherwise?

2. If so, when was he appointed?

3. What is his salary, and how much money has he received since his appointment?

4. Is the government aware that Dr. Savard is a brother of the member for Chicoutimi?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Yes. 2. November 3, 1896. 3. He is paid 1½ per cent on payments made by him. The commission he has received from November 3, 1896, to March, 1900, amounts to $495.79. 4. I understand he is.

MR. PHILIP SAVARD.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Dugas) asked:

1. Is Philip Savard employed by the government at Ottawa or elsewhere?

2. If so, what position does he hold?

3. When was he appointed?

4. What salary does he receive?

5. Is the government aware that he is a brother of P. V. Savard, member for Chicoutimi?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Yes. 2. Clerk in the estimates branch of this department. 3. April 1, 1898. 4. $2.50 per day. 5. I understand he is.

MR. JOHNNY SAVARD, OF ST. ALEXIS.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Dugas) asked :

1. Has Johnny Savard, merchant, of St. Alexis, county of Chicoutimi, received money from the government in the construction of the telegraph line at L'Anse St. Jean, and that of St. Alexis wharf?

2. If so, how much?

3. Is the government aware that Johnny Savard is a cousin of the member for Chicoutimi?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Yes, in connection with St. Alexis wharf. 2. $208.65. 3. The government has no information on this point.

MR. HILAS TREMBLAY, OF L'ANSE ST. JEAN.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Dugas) asked :

1. Has Hilas Tremblay, farmer, of L'Anse St. Jean, received money from the government in the construction of the telegraph line at L'Anse St. Jean and St. Alexis?

2. If so, how much?

3. Is the government aware that Mr. Tremblay is a cousin of the member for Chicoutimi?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Yes. 2. $960. 3. The government has not possessed itself of the lineage of the person referred to.

MR. FAUSTIN TREMBLAY.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Dugas) asked :

1. Was Faustin Tremblay employed by the government in the construction of the Lake St. John piers in 1897-8-9?

2. If so, what amount of money was paid to him?

3. Do the government know that he then resided at Quebec?

4. Do the government know that he is a cousin of the member for Chicoutimi?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The name of Faustin Tremblay does not appear on the books of the Public Works Department.

MR. JOSEPH TREMBLAY, OF ST. BRUNO.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Dugas) asked :

1. Whether Joseph Tremblay, merchant, of St. Bruno, county of Chicoutimi, is postmaster of that locality?

2. When was he appointed, and what is his salary?

3. Have the government paid him other moneys since 1896? If so, how much and what for?

4. Do the government know that he is a cousin of the member for Chicoutimi?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Joseph Tremblay is postmaster of Pasteur, county Chicoutimi. (The district appears to be locally known as 'St. Bruno.') 2. He was appointed on November 16, 1896.

Mr. MULOCK.

His salary is $60 per annum. 4. The government has no knowledge of his genealogy.

MR. ALFRED GAGNE, OF CŒUR DE MARIE.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Dugas) asked :

1. Whether Alfred Gagné, merchant of St. Cœur de Marie, of Chicoutimi, has been appointed postmaster of that locality?

2. When was he appointed and what is his salary?

3. Has he received money from the government in the construction of the wharf, and how much?

4. Do the government know that the said Mens. Gagné is a cousin of the member for Chicoutimi?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Alfred Gagné is postmaster of Delisle, county Chicoutimi. (The district appears to be locally known as 'St. Cœur de Marie.') 2. He was appointed on November 6, 1896. His salary is $42 per annum. 3. He was paid $352.80 for timber supplied in connection with wharf at Rivière à la Pipe. 4. The government has no information on this point.

FISHING PRIVILEGES—STRAITS OF JUAN DE FUCA.

Mr. HAGGART asked :

1. To whom have fishing privileges, if any, been granted in the Straits of Juan de Fuca?

2. What is the nature and extent of these fishing privileges in each case?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Alexander Ewen; Findlay, Durham and Brodie; Pacific Cannery Company; United Canneries; C. Ternan; W. C. Mitchell. 2. Drag seines of 100 fathoms each.

GRAIN ELEVATORS AND WHARFS AT LÉVIS.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

1. Is it the intention of the government to construct, or to aid in the construction, of a grain elevator at Lévis?

2. Is it the intention of the government to build, or to aid in the building, of wharfs at Lévis for deep draught ships?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I am not now in a position to declare the intention of the government as to either of the matters referred to in the question.

INTEREST.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 161) to amend the Acts respecting interest.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I explained, in introducing this Bill, that I proposed to substitute 5 per cent for 6 per cent in cases where interest is payable. I quote now from chapter 127, section 2. of the Revised Statutes :

Wherever interest is payable by agreement of the parties or by law, and no rate is fixed by such agreement or by law, the rate of interest shall be 6 per cent.

In several other Acts a similar provision is made. We substitute 5 per cent, so that it shall be commonly understood that 5 per cent shall be the standard rate of interest instead of 6 per cent, where no agreement has taken place.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

THE EXPROPRIATION ACT.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 160), to amend the Expropriation Act.

Motion agreed to. Bill read the second time and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This is merely the complement of the other Bill. In the Expropriation Act it is provided that interest may be allowed at 6 per cent, and here it is proposed to substitute 5 per cent.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

GRAIN INSPECTION IN MANITOBA.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 141), respecting the grain trade in the inspection district of Manitoba. He said: For a long time there has been a growing friction in the North-west among the transportation companies, the warehouse companies, the farmers, and those engaged in the handling and storage of grain, and in fact every person connected with the grain in the North-west. Last year a Bill was passed by this House relating to the grading of grain, and I am happy to say that for the first year, at all events, the operation of that Bill appears to have been attended with very little difficulty. The grain was of such fine quality that we have had no difficulty whatever with the grading. I hope that the results of the present Bill will be as favourable. The difficulties appear more numerous at first sight than they really are, still I think they can be satisfactorily settled. I may say that after the session last year, a royal commission was appointed to inquire into all these difficulties. That commission consisted of four members. The late Judge Senkler was chairman, but he died before the commission had concluded its labours, and was replaced by Judge Richards. The other three members of the commission were Mr. Sirett, Mr. Lothian and Mr. Castle, all practical farmers. The report of that commission was laid before the House about a month ago, containing their recommendations. First of all, they recommend the appointment of a warehouse commissioner whose duties will be found in the fourth section of this Bill. They are in brief: To require all elevators, warehouses and mills, to take out an annual license; to fix the amount of bonds to be given by the different owners and operators of elevators; to require the persons so licensed by the commissioner to keep books; to supervise the handling and storage of grain, in and out of elevators, warehouses and cars; to receive and investigate all complaints made in writing under oath; to enforce the rules and regulations made under this Act, and to institute prosecutions at the government expense whenever he considers a case proper therefor.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. minister permit me? Instead of saying 'and so forth,' I think that subsection e is the most important of all.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Which one?

Mr. WALLACE. The one that the hon. gentleman omitted.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I was merely running rapidly over the headings. Does the hon. gentleman wish me to read the whole section?

Mr. WALLACE. No. I am asking the hon. gentleman a question. Subsection e concludes with these words:

And to apply such remedy as may be in his power.

In this the hon. minister may grant unlimited powers and privileges. What does it mean?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I think it would be better to discuss the details in committee. I am merely trying to give an idea now of what the duties of the warehouse commissioner will be, and I am merely running over the Bill. When we get into committee we can take up the details. Then, there is another officer to be appointed, who will be known as the weighmaster. His duties are described in sections 6, 7, 8 and 9. Then, there are conditions as to elevators and warehouses. There is a distinction between the two. These are described in sections 14 to 28. Terminal elevators are elevators situated at Port Arthur or Fort William, and their name indicates what their purpose is. This Bill continues by dealing with country elevators, flat warehouses and loading platforms. The Bill appears to be very bulky and enters into a great many details, but, I think, when one considers the conditions under which the royal commission was appointed it will easily be understood why, in the Bill, we have entered into so many details and why we have taken so much of the report of the royal commission. This Bill is intended to remedy, as much as possible, the friction that has existed between the railway companies, the elevator companies, the warehouse companies and the farmers. It is designed to remedy, as much as possible, that friction, and it has been thought well to enter into as many details as possible. The farmers, who are particularly interested in this measure, will see the precautions that have been taken to protect their interests. It has been thought worth while to make the Bill rather longer than it otherwise would have been in order to meet every detail which might arise and as much as possible, to dispose of all the difficulties. The Bill from section 29, to section 41, deals with country elevators, flat warehouses and loading platforms. As I was saying a moment ago there are a great many details which have been placed in the Bill in an attempt to meet all the emergencies and to give us as full information as possible. There is a new feature, and that is in connection with the flat warehouses. The farmers are very anxious, as much as possible, to load their grain themselves, so as to save, in certain cases, the expense of the elevator which they think they can very well do. As can readily be understood they can load their grain, especially with the conveniences that this Bill gives them, as they will employ their own labour in doing it, at a cheaper rate than they can unload it into the elevators. Clause 40 provides for the erection of flat warehouses, and clause 41 deals with loading platforms. There are rules and regulations made to govern the operation of these flat warehouses and platforms and to facilitate the work of shipping through them. Section 42 provides that :

Twenty-four hours shall be allowed for loading a car direct from vehicles or at a flat warehouse.

This provision is evidently meant to protect the railway's interests, and to prevent a farmer from keeping a car longer than is a reasonable time. Then, there is a clause which has been taken out of the Minnesota law in connection with the traffic in grain.

Mr. DAVIN. What is the number of that clause ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is a new clause that my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) will find in the amended Bill under the heading of 41a. It is something that we have borrowed from Minnesota.

Sir HENRI JOLY DE LOTBINIERE.

Mr. DAVIN. Does my hon. friend know what the number of the section is in the Minnesota Act ? I have it here.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have it here too. I do not know exactly where it is at this moment, but when we get into committee I will show it to my hon. friend. It is in order to protect farmers against the wrong-doings of go-betweens, those who purchase grain from them as well as those who sell it. In many cases it has been found that if farmers have not been ruined completely, very serious loss has been caused to the farmer by not rendering them an account of their proceedings, and by this clause the commission merchant will have to take out a license and pay a fee of one or two dollars and give a bond. Then, the other clauses are in connection with the funds coming from the weighing of the grain and the license fees paid to the warehouse commissioner, providing how they are to be disposed of. Every item has been carefully entered into so as to remove, as much as possible, every kind of complaint. The Bill enters into details as to what is called the dockage of grain, that is to say, the amount of dirt which is removed from a wagon load of grain and which naturally diminishes the amount of the grain which is stored or sold. The Bill enters into details so as to remove the ground of the complaint of farmers, who, in many cases, say that dealers dock a much larger amount for dirt than is really removed. This operation of discounting a certain part of the grain is known by the name of docking, and in clause 51, there are provisions made to protect the farmers and to give them the right, when this grain is cleaned, to find out exactly the weight of that part which is removed. There are penalty clauses, and in the schedule there are a number of forms that are to be filled up by the warehousemen and others in dealing with the grain. The intention of the government is to carry out as far as possible the recommendations of the commission. The appointment of the commission showed that the government had the intention to find out as much as possible what the grounds of complaint were, and to try and remedy them. When the Bill is discussed it will be found, I hope, that a successful attempt has been made to meet the difficulties.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS (East Assiniboia). I trust the House will bear with me a little while I say a few words on the second reading of this Bill. Perhaps I might claim that no member in the House has given more attention to this subject than I have personally. I have had a Bill dealing with this matter before the House for three different sessions, and I still have two Bills on the Order paper this session. I am glad to be able to say that I can fully support the Bill which is now before the House for its second reading. I have given considerable attention to it privately, and have met with parties interested and discussed its various clauses with them. I also had opportunities of considering the Bill as it now appears, and I have suggested amendments which have been accepted so that the Bill as it now stands—speaking generally and without saying in every particular—meets with my approval. I would desire one thing exceedingly, and that is that there should be absolutely no restrictions made upon the trade, but nevertheless a very good deal of good has been secured under this Bill which I believe on the whole will give general satisfaction in the country. We cannot expect to get everything we want in a matter of this kind. The various interests affected by such a measure are so complicated that to arrive at an understanding we must be prepared to give and take so as to meet the general interest and secure a satisfactory result. Upon the whole, I am prepared to support the Bill as being satisfactory to the general public. Representing the people, living in their midst, being personally interested, knowing the difficulties under which the people have laboured in years past and the various ways in which they believed they have suffered and laboured under difficulties and grievances which caused considerable dissatisfaction; I am glad of the prospect of having these removed by such a Bill as this. I need not at the present time enter into a discussion of the various clauses of the Bill. This has already been done by the hon. minister, and when in committee of the whole House, we will be able to point out anything that may not be quite in accord with our individual judgment. I congratulate the House and the country on the provisions which the Bill contemplates in the general interests of the country. I believe it will go a long way to establish confidence between the producer and the purchaser; that it will go a long way to control the trade and bring it under such inspection and supervision as will secure public confidence. Without expressing my personal opinion just now on the several clauses, I desire generally to say that I give a hearty support to the Bill and will be glad to withdraw in its favour the Bills which I now have on the Order paper.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would ask the minister if there are many amendments proposed to the Bill as originally printed?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have had all the principal amendments printed, but I was sorry to hear that they had not yet been distributed.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). In my first glance over the Bill I was under the impression—and I do not say that impression has entirely departed—that a good Bill might be made out of it. In looking carefully over the Bill, however,

I have the impression that it looks too much in the interests of the grain buyer. However, I am glad to find that by clause 36 the hon. minister has now for the second time solemnly inserted in an Act of parliament, a clause regarding which the Liberal papers throughout the west have been condemning me, and saying that it is of no use whatever. I find my clause incorporated here, which, as I say, the Liberal papers have been saying is of no use whatever. I think that now, it having been twice accepted by the government of Canada, probably these papers will not take that course in the future. There was one important suggestion made before the commission with reference to the weighing and cleaning of grain that the minister has not embodied in this Bill. In my own Bill before the House there is a clause to this effect:

Elevators built after the passing of this Act, used for the purpose of storing and handling grain for hire, shall be provided with machinery to enable the grain as hauled to be weighed and cleaned, and the resultant grain and cleanings severally weighed. The manager of every elevator having such facilities shall hand the farmer or other person who has hauled the grain a certificate or wheat ticket showing the weight in each case and stating the percentage of dirt.

I trust that when we go into committee the minister will add a clause providing that the wheat shall be separated except in the case of flat warehouses, that it shall be cleaned, that it shall be weighed, and that the farmer shall be placed in a position to know exactly how he stands.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. A couple of days ago that amendment was suggested and I have embodied it in the Bill; it is drafted in writing.

Mr. DAVIN. I am very glad. There will be another of my clauses in this Bill which may make it useful.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) will give us very useful advice. The amendment which has been suggested to me, and which I intend to propose to section 52, provides:

Persons interested in the weighing of any grain at country elevators shall, when cleaning is done, have ample opportunity, if they so desire, of personally ascertaining the net weight of the cleaned grain.

Mr. DAVIN. That would go a certain distance. When we go into committee, I shall have some other suggestions to make, and I think that with careful supervision on the part of the House and proper amendments, there is no reason why we should not lick this Bill into a shape to be useful to the farmers.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. minister whether the evidence taken before the commission has been published yet?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is about 2,000 pages in typewriting. We have not published the evidence, but we have published the report.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I understand that the report is based on the evidence, and this Bill, which is the result of that inquiry, is being put before the House without that evidence.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I may say that the evidence is before the House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not printed.

Motion agreed to: Bill read a second time, and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

On section 3.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I propose that this section be amended by adding after the words 'Inland Revenue' in the eleventh line, the following words:

—and who shall in his oath of office declare that he is not directly or indirectly pecuniarily interested in the grain trade.

We thought it was well to have this as an additional precaution for the impartiality of the warehouse commissioner.

On section 4, subsection a,

Mr. DAVIN. Has the minister considered whether it would not be better to exempt warehouses and mills from the taking out of a license?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It only amounts to $2 a year. We want to be in a position to watch over them all, and have a list of them.

Mr. DAVIN. I am not at all certain that after the committee consider the matter, it may not prove to be wise to let the provision remain as it is; but, I would like them to consider this view. It is not merely a question of the $2; but there are other clauses which provide that a license shall be obtained and bonds given, and that this shall be done only by the commissioner. It opens up a possibility of making the strongest combine that could possibly be made. It opens up this danger, that after this Bill is passed, you make all buyers of grain a close corporation in the Manitoba district, which means the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. As the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), who attended, I believe, most of the meetings of the commission, knows, the one desire of the farmers was for freedom. They wanted to be absolutely free so that they would not be at the mercy of any combine. Now, although you provide here for warehouses, it does not at all follow that after this Bill is passed warehouses will be used at all. The men who went before that commission stated expressly that they were not contending for flat warehouses. What they said was, 'Provided we get justice and know that we are safe, we prefer to ship through elevators.' What the grain-selling public of Manitoba and the North-west aim at is not so much to ship their grain through flat warehouses as to be in a position, if they like to do it, to say to the elevator combine, or to any one else engaged in the purchase and shipping of grain, 'If you are not going to do what is right, we will ship through flat warehouses.' So that, I think you should consider whether the flat warehouses should not be exempted from the license. It is not so much the paying of the $2 license fee, but that the moment the commissioner has the power to grant or refuse a license, you have a state of things created that will make a close corporation of the purchasers of grain, and you may find that the farmer, instead of being benefited, will really be worse off than he is now.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. The point raised by the hon. member is worthy of consideration. I think, however, that he has perhaps overlooked the fact that the warehouses provided for, under this Act, are not to be established for the buying and selling of grain, but that that is expressly prohibited in a clause further on. There is this further to be considered, that in compelling elevators, warehouses and mills to take out a license, and come under bonds, there is nothing prohibiting a man buying or selling grain from any elevator without a license, provided the grain is shipped from a licensed elevator.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is the point about flat warehouses that the hon. member for West Assiniboia raised. If, as most of us desire, absolute free trade be allowed in flat warehouses, and any number of farmers who choose, may have the privilege of establishing them for the purpose of storing their own grain, it is scarcely fair that they should be obliged to take out a license for that privilege. A farmer may only wish to erect a little warehouse to hold a car-load of grain at a time, and to compel him to pay a license he would regard as a great hardship. I would suggest that the clause be allowed to stand until the whole Bill is considered, so that we may see whether it should be adopted in its present form or not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. How many bushels in a car-load?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Six hundred.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. These are assumed to be of 6,000 bushel capacity.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was speaking without reference to what may follow, as what may follow, may not be adopted.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There is this further aspect to be considered. Last year we secured the privilege to the farmers of being allowed to load directly from their conveyances on to the car. This is a great advantage to people who live within a certain distance from the main line—say eight or ten miles on either side. But there are people who live thirty or forty miles, or even fifty miles on either side, and the great difficulty they have to contend with, is that they have no storage room. Last year I contended strongly that these people should have places where they could deposit so many loads until they had accumulated sufficient to fill a car, and then ship. The warehouses provided in this Bill, are to meet that want. They are not places for the buying and selling of grain, but intended to accommodate farmers and enable them to ship their grain in car-loads. I point out to the hon. member for Assiniboia, as well as the hon. member for Lisgar, that this is based upon the system in force in Minnesota, and which has been in force there some fourteen years, and has given satisfaction. If warehouses of 20,000 bushel capacity are to be used for that purpose, it is quite right that they should be under the same regulations as other places where grain is stored. The object is to have complete control and supervision of such warehouses as well as elevators. Then I would point out with reference to the mills, that a very large amount of grain is bought by Ogilvie & Co., and the Lake of the Woods Company, and it is right that they also should be under the same supervision, and unless they have to take out a license they would not.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This is part of the recommendation of the commission. We have taken literally the report of the commission. Nevertheless, if my hon. friend wishes to have this section suspended for the moment, we might do so.

Section allowed to stand.

On subsection e,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. My hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) did not appear to approve of the words 'as may be in his power.' I propose to substitute 'as provided by statute.' I move that the clause be amended in that way.

Motion agreed to.

On section g,

Mr. DAVIN. The word 'of' in the first line is superfluous.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I was about to suggest that the word 'of' be struck out. I move that the clause be amended in that way.

Motion agreed to.

On section 5,

Mr. DAVIN. In this, the minister adopts the principle of an amendment that I called to his attention last year. What I proposed was that bulletins of the prices should be put up at any point where grain was bought. Under that system, say at ten o'clock in the morning a bulletin would be put up showing the price of grain at the controlling points. When I suggested it, the minister saw great difficulty in carrying it out.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. And so did my hon. friend (Mr. Davin).

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, I did see some difficulty. But in this clause the principle is adopted.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIN. If my hon. friend will allow me, the clause reads:

The commissioner shall keep on file for public inspection in his office in Winnipeg publications showing the market price of grain in the markets of Liverpool, London, Glasgow, Winnipeg, Fort William, Toronto, Montreal, New York, Chicago, Minneapolis and Duluth.

This makes it the duty of the commissioner, who is a government officer to keep in his office the means whereby a grain seller may be informed of the prices. Therefore, I say it is the same principle. I admit that it is easier to do this than to do what I proposed last year. If the hon. minister has looked over the manuscript evidence taken before the commissioners he will have found that farmers, and others as well, gave evidence to this effect—take two points say 40 or 50 miles apart and there would be a difference of one cent or two cents in the prices obtained for grain. This being so, it is palpable that the man who got the lower price was wronged to that extent because he did not know the price that was ruling at, say, Winnipeg. After all, if the hon. minister is legislating for anything, his object is to place the farmer in a position of equality with the grain buyer. That is the object. Suppose there are two men in a grain deal,—one, who wants to buy grain, knows perfectly the state of the market, and the other who is a seller is occupied about his farm and has not the advantage of the same information. Why, you may have a commissioner and an inspector and all the machinery of this Act, yet the advantage will be overwhelming on the side of the man who has the information. And, if you acknowledge the principle, as you do here, why not carry it further? The information is to be kept in the commissioner's office. Now, who are the persons who can get it there? The grain seller who can go to the commissioner's office in Winnipeg will be one who is pretty well off who is carrying on farming in a large scale,—and he who is in a vastly different position from the average farmer, who is the one we are trying to help. I hope the minister will let this clause stand, and consult with his Commissioner of Inland Revenue, or whatever officers advise him in this matter, to see whether he will not be able to go the whole way and provide that this information shall be furnished at these different points. They would not be numerous. It would not cost a great deal of money to provide this information, and it would be for the benefit of the class of men whom the minister is trying to help.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You would have the prices posted at points where there are elevators?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) does not appear to appreciate the difference between what he proposes and what the Bill proposes. The Bill merely asks the commissioner to keep on file the publications showing the markets; it does not ask the commissioner to become responsible for quotations every day at every station on the Canadian Pacific Railway. I studied the question carefully after my hon. friend spoke to me about it last year. He agreed that it was a most difficult thing to find a way to carry it out.

Mr. DAVIN. I grant that.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. And the hon. gentleman must see the great difficulty now. Under this Act the government does not assume any responsibility. I think it would be most dangerous for the government to assume the responsibility of issuing bulletins every day stating, at every station, what the price of grain is, so that the farmers may make their price accordingly. The price of grain may change two or three times in one day, and mistakes may occur. I am not speaking of the expense of carrying out this system, which will not be trifling. But, I would object to the principle of the government issuing a bulletin under its own authority, in which case it would be responsible for the correctness of the figures, figures which are liable to change at any moment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is not the hon. gentleman doing that now by section 5, which says that the commissioner shall keep on file for public inspection in his office at Winnipeg, the market prices of grain in the chief markets of the world? Is not the government responsible for that bulletin, for that advertisement, which is to be seen every day in the office of the commissioner? And a copy of that is to be sent into the districts where there are elevators.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We know where the points of publication are. It means the different commercial and trade papers that are received from these different localities. He must keep these papers on file, but there is no responsibility entailed on the government.

It being six o'clock, the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

(The House resumed in Committee.)

On section 5,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I think, perhaps, we had better let this section stand for a time.

On section 6,

Mr. DAVIN. What would be the objection to defining the duties of the weighmaster in the Act?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That would make the Bill too complicated. His duties are pretty well defined in the succeeding clauses.

On section 12,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I propose to substitute the following words for this section:

The chief weighmaster may adopt rules and regulations for the weighing of grain, subject to the approval of the Minister of Inland Revenue.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 13,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have not filled in the blank with the amount of the penalty.

Mr. DAVIN. I suppose we will have to insert it before the Bill is passed?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I think we can say $25 up to $100, or something like that. It is not exactly a dishonest act. It is rather an act that might arise from ignorance or some other cause, so that I do not think the penalty should be too severe. I think we should make it read:

Upon summary conviction, be liable to a penalty not exceeding $100.

Mr. DAVIN. I consider $100 too high.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The magistrate can make it any amount he likes. You should have some fairly decent penalty.

Mr. DAVIN. One hundred dollars is too high. As the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue says, it does not properly come under the class of offences at all. It is a kind of misconduct that a very slight liability would obviate. Suppose we say: Not exceeding $50.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Well, $50.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. It may be a trifling offence, but it is necessary to have a pretty stiff penalty, because, in the case of a scale being out of order, a party, by preventing the inspection of it at the time, might thereby avoid the infliction of a much severer penalty under other clauses of the Act.

Mr. POWELL. The case of not keeping the scale in order is not covered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You might fix that by leaving it to the discretion of the magistrate, not to exceed $100.

Mr. POWELL. That is a large amount.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is something in what the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) says. A man who deliberately refuses to allow a person to see his scale must have an object in doing so. It is surely fair to leave it at the discretion of the magistrate.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE moved :

That the blank in the forty-sixth line be filled by the insertion of the words 'one hundred.'

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DAVIN. Are you going to fill in the other blank in the forty-seventh and forty-eighth lines ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE moved :

That the word 'weigh-master' be inserted in the forty-seventh and forty-eighth lines.

He said : It will then read :

And such penalty shall be paid to the weigh-master for the benefit of the Manitoba grain inspection fund.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the Manitoba grain inspection fund ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) will remember that by a statute passed last year, a fund was created, and out of that fund the grain inspectors are paid. We propose to pay the officers coming under this Bill out of that fund, so that we shall have only one fund.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 14,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I want to move a trifling amendment to this. The title is 'Terminal Elevators,' and I propose to add 'and Warehouses.' I had an idea at one time that all the buildings intended for storing at the terminals were elevators. There are only terminal elevators at Fort William, Port Arthur and Emerson. It struck me that we might make a distinction between these elevators, terminal warehouses, flat warehouses and country elevators. I have been given to understand that it is better to apply these provisions to warehouses too. Therefore, in the title, I propose to put 'terminal elevators and warehouses.'

Mr. DAVIN. You will have to amend the clause too.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have provided for that.

Mr. DAVIN. What does the hon. gentleman understand by terminal elevators ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Elevators at Fort William, Port Arthur and Emerson. These are terminal elevators from which the grain, coming from the country elevators and warehouses, is ultimately shipped to its destination. The hon. gentleman will see that I have an amendment which says, after the word 'elevator' put the word 'warehouse.'

Mr. DAVIN. What is the use of putting in 'warehouse' for Fort William, Port Arthur and Emerson ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It has been thought better to do so. I have an amendment which reads, that wherever the word 'elevator' appears in sections 14 to 28 inclusive, it includes a warehouse. I think there is no harm in putting that in. At the end of the first line in the clause, I beg to move :

That the word 'commissioner' be struck out, and that the words 'Minister of Inland Revenue' should be inserted instead.

That amendment is proposed in case of some important change taking place.

Amendment agreed to.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. At the end of the seventh line, I propose to add the following words :

And the expression 'terminal elevator' in sections 14 to 28, both inclusive, includes a warehouse.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 15,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I propose to strike out the words 'subject to an appeal to the Minister of Inland Revenue,' and to substitute the words, 'such revocation not to take effect until the Minister of Inland Revenue has given his sanction thereto.' Great inconvenience might arise if they had to wait for an appeal, which would necessarily take a long time. It would be a very serious thing, especially for terminal elevators, and it would appear better that they should at once get a decision from the department.

Mr. BRITTON. Suppose the elevator is owned by, say the Canadian Pacific Railway, you surely would not require that corporation to put the name of the president, secretary and treasurer of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on the elevator ?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Why should we not do it, they will have to give bonds?

Mr. BRITTON. Suppose they do. Surely the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other railway is sufficiently indicated by the corporate name of the company, without naming the president, treasurer, and so on.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not think it is very important.

On section 17,

Mr. POWELL. You have defined 'terminal elevator' as being an institution that shall include a warehouse? On the second line of page 4, you include the word 'elevator' simply, and not 'terminal elevator.' Would it not be better to use the same phraseology all through?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Very well, I will accept that.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I call attention to the wording of line 7. This is a very important matter, and I would like to ask the committee to look back to clause 17, where the words occur 'save only that he may be permitted to deliver grain previously stored in such elevator.' In this clause you use the words 'in no case shall grain of different grade be mixed together while in store.' If one of these terminal elevators should mix grain in storing, and deliver it in a mixed condition to the vessel, and the commissioner thought it advisable to revoke the license of that elevator for the time being in order to stop that practice; this saving clause would allow that elevator to empty out that mixed grain without any interference whatever from the commissioner, after the revocation of the license, in so far as the delivery of that grain is concerned. I would suggest that the word 'lawfully' be inserted, so that the saving clause will read, 'save only that he may be permitted to lawfully deliver grain.' This would make it unlawful for a man to deliver mixed grain.

Mr. BRITTON. Is it contended that a man shall not get his own grain because the elevator license is revoked?

Mr. RUTHERFORD. The hon. gentleman seems to lose sight of the fact that the object of giving these licenses and getting these bonds is to compel the elevator men to deliver grain lawfully. It is unlawful to mix grain in one of these elevators. The commissioner revokes the license; but here is a saving clause put in to let the elevator man empty out the mixed grain without let or hindrance from the commissioner or anybody else.

Mr. BRITTON. If the elevator man commits a fraud or does wrong, his license may be revoked; but you are not going to tie up the grain and prevent its delivery on that account.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Then, why not wipe out this clause giving the commissioner power to revoke the license altogether?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The only reason why I hesitate to strike out that sentence is, that we have taken the greatest care to protect all the interests represented as much as possible. But I think it would be well to change the sentence in such a way as to say, 'save and except such grain as has not been illegally dealt with.'

Mr. POWELL. I would suggest striking out the saving clause, and inserting the following words at the end of the section: 'Provided, however, that notwithstanding such revocation to warehousemen may deliver all grain which has not become mixed in such terminal elevator.' This will cover the case exactly.

Mr. BRITTON. What is to become of the grain that has become mixed. Has it got to stay there and rot?

Mr. POWELL. I do not know.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The moment a license is revoked, the work in the elevator must cease until the question is decided, and if the public suffers, the elevator people are liable to heavy penalties.

Amendment (Mr. Powell) agreed to.

On section 29,

Mr. RICHARDSON. In connection with this and some subsequent clauses, I foresee some difficulty. The question of the farmer's warehouses and flat warehouses is, to my mind, the crux of the whole Bill. If we adopt this clause, then, when we come to clause 40, which, I think, is the clause that most affects the interests of the farmers of the west, we may find that we have in a measure tied our hands. In this clause, for instance, we provide, that elevators and grain warehouses on the right of way of any railroad or on ground 'reserved by any railroad company to be used in connection with its line of railway at any station or siding other than at terminal points, are hereby declared to be public elevators and shall be under the supervision and subject to the inspection of the commissioner.'

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I was going to ask to be allowed to add the words 'or warehouses,' making it read, 'public elevators or warehouses.'

Mr. RICHARDSON. But if we adopt the clause, the minister will see, should the committee consider it desirable later on to grant permission to farmers to erect warehouses for the storing as little as a car-load of grain, we shall already have provided that these small warehouses must be licensed and be under the supervision of the commissioner. I propose to contend later on that farmers shall have absolute free trade for the shipment of grain, that they shall not be compelled to ship through any particular form of warehouse, and the size of the warehouses shall not be limited, as it is in clause 40. For the last five or six years the farmers of the west have been struggling for free trade in the handling of grain; and I believe what they really desire is that they shall be allowed to construct warehouses for themselves of any dimensions whatever on the lines of railway and handle their grain through them. If we are going to tie their hands in the way proposed later on in this Bill, I think we are destroying the very object we are seeking to obtain in the west. I regret the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) is not here. I had a discussion with him on the report and he takes the same ground that I do. I would, therefore, suggest that this clause should be allowed to remain over until we come to clause 40. Of course, if clause 40 is carried, then these others should be carried, because these regulations will be necessary.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I think that everything has been done to meet the wishes of the farmers of the west. These flat warehouses are recommended by the commission; and I would remind the hon. gentleman once more that the commission included three practical farmers, and I am told, leading farmers. They recommended that these warehouses should have a capacity of at least six thousand bushels. If the railway companies are going to be called upon to make sidings for all the warehouses with the capacity of a car-load that anybody may choose to build, I think that would be going altogether too far. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) must admit that the government is doing everything it can to meet the reasonable wishes of the farmers. Here is what the commissioners say on page 11 of their report:

We believe that the erection of flat warehouses will not in all instances be called for. The knowledge that farmers will have the right, under certain restrictions, to get the same erected, or to erect the same, will lead to a desire on the part of the elevator owners and employees to give fair prices for grain rather than to stir up feeling which will lead to the erection of those flat warehouses.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The clause does not limit the warehouse to 6,000 bushels, on the contrary that is the minimum.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. When we come to section 40, we can discuss the minimum.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The paragraph the minister has just read bears out the point I was seeking to make. While I contend for the right of the farmers to erect flat warehouses of any capacity, I do not think they will be erected to a large extent. But the very fact that you grant them the privilege to erect flat warehouses will compel the elevator owners to treat the farmers in a reasonable and proper way. That has been the crux of the difficulty all along. In this legislation we ought to desire to protect the interest of the people who grow the grain. I think it will be a mistake to fix the minimum capacity of the flat warehouses at 6,000 bushels. The farmers are not in a position to erect warehouses of that capacity. I recognize the force of what the minister has said as to the possibility of farmers erecting a large number of these little warehouses along the line, which will take up a good deal of space; and I would be willing to have it declared in this Act that where an amount of space beyond what the committee might deem reasonable, is required, or where more sidings are required than the railroad companies usually make, these sidings should be paid for by the farmers. But if we pass this clause before we have settled the principle involved in clause 40, we will make a mistake. I propose to offer strong opposition to clause 40, and to move an amendment to it.

Mr. DAVIN. Clauses from 29 to 41, I regard as making a cradle for building up combines and close corporations. As I read these clauses it seems to me they will lead to the grain buyers forming a close corporation, and that is one of the things the farmers wish to obviate. The language of the report dealing with this matter is as follows:

As a valuable accessory to the proper shipment of grain in car-load lots by farmers, we recommend the erection at shipping points of loading platforms, to be used by shippers free of charge. We believe that the erection of flat warehouses will not in all instances be called for. The knowledge that farmers will have the right, under certain restrictions, to get the same erected, or to erect the same, will lead to a desire on the part of elevator owners and employees to give fair prices for grain rather than to stir up a feeling which will lead to the erection of those flat warehouses.

We further suggest that it be provided that, in cases where flat warehouses are now operated on any lines of railway, they should not be arbitrarily done away with or refused cars for shipping grain.

The hon. gentleman will see that if at certain points farmers feel themselves aggrieved, and they want to fall back upon the only means by which they can force the grain buyers to time, a flat warehouse of 6,000 bushels capacity might be too large. In talking with farmers on this subject they suggested a minimum of 3,000. But if we pass these clauses up to 40, the result will be that the hands of the farmers will be completely tied.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let us in the meantime take clause 40.

Mr. DAVIN. I suggest to treat the Bill as the Solicitor General treated the Criminal Code Bill, let us discuss the clauses one by one and then go on leaving them stand. Then we can retrace our steps.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The commissioners recommend that 6,000 bushels at least should be the capacity of a flat warehouse. This is what they say on page 31 :

That on a written application to the warehouse commissioner by any ten farmers residing within twenty miles of a shipping point, he (the warehouse commissioner) may give permission to any person or persons to erect, under the provisions of this Act, one flat warehouse of not less than 6,000 bushels capacity at such shipping point.

That is the authority under which we have fixed the minimum at 6,000 bushels. Now I do not understand that it is the capacity of these flat warehouses that my hon. friend objects to. I do not see why in the meantime we should not go on with the Bill until we get to section 40; and then if we find we must go against the recommendations of the commissioners, we can discuss the capacity of the flat warehouses. In the meantime, as we all appear willing to get ahead, we might discuss these clauses until we come to 40 and then we can make that the battle ground if the hon. gentleman chooses.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am quite in favour of deferring the consideration of 29 until we consider section 40.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. But you must defer all the others.

Mr. DAVIN. What I suggest is that we go on and discuss each clause as we have done in the Bill amending the Criminal Code. Then we will have heard the mind of the committee on these clauses, and we can come back and consider them, so that we may be in a better position to do so.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Section 40 establishes the principle, and it is the principle that we wish to discuss in the meantime. I see no difficulty in deferring the consideration of section 29 until we settle section 40. Though, in section 40 we have the express words of the Royal Commission, I want to say, simply, that the recommendation of the Royal Commission is impracticable as I can show in a sentence or two. For a great many farmers this proposal is utterly worthless. Farmers residing within twenty miles of any shipping point are only allowed four days to send forward—

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We have changed that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is true, but as it stands section 40 is not practicable.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. My hon. friend was there when we made this change to five days instead of four and six days instead of five.

Mr. DOUGLAS.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to say further, that, in reference to the 6,000 bushels capacity, I have always felt it was too large and I call the attention of the committee to the fact that several elevator companies have to-day in operation, and have had, warehouses of 3,000 bushel capacity and less. It will be found, in the list of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, that there are a number of warehouses in operation of less than 3,000 bushels capacity. It would be much more in accord with public feeling if there was a reduction in the size.

Mr. POWELL. The suggestion of the minister strikes me as being particularly appropriate, because the whole point of the discussion is the capacity of the elevators. If we are going to have a discussion over that these features of the Bill are not to be affected by the result, as these clauses have to be passed whatever the capacity of the elevators may be. Why not pass these and let the discussion come up as to the capacity of the elevators under section 40? I do not imagine that this House is going to allow a number of elevators to be put up without the control of a public officer, or that every man on the siding of a railway is going to be practically a dictator. These elevators must be under the control of a public officer whoever he may be; and the whole discussion will come up under section 40.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why not take section 40 now? The hon. minister says that will be the battle ground. As far as I am concerned there will be no battle. I will offer no factious opposition to the Bill at all. My own view is, that, notwithstanding the fact that the commissioners have reported, we are under no obligation to adopt their report because, as the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) has made it abundantly clear, some of the recommendations of the commission are absolutely impracticable and could not possibly be carried out. You, yourself, Sir, know that a great many of the amendments suggested, and which have been printed and distributed in separate forms, are not the recommendations of the Royal Commission at all. They are the result, I have no doubt, of maturer consideration on the part of men familiar with the grain trade who are desirous of facilitating the handling of the grain with the object of protecting the interests of the farmer. I would like to hear a discussion of clause 40, and then we can go into the details because clause 40 settles the principle.

Mr. POWELL. What I want to point out is that it is not a question of principle. It is a mere question of the capacity of the elevator. Suppose section 40 fixes it at 2,000 bushels it is not going to affect the preceding sections a particle. These preceding sections have all to be put through.

If it were a matter of principle it would be the expunging of section 40 altogether, or retaining it. It is simply a matter of the capacity of the elevator. We will need these sections whatever the capacity of the elevators is.

Mr. RICHARDSON. By clause 29 elevators are :

—hereby declared to be public elevators and shall be under the supervision and subject to the inspection of the commissioner, and shall, for the purposes of the following sections of this Act, be known and designated as public country elevators or country warehouses.

However, it is not important.

On section 30,

Mr. DAVIN. Would the minister think it necessary to change the words 'under oath,' in the 47th line to 'under statutory declaration' for the same reason that he made the change before?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE moved :

That after the words 'under oath,' in the forty-seventh line, the words 'or statutory declaration,' be inserted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. Why not have the third subsection read precisely the same as the fifteenth. The hon. minister made an amendment in the fifteenth; why not make the other exactly in the same terms?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE moved :

That subsection 3 be amended by striking out the words 'subject to appeal to the Minister of Inland Revenue,' and inserting the words, 'such revocation not to take effect until the Minister of Inland Revenue has given his sanction thereto.'

Amendment agreed to.

On section 31,

Mr. DAVIN. If you put the minimum at $2,000, you might just as well leave out the flat warehouse provisions altogether. It is only a farmer or farmers who will want to build flat warehouses, and to ask them to give security of not less than $2,000 or more than $5,000, is simply putting a veto on the whole thing. It would be much better to put in not less than $500.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think you should have a penalty there at all.

Mr. DAVIN. It is not a penalty, but anyway, as it is now, it is prohibitory. Either throw it out altogether or make the amount nominal.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I would say not less than $500.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If you are going to have free trade in the handling of grain you do not want to hamper the people who would erect such a warehouse with a clause like that. It looks from such a clause as if the whole idea was to—

Mr. DAVIN. To block.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, to block the farmers from building those warehouses.

Mr. SPROULE. If you are to have perfect freedom in the election of warehouses, you would not require this clause. But if a warehouse is to be of 6,000 bushels capacity, others will use it, than those who erected it, and in that case there ought to be something to secure a proper performance of duty by the owners of the warehouse.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I endorse what has been said by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). If a farmer puts up his own warehouse and ships his own grain to it, that farmer will not be called upon to take out a license, provided he does not handle any one else's grain. Our experience in Manitoba is, that it is the small warehousemen and the commission merchants who act dishonestly with the farmers and defraud the farmers. In my own neighbourhood in a great majority of cases where the farmer has been defrauded, it is in the handling of his grain by small dealers, and it is absolutely necessary that when these people handle any one's grain, they should be brought under the operation of this Act. How can you bring them under the operation of the Act, unless you issue a license, and unless you can get security that they will conduct their business properly?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Section 40, provides for the management and erection of elevators, and it is not the farmer who is supposed to be the owner of the warehouse. I am willing to agree that we reduce the minimum amount to $500.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Make the minimum $500, and the maximum $1,000.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. It is not enough. You can have a warehouse of twenty or thirty thousand bushels capacity, and in my opinion it is necessary that the man who has a big warehouse and is handling a great deal of wheat belonging to the farmers, should be compelled to give security that he will conduct his business honestly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I agree absolutely with what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rutherford) has said upon that point. But while we have the provisions of this clause applying to large public warehouses, it surely would not be fair to have them apply to farmers who may build small warehouses.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. It does not apply. If a farmer makes an arrangement with the railway company, and puts up a flat warehouse of his own, he does not come under the provisions of this Act.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It only applies to the man who is carrying on the business of a public warehouse. We can put the amount at not less than $500, and leave the commissioner to decide what the increase shall be, in proportion to the size of the warehouse.

Mr. SPROULE. I think that is fair.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It will show that our intention is not to prevent the establishment of these flat warehouses. I move that a minimum penalty of $500 be substituted for the minimum penalty of $2,000.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. There seems to be a distinction made between 'warehouse' and 'flat warehouse' and if so, it is necessary to amend section 31, and after the word 'elevator' in the 5th line, put the word 'warehouse.'

Mr. RUTHERFORD. At country points you either have an elevator or a flat warehouse. The difference is this: An elevator may be a warehouse, but a flat warehouse cannot be an elevator.

Mr. POWELL. If that is the case, the section had better be amended to preserve the distinction between a warehouse and a flat warehouse.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. At page 7 of the report of the commission, the different kinds of warehouses are fully described.

On section 32,

Mr. POWELL. Since section 17 passed the committee, the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) has called my attention to the fact that sometimes grain is mixed in elevators, and it is a perfectly right thing to do, so long as it is not done fraudulently. If that is the case, we are going to run against the snag suggested by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), of depriving the owner of the grain of the power of getting it out of the warehouse.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. In a public elevator you cannot help mixing grain, and the amendment to section 17 would prevent grain being mixed at all. I think the suggestion I made to provide that the elevator man may be permitted to lawfully deliver grain would meet the case.

Mr. DAVIN. That would only make the delivery lawful; it would not apply to the mixing.

Mr. POWELL. You had better let the section remain as it was originally. It seems to me to have been carefully thought out.

Amendment made to section 17 struck out.

On section 34,

Mr. DAVIN. I find that a part of this clause, near its end, reads as follows:

Sir HENRI JOLY DE LOTBINIERE.

Such grain, when so delivered at terminals, shall be subject to freight, weighing and inspection charges, and all other charges (if any) lawful at such terminal points; and the party delivering shall be liable for the delivery of such grain as will, on Canadian government inspection and on weighing at such terminal point, conform to the grade and weight mentioned in such receipt.

How are you going to get Canadian government inspection when it has arrived at Duluth?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Before it leaves, it will be inspected.

Mr. DAVIN. But this clause says that the party delivering—delivering at Duluth, I presume.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. But we have no government inspection at Duluth, and if it is intended that the grain is to conform to the government inspection at Emerson, this part of the clause is badly worded.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I shall be glad to accept any suggestion for better wording.

Mr. POWELL. I would suggest that the words in question be amended so as to read as follows:

And the party delivering shall be liable for the delivery of such grain as will conform to the grade, according to Canadian government inspection, and, as nearly as possible, to the weight mentioned in such receipt.

Mr. DAVIN. That would make it clear.

On section 36.

Mr. POWELL. There is one thing that strikes me in the 8th line, the words 'one or both parties.' I do not think one party should have the right to take a sample of grain and make the application ex parte, except in case the other party declines to make a joint selection with him. I would suggest that these words be replaced by the following words: 'Both of the said parties or by either one of them if the other declines.'

Amendment agreed to.

On section 39,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE moved:

That subsection 5 be struck out, and that the following be inserted in lieu thereof:

Each of the forms set out in the schedule to this Act, or which is authorized by the Governor in Council as aforesaid, shall be used in every case in which it is applicable, and in that case the use of any other form shall be an offence under this Act and be punishable by fine, or with forfeiture of license.

He said: This has been substituted. I think it is rather severe to provide such a penalty, if a mistake is made of using one form instead of another. We have a section of this Bill—54—which provides:

Any person guilty of an offence specified in this Act, or guilty of violating any provision of this Act, for which a specific penalty is not herein provided, shall, on summary conviction, be liable to a fine of not less than _____ dollars, and not more than _____ dollars.

We have not arrived at the point yet. I cannot help thinking that it is rather severe to deprive a man of his license for what may be a formal defect.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Is that quite safe? This would then be an offence under this Act which is punishable only by a fine. How would it be to put in the words: 'punishable by a fine or cancellation of the license,' because a person, working under this Act and handling a large amount of grain, could very soon indemnify himself for a very big fine.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This only applies to forms.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. They are very important.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There might be some mistake. I think it is safe enough to add the words that the hon. member for Macdonald's point is that making it an offence punishable by a fine or the forfeiture of the license. The commissioner will exercise his judgment in that.

Mr. POWELL. As I understand, the hon. member for Macdonald's point is that a man, by making a mistake in this way, might subject another to a terrible loss. We might allow a man, a civil remedy for the damage which is done him.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. By saying 'or forfeiture of license,' it would make it optional and there would be this reserve penalty. I am not speaking legally, but I do not think that it would do any harm to put that in. It is a sort of threat.

Mr. POWELL. We might say: And in addition the minister may cancel the license.

Amendment (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) agreed to.

On section 40,

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Chairman, I want to move in amendment to this section:

That all the words in subsection 1 of clause 40 be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:

On a written application to the commissioner by ten farmers residing within forty miles of their nearest shipping point at which there is then no flat warehouse erected or authorized to be erected, he may give permission to any person to erect, under the provisions of this Act, one flat warehouse of not less than 3,000 bushels capacity, with power to enlarge the same should necessity require it, at such shipping point, and such flat warehouse, covered with metal, may be erected on the railway company's premises after getting location of a siding within such portion of its station yard as shall not involve the construction of any additional siding in some convenient place of access, if there be any, to be approved of by the commissioner, at a rental not greater than that charged to standard elevators; but should there be none and should a siding have to be located, as aforesaid, involving the construction of any additional tracks, then the applicant shall construct the road-bed and furnish the ties therefor, the company providing the rails and fastenings and receiving for the use of the same rental therefor of 6 per cent per annum on their actual cost.

Mr. DAVIN. I think my hon. friend should put in 3,000 instead of 6,000.

Mr. SPROULE. All right; I intended to do that because I think 6,000 is too large.

Mr. DOUGLAS. A radius of 20 miles will not relieve the people or the country. Take my own case; my farm is 30 miles from a shipping point.

Mr. DAVIN. He has no objection to saying 40 miles.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. It is 40 miles in the Bill.

Mr. POWELL. Why 40?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Because the people that need the relief are people that are living between 10 and 40 miles away. Those living within 10 miles, or less, of a railway station are provided for by loading platforms. We have plenty of people handling grain every day who are 40 miles away. Twenty miles excludes a large portion of the community and they would have no interest in this Bill whatever.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) would accept 40 miles.

Mr. SPROULE. I have no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is the clause, as reprinted, the one which the hon. minister proposes, distributed?

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I still adhere to the position I took at the outset when we were considering this Bill after 8 o'clock that even the amendment is entirely wrong, and that the first clause is all wrong. I do not think we should place any such restrictions on the trade at all. I believe if you adopt clause 40 you make the position infinitely worse than it is at the present time. What you want for the farmers is absolute free trade in the handling of grain. Let them build flat warehouses for themselves and handle grain if it suits them. I feel strongly that by adopting clause 40, we will be restricting the trade and imposing a real injustice and a real injury upon the farmers. I have an amendment which I wish to propose, but I shall defer it until one of the amendments is disposed of.

Mr. SPROULE. The warehouse to be of any value requires to be on a siding, and according to this Bill there might be as many on a siding as it is possible to locate. It could hardly be expected that each farmer who would so desire could erect a warehouse and expect the railway company to provide a siding for him. This amendment provides for a warehouse where there was not one already existing; it provides for enlarging, and it also provides that the company shall provide a track or a siding to it, the applicant finding the ties and the company providing the rails and other things necessary. It seems to me that that would cover the difficulty, for it would be utterly impossible to have free trade in elevators entirely and yet expect that the railway company would be compelled to build a siding for every elevator that a farmer would choose to build near a station.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I take the ground that if there were an undue number of warehouses being erected, and if any injustice was being perpetrated on the railway companies, it would be only fair to provide that where an extra large number of warehouses are desired, that the sidings should be built at the expense of those who desire them. I certainly do not want to inflict any injustice on the railway company in this matter. If forty or fifty flat warehouses are to be erected it would not be right to compel the company to provide all the accommodation and the spur lines. The report of the commission does not contemplate that if you grant the privilege it will be availed of to any considerable extent by the farmers, and I feel convinced that that is so. However, the fact that you provide that they shall be able to construct flat warehouses for themselves when they so desire will absolutely protect them from the operations of the elevator companies. In doing that you almost insure that these companies will treat the farmers in such a way as will render it unnecessary for them to erect warehouses on their own account.

Mr. DAVIN. It would be well for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) to explain his amendment. There are three amendments and we better know what each of them is before we adopt one.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The amendment which I propose is taken from the Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. Douglas). It commends itself to my judgment and I may say that it commends itself to the judgment of the member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), who takes a very warm interest in this matter, and who on account of illness is unfortunately not able to be here to-night. I propose to substitute this for clause 40:

The commissioner shall accord to any person who demands it in writing, the privilege of erecting, maintaining and using, free of charge, on some portion of the company's right of way adjoining its main track, siding or spur, at each such station or siding, an elevator warehouse or grain chute, for the purpose of storing and shipping grain in car lots; but the said elevator, warehouse or grain chute shall not be used for any other purpose.

It is a general clause. You will see that no maximum or minimum capacity is provided for, and it is particularly desirable that we should allow the utmost latitude in a measure of this kind. It does not limit to one the number of warehouses that may be constructed at any station. As I understand it, clause 40 provides only that one flat warehouse should be constructed at any particular station. I feel very strongly that if a clause like that is adopted it will meet the very strongest disapproval, as it deserves, from the people of the west. If we propose to give adequate relief to the people there, we ought to allow them to build just as many flat warehouses as they desire. If you are going to limit it to one flat warehouse with a capacity of 6,000 bushels or over, you might just as well drop the Bill altogether. By this clause you strike a deadly blow at the most vital point affecting the interests of the people of the North-west.

Mr. POWELL. I have read the report of these commissioners, who are apparently very intelligent men, and it seems to me that you are going beyond what they recommend. While everything should be done to promote trade, yet if ten farmers cannot work in unison, no railway company should be inconvenienced because of that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There might be within a radius of forty miles hundreds of farmers, and ten farmers on the extreme north might not desire the same thing as ten farmers on the extreme south. My plea is for absolute free trade in flat warehouses and freedom in shipping by means of flat warehouses. I am glad to know that my hon. friend (Mr. Douglas) is ready to support this amendment.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. To my mind, there is nothing in clause forty, as amended by the minister, which says there shall be only one warehouse at a station. It says:

On the written application to the commissioner of ten farmers residing within forty miles of the nearest shipping point, he may give permission to any person to erect, under the provisions of this Act, a flat warehouse, covered with metal, of not less than 6,000 bushels capacity.

It does not say any particular ten farmers. I may be wrong, but it appears to me that under that clause there is power to erect any number of flat warehouses.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I may say that I discussed this matter some time ago with Mr. Bell, the secretary of the commission, who had, probably, a great deal to do with preparing this Bill, and he told me that the design was that under the Bill only one flat warehouse should be allowed at a shipping point. When this section says that the commissioner 'may give permission to any person to erect one flat warehouse of not less than 6,000 bushels capacity at a shipping point,' I would like to know to whom that applies.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. To anybody—you or any one else; anybody who goes to the expense of erecting a warehouse.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Does the hon. minister say that an unlimited number may be erected?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No, I will not pledge myself to say that there might be an unlimited number of these small warehouses.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then, this cannot be interpreted to mean what the hon. member for Macdonald says it does. Would the minister say how many might be erected? Might there be more than one?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It would depend on circumstances.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think it is absurd to discuss this matter in this way. I interpret this clause to mean that only one warehouse of 6,000 bushels capacity may be allowed at a shipping point. The hon. member for Macdonald interprets it to mean that more than one may be allowed. I ask the Minister of Inland Revenue to interpret it, and he will not say how many will be allowed, or whether more than one will be allowed. I think the committee is entitled to know what interpretation the Minister of Inland Revenue places on this clause; and I appeal to the reason of the committee when I ask that the clause should not be adopted unless we have a definite statement from the minister as to what it means.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. The hon. gentleman must recognize that the commissioner who is to be appointed will be a public servant, that the application will come to him and not to the railway company, and that he will decide whether another flat warehouse will be necessary or not. Is the hon. gentleman going to trust the commissioner, who is a servant of the people of Canada and is under oath to act fairly and squarely by the people, or is he not?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not so much concerned with what the hon. member for Macdonald may think about who the commissioner may be or what his duties may be. I think this committee is entitled to know what interpretation the Minister of Inland Revenue places on this clause, because on that point the commissioner will be guided by his interpretation.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I think we are entitled to know what my hon. friend means when he speaks of an unlimited number of warehouses of 600 bushels capacity each. If he gives an idea of what he wants, then we shall be able to say what we will do. I cannot say that I will allow an unlimited number of these small buildings.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would remind the minister that we are not discussing that point, but the minimum number of warehouses to be allowed of 6,000 bushels capacity.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I cannot say how many would be allowed, because I do not understand the circumstances of the case. If a necessity were shown for two or three, I would have no objection to allowing them, but I certainly would insist on a minimum capacity of 6,000 bushels. In certain cases, where it could be shown that more than one elevator of 6,000 bushels would be absolutely required, I would be ready to make provision to allow another to be erected.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But the decision is not left to the minister, but to the commissioner.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I can scarcely agree with the Minister of Inland Revenue on two points. In the first place, if there was one thing stronger than another in the entire evidence given before the Royal Commission, it was that the country desired perfect freedom of trade, and that the flat warehouse was the only means of securing it. To allow only one flat warehouse at one shipping point is a mockery, and not at all in accord with the evidence given before the commission.

Mr. POWELL. The commission recommended one, did they not?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not care what the commission recommended. The evidence was in favour of perfect freedom of trade. Further, as to the warehouses being limited to 6,000 bushels capacity, the minister says he is not prepared to yield on that point; but I know, as is reported by the board of trade, that we have quite a number of warehouses now in operation and used by these grain companies the capacity of which is even less than 3,000 bushels, certainly not more than 3,000 bushels. If, then, these companies are permitted, as we have already provided in the Bill, to utilize elevators of 3,000 bushels capacity, why ought not a company of ten farmers to be allowed to make use of elevators of the same capacity? If those companies have the privilege, the producers ought to have the same privilege. I feel that this is imposing a restriction, contrary to the evidence which the Royal Commission received in their meetings throughout the country. I would like very much to leave the number indefinite and open; and further, to provide that the capacity should not be less than 3,000 bushels, and as much more as you like.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me, if the English language means anything, that this clause means that there may be more than one erected.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But the minister does not interpret it in that way.

Mr. SPROULE. It will not be the minister who will be called on to interpret the clause.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then, let us make it clear.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. In order to clear this matter up, I would move that the words 'flat warehouse' be put in the plural, and that the clause read in this way:

He may give permission to any person to erect, under the provisions of this Act, one or more flat warehouses.

Mr. SPROULE. One person may erect one or more.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Should the necessity arise for more than one of those flat warehouses, after due consideration, the commissioner may give the permission required.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not want to leave it in the judgment of any one.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I intend to press my original amendment, and if it is voted down, I will then contend for the amendment that the hon. minister seemed disposed to grant, namely, that under this clause more than one flat warehouse could be erected.

Mr. BRITTON. Without discussing its merits, the section is somewhat ambiguous. I agree with the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), that the section does not limit the permission to one warehouse, but I do not think more than one could be erected on the application of any particular set of ten farmers. If it is intended that on the application of ten or more farmers, permission may be granted by the commissioner, to any person, to erect a flat warehouse, and that on the application of another ten farmers or more, another similar permission may be given, that ought to be stated.

Mr. POWELL. The railway company may provide ample accommodation themselves, and here is a law that will force them to put in a siding at their own expense, which would cost $5 to $10 a foot, wherever a flat warehouse is erected. If the necessity exists every accommodation should be given. But it is only fair to the company that they should not be compelled to put in sidings for flat warehouses erected by private individuals, when the company have themselves given all the accommodation required. Even our own government does not put sidings on along the Intercolonial Railway, wherever a farmer desires such accommodation. If an individual wants a siding for his own accommodation, he must put it in himself.

Mr. RICHARDSON. How does the hon. gentleman like my amendment?

Mr. POWELL. I think that in working it out, my hon. friend would find that the grain dealers would suffer themselves. You have no idea of the ingenuity of railway companies to overcome legislation, and I see great opportunities for them in this amendment. Take the first clause of the Bill submitted last year by the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas).

Every railway company now or hereafter engaged in the transportation of grain in the province of Manitoba or the North-west Territories shall, at every station or siding on its lines of railway at which grain is offered for shipment, provide, at its own expense, adequate facilities, &c.

There is the first provision. Then, and only in case of failure on the part of the railway company to provide these facilities, comes the subsequent provision to meet the case and enable private parties to provide facilities. If you will read the reports of the American Interstate Commerce Commission, you will find that the ingenuity of man is not equal to the ingenuity of railway corporations. I think that the effect of the Bill drawn up by the hon. member for East Assiniboia would be such that the poor farmers would be simply fooled. They would have to go into a long litigation to decide in each individual case whether the facilities provided by the company are adequate or not, which would probably be carried to the Privy Council before finally decided. If the hon. gentleman will read the reports of the Granger legislation out west in Kansas, he will see how these people got a stone when they thought they were getting bread, and will then understand how this clause would afford no relief whatever.

Mr. DOUGLAS. This clause that was introduced into my Bill last year, and this year, is based on the Railway Act of the Dominion itself, and this government has the perfect right to compel any company to provide facilities to receive whatever produce that may be presented at the station, when the people are prepared to pay the usual freight rates. It is altogether out of keeping with the spirit of the Dominion Railway Act to say that a railway company is not bound to provide facilities. You will observe in this proposed amendment, that it is only where the railway companies do not provide facilities, that other people are allowed to furnish them, and in that case there need be no legal process to compel the railway companies to give facilities themselves.

Mr. POWELL. You cannot enact effectual legislation to compel railway companies to provide facilities, or allow other parties to do so, on any portion of its right of way, free of charge, by statute. The only way you can do that is by appointing some commission which will have the power to direct these railway companies to make the necessary improvements in the interests of the public. If you let the individual farmer fight this out with the railway company, he might as well retire from his farm. I do not believe in leaving this matter in the control of the government, because no matter what government may be in power, it is too much influenced by politics. We want an independent commission to control these matters. But we have not got that. How are you going to work it out? Take, for instance, the clause providing that they shall provide the necessary facilities.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will call the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) to the fact that the Bill provided that the enforcement of the Act depended upon the government of Canada and not upon the individual farmer.

Mr. POWELL. In the Bill of last year?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. POWELL. I do not suppose the government would permit private members to submit such an Act, which would involve a charge on the revenue. But, in any case, see how it works out. A private farmer wishes to have the hon. gentleman's law carried out. He complains of lack of facilities. First, he sues the company for damages. They defend the action. That matter is taken to the Privy Council. The farmer is scared out of the fight.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not necessarily. The western farmer is not easily scared. The Canadian Pacific Railway will pay the cost in the long run.

Mr. POWELL. Your farmers will be rather backward about entering litigation with any large company.

Mr. RICHARDSON. They could combine and push it.

Mr. POWELL. We must have some stringent measure. If you have a commissioner, you have only to compel them to do it. There is no real point of dispute.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Under clause 40 as proposed, we are going to deprive the farmers of their constitutional right. The effect of it is to restrict trade. The effect will be to destroy the very object, the Bill is or ought to be designed to promote. I would press my amendment.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) says the Bill is not fair, I would like to read the clause as adopted in the state of Minnesota:

The owner or owners of any elevator, warehouse or mill of not less than 5,000 bushels capacity, located on lands adjacent to the right of way of any railroad company in this state at or in the immediate vicinity of any regular way station of any railroad, shall have the right to demand of such railroad company the construction of a side-track over its right of way from such elevator warehouse, mill or manufactory, which said side-track shall connect with a switch with the main or other side-track of such railroad, at a point within a reasonable distance from such way station, and the railroad company shall build said side-track and make such connection at its own expense. And in case no suitable place for the erection of such elevator, warehouse or mill can be had, for any cause, within the distance occupied by the switches, then the railroad and warehouse commissioner shall have the right, upon application of either party in interest, to designate a place for the erection of the same, not more than one-quarter of a mile beyond the end of such switch.

Then, there is a proviso that limits the liability of the railway companies as to switches extending outside of their own premises:

Provided, however, that no such owner or owners shall have the right to demand, nor shall any such railroad company be required to construct any side-track under the provisions of this Act which shall connect with the main track of such railroad outside of the outside switches of the yard of such station or siding as the same may be established at the date of such demand.

In view of this section, I do not think the Bill is so unfair as my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) seems to think.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Mr. Flint). I think we had better take the motion to substitute the draft clause proposed by the Minister of Inland Revenue to replace the clause 40 in the Bill as the main motion. To that there is an amendment by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and an amendment to the amendment by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson).

Mr. BRITTON. Do I understand the amendment to mean that, on the application of ten or more farmers more than one of these warehouses may be erected, even more than one by one person?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. If it was the same person, he would simply increase the size of his existing warehouse.

Mr. BRITTON. However, that does not cover my point. Do I understand that this means that on the application of ten or more farmers, the commissioner may, in his judgment, authorize the erection of more than one of these warehouses at a particular station, and compel the railway companies, at their own cost, to put in the sidings? If so, do you not think it is a hardship? I do not know that the western farmers are different from others. We have to have warehouses built here. There is not a warehouse in the country that does not require railway facilities. And the railway companies, of course, are glad to give them to persons if they pay for the

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. These flat warehouses are not destined to store grain for a long time as hon. gentlemen will see by reading subsections 5 and 6 of section 40. The evident intention of the Bill is that farmers shall empty these warehouses soon after they are filled, and not to use them for a long time as store-houses.

Mr. POWELL. This is a matter I propose to discuss, even though some hon. gentlemen think some of us who take different views from themselves, are interfering with the business of the farmers in the west. That evils have existed out there there can be no doubt. An independent commission, professedly clear-headed and just men, was appointed by the government to go out there and investigate the troubles. They made this recommendation, which will be found on page 31 :

That on a written application to the warehouse commissioner by any ten farmers residing within twenty miles of a shipping point, he (the warehouse commissioner) may give permission to any person or persons to erect, under the provisions of this Act, one flat warehouse of not less than 6,000 bushels capacity at such shipping point. Such flat warehouse to be erected on the railway company's premises after getting location of a siding, the railway company to be compelled to give such location, with siding, on their premises, in some place of convenient access, to be approved of by the warehouse commissioner, at a rental not greater than that charged to standard elevators. No owner or operator of any such flat warehouse to be allowed to store in or ship through such flat warehouse grain purchased by or for himself.

Such warehouse to contain not less than six bins of 1,000 bushels capacity each, and each bin to be numbered by a separate number.

Now, there are four independent, respectable men, men of intelligence, selected especially for the work of the government, and they make this report. The Minister of Inland Revenue has gone further, and has said : I will not limit them to one warehouse for the storage of their grain, but I will give them as many as the applications that are shown to be just should demand. Not only that, but he carries the Act further and put qualifications in there which are not in the original Bill which are in favour of the farmers, and yet my hon. friend gets up and says that a person is attempting to throttle the people of the West. He must remember that he is interested, and it looks as if the hon. gentleman has, by some means or other, a prejudice that he cannot overcome. He thinks that he and his fellow farmers should get privileges that this commission did not think they were entitled to, although the general tone of the commission is very much in favour of the farmers. If the hon. gentleman can show any good reason that will convince me that the commission are wrong, I would be only too glad because, I think, where the interests of the farmers are concerned we should not allow any corporation, or any body of men, to interfere with their success, as we would thereby prevent the growth of the west, because the future development of Canada certainly depends on the development of that country. But, there is this fact in addition ; take the interest of the railway itself. You allow, Tom, Dick and Harry and everybody else who makes a demand to erect a flat warehouse in the yard, and what is the result ? You get it all lumbered up, and by this Bill you compel the company to comply with the applications and the applicants are not under any financial responsibility except the payment of a rental. To my mind it would be made use of for the purpose of blackmail. Farmers generally are honest, but among that class there are people who are not any more honest than their neighbours. Such people will take the powers given to them under the Act for the purpose of blackmailing a railway company. This Act is largely tentative, if it does not meet the case, come back next year with well grounded complaints, and let us understand its workings. Here is my hon. friend, my reverend friend, who is making this application to the House. Why ? He tells us that he does not believe that the powers of this Bill will be invoked. It shows that he is not looking towards business but looking to some ulterior object other than business, because the facilities provided are not going to be realized, and the powers of the Bill are not to be invoked.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The argument of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) is exceedingly plausible, but I know the spirit and conditions of the west better than he does.

Mr. POWELL. I admit that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I want to be understood and to be put on record as saying that this recommendation of the Royal Commission is in the very teeth of the evidence which they received from that country, and I appeal to the evidence that has been laid before the House.

Mr. POWELL. Why did you not have it brought down ?

Mr. DOUGLAS. And then, the recommendation of the Royal Commission has the stamp of the Winnipeg grain trade upon it. It is not in the interest of the farmers, but in the interests of the trade. It is the interest of the trade that is considered, and not the interest of the producer. This is the reason that I wish to stand by the idea of having an open door. We do not wish to crowd the railway companies by putting up a lot of small buildings, but, we want it left so, that every individual or any number of men, if they are aggrieved with the existing state of things, shall not be tied neck and heel to any twenty men in any city or town, but that they shall have the liberty to go with their product to the market and to put it on the market in any way they choose. Then, they will be satisfied as to whether justice is, or is not being done to them as is their right as citizens of this Dominion. And I contend that no government whether it be Liberal or Conservative, has the right to detract from that privilege. It is true that there are certain things the production or the manufacture of which is circumscribed by law. If farmers were producing dynamite and selling it then it would be proper to apply rules and regulations to that commodity. But will hon. gentlemen tell me that such restrictions are imposed upon any other class of the community unless it be in the case of liquor, or of something that might injure a man's neighbour, but, when the farmer produces bread to feed his neighbour, who cannot provide it for himself, he is a benefactor and he ought to have a liberty to approach the market in his own way. I am not contending for the principle of flat warehouses. I do not care for flat warehouses at all. All I want is an open door which would allow farmers to put their produce on the market in their way as I believe it to be their right so to do. I hope that when a decision is reached it will be of such a character as to leave an open door. It is not one, or two, or three flat warehouses which the Bill provides for. It should not be left to the dictation of this grain commissioner appointed by the government. I do not think that we should compel any section of the country to submit to the judgment of any individual man in the community. My own opinion is that we should not have a grain commissioner, but a grain commission. My idea was to follow the Minnesota plan and have a commission of five individuals. In laying the responsibility of carrying out this Bill upon one individual we are placing more responsibility upon the shoulders of one individual than we should. It may be a tentative measure, but I am satisfied it will not continue very long until there will be not a grain commissioner, but a grain commission.

Mr. POWELL. My hon. friend (Mr. Douglas) has been so given to other worldliness that he has not got down to this world. Take things as they are. So far as this being exceptional treatment. I may say the Bill is exceptional treatment. It singles out the farming interest for exceptional and favourable treatment. I would inform the hon. gentleman that there is not an industry from one end of the country to the other that is treated so exceptionally by this parliament, or by any other legislature in the Dominion of Canada. The hon. gentleman asks for entirely exceptional privileges and rights. It is class legislation, purely and simply. I do not oppose it on that ground. I am not prepared to question it, and in a great deal that the hon. gentleman says I concur; as respects a more extensive commission, there can be doubt as to its desirability. In Germany, where matters are nominally under the control of the government, they are regulated by a commission. Tariff rates are regulated by a commission, trade facilities are regulated by a commission, and on that commission are represented the different interests in the empire of Germany. Some day, I trust, we will have some such successful regulations as that here, when farmers, mechanics and producers of all kinds shall constitute the railway commission of this country. They are acquainted with the requirements of each branch of commerce in the country generally. But, at the present we are striking out upon an entirely exceptional line of legislation, we are granting privileges that have heretofore been unheard of; some oppose such favours as being granted to a particular class. I admit the necessity of legislation, but do not let us get away entirely from the past. We are going a long way at present. Give this a trial for a year or two and let us see how it works. The Minister of Inland Revenue has gone a great deal beyond what the commission has asked him to do. It is well enough for my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) to make the statement that this commission was dictated to by a lot of grain dealers and shippers in Winnipeg. That may be so, but I do not know it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I know it.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. gentleman does not know it. He cannot know it. It is not a legitimate use of language. What he should say is: 'I surmise it,' not 'know it.' I have no doubt he does surmise it, and his surmise may possibly be correct. I have every confidence in the minister, and if he made the selection I do not think he would select improper men. I am informed that these commissioners are very honourable men. Speaking from the experience I have in testing evidence, I would judge from their report that they have discharged their duties in a very judicial manner, indeed. These men have given their judgment of what is best suited to the requirements of the west, and we have already gone further than they have asked. Before we go to the radical length the hon. gentleman asks us to go, we ought to pause and see first how the legislation works. At present let us not give away entirely to the supposed interest of one class, more especially as our action may be the worst thing we could do in the interests of that class. In Kansas, the farmers have had some experience of railway legislation, and the greatest fizzle in the whole history of legislation is the Granger Railway legislation of the west. They secured very extreme measures and endeavoured to put them in force, and the result was that every business interest suffered, and there was a howl from one end of Kansas to the other, and the very men who are demanding the repeal of that law are the farmers of Canada.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This is not Granger legislation.

Mr. POWELL. It is exactly in the line of Granger legislation. They over-reached themselves in Kansas, and it is possible the same may occur here.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think any one need be alarmed about the provision as to more than one flat warehouse at a siding. If it is permissible to construct one warehouse it might be necessary to establish a second one if the needs of the business required it.

Mr. POWELL. Certainly.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Bill provides for the enlargement of the warehouse, and I do not expect that a second one will be needed. If it is going to do any one any good to have a provision made, that if the necessity should arise there may be another warehouse, I do not think it can hurt any one to have it in the Bill. I feel confident that the way it will work out will be, that either the railway company, or persons acting in conjunction with the railway company, will provide facilities where the business is urgent. In some cases a flat warehouse will be constructed under this Act. I do not think that a second warehouse will be constructed at all, but yet it might give additional security, or they may feel it would, to the parties interested.

Mr. POWELL. The point is, introducing other legislation which gives to every man who makes application for it the right to have a small warehouse.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I was speaking to the amendment of my hon. friend (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), which I think is reasonable.

Mr. POWELL. Perfectly reasonable.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) quite appreciates the beginning of the grievances that led to the appointment of this commission. The farmers wanted to be free to ship their grain as they pleased, and because the commissioners gave their report practically through the channel of the grain trade, it does not remove that grievance any the more. Because they pointed out how the grain trade could be regulated, does not necessarily prove that the grievances of the men who have the grain to sell are going to be met. It is no argument to say that these provisions should not be inserted in the law because they would not be availed of. If they leave an alternate course open to the shipper, the conditions will be so regulated through the ordinary grain trade channels that he would be able to take advantage of them. The amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) would do away with the necessity of putting in any of these sub-clauses at all, or that amendment could be added to section 40. In looking over the evidence, I believe that the commissioners found but very few farmers to express any desire to have the privilege to construct, or who said they would construct, a single car-load flat warehouse. However, it is my opinion that a warehouse with the capacity of 6,000 bushels is altogether too large. If the minimum were fixed at 3,000 bushels, and on the petition of five members, it seems to me that the grievance would be very fairly met.

Amendment to amendment (Mr. Richardson) negatived; amendment (Mr. Sproule) negatived.

Mr. PUTTEE. Cannot the minister substitute 3,000 bushels for 6,000?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. My hon. friend proposes to reduce the minimum to 3,000 bushels. I must honestly say that that is against my own personal opinion; but as there appears to be on both sides of the House a wish to reduce the minimum to 3,000 bushels, I will ask the committee to amend the clause to that effect.

Amendment agreed to, and subsection as amended, agreed to.

On section 41,

Mr. SPROULE moved:

That on an application to the commissioner by ten farmers residing within twenty miles of the nearest shipping point, it will be the duty of the commissioners to inquire into the necessity for a loading platform at such shipping point and the railway company shall be heard at such inquiry, and if he deems the appliance necessary and proper, he shall serve notice to that effect on the railway company.

He said: The company ought to be heard before the commissioner comes to a decision that a platform should be erected.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. There is no necessity for this amendment at all. There is no reason why a platform should not be erected at every station for the loading of grain. The railway companies erect platforms for the accommodation of their passengers, and they make a great deal more out of shipping grain than out of passengers. At some points where the railway companies gave the privilege of loading from the wagons on to cars, the farmers had to drive their wagons into a ditch and erect ladders.

Mr. SPROULE. The railway company should be consulted as to the wisdom and convenience of erecting platforms in any specified place.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The commissioner would consult the railway company in any case.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The words 'approval of the commissioner' sufficiently protects the railway companies. He would not order anything unreasonable, and it would not be unreasonable to exact that one platform should be erected at every shipping point in the west.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman should not press this amendment. How can a railway be compelled to put up a platform without having been consulted?

Amendment (Mr. Sproule) negatived.

Mr. POWELL. I move an amendment to this effect:

Provided, however, that the railway companies shall not be obliged to erect any such platform outside the limits of the station yard.

If they put it beyond the yard, it compels them to put in another switch, and interferes with the safety of their line, and it would also put them to considerable expense.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The Minnesota law, which I quoted a short time ago has a provision similar to that suggested by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell). I think it would be well to adopt the suggestion, and in so doing we shall follow the Minnesota law which served us so greatly in the preparation of this Bill.

Mr. POWELL. If the amendment is not accepted, I would ask the Minister of Inland Revenue, in the interests of the public, not to pass clause 40 until the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) has had time to consult Mr. Schreiber about it. I know from experience that the railways hesitate very greatly about putting in these sidings, as they increase the danger of operating the road. So long as they were confined to the station yard, I would not object.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. In the west they have sidings for loading wheat in any wheat-growing district, and they put these in usually of their own volition. It seems to me the clause actually covers the point suggested by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) when it provides that the sidings shall be put in at the request of farmers within twenty miles of the nearest shipping point. If it is a shipping point platforms will be inside the yard.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Is 'station-yard' a term with a legal definition?

Mr. POWELL. Yes, it means within the semaphores. Beyond that there are no signals, and they cannot be sure of avoiding danger.

Amendment (Mr. Powell) agreed to.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I propose that the following be inserted as section 42:

Mr. FIELDING.

From and after the 1st day of September, 1900, it shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to engage in the business of selling grain on commission, or to receive or solicit consignments of grain for sale on commission, in the inspection district of Manitoba, without first obtaining an annual license, for which he shall pay $2. from the warehouse commissioner, to conduct and carry on the business of such commission merchant, and giving a bond to Her Majesty, with sufficient surety for the benefit of persons entrusting such commission merchant with consignments of grain to be sold on commission, in such amount as is fixed by the commissioner, subject to appeal to the minister. If such commission merchant receives grain for sale on commission, the said bond shall be conditioned that he faithfully account and report to all persons entrusting him with grain for sale on commission and pay to such persons the proceeds of the consignments of grain received by him, less the commission earned on account of the making of such sale, and necessary and actual disbursements. If he does not receive grain for sale on commission, the bond shall be conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties as such commission merchant.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I think there is grave objection to that clause. It seems to me that a man who goes into that country to purchase grain ought not to be treated like a pedlar. It will not do any good either to the farmers or to the shippers. Why should we put restrictions on a man who goes there and offers a price for grain? The farmers of the North-west know all about the price of wheat; there is no fear of anybody imposing on them. Why should this man be obliged to pay two dollars to get a license to purchase wheat?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This refers to commission merchants; if he has the money to pay for the wheat he does not need a license.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There are so many cases in which it has been found indispensable to protect the farmers that this clause has been introduced. A similar experience had led to a similar clause in the Minnesota law.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). But where is the protection to the farmers, because this man has to take out a license?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. He must give bonds, so that in case he should deceive the farmer the latter can sue him.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I would like the hon. gentleman to give me some information. As this appears to me, a man requires a license to sell grain on commission. If a man has the money to buy grain and pay for it, and he sells it again, he does not need any license. The man who buys and sells on commission is the man who buys wheat without money, and trusts to his sales to pay for it. Those are the men by whom our farmers lose money every year.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). It is a new doctrine that a commission merchant should take out a license. I do not see any difference in purchasing wheat from purchasing anything else.

Mr. DAVIN. Have there been cases where farmers have lost in this way?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. If there is a single case where they have lost, of course it is a good thing that the man who buys the grain should give bonds and place himself in a responsible position.

On section 45.

Mr. POWELL. I cannot get any meaning out of a good deal of the verbiage of this clause.

Notwithstanding that elevators of any greater or other capacity shall be erected at such point or for any other cause other than non-compliance with the law or as next hereinafter provided.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Until now the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, on the erection of a standard elevator at a station where a flat warehouse has hitherto existed, has been in the habit of refusing cars to the flat warehouse and closing it up. The first part of this clause, I understand, is a suggestion from the commission to prevent in future that action on the part of the railway company.

Mr. POWELL. What is the meaning of this 'notwithstanding.' It means on account of.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. In 1883 there was so much difficulty in handling grain that a great part of it had to be piled up. Then the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in order to encourage the building of elevators, made certain arrangements for standard elevators of the capacity of 25,000 bushels. These elevator men had certain privileges or monopolies which, since that time, have been set aside. But this law is passed so that all the smaller flat warehouses and all that are now existing, should not be set aside.

Mr. POWELL. There are certainly some words in this clause that are altogether meaningless: 'or for any other cause other than non-compliance with the law or as next hereinafter provided.' Well, there is nothing hereinafter provided.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I wrote to Winnipeg to get the meaning of that clause, and was not successful. But I am perfectly certain it is a most humanitarian and benevolent clause, and there can be no possible harm in our adopting it. I cannot explain what the clause means, but I am perfectly certain no harm is intended by it.

On section 47.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE moved:

That the words 'or buying' shall be inserted after the word 'selling' in the forty-sixth line.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 50.

Mr. SPROULE. Do you not think that the rules and regulations made under the authority of the Act, should be posted in every licensed elevator and warehouse, as well as in every licensed terminal elevator?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We will strike out the word 'terminal' in the thirteenth line, so that it will read as follows:

The rules and regulations made under the authority of this Act shall be posted up by the commissioner in a conspicuous place in every licensed elevator and warehouse.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Look at the next clause, which is as follows:

Such of the said rules and regulations as refer to dealings between producers, buyers, shippers and elevator or warehousemen, together with such portions of this Act as the commissioner or the Governor in Council deems proper, shall be printed in reasonably large type by the commissioner and posted in a conspicuous place in every licensed elevator or warehouse by the owner thereof.

Mr. SPROULE. Why do you want two clauses, both referring to the same thing?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There is a distinction between the two, but we will take out the word 'terminal' in the first one.

Mr. DAVIN. You should have them in the warehouses if you have them in the elevators.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Why not put it altogether, so that it will read:

The rules and regulations shall be printed in reasonably large type by the commissioner and posted in a conspicuous place in every licensed elevator or warehouse by the owner thereof.

There is only need for one of these clauses if it is properly worded, but it requires to be carefully worded.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We must take time to examine that carefully. I think these two clauses do not contradict one another. One of them applies to terminal warehouses, and the other to country warehouses.

Mr. DAVIN. I am quite satisfied with the section as it is.

On section 52.

Mr. DAVIN. I had in my Bill a No. 10 tester, which is the same as ten meshes.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. It is the same thing. Would it not be better, at the end of that clause. to say: The use of damaged and defective sieves shall be an offence under this Act?

On section 53.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I would suggest the addition of the following words, which I think the hon. member for West Assiniboia was proposing before dinner. I think this will about meet his views. I b. g. to move:

That after the word 'weighed' in the twenty-ninth line there shall be inserted the following words: 'And shall have ample opportunity, if they so desire, of personally ascertaining the net weight of the cleaned grain.'

The clause will then read:

Persons interested in the weighing of any grain at country elevators or warehouses shall have free access to the scale while such grain is being weighed and shall have ample opportunity, if they so desire, of personally ascertaining the net weight of the cleaned grain.

Mr. DAVIN. In the dirt that they dock, there is a large amount of small grain that farmers tell me is very valuable to them.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes, but unfortunately it is so much mixed with weed, that the law prevents them using it, and they are afraid of turning it out on account of the weeds.

Mr. DAVIN. I think it is a pity that we cannot solve that question in some way, because complaints in regard to that constitute a great grievance. They want to be allowed to make use of this small grain that they feed to their hens. However, it is a very difficult question, I know, with the local legislation, and the local ordinances, and I do not see how it can be dealt with.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Why should not this clause refer to 'all elevators'? For instance, the milling companies who do not clean grain would be exempt under this clause.

Mr. SPROULE. I would go much further than this clause if I had my way. I would compel every one whose duty it was to weigh grain to make an affidavit that they would faithfully discharge their duties. Anything less than that will still leave it to a large number of people to do what is not honest. A farmer may know a little about the scales, yet the whole thing is done so quickly that he cannot tell whether the grain is weighed correctly or incorrectly. In a case like that it would be no hardship on any one charged with the duty of weighing grain to provide that he should make an affidavit that he would discharge his duty faithfully.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. What would be the value of the affidavit of a man who would wilfully falsify weights?

Mr. SPROULE. There might be men who would wilfully falsify weights and yet would not make a false affidavit. One great trouble is that those who sell grain know nothing about the exact weight of it, as they do not see it, and they are often cheated by dishonest weighers.

Mr. DAVIN. Why not add to the beginning of the clause 'and in all elevators wheat shall be cleaned.'

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Have all the elevators got machinery for cleaning?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The milling companies have not, but why should they not?

Mr. SPROULE. Would the minister introduce a clause to compel those who weigh grain to make a statutory declaration that they shall do so honestly?

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Would they have to do that for every load?

Mr. SPROULE. No, there is a man there all the time weighing.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Suppose the man employed at the elevator to weigh grain was absent for any cause and another man took his place, it might be in a country place where there was no magistrate, how would you administer the oath?

Mr. SPROULE. That would be a very rare and exceptional case. These elevators are, I suppose, in a settlement where there would probably be a magistrate, but, at all events, it would be an easy matter for them to take the oath before they commence their duties.

Mr. DAVIN. Would not the minister provide that all elevators built henceforth shall be supplied with machinery for cleaning grain?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I propose to include all elevators, and that will cover the whole case.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This is, to a certain degree, an experimental Bill, and we should not take it for granted that all elevators have cleaning apparatus.

Mr. DAVIN. We can provide, that in all elevators built after this there shall be cleaning machinery.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I may say that on the Northern Pacific elevators there are no cleaners at all.

Mr. DAVIN. They should be compelled to put them in.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. What about the grain shipped through warehouses?

Mr. DAVIN. We cannot help that.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I think it is well not to grasp too much at once. We have trouble enough now, and I think we had better leave this.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Very well, I will not press it.

Mr. DAVIN. I know that the farmers of the North-west attach very much importance to this, and I would suggest that we let this clause stand, and consider it when we go into committee at a future period.

Mr. SPROULE. Before this section is disposed of, I beg to move :

That all parties entrusted with the duty of weighing grain at these elevators or warehouses shall take a statutory oath for the correct performance of their duty.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That may stand with the clause, and we will consider the two together.

Section allowed to stand.

On section 55,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I think we must go to extremes in fixing these fines. I mean to say, that I think the minimum ought to be small, because there are many offences under the Act which do not call for a heavy penalty, while there are others which should be severely punished. Therefore, I would suggest not less than $25 or more than $1,000.

Mr. DAVIN. Ten dollars is a large enough minimum.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Very well, put it at $10.

Section agreed to.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.45 a.m. Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, May 22, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER'S PUBLIC LIFE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I am going to ask the kind indulgence of the House to say a single word in reference to the very kind manner in which I have been received here to-day by both sides. I need not say, Sir, how deeply I have been touched by the kind manner in which my friends on this side of the House have marked the completion of the forty-fifth year of my public life, and not less so by the very generous manner in which the same spirit has been evinced by hon. gentlemen to whom I am opposed politically. I may say, Sir, that I was elected to represent my native county, the county of Cumberland, Nova Scotia, on May 22, 1855, so that to-day is the completion of forty-five years of continuous public life. During that period I have been engaged in the active practice of the medical profession for twenty-nine years, and I have had the good or bad fortune to hold the highest offices in my native province and in the Dominion of Canada, for twenty-eight years of my public life; and I think almost every person will agree that unless I was a great glutton both of office and of emoluments arising from it, I ought to be abundantly satisfied with the past. If I were half as polite a person as King Charles II., who apologized to those who had been detained for some time standing around his bedside to see him expire, I would make an apology for lagging on the stage of public life so long. I can only say that it is not my desire that that period should be very much longer continued; but, I am afraid I shall have to remain, at all events, until the electorate of the country shall decide which of the two great parties who are now contending for power in this country are to enjoy it during the period which is to come.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sure, Mr. Speaker, though I have no right to speak in this House except for one side of it, that on this occasion I voice the sentiments not only of those who are here present, but the sentiments of the whole Canadian people, when I express our pleasure that we are able to see this day and to congratulate my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, upon the completion of the forty-fifth year of his public service to his country. It is one of the blessings of political life that it is possible sometimes to forget that we are divided in opinion. It is one of the redeeming features of public life that though our fights are keen and sometimes bitter, still, after all, we can realize that beneath, or I should say above, there are nobler sentiments that guide us. I do not share the views of my hon. friend on many questions; those who are associated with me have taken issue with him upon many questions of public interest; but I am proud and glad to bear this testimony to the public career of my hon. friend, that, though I might take exception to it in many ways, it will live, and live for the best, in the history of Canada. It has been his good fortune to be associated in some of the great events of his time ; it has been his good fortune to be associated with the great event which brought Canada to the proud position it now occupies—which brought it from the condition of diversified, scattered provinces, to that of a united nation. For my part, I hail with pleasure the announcement that my hon. friend is to lead his party at the next general elections, and I do so, not by any means because I minimize his influence. On the contrary, I am fully conscious of the great power which his strong personality must exercise on the electors of Canada, but I do it all the more sincerely because, entrenched in the justice of the cause I represent, I am convinced that, notwithstanding all his efforts, he will still remain where he is, long to adorn the Canadian parliament.

THE OTTAWA FIRE RELIEF VOTE.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to say a word on a subject which I brought once before to the attention of my right hon. friend and the House. My right hon. friend will remember that shortly after the great fire here, there was some talk across the floor with reference to the government contribution, and I ventured to intimate that it would be well if the gift of $100,000 by this parliament could be made in some way or other conditional, so that its expenditure might have the result of bringing about more staple buildings and, consequently, safer conditions in the future in this city. I am not aware whether the government has handed over the whole of its contribution or not, or how far it considers it right to advise with the relief committee on the expenditure of the same. But, I wish to say that an event transpired last night in this city, which emphasizes the opinion of some members of this House, at least, that the gift of this parliament ought to have been accompanied with certain conditions, compulsory or advisory. The action of the city council last night, as I understand it, simply relegated the construction of buildings in this city to the old by-laws, without any improvement of any kind whatsoever. So that, buildings may be put up, entirely lacking in fire-proof qualities, with shingle roofs and timber trimmings. That is a matter which is to be deplored for many reasons, and I wish to call the attention of my right hon. friend to the matter, and emphasize the feeling which, I believe, is very general, that the city council and municipal authorities would only have been carrying out the general wish of the kind and generous donors of this great gift, if they had endeavoured to fence about the future construction of buildings in this city with fairly reasonable and safe conditions.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am not in a position to give any information to my hon. friend as to whether or not we have handed over to the relief committee the sum voted by parliament.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We have.

The PRIME MINISTER. I expressed my views the other day to my hon. friend that, much as I sympathized personally with the opinions he then expressed, I was not aware, and could not conceive, how the government could in any way enforce them. I regret as much as he does the conclusion reached last night by the city council. The time has come in the history of Ottawa when it should provide for fire-proof buildings and compel all builders to conform with such a provision. That might be a little more expensive, but it is in my judgment a mistaken kindness to the people of Ottawa, even to the poorer classes, not to compel them to put up buildings absolutely fire-proof. Unfortunately, the city council, as I am informed, have decided otherwise. But, apart from the remonstrance which my hon. friend and my self and everybody can make, as citizens of Ottawa, the government has no power to enforce the wishes which, for my part, I would be glad to see realized.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière)? The members of the relief committee will have something to say regarding the manner in which that enormous sum of money is to be spent, and, to a certain degree, can remedy the action of the city council. Surely, those hundreds of thousands of dollars subscribed are not all going to be spent in paying for furniture and clothes lost, and in feeding and supporting the people until they can find work. I think that the committee—of course, I speak subject to correction—has power to decide in what way those large sums ought to be spent, and the right to impose certain conditions on those to whom they give money to put up new buildings, and give it only to those who will undertake to put up buildings that will afford greater security against fire.

LABOUR TROUBLES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman who leads the government if he can state when Mr. Clute's report on the labour troubles in British Columbia will be brought down?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). It will be brought down, I believe, to-morrow—that is to say, the evidence and first report. There is, I think, a supplementary report, but I am not certain. The first report is over a thousand pages.

GRAIN INSPECTION IN MANITOBA.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 141) an Act respecting the grain trade in the inspection district of Manitoba.—(Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière.)

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). With the consent of the committee, I propose that we go over the Bill again, taking up those sections that were allowed to stand yesterday.

On clause 4, subsection a,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This subsection and also subsections b and c, were allowed to stand until we had gone through the whole Bill. Now that we have gone through the Bill, hon. members will see the necessity for these clauses.

On section 5,

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I move that this clause be amended, by adding the following words:

And shall see that at each point where an elevator or warehouse is established throughout Manitoba and the North-west, bulletins shall be posted up each day from September 1 to January 1, showing the prices ruling at Winnipeg and Fort William at ten o'clock a.m. of that day.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I am sorry that I must oppose this amendment. I gave my reasons yesterday for opposing it. A great many hon. members were absent then, so I may recapitulate briefly my reasons. Apart from the expense of telegraphing every day to every one of these stations and having agents post these bulletins, my principal reason for opposing the amendment, is that I object to making the government responsible for the contents of these bulletins, on the basis of which, no doubt, a great many business transactions would be carried on. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin), points to the clause we have already adopted, which provides that the commissioner shall keep on file in his office, publications, showing the prices ruling in the principal markets of the world. There is no responsibility upon the government in subscribing to newspapers in different parts of the world, showing the state of the markets, and keeping them on file in the office of the commissioner. This clause was taken from the Minnesota Act, from which we have taken nearly the whole of this Bill. That Act provides:

The said commission shall keep on file for public inspection publications showing the market price of grain and farm products in the markets of Liverpool, London, Paris, Hamburg, New York, Buffalo, Quebec, San Francisco, Chicago, Minneapolis and Duluth. Also the freight rates between said markets, either by railroad, lake, ocean or other means of transportation.

They are not to publish daily bulletins and send them everywhere, but a weekly bulletin.

They shall publish a weekly bulletin or market report showing the prices paid in said markets for farm products. Said market report to show the prices as reported by the publications received from the other cities for one week and immediately preceding the date of said publication, as near as practicable; also the rates of freight between Duluth and Minneapolis and said markets. Said bulletin to be kept on file in said institution and in the office of said commission in St. Paul; also to be furnished by mail to all persons who shall order the same and pay the price fixed by said commission, which shall not exceed $1 per annum.

I think it would be very dangerous for the government to take upon itself the responsibility of keeping the whole North-west farming community correctly acquainted with the daily price of grain.

Mr. DAVIN. I have only to say that the principle of my amendment is the same as that of the clause in the Bill.

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). May I ask, what is the purpose of the provision of clause 5, as it stands?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The commission in preparing its report, took a great deal from the Minnesota Act, including this clause. The purpose of the clause is perfectly evident. It is thought that this will be a benefit to people who take the trouble to look at the files kept in the commissioner's office, from which they can gain some information as to the movement of the grain market all over the world. I do not pretend to say that I see very much advantage in the clause; but it is in the Bill, and it cannot do much harm, while it will be a benefit to those who take the trouble to consult the publications in the commissioner's office.

Mr. OLIVER. It appears to me, that on the face of it, this section purports to give information. Now, if it gives information only to one class of the community, that is to the grain buyers, who circulate around the commissioner's office, I certainly am not in favour of going no further. I believe in giving the information to everybody, if we give it at all; and if you cannot give it to everybody, then, do not profess to give it to anybody. Putting the matter shortly, I am in favour of striking out section 5, or of supporting the amendment of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin).

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. If my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver), will move to strike out the clause, I have no objection.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not propose to move to strike it out. The section is there; and I will support the amendment if the section remains. If the minister sees fit to strike it out, that is another affair. My objection is that as it stands, it is apparently in favour of one class of the community, leaving the other out of consideration.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This is an appeal to popular feeling. I see. If my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) would read the clause with attention he would see the purport of it. The publications the commissioner is to keep on file are the commercial papers published in those commercial cities, and they will be kept there for the information of the public, quite as much for the poor as for the rich.

Amendment (Mr. Davin) negative.

On section 26,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I must now ask the committee to go back to clause 26, which was passed yesterday. The committee will see that section 35 covers the case of grain heated or damaged when kept in store in country elevators and flat warehouses, but that provision has been overlooked in the case of terminal elevators. My attention was called to it, and I propose to introduce a subsection founded on the Bill passed in the state of Minnesota on that subject. Section 35 says:

In case any country warehouseman discovers that any portion of the specially binned grain in his elevator or warehouse is out of condition or becoming so, and it is not in his power to preserve it, he shall immediately give written notice thereof by registered letter to the commissioner and to the owner of the grain, when possible.

Then it goes on to state how he shall give notice to the owner to remove that grain, and if, after a certain delay, the grain is not removed, he shall give public notice in the press and sell it. I propose to adopt this same provision in the case of the terminal elevators by the proposed subsection, which I will read:

No terminal warehouseman shall be held liable for damage to grain by heating, if it can be shown that he has exercised proper care in the handling and storing of the same, and such heating was the result of causes beyond his control. It shall be deemed the duty of such warehouseman to dispose of by delivery or shipping in the ordinary legal manner of so delivering that grain of any particular grade, which was first received by him, or which has been for the longest time in store in his elevator.

Now, it will be remembered that in these terminal elevators the grain loses its identity, all the grain gathered there becomes one. In order to prevent the danger of the good grain newly brought in becoming heated, the amendment provides for getting rid at once of the grain that came there first, so as to avoid the danger of the heated grain communicating the fermentation to the good grain:

Unless public notice has been given, as hereafter provided, by him, that some portion of the grain in his elevator is out of condition, or becoming so, such warehouseman shall deliver grain of quality equal to that received by him on all receipts presented.

Mr. OLIVER.

In case, however, any terminal warehouseman shall discover that any portion of the grain in his elevator is out of condition, or becoming so, and it is not in his power to preserve the same, he shall immediately, by registered letter, give written notice thereof to the warehouse commissioner, and at the same time give public notice by advertising in a daily newspaper in the city in which such warehouse is situated, and in Winnipeg; and by posting a notice in his elevator and in the Grain Exchange at Winnipeg, of its actual condition as near as he can ascertain. He shall state in such notice the kind and grade of the grain, and the bins in which it is stored, and shall state in such notice the receipts outstanding upon which such grain will be delivered, giving the numbers, amounts and dates of each, which receipts shall be those of the oldest dates then in circulation or uncancelled, the grain represented, but which has not previously been declared out of condition. And the enumeration of receipts and identification of grain so discredited shall embrace, as near as may be, as great a quantity of grain as is contained in such bins. And such grain shall be delivered upon the return and cancellation of the receipts.

Nothing herein contained shall be held to relieve the said warehouseman from exercising proper care and vigilance in preserving such grain after such publication of its condition, but such grain shall be kept separate and apart from all direct contact with other grain, and shall not be mixed with other grain while in store in such elevator. Any warehouseman guilty of any act of neglect, the effect of which is to depreciate property stored in the elevator under his control, shall be held responsible as at common law, or upon the bond of such warehouseman, and in addition thereto the license of such warehouseman shall be revoked.

In case the grain declared out of condition, as herein provided for, shall not be removed from store by the owner thereof within one month from the date of the notice of its being out of condition, it shall be lawful for the warehouseman in whose elevator the grain is stored, to sell the same at public auction, for the account of the said owner, by giving ten days' public notice by advertisement in a newspaper published in the city or town where such elevator is located, and in Winnipeg.

Nothing in this clause shall be so construed as to permit any warehouseman to deliver any grain stored in a special bin or by itself, to any but the owner of the lot.

The only purpose of this amendment is to put the terminal warehouses in the same position as the country warehouses.

Mr. J. G. RUTHERFORD (Macdonald). I think the word 'shall' in the fifth line of section 26 is rather peremptory. I suggest that it be changed to 'may.'

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE moved:

That the word 'may' be substituted for the word 'shall' in the fifth line of section 26.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 34,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I will ask the committee to take into consideration once more section 34. We overlooked a point which can clearly be explained if hon. members will look at line 13, page 9. Subsection 3 reads as follows:

The operator of any elevator or warehouse may at any time forward any grain stored in his elevator to any terminal elevator in the Manitoba inspection district on the same line of railway, or on railways connecting therewith.

On page 8, line 29, you will see we made a provision as follows:

Except that in the case of a country elevator or warehouse of the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway line—

And we have forgotten to make this provision in subsection 3. I therefore beg to move:

That after the word 'therewith' in the thirteenth line, the following words be added: 'Except that in the case of a country elevator or warehouse on the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway line or any line of railway operated therewith, it may be delivered on track at the proper terminal elevator at or adjacent to Duluth.'

Motion agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. The first clause had some amendment made to it.

Mr. DAVIN. We made a great number of amendments to this clause. I think before we pass it finally, we ought to have the clause as amended.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Oh, no; we have made them all very carefully. They were all written beforehand in red ink.

On section 52.

Mr. DAVIN. The unsatisfactory character of the amendment moved by the minister is, that you have at the present time a number of elevators where cleaning is done, and you have other elevators where cleaning is not done. There is nothing to guarantee that elevators put up in the future shall have cleaning apparatus. If you will study the evidence given by Mr. Whyte, manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and study the evidence given by farmers at the meetings of the commission, you will find it is a most important thing that every elevator should have cleaning apparatus. The objections urged against having cleaning apparatus put in these elevators which at present have not got it; these objections are futile, because I am assured by persons who understand what they are talking about, that the cost of putting in cleaning apparatus into these elevators which have not got it, would be trifling. I am told that all that would be necessary would be to add a very small lean-to to one of the elevators and the machinery, which is cheap, could be put in. You should put in cleaning apparatus that will separate the plump wheat from what is called the dirt: a word that covers small grain, cracked grain, and weed seeds. The weed seeds are very small, and I am assured that it would not be very onerous that every elevator should have such fanning machinery and screens as would separate at the same time, the good grain from the small grain and the weed seeds, and would not only do that, but would separate the cracked grain and the small wheat from what is really the dirt, and which should be destroyed. In looking over the evidence, I find that a very large amount of this dirt, according to Mr. Whyte's evidence, is used for fuel purposes, and he says that when it is mixed with other fuel it makes very good fuel. He very properly says that the farmer should not have to pay for that. Why should the farmer have to pay the freight rates on dirt hauled from Regina or Edmonton or Prince Albert to Fort William in order that a great railway may be able to use it as fuel? Mr. Whyte does not wish it. He says it is not the proper thing. As a broad-minded man, he says the railway is interested in having the best possible machinery for taking out the farmers' grain. He says—and who can doubt it?—that it is a good thing for the railway that the farmer should get the most possible out of his grain. Mr. Whyte's evidence is here, and with the permission of the committee I will read some things that he said on this subject, because I think we ought to know what the opinion of a man who can talk with so much authority is on a subject like this. In answer to a question by Mr. Sirett, Mr. Whyte said:

This morning I gave you my reasons for the establishment of elevators. I am not saying now that the allowing of grain to be loaded from farmers' vehicles is the proper method of shipping grain, although it was free to every one this year to do so, and I have also given evidence that instructions were issued to our agents that preference was to be given in the supply of cars to farmers who wished to load direct from their own vehicles. Last year there were 804 cars shipped in this way, or slightly over 5 per cent of the total crop shipped. While we granted that privilege, I am not an advocate of increasing what I may term an improper way of handling the crop. I also mentioned this morning one of the reasons why the railway company went into the arrangement with the elevators was that the wheat might be cleaned.

One of the reasons why inducements were given to men to erect elevators was, not the convenience of the railway, but that the wheat might be cleaned.

That is one of the conditions, that there must be a cleaner in the elevator.

If the Canadian Pacific Railway felt bound to make that a condition of allowing an elevator to be erected on their line, why should we not insist that the Ogilvie Company or the elevator company, or the Northern Pacific Company should see that cleaners are put into their elevators?

The railway company believe that it is in the interest of the farmer to have his wheat put on the market in as good shape as possible. They have no wish to make money out of hauling seeds and dirt from the point of shipment to Fort William.

If the railway company have no wish to make money out of hauling seeds and dirt from the point of shipment to Fort William, is it to be supposed for one moment that the farmer has any interest in paying for the hauling of those seeds and dirt?

Q. There are two of the companies that do not pretend to clean the wheat at all?—A. Yes, but they don't haul it as far. They have their elevators here or at Keewatin. We have a greater interest than making money out of hauling dirt. We want to see the farmers making money and contented.

Q. The cleaning of the wheat at the receiving point, I think, is a detriment in connection with the question of noxious weeds, because it is almost impossible to get rid of the weed seeds at these places, and it is scattered around, we find, in different districts, and blows all over the country?—A. Can't they take them back to the engine and burn them? We don't allow them to blow them out on our station grounds. It is only a little expense and trouble to convey these noxious weeds back and put them into the boiler and consume them. So that disposes of that objection.

Q. The objection raised is that they do not make a good fuel. Then, wheat—there is a grievance in connection with that, that the farmers lose that. They think when they pay for the cleaning of the wheat that they should get it back again, and this difficulty is raised with reference to the cleaning at the receiving elevators?—A. We have used them at Fort William and find that we can't get as good a head of steam from them as from coal, but ordinarily get all the steam we want from these foreign seeds mixed with a little coal.

There you have a most disinterested opinion as to the necessity of this government compelling all elevator owners to have cleaners in their elevators, and to save the farmer the cost of paying for the freighting of his wheat from the point of shipment to Fort William; and he points out that the elevator man at a little expense can have the advantage which they have at Fort William of using this refuse as fuel. I am told by persons who have engineering ability that the statement made by those interested in the elevator companies that it is an expensive thing to put in cleaners in those elevators that have not got them, is a complete mistake. It is quite clear, therefore, that the amendment of my hon. friend who has charge of this Bill does not meet the case, and what I suggest is this: That all the words of the hon. minister's amendment should be left out, and that the following words be added at the end of subsection 1, of section 52:

—and every elevator shall clean the grain before it is weighed, and shall have appliances by which small wheat and cracked wheat shall be separated from dirt and noxious weeds, and the seller shall have an opportunity of personally ascertaining the weight of the cleaned grain and of the cleaning; and the proprietors of any elevator failing to provide machinery for thus cleaning and weighing grain shall be guilty of an offence under this Act.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS (East Assiniboia). I regret to be obliged to state that the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) seems entirely to misapprehend the meaning of this proposed amendment to clause 52. The purpose is not to compel certain companies to introduce into their elevators cleaning machinery, but to satisfy the public with reference to the weighing and cleaning. As I had something to do personally with drafting this amendment, I would call attention to clause No. 9 in my Bill No. 58, which is now on the Order paper. This clause does not deal with terminal elevators. It reads as follows:

9. All elevators and warehouses where the government weighmaster or his assistant is not present, the owner, or proprietor, or agent of a company, shall weigh the grain offered in the following manner:

1. The grain shall be weighed in the vision of the interested party. He shall ascertain the gross weight of the quantity offered.

2. He shall then clean it (if requested) on the same floor and in the presence of the interested party. Having separated the seeds and dirt, the same shall be weighed and the weight shall be deducted from the gross weight, and a certificate given to the interested party setting forth the gross weight and the net weight after deducting the weight of seeds and dirt, which shall also appear on the face of the certificate. The cleanings thus deducted shall be the property of the grain producer, and may be taken away should he so desire.

It was felt that this was a matter which should be put beyond the possibility of any deception, and the principle in this amendment is really the one involved in section 9 of my Bill, which I have just read. The interested party, if he so desires, shall have ample opportunity of personally ascertaining the gross weight, and then the net weight after cleaning. I may state that by means of the latest machinery now being used in the United States, and being introduced in some sections of our own western country, the grain is weighed in the presence of the seller or purchaser, and he has an opportunity of ascertaining the gross weight, the weight of the cleanings, and the net weight, and having these stated upon the certificate. This enables the party interested to see for himself whether he is getting justice or not. It was felt by the commission that it might be somewhat difficult to introduce that system throughout the country as a whole. However, without compelling the milling companies and the elevators on to the Northern Pacific, to introduce cleaning machinery, we endorsed the principle and sought to introduce it under section 52 of the government Bill now under consideration, and I am satisfied that the amendment I propose is of decided importance, but I think the hon.

member for West Assiniboia scarcely apprehends the exact meaning of the proposed amendment to section 52.

Mr. DAVIN. With great deference to the opinion of my hon. friend, I thoroughly apprehend the amendment and want to go further. We are on the clause dealing with the weighing of grain, and I am proposing an amendment to it dealing entirely with the weighing of grain, and my hon. friend says that it is in some way incongruous and that I misapprehend the clause; and then he read the clause from his Bill No. 58. I do not know what his object was in referring to that clause. I do not know whether he is going to support my amendment or not.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not sure.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I would rather the hon. gentleman were in doubt than that he should be decided to oppose my amendment. If his object, in reading the clause from his Bill, was to indicate that, in some way or other, I had taken my amendment from his Bill, let me tell the hon. gentleman that I have a Bill of my own, No. 38, introduced before his, and in which a clause embodying the same principle will be found. I refer to clause 9 of Bill No. 38, which reads as follows:

Elevators built after the passing of this Act, used for the purpose of storing and handling grain for hire, shall be provided with machinery to enable the grain as hauled to be weighed and cleaned, and the resultant grain and cleanings severally weighed. The manager of every elevator having such facilities shall hand the farmer or other person who has hauled the grain a certificate or wheat ticket showing the weight in each case and the percentage of dirt. In a case where one of the existing elevators does not possess such facilities, then the buyer shall hand the seller a wheat ticket showing the estimated percentage of dirt.

Let us get away altogether from any question except this: How are you going to improve this Bill, so as to make it the best thing almost for the North-west Territories and Manitoba?

Suppose the government had not introduced this Bill and my hon. friend had introduced his, I would have thought, for reasons I need not mention, that he had a better chance of getting his Bill through than mine, and would have supported his Bill. My amendment is one that will really benefit the farmers, and in the end the elevator men. People think the Canadian Pacific Railway is opposed to legislation of this kind, but we have the opinion of Mr. Whyte, who tells us that they actually legislated themselves in regard to their own elevators, by making it a condition that the elevators built on the Canadian Pacific Railway, should have those cleaners. Let us therefore act in the interests of the farmer and do the best we can for him. I will be most happy, if my amendment does not meet the case, to withdraw it in favour of a better one, but if my amendment meets the case, let us support it.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I regret that I consider it my duty to oppose the amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin). We are giving proof that the government are anxious to come to the help of the farmers, and have trespassed perhaps upon other ground, for both the elevator and the railway people consider that we are subjecting them to hardship. However, it is so important to favour in every way the grain growers of the North-west, that we felt justified in bringing down this measure. My hon. friend wants to force every future elevator to be equipped not only with a cleaner, but first to have the weighing done before cleaning and then after cleaning. I do not like to say that my hon. friend does not know the cost of the machinery, because he must have seen much more of the elevators and the working of grain in the North-west than I could in the few days I was there, but from what I have seen it is very expensive to equip elevators with this machinery, which will take up first the grain and then weigh it, then clean it, and then divide and subdivide the grain. That is much more than I think we have the right to ask from the elevators. My hon. friend read the first subsection of clause 9. But the second subsection, which he did not read, is as follows:

3. In testing for the purpose of arriving at the amount of dockage a No. 10 tester shall be used.

How can that estimated percentage be found out? By the very process my hon. friend suggests and that we have adopted now. Last evening, in the two clauses preceding this one, we provided that where elevators had not this machinery—there are not many of them that have it—in order to find out the exact amount of deduction that should be made:

When testing sieves are used for the purposes of dockage, the wire cloth used in their construction shall have ten meshes to the inch each way, and be of No. 28 standard gauge hard tinned steel wire, and every such sieve shall be verified by the commissioner. The use of damaged or defective sieves shall be an offence.

That is, we provided, as my hon. friend's Bill did, that the amount of dirt to be allowed for should be decided by test. Furthermore, there is another clause in this Bill which is a repetition of the clause which was introduced in the Inspection Bill at the request of my hon. friend. It was not introduced in this House, but in the Senate. It is a clause providing that, when a farmer is not satisfied with the price offered for his wheat or with the weight, that is with the amount of dockage, each of the parties may take a sample of that load of wheat and send it to the inspector; and the whole procedure to be followed in order that justice may be rendered as between the parties is provided for. Under these circumstances, I do not think we should adopt the amendment of my hon. friend.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue sees that the clause in my Bill provided that elevators built after the passing of that Act should be provided with this machinery. When I drafted that clause, I was not in a position to inquire from any person who could tell me with authority what the cost of putting in this machinery was, and I was therefore unwilling to make the clause retroactive. This clause of mine would be better as it is than what he has if the hon. minister will accept it. But I am told that it would not cost them much to put in machinery. He is quite right in saying that in this Bill he has provided that in testing so as to arrive at the amount of dockage a No. 10 tester shall be used. That was suggested to me at Regina, when the thing was thoroughly threshed out in evidence. There are 447 elevators in the Manitoba inspection district—'Manitoba district,' meaning Manitoba and the North-west Territories. It does not say in the report what percentage of these have cleaners: but suppose that we say one-quarter of them have—

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. From the information I have received, I am led to believe that not as many as one-quarter of them have cleaners.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, to begin with, there is the Lake of the Woods Milling Company, with fifty elevators. They have no cleaners. They are an immensely rich corporation, and we are to snigger and dicker as to whether a few cents is to be taken out of the pockets of the Lake of the Woods Milling Company. Then, there is the Ogilvie Milling Company, with forty-five elevators, and they have no cleaners. And again you are to dicker and snigger and sneeze at taking a few thousands or a few tens of hundreds, or a few hundred dollars, as the case may be, out of the pockets of this corporation. This company has made vast wealth out of the North-west Territories. If they have made vast wealth, out of whom have they made it? They could only have made it out of the farmers who had grown grain and sold them grain. And we are to hawk at a proposal to compel these men make their elevators efficient, fit to do the work that, in the emphatic and sworn language of Mr. Whyte, the manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is needed in the interest of the North-west Territories. Then, we have the farmers' elevator companies. I do not know whether they have cleaners or not. Then, you have have the 'individual millers and grain dealers own'—I do not know what that means—there are 120 elevators. And the three line elevators own 206. All the persons behind these are rich people; they have vast capital; they can make monster elevators and can provide any machinery which will have the effect of adding to their wealth. But, forsooth, we are to shed crocodile tears in this committee, in this parliament of Canada, over the harsh measure dealt out to these poor fellows if they are made to pay out a few hundred dollars in order to make their elevators fit to do justice to the farmers.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). If this proposal is practicable, it would be well that it should be done; but for my part, I do not see how it would be possible to make it work. Leaving out of consideration the cost, it is plain that the farmers will be detained at the elevators, which might at times be inconvenient to them. Suppose a man had 30 or 40 teams—or suppose he had only one and was delivering from day to day, he would be compelled to remain a considerable length of time after the grain was emptied before he could get a return.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. SPROULE. I respectfully submit that if you get any machinery that will clean the grain as fast as it is emptied out, it will be expensive machinery. In many cases, I believe, the elevators would not have room for it. I agree that if it could be done it is a desirable thing, because it is the only fair way to deal with the grain.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) will allow me, I would say that it is done in the farmers' elevators. Complete machinery has lately been introduced that will clean the grain as fast as it can be emptied into the hopper.

Mr. MacLAREN. What does it cost?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not know, the farmers' elevator on the Pipe Stone branch does this successfully, and a certificate is given of the gross weight, the net weight and the weight of cleanings, leaving no room for dispute as to the proper weight being allowed.

Mr. SPROULE. I admit that they would have to put in very costly machinery, and I think the hon. gentleman ought to be prepared to give us some approximate estimate of the cost of the machinery. The minister stated that a No. 10 tester would be used. I do not know what that is, but I assume it is used on the same principle as that upon which the weight was formerly ascertained in Ontario, that is, taking one-sixteenth of a bushel.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We take a larger quantity now, instead of one-sixteenth we take a bushel for a test.

Mr. SPROULE. No one can tell what the effect of that is. It is entirely in the hands of the individual who weighs that grain or makes that test. No one can tell exactly how his grain will turn out. They will say it only weighs 58 pounds to the bushel, that it contains dirt, or seeds, or something that reduces it to that weight, and the owner has no certainty that such is the case. He has only the word of the man who tests it, and the man who tests it is an interested individual. Therefore, the farmer is dissatisfied, and he does not know whether he is getting his rights or not. We should make provision so that the farmer may in all cases, as far as possible, be satisfied, that he shall not have occasion to suspect that he is being cheated. My amendment is simply this: That every one who is charged with the duty of weighing grain, shall take an oath or statutory declaration that he will perform his duty honestly.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not see any objection to that, except the difficulty and inconvenience of requiring all the employees about the place to take the oath, and they may change during the season and others take their places. The hon. gentleman will see that there is a penalty provided for any one who tampers with the weight. It seems to me, as the number of elevators is small, only 47, and in many cases there must be more than one person to do the weighing, we ought to hesitate before putting all these people under oath.

Mr. SPROULE. In an elevator there is usually only one man employed to do the work all through the season, at least he has rarely more than one assistant. These men work all through the season. I think the weigher and his assistant should take an oath before beginning their duty. The time is fast coming when we shall be forced by public opinion to have public weighing scales all over the country, and every man who has charge of them will be put on oath to do his duty. Throughout Ontario to-day, and indeed everywhere else, there is great dissatisfaction with regard to the manner in which the weight of cattle and the weight of grain is determined. We should have not only properly tested scales, but the parties entrusted with the duty of weighing, should be independent men, sworn to do their duty. Now I think that in the case of grain, where it is usually weighed by the same party throughout the season, there could be no injustice to any one if this weigher were compelled to make a statutory declaration that he will perform his duty honestly.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I do not know that there is any serious objection to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule); but I must say that I have not got the same faith in the virtue of an oath as he appears to have. I believe that a man who would falsify weight would not be deterred from doing so by the simple fact of having made a statutory declaration that he would act honestly. There is a clause here in subsection 2, which provides a punishment for any person who falsifies weight. Detection would be just as easy under this clause as under the amendment the hon. gentleman proposes. I do not know that it would do any harm, but I do not see that it would do much good.

Mr. SPROULE. I think there are many men who will do their duty more faithfully if under oath. The common law enables a man to be punished who falsifies weight, still, that is done over and over again.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. The only deterrent for a man who would make a false weight, would be the fear of eternal punishment, I presume.

Mr. SPROULE. Or perjury.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. But we have provided penalties for the offence here, and I think the man who would take the chances of eternal punishment by falsifying weights, would be apt to take the same chances whether he had made a statutory declaration or not.

Mr. OLIVER. I object to cheapening the idea of an oath or a statutory declaration.

Amendment (Mr. Sproule) negatived.

Amendment (Mr. Davin) negatived.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE moved:

That the following words be added to the amendment: 'If facilities exist for doing so.'

Amendment agreed to.

On section 45.

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). What about that clause that had no sense in it—section 45 in the new Bill?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That mysterious clause?

Mr. POWELL. If we do not want to perpetuate this curiosity, I think it ought to be amended. It is rather a reflection on parliament to have a section like that. I called the attention of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who is a literary man, to the construction of this clause. It is simply nonsense. To use an expression employed by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce some years ago, it is a remarkable convolution of grammar. It is preposterous as it stands there.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I would suggest that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue and the hon. member for Westmoreland draft a clause.

Mr. POWELL. I do not know what is wanted.

Mr. DAVIN. The phrase 'next hereinafter provided' has no meaning whatever. It reads:

Notwithstanding that elevators of any greater or other capacity shall be erected at such point or for any other cause than non-compliance with the law or as next hereinafter provided.

It has no meaning at all.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. If the clause is struck out from the word 'law' to the end, it has meaning.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I admit a feeling of shame in my conscience that we should pass a Bill with such a mysterious clause that none of us can exactly explain it. I will refer hon. members to the same clause in the Bill as it was originally printed :

But nothing in this section shall interfere with or render void any condition, agreement or contract made between the owner of or party who erected such elevator or warehouse and the railway company on the faith of which a site was leased or granted to such elevator or warehouse.

Mr. DAVIN. It is quite clear that the hon. minister does not know what is aimed at in this last sentence :

But nothing in this section shall interfere with or render void any condition, agreement or contract made between the owner of or party who erected such elevator or warehouse and the railway company on the faith of which a site was leased or granted to such elevator or warehouse.

If you read the evidence of Mr. Whyte, the manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway, given before the commission, you will find that when there were no elevators in Manitoba or the North-west Territories they held out inducements to persons with money to erect elevators, and one of the inducements held out was that nobody else would be allowed to ship grain at the place where the elevator was erected. Mr. Whyte says that there was an understanding between those gentlemen who erected elevators and the Canadian Pacific Railway that where an elevator was erected no grain would be taken through a flat warehouse, or in any other form, although, in 1898, he, perhaps, may have departed from that because 804 cars of grain were taken direct from farmers' wagons. If you bear that in mind I think you will see what the clause is aiming at. That is clearly what it is aimed at to protect those agreements. I think the hon. minister should ascertain what he aimed at in making the clause, and then when we come to the third reading we can put a clause in that expressing the idea of parliament now. It is perfectly clear to me. If you bear in mind the evidence that I have referred to, you will see that this clause has a meaning, and it may operate against other clauses in the Bill. It reads :

But nothing in this section shall interfere with or render void any condition, agreement or contract made between the owner of or party who erected such elevator or warehouse, and the railway company on the faith of which a site was leased or granted to such elevator or warehouse.

It is in evidence that in order to induce the erection of elevators a bargain was made, which legal documents embody, that no grain would be received except through these elevators at the points where they had been erected. If all these inducements were held out, if these elevators were erected, and if this bargain was embodied in legal documents it is palpable that this sentence at the end of this clause would nullify clause 40, which provides for the possible erection of flat warehouses which can be asked for by any ten farmers within forty miles of any shipping point.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have in my hand the explanations sent by Judge Richards, who prepared that clause. Judge Richards succeeded Judge Senkler. The difficulty which arises now is that the clause in the printed Bill in the hands of my hon. friends, says :

But nothing in this section shall interfere with or render void any condition, agreement or contract made between the owner of or party who erected such elevator or warehouse, and the railway company on the faith of which a site was leased or granted to such elevator or warehouse.

In the amendments that we distributed, we changed the last part of that section, but, I believe, we should restore it to the original. I will read to the committee Judge Richards's explanation :

Winnipeg, April 28, 1900.

Hon. Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière, K.C.M.G., Department of Inland Revenue,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—In answer to yours of the 25th inst., I have to say:

First, it was the deliberate intention of all the members of the royal commission on shipment and transportation of grain to recommend the allowance and permanent maintenance of flat warehouses, such as recommended in the report and schedule 'E' at all shipping points in the Manitoba inspection district (whether there are or not at such points elevators built on an understanding with the railway companies that grain should not be shipped at such points except through elevators).

The commissioners were of the opinion that the serious troubles that have arisen were largely caused by such monopoly agreements. They were also of the opinion that public carriers should never be permitted to make such monopoly agreements, and that such agreements were and are contrary to public policy, and greatly in restraint of free trade and a serious wrong to the farmers.

I may point out here (as was done in the commissioners' report), that the right to farmers to load direct on cars has been restored by the railways, though their promise not to allow such direct loading was (equally with the promise to prohibit flat warehouses) a part of their inducement to elevator owners to build standard elevators.

Secondly, the sentence in schedule 'E' to the commissioners' report under the heading, 'Warehouses now existing,' which begins: 'But nothing in this section shall interfere,' and ends, 'leased or granted to such elevator or warehouse' (which sentence is the underlined part you refer to), most unquestionably was not meant to apply to or restrict the proposed erection of flat warehouses at the railway stations where there are already standard elevators, or to protect any rights of owners of such standard elevators.

The sentence in question was not in the report as originally drafted. It would never have been inserted but that, when going over the draft report with the other commissioners, it occurred to me that there might be now existing on new lines of rail, some cheaply constructed temporary elevators or warehouses, which had been put up under agreements limiting the period during which the sites could be held. The sentence in question was then inserted, at my suggestion, solely to prevent our report from appearing to advise that the rights to such temporary sites should be made permanent. It was intended to modify only the words preceding it under the heading of 'Warehouses now existing.' It was not intended, or foreseen, that the sentence in question would be thought to affect any part of the report of schedule, except that part of schedule 'E' preceding it under the heading of 'Warehouses now existing.' I greatly regret that our meaning has not been made clearer. This letter will, however, explain it fully.

I remain, yours respectfully,

A. E. RICHARDS.

Mr. POWELL. It is clear what our intention is, and then, why not strike out the whole section and express our intention in the following words :

Nothing in this Act shall affect the right of any person or persons carrying on the business of an elevator at the time of the passing of this Act to continue to do so.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That will suit.

Mr. DAVIN. We will suppose that at a given point an elevator is erected and a lease of the site given to the owner of the elevator by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in that lease one of the conditions was that the company would not at that point take grain from any other persons. If you leave this clause here as it is now, you will prevent interference with that right by any other part of the Act. If that is the meaning of it, we should know what we are doing, and not ignorantly repeal the clause.

Mr. POWELL. My amendment would cover it. If a man or company had a right under a lease to carry on this business, then it would be saved by this amendment that I have suggested.

Mr. DAVIN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. There is a point which the hon. member (Mr. Powell) has overlooked. I take issue with the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) on the stand he takes. He says that we have no right to interfere with this bargain.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, no. My hon. friend misunderstood me. I did not say we have no right. What I said was, if we are going to repeal it as the minister suggests, then we ought to know what we are doing.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I think that the first part of the clause takes away the right of the Canadian Pacific Railway to interfere with existing flat warehouses. At many stations in Manitoba and the Northwest Territories, flat warehouses have heretofore existed and have been doing business as such, and the owners of these flat warehouses have been ordered to cease doing business, and in some cases to remove the building. The object the commissioners had in view in this clause was to prevent that, and to allow flat warehouses now existing to continue business. That the Canadian Pacific Railway have recognized this principle is shown by the fact that for the last two years they have permitted the loading of grain direct from wagons on to cars, thereby violating their agreement with the elevator companies. The proposed addition to the clause first drafted might very easily be construed to mean that nothing in this section shall interfere with the right of the Canadian Pacific Railway to close up and remove these flat warehouses. I most emphatically object to that. I say that this parliament has a perfect right to legislate on that question, and to embody in an Act of parliament the principle that these flat warehouses shall not be interfered with. What is proposed as a substitute for the clause will leave the old monopoly clause in existence.

Mr. POWELL. No, it simply means that people who have been carrying on the elevator business shall, notwithstanding all these additional elevators, be entitled to continue to carry on that business.

Mr. DAVIN. If the last part of the clause has the meaning which my learned friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) says, there is no objection to it.

Mr. OLIVER. If the last part of this clause has a meaning, I would certainly move that it be struck out. Does the new section stand or the old section?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE.
The new one.

Mr. OLIVER. Then, it does not contain these objectionable words?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE.
No.

Bill reported, amendments made in committee read the first and second time, and concurred in.

Mr. DAVIN. I think before the third reading, the Bill ought to be reprinted.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE.
I will try to get it reprinted at once.

COLD STORAGE ON STEAMSHIPS.

Bill (No. 152) to authorize contracts with certain steamship companies for cold storage accommodation (Mr. Fisher), read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time, and passed.

MARKING AND INSPECTION OF APPLES AND PEARS.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 127), to provide for the marking and inspection of packages containing apples and pears for export.—(Mr. Fisher.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 8,

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). When this Bill was under consideration before, I sent several copies to parties in the trade. They object to that portion of the clause which compels them to mark the variety on the barrels. The reason they give is that you can scarcely get two men in the business who will give the same name to the same apples, except in well-known varieties. A few years ago apples shown under one name were refused to be considered by the judges at an agricultural fair in our country because the judges did not consider them properly named, and a number of them were sent to the president of the Fruit Growers' Association to be named. The names put on were not accepted by the fruit men. Every year we find the same trouble. An apple would be called one name by one fruit man and another by another, and it is impossible to say which is correct. One of the largest fruit handlers has written me some very good information. He says :

Something ought to be done to regulate the shipment, or rather the branding, of apples to Manitoba and the North-west as well as to England. It is my opinion that inspection will not be satisfactory, either to the shipper or the protection of the trade. Montreal is about the only place where inspection could be done without employing an army of inspectors; and if the shippers see that their apples are being opened at Montreal, they will ship via Boston, for after a barrel of apples is opened and properly inspected, it is spoilt for export. This will, therefore, drive trade out of our own country.

He means that in the repacking of the apples and putting in the head of the barrel, they would be bruised and spoiled.

The curse of the trade consists in shippers shipping apples under too many brands. A shipper will have his own brand, under which he will ship his good apples. Then he will use any other person's name, he will take the name of any man in his employ, and brand it on the barrels containing his poor apples. He will put up, say, eighteen barrels of poor apples, and brand them with the name of some boy working for him, say, Smith, with XXX, the same as his own brand. The reason he will put up only small lots of eighteen barrels or less, under fictitious names, is because, under the custom of selling, when there are over twenty barrels of one brand, a barrel is opened and another is dumped out as samples, but when there are under twenty, only the face of one barrel is opened.

All that is required is to make every shipper and company have only one brand, and compel them to put that brand on every barrel they ship. Then the shipper will have to mark his apples for what they are or suffer the consequences, and no shipper would put a No. 1 on No. 2 apples, with his own brand on it. This will bring about what the trade wants, without any inspectors except one, and with the least annoyance to the trade.

I think this suggestion is very valuable. If every shipper is compelled to brand his apples under his own name, he will not risk his reputation by branding them incorrectly. It would be utterly impossible to inspect the apples because the only place where they could be properly inspected would be at Montreal, and after the apples have been carted over a rough road, in country wagons, in many cases, and then taken by train some hundreds of miles, they will not be found in the perfect condition they were in when they left the orchard, and will not pass as No. 1 apples.

I have some other letters largely on the same line; and while all the writers agree that there ought to be something done, most of them are of the opinion that this measure cannot be successfully worked. I have another from Thomas Kells, who is in this business every year.

After carefully reading and giving inclosed Bill my best consideration, I have come to the conclusion that in its present state it would not be workable. I have marked the clauses or sections to which I object. I believe that sections 5 and 6 are reasonable. Section 7 also is reasonable, but the rest I consider humbug. To have apples inspected as set forth in this Bill would cost some person or the government not less than 15 cents per barrel. Of course, there would be any amount of inspectors to be paid by somebody. The great trouble, in my opinion, is that the barrels are too light in the stave and not fit to stand the pressure when large quantities are placed, say, eight or ten tiers deep in the vessel. Consequently, the apples are spoiled in transit.

He means to say that the staves are so light that when you put eight or ten tiers of barrels, one on top of another, the staves press in, and thereby bruise the apples and cause them to spoil.

I got the official reports from Glasgow in 1899, and there was no fault found with regard to spot or worm. Of course, there was complaint re colour and not uniform in size, but nearly all the complaints arose from what the apples suffered in transit.

I had another letter, but I have not it at hand just now. However, I may say it is on the same line as the one I have just read—in the first place, that if you mark the barrels with the name of the variety, then you will get into trouble, because you find no two apple-packers who will name apples alike; and, in the second place, inspection could not be successfully carried out without disturbing the apples in the barrel after they have been packed and tightened up for transportation.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Everybody admits that this Bill is a good Bill, and one that it is desirable to have carried into effect as soon as practicable. The objection is raised that it cannot be worked. There are certainly some clauses in the Bill which are not impracticable, and which, if they were carried into effect and they led to the condemnation of only one man for sharp practice or fraud in this business, would teach a good lesson and result in great good. There are objections to clauses 3, 4, 5 and 6 on account of the difficulty of giving the size and name of the apples. I am not ready to say that these difficulties are insurmountable, the more so as the horticultural association have recommended these enactments. There are some clauses that are clearly practicable and which, if put into effect, even on a small scale, would do good. For instance, take clause 8. Could anything be more simple than this? A moment ago my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) read a letter which spoke of the clause I now refer to as humbug. It seems to me it can be humbug only in the minds of those who are not willing to be bound by such conditions. Here is the clause:

No person shall sell, offer, expose or have in his possession for sale any apples or pears packed in a closed package and intended for export upon which is marked any designation of size, grade or variety which falsely represents such fruit; and it shall be considered a false representation when more than 10 per cent of such fruit are substantially smaller in size than, or inferior in grade to, or different in variety from the marks on such package.

The man who refuses to live up to it is one who wants to deceive. It is simply intended to prevent false representation.

Mr. SPROULE. But, as to placing the name of the variety on the barrel, no two men will be found to agree as to the name.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Everybody admits that the Bill is useful, and we are trying to find a means of working it out. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) has pointed out the only difficulty that can possibly arise, and that is, as to giving the variety. But, as to the size and grade of the apple, there can be no mistake. Even if a packer has not the pomological or botanical knowledge to give the exact name to a variety of apples, he can say what is the size and the quality of the apples. As to the point raised by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule), we might amend it by making it read 'as near as possible the variety.' The next clause provides the penalty. If there were only these two clauses in the Bill, I should consider it a great step in the right direction. But, in this Bill, the Governor in Council is given power, under clause 17, to make regulations. If these regulations provided for the inspection, say at the port of Montreal, of any lot of apples by choosing, say ten barrels out of a hundred, the result would be good. If any dishonesty has been practiced, the examination of 10 per cent of the barrels is pretty sure to lead to its discovery. If we could detect and punish only one person for an act of dishonesty and advertised his name, the effect would be beneficial to the trade. I have received a communication from Ontario on this subject, which contains this interesting statement:

There is no occasion to ship poor or inferior fruit out of our country. There are sufficient evaporators located now in all parts of our province to use up anything that is not strictly first-class, and I think, if the government imposed a severe penalty upon packers of inferior stock, and appointed inspectors at the points of shipment, it would have a tendency to stop the present system of packing. It might be well not to impose the regulations too severely at the start until the packers got acquainted with what the government required.

Mr. E. COCHRANE (East Northumberland). How much would apples be worth for evaporating purposes?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not say the apples would be worth much for evaporating purposes, and I do not ask the packer to barrel only apples that are fit for evaporating purposes; but I say that there is not now the same excuse for deceiving the public. My hon. friend will understand what I mean. There is not the same excuse for deceiving the public now, when there are so many evaporators and canners who are ready to use apples of an inferior quality, which are not proper for exportation, but which still can be utilized for evaporating and canning purposes. This removes the excuse for dishonesty—but at all events, it is one reason why, when people can dispose of their inferior fruit to the cider mills, canneries and evaporators, they have less temptation to deceive the public by barrelling these inferior apples for exportation.

Mr. COCHRANE. I think there is a false notion prevalent about farmers deceiving the people in packing apples. I am safe in saying that no apples at all are packed by the farmers in the section of country where I live, which is, I suppose, one of the largest exporting sections in the Dominion of Canada. The apples are bought by the apple dealers. They buy them generally on the tree, or buy them in piles on the ground, and they send their own men into the orchard and pack the apples themselves. So this cry that has gone abroad that the farmers are deceiving the people by packing inferior fruit is, as regards our section of the country, without a scintilla of truth. There are no apples packed by our farmers for export. I do not object to this Bill, but I object to any provision placing unnecessary annoyances in the way of exporters. In my opinion there will be trouble in working out this Bill. How can any one tell the size of the apple by the eye? One clause of this Bill provides that the package should be marked as containing not less than 10 per cent of apples, say two inches, or two inches and a half in diameter. Now, in order to comply with that clause, you will have to have two rings two inches or two inches and a half in diameter, by which to try the apples, and a man is forbidden to export a barrel of apples in which there would be 10 per cent smaller than that. I want to draw attention to another thing which should be kept in mind, and that is that the largest fruit is not the best fruit for export. Then there is the difficulty that the same kind of apples have not the same name in Ontario and Nova Scotia. I am as anxious as the hon. the minister to see a good Bill passed. I may say that in my section of the country there is less objection to the Bill than there was at first. I would like to have that clause amended so that there would be no 'if' about it, so that people would not be afraid to sell a barrel of apples having less than 10 per cent two inches in diameter. I understand that is the meaning of the clause, that you must have a certain quantity of two-inch apples.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
Whatever size they are.

Mr. COCHRANE. Anybody that knows anything about apples, knows that to comply with this clause you would have to have a ring to measure every one, you cannot tell the exact size by the eye. That is a pretty nice distinction. Buyers tell me that the fruit which is the largest is not the most saleable; they tell me that hotelkeepers in the old country do not prefer the large fruit; what they want is a nice colour, a shapely apple. They do not care so much about the size as about the appearance and the quality.

It being six o'clock, the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

(The House resumed in Committee.)

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Mr. Chairman, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was just about to make a few remarks upon the suggestions which had been made by hon. members. The Bill is now for the third time before the committee, and it has been pretty fairly discussed in a tentative manner. Since the Bill was last before the House I have had an opportunity of communication with a large number of those engaged in the apple and pear trade in the country, and have had the advantage of receiving a very large number of communications from several parts of the country, some of them coming directly to myself and others forwarded to me by the various members of the House who had received these communications from their constituents. I may say that the tenor of these communications has been, on the whole, favourable to the Bill. It is true that certain details of the Bill have been somewhat adversely criticised in some of these communications, but in some instances these very details have been endorsed in other communications. There seems to be, pretty generally, I might also say, a difference of opinion in regard to the details, but there seems to be hardly any difference of opinion as to the necessity of a Bill dealing with this apple trade. If there is one thing perhaps more than another, in which the communications that I have received agree, it is that the Bill should apply not only to the export trade, but also to the interior trade. The expressions of opinion have been, on these lines of the Bill, that if we are going to protect the purchasers who live abroad we ought to protect the purchasers who live in our own country, that if we are going to secure a proper grading of apples for export we ought also to equally secure the same kind of grading for the interior trade. There is, however, a little difficulty in this respect, which was brought to my attention. There is a very large number of large operators who deal in the export trade. These gentlemen are engaged in a large business which they manage on business principles and in a thoroughly businesslike way. They can, comparatively easily, make a change in their trade methods, but there is a large number of people in the country who deal only in a small local market, sometimes not having many, if any, apples for sale, one year, and perhaps next year again having quite a good crop and selling a good many barrels. It is pointed out that these people would find it rather a hardship to have to comply with the provisions of this Bill, that it would be practically impossible, or at any rate, expensive, for these people, selling in a purely local market to comply with all the provisions of the Bill, and that they would be open to the hardship of being fined if they did not comply with the provisions of the Bill. In dealing with this Bill, on a former occasion, I said that I was rather disposed to meet the views, which many hon. members expressed on the floor of the House, by making the Bill apply to the interior trade as well as to the export trade. This is the only argument which has been brought to my attention against that action. I would like to bring it to the attention of hon. members of the House who have taken an interest in this Bill and who have favoured the House with their opinions upon it. I may say that one or two criticisms have been levelled at details in connection with this Bill, and if I may be allowed I will take up one or two of these. In the first place, I have been asked to introduce into the Bill a statement of the size of the apples to be applied to the individual, particular varieties, and that these varieties should be named. For instance, I have a letter here which gives me a list of certain apples which should be required to be three inches in diameter, a list of certain other apples which only require to be of a diameter of two and a half inches, and others again of two and a quarter inches. I think that those who are making this suggestion hardly appreciate a fact to which I drew the attention of hon. members of the House, and that is, by the provisions of this Bill the size of the apple is not included in the specification of the grade. I hope that I put this clearly. But if anybody will read the Bill over carefully he will see that in the descriptions of A 1, No. 1 and No. 2, there is no mention of the size of the apple at all, and that A 1 grade, or quality, may be of any size that happens. The size does not affect the grade, or the quality.

Mr. JAS. CLANCY (Bothwell). Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) state what is the object of the size, if it is not afterwards to have some bearing on governing the grade? It occurred to me that if it had no bearing on the grade, it should be eliminated from the Bill, because persons, if it is left open to them in the Bill, might fix the grade entirely upon the size of the apple. I want to have it understood clearly that as the Bill stands, the size of the apple does not affect the grade. The Bill defines that the grade shall be a well grown specimen of one variety, sound and nearly uniform in size, of good colour for the variety, of normal shape, and that there shall not be less than 90 per cent free from scab, worm holes, bruises, &c.

Mr. SPROULE. By clause 8 you make it compulsory to put the size on the head of the barrel, no matter what the variety.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Quite so. To speak in general terms, clause 8 says that nothing that is untrue shall be put upon the barrel. The size and the grade are two different things altogether. Both require to be put on the barrel. There are apples of large size and apples of small size and each one may be A1 of its variety. A fruit-dealer sends me a list which names amongst others, Kings, Twenty-Ounce Pippins, Blenheim, Gloria Mundi, Alexander Baldwins, Ben Davis, Spys, Canada Red, St. Lawrence, and he says that these large varieties should be three inches in diameter. These are large apples, but another variety would be of just as fine quality and be only two inches in diameter. The quality of the apples under this Bill is not interfered with by the size that is to be marked on the barrel. The size marked on the barrel has not necessarily to do with the grade or quality.

Mr. A. BRODER (Dundas). Those in the apple business are aware that the size of an apple has to do with its grade.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That may be, but at the same time, the size varies with different varieties of apples, and I propose in this Bill that the grade should not depend upon the size, because the grade applies to all varieties, but the size of the different varieties would be so different that if I were to include the size in the definition of the grade it would not apply to all varieties. I therefore have suggested in the Bill that the size should not go in with the grade, but should be put upon the barrel in a different mark. For instance, you can have Kings, A1 of three inches, and some seasons Kings would not grow to be as large as that, and therefore Kings might be A1 and only 2½ inches in diameter. Take Snow apples or Fameuse of 2½ or 2½ inches and they may be just as good a quality as Kings of 3 inches. Those with whom I have consulted, including the Fruit-Growers' Association, believe that it is better the size should not be put in as part of the definition of the grade, but should be another designation put upon the barrel.

Mr. M. J. F. QUINN (St. Ann's, Montreal). In the communication from the fruit-growers the minister will notice that Kings, &c., should be 3 inches A1, and that Snows, Spitzenberg, Golden Russets, &c., should be 2½, while English Russets, Swazis, and Pomme Grise should be 2½, so that there are three sizes for A1, according to the different variety of the apple.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. To go into a definition of the particular varieties would complicate matters, and make the person packing the apples more liable to make a mistake. If the packer knows the size of the apple he puts in his barrel he marks that size and the variety, and a person knowing anything about the variety will know that the size is a good size for the variety in the barrel. If I were buying a barrel of Kings marked 2 inches, I would know they were culls, whereas the Pomme Grise, or the Snow apples might be marked 2½, and I would know that was a good size for that variety. It is a well-known fact that one year the apples are larger than another year, and this Bill does not suggest that the grade should change from season to season, but that A1 should be A1 year after year, and that it shall require certain quality of apples. Although the size may change with the seasons, the quality of the apple may be equally good or perhaps better, although the apple is smaller. I would also emphasize the fact that, while a barrel of apples is required to have the size marked upon it, that means the diameter of the smallest apple in the barrel, and it does not prevent a larger apple being put in.

Mr. SPROULE. How can you provide for the measurement in packing?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The Bill provides that the measurement shall be the diameter through the core.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose a man goes out with three or four others to pack apples, it is going to retard him very much in his business if he has to run them all through a sieve.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think the packers can manage that very well without having an absolute measurement. A man who handles apples very much can tell after a little by his eye almost exactly whether they come up to the standard size.

Mr. SPROULE. A man goes out with a number of boys or men whom he divides up into two or three groups. He may be experienced in packing, but the others are not. They gather the apples in baskets or place them in piles in the orchard ready for packing. How are they to measure the apples with their eyes? They could not do it unless they were experts; and to do it in any other way would take a great deal of time.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is partly to obviate just what the hon. gentleman has pictured that this Bill is intended. Its object is to hold to account the people responsible for the shipment of our apples, and to compel them to see that the business is done properly. Though I am not an expert, I know a little about the packing of apples, and I think that with very little practice a man packing apples can easily grade and sort them by the eye; and the packing of apples by inexperienced and ignorant people, which the hon. gentleman has pictured, is just what the Bill is intended to a large extent to obviate. The Bill provides that the actual labourer who does the work as well as the person responsible for the work shall be liable to a penalty; and I am in hopes that by imposing that joint responsibility we shall have the work done satisfactorily and well. I do not pretend that people should measure every apple to be put into a barrel; that would interfere far too much with the work; and I do not suppose the inspector would measure every apple put into a barrel unless there came to be a prosecution. The inspector as well as the packers can judge pretty well by the eye.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). I think the further the hon. gentleman goes with the Bill the more difficulties we will get into. To my mind it is practically unworkable, and the more provisions the hon.

Mr. FISHER.

gentleman makes in it, the more people he makes liable, and the wider the scope he gives to the Bill, the more unworkable he will find it. I gather from what the minister said a few minutes ago that he had it under consideration whether he should make the Bill apply to apples packed for market in Canada. Whatever the hon. gentleman does with the other provisions of the Bill, I think he had better stop short of that. To my mind the evil does not lie with the farmers at all, but with the packers. As a matter of fact, the charge made against the Canadian farmers was absolute nonsense. I venture to say that many apples which were bought from them as second-rate apples were packed by the packers and sold as first-class apples. I quite recognize that some law should be placed on the statute-book to prevent the packers practising fraud on the farmer as well as on the buyer; but my judgment is this: if you put the name of the packer upon the barrel, that is penalty enough. If he practices fraud, his name is discredited for the future, and the purchaser has recourse against him if the apples are not up to the standard he represented them to be. I do not think you can have any better remedy. A miserable little fine that may be imposed will not have the effect of deterring him from practising the fraud without some stronger motive, and that motive must be to keep his name good with the men who buy the apples from him. If a man sells to a wholesale dealer fifty or a hundred barrels of apples, which are found not to be up to the standard, he is disgraced in the eyes of the dealer, and will not sell his apples to him again. All you propose to do beyond that will, I believe, be unworkable. The same difficulty was experienced in connection with the Irish egg trade. Eggs were collected by dealers in Ireland and sold in the British market; and on some occasions a large number of them were found to be stale. The plan adopted was to compel every man who sold the eggs and the man who gathered them to stamp his name on the eggs; and it is an exceedingly rare thing to find a single egg in the shipments from Ireland to England which is not first-class and absolutely fresh. The deterrent there was that the man who sold the eggs had to pay the loss, and his name was dishonoured among the purchasers. I believe the same thing can be done in the case of the packers of apples. If they are made responsible for every barrel by having their name placed on the head of the barrel, they will see that the apples are honestly packed and that the buyer gets exactly what he pays for. All the nonsense about measuring apples will lie on the statute-book, and will continue to be nonsense for all time. Nobody is going to measure apples. I think the hon. gentleman will see that that part of his Bill is unworkable. The main point is to bring the fraud home to the person who sells apples not up to the standard, and compel him to pay damages as well as dishonour his name among the trade.

Mr. JOHN McMILLAN (South Huron). What the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) has just stated is quite correct. There is not one farmer in fifty in western Ontario who packs his own apples, and almost every farmer there has a quantity of apples to put on the market. In some cases the packer buys the best apples and leaves the refuse to the farmer. In other cases the packer takes everything, and the farmer only draws the apples to the railway station. The measuring of apples is an impossibility. I have shipped Pomme Gris apples which would not measure over an inch and a half through the core, and yet they brought the highest price. I believe there is a necessity for doing something in this matter, as great fraud has been perpetrated by men putting fine apples at the bottom and at the top of a barrel, and inferior apples in the middle. I believe the object would be attained if we required the grade to be the same from the top to the bottom of the barrel. I think it would also be well to have the name of the packer stamped on the barrel, and I would have no objection to having two or three sizes in the barrel if the grade were correct. It is also impossible to have one variety, because I have had several packers, two or three of them experts, and they gave the apples different names. It would, therefore, in my opinion, not be fair to fine a farmer so long as the centre of the barrel was as good as the top and bottom. If a fine were imposed on those who put good apples on the top and bottom and bad apples in the centre, we would accomplish the purpose desired. The apples should be the same from the top to the bottom; and unless the packer packed in this way, he should be liable to a fine. If something of that kind were done, we would attain the object aimed at without going into all these technicalities, and the credit of our fruit would be very much enhanced on the English market.

Mr. CLANCY. The difficulty of inspection in order to ascertain the size of the apples is, that the barrel would have to be unpacked to a very large extent to determine whether an inferior class was found in the centre. Apples might be graded as No. 1 without being all of a certain size, but, under this Bill, you would require a uniform size as well as grade. The hon. gentleman must see that all the extra expense of handling and measuring these apples, so as to determine the size, must eventually come out of the farmers, because more labour would have to be expended in packing. Let us suppose that the apples were packed with ordinary care, and the inspector found one apple undersized, it is true that he has discretionary power, but the law specifically imposes a certain penalty if a single apple is found undersized.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, 10 per cent.

Mr. CLANCY. Even in that case, it requires greater skill than you can always obtain. During the season when apples are packed, it will be utterly impossible to get experts to pack the apples of a uniform size. You must make use of such labour as you can get. The season is short, and if the apples must be measured before being packed, you will find it almost impossible to have that done, and you will impose greater expense on the farmers.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). I think the hon. minister is mistaken as regards 10 per cent being a smaller size. Whilst there might be 9 per cent of wormy apples, that would only leave 1 per cent margin for small apples.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The size has nothing to do with the definition of the grade. The definition of the grade is explained in section 5, which provides that if 90 per cent are free from wormholes and scabs, the apples are A No. 1; but, section 8 provides that if 10 per cent are substantially smaller in size or inferior in grade, there is false representation. The grade would not be marked A No. 1 if 10 per cent were wormy, but even if they were up to the grading, there must not be 10 per cent undersized. The hon. gentleman has said that the size is not necessary. Well, I can only say that a uniform size was most specifically demanded by the formal resolutions of every provincial fruit-growers society in the Dominion.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There are different classes of fruit-growers. There are what we call fancy fruit-growers, who are devoted exclusively to that occupation, and who do nothing else. But they are not the people who raise the greatest amount of fruit in Canada. The people who raise the greatest amount of fruit in this country are the farmers, men who do not belong to fruit-growers' associations, but who grow and sell, I venture to say, ten barrels for one produced by the fancy growers.

Mr. FOSTER. A hundred.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes—perhaps a hundred. The fancy fruit-growers may be prepared for these technicalities, but the farmers are not.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I will take up the point before the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Montague's) interruption. The Fruit-Growers' Association held its annual meeting, which was attended by fruit-growers in all parts of the province, including dozens and hundreds of the farmers of the province, and not the fruit-growers alone.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will venture to say if the hon. minister will permit me—

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I do not think it is quite fair for my hon. friend (Mr. Montague), to interrupt me so often.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This is probably my last interruption. In my constituency there are thousands of barrels of apples grown and sold. Yet, I venture the statement, that there is not a farmer in my constituency who belongs to the Ontario Fruit-Growers' Association.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague), with all due deference to him, is entirely astray. The Ontario Fruit-Growers' Association is largely composed of members of the local Fruit-Growers' Association, who are, ipso facto, members of the provincial association.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They are not attending members.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They send their delegates to the Provincial Fruit-Growers' Association. The local associations get subventions from the provincial association, and have their officers and their directors in the provincial association. The hon. gentleman need not suppose for a moment that the annual meeting of the Fruit-Growers' Association of Toronto, is simply a convention of fancy fruit-growers. Though the hon. gentleman comes from a fruit-growing section, he has entirely misconceived the scope and excellence of this annual meeting of the provincial association. At the last annual meeting, they appointed a committee to deal with this, a committee whose names were before the farmers and fruit-growers for months. Among them were such men as Mr. E. D. Smith, Mr. William Orr, Mr. George Fisher, Mr. Wolverton, the editor of the Horticulturist, who has been most intimately connected with the fruit-growing interest of Ontario, and others. This committee for months took information from all parts of the province, as published in the Horticulturist, and given out at Farmers' Institutes. And that committee, after deliberating the question for months, asked that the provision with respect to the size of apples should be put in the Bill. I am in the judgment of the House, when I say, therefore, that this was not introduced into the Bill without consideration. The fact is, that the fruit can very easily be graded as to quality and also as to size. An apple is not good in quality according to its great size. Those who know anything about fruit-growing, know that the fruit of medium size is of fully better quality than than of the largest size. The object of putting the size upon the barrel, is to let the purchaser know what he is getting. If a man thinks that his fruit of medium size is better quality than the largest, he can pack those of largest size in one barrel, the medium-sized in another, and the smallest in still another. But the English market demands that each package shall contain articles of a uniform size. You can always do better in the English market, if you send a package of fruit or poultry, or any thing else that is divided into units so that articles of equal size shall be in one package. It was largely for that reason that the fruit-growers and those who have interested themselves in drawing up this Bill, asked that the size should be put upon the package. In the definition of the grade, it says that the apples shall be of nearly uniform size. It may be that that is sufficient, that is, it is unnecessary to provide in addition, that the size shall be marked on the package. I have taken the recommendation of those who are in the best position to know; but I am not particularly wedded to this, and not particularly anxious to force it upon the House; although I think that those who asked it knew the business they were dealing with, and had good grounds for their request.

Mr. SPROULE. What has the Fruit-Growers' Association recommended with regard to variety?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They asked that the name of the variety should be put on. In that connection—I am not speaking in a controversial sense, but I want to let hon. members understand the things that have been brought to my own attention during the months I have been dealing with this question—the reason for putting the name of the variety on the barrel is this: These varieties of apples will keep for different times. If you put into one barrel, for instance, some apples that will keep until the middle of October, and others that would keep until Christmas or later, the purchaser would be unfairly treated; because the more delicate apples, spoiling in a few weeks, would ruin and destroy the others. But there is another reason. There are apples of different kinds, a list of which I have just read. As a matter of personal taste, some of these apples I like, and some I do not like. Of course the same is true of any purchaser. If a man buys a barrel of one variety, he has a right to get what he chooses, and what he pays for. And, if he finds on the top, a layer or two of snow apples, and underneath a layer or two of Ben Davis, he is deceived. Therefore, it is only right that the barrel should show what is contained in it.

Mr. SPROULE. I have here a letter that was written by a member of the Fruit-Growers' Association, who attended the meeting to which the hon. minister referred. Practically this Bill was the one that was discussed before them. He says:

If a person is liable for placing the wrong name of a variety on a barrel, few would escape the penalty.

He admits that a barrel may contain apples of which one party would name as a certain variety, while another would disagree with that and call them by another name or variety. So long as you are dealing with well known varieties, it would not make so much difference, but you have some varieties that are known by different names by different people. Therefore, my correspondent thinks it would be unwise to make it compulsory to put on the barrel the name of the variety and subject the packer to a penalty if he used the wrong name.

Mr. JOSEPH FEATHERSTON (Peel). There are some varieties of apples that are known by different names at different places. For instance, there is the twenty pound pippin, as it is called in some places; it is the same apple that is called the Cabaschaw in others. Complaint was made with regard to this Bill on account of the provision concerning the sorting of apples. Many think it would be a loss to the farmers to sort their apples, but I do not think so. I have handled apples for many years. Take a ten-barrel lot, for instance, going to Toronto market. I take these ten barrels and sort them over and see that the packages contain apples of uniform size. If the apples are of uniform size, I would probably get nine barrels of first-class apples and one barrel of culls, or eight barrels of first-class and two barrels of culls. I found I made more by sorting them in that way than by sending them in promiscuously. It will pay you every time to search the fruit, both for the foreign market and the home market. To send mixed fruit or poor fruit to England does not pay at all; you do not get as much for a barrel of poor apples as the cost and the freight. If you send a good article you will get enough to pay the expense, and have a good price left. I think this Bill is in the interest of the public generally. If we can arrive at some conclusion along the line suggested in this Bill it will be a good thing for the country. Of course, there are some men who object to restrictions and regulations of any kind, because they are men who will do a crooked thing whenever they are able, and they will be willing to take their chances to make a few dollars. I for one would like to put a stop to that kind of business, and I think the time has arrived to do so. We must reluctantly admit that our apple trade has become a disgrace to this Canada of ours in the English market, and I think the time has come when we should make some change, and try, if possible, to give our apples a better standing on the English market. Our western apples do not sell as well as Nova Scotia apples, because we do not practice honest packing, as they do in Nova Scotia. I suppose the Nova Scotia people do it as a pleasure to themselves, because they find they get a better price for their fruit. Let us endeavour to make this Bill workable in all its features, and if we do that I am satisfied that the apple trade will benefit by it.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the apples should be as nearly as possible of a uniform size, and that the names of the well-known varieties should be put on the barrels containing them. But I do not think there should be a penalty if a barrel happens to be found wrongly named.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. There is no danger of that.

Mr. SPROULE. But others who have had a good deal of experience think there is danger. Then, with regard to the law, most of the parties who have written me think it ought to apply to apples sold at home as well as to apples for export; but they think it would be a hardship to compel the party to put the name of the variety in every instance on the barrel, and then make it a punishable offence if it is found that the name of the variety is not correct, though they think the names of the best known varieties should be marked on the barrel.

Mr. J. D. REID (South Grenville). I am surprised that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), who is supposed to be a friend of the farmers, should have presented this Bill. This Bill imposes a penalty on the farmers of this country, and forces them to assume the responsibility of the man who purchased the apples and packed them. Now, here is the statement of one who is in the business:

On reading over the copy of the Bill, I have come to the conclusion that it is impracticable. It would be impossible to inspect the large quantities going forward in some seasons of the year. Moreover, it would spoil packing. It cannot be got in as good shape again for shipping after being opened up, and unless the apples are repacked at shipping points, no inspector could put the government stamp upon them. If my apples have to be repacked at shipping points, I for one will go out of the business. I will admit something should be done to compel the shippers to put their names and address on every barrel, marking them No. 1, 2 or 3, as the case may be. I would compel every shipper to sign an affidavit that his apples are truly marked according to the quality as marked on the barrel, and that the name on the barrel is the true name of the shipper. I would have a copy of this document go forward with each bill of lading to the man to whom the apples were consigned, with instructions to the brokers or men who sell these apples, to read to the people before the sale something like the following:—

And so forth. Then, if we take up the Canadian Horticulturist of May, 1900, we find a letter from Bowlby Bros., of Waterford, saying:

Sir,—We see by the 'Canadian Grocer' that you and Mr. Orr called on the Minister of Agriculture to endeavour to find some means to put a stop to dishonest packing of fruit, especially of apples for exportation. Our canning factory here has had a great amount of trouble this year when opening a barrel that was bought as Spys or Baldwins to find them sweet apples or poor little cider apples, of no use whatever, and all other fruits to a certain extent are not properly graded and labelled. We are of opinion, as we wrote you in December last, that the only way to stop this rascality is by Act of Parliament—

That's right; I agree with that.

—making it compulsory when fruit is sold that it be properly labelled with the grower's name, number of lot, township and county; in case he did not pack it himself, the man's name who did pack it; in case he sold to a dealer, then the dealer's name. The grower or dealer to become personally liable for damages, and every one connected with the packing to be criminally liable for committing a fraud and be punished by fine or imprisonment or both.

We have never seen the rules for grading as made by your Fruit-Growers' Association. Would like very much to have them.

We will be ready to assist all we can at any time to further the purpose about which we are writing.

I know that in my county where there are a great many apples grown, none of the farmers in that constituency belong to the Fruit-Growers' Association. They simply sell to men who come around there and buy the apples, and these men are usually from the city of Ottawa. The farmers sell to these men who do the packing themselves.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
Who pack the apples?

Mr. REID. The men who buy them from the city of Ottawa. Now, the farmers are liable for the action of these men according to this Act.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
No.

Mr. REID. But they may put the names of the farmers on the barrel and then the farmers will be liable, which I consider unfair and unjust to the farmers. I think it is most unfair to make the farmers liable to a penalty, or make them liable to receive a smaller amount for their fruit.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman has shown clearly, both by the letter he read and by his statements, that the Bill does not do any of the things that he is afraid of. The Bill does not provide that the farmer from whom the packer buys shall be liable for a penalty; on the contrary, that penalty is only upon the man who packs and not upon the grower. The hon. gentleman read a letter from a friend of his who said the penalty should apply to both the packer and the grower. I suppose he endorsed that letter, and he wants it to apply to the grower as well as to the packer.

Mr. REID. But why should it apply to the packer alone?

Mr. REID.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Because the packer is the man who is responsible for the way the fruit is put up.

Mr. REID. That is right.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The man who grows the fruit has nothing to do with it, if he has sold his whole orchard to the packer. Therefore, he is innocent, and the hon. gentleman wants the farmer, who is innocent, to be made liable.

Mr. REID. No, I do not.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Well, the hon. gentleman has read a letter which contends that he should be liable. The hon. gentleman says: Why should not the grower be responsible the same as the packer? The hon. gentleman is so mixed up that he does not know what he has said.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The minister is getting too clever. The hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Reid), said what was very clear, that he did not want anything done that would make the farmer liable.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman read a letter in which the writer said that the packer or the grower should be liable. When I said that the packer only would be liable, he said: Why should not the grower also be liable?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The packer and the grower may be two individuals, or the packer and the grower may be only one individual, and if only one individual, he must be liable.

Mr. REID. The grower or the packer must be personally liable for the damage. Which ever one sells the apples is responsible.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is the grower, according to the hon. gentleman's letter.

Mr. REID. If the farmer sells the apples, I want him to be responsible, and if the packer sells the apples, I want him to be responsible.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is what the Bill does.

Mr. REID. No, it does not.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Excuse me, the Bill does not make anybody except the packer responsible.

Mr. REID. If the packer puts the name of the farmer, on the barrel, who sells the apples, the farmer will be responsible.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, the packer will be responsible for putting a false name on it. That is the provision of the Bill.

Mr. REID. It does not say that.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It does say that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Take another point.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Let us finish this point at once, and take up another question afterwards. The Bill distinctly says :

Every person who, by himself or through the agency of another person, packs apples or pears in a closed package, intended for export, shall cause the package to be marked in a plain and indelible manner before it is taken from the premises where it is packed.

Then it gives the definition. Section 10 says :

Whenever any apples or pears packed in a closed package are found to be falsely marked—

And so on. Section 11 says :

Every person who wilfully alters, defaces or obliterates—

And so on. Section 12 gives the definition as to who shall be liable as follows :

The person on whose behalf any apples or pears are packed, sold, offered, or had in possession for sale, contrary to the provisions of the foregoing sections of this Act, shall be, prima facie, liable for the violation of this Act.

The grower has nothing to do with it. The grower is not liable in any shape or form under any provision of the Bill.

Mr. CLANCY. Where is it intended that the inspection shall take place, and at what stage ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The Bill does not provide for that. It is left, according to section 17, to the Governor in Council to make provisions for the inspection. The general intent of the Bill is that when the apples are once packed, and in transport, they will be liable to inspection. The inspection will, probably, sometimes, take place at the port of export, and sometimes at the point of shipment, and, as I explained the other evening, I think it would be wise to make provision so that if any packer wished to have the inspection take place at his own place of business, or at the point of shipment, he could do so on the payment of a small fee. Wherever the inspection takes place without a request from the packer, it will be done at the government's expense. That is part of the regulations which I suggested to the House the other night, and which seemed to meet with the approval of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), in answer to whose suggestion I made the proposal.

Mr. SPROULE. How is it proposed to make the inspection—by taking the head out of the barrel, or a stave out, or how ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The general opinion is that for a proper inspection, the barrel will have to be opened and turned out.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How many barrels will be opened in two hundred, for instance ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That will be a matter of discussion.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How many would you suppose ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I would say 10 per cent.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then you would destroy 10 per cent of the apples, because every time you turn the apples out and put them in again, you make a fresh bruise.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. To a certain extent, there is no doubt that is a very material difficulty.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The whole of this Bill could be done away with, and a Bill of about twenty lines would give just as effective a remedy, by compelling every man to put his name on the barrel, and the class of the apples on the barrel.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. What does the hon. gentleman mean by the class of the apples ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The grade of the apples ; possibly the variety, if you like.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Does the hon. gentleman mean the variety ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I mean the grade. My English is not quite as good as that of the hon. minister.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I just want to know what the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I mean the grade, or the class of the apples, No. 1, or No. 2, or whatever is the classification. You have then the name of the packer, or the shipper, and if he cares for his name and reputation, this will be a guarantee.

Mr. COCHRANE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to draw the attention of the hon. minister to a letter I received from one of the largest packers in my part of the country, Mr. Nisbet. He says that he has had a man in Montreal to attend to the inspection of his apples for the last two years, and he says that it is a most serious difficulty, unless the inspection takes place where the apples are packed. He says that every barrel of apples that was opened in Montreal had to be placed on the market. If 10 per cent of the apples had to be placed on the market because they were unfit to be shipped to Great Britain, this would be a serious thing for a man shipping thousands of barrels to the old country. I am rather of the opinion that the Bill will not be workable as far as the inspection is concerned, when the apples are inspected at the point where they are shipped from, and there is a great deal of force, to my mind, in the point that if a man will put his name on every barrel that is packed, it will be a guarantee. I think I can show the minister where a great deal of this fraud is perpetuated. For instance, a man comes and buys orchards all through the country, and he takes the apples all away. I may tell the minister that in our section of the country, there is no winter fruit left in the orchards. It is all taken out, because with evaporators, cider presses and one thing and another, it pays the packers to remove the apples and pack them in their storehouses. Some of the buyers have evaporator, cider-mills, and canning factory of their own, so that they can utilize everything that they buy, but there are other men who have not the same facilities. They buy up orchards and put on their barrels, No. 1, or No. 2, but they have a great deal of fruit that will not stand these classifications, and they send it to the old country without any name on it. I think if men are compelled to put their names on the apples they pack, and send out of the country, they will know that if their apples are fraudulently packed they will not be liable to sell apples another year. It appears to me that this Bill will be unworkable, and that it will cause a great deal of inconvenience. I am not discussing this Bill with any motive other than a desire to make the Bill workable and to produce the best results we can from the apples we are sending out of Canada. But these difficulties which arise, and which are spoken of in the letters I have received in connection with the inspections from apple exporters in my riding, will, as I have said, render the Bill unworkable.

Mr. CLANCY. I have no disposition to criticise the Bill for the purpose of minimizing the efforts that the hon. gentleman is endeavouring to make to cure an admitted evil. It seems to me that the Bill undertakes so much, that it will be next to impossible to carry out its provisions. The minister tells us that the fruit may be inspected at Montreal, or some port of export, and that in cases where a demand is made for inspection at the place of packing, an inspector will be sent on the payment of a small fee. The hon. minister must see that it will take an army of inspectors to carry out such work. I do not point out these difficulties in a spirit of hostility to the Bill, but I wish to show that if you are not able to carry out all its provisions, it would be better not to have any law at all on the subject. Section 9 says :

Every person who by himself or through the agency of another person violates, &c., shall be liable to a fine.

Now, certain persons may go from one end of Canada to the other buying apples from farmers, pack them, and sell them to third parties. The purchaser was not the packer, and the person who purchased in the first instance was not the agent, and if he were it might be impossible to find him. The law could be evaded there at the outset. I quite agree that some attempt ought to be made to remedy the existing evils, but, at the same time, it appears to me that it would be better to have a simpler Bill, the provisions of which can be carried out, than this Bill full of details which cannot be carried out.

Mr. REID. Section 12 says :

That the person on whose behalf any apples or pears are packed shall be liable for a violation of this Act.

Therefore, if a man goes around and purchases apples from a farmer, that farmer is liable.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If you buy apples from a farmer and pack them for yourself, you are not packing for the farmer.

Mr. REID. The person who buys them may never be found out.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is something in the point. Suppose a dealer says to the farmer : I will buy your apples after they are packed. Then, the farmer is liable if they are improperly packed.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. He would be in that case.

Mr. REID. I am satisfied with any Bill that would protect the farmer, but I am opposed to any law which will harass the farmer as this Bill does, and make him amenable to a penalty that it should not.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Reid) was not present when the Bill was discussed, and he does not know what passed. It was stated over and over again in the House that in almost every case the apples are not packed by the farmers, but by men who buy the orchard, pack the apples, and try to make as many barrels as possible out of the product of the orchard. These men fill the middle of the barrels with poor fruit, and put good fruit at both ends.

Mr. REID. That is right.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is what the Bill seeks to cure. The object of the Bill is not to make the farmer liable, and I have the assurance of the Department of Justice that that is not the effect of it. Of course, if a farmer himself packs the apples, he would be responsible if they were not properly packed. If he is dishonest he would be liable, but if he sees that the apples are properly packed, he would not be liable. The honest farmer is perfectly protected under this law. I assume the intention of all law is to punish the guilty, whether they be farmers or others, and I do not suppose that the hon. gentleman wishes to shield the dishonest farmer any more than he would the dishonest packer. My personal opinion is, that few, if any, of the farmers are dishonest in this matter. As a general rule, the grower is not responsible, but if he be responsible for the improper packing, he ought to be liable to a penalty. There is no danger whatever to the honest farmer.

Mr. REID. The minister knows that probably not one farmer in a hundred will know anything about this law. If a city buyer comes to my constituency and says to the farmer: I will give you so much per barrel, and I will pack them, and put your name on the barrel. The farmer does not know anything about this law, but he will afterwards be held liable for bad packing. There is nothing in this Bill to protect the farmers, and there should be something to protect him against unprincipled men of that kind. The minister knows there is nothing in this Bill to protect the honest farmer.

Mr. FLINT. The clause only makes the person prima facie liable, and he will have an opportunity of defending himself by competent evidence.

Mr. REID. Yes, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Flint) knows that the magistrate will look to the law and not to the discussion in this House; and there is nothing in the law to protect the honest farmer. He will take the law as he finds it in this ninth clause. There is nothing in this Bill to protect the honest farmer of the country, and the minister should have something in it that will protect him.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The Bill was never intended to meet the case of the honest farmer, because the honest farmer will not violate the law.

Mr. REID. The honest farmer will not violate the law if he knows what the law is. Does the Solicitor General suppose that every farmer in this country will have a copy of this Bill? He knows that he will not; therefore, there should be something in it to protect the honest farmer.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Then I suppose the hon. gentleman means that when we enact a Criminal Act, we should distribute a copy of it to every person in the country.

Mr. REID. No I do not, but this Act is framed especially for the farmers of this country.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is not.

Mr. REID. It is not the lawyers of this country who are growing the apples, but it is the farmers, and if the Solicitor General framed this Bill, he should see that it protects the honest farmers, who are the backbone of this country.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am quite satisfied that when the farmers of this country read this discussion, they will not be very thankful to the hon. gentleman for the mode he has taken of protecting them.

Mr. REID. The hon. gentleman has no right to make that remark. I am ready to depend on the votes of the farmers of the county I represent for their approval of my course. The Solicitor General, in framing this Bill, should protect the farmers as well as the purchasers of apples.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). There is a good deal in the contention of my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid), for this reason. The farmers of this country have been growing apples from time immemorial, and shipping and selling those apples in a certain way. Now, you are enacting a law, which is to take effect on the first of July, making it a penal offence in some cases if these farmers dispose of their apples. As my hon. friend says, there is not one farmer in twenty who will know that you have passed this law. But what I rose for was to ask the Minister of Agriculture how apples from other countries are sold in England. If I am correctly informed, apples from all countries are sent there in barrels, and when put on the market a certain number are poured out into baskets, and the apples are sold according to the sample shown, so that the purchaser sees what he is buying. He sees the sample poured out.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, certainly.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is the case with apples from all countries, and I understand that no other country has the form of inspection which we are adopting here.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I do not know as to that.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am informed that neither the United States nor any European country has this kind of inspection; therefore, it is going to prove a disadvantage instead of a blessing. Let the hon. gentleman adopt the suggestion I made and try it for one year, that is, to let the packer be his own inspector, and brand his name, his address and the variety of the apples on the barrel. If you adopt this Bill, you are going to stop a large trade. Many farmers send their apples to commission merchants in Montreal. The commission merchant finds them to be a fair average stock, and he sends them to England and sells them by auction for what they are worth. My hon. friend is going to stop that trade unless the apples are repacked at Montreal, which would spoil the fruit. Then, he proposes to brand the apples A No. 1, No. 1 and 2. The apples which command the highest price in this country are the Russets, and yet you will hardly get a Russet large enough to grade A No. 1.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman has not listened to my explanation, that the grade does not depend on the size.

Mr. TAYLOR. The grade must depend to a certain extent on the size.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, not at all.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then I do not understand the hon. gentleman. What is the benefit of having a size?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. To show what the size of the apples is.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know that the small Russet apple commands the highest price, it is the best keeper, there is a larger number in the barrel, and the apples will go further as a table fruit in hotels. If the hon. gentleman is going to grade a Russet because it is small in size—

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am not, and the Bill does not.

Mr. TAYLOR. However, I have studied the matter, and my opinion is this—and it will please the farmers, the fruit-growers and the exporters—that you should compel every packer to be his own inspector, put his name and address and the variety of the fruit on the barrel. But to appoint a lot of inspectors to enforce the Act at Montreal or anywhere else, means that you are simply going to ruin the trade of this country, and do something that is not done in any other apple-growing country in the world.

Mr. THOMAS FORTIN (Laval). I have only a few words to say on this subject, and they are said in response to what I understood to be an invitation of the Minister of Agriculture, as to the feasibility of enacting that the branding of apples shall apply to the local market. I understand that the Bill provides for the branding of apples for the export trade only, and the suggestion was made that it should also apply to apples for the local market. I do not know very much upon this subject, and it is with hesitation that I venture to express an opinion. There are, however, a few farmers in my constituency who grow apples for the local trade only. I regret to see that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier is not here; I understand that possibly the best apples grown in the whole country—the celebrated Fameuses—come from the county of Jacques Cartier. There is hardly any necessity for imposing upon our farmers the necessity of putting their names upon the barrel, etc., when they are selling their apples upon the local market. There are reasons for this which may not exist in so far as the export trade is concerned. In the first place, the farmers are generally known to the purchasers. A man who purchases apples upon the market in Montreal from a farmer in the vicinity generally knows the seller, and can tell whether he is dealing with a man in whom he may have confidence. In the second place, those apples are brought either in bags or barrels, and the barrels are opened to inspection, and may be emptied sufficiently to permit personal inspection.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The Bill only applies to the sale of fruit in close packages, so that the open packages which the hon. gentleman describes would not come under its provisions at all.

Mr. FORTIN. This is an additional reason why this Bill should not apply to the local trade at all. If the local trade is not carried on under the conditions provided by the Bill, it seems to be useless to extend the Bill to that trade. I am not an expert on this subject, but I have heard so many members talking on subjects which they apparently knew so little about, that I was encouraged to take some little part in this discussion.

Mr. D. D. ROGERS (Frontenac). I am very pleased to see the sentiment prevailing, that something should be done to regulate the sale of apples shipped for export. We all realize that our apples are at a great disadvantage in the English market. We can see by the press of our country and by the English press, and any person who heard the evidence given before the Agricultural Committee by our agents on the other side could not help a blush of shame at the manner in which our apples are sent to the mother country. While we find that our wheat and pork and cheese and butter are rated high in the English market, our apples, unfortunately, are at a discount, and considering that we export from $1,300,000 or $1,400,000 per year of this commodity, we must admit that it is high time something should be done to give it the standing which our other products have attained. And it is quite evident that if our apples were properly handled, they would realize some hundreds of thousands dollars more than they now do. It is no doubt a good move to compel the name of the shipper to be stamped on the barrel, but we should have a provision compelling him to put on his true name, so that he could not evade the law by putting on the name of one of his employees or irresponsible person. It is said that the inspection of the barrel would be a source of great trouble, but if 10 per cent inspected be reduced in value, the 90 per cent will bring a better price and the exporters will get the benefit. When our apples are at a discount, as they now are, in the English market on account of poor packing, some radical means should be taken to remedy that evil. It may be said that the present Bill is not perfect, but I would like to know of any law that was perfect when first passed. All our laws have been amended time and again, and if this measure should not be found workable, we can have it amended another session. As regards the contention of the hon. member for Renfrew with reference to ignorance of law, there may be something in it, but ignorance of law is not an excuse, and our farmers are to-day a reading public and better aware of what is going on in the House and the country than some people imagine. When he has an article to sell a farmer should not and is not ashamed to put his name on the package. Even in the local trade that would be an advantage, and if all the apples were not up to a certain grade, they could be stamped as mixed or seconds, so that the buyer could know what he was buying. In my opinion, this measure will encourage our farmers to take more care of their orchards and aid in the development of this valuable trade.

Mr. REID. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers). That hon. gentleman was elected as a Patron of Industry and a friend of the farmer. And since he has sat in this House, he has never given one vote or spoken one word in the interest of the farmers of this country. But every Bill that has been submitted by the government, the hon. member has supported, whether it was right or wrong, whether it was needed by the farmers or not. He knows that this Bill is not in the interest of the farmers. He asks that it be passed now, and says that next year it can be amended. The hon. member knows that next year he will not be in the House to amend it. He says that a great injustice has been done to the apple-growers of this country. I agree with him in this statement. My objection to this Bill is that it does not protect the apple-growers. If he will point out to me one clause in the Bill that will protect the apple-growers, I will support it.

Mr. ROGERS. It all protects them.

Mr. REID. No, it protects gentlemen who buy and pack the apples. But it is the farmers I am trying to protect; and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) is going back on the farmers, although he was elected to represent them in this House. He says that butter and cheese are properly protected. I agree with the hon. gentleman, but he is not protecting the farmers of this country when he agrees with this Bill. He says the farmers are not so dense but that they know what is going on, and what the objects of this Bill are. I agree with him to a certain extent. But not every farmer knows. Those who do know, and who read the speech of the hon. member (Mr. Rogers), I believe, will not support him after what he has said.

Mr. TAYLOR. How are butter and cheese protected?

Mr. REID. By brand. The Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), I believe, framed this Bill—

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. REID. Well, he takes the responsibility. But, as a lawyer, I do not know why he should be unwilling to leave matters to a jury. The Bill provides:

No appeal shall lie from any conviction under this Act except to a superior, county, circuit or district court, or the court of the sessions of the peace having jurisdiction where the conviction was had; and such appeal shall be brought, notice of appeal in writing given, recognizance entered into, or deposit made within ten days after the date of conviction; and such trial shall be heard, tried, adjudicated upon and decided, without the intervention of a jury—

And so on. Now, is it not unfair that if there is any wrong-doing it should not be allowed to go to a jury to consist of the farmers of this country? Could not twelve honest farmers be chosen to decide such questions? The hon. member is afraid to allow that to go to a jury of farmers.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. I think he will accept that. There are twelve in the House who are capable.

Mr. REID. Why not put it in the Bill? Will the hon. minister agree to leave it to a jury?

Mr. JAMES GILMOUR (East Middlesex). Fraud should be punished wherever it exists. This Bill seeks to accomplish that, but in the technicalities and varied stipulations into which it goes, it defeats its own object. I would not like to ship apples under the conditions imposed by this Bill. I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) would make it easy and plain—simply to provide that the apples shall be uniform from one end of the barrel to the other. This could easily be ascertained, and the inspector could put his brand on accordingly. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Featherston) has shipped many apples, I know; and I would ask him if that would not meet the case. There are all sorts of stipulations with regard to size and with regard to grades made by the government in this Bill. We are all sure to vary as to the grade, and vary honestly. Your inspector might meet my apples somewhere on the way and stop and inspect them. If he did not agree with me as to the grade, he would bring me up for summary punishment. The apples would be detained, while the litigation was going on, and while an appeal was taken to a superior, county, circuit or district court. That is too much for apples. Apples are delicate articles. The one who handles apples has to get them while he can and put them on the market right or he will soon be out of the business. I would urge the minister to consider the suggestion of the hon. member for South Huron. Let the barrel bear the name of the variety and the name of the shipper, and let the fruit be uniform from top to bottom of the barrel.

Mr. W. V. PETTET (Prince Edward). The fruit-growing industry is a very important one in the county of Prince Edward. I think that the year before last we shipped something like 50,000 barrels from that county alone. The hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) will bear me out in saying that there are not better apples grown on the continent of America than those grown in the Bay of Quinté district—notwithstanding the statement of the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) and others that the Annapolis valley apples are the best. I have never had experience in exporting apples to the old country, but I have shipped my own apples to Montreal. I prefer selling them at home. I have always found it more satisfactory to ship them to Montreal and have them sold by a commission merchant. I do not believe that the bad name that our apples have got in the British market is due altogether to bad packing. Professor Robertson, before the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization last year, said that it was impossible to carry apples safely across the Atlantic unless the holds of the vessels were fitted up with ventilated chambers. He went on to read a letter from Mr. E. D. Smith, a leading fruit-grower, comparing the shipments of this fruit from Halifax and from Ontario and Quebec. Of 1,000 barrels shipped from Halifax in vessels provided with ventilating chambers, only fourteen were reported slack and wet; whereas, in the shipment from Ontario and Quebec, from twenty to seventy-five per cent were slack and wet when they reached the old country. I do not know whether the steamships have been provided with ventilating compartments since that time; but the minister should see to it that the vessels carrying our apples from Montreal to Great Britain shall be provided with ventilating chambers. Now, as for the Bill itself, I am in accord with its principal features. Perhaps if anything should be left out it is the provision regarding the size of the apples in inches. I think the packer's name should be put on the barrel, with the name of the variety and the grade. But the most important part of the Act is left to the Governor in Council, that of inspection, and I would advise the minister, when an inspector is appointed, to make him liable to a penalty if he does not do his duty faithfully. I know of some cases where veterinaries were appointed to give certificates for cattle going to the other side, and I have it on good authority that they gave the certificates without having inspected the cattle at all; that upon being paid for it by the shippers they passed a whole car-load without inspection. Now that might be the case with the apple inspectors unless they were liable to a penalty.

Mr. TAYLOR. Explain how they can be inspected.

Mr. GILMOUR.

Mr. PETTET. That is a difficult thing.

Mr. REID. You are representing the farmers, you should do so.

Mr. PETTET. Yes, I am a farmer, and I grow apples, but I never had any experience in shipping them. The member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane), said the other day that shippers could give more details about the business than growers. I could not offer any suggestions in the matter of inspection, and am willing to leave that to the Governor in Council.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pettet) has made one or two remarks which show that he has carefully considered this Bill. He remarked, in referring to inspectors and their duties, that he had heard of a case where veterinary inspectors had given certificates without proper inspection. I regret to hear that, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that if he will inform me who those inspectors are, I will take steps to see that they are dealt with properly and promptly. So far as I know, no such conduct has been brought to my attention, except in one particular case where the person was immediately dismissed from the service of the government. If the hon. gentleman will give me the means of tracing such action on the part of any officers of my department, the shrift will be very short for such officer, I can assure him.

The matter of inspection, I say frankly, is a most difficult one. I have shrunk for two years from the introduction of an Act of this kind, although it has been urged upon me by gentlemen all over the country, by many gentlemen who are discussing this Act to-day. In the Committee of Agriculture, the question has been discussed for two years, and it is only in consequence of the deplorable condition which our export apple trade has reached, as shown in the information which was received last fall, that I felt compelled to take some action, if we are going to preserve our export trade at all. The condition of affairs is not altogether what has been explained by my hon. friend from Prince Edward County (Mr. Pettet). The arrival in England of apples which have been damaged in the unventilated holds of steamers, is certainly much to be regretted. Through discussion with the various ship-owners, I have been urging upon them to provide proper ventilation for those holds, and as an hon. gentleman has mentioned, in the case of apples shipped from Nova Scotia the shipowners who took those apples to England had acted upon my solicitation and had put proper ventilating shafts into the steamers to carry those apples. This last fall a number of ships from Montreal were also fitted with electric fans and ventilating shafts, but notwithstanding these improvements in the transportation of apples, the reputation of Canadian apples last fall suffered more in England than ever before. But the chief cause of this was not the discovery of slack and wet apples so much as it was the discovery of actual fraud in the packing, where closed barrels had been faced at either end with a couple of rows of good apples and the rest of the barrel was filled with trash. It is to guard against fraud of that kind that this Bill has been framed. This Bill does not provide for any inspection of fruit after it has crossed the Atlantic, we have to leave that to the people on the other side. There is no doubt that even if our apples were good through and through and fulfilled every condition of this Bill, still, if they are carried across the Atlantic in heated holds, near the boilers and engines of the vessel, they will arrive on the other side of the Atlantic in bad condition, and this Bill does not pretend to provide against that. What it does pretend to do is to provide against the fraudulent packing and marking of the barrels. Hon. gentlemen opposite have made suggestions, some of them in one direction and some of them in another. My hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) has protested against the name of the variety being put upon the barrel. My hon. friend from Middlesex (Mr. Gilmour) asked that the name of the variety be put on.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister misunderstood me. I said it would be well to put the names of the well-known varieties.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I was going to suggest a small verbal amendment to that third clause in section c, where it says that the name of the variety shall be put on, an amendment in these words 'mixed varieties'; so that if a person wished to pack different varieties of apples in the same barrel he might put these words on the barrel. So far as the inspection is concerned, nobody appreciates the difficulty more than I do. As I have pointed out in former sessions in the Committee of Agriculture, I have shrunk from proposing legislation of this kind because of the difficulties of inspection. At the same time it seems to me we have had a call to pass such a Bill as this. Inspection seems to be necessary, however little may be contained in the Bill itself. If it is understood on the floor of parliament that we require certain grading and certain things to be done in the shipment of fruit, and if there were to be no provision for inspecting that fruit, the people would laugh at the provisions and would not try to fulfil them. As I have explained on several occasions, it is not expected that every shipment, that every barrel or every lot of apples shall be inspected. But every one, under this Bill, would be liable to inspection, and therefore I think it will prove a deterrent to people from practising these frauds. Inspection is not compulsory, but at the same time any individual who packs apples is liable to have them inspected under this Bill. Without such a provision the Bill would be of little use. If it was understood and expressed on the floor of parliament that while provision is made for the proper branding and marking of apples, no penalties were attached for neglecting to do so, and no inspection was to be made, the people would laugh at the provisions and would ignore them, and our fruit would not get the benefit of the improvements. Some hon. gentleman has suggested that the name of the packer and the grade would be sufficient to mark upon the package. But, the grade is no use to be put on the package unless there is some statutory definition of what the grade means. If you were to put A No. 1. or XXX, or anything of that kind on, and there was no statutory declaration to show what that grade meant, if an hon. gentleman opposite were to buy a barrel of apples from me, marked XXX, if he were to go into a court and try to prove that I had not supplied him with XXX apples, and there was no definition of what XXX meant, the hon. gentleman would find it very difficult to convict me, because there would be no standard, and he could not prove that I had sold him something which was falsely represented. Therefore, it is, that I think it is necessary that there should be a definition of what the grades mean. Otherwise I think the Bill would be practically useless.

Mr. TAYLOR. That would be all right.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is just what the Bill provides.

Mr. TAYLOR. It provides more than that; it provides for an inspection.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It provides that there will be a liability to inspection, so that any person who puts up apples and mark them fraudulently is liable to be found out. But, if there were no inspection a person would mark whatever he liked on the package and he would take his chance of being found out. As far as the home trade is concerned, the purchaser who is defrauded might bring him to account, but as far as the export trade is concerned, when the people in Great Britain, who purchased the fruit, found that it was not what it was represented to be, they could not prosecute him with any convenience, or they would not be likely to do so. This brings me to what the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Reid) said. He said, that on the English market fruit is turned out and sold at auction open to the inspection of the purchaser.

Mr. BRODER. Only the sample.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is sold by sample, and the sample is turned out.

Mr. SPROULE. A gentleman who is in the business says that if the consignment is under 20 barrels the barrel is not turned out, but if it is over 20 barrels one barrel is turned out.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am not aware of that provision, but I do not say that it is not so. If it is so it is very evident that fraud is very easy because, as we know perfectly well, to our shame be it said, a large number of packers and shippers send part of their trade in one name and part of it in another, and probably the reason for doing that is to avoid coming under the provision that the hon. gentleman has described. But even supposing that the purchaser over there knows what he is getting, and only pays for what he is getting, that is not a remedy for the evil at which this Bill is aimed, because, in consequence of what has been going on the reputation of Canada as a fruit exporting country has been ruined and the object of this Bill is to try and reinstate her in the reputation which she ought to have as a fruit-growing and a fruit-shipping country, because we do produce fruit here of the highest and best quality. It is only because some people have been guilty of fraudulent packing that our reputation has been injured in other markets. Therefore, the contention as to the inspection is not substantiated but, to prevent further injury to our reputation in foreign markets we need an inspection, or a liability to inspection, and is only by that means that we can accomplish the objects of this Bill at all.

Mr. HURLEY. Would the hon. minister tell me where and how the inspection will take place?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. An inspection will be liable to take place at any point from the point of shipment until the barrels are sent out of the country. The fruit shipped is liable to be inspected wherever the inspector may happen to find it, under the provisions of the Bill. That is the intention of the Bill. There is no doubt that there are great difficulties in this, but, at the same time, if we are going to have a Bill, and if we are going to have any good effect from it, it seems to me absolutely necessary that this liability to inspection shall be provided for.

Mr. J. J. TUCKER (St. John City and County). Will it be one barrel in 50, or one barrel in 75, or one barrel in 100, that will give an indication as to the quality of the remaining barrels?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The usual practice in such cases is that a certain percentage of the barrels shall be opened, and that if that percentage is good the whole lot will be allowed to pass. But if a certain number be found defective the whole lot shall be marked 'fraudulently packed,' or wrongly marked, like the ones that are inspected. This is a detail of the inspection which can be arranged to suit the exigencies of the trade.

Mr. GILMOUR. The hon. minister said at one stage of his remarks that he had noticed the bad condition of the apples when he was in the old country last fall. He did not seem to state the cause exactly. I would like to state to him the chief cause of the bad condition of the apples which were sent forward last fall, and the cause of the disaster to those who shipped them. It will be remembered that last fall apples ripened too early, that warm weather followed the ripening, and that they were unfit to ship. Winter fruit was as unfit to ship as fall fruit generally is. I know men who lost every dollar's worth of the apples which they had shipped under the best method which was known to them.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman is quite right, but that does not account for the fact that at each end of the barrels there was fine, handsome fruit, while the middle was filled with little nubbins.

Mr. GILMOUR. When the decay came the middle would look worse than the outside.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, but it does not account for the small apples that were in the middle of the barrel.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). I would like to ask the hon. minister, if after fruit has been inspected in Montreal and passed, there will be any mark put upon the barrel by the inspector that will guarantee to the purchaser in England that the fruit has been inspected and is really what it is represented to be. Will there be any distinctive mark showing that the fruit has been inspected?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. As the inspection is not compulsory, I did not think it would be well to place such a mark on the package. This Bill does not contain provisions for a compulsory inspection. I have been urged by many people to have a compulsory inspection and to undertake to inspect every lot of fruit that goes out of the country, but I did not see my way clear to do that. I shrunk from attempting such an inspection, and as long as that is not done I do not think that it would be wise that any mark of inspection should be put upon the barrels.

Mr. CLARKE. It would undoubtedly give a special status to our fruit if the result of the inspection were put upon it. It seems to me, that the purchasers of fruit in England would rather purchase fruit that had been inspected and would pay a larger price for it while the reputation of our fruit would be re-established more rapidly if some marks were on the barrel showing that it had been inspected by our inspector before it was shipped to the old country.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to express any opinion as an expert, and I feel some diffidence in addressing you, Sir, upon the question which has been treated by the experts of the House. But, there are other points beside the technicalities which appeal to the practical common sense outside of any technical point, and one of these which appeals to me, whether I am right or wrong is this: The hon. minister states that in his Bill he does not wish to make a compulsory inspection. What is the use of an inspection in so far as the foreign market is concerned, unless compulsory? If the English buyer knows that there is compulsory inspection in Canada which gives a certificate of character to the apples, he would be more likely to rest assured that he was getting fruit of good quality. I would like the minister to consider whether this inspection, without being compulsory and without placing the imprimatur of the government of Canada on our apples, will have the desired effect of enhancing the reputation of our apples in the English market. In Canada our fruit is undoubtedly of a most superior quality, and it should enjoy the very best reputation, and it is for the government to take measures to secure that. The apple-grower in Canada will enter into the business for the purpose of making money out of it, and his greatest inducement to pack properly and to grow the best quality of fruit will be, that if his name is placed on the barrel, he may become known as a successful producer of apples. The individual grower will be interested in maintaining his reputation, and will produce and export his apples in a manner to bring him the highest price. I speak with some diffidence on this subject, but I come from a part of Canada where apples are produced in perfection. The Fameuse is favourably known all over the world, but the delicacy of that variety is such that it is not fit for exportation. However, in Ontario, Quebec, and the valley of Evangeline, we produce the very best fruit in the world for export to the English market. I should imagine that if the inspection is compulsory it would be far better for the apple trade, and I would also suggest that it would be better to stamp the name of the grower on the barrel for the reasons I have mentioned.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The Bill does provide that the packer's name shall be upon the barrel. The hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) alluded to the Fameuse apple, and while I quite agree in his opinion as to its excellence, I cannot allow his statement to go unchallenged, that the Fameuse cannot be exported. The Fameuse is exported with the greatest success to England, and its super-excellent qualities are recognized there to-day. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House complain generally that the Bill goes too far, but the hon. member (Sir Adolphe Caron) asks that it shall go a great deal further, and that the inspection shall be compulsory. As has been already stated, it would be almost a physical impossibility to undertake to inspect all the apples exported. Within about six weeks of the fall of each year, some time as much as 500,000 barrels of apples are shipped from the port of Montreal, and compulsory inspection of that number of barrels in such a short period of time would be practically impossible. Of course, I suppose enough men could be put on to do it, but the inevitable delay which would arise would be fatal to the trade. I venture to say that no one who has studied the matter carefully would advocate compulsory inspection. I grant that the fact that this inspection is not compulsory may not make the grading of itself so satisfactory to the English purchaser. But the fact that inspection can be made will accomplish, I believe, what is aimed at, in deterring the fraudulent packer. He will never know when his packages may be inspected, or when he may be discovered and fined, and nine men out of ten, of those even who wish to commit fraud, will shrink from doing so. I fear it will be impossible to do more than that.

Mr. T. DIXON CRAIG (East Durham). I have two or three large apple-shippers in my constituency, and when home I had a talk with them about this matter. They told me there was a meeting of shippers at Toronto, that one of them attended as representing the others, and that the conclusion they came to was: That they were opposed to this Bill. They thought the object of the Bill might be good, but they said it was utterly impracticable. They did not know where or in what manner this inspection was to be done to be of any use. I report that as their opinion; but I go further for myself, and I say that on general principles I am opposed to compulsory inspection of any kind. Our butter trade does not amount to much, but our cheese trade amounts to a great deal, and it has not been built up by compulsory inspection. Neither has the bacon trade, which is also a very large trade in this country. It is true, as the minister says, last year our apples turned out very badly; but the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Gilmour) has given the reason for that. In that case it was the shippers themselves who suffered loss, not the farmers. A difficulty of that kind will cure itself, for men will not continue to ship apples and lose money on them year after year. They themselves will have to take greater precautions and be more careful about packing. After all, self-interest is the great motive in doing business; it is the only thing that makes men do business properly. Every man is anxious to have his goods stand well in the market to which he sends them, and it is his interest more than that of the government to see that everything is done so that the goods will turn out well and that he will make a profit. A suggestion which was made by the shippers in my constituency has been mentioned here two or three times, that is, that the name of the shipper should be put on the barrel. If that were done and the apples turned out badly in the old country, he would get a bad name. That was their argument. As for themselves, they said they would be anxious to have a good name there, and that the apples should turn out just what they were represented to be. They are opposed to the government going any further than that.

Mr. SPROULE. Did they not express the opinion that the name or the brand on the barrel should also be registered here, so that it could be traced? Those with whom I communicated regarded that as important.

Mr. CRAIG. No, they did not say a word about that. Now, as the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) says, I do not think there is any such Bill as this in the United States, where they ship a great many more apples than we do; and that being the case, I am afraid that if we adopt a Bill of this character, instead of doing good, it will do harm and hamper the shippers of apples. There is one clause in this Bill which struck me as a very peculiar one, that is clause 13, which provides that the inspector may enter upon any premises to make an examination of any packages of apples or pears suspected of being falsely marked, whether such packages are in the premises of the owner or on other premises, or in the possession of a railway or steamship company. It seems to me that puts too much power altogether into the hands of the inspector. If he suspects any apples, he has the power to inspect them anywhere, whether in transit or anywhere else. I can see how this would greatly interfere with trade. I think that power is too great to give any man. Altogether, I am opposed to this Bill. Before sitting down, I am going to read a short article from the Weekly Sun, a farmers' paper, which expresses my views on this question exactly:

The Fruit Inspection Bill.

Mr. Fisher's Bill, providing for the inspection of apples and pears packed for export, is one of the most important that has been taken up at this session of parliament. It was well, we think, that when it was up in the House last week, it was allowed to stand over, in order that there might be a fuller expression of opinion upon it. The legislation proposed is of an entirely new character, and it is not easy to say just how the measure will work out, should it be placed upon the statute-book.

Mr. CRAIG.

It is unquestionably in the interests of all, and of none more than the exporters, that our apples, which constitute nearly the whole of our fruit exports, should obtain and secure a high reputation on the British market. There have, doubtless, been instances where inferior apples have been exported, and the general average has thus been lowered. But, in instances where the quality has proved to be inferior, the party placing the fruit upon the market has been the chief sufferer. It is not the purchaser who loses, for before apples are sold in Great Britain, they are subjected to rigid inspection, and if the quality is poor, so is the price. Here, then, a penalty of the heaviest character is at once imposed upon the exporters of inferior fruit.

Our cheese has acquired a high reputation on the British market; so has our bacon. With neither cheese nor bacon has it been found necessary to enact legislation such as is proposed in the case of apples. Is there not some danger that the legislation now proposed will hamper our apple trade rather than help it? Is there not some danger that the proposed restrictions and the impositions of penalties, one-half of which we notice are to go to the informers, may have the effect of discouraging trading, and thus lead to less competition and lower prices? We hope that the Bill, if enacted, may have a directly opposite effect, but these questions seem, to us at least, worthy of consideration.

As the exporters have the most to gain from a high reputation for our apples abroad, they will doubtless investigate the causes that have led to the shipment in recent years of some apples of an inferior quality. They will probably find that the great defect is the way in which the system of purchasing and packing is carried on. They will probably find instances where their local agents have bought orchards in bulk, and, when the crop has been short, have packed inferior apples in order to bring the number of barrels up to the estimated quantity. They will probably find other instances where agents who purchase for them on commission, have been more zealous in swelling their commissions than in culling the apples purchased by them. That it is the system of purchase more than anything else that is at the root of the trouble is proved almost conclusively, from the fact that in Nova Scotia, where the apple-grower exports his own fruits, there is little, if any, complaint of the inferior quality of the exports. It is in Ontario, where the fruit is at least equal to that grown in Nova Scotia, but where an entirely different system prevails, that the charges of bad packing are made. If we are correct in this, the evil seems one that is likely to best work out its own remedy without restrictive legislation.

It seems to me that the minister might well let this matter stand over until another session, so that it may be more fully considered and we can ascertain whether or not there is any need of a Bill of this character.

Mr. ANDREW BRODER (Dundas). I rise to suggest that it would be well to put on the barrel, not only the name of the exporter, but the name of the orchard from which the apples are taken. Then, the owner of the orchard would have as much interest in having the apples properly packed as the shipper, because the reputation of his orchard would be to some extent at stake. It seems to me that would get over the difficulty as to when, where or how the apples should be inspected. I do not for a moment suggest that any inspection we can make here will bind the English purchaser. A perishable article like an apple may be in good condition when it leaves our shore and be bad when it reaches England. You cannot get a thorough remedy. The one thing we want to be sure of is, that the apple shipped from Canada is what it is represented to be. The persons interested are the owner of the orchard and the packer; and if the purchaser is packing badly for the purpose of fraud, let the farmer bring in the inspector at the expense of the purchaser.

Mr. TAYLOR. If I understood the hon. minister correctly, he said that Canadians lost heavily on account of the way they packed their apples, namely, by putting one or two tiers of large apples at the head and bottom of the barrel, and filling the middle with smaller apples.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Some did that.

Mr. TAYLOR. How does he know they were Canadians? Is he not aware that large quantities of apples are brought in from the United States, purchased by our Canadian shippers, and shipped from Montreal? How does he know that it was not the Americans who were doing this work of which he complains and not the Canadian shippers. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Trade and Navigation Returns, he will find that last year in particular we brought in large quantities of apples from the United States and shipped them to Great Britain, and we shipped besides from Canada to the United States 17,000 barrels of apples. Will this Bill apply to apples shipped to the United States?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. We supplied Germany with 5,000 barrels and Newfoundland with 7,000 barrels, and no fault was found by the trade in the United States, Germany, and Newfoundland as regards the apples being smaller in the centre of the barrel than at the top and bottom. What right has the hon. gentleman to charge Canadians with this fraudulent practice? Where is the protection he gives the Canadian trade by providing that our apples are to be branded as the produce of Canada, when the Americans can ship their apples and claim that they are Canadian goods?

I agree with what my hon. friend has read from the Farmer's Sun. We have built up in Canada a trade in cheese and butter simply because Canadians took pride in sending the best article to the English market, as they will do in the case of apples. If the hon. minister will take the precaution of having them shipped as carefully as butter and cheese were under the provisions enacted by the late government, he will be doing something for which he may claim credit. My hon. friend laughs, as if the late government had done nothing in building up our butter and cheese industry, although he knows that industry was built up before he ever had anything to do with it as a cabinet minister. If he would take the trouble to see that our apples are not stowed away in the holds of vessels, where they become melted before arriving in England, and have them stowed in properly ventilated apartments, he will be doing something for the trade. I would ask the hon. minister what he did with the apples he sent to England. He nursed them all the way across, and yet they did not bring enough to pay freight, and did not return a dollar into the treasury. Did he pack the barrels with small apples in the middle, and large ones at both ends? or what was the reason not a cent was returned to the treasury? and were they the kind of fruit that has brought our Canadian exporter and grower into disrepute? He is allowing American apples to go from Canada branded as Canadian fruit, and is making no provision to brand Canadian apples as a Canadian product.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The Bill does provide that Canadian apples shall be branded as such, and the American apples, to which the hon. gentleman has alluded, came from the United States and went through in bond, and were sold in England as coming from the United States, and had not the word 'Canadian' printed on the packages at all. The English law requires the packages to have the country of origin printed on them, and Canadian apples were branded as such on their packages in accordance with that law. The apples which the hon. gentleman has alluded to, and which have been alluded to several times in this discussion, which arrived in England fraudulently packed, had the names of Canadian packers on the packages.

Mr. TAYLOR. They will not do it again.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They may or they may not, but they injured the reputation of Canadian apples in the English market, and the object of this Bill is to prevent a repetition of that kind of thing. The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong in his premises, so that I need not pay any more attention to him.

Mr. REID. The whole tendency of this Bill is to represent that our farmers are a lot of scoundrels.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Not a bit of it. The farmers are not mentioned in the Bill at all.

Mr. REID. According to the Bill, it is directed against the farmers.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
No.

Mr. REID. From my county some 10,000 to 20,000 barrels of apples are sold by the farmers to men who purchase them at so much a barrel. The purchaser packs them, and the farmers are held responsible for the packing of those apples under this Bill.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
No.

Mr. REID. Yes, the Bill says: 'Every person who, by himself or through the agency of another person—' The packer may be held to be the agent of the farmer and the farmer is responsible.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
The purchaser is not an agent.

Mr. REID. He might be held an agent, because he might put the farmer's name on the package.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
He would be liable under section 3 for putting a wrong name on the package.

Mr. REID. Right along the border, supposing the packer shipped the barrels right across the river and thence to England, how are you going to protect the Canadian market? Those apples are shipped as Canadian apples; and if badly packed, as the minister describes, they will injure our reputation. I was the first man in this House to recommend the branding of our Canadian cheese, and the first time I did so I met with opposition, but the government in the House finally adopted my view, with the result that our cheese exports are very much increased. Now, if this Bill provided that the apples were to be branded 'Canadian'—

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
It does.

Mr. REID. I admit that. But apples of the United States may be shipped through in bond marked 'Canadian,' and you cannot prevent it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
Yes, you can.

Mr. REID. You cannot interfere with the brands of a foreign country.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
We could not prevent an American shipping his own goods, say from Boston, marked 'Canadian.' But there is a law in England which says that food products shall be marked with the name of the country of origin. The English law would have to deal with that.

Mr. REID. Is there anything in this Bill to prevent apples marked 'Canadian' going through in bond? American apples packed in the way the minister is trying to prevent will go through in that way, and the reputation of this country will be affected. When the manifest shows them to come from Montreal, the English purchaser does not know where the goods actually come from. I have heard from men who have shipped cheese that it is impossible to trace it if it is shipped from Montreal.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
It is very difficult, I admit.

Mr. REID. It does not protect. Then, what is the use of the Bill?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
It is not intended for that purpose.

Mr. C. E. KAULBACH (Lunenburg). I have listened very attentively to the remarks of the various members on this Bill, and I am sorry I cannot endorse the views expressed, as they are altogether different from those I entertain. I am pleased to say I represent a county that grows a large quantity of choice fruit, as has been shown by the prizes won, not only in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but in England as well. And I feel I should be doing injustice to the farmers of Nova Scotia were I to allow this Bill to pass without expressing my opinion with regard to it. First of all, I am opposed to compulsory inspection. The hon. Minister of Agriculture, a few moments ago, said it was not compulsory. But clause 3, to my mind, makes it compulsory:

Every person who, by himself or through the agency of another person, packs apples or pears in a closed package, intended for export, shall cause the package to be marked in a plain and indelible manner before it is taken from the premises where it is packed,—

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
That is compulsory, but it is not the inspection.

Mr. KAULBACH. But clause 13 clearly makes inspection compulsory. Suppose that a farmer is not getting on well with his neighbour, and that neighbour knows that the farmer is exporting apples, and he wants to put him to all the inconvenience and trouble he can, he will require these apples to be inspected. And clause 13 requires him to submit. It says:

13. It shall be lawful for any person charged with the enforcement of this Act to enter upon any premises to make an examination of any packages of apples or pears suspected of being falsely marked in violation of the provisions of this Act, whether such packages are on the premises of the owner or on other premises, or in the possession of a railway or steamship company; and any person who obstructs or refuses to permit the making of any such examination, shall, upon summary conviction, be liable to a penalty not exceeding $500 and not less than $25, together with the costs of prosecution, and in default of payment of such penalty and costs, shall be liable to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding six months, unless the said penalty and costs of enforcing it are sooner paid.

I feel that it would be very hard for a farmer to be submitted to the operation of a clause of this kind. I am not anxious to criticise this Bill unduly. What I desire is not to be hampered in any way in the export of our fruit. We export and inspect in such a manner as we feel is in the interest of the farmer, and I do not want this parliament to legislate so as to interfere with us and hamper us in our shipments. I believe in the grower's own inspection—that is, he marks the package with the name and address of the packer, the variety of the apple and the grade. I think that that is all that should be required of the farmer. I agree fully with the Minister of Agriculture with regard to the size of the package—that our barrels should be the same size as the barrel that is in use in the United States.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. This Bill does not provide for that.

Mr. KAULBACH. But I agree with the minister's remarks in regard to that point, in introducing this Bill. He said that was one of the objects sought in framing it. But, I believe that the restrictions imposed here are not in the interest of the farmers. As to the inspectors, it seems to me that the minister would require an army of inspectors to carry out the provisions of the Bill, and their fee would be a tax on the farmers which I object to strongly. I am anxious to protect the farmer's interests and I am also anxious to help the Minister of Agriculture in fair legislation; but I must certainly dissent from the views expressed by him as respects this Bill in many of its features, and shall have to oppose it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am glad the minister has not made the inspection compulsory. The Bill, I assume, will become law, as he intends to put it through. Therefore, I am glad it contains that feature. In fact I think the more difficult he makes the inspection the better. On reading section 13, I apprehend the inspector would not be able of his own will to go upon the premises of any man where apples are stored and insist upon an inspection. It seems to me that could only be done on some person swearing out an information that he suspects and has reason to believe that the apples are falsely marked, and on the strength of that information the inspector would then proceed to inspect the apples. If that is not the minister's intention, I think he should change the wording of the clause in such a way that the inspector, of his own free will, could not make an examination, but could only act on the sworn information of some one that there was reasonable ground to believe that the apples were falsely packed. If that is not the meaning of the Act, I am afraid the whole system of inspection will be abused. It would be a very easy matter for the inspector to make considerable money by inspecting where inspection was not necessary. I hope that if the language here is not sufficiently strong to prevent the inspector from acting on his own free will instead of waiting until some person has given him sworn information, the minister will make it so, and not leave the matter of inspection entirely in the hands of an inspector.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am glad to hear the suggestion of the hon. gentleman. It may be that this clause is not as clear as it should be. The intention is not that the inspector should enter upon premises where apples are originally packed and where the owner still holds them, but the intention is that when the apples are once started on their journey to the point of destination, showing that that was the manner and style of the packing intended, they would then be liable to inspection. There was no intention of entering upon the premises, say, of a farmer who had put up apples in his cellar and was keeping them. Perhaps the clause may require a little change to make that intention more clear. The intention was that the inspector might enter upon the premises of a packer who had packed apples in a warehouse, where he was putting them up and heading them up, and marking them for export or for shipment; but there was no intention that the inspector could enter the cellar, for instance, of a grower and there inspect apples which happened to be put up in a particular way in that cellar. I will look over the clause carefully and see if it can be made more clear. I think it would be necessary, if there is to be any inspection, that the inspector should be empowered to inspect apples at any point in transit, or in a warehouse in transit.

Mr. HENDERSON. I scarcely think so, unless he is called upon, unless he has placed in his hands some evidence showing that there is reason to believe that these apples are falsely marked. I think it will make inspection too common and too easy, and that the whole matter will be abused and become unpopular. I think the inspector should not be called upon except where there is good reason shown him, on sworn testimony in fact, that the informant has ground to believe that the apples are falsely packed. I do not think it is well to trouble the trade more than is necessary, but when it is necessary, I am satisfied that an inspection should be made.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I agree with the hon. gentleman that we should not trouble the trade more than is absolutely necessary. I will consider carefully what the hon. gentleman has said. I would point out to him, however, that in such a provision there would be danger perhaps, if people had a spite against a packer or shipper, of calling upon the inspector to take action against him.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think it will prevent it.

Mr. REID. This Bill is only supposed to deal with apples for export. Now, suppose a man goes to a farmer and says that he wants to buy a thousand barrels for home consumption, and he picks them as he wishes, and ships them through to the United States, brands them Canadian or not, as he pleases; how are you going to follow these?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I do not think we could follow them.

Mr. REID. They go as Canadian apples. If all apples exported from this country had to be branded as Canadian apples—

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. So they are, under this Bill.

Mr. REID. No, if they are exported through to the United States.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Under this Bill they would be liable to inspection. Supposing a man, any where on the frontier, put up apples and shipped them across the river, if the inspector happened to hit upon them before they crossed the river, he could inspect them under this Act just the same as if they were going to Montreal. Of course once they have got across the river, or on the sea, or in England, we cannot follow them any further for inspection. If the apples escape inspection in Canada we cannot help it; but if the apples are marked under this Bill and started towards the United States, if the inspector should catch them, he would have power to inspect them and to mark them accordingly as he found them. More than that we cannot do.

Mr. REID. What I mean is this: A man may purchase a thousand barrels of apples in a township adjoining my village; he may bring them out and put them on the vessel. When he is ready to ship them he simply goes to the customs and gets an outward entry, and it is impossible for you to follow them.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They would be liable to be inspected when they are on the vessel.

Mr. REID. No, because he may say he is going to ship them to Montreal, and they are not liable to inspection until they are ready to leave. Is it the intention of the minister to have an inspector in every town, village and city in the Dominion?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No.

Mr. REID. If it is not, how are you going to have these inspected? The customs officer cannot detain them, and therefore they go through. He can brand what he likes on the barrel, but as it is not compulsory,

Mr. FISHER.

I do not see how you are going to protect the Canadian trade by this Bill.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is a deterrent to prevent people marking their packages wrongly. If a man is not caught he will get through all right, but if he is caught he will be liable to penalties. But if there is no Bill and no penalty, he is not liable for anything, and he can mark his packages just as he pleases. The hon. gentleman was not present a night or two ago, and consequently does not know that many members asked that the scope of this Bill should apply to the home trade as well as the export trade. If that amendment is made, which I am rather disposed to suggest should be made, then it would apply to these apples when they are packed under the circumstances to which the hon. gentleman alluded.

Mr. REID. The hon. gentleman means that they may be shipped across to the United States without any brand on them at all?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They cannot under this Bill. The Bill requires that they shall be branded if they are exported at all.

Mr. REID. But they can be shipped to the United States without any brand?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, they cannot.

Mr. REID. It is not compulsory to have it on?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Certainly it is.

Mr. REID. I do not see how that is.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If you will read clause 3 you will see how that is.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like the hon. minister to point out the law whereby goods were last year required to be branded Canadian.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is an English law.

Mr. TAYLOR. The English law says that goods coming into England must have the brand of the country from which these goods were exported? The minister will not make that statement.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I do emphatically.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know, as a matter of fact, that any amount of goods of all kinds are shipped from Montreal. Until we commenced to brand cheese all these goods were sent to England without any mark upon them.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Because the law was only passed two years ago.

Mr. TAYLOR. Did we pass a law ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, England passed one two years ago.

Mr. TAYLOR. That all goods coming into the country should be branded ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. All food products.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is news to me. If we are to brand at all the only point at which the branding or inspection should take place is the port of export. What will be the result if the hon. minister is going to allow his inspectors to inspect and brand in transit ? Take, for instance, Port Hope and Cobourg. These are large points of shipment. The exporter purchases from the farmers and warehouses his goods there. The inspector may come in, if he is so disposed, inspect every barrel of these apples, and destroy every barrel. The only place at which the inspection should take place is at the port of shipment, Montreal, Quebec or Halifax.

Mr. REID. The hon. minister stated to me, a few minutes ago, that every barrel of apples exported had to be branded 'Canadian apples,' and he referred me to clause 3. In clause 3 the Bill states :

Every person who, by himself or through the agency of another person, packs apples or pears in a closed package, intended for export, shall cause the package to be marked in a plain and indelible manner before it is taken from the premises where it is packed,—

- (a) with the initials of the Christian name and the full surname and address of the packer;
- (b) with the size of the fruit in inches;
- (c) with the name of the variety, and
- (d) with a designation of the grade of the fruit.

Will the hon. minister tell me where it says that the apples have to be branded 'Canadian apples.'

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If the hon. gentleman will look at the designation of the fruit he will see that in the designations there is the word 'Canadian.'

Mr. REID. It does not state so in this Bill.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, if the hon. gentleman looks at section 5 he will see that it does.

Mr. REID. Clause 5 is as follows :

5. No person shall sell, offer, expose or have in his possession for sale any apples or pears packed in a closed package and intended for export upon which is marked the grade 'A No. 1 Canadian.'

'Upon which is marked the grade,' but it does not say that he must mark it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It says in section 3 that he must mark it, and in section 5 the grade is defined with the word 'Canadian.'

Mr. REID. But it does not say that he must mark any grade 'Canadian.' He can mark it any grade he wishes.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, he marks it any grade he wishes, but he must put the word 'Canadian' on whichever grade he marks it.

Mr. REID. I do not see that it is compulsory.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am sorry you do not.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the minister will look at clause 16, he will see the lever that he is placing in the hands of the inspector, or some other person who might have some spite against a shipper.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I said the other night that I proposed to strike out section 16.

Mr. REID. Section 5 says it shall be branded 'Canadian' or any similar designation.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That similar designation would contain the word 'Canadian.'

Mr. REID. Not necessarily. I would ask the minister in all seriousness if it would be necessary to use the word 'Canadian' in any similar designation ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, I think it would.

Mr. REID. But, according to the law would it ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think so.

Mr. REID. Yes, but your opinion is only think so.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am not going to set my opinion against yours. Perhaps you are a lawyer.

Mr. REID. No, I am not.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If it is possible that there is any doubt in the opinion of the lawyers of the House we can put the word 'Canadian' in, but I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. REID. Should it not be more explicit ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I do not think so, but if the hon. gentleman wishes we can make it so. He can move an amendment.

Mr. REID. What is meant by section 5 ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That the word 'Canadian' has to appear.

Mr. REID. It says 'or any similar designation.' Could it not be a mark of any kind ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I do not think so. It would have to be similar.

On section 10,

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the hon. minister whether it would not be wise instead of saying 'falsely marked' to mark it correctly. If the inspector finds a package marked falsely he should be able to say what is the correct mark that should be upon it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The reason for putting on 'falsely marked' is that it may act as a punishment. It would be designated as falsely marked, and therefore the fruit would have to be sold on its merits. I think if we marked it in that way it would help materially to enforce the Act.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to ask the hon. minister whether 2,108 cases of pears and the 253 cases of apples that he shipped over to England in 1898 were sold on their merits and whether it was their defective condition that caused such a loss as to return no money, or whether they spoiled on the passage over? I see by the Auditor General's report that there were 2,108 cases of pears purchased and sent over.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I did not purchase them, and if the hon. gentleman will consult the next page of the Auditor General's Report he will see an item that balances against that, and, consequently, the amount which he has indicated is not the correct one. Some of the fruit was sold to advantage and some was not. It was not by any means an altogether successful shipment, but I may say that the shipment was made with the assistance and at the request of certain fruit-growers in the neighbourhood of Grimsby, whose names were submitted by the Fruit-Growers' Association, that the shipment was guaranteed by the department so as to make a trial shipment, and that it was a trial shipment, in every sense of the word. Various kinds of fruit and various varieties of fruit were sent over to see whether a trade could possibly be worked up. Some of these were successful and some were not. Some reaped a good profit and some were a dead loss. In some instances the fruit was sent in consequence of those interested asking over and over again that trials should be made. The hon. gentleman, on a former occasion, discussed this matter very fully, and I have secured the information which he requires, and more than he asked for, which I will give him when we discuss the cold storage.

Mr. TAYLOR. In the Auditor General's Report, B-47 and 48, every item shows a small balance over the amount guaranteed, but the total loss to the country is $3,088.85 on the trial shipments of pears, apples, grapes and tomatoes. There is no revenue returned anywhere.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. At page 50 you will find the entry 'less proceeds from fruit sales, $1,665.66.'

Mr. REID. After the barrel is branded 'falsely marked,' the person shipping may erase that and brand them as Canadian apples again.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. He can do anything he likes with the barrels after he gets them out of the country.

Mr. REID. They should not be allowed to leave this country without being properly branded, or else the apples should be confiscated.

Mr. CRAIG. The man who owns the apples may not be to blame. Instead of them being falsely packed intentionally, they might be inadvertently marked by an employee, and I think it would be better, after the fine is inflicted, that the barrels should be branded according to their contents.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It was thought well to put that in as a sort of punishment for the incorrect marking.

Mr. CRAIG. He is fined already.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. He may or may not be. I think myself the inspectors ought to prosecute, but that does not necessarily follow. When the inspector brands it 'falsely marked,' then the fruit can go forward and it will always be followed with that mark, unless, as my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid) says, the fruit shall be confiscated. The hon. gentleman says that not only ought it to be branded 'falsely marked,' but that it should be confiscated.

Mr. GILMOUR. Cases may arise in which it would not be fair to brand them 'falsely marked.' Suppose the buyer buys the orchard, packs the apples, and sells them to another who would ship them. They go to Montreal, and the third party would hardly be responsible for the packing, unless he examined them all, and that could not be very well done.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The intention is, that both the shipper and the person from whom he bought would be liable.

Mr. REID. I move:

That after the word 'mark' in clause 10, the words 'falsely marked' be struck out and the words 'quality such as is found,' be inserted instead.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I would hardly be prepared on the spur of the moment to accept that amendment, for this reason, that it would, I think, necessitate the inspector examining the whole lot.

Of course, if he found a certain percentage not up to the standard, he would so mark the whole lot; but if he were to mark them according to what they would grade, I think he would be obliged to inspect every barrel, which nobody has yet suggested should be done.

Mr. GILMOUR. Would it not be necessary for him to examine every barrel before he marked them as falsely branded? He should certainly see that he is correct before he does that. It would be better for him to go on and examine them and put the proper brand on them.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I think as a matter of law there would be a very great distinction as to the number of barrels the inspector would have to examine, in order to brand them as of a proper quality, and the number he would have to examine before he put the other mark upon them. The law would say that after he made an inspection of the requisite percentage, he would be entitled, in a general way, to pass the whole lot as being properly graded; but he would lay himself open, it appears to me, to an action for damages if he labelled any one of those barrels as falsely marked and on inspection it should be found that it was properly marked.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose a person purchased a consignment of apples, and found one barrel falsely marked, would that be regarded as the only barrel falsely marked, or would that apply to the whole consignment?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The mark would have to go on each package.

Mr. REID. Take the case of a farmer or a packer having a thousand barrels of apples, who asked the inspector to go and inspect those apples. They might be packed as No. 1 Canadian apples; but the inspector opens one barrel, and says he can only grade that as No. 3. Why not mark it No. 3? I do not think it is fair to the farmer or the packer, that the inspector, simply because he finds one or two, or ten barrels wrongly graded, should condemn the whole thousand barrels. Let him mark them for what they are. The farmer might prefer to have them marked No. 3, rather than to have the words 'falsely marked' put upon them, because that would be an imputation upon him when he did not intend to do anything wrong. I think he has a right to have them branded for what they are.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman has evidently not apprehended the purpose of this Bill. It is that the inspector shall inspect the apples after the packer has put the brands upon them. It is not intended that the inspector shall help the packer to pack his apples or grade them. The packer must do that for himself; but if he brands them fraudulently, he is liable for the penalty, and the inspector will mark them as falsely marked. I agree, however, that the hon. gentleman's suggestion, that the inspector, instead of putting 'falsely marked' on the barrel, should mark the grade on them, is worthy of consideration, and if the committee will let this clause stand, I shall be glad to consider that, and see how it will work out, and if possible adopt it.

Mr. REID. The minister says that the packer must have the apples branded before the inspector comes. Would it be unfair if the farmer or the packer has the apples packed, with the heads out, and says to the inspector, 'There are my apples packed; you can examine one barrel or a thousand; grade them what you can, so that I can brand them;' just as is done with grain. But from what the minister says, the farmer or the packer must inspect them for himself and brand them, and then if the inspector comes round he may fine him a dollar a barrel, and mark them 'falsely marked,' whereas the farmer may wish to have them inspected and marked for what they will fairly grade, and the inspector comes down and says: I cannot pass them, because they are No. 3, and I will mark them 'falsely marked.' His neighbour may be an enemy and enters an action to recover the penalty of $1 per barrel. The inspector should be allowed to grade them according to their grading, and then a fine could not be imposed.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The intention of the Bill was not to have the inspector go and grade the fruit. But, it is quite possible that arrangements ought to be made by which the packers could call upon an inspector to go and mark the fruit, and, under those circumstances, the packer ought to pay a fee. When an inspector inspects the fruit in transit, and not at the request of the packer, the government ought to bear the expense, because that is done for the general good. But, I agree that provision ought to be made for the calling in of an inspector to grade the fruit at the point of shipment, so that the packer would not be liable to a fine. That is one of the regulations with regard to the carrying out of the provisions of the Act, which is left in the hands of the Governor in Council, and which, in consequence of the discussion here, I intend to have adopted. The discussion on this clause with regard to the false marking has brought out several points well worthy of consideration, and I would ask that the clause be allowed to stand for further consideration.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is no room for doubt that under the provision of this Bill, it would be necessary to prove that each individual package was falsely marked in order to recover the penalty provided, not exceeding $1 per package.

Mr. REID. But the Minister of Agriculture says it is not necessary to examine the whole lot, but that a few barrels need only be examined, and the court might be guided by this explanation.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is a very clear distinction between passing the lot as properly graded and recovering penalties for false grading. The inspector may examine a percentage of the lot, and finding it up to the mark, pass the whole. But, if you seek to recover a penalty for false marking, you must prove that each package was falsely marked. Otherwise you would expose yourself to a claim of damages for seeking to recover a penalty on the allegation that certain packages were falsely marked, when each package was not examined and proved to have been falsely marked.

Mr. REID. The hon. minister is, no doubt, right, and no doubt each package would have to be examined before it could be proven that it was falsely marked. But, I fall back on the request I made, that if a package should be falsely marked, the inspector should give it its proper grading and mark it accordingly.

Section allowed to stand.

On section 15,

Mr. REID. The minister will remember that a few minutes ago I said that in this clause no provision is made to allow the party the option of having a jury. I claim it as most unfair in this country, that any man accused should not have the option of being tried by twelve of his countrymen. I would ask that that clause be amended.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Such an alteration would be directly contrary to the provisions of all our summary convictions Acts. The necessity of a jury is not recognized in cases of much greater gravity, and involving much larger interests than are contemplated here. The conviction is summary, and it is necessary that the proceedings should be summary. It would be impossible to summon a jury; there is no procedure for calling a jury to decide whether a man should be fined a dollar for wrongly marking a barrel of apples.

Mr. REID. I will admit that I discuss this at a disadvantage when I discuss it with an able lawyer like the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair). But, is it not a fact that, in division court cases in the province of Ontario, even in the smallest cases, if the party wishes, he can demand that he be tried by a jury, and the judge simply calls twelve men out of the room—the party having the right to challenge them.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. SPROULE. But this is on appeal.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). That is a small jury and in certain cases.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It may facilitate matters if I explain to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Reid) that this section was taken verbatim from the General Inspection Act, and is the same as applies in the case of the inspection of other commodities.

Mr. REID. This is a very important matter to the farmers of the country, and the General Inspection Act does not get down to the farmers.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It applies to wheat.

Mr. REID. But, that is a different thing. Is it not a fact that there will be an audience sufficient to get a jury? Why not let the party have the option?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In these summary convictions, it is deemed advisable that there should be no such machinery.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). If you read the criminal law, you will find that many cases that, formerly, it was thought impossible to try without a jury, are disposed of summarily without a judge. To provide for a jury in this case would open the door to a similar amendment in ten thousand other cases. And it would be discovered in the main that a man gets a better trial by a judge in summary conviction than by a jury.

Mr. TAYLOR. It seems to me that this is all right, being an appeal. But I object to the procedure in the first instance. If a man has a thousand barrels of apples for shipment, the inspector may come along, brand them as wrongly marked, and fine the party a dollar a barrel. It may be merely a difference of opinion, but, apparently, the law is absolute, and the inspector has the power.

Mr. SPROULE. But you have the appeal.

Mr. TAYLOR. But, apparently, the inspector has the power of imposing a fine.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, he has to lay information under section 14. He cannot impose any fine. All he can do is to inspect and give evidence as to the inspection.

Mr. SPROULE. The complainant gets half the fine. I think this clause is decidedly in the right direction. When the appeal is made it should come before a judge. A man can expect fair-play from a judge more likely than a jury.

Mr. REID. Notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) has said, I would like to see the option allowed of a trial by jury. Of course, it is useless for me to argue a point of law against the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) and the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser). If it cannot be done, of course I must submit.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Before moving that the committee rise and report progress, I would like to move an amendment in regard to clause 3. In subsection c it is provided that the name of the variety shall be branded on the barrel. I would like to add, 'or the words, mixed variety.' I think that would meet the views which have been expressed this afternoon, so that if any packer was not sure he had put all of one variety into a barrel, he could put on to that barrel the words 'mixed varieties.' In that way he would not render himself liable to the penalty.

Mr. SPROULE. That scarcely meets my views, because the same defect exists still, that there may be a difference of opinion as to the names of the varieties. If you said 'all well known varieties,' I would not object to it. There are so many varieties of apples that one could call by one name, and another would call them by another name, and the inspector might take a different view from the packer.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I do not think any inspector would condemn a barrel of apples on such an occasion as that. If the hon. gentleman does not like my suggestion, I would be glad if he would draft an amendment which would satisfy him and cover the case.

Mr. REID. If what he is suggesting there now means that you could put more than one kind of apple in a barrel—

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. You could if you wished to.

Mr. REID. In that case how would you brand them? Because they have to be branded either No. 1, 2 or 3 Canadian. If you say that you could mix the apples in a barrel, then the other clauses would be wrong.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think the minister would make a mistake by his amendment. The apple business is not carried on on such a small scale in Ontario and Nova Scotia that a man is going to ship to the old country a barrel of apples, half of one kind and half of another, or of several different varieties. I would much rather adhere to the Bill as it stands. If the branding is to be of any value, let us maintain it at as high a standard as possible.

Mr. SPROULE. It is a fact that many exporters pack barrels of apples containing two varieties. I have seen it frequently done by the packer, and that from a locality that ships from 100,000 to 300,000 barrels in a year. I saw the name put on the barrel, Spys and Russets, or names of other varieties. The mixture usually consists of two kinds. There are a few good apples left from one tree but not enough to fill the barrel, and they make up the balance from another tree.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). It is a fact that there are many different kinds of varieties shipped. I attended a show in Kentville two years ago, and there were 109 distinct varieties of apples there.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Be good enough to state the names.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I refuse to keep this House so long in session as to give the names.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. No man in the business would think of mixing two or more varieties in a barrel for shipment.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I move that the committee rise and report progress. There are one or two suggestions that I would like to consider with my colleagues before it finally passes.

Mr. ELLIS. I understood the minister to intimate that he proposed to give this Bill a local effect as well as to make it apply to exportations.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have followed the discussion closely, and the impression in the House seems to be in favour of applying it to the interior trade as well as the export trade.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). I think it would be well that the Bill should also apply to the home trade. There seems to be a diversity of opinion amongst hon. members as to whether the Bill will do any good at all in connection with the export trade, but I am perfectly sure that it will do good in regard to the North-west trade. In England they have an open market where apples come from various parts of the world besides Canada, but in the North-west it is different. We depend entirely on Ontario. We have a customs tariff against apples, so that we are restricted to this market. We do not grow apples at all. The hon. Minister of Agriculture knows thoroughly well that we have suffered most outrageously from bad packing, false packing and false marking of apples. Whether or not the Bill should apply to the eastern trade, it should most certainly apply to the western trade, because that trade can be handled more easily than the export trade can. I had intended to move an amendment to section 3, but when the first two or three sections of the Bill were brought up, they were put through so quickly that no person had a chance to say a word. If the section 3 is opened up again, I propose to move an amendment to it.

Committee rose and reported progress.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY—SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows :

MINTO.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons further supplementary estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ended 30th June, 1900, and in accordance with the provisions of 'The British North America Act, 1867,' the Governor General recommends these estimates to the House of Commons.

Government House,
Ottawa, May 22, 1900.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved : That His Excellency's Message, together with the supplementary estimates accompanying it, be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

YUKON—RETURN RE THE STEAMER YUKONER.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson) moved :

That leave be granted to lay on the Table of the House papers in connection with the ss. 'Yukoner.'

Motion agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I would like to ask the hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), what he intends to take up to-morrow ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Bills, and then supply.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. (Wednesday.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, May 23, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 166)—from the Senate—to incorporate the British North America Pulp and Paper Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Mr. PUTTEE.

Bill (No. 165)—from the Senate—respecting the Montreal Bridge Company.—(Mr. McAllister.)

Bill (No. 164)—from the Senate—respecting the Great Eastern Railway Company.—(Mr. McAllister.)

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Mr. GIBSON moved :

That the petition of the Central Vermont Railway Company, presented this day, praying to be permitted to lay before the House their petition for the passing of an Act authorizing them to acquire and operate the Montreal and Province Line Railway, the Stanstead, Shefford and Chambly Railway and the Montreal and Vermont Junction Railway, notwithstanding the expiration of the time for presenting petitions for private Bills, be read and received forthwith, and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Mr. D. TISDALE (South Norfolk). I do not wish to object to the different Bills being introduced at this stage of the session, but I do appeal to the right hon. the leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that we ought to have some regard for the rules of the House. If this session had closed within the average time, as it should have, some of these Bills could not have been presented. It is most unfair to ask the Railway Committee to give, at this late date, that consideration to those Bills which they ought to get in the interests of the country. I can understand an exception being made in a special case, but it seems to me that the introduction of private Bills after the time in which, according to the rules of the House, they can be introduced is becoming an abuse, and both sides should unite in applying some remedy. I am not saying that one side of the House has sinned more than the other in this respect, but either we should have some respect for our rules or repeal them.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The subject to which my hon. friend has drawn our attention is not a new one, and is one in which I am ready to go very far in supporting him. The Bills that come from the Senate are within the rules in being introduced now.

Mr. TISDALE. That is right.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend, perhaps, has reference to the petition introduced to-day. I have looked into that petition somewhat cursorily, and it seems to me that the exception in each of the circumstances justifies us in allowing it to be adopted. But I am prepared to say to my hon. friend that, unless from this time forward a petitioner is able to establish exceptional circumstances, I am ready to say we shall not allow any further private legislation to be introduced.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I am glad to hear the statement of the right hon. gentleman, because it shows at any rate his good intentions. He made a somewhat similar statement last year, and I hoped for better results. Although I drew attention to this divergence from the usual rule twice this session, I regret to say I had no supporters in this House. I am glad that the hon. gentleman has come to the same conclusion as I have, that this is a real grievance, and that it is increasing year after year. The rule provides that after a certain stage of the session, we cannot receive petitions, that, after a later stage, we cannot introduce Bills, and so on. But these rules are systematically and persistently violated. Now, I can understand, that in some cases, there may be special reasons for it; and when these reasons are given to the House, they may justify the House in allowing the rule to be set aside in a particular case. But this is growing to be such an abuse that no reasons are given, but simply the motion is made for the petition to be read, and it is passed as a matter of course. In my judgment, this tends to lengthen the session and also to prevent Bills getting that careful attention that they ought to receive. Therefore, I think that the sooner we reach the conclusion that if the rules are proper, we should obey them, and if they are not proper, we should amend them, the better.

Mr. TISDALE. If I may be allowed the indulgence of the House, I would say that in my opinion the reasons given are quite sufficient.

QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY RECESS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I move:

That when this House adjourns this day that it do stand adjourned until Friday next.

Mr. DAVID TISDALE (South Norfolk). I would appeal to the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), even at this late date to make it Monday.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. TISDALE. Well, I suppose I have the floor; and if hon. members do not agree with me, I am quite content to have the motion carried. But my experience in this House has been that when the Queen's Birthday comes on Thursday, as it does this year, we do not get such an attendance in the House on Friday, as will enable public business to make substantial progress, even though we sit on that day. If meeting on Friday would really advance our business and secure due consideration for the measures coming before us, I would be the last to propose an amendment to such a motion as this. But on such an auspicious occasion as the celebration of this great event, a great event, not only for the Dominion, but for the empire, the celebration of the birthday of our venerable Queen, not only the great Sovereign, but the great woman, those of us who can possibly reach their constituencies, naturally desire to spend the day there, to take part in the local celebration. It is true that distance prevents some hon. members from reaching their homes and returning in time; but those whose constituencies are in Ontario or Quebec have an opportunity to do so. While I desire to see the business of the House progress as fast as possible, I am not prepared to have the mere semblance of attending to business, when we have not the reality; but I am prepared to take the responsibility of saying that where we can only have a semblance, we should frankly adjourn. For my own part, and I am satisfied that I speak for the majority of those from Ontario, I am not able to be present. And I believe that those from a distance will be willing to say that on an occasion like this, considering the years of our venerable Sovereign, and considering that to meet would not really advance the business of the House, it would be better not to have a sitting on Friday. It will be almost impossible to get a quorum, even if the House does meet. Let us give the government a chance to prepare their business in council, and let us go home, feeling that we will make this celebration worthy of the occasion and that we will come here ready to work all the harder.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I am sorry I cannot agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Tisdale). I think the best way we can honour our Queen, is to imitate her in our close attention to duty. The Queen's Birthday has always been made a holiday; but it has always been considered that from twelve to fourteen hours of that day devoted to cheering Her Majesty and giving expression of patriotic sentiments, are adequate for the demands of loyalty. We cannot, as my hon. friend (Mr. Tisdale) can, spread our wings and go to our lares and penates. We cannot go to the shrine of our household gods with the quickness that he can—some of us from the lower provinces, some from far British Columbia, and some from the North-west Territories, like myself. At this stage of the session, one day's work will help us very much. Of course, I would not presume to suggest to the government, but if, on Friday, instead of adjourning, as my hon. friend suggests, they were to bring forward some of the Bills that are pending, we could make good progress. For my part, I realize the force of my hon. friend's appeal, and was touched by it; nevertheless I feel that the best way we can honour our Queen, and show ourselves good British subjects, is to get on with our business as quickly as we can.

Motion agreed to.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 167) to amend the Copyright Act. He said: This Bill has but one object. At the present time, before the Imperial parliament, there is an Act which gives authority to those self-governing colonies in which there is copyright legislation, to provide that when a copyright exists in the colony, the book that is copyrighted and printed in England, shall not be allowed to be imported into the colonies, thus overriding the present provisions of the Imperial Copyright law, which makes the Imperial copyright override the colonial copyright. The present Bill provides the necessary means to take advantage of that provision of the Imperial Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PATENT ACT AMENDMENTS.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher), moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 168) to amend the Patent Act. He said: This Bill is intended to provide certain machinery, under certain circumstances, by which the life of a patent may be extended. In the Imperial Patent law there is a provision by which, on appeal to Her Majesty in Council, the request for an extension of a patent is submitted to the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council. This committee makes a report and that report is acted upon. Representations have been made of the desirability of a similar provision being inserted in our Patent Act. This Bill follows almost exactly the provisions of the Imperial Act, and introduces them into our Act—with the change that the Exchequer Court here is made use of, as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is made use of in England.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the nature of the representations which have prevailed to induce the minister to bring in a Bill? For instance, a case might be cited to show that it is necessary.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There is a Bill now before the House, a private Bill, which I think represents the class of cases which might be dealt with. I think the patent is called the Service Fish-Plate Patent. The owners of the patent show that they have not been able to introduce their patent into public use, that the patent was perhaps a little before its time, and that the people who were likely to make use of this contrivance did not at first see the advantages of it, and that it is only towards the end of the ordinary life of a patent that the patentee is able to place his goods upon the market and make it of any advantage to him. Several cases of this kind have been adduced, and it seems only fair that a certain amount of extra protection should be given to the inventor to enable him to reap some advantage from his invention, an advantage which he has not been able to secure through no fault of his own, but rather perhaps because he was a little too clever for the market to appreciate the value of the patent. The safeguards which are thrown round the exercise of this power are sufficient, I think, to prevent any improper use of this privilege of extension.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PAYMENTS TO THE MEMBERS FOR TORONTO.

On the question,

What amount of money has been paid to each of the present sitting members for the city of Toronto over and above their sessional indemnity and mileage by the government of Canada, from January 1, 1879, to January 1, 1897?—(Mr. McMullen.)

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Stand.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Might I say a word with reference to that question? It is a peculiar question, and seems to indicate some improper conduct on the part of members of the House. I do not think it ought to be allowed to stand so long. One can see there is rather an imputation in the question. It has stood now from May 10th.

The PRIME MINISTER. I may say that I asked the hon. gentleman privately what he wanted, and I find the information he desires to have would require some time to procure. The public accounts have to be looked over. Let it stand till Monday.

Mr. BERGERON. Why go back to 1879?

The PRIME MINISTER. If the hon. gentleman understands the question he knows that the books have to be looked over since 1879.

Mr. BERGERON. I think the right hon. gentleman can get an answer from the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) himself.

GROSSE ISLE QUARANTINE.

Mr. TALBOT asked:

1. Has the hon. the Minister of Agriculture entered into any contract with any individual or company for the service of a steamboat in connection with the quarantine at Grosse Isle?
2. To whom was the contract awarded, and under what conditions and prices?
3. How many applications or tenders were received by the Department of Agriculture for said contract?

4. What were the prices asked in the different applications or tenders?

5. What are the names of the parties who made application or put in tenders for said service?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). 1. Yes. 2. John C. Kaine, of Quebec, $3,000 for the season. Mr. Kaine installing at his own expense all the disinfecting appliances upon the boat and removing them again in the autumn, and furnishing the passenger cabin. 3. Four. 4. $25 a day (Mayflower); $4,880 for the season (Rhoda); $3,000 for the season (Kathleen); $2,000 for the season (Contest). 5. F. P. Ronnan; G. Rochette; John C. Kaine; D. Arcand. (Contest), $2,000, requires extra crew, having double engines, and would require considerable alteration to take machinery on board. Nothing in tender providing for installation of appliances. (Kathleen), $3,000, including the putting on and taking off appliances ($300 to $400), and requiring smaller crew and less coal, was taken as cheapest and most suitable boat available.

IMPORTATIONS OF BINDER TWINE.

Mr. CLANCY (by Mr. Kaulbach) asked :

What quantity of binder twine, and the value thereof, was imported in each of the following months, namely: January, February, March and April, 1900?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The information required by this question cannot be furnished by the Department of Customs at present. In the monthly returns of statistics received from the customs ports, binder twine is not specifically enumerated. It is so enumerated in the quarterly returns, but such returns do not subdivide the months. From the returns for the quarter ending March last, it is found that 415,388 pounds of binder twine, of a value of $45,833 were imported. To obtain the full information required by the hon. gentleman, it would be necessary to communicate with each of the ports in the Dominion for a special statement. If the hon. gentleman desires it, this will be done. Would the hon. gentleman who asks the question for the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) please mention that to him, and ask him kindly to let me know whether he wishes the information to be procured from the ports?

SALE OF NEWSPAPERS ON INTER-COLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. GAUVREAU asked :

1. Who has had the contract for the sale of newspapers, &c., on the Intercolonial Railway from Lévis to Halifax, and on all the branches east of Lévis, and what amount has been paid to government from May 1, 1897, to May 1, 1900?

2. Who has had the contract for the sale of newspapers, &c., on the Drummond Railway, from Lévis to Montreal, since the line has formed part of the Intercolonial Railway, from March 1, 1898, to May 1, 1900?

3. Were tenders called for?

4. What amounts were paid?

5. Has the whole been paid up?

6. Who now holds the contract for the sale of newspapers, &c., since May 1, 1900?

7. Were tenders called for?

8. If not, why not?

9. When will the present contract expire, and what is the price?

10. What is the amount paid by the government yearly to the Canada Railway News Company for the advertisements of the Intercolonial Railway in a volume called 'The Railway Guide'?

11. Is the hon. Minister of Railways aware that the Canada Railway News Company does not give satisfaction to the travelling public, in that it does not keep its agents on all the passenger trains, and that its agents, when they are so kept, do not do their duty?

12. If so, what means does the minister propose to adopt to provide a remedy?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The Canada Railway News Company have had the contract for the sale of newspapers, &c., on the Intercolonial Railway, for line east of Lévis for three years from May 1, 1897, to May 1, 1900. They paid in cash $11,000 and $1,500 in advertising in Intercolonial Railway Guide and the Allround Route Guide. 2. Eugene Michaud, Rivière du Loup, was given a contract for the sale of newspapers, &c., on the Drummond Railway on March 21, 1898, at $599.84 for twelve months, but after paying for one month (April), he transferred his contract to the Canada Railway News Company. 3. No tenders were called for, for the Drummond county end of the line. 4. Eugene Michaud paid $50 for month of April, he then transferred his contract to the Canada Railway News Company. 5. Yes, the whole amount has been paid up. 6. The contract expired on May 1, 1900, but the Canada Railway News Company is carrying on the work for the present under their old contract. 7. Tenders have not yet been called for. 8. The matter is still under consideration. 9. The present contract expired on the May 1, 1900. The prices paid by the Canada Railway News Company for the privilege of selling newspapers on the Intercolonial Railway east of Lévis is $12,600 for three years—$4,100 for the first year, $4,200 for the second year and $4,300 for the third year. For the line west of Lévis they paid for the same privilege, $599.84 a year from April 1, 1898. 10. Under the contract for news agency on trains $500 a year is paid the Canada News Company for advertising in the Railway Guides. 11. Have heard no complaints.

I.C.R.—STATION MASTER AT STE. LOUISE.

Mr. DECHENE (by Mr. Gauvreau) asked:

1. For what reason has George Morin, station master at Ste. Louise, an employee of three years' standing, not been made permanent, in pursuance of his application in that behalf?

2. Why was no answer returned to a letter of April 6 last, addressed by A. M. Dechene, M.P., to Moncton, until May 9, when the said station is about finished?

3. Why is the 'express' run on Sundays between Montreal and Campbellton, and 'vice versa,' and not in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. George Morin has been station master at Ste. Louise, permanently since the first of July. 2. An inquiry had to be made as to whether or not there were any special circumstances necessitating a resident inspector in the case of St. Jean Port Joli station, and it took some time to obtain this information, that is the reason why Mr. Dechene's letter addressed to Moncton was not answered until the 9th of May. An inspector is not appointed for each separate building along the line. 3. The express is run on Sundays because the carriage of the through mails and the business of the country require it. The Canadian Pacific train in competition with the Intercolonial train leaves Montreal on Sunday, and so the Intercolonial train has to leave there the same day.

PARIS EXPOSITION—MAP OF CANADA.

Mr. PRIOR (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

1. Has the large map of the Dominion, which was lately exposed to view in the vestibule of this building, been sent to the Paris Exposition as the official map of Canada exhibited by the government?

2. Is it true that the boundary between Canada and Alaska, commonly known as the 'Alaskan boundary,' is marked on that map according to the United States contention and that the boundary according to the Canadian or British Columbian contention is not shown at all?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The map in question was sent to Paris as one of the exhibits of the Department of Public Works, but not as an official map. It is true that the boundary between Canada and Alaska, commonly known as the 'Alaskan boundary' is marked on that map in two ways, marking the American contention and the Canadian contention as to the boundary, and each of these markings is distinctly stated to be what it represents; so that I do not think there could be any possible difficulty or doubt as to what is meant.

BASIC SLAG FERTILIZER.

Mr. DOMVILLE (by Mr. Ellis) asked :

1. Why is the insoluble phosphoric acid of bone meal valued at a much higher price than the insoluble phosphoric acid of Thomas' phosphate powder?

2. Upon what system or principle is such a value made?

3. Is the chief chemist aware that continuous experimentation with Thomas' phosphate powder in comparison with bone meal shows its phosphoric acid more readily available than that of bone meal?

4. Is it prudent upon the part of the chief chemist, in determining the scientific value of phosphoric acid as available or unavailable, to step beyond his sphere and express determinations of trade values giving relative prices per ton?

5. Does not such valuation leave the average reader of reports to draw wrong conclusions as to the real merit of Thomas' phosphate powder or other fertilizers because of such printed values?

6. Would it not be better to print unit of value per pound of phosphoric acid rather than unit of value per ton?

7. Will the chief chemist quote or express an opinion as to whether the phosphoric acid of Thomas' phosphate powder existing in a tetra-basic form is not changed to a tri-basic form by means of past methods of analysis adopted by the Inland Revenue and thus show a lower percentage of available phosphoric acid?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). 1. Because section 52 of the Fertilizers Act of 1890 provides that the relative value of each fertilizer shall be calculated from its contents in fertilizing ingredients at their current market value, and the insoluble phosphoric acid in bone has a higher market value. 2. The principle is stated in the foregoing answer. 3. No. 4. It must be prudent seeing that this has been made his duty by the Department of Inland Revenue. 5. No. 6. No. 7. The question is not stated with sufficient clearness to enable him to express an opinion.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) if he intends to have these interesting chemical questions and answers edited by themselves later on.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). We are preparing a pamphlet which will be distributed among hon. members.

Mr. FOSTER. We will send that out with Sir Richard's speech.

SERVICE AMMUNITION IN MILITARY DISTRICTS.

Mr. WALLACE (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

What was the number of rounds of 'service ammunition' stored in each military district in the Dominion on April 1, 1900, distinguishing the 'Lee-Enfield' and 'Snider' ball cartridges, giving the number of each?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I see that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) is not in his seat. If he were here, I would like to submit to him that it is not desirable that the figures we have before us should be given out publicly. But, I would say that, in every military district in Canada there is and there was on the date named Lee-Enfield cartridges, and a considerable supply of Snider cartridges, amounting in the aggregate to many millions.

ALLOWANCE TO OFFICERS, PRINCE OF WALES RIFLES.

Mr. PRIOR (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

1. What are the names and rank of the officers formerly in the 1st Prince of Wales Rifles who were transferred to the 1st Prince of Wales Fusiliers, and to whom the government paid an allowance on account of their having to buy new uniforms ?

2. How much was paid to each of the above officers by the government ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I see also that the hon. member (Mr. Prior) who proposes this question is not in his place. I had a conversation with him last evening in reference to the matter contained in the question. I did not know then that he had given notice of the question. I do not think it desirable that the names or the amounts should be mentioned, but I may say now, what I promised to say to him in a letter, that the smallest amount paid was $84, and the largest $264, that there were about 16 officers who received money to compensate them for uniforms, and that the average amount paid was something like $150 per uniform.

YUKON TERRITORY—DREDGING LEASES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

Referring to Yukon dredging leases in question answered May 16, 1900, and replies to (s) and (t) in which it is said the regulations have not been complied with :

1. Have these leases, or any of them, been cancelled or declared forfeited ?

2. If not, why not ?

3. If not, what does the government propose to do about them ?

4. If any of these leases have been forfeited or cancelled, which are they, and when were they declared forfeited or cancelled respectively ?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. None have been cancelled or declared forfeited. 2. The department has extended the time where application for the same was made by any lessee. The department has not cancelled any leases in view of the fact that the demand for leaseholds had ceased, and there appeared to be no advantage to the government in cancelling the leases as in many cases it was represented by the lessees that they were proceeding to provide the necessary machinery to operate their leaseholds. It was felt that if the government cancelled the leases, the lessees would simply have allowed the leases to lapse and made no further effort to operate them. In cases where application was made by the lessees, the time for payment of rent, and complying with other provisions of the lease, was extended from time to time. All other leases are subject to cancellation at any time. Extensions of time were granted in each case for a limited period. 3. The policy of the government at present is not to cancel unless there are later applicants desirous of acquiring the leaseholds. 4. None have been cancelled. Most of the leases are subject to forfeiture for non-payment of rent, but none have been cancelled.

YUKON TERRITORY—GRANTING OF OPTIONS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

Referring to the answer of the hon. the acting Minister of the Interior, May 16, 1900, (page 5298-5401, 'Hansard') :

1. When was the system of granting 'options,' such as obtained in the cases mentioned, first introduced in the Department of the Interior ?

2. Will the hon. the acting Minister of the Interior cause to be laid on the Table the papers connected with first application when an 'option' was granted ?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. On the 22nd of January, 1898. 2. Yes.

YUKON TERRITORY—BONANZA CREEK LEASE, MR. A. E. PHILP.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

Referring to question and answer, May 10, 1900, (page 5025 'Hansard') ; Bonanza Creek lease, Mr. A. E. Philp :

1. When was the commissioner asked for a report ?

2. How long will Mr. Philp be allowed in which to comply with the provisions of the regulations referred to ?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. The commissioner was not asked by the department for a report. The applicant is required to furnish the report. 2. Mr. Philp was given six months from the 1st of February, 1889, to file in the Department of the Interior a report from the commissioner. The department was advised in August, 1889, that letters to Dawson to obtain a report from the commissioner had gone astray ; and a further extension of three months was given. Mr. Philp was advised by two letters on the 12th and 14th of May, 1900, that the report from the commissioner had not been received. No application has been received for further extension, and the matter has not been considered.

YUKON TERRITORY—NAMES OF PARTIES HOLDING OPTIONS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

Referring to answer May 14, 1900 (page 5246-5247 'Hansard') :

1. Were the names of parties holding 'options' furnished to the public or to Mr. Philp?

2. If not, why was a distinction made in the case of a lease and an option for a lease?

3. What particular records, books, &c., were open to the public, covered by subsections 1 and 2 in the above question and answer of May 14?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. No. 2. Because it was not the policy of the department to disclose the names of applicants up to the time they became lessees. 3. A plan showing the tracts leased, and the portions of the rivers covered by applications.

YUKON—ALEXANDER McDONALD'S ROYALTY.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (by Mr. Taylor) asked:

Referring to question and answer, May 14, 1900 (p. 5238-5241 'Hansard'), Alexander McDonald's royalty:

Has the report of the Comptroller of the Yukon Territory been brought down to the House?

(a) If yes, when, and what is the date thereof?

(b) If not, will the hon. the acting minister cause the same to be brought down at an early date?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. (a) June 23, 1899. (b) Yes.

YUKON—MR. OGILVIE'S REPORT.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (by Mr. Taylor) asked:

1. Has the Department of the Interior any reply to the telegram sent to Mr. Ogilvie for his report referred to by the hon. acting minister on May 3?

2. If yes, what is its nature and when may the report be expected?

3. Considering the period of this session, will the report be laid on the Table of the House upon its receipt and before it is printed?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. No. 2. Unable to say. 3. It is not customary to do so, but the matter will be considered.

BRIDGE BETWEEN BOUT DE L'ISLE AND CHARLEMAGNE.

Mr. BERGERON asked:

1. Whether, in 1897, the Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, pledged himself on his honour, to a delegation of the inhabitants of L'Assomption, to grant subsidies during the then coming session, 1899, for the construction of a bridge between Bout de l'Isle and Charlemagne, and for an extension of the Montreal belt line as far as Berthier, via L'Assomption?

2. Why did not the government redeem the pledge given by their leader, and grant them the said subsidy?

3. Is it the intention of the government to grant the just claims of the counties of Berthier, Joliette, Montcalm and L'Assomption, now urgently calling for the granting of the said subsidies?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In 1897 a delegation waited upon the Prime Minister to urge the granting of a subsidy for the construction of a bridge between Bout de l'Isle and Charlemagne, and the Prime Minister promised he would bring the matter to the attention of his colleagues and would favour it himself. The answer to the second question cannot be disclosed, but I may say that the subsidies were so large last year, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron), judging from his speeches in the House did not favour an increase.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. BERGERON. I proposed to increase that one, though.

The PRIME MINISTER. As to the third question, my hon. friend will have to wait a little longer to see what the policy of the government will be.

POSTMASTER, NORTON STATION, N.B.

Mr. FOSTER asked:

1. How long was Mr. McCready postmaster at North Station, King's County, N.B.?

2. Has he been dismissed, and why?

3. Was an investigation ordered, and if so, on what charge?

4. Who conducted the inquiry, and what was the recommendation made in the report?

5. Who has been appointed in place of Mr. McCready?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Mr. Samuel McCready, late postmaster of Norton Station (the name of the office has been changed to Norton) was appointed postmaster on January 1, 1881. 2. Owing to the removal of the post office from the railway station, and Mr. McCready not being a satisfactory officer, Mr. Wm. H. Baxter has been appointed to the office in his stead. 3 and 4. There was a report by the inspector which shows that the postmaster was not a satisfactory officer. 5. Mr. Wm. H. Baxter has been appointed to succeed Mr. McCready.

ALIEN LABOUR LAW.

Mr. CLARKE asked:

Since the Alien Labour Law was enacted by this parliament in 1897, has any convictions been secured by any agent or officer of the government against any person or persons for the violation of its provisions?

If so, against who, when and where, and what was the penalty imposed in each case?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am informed by the Department of Justice that no prosecutions have taken place under the Act.

POSTMASTER, NEW WESTMINSTER, B.C.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (by Mr. Taylor) asked:

Who is the postmaster at New Westminster, B.C.?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Mr. George Kennedy is postmaster of New Westminster, B.C.

PAYMENTS OF SESSIONAL EMPLOYEES.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Prime Minister, whether, considering to-morrow is Queen's Birthday, the sessional clerks and messengers and pages, will receive the amount they are entitled to in order to enable them to properly take part in the fete. My attention has been called to the matter by several of the employees, and it would be a great boon to them if they could be paid to-day.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The government would be glad to do anything they can, but it is not a matter entirely within the power of the minister. I am sorry to say that the supplies for that very necessary service are about exhausted, and we have estimates on the Table to cover the additional appropriations required. The Auditor General, who has the power to deal with these matters, declined to pass any further moneys for these services, until the estimates have been passed. Perhaps before the day is out we may be able to dispose of these estimates, and although they do not become law until assented to by His Excellency, yet the passage of the estimates might satisfy the Auditor General and enable him to make the necessary appropriation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FOSTER. As to-morrow is a holiday, would the right hon. the Prime Minister indicate what business will be taken up on Friday?

The PRIME MINISTER. We propose to take a few Bills and then the estimates.

CRIMINAL CODE (1892) AMENDMENT.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 137) further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.—(Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

(In Committee.)

On section 179.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I wish to place before the Solicitor General additional reasons why he should adopt my amendment to this section now in the hands of the Chairman. The other day I showed him what was the public opinion in the United States and in Canada on this matter, and I shall not take up the time of the House by reiterating those citations. I notice that in preparing this Bill the draughtsman, no doubt, instructed by the minister, has put notes to the various sections, and under section 183, I find the following note:

See reports of the National Council of Women, Canada.

That shows that the Department of Justice was very properly aware of what took place at the National Council of Women of Canada, and gave due weight to their suggestions. The Solicitor General may have seen in the Citizen that about a fortnight ago there was a special meeting of the National Council of Women held in Ottawa. It seems that one of the ladies brought before the council this amendment of mine, and after due deliberation, a unanimous vote was passed endorsing it. I call the attention of my hon. and learned friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) to the fact that in England, up to this moment, you have the Lord Chamberlain exercising censorship over plays. I do not think he exercises a sufficiently strict censorship, of which, judging by some of his remarks, he seems himself to be aware. A great art calamity has recently happened in Paris. The temple of the French classic drama, the Theatre Francais, has been burned down; and that event has called public attention to the history of that theatre—a subventioned theatre, over which, for more than a couple of centuries, the government of France has exercised paternal control. All the great productions of French dramatic and romantic genius are connected with that theatre, which, closely supervised by the government, supplied the salt to the literary and dramatic efforts of a city where, according to one eminent critic, the Goddess of Lubricity is worshipped. In Canada comfort is now widely diffused, our wealth having greatly increased in the last twenty or twenty-five years. I remember when the only theatre in Toronto was a little bit of a place, about one-sixth the size of this Chamber, hidden away in an alley, when there was no theatre worthy of the name in Montreal, and when there was none in Ottawa. Now, you have theatres in all the big cities of Canada; and we find an unworthy, inartistic, degrading drama, which, I believe, is temporary; but which cannot pass on its vicious and destructive way without leaving a deposit of great moral and national evil. I need not tell the right hon. gentleman what has been the history of the drama in the great civilized countries in the world. In Greece, for instance, for a certain time the drama was associated with great religious and national festivals, so that the great productions of the Greek mind, which remain to us, unparalleled monuments of dramatic power, were associated with the highest religious aspirations of the Athenian people. But, as the drama in Greece departed from its original associations and controlling influences, and the licentious wit of the dramatist was allowed to have free scope, you find that with the decay of the drama went the decay of national life, until at last a people who at one time held the empire of the civilized world, fell easily beneath the stroke of a petty potentate just emerging from a half savage condition. In Europe, you find that from the dominance of Christianity the Church exercised control over the theatre; and in England very close supervision, probably altogether too close, was exercised for a long time, of which the Lord High Chamberlain is the relic. But, up to this hour absolute license has never existed. Here in Canada and in the United States, however, there appears to be absolute license. Now, in regard to this amendment which I have suggested, the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) said he had seen a similar clause in the New York Code, and yet no conviction could be got, for instance, against the author of 'Sapho,' or the impersonatress of 'Sapho.' Well, I can find no such clause in the New York Code.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth). The hon. gentleman failed to find it, but it is there, though in a form in which it was not easy for him to find it.

Mr. DAVIN. If the hon. gentleman has the code there, will he kindly send it over to me with the place marked?

Mr. FLINT. It is under the head of 'Definition of a Public Nuisance.'

Mr. DAVIN (reading):

A public nuisance is a crime against the order and economy of the state, and consists of unlawfully doing an act or omitting to perform a duty, which act or omission annoys, injures or impairs the comfort, repose, health or safety of any number of persons, or offends public decency.

I think the hon. gentleman is very strained in his definition when he says that is in any way equivalent to my clause.

Mr. FLINT. The hon. gentleman is speaking in entire misapprehension of what I stated. What I stated was, that the terms in the New York Code referring to this matter were very similar to the terms in the Bill before the House, not in the amendment of my hon. friend, and that in my opinion the terms in the present Bill were ample to cover all the points of the hon. gentleman's amendment.

Mr. DAVIN. If that is what the hon. gentleman said, it is no argument whatever against amending the Act.

Mr. FLINT. Yes, it is.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not think so. I suppose the hon. gentleman, before he was allowed to practice law, received some education in logic. Let me put the case. I am arguing that our law is not effective and should be amended, and the hon. gentleman says, in reply to my argument, that our law is the same as that which is in force in New York. But in New York the impersonatress of Sapho and her theatrical manager were brought before the magistrate, and no conviction could be obtained. Therefore, the New York law is equally ineffective. If the hon. gentleman were to argue against my proposition that the New York law is the same as ours and proved effective, I could understand his logic, but I cannot understand it when it is proved ineffective. I am glad, however, that I was mistaken in my understanding of what the hon. gentleman said, because I was afraid he had departed from that sincerity which so distinguishes him.

This is a serious matter, and the government will not be doing its duty if it does not pay any attention to it. We sent to South Africa contingents, the like of which is not supplied by any other portion of the British Empire. Do you mean to say, Sir, that we shall be able in the future to produce such men if we allow that virus to be introduced into our community which, more than anything else, destroys manhood? People may be coarse and yet manly, but you cannot encourage in any community a taste for such theatrical exhibitions without the result happening in this country that history has shown us has taken place in other countries. We will have the inevitable degeneration and deterioration, first morally and then physically, and then deterioration in national life.

The right hon. gentleman knows who it is that writes under the pseudonym 'Bystander' in the Weekly Sun. He knows that there is an eminent name behind that pseudonym, and his attention may not have been called to the fact that that eminent man supports the position I have taken. I need hardly say that there is not, in any English-speaking community, a greater advocate than he for freedom, under all possible conditions. But even this philosophical radical makes his protest against the abuse of freedom which is called license. I can easily understand the kind of mind that laughs at any attempt to deal with this evil, but I know that the right hon. gentleman has not that kind of mind, although there may be men on both sides of this House who have. I do not say there are many, but I know the kind of man that laughs and says: Oh, let things go. Their attention has never been directed to the harm that comes from license in these matters. Here is what 'Bystander' says:

Mr. Davin is moving for increased restrictions on the Canadian stage. There is room for such legislation without trenching on legitimate freedom.

'Bystander' at once sees that there are people who would raise the question: Oh, you are interfering with freedom; but he knows very well, as a great historian, that there is a limit beyond which freedom degenerates into license, and when license strikes a blow at legitimate freedom itself.

Nobody expects or wants the theatre to be a Sunday school; at the same time, we do not want it to be a vestibule of the brothel. Let it present human nature frankly, but without alluring to vice. That some of the plays and ballets now presented do allure to vice cannot possibly be denied; they, in fact, have no other attraction. Of such, ballets especially, as are often exhibited the object can only be vicious; probably no other object is intended or even professed. A cultured spectator may possibly be able mentally to separate the grace of motion from the sensual allurements, as he may be able to read a French novel for the art, not for the lubricity. But the mass of spectators are not cultured. These exhibitions often involve the most deplorable degradation of woman, and it is impossible that in the minds of those who have gloated over them respect for the sex should not suffer. We are in danger of descending, though, perhaps, by a somewhat different road, to the level of the infamous drama of the Restoration. If Mr. Davin could strengthen the checks on theatrical posters he would do a further service. We do not want to be squeamish, but beastliness is not manliness or freedom. It is an advantage which London has hitherto kept over Paris that in Paris things are displayed which in London would be torn down by the police.

I saw the other day in a paper which I always read, the Mail and Empire, a criticism on Sapho:

'Sapho' produced at Toronto.—Daudet's heroine presented by Alberta Gallatin.—A play with fine points.

If Daudet's heroine can be presented and played with fine points, the actress has achieved an extraordinary success. To present Daudet's heroine and make the play one with a fine point—the dramatist must have made the character something different from Daudet's heroine.

The play 'Sapho,' as presented at the Toronto Opera House last night proved a sore disappointment to a few and a real pleasure to many. It was a disappointment to those who went in the joyous expectancy of something nasty, and as might be expected of persons of that ilk, they made their chagrin known by laughing in the serious passages, and becoming uproarious at the points where their microscopically morbid intelligences found something they imagined to be suggestive. Either there never was anything dangerous to public morals in Clyde Fitch's stage version of Daudet's romance—as the New York jury held—or else it was scum that was easily skimmed off the play; at any rate, last night's representation was no more demoralizing than the average daily newspaper.

There is a fallacy there. The daily newspaper tells of public transactions, sometimes most disgustingly loathsome, but it does not present them in the guise of art, but merely as a chronicler. And if, sometimes, the chronicling does not subserve public morality, we know that the cold chronicling of a criminal act is very different from presenting the criminal act with all the allurements of artistic presentation and stage decoration.

With regard to Daudet's novel itself, there will generally be two opinions, fixed largely by the temperament of the reader. There will be those who will be touched by the pathos of the woman with an earnest longing for pure love, but who has found the apples of Sodom that turned to ashes at her touch. And there will be others who will see nothing but the sordid ambitions of a vile outcast in the piece.

Here is three-quarters of a column about 'Sapho' in that strain of criticism. It is palpable that the reporter who wrote that criticism is not, it seems to me, a very just dramatic critic. I do not say he has written without sincerity; I have no doubt these are his own opinions. But, I would refer to the impression made on the highest papers in New York, behind which, we know, there are minds critical and highly educated. The impression made by the presentation of 'Sapho' in New York was very different from that. It may be that the play has been changed. But, it must have been greatly changed indeed from Daudet's work to present what he says so well here in the life of a vile outcast to one mind, as to appear to another mind—such a piece of euphemism that has probably never been heard—that this abandoned woman was hungering for pure love—hungering for a lily under conditions where lillies cannot grow. Now that our cities are becoming larger, now that our theatres will become still more numerous and more numerous frequented, it is the duty of the government to so fence around theatrical exhibitions as to make it clear to dramatists and to dramatic impersonators, that it will not pay to come to Canada with dramas that, as I say, pander to sensuality.

Mr. DAVID TISDALE (South Norfolk). I ventured, the other evening, to differ from my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) with regard to this section. I do not wish to repeat what I said then, as it was pretty exhaustively argued on both sides. But I wish, by way of explanation of what I did venture to say, to address a few words to the committee. The words of the clause as passed and sent to us are 'publicly exhibits any disgusting object or any indecent show.' I said that in legislation, as in discussion and in the ordinary conversation of life, I thought it best to use language that could be fully understood—there was nothing like plain English. And when you say 'any disgusting object or indecent show,' I think you cover the whole ground, because we all know what that means. The commonest man and woman or the most educated and refined man or woman in the community will understand those words. And when you attempt to go beyond that, in my opinion, you do more harm than good, because you limit the broad expanse of plain, common-sense English. And I said, as I say now, that, either as a philosopher, as a linguist or as a poet, a plain, common-sense, matter-of-fact man of the world like myself has had neither the opportunity nor the time that my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) has had, and so, I could not 'hold a candle' to him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TISDALE. I am not saying that sarcastically. Hon. gentlemen are laughing, but I say that seriously. Unfortunately for me, I was brought up in a country and under circumstances that limited my opportunities for the requirement of literary and philosophical lore, and I have had to be content with such advantages as I had. My hon. friend has had opportunities of which he has taken advantage, and I admire him for it. As I have said before in this House, I regret that I have not had opportunity to acquire languages as he has. Were I the master of the language spoken by so many of my fellow-countrymen in the province of Quebec, I should be able to understand them better. I often feel that we, in our rough English, fail to express ourselves in a way that they will understand, and, on the other hand, we fail to understand them. However, this is digression, and that I do not often indulge in. I am unable to agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) in the view he expresses. He saves me the trouble of reading an article from the Mail and Empire, which I had intended to read in support of my contention. Though I have had a somewhat lengthened experience and lengthened life, this is only the second case—the previous one was in a legal argument—in which my opponent and I referred to the same authority in support of our varying contentions. My hon. friend is a newspaper man and an able one. Not being a newspaper man myself, I defer to him, but only this far—that I believe that from their knowledge, those representing the great newspapers on either side of politics, are generally well able to decide the matter where there are no politics involved. Therefore, I think the criticism of a gentleman who is entitled to represent the Mail and Empire, the Globe—and I mention the two to show that politics does not influence me in this matter—would be one which could be referred to with confidence. I am somewhat surprised that my hon. friend should feel called upon to criticise the criticism of such a newspaper on such a question as this. I would take the opinion of the reporter, and I would consider it as a reader and as an observer. The article the hon. gentleman read shows that it is the way you look at it whether a play is objectionable or not. It brings our coat-of-arms into question: Honi soit qui mal y pense. That means the way you look at it, and there is no better morality in the world than is taught by those words. I say the matter is capable of being looked at in two ways, in a suspicious way and in an unsuspecting way. If it depends on the way you look at it, we should be very careful, when we are legislating, not to interfere with the plain English of this clause. I do not take the view that seems to have prevailed in the Senate. I have brought up both girls and boys, and I have endeavoured to teach them that a thing is bad or innocent according to the way they look at it, and that is the true criterion of judging of these things. It depends on the way you look at them whether they are right or wrong. If you attempt to make people too good, you expose them to the liability of falling into error when they come into contact with the rough things of life. The true way to make men and women strong and virtuous in this country is to let them see things in a proper way and to judge for themselves, to educate them in the right way to look at things and the right way to act. Before we exercise the strong arm of the criminal law, let us be sure that we are right in the way we look at the Act in question. In regard to all these amendments made by the Senate, when we come to deal with them, I think we would do better rather to let up on what they have done than to make it more severe. The clause reads: 'Publicly exhibits any disgusting object or any indecent show.' Any magistrate, any judge, any legislature, and man, high or low, can fairly judge what that means.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No matter what his motive may be, he is liable.

Mr. TISDALE. Not at all, because we ought not to consider the motive. When we make that criminal which is not yet criminal, we ought not to consider the motive.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I say the section provides that the motive shall be irrelevant, whatever the motive may be.

Mr. TISDALE. We ought to be very careful. I am always prepared to support any reasonable amendment to the criminal law when it is clear and plain that what we legislate against is an offence. The best way of finding out whether anything is wrong, is to ascertain how the great body of men and women look at it. Whatever the general community condemns, the law should condemn, and not otherwise. When we go beyond that we make a mistake.

Mr. FLINT. The hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) having brought my name into the discussion, I will venture to say a few words. He was under a misapprehension in his reference to me, and I desire to express my opinions a little more fully on this occasion. There was an undertone throughout his speech that I and others who take the same views with me, are opposed to the views that he has expressed at such length. I have stated that we agree precisely on the object to be attained. The question is: Does the form of words in the present law meet the views which are held by the majority of the committee, or is it necessary, in order to carry out those views, to add additional words? That is the point under discussion, not the morality of any particular play or the tendency of the drama. The reason I alluded to the trial of a famous case in New York was the fact that it was conducted under a code the terms of which are as simple and direct as are the terms of the present Act. The hon. gentleman was not able readily to turn up the reference in that code, because it does not come under the heading that he might expect. In New York it comes under the heading of 'Public Nuisance.' Their Act declares that any person doing an act which offends public decency is liable to imprisonment or fine. The phrase in theirs is similar to our own, and it was held by the court to be ample to cover all the ground which the prosecutor desired to cover in that case. The reason of failure to convict was not in the law, but because the jury did not think that the action complained of was an offence which came within the terms of the law. Similarly in this country it would be open for the jury to decide whether a like charge came within the terms of this law. I think the terms are ample. Fortunately in Canada we have not hitherto been seriously troubled by offences of this kind, and the reason is that public opinion is so well educated, is so thoroughly in accord with the best sentiments of the legislature, that the exercise of this provision of the Criminal Code has not been frequently required. I agree with the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) that the present form of words is ample to meet any possible emergency. There is danger of adding too many words in defining an offence, as is patent to all who are accustomed to trials of offences under the Criminal Code. If there were any danger that this form of words did not cover all possible occasions of offence under the idea endeavoured to be conveyed, of course, it would be the duty of parliament to adopt such phraseology as would meet the emergency of the case. This Act is comparatively new. This form of words did not exist previous to the introduction of the code. It was introduced at that time to remove the offence from the position which it formerly occupied as a case of vagrancy. I think the committee would make a great mistake if it entered upon a new line of legislation to meet this difficulty, as the present form of the law is ample as it stands.

Amendment (Mr. Davin) negatived.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Chairman, if in order, I desire to offer an amendment to section 181 of the Criminal Code, 1892. I beg to move:

That section 181 of the Criminal Code, 1892, be amended by substituting the word 'eighteen' for the word—

Mr. TISDALE. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) be kind enough to read the section so that we will see the application of his amendment?

Mr. CHARLTON. Section 181 is as follows:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who seduces or has illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character of or above the age of fourteen and under the age of sixteen years.

The amendment which I propose is:

That section 181 of the Criminal Code, 1892, be amended by substituting the word 'eighteen' for the word 'sixteen' in the fifth line thereof.

The section would then read:

—any girl of previously chaste character of or above the age of fourteen years and under the age of eighteen years.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There are two or three motions still before the Chair which were proposed the other day, and which have not been disposed of yet. Perhaps it would be better, before proceeding with the discussion of the new question put by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that we should dispose of these proposed amendments.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am under the direction of the Chair. If that is the correct ruling, I will submit to it. Might I offer this motion to be considered in connection with ones pending before the committee?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think it would be in order to move a motion, but to expedite business it would be better to dispose of the motions that are before the Chair.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am in the hands of the Chair.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I would suggest to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), that his proposed amendment might come up on the motion for the third reading. As this Bill was introduced in the Senate, and came from the Senate, I would not like to say that I will accept or reject the amendment without having time to consider it.

Mr. CHARLTON. The motion was considered by the House, it received the assent of the House, and was sent to the Senate in the form in which the Bill was passed by the House, so that we can hardly deal with it as a novel question which requires time for consideration. It has received careful consideration, because it has been under consideration session after session.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This matter has been considered very carefully by the Senate, with the result that the amendment has been rejected. I do not want to deal lightly with it now.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have not been in the habit of receiving dictation from the Senate or of acting under their directions.

When we have, after careful consideration, session after session, passed this provision and sent it to the Senate, I do not think it follows that because the Senate have rejected it we should be chary about dealing with a question that we have dealt with before.

Mr. TISDALE. The question would be one of order. I am not saying what my view upon it is now, but certainly it would be more conveniently deferred until we get through the rest. What is the order? Should the hon. gentleman give notice?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is no notice required. I was simply making the suggestion to the committee in order to expedite business. We have already three motions before the Chair which have not been disposed of. Perhaps it would be better to dispose of these three motions, and afterwards take into consideration the motion of the hon. member for North Norfolk.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would ask if the motion offered by the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), at the time of its being tabled was not fully discussed then and stood over for subsequent action?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The first motion which is before me is the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), to add a new clause to the Bill providing that this Act shall come into force on the 1st of September, 1900.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will offer the motion now, and it can be taken up in due order. I wish in connection with this motion, to submit another. I will again read section 181 so that the bearing and effect of the amendment I propose will be more clearly apparent. Section 181 is as follows:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who seduces or has illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character of or above the age of fourteen years and under the age of sixteen years.

I propose in this amendment:

That section 181 of the Criminal Code, 1892, be amended by striking out the words 'of previously chaste character.'

The reason for offering this motion rests largely upon experience as to the carrying out and working of the previous law. It has been found almost impossible to protect any young female under the provision of this law which contains the words 'of previously chaste character.' Some woman who keeps a brothel, or some unscrupulous person, can swear for $5 that a girl is not of chaste character, so that a girl is at the mercy of any unscrupulous person who may tamper with her character. Those who desire the preservation of female chastity are unanimous in their opinion that these words should be struck out and that the law should be applicable without any conditions at all to the protection of females who are protected by the law.

Mr. DAVIN. How would the clause read with the amendment?

Mr. CHARLTON. I will read the clause as it will read when amended:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who seduces or has illicit connection with any girl of or above the age of fourteen years and under the age of sixteen years—

Or of eighteen years if the amendment now tabled is adopted.

Mr. DAVIN. The words 'of previously chaste character' are omitted.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). It is not in the Bill before the House.

Mr. TISDALE. This is a new amendment not in the Bill at all.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would just observe to my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton), that, while expressing no opinion upon the merit of the motion which he has offered to the committee—and if I were to offer an opinion upon it it would be in favour of it, because I favoured it on a former occasion—that the hon. gentleman proposed this legislation last year and the year before, and that it passed this House. It was sent to the Senate and rejected by the Senate.

Mr. TISDALE. Both clauses?

The PRIME MINISTER. No, the first one. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) now wants to introduce this legislation into this Bill. This Bill comes from the Senate. It would have to go back to the Senate again with the presumption that the Senate would not accept this amendment, and the result would simply be to imperil this Bill which is one of very great merit. I would submit, therefore, to him that the committee ought not to agree to his motion for this reason, not that I object to it, because I am in favour of it, nor am I one to submit to the dictation of the Senate, but I think such legislation should go in a separate Bill and be examined by the Senate separately, because if it is embodied in this Bill it must go back to the Senate, the presumption is that it will be rejected by the Senate, and it may perhaps imperil the Bill. For this reason, I think that the clause should not be incorporated in this Bill at this time.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) must bear in mind that this clause was in the Bill as first introduced in the Senate, and that the Senate rejected the clause. If we now re-enact a clause which has been already rejected by the Senate we should do so with a possibility of jeopardizing the Bill. I am afraid the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) was not present when the Bill was being discussed here, but if he would read the amendment passed (183*a*), he will find that the burden of previous unchastity is on the accused. We meet exactly the difficulty he suggests.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have stated that the result of experience is, that while the burden of proof was upon the accused—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It never was before.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yet, the accused was easily able to blast the character of the girl, by subordination and perjury, on the part of females who have fallen themselves, and who are ready to drag down others and to swear away the character of an innocent girl. For that reason this provision had better be eliminated from the Criminal Code, so as to give the girl who is protected by the age limit absolute protection without putting her to the trouble of proving her character, or leaving her exposed to the possibility or the probability of having her character blasted by perjured evidence; her character having suffered only in respect to the trial which is going on. The general consensus of opinion of those in favour of such a provision is, that his provision with regard to previously chaste character should be eliminated from the Bill. As to the action of the Senate, I realize the force of what the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General have said, but still I do not think we are so near the close of the session as to endanger the Bill if we refer it back with one or two clauses added. The Senate may possibly reject those clauses, and if so they will do it speedily, and when the Bill is returned here we naturally would make no further trouble about it. It must, however, be borne in mind that the personnel of the Senate has changed somewhat, and we hope it will change still more, and the action of the Senate last session is not an absolute criterion of what its action will be now. Not only are there new senators who will take perhaps a different view of this case, but other gentlemen who voted against the Bill last session, when they find this provision reiterated by the Commons may conclude that they had better accept it. I cannot agree with the position taken by my right hon. friend and leader, but I do not think we will imperil the Bill by the insertion of this clause. The principal question to me is: Are these provisions right; are they desirable, should they be incorporated in this Bill as a matter of public policy and public interest, and if the answer is in the affirmative, then I say we should enact them and leave the responsibility of rejecting them to the Senate.

Mr. TISDALE. As the right hon. the leader of the House has pointed out, this Bill contains a great many other provisions than that which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) feels so keenly about. Those of us who have experience know that in a Bill of this kind with forty or fifty clauses of public interest, all of them being improvements on the Criminal Code, it is not fair to the House nor to the Prime Minister nor to the Solicitor General, that these provisions should be imperilled for the sake of asserting one other principle; and particularly as this very clause was in the Bill as introduced, and rejected by the Senate. The Senate gave a great deal of consideration to this matter and made many improvements in it, and for my part I feel that the passage of the general provisions of this Bill is more important than the passage of an additional one or two clauses.

Mr. CHARLTON. I agree with that.

Mr. TISDALE. The proposition which the Prime Minister submitted to the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is a fair one, namely, that the hon. gentleman might have introduced a Bill specially dealing with the subjects he advocates. It is too bad that any course we should take now would set at naught all the labour of the House on this Bill. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) has always taken a very strong course on this question, and I would suggest to him that his views would receive more consideration if he would adopt the suggestion of the Prime Minister and of the Solicitor General.

Mr. CHARLTON. I realize the force of what my hon. friend and colleague (Mr. Tisdale) says, and I realize very fully the force of what was said by the leader of the government. I disclaim any intention to imperil this Bill. I cannot believe, however, that the insertion of these two amendments, if they were accepted, would endanger the passage of the measure. I have to say now, that if the Senate should eliminate these provisions from the Bill and return it to us, I should have nothing further to say about it this session. If the Senate does not accept the amendments I shall consider my duty done for the present, and I shall not interpose any further delay but shall allow the Bill to pass when the desire of the Senate is known. I merely move these amendments for the purpose of having them submitted to the Senate and asking that body to concur in them, expecting to abide by the decision of the Senate, whatever it may be, as it would be useless to go further than that.

The PRIME MINISTER. Notwithstanding everything that has been said by my hon. friend, I can only repeat, that while on the merits I agree with him, I have to adhere to the determination

I announced a few moments ago, that these amendments should not be accepted. My hon. friend, the Solicitor General, stated that these provisions were incorporated in this very Bill when it was brought in by the Minister of Justice, at the solicitation of my hon. friend. They have always been considered by the Senate and rejected by it this very session, so that there is no hope of having them accepted by the Senate this year. It is true, we could engage in a controversy with the Senate on this question, but there is no hope of carrying the amendments. The business of the House is advancing, we are all anxious for prorogation, the government are anxious to clear the Order paper; and if we put these amendments in the Bill, it would have to go back to the Senate and then come back to us, and so much time would be lost, which I think had better be applied to the practical work of the session. Therefore, when we cannot get the legislation, which, for my part, I favour, I think it should not be introduced into the Bill at this time.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. CHARLTON moved :

That section 181 be amended by striking out the words, 'of previously chaste character' in the third line thereof.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. B. RUSSELL (Halifax). When this Bill was in committee before, I suggested an amendment to section 449, with reference to the fraudulent use of trade marks. There was no objection taken to the clause which I proposed, and I would ask the Solicitor General to have it placed in the hands of the draughtsman, so that it may be made to correspond with the other provisions of the Act. I understand that the Solicitor General favours it, and is prepared to recommend its acceptance.

Mr. TISDALE. What is it ?

Mr. RUSSELL. There is at present no law to protect the manufacturers of soda water and aerated waters, from the fraudulent and improper use of bottles bearing their trade mark. These bottles are not sold, but are only loaned for the use of customers; but entirely irresponsible persons, such as scavengers, junk dealers and children take these bottles and sell them to other dealers, who obliterate temporarily the trade mark, and put their own inferior product on the market in the bottles, thus practically misrepresenting the character of the contents and perpetrating a fraud on the public. There is no law here to prevent that abuse as there is in the state of New York, and I propose that the same protection be given to the manufacturer in this country as is found to be useful in the state of New York.

Mr. TISDALE. What is the penalty ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. RUSSELL. That will depend on the way the clause is drafted. I presume it will be the usual penalty provided in the Act.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). In some cases the name is branded in the glass of the bottle itself. Suppose a junk dealer legitimately purchases these bottles ?

Mr. RUSSELL. If he purchases them from anybody having the ownership of them, there is no offence; but the custom of the trade is not to sell the bottles.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Suppose he purchases them at a private house, is the hon. gentleman going to impose a heavy penalty upon him ?

Mr. TISDALE. In my opinion, there is a great deal in the idea of my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron), because you shift the onus of proof. If a private individual sold one of these bottles in good faith, he would become liable, unless he could prove that he had paid for it. It seems to me there is no hardship or impropriety in preventing anybody taking advantage of the trade mark of another; but when you commence shifting the onus of proof, you are enacting hasty legislation. What I mean by hasty legislation, is legislation which was not contemplated by those who naturally considered the Bill when drafting it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I would like the hon. gentleman who is moving the amendment to be good enough to explain the very point I am submitting.

Mr. RUSSELL. The New York statute, which covers the same ground, provides, first of all, for the registration of the trade mark, substantially as we have provided for that here. Then, it provides that if after such registration, anybody else should use such trade mark, without the consent of the owner, for the purposes of sale, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. He is obliged to obliterate the trade mark.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. How can you obliterate it if it is branded ?

Mr. RUSSELL. This provides that the use of a bottle or other vessel containing the trade mark shall itself be an unlawful use. It is always a tortuous use. It is quite possible that my hon. friends may be right in saying that we ought not to shift the burden of proof, and I am quite content that that provision should be struck out, but there should be a general provision preventing frauds being practiced on the public.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would suggest that we should have these clauses reprinted and distributed before the Bill is brought up for further consideration.

Mr. J. A. GILLIES (Richmond). Take the case in which large quantities of bottles have been seized under assignment made by merchants to the trade, and sold by a sheriff. The right of property in the purchaser would seem good.

Section allowed to stand.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I have here a motion of which I have given notice :

That subsection (c) of the Senate, as introduced in the Senate, be reinstated.

This section—section 205—does not apply to :

Any distribution by lots among members or ticket-holders of any incorporated society established for the encouragement of art, of any paintings, drawings or other works of art produced by the labour of the members of or published by or under the direction of such incorporated society; if—

First, such paintings, drawings or other works of art are themselves actually and bona fide so distributed; and

Second, when the member or ticket-holder is not given the option of taking in place of any work allotted to or drawn by him a sum of money or something else of value; and

Third, no other such distribution has taken place among the members or ticket-holders for a period of one month, less one day, next preceding the date of, or the date fixed for, such distribution.

It will be observed that the Senate left in the clause b of the original Bill, which relates to the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien, and according to which the ticket-holders can draw money. This clause only permits the drawing of paintings and pictures. Everybody knows about the drawings of the London Art Society, and I cannot understand why this clause was left out.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That was thrown out by the Senate, and they will not pass it again. You will be only courting a defeat of the Bill.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The legislation which the hon. member for Guysborough is proposing to reinstate in the Criminal Code is an absolute copy of that which obtains in England. While we are all anxious to put an end to the gambling under the guise of art lotteries, there is no reason why we should not allow lotteries to be established on the basis of the Art Union of England. I remember well that when my late leader, Sir John Thompson, introduced this clause he went into the whole question. It is impossible for me to account for the Senate leaving out this clause except upon the supposition that, while wishing to put an end to an existing evil, they overlooked the difference between this Art Union and the small companies or societies which are organized for the purpose of demoralizing our people. Hon. gentlemen will easily see the difference between the two propositions. In these societies which should be abolished there are three drawings a day, and they sell tickets from ten cents up to fifty cents. But, in the other case you have a drawing which is for the purpose of encouraging art, something which is especially necessary in a country like ours that is new, and is only beginning to develop its artistic life. Artists here are under great disadvantage through finding it difficult to dispose of their paintings in the ordinary way. Even in England such encouragement as here proposed is deemed necessary, and it is for that reason that the Art Union of London was created, giving a helping hand to the artists there. If such a course is found necessary in the older and more advanced civilization of Britain, we should not neglect this means of encouraging art in our country. Under the clause proposed by my hon. friend from Guysborough you will have drawings not oftener than once in two months, and purchasers will not be able to buy tickets for less than one dollar. A clergyman in Montreal told me the other day he could see the distinction between these two institutions. He said that even children purchased tickets in these so-called art societies whose drawings are now going on. Children go about the canals, picking up coals and selling them at ten cents a can-full in order to invest their money in the purchase of tickets in these different societies. I have had occasion to speak to some of the senators, and I have no doubt that when the matter is submitted to them again, it will be found that the reason why the clause was left out was that they did not draw the line between these injurious organizations and this other which is intended to fill a want among the people of the cities. In my opinion, the police, the municipal authorities, should look after the administration of such a law as this; they should prohibit any society such as these injurious societies that I have spoken of from carrying on its nefarious business. It is not for the government of Canada to, in effect, take into its own hands the municipal administration.

Mr. SPROULE. I would ask the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) if it would not be quite as possible to make a lottery business out of this as it would if the tickets were sold at ten cents each. The question of a little more or a little less money does not make the difference. It seems to me this is only providing a lottery for those who can afford to pay more for their tickets. This, as I understand, provides that if one does not care for the specimen of art he wins, he can take money instead.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No; under the clause which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser, Guysborough) wishes to introduce, there is no option.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not going to express an opinion one way or another, but the section introduced in the Bill was opposed by the Senator from Montreal, and they succeeded in having it struck out. And the argument that convinced the Senate, rightly or wrongly, was that if the liberty asked for were allowed, the same kind of gambling so detrimental to the people of Montreal could be carried on.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It cannot be.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. However that is the argument that convinced the Senate and caused them to strike out the clause. It comes before the House for the first time, and it might be well to let it stand for consideration.

Mr. O. E. TALBOT (Bellechasse). Under the old Act there was nothing to prevent the distribution of paintings being made the pretext for carrying on a lottery with money. Under the clause as proposed, the winners are compelled to take the pictures and nothing else, and the members of the society have no option to give money instead.

Mr. TISDALE. I can see the distinction, and I think the argument has something in it. The clause as proposed, if we can be sure it will be carried out, simply affords an indirect means of encouraging art.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If my hon. friend will tell me that there is an incorporated society in Montreal actually existing that wants to dispose of its works of art in this way, it will, no doubt, have great effect upon the opinions of hon. members on this subject. But they were not able to convince the Senate that there was any such society, and Senator Dandurand succeeded in convincing the Senate that under cover of the section gambling would be carried on.

Mr. TISDALE. I do not propose to commit myself to the clause. I agree with the minister that we had better have it printed and circulated, like the other clauses, and defer the consideration of it. But it appears to be conceded that abuses did arise under the law as it was formerly. The question is whether this abuse would be likely to exist under the proposed new section, and secondly, whether some useful purpose would be served by it. If so, there would be no reason why we should not pass it. There would be no reason for passing, because there would be no object. It would look like an evasion under cover of something else. Therefore, unless there was some society in Montreal or elsewhere that it would affect unfavourably, there would be no use in the legislation.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think I can explain how the Senate was led into error. These companies or societies were organized under provincial charters, whereas this company and the Credit Foncier and the Credit Franco-Canadien were organized under charters granted by the Federal parliament. The

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Minister of Marine and Fisheries has stated that it would go far to convince him if it could be shown that a company or society existed in Montreal. Well, I have never heard the question discussed, because it is thoroughly well known that there is a company or society existing in Montreal, and that a large amount of money has been invested in it. I know some of the people who belong to the society, which has branches in the city of New York, and they are not men who would invest their money with any intention of encouraging gambling, or leading young people away from their legitimate occupations, into bad habits. The object of that company is really the encouragement of art. How could they continue their organization, if we stated that they should not have the option of taking money instead of pictures? That indicates that the object is perfectly legitimate. Does it not indicate beyond a doubt, that their object is absolutely the same as the object of the Royal Art Union of London, namely, for the purpose of encouraging art? Some of these artists dispose of their own pictures by giving them away in the shape of prizes to their own company; others are encouraged to prosecute their artistic studies abroad by the money which is received from the sale of these pictures. I make this statement, that the small ten-cent organizations that have been organized under provincial charters—not that I wish to blame at all the provincial legislatures for granting those charters. But this company and the Credit Foncier and the Credit Franco-Canadien, were excluded in Sir John Thompson's Criminal Code, because they had been organized under charters passed by this parliament.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The companies to which the hon. gentleman refers, are all excepted from the operation of the section by the Bill now before the House.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Except the Art Union.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I say except the Art Unions you speak of. The Credit Foncier by name is excepted.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, and there is no reason why that exception should be made as against the Art Union. The point I wish to make, is that when Sir John Thompson drew up his Criminal Code and submitted it to parliament, he made three exceptions, namely, the Art Union of which I am speaking, the Credit Foncier, and the Credit Franco-Canadien. Under these circumstances there was a distinction made in favour of these three institutions. What I claim to-day, is that in trying to rid the city of Montreal and other cities of societies which are really injurious, the legislators did not consider the distinction which exists between this Art Union and the Compagnie des Arts, and for that reason I think it should be reinstated in the code.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I want to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the exception in favour of the Credit Foncier has not resulted in any evil, or alleged evil. Nobody has contended, since the Criminal Code was introduced, that there has been gambling by reason of the Credit Foncier, or other companies being excepted. But it has been claimed and proved that under the other exceptions of the Art Union, as it was in the old code, gambling of an odious and condemnable character was carried on much to the detriment of the young people of Montreal.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Not in this.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Now, the Minister of Justice introduced that old exception into the Bill this year, with certain guards, which he thought were sufficient in themselves, to prevent that gambling taking place. For reasons that seemed good to the senators, they threw it out, even with the guards the Minister of Justice had thrown around it. They did it, I understand, at the instance of senators from Montreal. Well, I can give no opinion, I do not know the facts; but I merely say, that being so, it behoves us to go along a little slowly. If the Senate has carefully, after consideration, thrown it out at the instance of those who are supposed to know the facts, we ought not hurriedly to insert it again and send it back to the Senate.

Mr. POWELL. Has this been a matter of public complaint in the press?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No complaint at all. The complaint has been made against the ten-cent organizations, the cheap policies. I draw the attention of the minister to this difference: In the ten-cent cheap policies, they have the option of money or pictures. In the present society, the Art Union of Montreal, the tickets are $1, and there is no option of money at all. The person who invests $1 in a ticket, if he draws a prize, must take a picture. Surely there is a great distinction, and it shows that there cannot be any idea of gambling when, for the dollar you have invested, you have the option of taking the price of the picture in money, in lieu of the picture itself.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I press the other point, that the circumstances of the Credit Foncier and the Credit Franco-Canadien are largely different from those of this alleged Art Union, a different character of society altogether.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Not different from the Art Union, but different from the cheap ten-cent organizations.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I speak with some diffidence, not knowing the facts as well as he does about Montreal, but I am told that these alleged Art Unions are so-called for the purpose of deceiving the public, and that under cover of this name, people carry on condemnable gambling.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That is true of the cheap ones.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman has not yet been able to state to the committee, from his own knowledge, that there are some Art Unions worthy of the name existing in Canada, seeking to have their operations exempted from the gambling section. If there is such a society as an Art Union composed of reputable and responsible people who desire to dispose of works of art by this system, there may be a very good argument. So far as I have been able, and I am speaking now without committing myself, to gather information from other sources, it is that under cover of an alleged Art Union, their names are being used for the purpose of carrying on gambling.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. This is a regularly organized Art Union Society that I am speaking of.

Mr. TALBOT. There is a good deal of truth in what the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) has said, that under some of these Art Unions gross abuses have been committed. But in this instance, if the hon. minister wants information he will find that there are schools now in existence in Montreal which are receiving young pupils and teaching them drawing and painting. There is one now under the direction of Mr. Brault. There have been abuses in this as well as in other things, but we want to prevent these abuses and to encourage these institutions which are teaching the art of painting and drawing. This amendment is intended to prevent anything but a fair distribution of paintings and to enable these institutions to bring in money in that way.

Mr. SPROULE. What would hinder a ticket-holder under this amendment, providing these pictures were drawn by ticket-holders not belonging to the association, to sell a picture back to the same Art Union at a price stipulated with the union beforehand?

Mr. TALBOT. The amendment prohibits that.

Mr. SPROULE. My hon. friend (Mr. Talbot) misunderstands me. A person might take so much money in lieu of the picture.

Under that provision a person might come to an understanding with the Art Union that these tickets have a certain intrinsic value and the pictures drawn might be disposed of afterwards for the amount of money previously stipulated, and a lottery might be carried on in that way. What would prevent that?

Mr. TALBOT. The law prevents that. There is no option. When a man brings a ticket a bona fide distribution takes place of pictures of a greater or lesser value.

Mr. SPROULE. I might take a dozen pictures and mark them at from $1 up to $5 each. If I have a picture cannot I realize the price of it by sending it back to them afterwards?

Mr. TALBOT. No, you cannot.

Mr. SPROULE. I mean, providing that this association wished to turn itself into something of the species of a lottery. These pictures will be saleable there at that amount of money. I buy my ticket for a dollar and draw something. Whatever it may be there is a price on it. I have the option either to take the picture or to dispose of it for a certain amount of money. I will take the picture home, but afterwards I will go back to the association and sell the picture to the association at the price stipulated.

Mr. TALBOT. The hon. gentleman could not sell it to the association, or to any member of the association. You might sell it outside. If a man has drawn a picture he is certainly entitled to sell it as it is his property, but it cannot be done between the members of the association.

Mr. SPROULE. I see nothing in the law that would prevent me doing that.

Mr. T. D. CRAIG (East Durham). I think that in this matter we ought to be guided by the Senate. It is stated in the Senate by Senator Dandurand, and apparently without contradiction, or this section would have been stricken out, that this was merely a lottery and that it had led to many abuses. That statement was not successfully contradicted, and if it had been we should not have had this clause from the Senate. I am prepared to vote against the amendment.

Mr. FLINT. The question has been asked why the Credit Foncier are exempted from the operation of the law. They are exempted, I presume, on the ground that they are reputably and honestly conducting an art lottery. I think such institutions as the British Royal Art Society and the Scottish Royal Art Society should be placed on as good a footing as this.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Are we going to say that we shall not have some of the best societies in the world in Canada because there are some abuses in Montreal, and the officials will not prosecute? We are not legislating for Montreal. We have an Art Society which is not incorporated, so far as I know, in Halifax. I do not know whether there is one in Vancouver or whether there is one in Toronto. But, this is not for Montreal. The senator for Montreal thought Montreal was the whole world. We are legislating for Canada, and we want to encourage art from Halifax to Vancouver. Every one knows that in England and Ireland such institutions exist under the law. People who are young and well educated, who have no means, who would not come and ask for money, are anxious to receive instruction in the arts of painting and drawing, and everybody feels, when tickets are taken, that they are contributing in that way. I am not going to legislate for one city. I want a law that will apply generally, and I say that what is good enough for England, or Scotland, or Ireland is good enough for Canada.

Mr. F. McCLURE (Colchester). I have no doubt in the world that under the strict letter of this law the process described by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) could not be carried out, but I can see that this Act is not necessarily a law for Montreal, or for any particular society. It is a general law, and if people were inclined to act dishonestly and desired to make a gambling institution, I can see that by the process described by the hon. member for East Grey, it will be very easy to get around this law and make of an Art Union a gambling institution by drawing, within the letter of the law, a picture, and afterwards under a private arrangement, it would be possible for the company, or somebody not officially connected with it, to buy back the pictures at a stated price, and thereby evade the law and carry on an open and notorious lottery.

Mr. TISDALE. I am prepared to give societies under this Bill a chance. If it does not work let them come back, and we can repeal the law. I believe that we should give a chance to artists, such as is given in older and well established countries. I cannot say that I am fully satisfied that this Bill will work out. If the Bill does not work well, let us repeal it at a later stage, but in the meantime let us give them a chance.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). I should not like to support the amendment unless I was sure that it had been carefully drawn. An amendment of that kind should receive very careful attention, and I have no doubt the Senate did give it all the attention we have given it here. We should not make it possible, under our law, for people to turn Art Unions into gambling societies. I have received resolutions from some of the labour organizations in Montreal, asking me to assist this amendment of the senators through the House. These organizations fully realize the tremendous harm that these Art Union lotteries are doing in that city.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think that clause might be made to meet the objection suggested by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Sproule). I think that the Senate—I am not permitted to refer to the other Chamber—but I think that since this Bill was introduced into parliament it has not had the consideration yet that might have been bestowed upon it. I think it probable that, perhaps, in another Chamber, hon. members saw that this innocent device of an art lottery could be used for the purpose of carrying on an injurious lottery system, and they despaired of being able to find suitable words to check all the abuses in a legitimate way. They find it easier to strike out the whole thing than to do what they ought to do, that is, to address themselves to the task of preserving that which is good and beneficial, and prevent it from being made the means of that which is evil and injurious. It seems to me that protected as the clause is by the amendment as originally drafted, it almost provides for everything necessary. I see in the small print in the Bill:

The attention of the authorities has been called to several societies claiming to be art societies, but whose operations are only colourably so, they being, to all intents and purposes, lotteries for money prizes, as directly or indirectly, they give ticket-holders an option to take money. Of course that avenue will be closed up by the amendment.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL (Halifax). If there was another exception added, namely, that this should not be a lawful and legitimate transaction unless it was such as was not being colourably used for the purpose of effecting the distribution of money by lot, then we would make the clause absolutely watertight against evasion. I do not think we should destroy what has proved to be a perfectly ordinary, innocent, and beneficial piece of machinery, or that we should despair of making that useful, simply because it has been used for illegitimate purposes. It seems to me that we should direct ourselves to the task of preventing this improper purpose being accomplished, while at the same time, we retain what is useful.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It ought be borne in mind that if the law goes into force in the shape it now is, that it will be impossible to sell the tickets of the British Art Association in Canada, and impossible for Canadians to participate in it. With reference to the lotteries, they are not only a nuisance, but it would be a crime for us to allow them to continue, and we must insist that such safeguards will be thrown around the amendment as to make it impossible for them to continue any longer. While we are at it, the attention of the committee ought to be directed towards the bucket shops in Montreal, which are a greater evil—I speak from my own personal experience—which are a greater evil than the lotteries, bad as the lotteries are.

Mr. HENDERSON. How much did you lose?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am glad to say I am not a victim.

Mr. HENDERSON. You said you spoke from personal experience.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I may say to my hon. friend that I never in my life speculated to the extent of five cents.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am very glad to hear it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I speak from experience, and I now state that in connection with the fall of the Ville Marie Bank, over $200,000 went into one bucket shop alone.

Mr. POWELL. The bucket shops have sent more men to the penitentiary than perhaps anything else.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. They have helped to send more men to the penitentiary than there are in this chamber at the present moment.

It being six o'clock, the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 125) respecting the Algoma Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Dymont.)

Bill (No. 20) respecting the British Yukon Mining, Trading and Transportation Company, and to change its name to 'The British Yukon Railway Company.'—(Mr. Fraser, Guysborough.)

Bill (No. 150) respecting the Salisbury and Harvey Railway Company.—(Mr. Lewis.)

Bill (No. 68) respecting the Nickel Steel Company of Canada.—(Mr. MacPherson.)

Bill (No. 144) for the relief of Catherine Cecilia Lyons.—(Mr. Mills.)

Bill (No. 159) for the relief of Gustavus Adolphus Kobold.—(Mr. Bennett.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 157)—from the Senate—to incorporate the St. Lawrence Terminal and Steamship Company.—(Mr. McIsaac.)

Bill (No. 158)—from the Senate—for the relief of Gertrude Bessie Patterson.—(Mr. Richardson.)

THE CRIMINAL CODE (1892) AMENDMENT.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 137)—from the Senate—further to amend the Criminal Code of 1892.—(Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). As the two amendments proposed to this Bill, one by the hon. member for Guysborough, with reference to lotteries, and the other by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), with reference to the use of trade marks, were understood to be printed before we proceed further, I would move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

SUPPLY.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I propose to take up first the supplementary estimates laid on the Table for legislation for the current year.

Reporting, printing, &c., of debates in the Senate, and other purposes..... $8,000

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) What was the vote taken in the main estimates?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There was a supplementary vote last year of $6,000; this year it is $8,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this supposed to cover the whole cost, or up to what date?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This can only be to June 30, the end of the present fiscal year. It was sent by the committee of the Senate as covering the requirements of that date.

House of Commons—Publishing debates.. $15,000

Mr. FOSTER. Is that calculated on the basis of the session lasting to June 30?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The whole cost is calculated to June 30.

House of Commons—Sessional clerks, including two clerks for the whips' room. $10,500

Mr. FOSTER. Is there any addition to the number of clerks?

Mr. SPEAKER. No, the number is not increased; but last session extended to August 11, and the pay up to that time came out of this year's appropriation. The staff is the same as usual.

House of Commons—Serjeant-at-Arms' staff $18,278

Mr. FOSTER. Is the sessional staff increased?

Mr. SPEAKER. No, I think the staff is two less than it was a year ago.

Mr. FOSTER. Would Mr. Speaker kindly tell the House with how many less he thinks we could get along?

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps if I had more prolonged experience, I might be able to tell.

Mr. FOSTER. Is Mr. Speaker fully persuaded that the staff is an efficient one?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think, perhaps, there never was a finer staff.

Library of Parliament—Sessional messengers $210

Mr. FOSTER. What is the explanation of this?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). We had that the other day. These messengers continued until August 10. This is to pay them for the time between June 30 and that date.

Mr. FOSTER. Have they not had their pay?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They have been paid out of contingencies, and this is to recoup that vote.

Printing, printing paper and binding.... $25,000

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This is on the recommendation of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FOSTER. This does not include stationery, but we have already had an item about that. Where is the stationery being obtained now?

Mr. SPEAKER. The House will remember that there was some difficulty with regard to the quality of the stationery. I believe—speaking subject to correction—that the stationery in the lines complained of is now being supplied under the old contract, but we are still making use of a good deal of Canadian stock. The envelopes were unsatisfactory. I may explain that the increase of the estimate is due partly to the fact that provision was not made for the amount usually provided for members' trunks, and partly because there has been a very heavy demand for the long manila envelopes.

Mr. FOSTER. Has Mr. Speaker any idea of the use made of these manila envelopes?

Mr. SPEAKER. No, I do not pursue the subject further than to keep up the supply.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). I would like to ask whether the large envelopes which are being put in members' trunks are Canadian or imported?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the Canadian envelopes were not found satisfactory, and we reverted to the foreign imported stock.

Mr. HENDERSON. I venture to hope that those supplied last year and this year are not Canadian. They are worthless. The paper is so hard that it will not absorb the gum and you cannot seal them. It would be a compliment to the members if these envelopes were not given out at all.

Mr. SPEAKER. I will make inquiry, and will give the desired information as to stationery when the regular estimates are under discussion.

Mr. HOLMES. You cannot get a stiff envelope that will seal well; the paper is so stiff that you cannot put enough mucilage on to seal the envelope.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). I would like to inquire from the Finance Minister if this sum of $25,000, or any part of it, is required to pay for publishing the blue-book which, in my opinion, is nothing more or less than a campaign document. It is entitled 'The action of the government in respect to the manufacture and sale of twine produced by convict labour.' I presume that this is published by the hundred thousand, and distributed throughout the country, and it may be that this $25,000 is required for this purpose.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am afraid I am unable to inform my hon. friend whether this is charged against parliamentary printing or not. The $25,000 for parliamentary printing was inserted on the recommendation of the Joint Committee on Printing. Whether it is used for that particular purpose I could not say.

Mr. TAYLOR. I brought this up before the Printing Committee, and it was done by the committee.

Scientific institutions and hydrographic surveys—Meteorological service $72,000

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is an increase in this item caused by the printing of the diary for distribution in Europe and Australia. It is an immense volume giving details of all this work, and is sent to every scientific institution in Europe and Australia. It is a volume of 300 or 400 pages, with scarcely anything in it except figures, and for this reason it cost $1,500 more to print it than the previous volume. As the result of some suggestions made at a meeting of the Royal Society which took place last year, it has been extended, made larger than heretofore.

The next large item of increase is for the extension of the service to the Yukon—$1,000 to appoint two observers at different places in the Yukon. Then there is an increase in the salaries of observers at the station in Toronto and other places in the Dominion, made on the report of Mr. Stupart. These officers at Toronto are paid exceedingly low salaries, many of them, and on the recommendation of Mr. Stupart we have made the following increases: Mr. Webber, who has been there many years, was getting $1,500, and we give him an increase of $100. Mr. Payne gets $930, and is increased to $1,000. An increase of $50 a year is given to Mr. James Young. Mr. Blake gets an increase of $200, making him $900. He was paid a very low sum, he is an extra good man, and Mr. Stupart said he could not retain him at that salary. He urged strongly that, in consideration of his services, he be allowed a sufficient sum to live on. He has been in the service ten or twelve years. Mr. Banning is getting $750, and we give him an increase of $50. Charles Ross, $580, increased by $120. He has been there for a long time. He commenced like other young fellows at a low salary, $300. All these increases are made on the recommendation of Mr. Stupart. Some of the officers do mechanical work, and others more or less scientific work. Then R. McKay Cameron, salary $350, increased to $400; A. J. Small, salary $330, increased to $400; Mr. Tweedie, salary $480, increased to $500; Mr. Kingsmill, salary $350, increased to $400. Mr. Allan was appointed last year at $300 on the understanding that he was to get $400 the present year. These are all the increases in the service at Toronto.

Mr. FOSTER. You have practically increased them all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, we have increased eleven, and there are seventeen altogether, not including Mr. Stupart. Then there is Mr. Hutchinson, in the observatory at St. John, who gets $950, and on urgent representations, I propose to increase his salary by $50. He succeeded his father in that position, and is an excellent official. Then young Mr. Dennison was sent from the observatory at Toronto to British Columbia. He got $500 at Toronto, and we propose to give him $900 on the ground that the expenses of living are much higher in British Columbia than in Toronto. He was backed up by Mr. Stupart, and in consideration of the fact that he was getting married besides, we propose to give him an extra $100, making $900.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that not a direct encouragement to matrimony?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If it were, it would not be condemnable. Then there are small increases proposed for the officials at the telegraph stations of Barkerville, Calgary, Sydney, Rockliffe and St. John's. In the Yukon I spoke of the $1,000, and there are the Vancouver time signals $250, which make a total of $2,450 of an increase in the salaries of that branch. Then, there are some small miscellaneous expenses not enumerated, such as hardware and train signal agent's fuel, making up the total increase.

Fisheries $262,000

Mr. FOSTER. Before the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries goes into the details I would like him to give some information to the committee as to what is now practically the position of the fishery question as between the provinces and the Dominion, and also some information in reference to rumours—I do not know whether they are well based or not—of a claim that is being made by the provincial governments to a further encroachment—or that is not the right word to use—to taking over the fishery privileges which have been heretofore exercised by the Dominion. The hon. gentleman knows that this is a matter of a great deal of importance. Unfortunately, I am afraid, it is in a position where incalculable harm is bound to come in the future. My own opinion is very strong that the Dominion authority should have retained its power, or that its power should have been retained over the fisheries. I remembered hearing that there was a conference looking to a retention of the central authority over the matter in the provinces for the sake of the fisheries themselves. I would like the hon. minister to give us a brief, although comprehensive idea, of how the matter stands.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) that the position is unfortunate and unsatisfactory. Up to the time that the Privy Council judgment was given on the fisheries case, which was submitted to the Supreme Court and afterwards carried to the Privy Council, the general assumption was that we had entire control over the fisheries in the various provinces and acting upon that assumption we had our officers in those provinces. We made regulations as to the times and seasons and manner of fishing, and appointed our officers to carry our regulations into effect. There was no discord and no claims put forward in an effective way disputing our rights until the province of Ontario claimed that the fisheries did not belong to the Dominion, in so far as Ontario was concerned, and that question was referred to the Supreme Court. The different provinces were asked to join in the reference, and they nearly all joined in—Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and I am not quite sure whether British Columbia did or not. The matter was decided by the Privy Council in a lengthy, reasoned judgment, the effect of which was to declare that the fisheries, as property, in Ontario and Quebec, and in the interior parts of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, belonged to the provinces and not to the Dominion.

Mr. FOSTER. Did that take in the great lakes?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That the great lakes and rivers of the provinces belonged, not to the Dominion, but to the provinces themselves, and that the property in the beds of the lakes and rivers, being vested in the provinces, the property in fish, swimming in these waters, belonged also to the provinces. So that the property which we were supposed to have had in the fish in these great lakes and rivers was declared by the Privy Council judgment to be vested in the provinces themselves and not in the Dominion. The result of it was that while we used to exercise and assume the right to lease the fisheries in these lakes and rivers at specified places and points, we lost that right. Our leases were void, and we had to hand over to these provinces the right to do what we theretofore had done, to grant leases to A, B, C and D for particular localities in these different lakes and rivers. We retained, however, by decision of the Privy Council, the absolute and uncontrolled right to declare the close season, the seasons when fish may be taken, and also the manner of catching the fish, by net or by other methods. That right could not be interfered with in any way, no matter how absolutely or how arbitrarily we exercised it, so far as the inland waters of the Dominion were concerned. I am not speaking of the North-west Territories, which stand upon a different footing altogether, but so far as Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick fisheries and interior rivers and lakes are concerned, the fisheries were by this judgment vested in the provincial governments. Then, we only had the right to declare the close seasons and the methods of fishing, and that new condition of matters resulted in our withdrawing from the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, the fishery officers that we had appointed in years gone by for the carrying out of the regulations. The regulations which we previously had made were now made by the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. FOSTER. Regulations as to the close season?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. As to the number of licenses that they would grant and to whom they would grant the licenses. Hundreds of licenses have been granted in these provinces which were formerly granted through our officers, and the fees derived from these licenses go to the provincial governments. We withdrew from the provinces all our subordinate officers. We retained in Ontario three inspectors for the purpose of travelling during the fishery seasons all over the fishing districts and reporting to the department, from week to week, how the regulations of the department in regard to close seasons and methods of fishing were being carried out, if there was any breach of them, and if so what.

Mr. FOSTER. What officers enforce the close seasons?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Our officers enforce the close seasons if they have knowledge of any breach. We have in Ontario three inspectors. One of them goes from the department here, Mr. Cunningham. Another is the fishery inspector from Ontario whom I found in office when I came here. Mr. Sheppard. The third man is appointed in what is called New Ontario, in the Georgian Bay district, and his name is Mr. Duncan. These are the only three officers we have in Ontario besides the captain and officers of the Petrel, who are still retained for the purpose of protecting our international rights as against the Americans in Lakes Erie and Huron.

Mr. FOSTER. In the property of the fish.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In the waters there. To prevent foreigners from encroaching on these fisheries.

Mr. FOSTER. But the property of the Ontario government.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Well, yes, but we thought as it was an international matter we should continue that protection we had hitherto afforded from the encroachments of foreigners. Unless the provincial authority were prepared to go to the expense of fitting out a ship for the purpose, we did not see how they could protect those fisheries at all. However, as a matter of policy we continued that expense and the officers of the Petrel have continued to discharge the duties which they discharged before the Privy Council's judgment was given. In the province of Quebec the same policy was adopted, as far as it could be, but when we get down near the sea there is a little difference. We have one of the officers of the department, fishery inspector for western Quebec, and we have a fishery inspector in eastern Quebec, Dr. Lavoie.

Mr. FOSTER. You have two inspectors in Quebec.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. One is an officer of the department, and he only costs $100 a year extra, besides his travelling expenses, the same as Mr. Cunningham in Ontario. When we get to the sea-coast the question comes up: What are the rights of the provinces and the Dominion; does the recent judgment of the Privy Council, which declares that the beds of the lakes and rivers belong to the province, and therefore, the fisheries in the lake and rivers belong to the province; does that reasoning apply to the bed of the ocean? We have been for a long time in trying to get a case agreed upon between the province and the Dominion, in order that it may be referred to the Privy Council to determine: Does their judgment mean also that the beds of the ocean within the three-mile limit belong to the provinces, as well as the beds of the lakes? We have submitted to Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, British Columbia and Quebec certain questions for their approval, and we have got answers from many, some suggesting other questions, and we have not yet decided upon the form which the case must take. The Quebec government insist that they not only own the lakes and rivers, but that they own the beds of the ocean within the territorial jurisdiction of the province, which they construe to be out to the three-mile limit, and, that having the territorial rights in the bed of the sea out to three miles they also have the right in the free swimming fish and other fish in that sea, the same as they have in the lakes.

Mr. POWELL. What about the harbours and foreshores?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is conceded that the harbours themselves belong to the Dominion by the express words of the schedule to the British North America Act. No one challenges our exclusive right to the fisheries in the harbours. It is, of course, a very difficult matter to determine what is a harbour and what is not within the meaning of the Act. Before we can have anything like a final settlement, we must have a decision of the Privy Council upon that point. We are forcing it to an issue as fast as we can, and I am not without hopes that in the near future we will have it finally arranged. Some of the provinces desire—and it does not seem to me to be reasonable—that the question of their right to the share of the fishery award should be included in the reference. We think that might be a matter of policy as well as a matter of law, which could be determined when the legal rights of the provinces and the Dominion were settled as regards the foreshore in the three-mile limit. We have withdrawn from Ontario and Quebec a large number of officers, so that now the expenditure in Ontario is $3,500, and in Quebec $4,500. In New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, to some limited extent, the same questions arise, but the fisheries there are largely around the coast, and the governments of these provinces intimated that they did not wish to raise the question at all. They would rather we should go on administering the fisheries in the future as we have done in the past.

Mr. FOSTER. The inland fisheries?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes. They said that until the legal right of the Dominion or provincial government to the fisheries around the shores was determined, they would rather we should continue to administer the fisheries, and we are doing that.

Mr. FOSTER. You draw the revenue?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, very serious questions may arise one of these days upon that point, but what is being done is done by mutual agreement. It has been suggested to us that having first taken legislative power to do so, they should assign all their rights in these fisheries to the Dominion for a certain time. We were not able to agree upon the amount we should pay, and I for one told them that I thought it would be injudicious to enter upon negotiations upon that point until the Privy Council had finally determined what our and their legal rights are.

Mr. POWELL. Suppose in the meantime these men down by the sea, dispute your authority and turn out your officers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It would raise a case that would have to go to the Privy Council, because the Dominion, I assume, would not waive its claim. A private person would have the right to contest the point as well as one of the provinces.

Mr. POWELL. It would look as if he could do it very successfully just at present.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will not express a decided opinion upon it. I have talked it over with the Minister of Justice and the Deputy Minister of Justice and Attorney Generals of the different provinces, and am not satisfied we have not the right in the foreshores.

Mr. POWELL. It is well to say so anyway.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Well, it is more than arguable.

Mr. FOSTER. The provincial governments of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island have undertaken not to dispute your authority in the meantime.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, yes, it is at their solicitation we have gone on administering the fisheries as formerly and drawing revenue, with the exception of the oyster fisheries which clearly belong to them.

Mr. FOSTER. You said: 'That great trouble might arise hereafter.' Do you mean trouble as to claims for the return of revenue?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not anticipate any trouble of that kind, but the trouble I had in my mind was that supposing it was held in the future that the three-mile limit was territorial property belonging to the province, then the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, at least, have given formal notice that they intend to claim they have the right to share in the fishery award which was granted for the lease of this property to the American fishermen for ten years. That question will have to be met, if and when the Privy Council determine (if they ever do) that the property in these waters belongs to the provinces.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Mr. POWELL. Take the oysters in the harbour of Prince Edward Island near Hillsboro; these clearly are in the harbour?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no question but that the Dominion has the authority there.

Mr. FOSTER. What oyster beds do the provinces hold?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The oyster beds in the rivers and creeks and on the flats in the bays and creeks.

Mr. POWELL. Not what might be a harbour?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If it is a harbour they concede it is ours.

Mr. FOSTER. How far do the provinces go out from the shore?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Waters inclosed in the jaws of a small bay would be clearly territorial. It is only when the bay becomes large, as the Baie de Chaleur for instance, that the question arises.

Mr. FOSTER. Do I get it right, that as far as the oysters are concerned, they belong to the provinces up to the three-mile limit?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would not say that, but I say that in all the rivers, and in the small creeks and bays, which are clearly within what are called territorial waters, they would all belong to the province. It is a very difficult thing to give a definition unless you have the exact contour of the harbour before you. Speaking broadly, I would say that the Baie de Chaleur is not territorial property, although I am bound to say that many lawyers hold differently.

Mr. FOSTER. Why oysters and not other fish?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The fish on that particular spot.

Mr. POWELL. All birds in the air or fish in the sea over the ground.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Within their territorial property rights—because I draw a broad distinction between territorial jurisdiction and territorial property rights.

Mr. FOSTER. You have not made any reference to Manitoba.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In Manitoba the question does not arise. It all belongs to us.

Mr. FOSTER. And in British Columbia ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, the same question would arise there. British Columbia has adopted the same course as Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. It has left the administration to us, knowing that it will be better conducted in a central office than by the different provinces.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, the Dominion government has given up all effective control in Ontario and Quebec ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Except below the mouth of the St. Lawrence. There is a point in the St. Lawrence which was settled by the arbitrators under the old reciprocity treaty as the mouth of the St. Lawrence, and for practical purposes we have assumed that to be the mouth of the St. Lawrence, and we claim the right to the fisheries below that point.

Mr. McALISTER. Have the New Brunswick government and the Dominion government come to an understanding as to the territorial divisions in that province ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes. The New Brunswick government were anxious that we should continue to administer the fisheries. They were anxious, further, that we should enter into an arrangement by which they should hand over to us what they considered to be their rights for a certain sum per year; but I pointed out that I did not see how we could arrive at a defensible basis until we had the question of the rights of the two governments settled. I do not see how we could come to a fair estimate of what we should pay for their rights, if we determined to take them over, until the Privy Council gives judgment as to what those rights are.

Mr. McALISTER. There is no final arrangement until the Privy Council gives its decision ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, further than that in the meantime we administer the fisheries, drawing the receipts and paying out what is required to administer them.

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). The minister's suggestion is a very good one, and the only sensible course that the provinces should pursue. What is their secret objection to taking this course or not taking it ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know what their secret objection is.

Mr. POWELL. I say this because I know the question has come up in my own practice respecting the fishery rights in the different rivers and along the shores. I had some correspondence with the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and I could not complain of the answer I got, because if they had given me any other answer they would be assuming the powers of the Privy Council. But the matter is in a very unsatisfactory state. It is several years since a decision was given, and we have nothing but a legal chaos between the provinces and the Dominion in respect to the fisheries. One scarcely likes to advise the people along the shore to ignore the Dominion altogether; yet, the decision of the Privy Council looks that way, although I cannot appreciate the reasoning of their decision. When the British North America Act gives the Dominion jurisdiction over the fisheries, it would strike an ordinary person that it is not merely to say when people shall fish and when they shall not fish, but it gives full power over them. Unless the matter is settled in some way, private individuals will have to bring it before the courts.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We have the question fairly well disposed of, as most of the provinces have come to an arrangement with us, and I think in a short time Mr. Newcombe will have the case ready to go home.

Mr. POWELL. Are you going direct to the Privy Council ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I think we shall go first to the Supreme Court.

Mr. FOSTER. There seems to be no great need for having two inspectors in Ontario and one in Quebec. What are these men in Ontario to do ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I must have some man there to keep in touch with the provincial officers and to see whether the licensees of the provincial government are observing the close season or not. It is of no use to make regulations unless I have some one to inform me from time to time whether these are being observed or flagrantly broken. The department here must also be informed in regard to the manner of fishing, whether by nets or otherwise, in order to take steps to prevent breaches of the law. Of course, there is a dual control.

Mr. FOSTER. Over so large a province as Ontario, with fishing districts everywhere, it is absolutely impossible for two officers to keep track of violations of the law. Your officer is in Toronto.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, he keeps travelling all the time.

Mr. FOSTER. He cannot be in two places at the same time, especially if they are a thousand miles apart. Even with fishing officers everywhere, it is most difficult to keep the law fairly well enforced; but how must it be when there are weeks, at least, between the visits of the inspector at one place? The hon. gentleman has no officer to advise him outside of these two or three?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No others.

Mr. FOSTER. So that, practically, the control is a very loose control. Then, what are the reports given by these officers as to the manner in which the provincial officers are acting with regard to enforcing methods and times of fishing?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They are fairly satisfactory. We had some friction at first, because the province was insisting, not only that it should draw the whole revenue, but that we should appoint officers from time to time to enforce the law. I said that we would not do that, but that we would have our officers report from week to week whether or not the regulations of the department were being observed. We are, at present, in a transitional stage, but the arrangement has not worked badly. Our officer at Toronto is to report his observations once a week; and whenever he reports a breach of the law, we at once put ourselves into communication with the fishery commissioner of Ontario and notify him of the fact; and wherever our officer has personal cognizance of a breach of the law, it is his duty to punish.

Mr. FOSTER. Do the provincial authorities instruct their officers to see that the methods of fishing and the close seasons, as prescribed by the Dominion, are carefully observed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have no reason to doubt that they are loyally assisting us in that regard.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. minister could easily see whether they were doing that or not. If the regulations are necessary, they should be carried out; and if not necessary, they should be abrogated. Do the provincial authorities give imperative instructions to their officers to carry out the law?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I believe that their co-operation has been fairly loyal. Of course, now that they have independent jurisdiction, they may sometimes assume a pretty independent tone, but, speaking generally, their co-operation has been fairly loyal, and the provincial officers are doing fairly well in seeing that our regulations are carried out with regard to the close seasons and the methods of fishing.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Mr. FOSTER. Under the changed circumstances, my hon. friend might consider the question, whether we should any longer sustain the burden of the fish hatcheries in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, which are, of course, intended to keep up the supply from which the provincial governments draw the sole revenue. It does not seem quite fair that when the revenue has been entirely taken from the Dominion, the Dominion should go on making these large expenditures.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is a very broad and important question, which gave me a great deal of thought and consideration. I came to the conclusion that as we have these fish hatcheries in operation, the general interests of the fisheries would seem to justify their continuance, at any rate for the present, and I have made no change in the policy of the government in that regard. In the province of British Columbia our receipts are very large from the fisheries, and we are getting the revenue also in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and are retaining the fish hatcheries in these provinces.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman surrendered without a shot.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not quite satisfied that our action could be correctly designated as a surrender. We were in possession of these hatcheries and administering them, and I do not know that we would be justified in closing them up. I do not think the hon. gentleman himself would advocate that course.

Mr. FOSTER. It is certainly a matter for adjustment. If you had a property which brought you a revenue and all at once it was taken from you by decision of law, there is no longer any duty incumbent on you to look after that property and take care of it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I was a long time dubious about it.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a question which ought to seriously engage the attention of the hon. minister. There is a little difference in the matter of beet-root sugar, because there are international questions connected with it that are better dealt with by the central than by the provincial authorities, and that I would not press unduly, but the other is a matter which ought to be taken up.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am intensely sorry, whatever the reason may have been, that the change was made with regard to the ownership of the fisheries.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a change that the country will deplore more and more, and it is a question that may be solved in some way like this, namely, that the provincial authorities by legislation—I suppose Imperial legislation would be required?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think not. Provincial legislation would suffice.

Mr. FOSTER. The provinces might by legislation put the fisheries in the hands of the central authorities for many reasons. I do not think there is a single reason against that view. The diminution in the salaries and disbursement of the fisheries overseers and guardians, I suppose, was made two years ago?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. minister (Sir Louis Davies), if the decision of the Privy Council, while giving the provinces the sole control of issuing licenses and appointing overseers, went so far as to make it imperative on the Dominion government to exercise some control.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend wishes to know whether it is imperative on the Dominion government, by the decision of the Privy Council, to pass regulations with regard to the close seasons and the appliances that might be used in the catching of fish?

Mr. CLANCY. Or whether you might hand that duty over to the provincial authorities.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Privy Council declared that that was within our sole jurisdiction. The provincial authorities could not pass any regulation about the close season which would be of value.

Mr. FOSTER. Could they not make it a condition of the license they issue?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. By the decision of the Privy Council the regulations on that subject are exclusively vested in the Dominion government.

Mr. POWELL. Could they issue a license for the month of July?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, provided we permitted fish to be caught during that month. But they could by refusing a license make that month a close season.

Mr. CLANCY. If it be the case that there is no power within the provinces to make regulations with regard to the mode of fishing or the close seasons, their rights to issue licenses are utterly worthless, standing alone, unless assisted by the central authority, and it seems to me there is no advantage in our having this power when the provinces alone profit by the fisheries. Therefore, while perhaps a solution cannot be reached at once, there can be no doubt that the jurisdiction given us by the Privy Council would be a very good lever to use with a view of coming to some reasonable understanding, by which the Dominion would either be relieved of all expense or be given the sole control and benefit of the whole matter. The question might be settled, because, as I pointed out a moment ago, the rights which have been declared, by the decision of the Privy Council, to rest with the provinces are of no use without the co-operation of the Dominion government—they cannot make regulations. I wished to ask the hon. minister (Sir Louis Davies) if none of the overseers in Ontario have been retained except those he has referred to?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. None.

Mr. C. E. KAULBACH (Lunenburg). As there is a question between the Dominion and the maritime provinces as to which controls the fisheries, would it not be well to come to some arrangement, instead of allowing the question to continue in doubt? Two litigious parties might bring the question into the courts here, the end of which might be the reference of the matter to the Privy Council. All that expense and uncertainty could be avoided and a clear understanding reached with respect to the fisheries on these shores, if an arrangement were made, which should be done at the earliest day. I am sure the maritime provinces would have no objection to transferring their rights, if rights they have, to the Federal government; and I contend that the Federal government is the proper authority to deal with the matter. I am anxious to have the matter settled, in order that we may take up the development of the deep-sea fisheries. I have had correspondence on this subject with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and I am very anxious that fishing in the waters of the deep sea should be recuperated. At present, the condition of affairs is such that there are a number of fishermen on the shores of Nova Scotia, who will be compelled to seek other employment, unless something of this sort is done. They have made the appeal very frequently to have fish hatcheries along the coast. I feel satisfied that there is no money the Federal government could spend to better advantage, than in establishing fish hatcheries. I wish the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries would give this matter his serious attention.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). Do I understand that the fisheries and fish hatcheries of Manitoba are completely under the control of the Dominion?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. PUTTEE. What is the use of having a fish inspector on Lake Winnipeg, seeing that his advice as to issuing licenses is given no weight? This is true of this year especially. It has been customary, in past years, to issue licenses in Manitoba, but this year the applicants came here and got their licenses in the winter, when it had been customary to get them about the present time of the year.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The duty of the fisheries inspector is to make recommendations, and he has done that from time to time; but it does not necessarily follow that the department must follow every suggestion that he may choose to make. The only question that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Puttee), refers to is that of the fisheries of Lake Winnipeg. The question came up whether we should grant licenses to British subjects to fish on a large scale. The matter was reported on by the fisheries inspector, and I referred his report to the Commissioner of Fisheries, and acted on his advice. Some people complain that I should not issue these licenses. They are all granted to British fishermen. It is quite true that it is contended that these licensees are the agents of a combine. That may, or may not be so. There are petitions in, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Puttee) knows, charging that the men to whom the licenses are granted, are the agents of a huge combine, and should not get any licenses at all. On the other hand, I have statements from these men and others, that such is not the fact. At this distance I cannot judge as to the facts; therefore, I intend to send a capable man up to examine the question on the spot. I have also consulted the representatives of the locality, and we continue the system as it has been without any material change. Whether or not we will refuse to grant licenses for such a large number of yards of net to any individual, will be determined by the report of the scientist whom I shall send up to examine the question. As at present advised, I do not think it would be wise to make a change this season. But, even as to that, I have not made up my mind. I am constantly receiving information, and I shall act on the advice of the Commissioner of Fisheries upon whom, in such matters, of course, I must largely depend.

Mr. PUTTEE. It is pretty well understood that the fisheries there are carried on for the benefit of the Booth Fish Company of Chicago. I think we are entitled to some explanation. Two months ago, I asked for reports of the fish inspector and so on, and the minister objecting to bring down confidential reports, I did not get them. The House afterwards passed an order with the objectionable clause struck out: but the papers in response to that order have not yet come down. Therefore, I am hardly prepared to discuss the matter; and so, if this item passes, I think the next should be allowed to stand, so that the question may be discussed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There will be other estimates upon which the question can be discussed.

Mr. PUTTEE. In that case, I am quite willing to put off the discussion. I may say that this is a very serious matter. As the hon. minister says, he has petitions from fishermen at twenty-two different points on the lake, that something should be done to let Canadians get some benefit out of these fisheries. Though we in Manitoba are known principally as wheat-growers, we are a little in the fish business too. In Lake Winnipeg, we have valuable fishing grounds; but they are being rapidly fished out, and the entire profit of the fishery is going across the line. Our own fishermen are not getting even a bare living. There were people brought over from Iceland to that section, induced to come partly by the representation that they could carry on the fishery there in connection with their farms. But the combine has the fishermen entirely in its power. It pays them low wages, and forces them to truck at its store, and often brings them out in debt to it at the end of the season. There is a great deal of matter in this case that the minister is aware of, as I am; and I would like to have a chance to place it before the House. But, if there are supplementary estimates coming up, I can bring the question forward when they are before the House. I intended to move that this second item for fish hatcheries should be reduced. For what is the good of paying for hatching fish to keep those lakes stocked, when the people of our own country are making no use of them? The combine fishes all around the lakes and near the shores, so it is impossible for individual fishermen with domestic licenses to fish at all. The lake is so large that you must have tugs to go out to the middle of the lake. There are three commercial licenses granted, covering 20,000 yards each. By this arrangement the whole fishing business has been monopolized, and six or seven independent companies crushed out of the business, and nearly 1,000 fishermen have had their business taken away from them. While this matter is before the committee, I think we should have some promise that something will be done. I have myself put before the Minister of Marine and Fisheries twenty-two petitions, comprising nearly 700 names, asking that the licenses that have now been granted be cancelled as having been obtained under false pretenses. They were obtained merely for the American combine and not by Canadian citizens.

Mr. TAYLOR. Some three or four years ago a deputation from the American authorities had an interview with this government in reference to setting apart a preserve in the river St. Lawrence between Cape Vincent and Ogdensburg on the American side, and between Kingston and Prescott on the Canadian side. Difficulties had arisen on account of the close season on the American side of the river for bass beginning June 1, and on the Canadian side on June 15. The Americans, beginning to fish on the 1st. of course, came into Canadian waters. After discussing the matter, the Canadian government and the representatives from the New York government agreed to set apart this portion of the river as a national preserve, making the regulations the same on both sides of the river, and it was agreed that June 9 be the day for putting the law into force. Now, there has been no action taken by this government. Shortly after that arrangement was made, on the faith of the promise of the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries, then Mr. Costigan, the Americans changed their law, but the Canadian law has never been changed. Representations have been made to this government year after year, and I think this government should keep faith with the American government on this matter. Last spring we had a meeting at Brockville, and representatives were there from both governments, and it was then distinctly understood that these regulations would be put into effect this year by the Canadian government. Has this been done?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I hope it will be done. Within the last ten days I have had two or three consultations with my officers on that very point, and have gone over all the representations made to us. I am not able to speak with positive accuracy now whether the order has been issued, but the intention is to carry out the agreement and the views which the hon. gentleman mentioned.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). I did not understand the hon. minister (Sir Louis Davies) to say that he proposed to make any change in the regulations with regard to fishing in Manitoba.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I said I had not made up my mind yet, but that the matter was under consideration. The petitions sent to me, signed almost entirely by Icelanders, have been sent back to be verified, examined into and reported upon, and I have not received them back yet. When I saw hundreds of names on the petitions, names which I could not read, many of them signed in the same handwriting, I could not tell what weight to attach to the petition, and whether the signatures represented the genuine wish of the people. These refer to Lake Winnipeg.

Mr. ROCHE. Is any change likely to be made as regards Lake Winnipegosis?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. As regards Lakes Winnipegosis and Manitoba, I have issued an order and regulations nearly a month ago prohibiting fishing with tugs in either of these lakes. That cures all the objections there were to the combine going there and cleaning the lake out. Our object was to prevent these two lakes from being overfished, and the question was how to do it. The manner in which they were overfished was by getting a license for a large number of yards of netting, and using this netting with tugs. We have prohibited the use of tugs on Manitoba and Winnipegosis lakes. We have appointed a special inspector, with a tug of his own, to see that our regulation is enforced, a gentleman at Dauphin. I think his name is Macpherson. We have taken every step to ensure that our regulations shall be rigidly enforced by the fishermen there. I do not expect any difficulties in carrying them out to the fullest extent. The other point my hon. friend referred to is now under consideration. I am in hope we shall reach a satisfactory conclusion in regard to Winnipeg Lake, too.

Mr. ROCHE. I suppose the minister is not in a position to say to-night how many licenses have been issued on Lake Winnipegosis?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think in the neighbourhood of twenty-five. These are issued to local fishermen, and to none others.

Mr. ROCHE. Are the fish hatcheries supposed to be inspected yearly?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. ROCHE. Has there been any inspection of Selkirk the last couple of years?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not since Mr. Prince was there himself.

Mr. ROCHE. How many whitefish were hatched out last year and this year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I refer my hon. friend to the Fisheries report, which will give him all the information he requires on that point.

Mr. ROCHE. It says that 75,000,000 were placed in jars. I saw an article in the public press up there stating that less than 3,000,000 fish were hatched last year, and less than 5,000,000 this year, and offering to pay the expenses of an inspector, or any one else, to go up there and verify the list. The statement is, that the report made is entirely inaccurate, that the jars could not hold that number.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am glad the hon. gentleman has mentioned it to me. It is my intention to have a thorough investigation made this year by the most competent officer I have.

Mr. PUTTEE. It is understood, I presume, by the minister that even on Lake Winnipegosis tug fishing was never legal?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They were prepared this year to scoop the lake out, and tugs were being prepared to be sent up that lake.

Mr. PUTTEE. They have another scheme of getting over the law at this very same point, for the Booth combine operates here. They get some one to take out two or three domestic licenses and supply them with a large sail-boat, and instead of fishing with several hundreds of yards of net, they fish with thousands of yards of net.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think it is a 300-yard net and a large sail-boat that are allowed. I think my hon. friend can rest satisfied that so far as Lake Winnipeg and Lake Manitoba are concerned we have collared the combine. I think our regulations will ensure absolute protection for the local fishermen and for the fisheries on those lakes.

Mr. PUTTEE. As to the export of fish from these lakes has that been absolutely stopped?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I could not prevent the export of fish.

Mr. CLANCY. There are Indian lands on which the Dominion government have granted fishing and shooting privileges, and where the people holding these privileges have club houses. I want to ask the hon. minister if, since the change has taken place, the government of Canada still exercise supervision over these lands. I may point out the case of Walpole Island as one of the striking cases where they have a club house and where they have a lease from the Dominion to shoot and fish upon Indian lands with the consent of the Indians. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the Dominion government have any overseers there for the purpose of seeing that the law is enforced, as, of course, these lands belong to the Dominion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not in a position to answer the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) on that point, but I will make inquiries in regard to it. The matter has never been brought to my attention. There has been no change made as far as I am aware.

Mr. JOHN McALISTER (Restigouche). What are the specific duties of guardians here? I see a provision made for overseers and guardians.

Mr. ROCHE.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is a distinction between a guardian and an overseer. An overseer, for instance, is a man appointed for a country or district. He is appointed every year and paid by the year. A guardian is only appointed for a special river, and he is appointed for so many days in the season.

Mr. POWELL. What do you call these lobster men—overseers?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, guardians.

Mr. McALISTER. My particular reason for asking this question is, that in Restigouche the fishing bounty used to be distributed through the overseer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Who is the overseer there?

Mr. McALISTER. Mr. McLean is the overseer of the county. I am informed that last year and the year before a special officer was appointed to look after the distribution of the fishing bounty. I do not know it of my own knowledge.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, it is on the Quebec side that these special officers are appointed.

Mr. POWELL. There is one point in respect to these guardians or overseers or wardens, as you may call them, of the lobster fishery. If there is one question more than another that has been impressed upon the attention of the present and the preceding ministers it is the protection of the lobster fishery in the maritime provinces. There is no question but that this is a great source of wealth, and a great source of wealth to people who particularly require it, to the farmers along the shore who may, during the few months or weeks that they snatch from their agricultural pursuits, catch these fish for which they receive considerable money in return. This is a matter that has been under my own personal notice ever since I was a child. I remember the first man on the shores of New Brunswick, who engaged in the business was Henry O'Leary. From that time the fishery has grown to the enormous proportions it has now reached. While the fishery has been carried on more and more every year, there has been a gradual decline in the size of the fish, until to-day it is simply ridiculous the size of the fish that are caught on the shores of New Brunswick, and I presume that the same thing is true of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. Now, the fishery regulations have been made apparently for the sole purpose of being broken from the very inception of the supervision that the government has taken over these fisheries, but never has it reached that pitch of absurdity that it has reached under the administration of the hon. gentleman who now presides over the Marine and Fisheries Department. I say that, and I say it advisedly. I attribute that to two things. In the first place, so far as the county of Westmoreland is concerned, one thing that was done was to turn out a man, and I am speaking within bounds when I say that a more conscientious man I never knew in the whole of my acquaintance. He was a gentleman by the name of Charles Munroe, he was the fishery commissioner and the only fault he had was that he was so conscientious that he might be called a crank. Another gentleman was appointed who was entirely ignorant of the duties which he had to perform. I am informed, credibly informed, that last year and the year previously there were actually more lobsters caught out of season than were caught in season along the northern and eastern shores of the province of New Brunswick. Something should be done to remedy this. This is a serious matter and I would not state it had I not the information to back it up, that officers of this department actually collude in some way or other, with the fishermen, or there may be another hypothesis that the fishermen are too shrewd for the officers and in that way elude the regulations of the department. But, whichever hypothesis is correct, the result is that, these illicitly caught fish are stamped with the government stamp, or label, or certificate of the inspector and they go forward as if they were caught in season, and more go forward which are caught out of season than are caught in season. The large establishments along the shore, of course, are closed up. But illicit fishing is carried on by men of less means. Either the regulations should be done away with altogether, and the expense that the Dominion is put to in maintaining the service should also be done away with, or else these regulations should be more stringently applied. The result of the present lax administration of affairs will be that these people who live along the shore will have destroyed their means of livelihood and lessened one of the most lucrative businesses that they have. It is a business which does not require much capital. A man requires a boat or two, a few traps and a moderately sized boiler. The whole equipment would not cost a couple of hundred dollars and he can earn quite a number of hundreds of dollars in the few weeks or months he is engaged in the business. The matter has been brought to the attention of the Department of Marine and Fisheries under the present and under the preceding administration, and it seems idle to talk about it, but the matter is now in this predicament that the hon. gentleman who is at the head of the department must either, if he is going to maintain his self-respect, wash his hands entirely of the regulations and give free trade in fishing, or else he must see that the regulations are carried out by having officers and wardens who are sufficiently conscientious to carry them out and by backing up an officer who will initiate legal prosecutions to effect that result.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is news for me to hear that the administration of the Department of Fisheries has been somewhat lax.

Mr. POWELL. Well, it has been extraordinarily lax.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is the only man in the maritime provinces who has ever made that charge. I venture to say, speaking with a better knowledge on the subject than the hon. gentleman can possibly boast, that there never was a time when the regulations were enforced more rigidly than they have been during the last few years. I suppose there is no more unpopular man in the maritime provinces than your humble servant because of that. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) knows that the inspectors of fisheries who were in office when I came in power are there still.

Mr. POWELL. It is not the inspectors; it is the local wardens.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The chief officers in each inspection district have been retained and not one of them has been dismissed. These officers have had the most positive instructions given by me to them to enforce the law on every occasion. If the hon. gentleman takes the report of the department he will find that each of the inspectors has reported that the law has been enforced up to the hilt. In addition to that, I chartered a number of tugs, manned them with men from the fisheries service, and sent them around the coast, and they confiscated and destroyed tens of thousands of lobster traps, because the people would persist in fishing contrary to law. That was a very painful task for me to undertake, but I recognized the vast importance of this fishery, and because of that I determined to save the people from themselves and to insist that the regulations which had been passed to preserve this fishery for the people should be observed. Take the report of Commander Spain, and the report of the officers of the Curlew and the Kingfisher, or any of these, and you will see the efforts that have been made, the great number of prosecutions that were instituted, the convictions obtained, and the large quantity of property destroyed in an effort to have the regulations obeyed. I must frankly say that although there were persistent attempts made to violate the law—hon. gentlemen will see how difficult it is to guard four or five thousand miles of coast—I have no complaint to make of the general efficiency of the officers, and I believe they did their duty well. The complaints which flood the files of my department are to the effect that we are absurdly severe in the enforcement of these regulations. The complaints that I get from hon. members on both sides are to the effect that we are pushing this matter too severely, and not that we are too lax. I frankly say to my hon. friend (Mr. Powell) that it is rather a pleasure to hear myself attacked for being lax. It is the first complaint of the kind that has ever been made to me. I do not know a man who has ever come to me before and said that I was lax in the administration of the fishery laws. Per contra the complaint has been the other way. We have enforced the law. I will not say with too great severity, but pretty severely, in a bold effort, and at a good deal of expense to convince the people that it was in their interest that the law should be observed, and that we were determined to carry it out. Look at the quantity of property destroyed for illegal fishing during the last few years; look at the extra amount of money we have spent in this protection service. Let me ask, when before did tugs, with officers, patrol the whole coast, as has been done for the last few years, and when before was property destroyed that was left in the sea for illegal lobster fishing. I venture to say that the strictures of my hon. friend (Mr. Powell) are entirely unfounded.

Mr. POWELL. I am speaking simply whereof I know. Outside of Westmoreland I do not know anything. I am speaking from my own observations and on what I believe to be credible information. What I have said is true. The county inspector or the divisional inspector has nothing to do with a matter of that kind except to direct his officers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He goes along the coast all the time.

Mr. POWELL. I am speaking of the local officer. If there is any complaint it is made to the inspector, and I have no doubt these inspectors in that respect would do their duty. The chief reason why that state of affairs has existed, I believe, is due to the fact that the people along that shore believe they are hardly dealt with in the matter of the close season. The lobsters strike Cape Breton weeks before they strike on that shore. They strike Prince Edward Island before they strike on that shore. The result is that the season for lobster fishing on that coast opening at the same time as on Prince Edward Island, the Prince Edward Island fishermen have a fortnight's fishing before our fishermen can commence. Just at the time that the fish begin to strike in on our coast, and after the fishermen on other coasts have had their good catch our fishermen are obliged to stop just as the good catch is beginning.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman knows that we have remedied that, recognizing that what he says to be true. We have extended the time to the 15th of August all along that coast.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Mr. POWELL. That will better it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I appreciated that what the hon. gentleman says is true, and that is why I gave the extension.

Mr. POWELL. Let me speak for a moment on this item of oyster culture in the county of Westmoreland. The hon. gentleman talks about the way these regulations are enforced—the late government undertook the costly experiment of seeing whether the famous old oyster beds of the Shediac could be renewed. There was the Poirier bed that was known to all oyster dealers and it was sought to renew it. At the expense of several thousand dollars that bed was cleared and planted with oysters of the best quality. These oysters had just about come to maturity the year the present government came into power and regulations controlling it should then have been made. It is nonsense for the minister to deny that this matter has not been pressed upon him and upon his department. It has been pressed upon Professor Prince and it has been pressed upon other officers. But the government were more anxious about politics than oysters. The first thing they did was to turn out one of the most conscientious men of my acquaintance—a gentleman named Mr. Wood—who, at the time of his appointment was selected purely and simply because of his merit and his character, and who at the time of his appointment was reputed to be mild Liberal. He was turned out of office by this government and they put another man in his place. What was the result? Instead of this government conserving the oyster bed and seeing that the money expended produced good results they turned out the old officer and put in a new man, and the result is that there never has been a license issued in respect to the bed from that day to this. At one time twenty poaching boats were found upon it. Oysters, not by the hundreds of barrels, but by the thousands of barrels have been taken from it and to-day it is practically depleted again. That is the history of that bed. While that has been going on the minister, although he could not help knowing of this matter, for complaints were made to his department, has sat quietly here and allowed this illegal fishing to go on, and the oyster bed to be ruined. With that history before us we are asked for an expenditure of several thousand dollars for oyster culture. The House will fail to appreciate the reasons that may be urged by the minister in support of that vote, when we consider what happened in the Shediac case. I do not hold the minister to that degree of—what shall I say—acuteness, in enforcing the law, which would indicate omniscience on his part, but there is no question about it, that there has been a most atrocious maladministration of the oyster culture undertaking in the province of New Brunswick. The first experimental expenditure, which amounted to between ten thousand dollars and twenty thousand dollars, has been absolutely thrown away. If the hon. minister wants evidence of the illicit fishing, he can find evidence in the fact that his officers are aware of about twenty poachers who were found there on one occasion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. When was that?

Mr. POWELL. That, I think, was last summer, and some of them were fined, I am informed. It was a systematic business to fish that bed. To-day from this bed that cost the country thousands of dollars, the minister could not get as many hundred dollars' worth of oysters, if accounts I hear are true. The ex-Minister of Finance spent the summer down there. I have never spoken to him about it, but the matter was such a public scandal, that I have no doubt he heard of it time and again.

Mr. J. H. BELL (East Prince). I think there is something in the observation and admission of my hon. friend (Mr. Powell) with regard to the poaching that goes on along the coast of Westmoreland. On the Cape Traverse coast we have to complain that while our people observe the law, and sometimes are compelled to observe it, we hear constant reports of poaching on the opposite shore, and I think the Minister of Marine might take the hint and send his cutters and apply a little more severity there. Our complaint against the government on the Prince Edward Island shore is that the lobster regulations are enforced very severely—I may say too severely. We have no charge of laxity to make against the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; on the contrary, and we find that the regulations are rigidly and arbitrarily enforced. We do sometimes complain that when illegal fishing is going on, the lobster traps and gear are destroyed instead of being taken ashore and sold to the best advantage.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We would require a whole fleet to do that.

Mr. BELL (Prince). The change of season made under the present administration has given very general satisfaction. The fishermen of a certain section of the Island shore, extending from Cape Traverse to West Point, now enjoy the benefit of a season for which they have prayed and petitioned in vain for many years. The minister may receive some complaints yet. I can assure him there is a very general satisfaction with the change. What we do complain of is that our new season, which the people appreciate very much, is shortened unfairly by certain regulations of the department preventing the people from putting out their lobster traps and preparing for the season before the time limit for the opening of the season. I do not think the poaching referred to by the hon. member for Westmoreland as going on along the shores of that county results from laxity on the part of the officers, but from persistent and determined efforts on the part of the fishermen along that shore to violate the law. I think the minister should respect the plain intimation of the hon. member who represents that shore and these people in this parliament and should see well to it that such cause of complaint be rendered impossible for the future.

Mr. A. C. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) I am sorry I cannot very well agree with the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Bell) that the minister is enforcing the law too severely. I think when there is a law or rule laid down by the government or the department, it ought to be carried out to the letter, or as close thereto as it is possible to go. If the fishermen have to suffer in consequence, I am sorry for them; but I think it is in their own interest that the regulations which the department lays down should be carried out. From all I can learn I am rather inclined to the opinion that there is more poaching going on along other coasts than along the coasts of my county. If there was no law at all, I think the lobster fishermen would be quite prepared to take up their traps at the end of the season. The greatest injury to the lobster fisheries are the small packers, who are people of small means, and whose necessities are so great that they are driven to encroach on the regulations, and try to get all the fish possible, even if the process should exterminate the fishery altogether; and we can see that result coming closer to us every day. The lobsters have got to be so small that where hundreds of traps were used some years ago, there are thousands used now, and immense numbers of these small lobsters have to be caught to make a factory self-sustaining. Many of these lobsters, I fear, are taken before they reach the reproducing age, and for that reason the fishery is becoming rapidly fished out. With regard to the fishing season, the fishermen were in favour of opening it on the 1st of May instead of on the 20th of April, and I think it would be well for the minister to take that into account. With respect to the hatching of lobsters, I cannot say much about it. On our coast we have not seen any appreciable results from it. It is to be hoped that the hatchery for the propagation of lobsters on the coast of Pictou is of some benefit, but it is a question on which there is very much doubt. I think it is pretty hard to demonstrate that it is really a benefit.

Mr. McALISTER. A charge has been made by the hon. member for Westmoreland of violation of the lobster fishery regulations along the coast of that county, a charge which, I have no doubt, is true, because the hon. member has stated that he knows of it of his own knowledge. I may say that the county of Restigouche, which I have the honour to represent, has very extensive lobster fisheries; but I have never yet heard of any complaints that the regulations of the lobster fisheries were violated in that county. A great many of the people in my county are engaged in that industry, and quite a number from other places have factories established there, but the fishing is done principally by the people of my county. I must say that the people there are law-abiding citizens. Each and every one of them, so far as I can ascertain, is anxious to see the regulations strictly carried out. True there are complaints time and again made that the regulations are unjust in some respects, complaints that I admit, have some strong foundation; but at the same time I know the difficulties that exist in the way of framing regulations that will please everybody, or be at all near perfection. But while complaints are made from time to time, I know, of my own personal knowledge, that the regulations are rigidly enforced by the officer of the department. He has, however, no difficulty in enforcing them. I never knew yet of any complaint being lodged in the county of Restigouche against any lobster fishermen for violation of the regulations. There may have been some, but I think I would have heard if there were any, and I never did. The season is unsatisfactory to some of them. They complain that the regulations are unjust, which are imposed on the fishermen in the Baie des Chaleurs, as compared with the regulations in force in other places. Not being a practical fisherman myself, I do not know whether there is anything in that complaint, but I know that it is made from time to time. At the same time the regulations are strictly carried out, and I have never heard yet of any complaints made of any violation.

Mr. ANGUS McLENNAN (Inverness). I happen to represent the county just opposite that represented by the hon. gentlemen from Prince Edward Island, who have just spoken. That county covers the whole of the western side of the Island of Cape Breton, just as the three counties of Prince Edward Island cover the coast of the whole side of that island. In that whole coast, the western side of the Island of Cape Breton, I have had ample opportunities for personal observation, living just midway between the two extreme points, and I am in a position to state that I do not believe one hundred lobsters were packed out of season during the past three or four years, since I have had the honour of a seat in this House. While criticising, as I did the other day, severely the conduct of the Marine Department in shortening the fishing season, as applied to the western side of Cape Breton Island, and lengthening it as applied to the eastern side thereof, yet when we come to the subject of the protection of the fisheries, I must really stand up in my place and declare that the regulations have been strictly carried out, since the present minister has had charge of the Marine and Fisheries Department. Whether that be due to the vigilance of the officers or to the law-abiding character of the people, I am not prepared to say; but I do know that there are about forty or fifty miles of unsettled coast along the extreme northern portion of the island, which was considered, no doubt, by some of the packers, a very eligible site for poaching or illegal fishing, and accordingly they established two or three packing establishments there, and operated them. And on a certain occasion, while preparing to pack a catch, to their very great consternation, they saw a steam tug coming in from the sea, and making straight for one of these establishments. An officer came ashore and found one lobster in the lot below legal length, and the whole lot was confiscated, and the owner of the institution subjected to a fine.

Mr. KAULBACH. When was that?

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). Last season. I do not know the name of the tug or the officer.

Mr. KAULBACH. Hard usage.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). Well, I only cite this instance as evidence of the vigilance of the protective service on that coast, which is about 150 miles in extent. While I feel bound, in justice to the department to say what I have just said, I do complain that the department is using the fishermen rather severely by shortening the season, in view of the fact that not a trap is set along that great extent of coast until May 10th or 12th, instead of April 20, as allowed by the new regulations. The traps are set out twenty days later, thus leaving the people along the coast a fishing season of only about six weeks, whereas the people of eastern Nova Scotia are permitted to fish three weeks longer. However, the point I rose to call attention to, is the efficiency of the protective service, which I must say, is most effective on our side of the Island of Cape Breton.

Mr. POWELL. Might I ask the minister what the regulations are now?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. August 15, is the date on the north shore of New Brunswick down to Cape Tourmentine.

Mr. POWELL. When did that come in force ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Some few months ago.

Mr. POWELL. That regulation is a step in the right direction. My hon. friend from East Prince, seems to think that the people of Westmoreland are more immoral than the people across the Strait. But it is not a question of morality at all. The root of the trouble has been the fact that our people felt they were deprived of three weeks' fishing which the Prince Edward Island and Cape Breton fishermen enjoy. When the lobsters are just beginning to come from the deep to the shallow water in large numbers, our season was cut short, and the result was that if our fishermen were going to catch any of those lobsters, they had to continue fishing beyond the season, and having done that, a great number continued a much longer time, and carried their fishing some time into the fall. My remarks apply to the period previous to last year, because last year we were engaged here until after the fishing season was over, which was some time in July. I cannot speak for last year, because we were here until August and, before I had personal knowledge of affairs in the county, we were into September. But previous to last year, it was true that illegal fishing went on, and the reason primarily was the unfairness of the regulation, the secondary reason being the laxity of the official who was appointed in lieu of Mr. Munroe. This year I am glad to hear the government extended the time as I had urged upon the department previously. I urged it upon the last Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan), and also upon his predecessor (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). But they ignored this very wholesome regulation and the necessity for extending the time, and with the most disastrous results. The hon. gentleman says that in other parts of the maritime provinces they are enforcing the regulations strictly. I am glad of that, as the effect must be to increase the lobsters in every portion of the coast, including the shores of Westmoreland. But I bring again to the minister's attention this maladministration of the oyster bed in the harbour of Shediac; and I hope he will not allow another year to pass without having stringent measures taken to preserve that oyster fishery which has cost the Dominion so much. It is a scandal, nothing less, that the government should have done absolutely nothing with the bed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I shall have a special report made on what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) says to-night.

Mr. KAULBACH. I would ask the hon. minister to inform me with regard to the size limit of lobsters.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The limit is nine inches on the coast of the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Kaulbach's) county. That limit holds good to Halifax harbour, but north of that the limit is eight inches.

Mr. KAULBACH. I think the minister will see that this difference in the size should not exist. I do not see why they should draw a line at the mouth of Halifax harbour and all south be given a limit of nine inches, while north the limit should be eight inches. It appears to me, if a difference is to exist, it should be reversed, that the smaller limit should be south of Halifax, for the reason that fewer lobsters are found south of Halifax than are found north of it. I understood the hon. minister to say that no overseer of fisheries had been dismissed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I said no inspectors had been dismissed.

Mr. KAULBACH. I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. I know that in my county—Lunenburg—we had two very active and very efficient officers, Mr. Solomon and Mr. Evans, with whom no fault could be found except that they were friends of the Conservative party. But they were not offensive partisans by any means; I know of no action they took, inconsistent with their duty. Nevertheless, the government thought proper to dismiss them and to replace them with other men whom I am sure have not been looking after the fisheries half so well as their predecessors. I think it was a gross mistake on the part of the government. However, it is done; and I suppose it is needless for me to comment upon it. I was rather surprised to hear my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. McLennan) charge the government in the manner he has done. I thought he would look upon the government as a paternal one; and that they would not be so cruel as to send officers in a ship to his town and seize a large number of traps and lobsters because of finding one lobster under the limit size for packing. I can hardly imagine that such could be the case.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). It was not in a port, but on an isolated coast.

Mr. KAULBACH. That makes no difference. It seems to me that the action of the officers as reported by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McLennan) was very unfair and acted cruelly; and if these poor people have suffered in this way, I hope the government will make some compensation to them. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Macdonald) referred to the scarcity of lobsters on that shore and to their being of full size. That only shows more clearly the necessity that exists for the government to carry on fish hatcheries along the coast. I realize this very clearly. In this connection, I would remind the minister that in a letter written to him, I urged that, in addition to fish hatcheries and the use of incubators, that where it is possible to find natural ponds for hatching, that is for lobsters more particularly, these ponds should be utilized. I hope the hon. minister will not overlook the letter, carefully drawn, in which I made a special request that he would give this his earliest and most careful attention.

Mr. FOSTER. What has been done about lobster hatcheries?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There has been an increase of the vote. We propose to build three new hatcheries. One, a combined lobster and salmon hatchery will be at Gaspé. The size will be 114½ feet by 34 feet. The plans and specifications have been prepared and the site has been selected, and the only cause of delay now is that Prof. Prince desires to see the exact location before the hatchery is built, to see that there is proper water supply. He is going down in a day or two to see about that. Then, in British Columbia, where, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) knows, we have large surplus receipts, there will be hatcheries at Sicamous and Skeena. The first is to take the place of the one at New Westminster which has rotted down. We go further up the river. They sent officers up there last year to select the site, and a site has been selected, though not finally determined upon. Plans and specifications are prepared, and the hatcheries are about being built. And we propose, inasmuch as the hatchery at Sydney, Cape Breton, is rotted down and has been closed up for some years, to rebuild at Margaree. That accounts for the increase in the votes for this service. We have at present hatcheries at Ottawa, Newcastle, Sandwich, Tadousac, Margaree, Restigouche, Bedford, Miramichi, St. John, Fraser River and Selkirk.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) What is the Margaree hatchery for?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. For salmon.

Mr. CLANCY. Can the hon. gentleman say what the fish hatcheries cost, that are now maintained in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In Ottawa it costs $1,278, that is our central fish hatchery down here. At Newcastle it costs $3,762; Sandwich, $4,941. Those are in Ontario. In Quebec, we have one at Tadousac only, costing $2,190.

Mr. FOSTER. What has been the result of the lobster hatchery business?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is claimed by the fishermen that the results have been good. It is almost impossible to come to any definite conclusion. All we know is that since the lobster hatchery has been started in the neighbourhood of Pictou, a very large number of small lobsters are caught every year, and that is attributed largely to this lobster hatchery. We have no means of testing that definitely except by taking the opinion of fishermen along the coast.

Mr. FOSTER. Why are you extending the system?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Because the general opinion is that it has done good. We are establishing this one at Gaspé for salmon and lobster both.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) I call the attention of the minister to the fact that we had a salmon hatchery in Prince Edward Island at one time that did good service. Unfortunately, it was burnt down, and I trust the government will see its way to rebuilding it. It is situated in the riding I have the honour to represent, on an excellent location, on Dunk River. As it is the only one in Prince Edward Island, I trust the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will direct its reconstruction.

Mr. J. V. ELLIS (St. John). I think it is doubtful, indeed, if the lobster fisheries can be restored by means of hatcheries. I have no practical knowledge of the matter myself, but those who have, doubt very much if they can be restored by these means. I believe the time will come very soon when, if lobster fishing is to be retained at all, the country will have to face the question of suppressing the lobster fisheries for two or three years, taking, not the whole coast at once, probably, but a part of the coast at a time.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is a drastic measure.

Mr. ELLIS. But, I believe it is the only remedy to preserve the fisheries from extinction. I would not stop the fishing over the whole country at once, but over a portion of the coast.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Who do you propose to offer up as a sacrifice first?

Mr. ELLIS. I would begin with Prince Edward Island. But, I would be perfectly willing to follow geographical lines, and extend it over so many miles of country in successive years. The lobster is not a fish that travels a great distance on the coast, only from deep water into the shore, not laterally along the coast any great distance.

Mr. POWELL. Opinions differ about that.

Mr. ELLIS. I know they do. Yet, it is well understood that the lobster lives within not a large area. Now, if this fishery is valuable, and the country is earnest in desiring to retain the lobster fishery, it will have to undertake what the minister calls drastic measures. We are told in this portion of the country that the people are exceedingly honest and do not violate the law. The truth is that every lobster fisherman violates the law if he gets an opportunity when fish are plentiful. It is the most natural thing in the world for fishermen. The fishermen suffer a great deal by the drastic measures, to use the minister's own words, which are necessary to enforce those laws. At the same time, they will run any risks to catch the fish when they are there. The lobsters are disappearing, you cannot get a decent sized lobster at all now for ordinary use. While the minister is endeavouring to hatch out a few lobsters here and there, the fish in its natural state is caught before it is able to produce eggs at all.

Fisheries protection service $100,000

Mr. FOSTER. Were there any American fishermen down last year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, a list was given by Commander Spain, about 120 all told.

Mr. KAULBACH. Before the item passes, I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to one fact in connection with the mackerel fisheries. He is aware, I think, as well as the most of us who reside on the coast, that the paucity of fish in the waters on the shores of Nova Scotia, in Cape Breton, is occasioned largely by the methods that are employed in the catch of mackerel. Some years ago an arrangement was made between the Dominion government and the United States government with regard to the catch of fish of this description by purse-seines. In the maritime provinces, a large number of vessels were fitted out for that purpose, and fish were destroyed in great numbers. An arrangement was made, as I said, between the two governments, that that method should be abolished. Of late years the Americans have been adopting that method again, after the Canadians have dropped it. Now we find that in the spring of the year a fleet of vessels will pass from Cape Sable down along the eastern shore, past the ports of Lunenburg, Halifax and others, for the purpose of catching all the fish they can. A fleet of eighty or ninety vessels may be seen at one time, all fitted with purse-seines to bag the fish in any part of the ocean where they may be found outside the three-mile limit, and inside the three-mile limit, if there are no schooners or steamers in the patrol service to prevent them purse-seines when each tend to drive fish, and mackerel particularly, from the shores into deep water, and are lost to the shore fishermen entirely as they do not return. I think, in order to encourage that industry in a legal way, the government should approach the American government and make an arrangement similar to that which was in force in previous years, and prevent the capture of fish by the use of the purse-seine. I think it would be wisdom on their part to do so, and I urge very strongly that something should be done in that direction.

Building fishways and clearing rivers..... $1,000
Mr. McALISTER. What fishways are these?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are no special ones. From time to time applications are made to build fishways and the law provides that we shall contribute half the cost.

To pay persons employed in the Department of Marine and Fisheries for services in connection with the distribution of the fishing bounty, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act $5,000

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. These are custom-house officers.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) I suppose the bounties have been distributed for the past year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) The cheques have been sent out?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) They are now in the hands of the same parties as heretofore?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) This amount is to pay for the services of parties who have distributed the bounties?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This is for custom-house officers in connection with the distribution of the bounty.

Oyster culture $7,000

Mr. FOSTER. I think the minister had better not press that to-night.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We have discussed that all evening.

Mr. FOSTER. We want to have a little discussion over the next item.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Can you not carry all the items to the last one?

Mr. FOSTER. If we can talk upon all of them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well, leave the last one.

To assist in the establishment, maintenance and inspection of cold storage for bait for deep sea fishermen under conditions to be fixed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries $25,000

Mr. KAULBACH. Are you going to take up the $25,000 item?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. KAULBACH. May I ask the hon. minister as to how the money is disbursed in connection with the package of ice for cold storage for bait for the deep sea fisheries? What is the method for engaging in the packing of this ice? What amounts do the respective parties receive?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The organizations are formed, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kaulbach) will see by the circulars that we issued, one of which I hold in my hand, and which I will be happy to give him, by the local fishermen along the coast, and they contribute a proportion of the cost of the building. The building must be erected according to specifications and plans submitted by us, and on the inspection of our officers we contribute 50 per cent of the cost within a certain limit.

Mr. KAULBACH. What is the limit?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think $1,000.

Mr. KAULBACH. How many have been erected?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Five or six have been erected and others are in process of erection, but their completion has been postponed until next year.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the hon. minister is not going to press this matter to-night.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not wish to if the hon. gentleman wants it left over.

Mr. FOSTER. I want it left.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I can give all the information that you wish to know.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not every person in the House, and if it is necessary we will have to ask the quorum to stay if we want to do business, and if the hon. gentleman wants to stay all night, we will do so.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The whole matter will come up again.

Mr. FOSTER. The matter will come up again when we have about two days at our disposal.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have no desire to press it. The hon. gentleman has been very good to-night.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. gentleman is as consistent as a young lover. He is so consistent that he will not let go.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is that the way with a young lover? I have to take another vote in the supplementaries for this and if the hon. gentleman will let this go to-night it will facilitate matters. I want to get some night to myself. I have to come back here every night for this one thing, and it is rather hard. I have been good to the hon. gentleman myself in old times, and he might do it again.

Mr. FOSTER. We have been good to you to-night.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, May 25, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 169) to incorporate the Dominion of Canada Rifle Association.—(Mr. Borden, King's.)

BANK ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 163) to amend the Bank Act. He said: I do not imagine that there is any desire to discuss this Bill at the present stage, as I have intimated that it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. I move the second reading on that understanding.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

INSCRIBED STOCK OF CANADA IN THE UNITED KINGDOM.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 149) respecting inscribed stock of Canada in the United Kingdom. He said: This Bill has been submitted to the House in accordance with the intimation which I was able to give in the budget speech, when I stated that an understanding had been come to between Her Majesty's government and the government of Canada, for the promotion of legislation which, when enacted, would enable trustees in England to invest their moneys in the stocks of Canada. I am sure it is not necessary to say much as to the desirability of that privilege being given to trustees who may wish to put their money into Canadian securities. When a man has stocks, bonds or debentures to sell, or goods of any other kind, he is interested, of course, in having as many purchasers as possible. If a farmer brings his goods to a market town where there are a score of buyers, he expects the competition of those buyers to create a demand, which will assure a fair price. But, if he found that half of the buyers had been, by some local regulation, forbidden to buy, he would feel that his market was restricted. This is our position in relation to the investment of trust money in Canadian securities. A large number of the best buyers of stocks are practically prevented by the English law from investing in Canadian securities. When we need money for the purposes of our permanent works, we have to go to England to raise it; and, when we put out an issue of bonds, our desire is that we should have as many buyers as possible. The importance of securing this privilege for Canada was recognized many years ago, and very earnest efforts were made by the government of the day to obtain this privilege. Especially in the year 1888, an effort was made in that direction. We have the privilege under the Scottish trustee laws of having trustees purchase Canadian securities; but in England, where we find the greater volume of transactions of that nature, we are precluded by law from having trustees so invest their money. In the English Trustee Act, there is a provision that by order of the Supreme Court, such permission may be granted. In 1888, the Supreme Court took steps by virtue of that Act, to allow such privilege to colonial stocks, under certain conditions. The special condition they laid down was that it would only apply to a stock which, bearing 4 per cent., was quoted in the market at 105, or a stock at lower rate of interest, bearing a corresponding quotation. While the matter was in that position, a discussion occurred in the Imperial parliament which, apparently led the English court to withdraw its order. There was at that time a Bill before the Imperial parliament to amend the English Trustee Act, and a clause had been inserted in that Bill, no doubt as a result of earlier agitation, which would give this privilege to colonial stocks. When the Bill was before the House of Lords, it received the approval of Her Majesty's government, and was carried through the Upper House.

Subsequently, when it came to the House of Commons, it was referred to the Committee on Law, and it would appear that the government changed its views, because when the Bill came before the House, members of the government dissented from the Bill, and the clause was removed, thus denying a privilege which seemed at that time likely to be conferred, not only upon Canada, but upon the colonies generally. In consequence of that, no doubt, the colonies made a further effort to secure this recognition of colonial stocks. A deputation waited upon the Imperial authorities, and it was agreed between the representatives of the colonies and Her Majesty's government that a committee should be appointed to give special consideration to the subject. Later on, a committee was appointed in accordance with that understanding, a committee composed of representatives of the colonies, including the then High Commissioner for Canada, the present leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and also representatives of the English public service, and, if I mistake not, a representative of the Bank of England. They reported a draft Bill, which, if enacted, would have given the privilege to the colonies generally. However, difficulties arose, as will happen with regard to legislation on such an important matter, and the Bill did not become law. The agitation continued, because the desirability of the privilege was recognized on all hands. However, nothing appeared to be accomplished, though I am sure that every government, and every High Commissioner for Canada, did their utmost to that end. In 1899, however, we thought the opportunity favourable to revive the agitation to profit as much as possible by all that had gone before, and urge as strongly as we could our reasons in support of the change. We pointed out in a report of the Minister of Finance, confirmed by an order in council, the importance of the colonies, and also that the time seemed opportune for granting the privilege to the colonies generally—for we did not think we should press the case entirely from a purely Canadian standpoint.

Mr. FOSTER. Were these negotiations conducted in concert?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No. I have reference now to independent negotiations carried on in 1899 and since. The earlier negotiations were largely in concert with the other colonies, especially in the case that I have referred to, when the present leader of the opposition, then High Commissioner, was associated with representatives of other colonies in pressing the matter upon the Imperial government. In 1899, as I say, we deemed the opportunity favourable for bringing the matter before Her Majesty's government, urging, as the papers which have been laid on the Table, will show, that the privilege might be given to the colonies generally, and, at all events, we thought Canada could make out a very good case for the privilege, in view of the growing importance of this country, its unassailable credit and its strong financial position generally. That led to some confidential negotiations, which continued for some months, between the British Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Colonial Secretary, the Canadian Finance Minister, through the Canadian High Commissioner for Canada. The upshot of the matter will be found in a letter from Mr. Chamberlain to Lord Strathcona, the High Commissioner for Canada, written on February 15, this year. The letter is as follows:—

Colonial Office,
Downing Street, S.W.,
February 15, 1900.

My dear Lord Strathcona,—I have been in communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject of the admission of colonial securities as authorized trust investments, and I am glad to be able to inform you that a decision has been arrived at which will, I hope, be satisfactory to Canada.

As you are aware, the Chancellor proposed to take legal advice as to how far the proposals submitted by the Dominion government were sufficient to secure the objects which are aimed at, and this has now been received.

It is essential, of course, that the privilege should be confined to the securities of colonies adopting the Colonial Stock Act, but the adoption by the Dominion government of the Colonial Stock Act would not, the Chancellor is advised, wholly remove the difficulty so far as Canadian stocks are concerned. It would be necessary, in order to enable that Act to be applied to Canadian stock issued between 1877 and the present date, that Imperial legislation should be passed amending the Act, and providing that 'it shall not be necessary that any prospectus, notice, coupon, &c., or other document issued before the passing of the Act in relation to the stock should state the particulars required to be stated therein by section 19 of the Colonial Stock Act of 1877.'

The passing of this Act would secure the parliamentary sanction which, as you are aware, it has been felt, after what happened in 1899, ought to be given before colonial securities are admitted as trust investments.

Assuming that such an Act is passed, supplementary legislation would be required in Canada making specific provision for the inscription and transfer in a register kept in the United Kingdom of Canadian stock, so that the declaration required by the Act of 1877 may state the provision thus made in proper form; and Canada would further have to provide for the satisfaction of judgments of the English courts in the two ways, (a) and (b), offered in Mr. Fielding's confidential letter to you of June last.

It would be necessary that the Dominion government should officially undertake to do this before any legislation is introduced here, and that they should also formally place on record the views, unofficially expressed by Mr. Fielding, that any Canadian legislation which, in the opinion of the Imperial government, altered the provisions above required to the injury of the stockholders, or otherwise involved a departure from the original contract, would properly be disallowed by the Imperial government.

If the Dominion government will now make an official application and give the formal assurances required, the way will be cleared for the introduction of the necessary Imperial legislation.

I am, &c.,
(Sgd.) J. CHAMBERLAIN.

Thereupon, a further report was made by the Minister of Finance of Canada, upon which an order in council was founded, dated 22nd of March, 1900. It will be seen from Mr. Chamberlain's letter that he asked Canada to pass legislation in certain respects, legislation which is largely of a formal character, because what it asks we have practically already done. I quote now from the conclusion of the order in council in which we made the following recommendation:

As it has been intimated to the minister that it will be necessary before legislation is introduced in the Imperial parliament that the Canadian government should undertake to introduce in the Canadian parliament the legislation necessary on the part of Canada, and should give the formal assurance desired by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to disallowance by the Imperial government of future legislation as hereinbefore set forth, and as it has also been intimated that if the Dominion government will now make an official application and give the formal assurances required, the way will be cleared for the introduction of the new Imperial legislation, the minister, in view of the great advantage which will undoubtedly accrue to Canadian stocks in the English market if they are included in the authorized list of investments by trustees, recommends as follows:

1. That the Canadian parliament, during the present session of parliament, be asked to provide for the inscription and transfer of Canadian stock in a register to be kept in the United Kingdom, so that the same may be recorded under and become subject to the provisions of the Colonial Stock Act, and for the payment by the Minister of Finance and Receiver General out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada of any amounts which may be payable in respect of any such stocks under the properly certified judgment, decree, rule or order of the proper court in the United Kingdom.

2. That the Canadian government arrange with their present financial agents for the payment at all times of all such judgments, decrees, rules or orders of such court in the United Kingdom, and make similar arrangements with their successors in office if a change of agents should at any time be made; and

3. That the Canadian government concurs in the views expressed by the Minister of Finance, that any Canadian legislation which, in the opinion of the Imperial government, alters the provisions as above required to the injury of the stockholders, or otherwise involves a departure from the original contract in regard to any of the stock so inscribed, would properly be disallowed by the Imperial government.

The minister further recommends that Your Excellency be pleased to make application on behalf of the Canadian government for the admission of Canadian inscribed stock to the list of authorized trust investments, and for the introduction into the Imperial parliament by Her Majesty's government of the legislation necessary to remove any difficulties in the way of such admission.

What the Imperial government desired us to do had, to a large extent, been already done. In the year 1890, at a time when, as I have already explained, this matter was being urged upon the attention of Her Majesty's government, an order in council was passed in Canada by which we practically adopted the English method of inscribing, registering and transferring stock. That has already been done and is applied now to our stocks in England. In 1893 a further order in council in the same line was passed, when the change of financial agents took place. So far as this Bill is concerned its chief provisions, relating to the Colonial Stock Act of England are already in actual operation by the voluntary Act of Canada. It is the desire of Her Majesty's government that we should have these regulations made under a special statute. Therefore, we insert a clause in our Bill providing that we may pass such regulations in conformity with the English Colonial Stock Act.

Mr. FOSTER. And these regulations will fill the Bill?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We hope so. They were made in anticipation of our being able to secure the admission of our stocks, and were designed for that very purpose. The second point in which Her Majesty's government asked us to meet their views may seem to some, perhaps, unnecessary. It is that we should make provision by which Canada would respond to any judgment that might ever be obtained in an English court against the Dominion as respects these stocks. We can hardly anticipate any circumstances under which any English stockholder would be obliged to sue the Canadian government to recover either the principal or interest on this stock. Still, as a matter of business the provision is not unreasonable. We are asked to make provision that any judgment, order or rule of court in England made as respects these stocks should be recognized, and that we will respond to any order so made, and we are to arrange with our financial agents in London, the Bank of Montreal, that they will at all times agree to respond to any demand of that court which may be made upon us.

The only other point is one, not of legislation, but rather as to what I might call constitutional understanding. The power of Her Majesty's government to disallow any legislation which Canada might pass is, of course, beyond question. Still, it is a power that happily is not often exercised, and is not likely to be exercised often. Perhaps that is the reason why Her Majesty's government are not content to rest upon their abstract power in the matter, but ask that we should give the assurance that if at any time the parliament of Canada should pass any legislation which would seem to vary our contract as respects these stocks, that such legislation would be a proper subject of disallowance. I am sure we will all agree that if the parliament of Canada were to do anything so unreasonable as that, we could not expect our Act to be confirmed by Her Majesty's government. We, therefore, had no hesitation whatever in giving Mr. Chamberlain the assurance that if at any time such legislation were passed, we, on behalf of the Canadian people, admitted in advance that this would not be a legitimate subject for legislation on our part, and that such an Act might be properly disallowed by Her Majesty's government. Practically therefore, all we are asked to do by Her Majesty's government in this matter is not of great consequence, and much of it has already been done in a less formal way. I think that I have said enough to place the matter fairly before the House.

Mr. FOSTER. But the minister has not stated the conditions of the stocks.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There will be no conditions. It means that in any new stocks that we may issue in England we would issue them under the Colonial Inscribed Stock Act, which practically we are operating under to-day. There are no new conditions for the issue of stocks.

Mr. FOSTER. Is their no standard fixed?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No. At one time that question was raised, but in recent negotiations that point has not been raised at all. At one time it was thought necessary in order to secure the admission that there should be a standard to which I have already referred, and this was that it should be a stock which, bearing interest at 4 per cent, should be quoted on the Stock Exchange at not less than 105. That, at one time, was thought necessary, and it was inserted in the order of the court made in England in 1888, and it was contemplated by a clause inserted in the English Trustee Act, in 1888. But, I think it is because, since that time, the position of the colonies generally has improved, and the credit of Canada is unassailable, that that condition has not been insisted upon in the recent negotiations.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I should like to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), as I was not in the House when he rose, whether all the correspondence between the High Commissioner of Canada, from the inception of this subject, and the government, has been brought down?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The correspondence brought down refers to some confidential correspondence that took place during the interim, but all that is official, and, I think, all that is necessary, to show the whole matter, has already been laid on the Table of the House. I have only this moment learned that it is not printed. I assumed that it was.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should have liked that the House should have had the opportunity of perusing the printed copies of the correspondence before the hon. gentleman felt it necessary to move the second reading of the Bill. But this is a subject upon which there will be such a consensus of opinion in the House as to make that not so important as it otherwise might be. I can only say that this was a matter that was practically determined long ago as between Her Majesty's government and her colonies. What occurred was this: The great importance of having colonial stocks admitted to be in the position that trust funds could be invested in them was so apparent to all the colonies that the subject was taken up—I think it was in 1890—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Eighteen eighty-eight was the first.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The commission was in—?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Eighteen eighty-nine.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Eighteen eighty-nine. I, myself, acting in the capacity of High Commissioner, felt the subject to be of such great importance that I called together all the representatives of the self-governing colonies in London, and we made a communication to the colonial minister, asking for an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. At that time that position was occupied by the very distinguished gentleman who is now the First Lord of the Admiralty, Right Hon. Mr. Goschen, and after a number of interviews with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in which we obtained the aid and support of the Colonial Office, Her Majesty's government took a very decided and important step, appointing a departmental committee to deal with this question, as has been stated by the hon. Minister of Finance. On that committee the Treasury were represented, the Colonial Office was represented, and the Lord Chancellor was represented. The Bank of England was invited to send a gentleman to represent that great monetary institution, and the colonies were invited to elect three of their number to represent the colonies. The then Agent General of New Zealand, Sir Francis Dillon Bell, Sir Graham Berry, representing the colony of Victoria, in Australia, and myself had the honour of being selected as the three representatives of the colonies on the departmental commission. The commission held a number of meetings, and gave the subject the most careful consideration. As it will be remembered, as has been suggested by the hon. Minister of Finance, the credit of the colonies had not attained, at that time, the very high position which it has since attained. It was felt necessary by the Imperial government to have some mode of determining what colonial stocks should be in a position to have trust funds invested in them, and that there must be some criterion affecting the known value on the English money market of these various stocks. After a good deal of care and deliberation upon this question, we all agreed, on the part of Her Majesty's government, the Lord Chancellor, the Bank of England and the colonies, upon a plan, and we reported by a Bill. When the Bill was reported, I have no hesitation in saying, that as matters then stood it would have been submitted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Goschen, to parliament, and it would undoubtedly have become law, but, after that Bill was reported by the commission, and before the meeting of parliament, a very unfavourable condition of things exhibited itself in Australia. I may say Australasia, because New Zealand was similarly affected, and it was felt that in consequence of the very great change in the relative value of securities, especially in Australasia, it would be unwise to submit that Bill to parliament as accepted in fact by Her Majesty's government for the adoption of parliament, and for the passing of it into law. We felt that we were approaching parliament on a very important question at a very unfavourable crisis in colonial affairs. I may possibly be told: Well, Canada was not very materially affected by that; there was no change in the value of Canadian securities that would have prevented their coming within the scope of the Bill, and being available for the investment of trust funds, but, I may say frankly to the House, that having received the hearty co-operation and support of the representatives of the self-governing colonies in London, I felt that it would be invidious to press the Bill, so far as it related to the Dominion of Canada. I felt that I was acting in the best interests of Canada in not taking advantage of the position that we occupied at that time to press our interests, leaving in abeyance those of the Australasian colonies and of the gentlemen who so earnestly aided and co-operated with me in bringing about the adoption of the Bill. Under these circumstances, the matter was allowed to remain in abeyance, but Her Majesty's government and the representatives of the colonies felt that it was only a question of a short time until the financial position, the credit and the value of colonial securities assumed their normal position, and that the cloud of the commercial and financial depression which moved over the world at that time, from 1890 onwards, had passed, when we should press for the adoption of the Bill. I am very glad to know that that time has long since passed, that the only possible difficulty that stood in the way of carrying out the settled policy of the Imperial government, and as well as of the colonies, is a thing of the past, and that there is now no difficulty in the way of the adoption of that measure which undoubtedly will give additional value to the securities of the colonies which are made available for the investment of trustee funds.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT AMENDMENT.

The House again resolved itself in committee on (Bill 110) to amend the Weights and Measures Act.—(Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière.)

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). I wish to give to the committee some information which I have obtained recently concerning this Bill. It was introduced at the request of the Fruit-Growers' Association of Nova Scotia, who asked that the legal size of the standard apple barrel should be reduced to the same size as that legalized in New York State, and adopted by other northern states of the union. The Nova Scotia fruit-growers consider they labour under a grievance in this respect, because they cannot get for their larger barrel in the English market any higher price than their American competitors get for the smaller barrel.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman is meeting the wishes of the hon. gentleman from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) in this matter.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes, and the Fruit-Growers' Association of Nova Scotia.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, that is sufficient.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I wish to point out that the American barrel only holds ninety-six quarts, and the other day I stated to the House on the authority of the officers of my department, that our standard barrel holds 103 quarts. Since then I thought I would experiment so as to find exactly the size of our standard barrel, and to my great astonishment, I found that instead of it being 103 quarts, it is 112 quarts. The barrel which the Nova Scotia apple-growers are asking for would hold three Imperial bushels, while our legalized barrel holds three and a half bushels. I was asked by the hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), if I could say what was the capacity of a sugar barrel, and I had an experiment made with the greatest care, and I find that a sugar barrel holds 126 quarts, that is to say, thirty quarts more than the barrel advocated by the Nova Scotia fruit-growers. I find, however, that the apple-growers in the other provinces are not all of the same opinion as the apple-growers of Nova Scotia, and the question arises whether we should legislate in this matter for Nova Scotia alone. We have done that already in the Weights and Measures Act, particularly in regard to the province of Quebec, where they have old customs as to their measures, and we have provided that the contents of a bag of potatoes in Quebec shall be eighty pounds. Perhaps the committee will consent to make the ninety-six quart apple barrel, applicable to Nova Scotia, particularly so as it will be an experiment which may prove that the Nova Scotia people were justified in advocating to reduce the size of the apple barrel. I wrote to a number of fruit-growers in Quebec and Ontario for their opinions on this matter, and have received several replies. For instance, I have here a letter from a fruit-grower in Montreal, in which he says:

I agree with you in what you say. The apple-growers have been at a great disadvantage. Not only do we not get any more for our apples, but they carry better in the small barrel. A flour barrel is too large. One of the reasons that the Nova Scotia apples arrive in better condition than those from Ontario is the small barrel.

Here is another one from Montreal, written by a well-known horticulturist and apple-grower, Capt. Shepherd, in which he approves of the proposal to change the size of the barrel, and says:

Certainly the Canadians competing in the same English market should have the same sized barrel as a standard barrel.

Here is a letter against the proposal from one of the apple-growers of Montreal, in which he says:

We do not understand why your department asks to change the present size of the apple barrels. In our opinion, the barrel now in use is small enough. The only people to benefit by a change would be the manufacturers, railroad and steamship companies; certainly not the trade. The size of the Canadian apple barrel is well known, and in many instances, where the goods are equal, is given the preference on this account, when compared with the American apple barrel. We are certainly very much against any change being made.

I have some letters from Ontario. Here is one from Mr. Vanduzer:

I think that all apple barrels should be of the same size throughout the Dominion, and that size should be the same as those of another country or countries from which we get our strongest competition in the British market.

As the United States is our strongest competitor in the apple trade, our barrels should be of the same size as theirs. There is nothing gained by having them larger.

But there are others in Ontario who are not in favour of adopting the smaller barrel. Here is one from Mr. Henry, in which he says :

I would be very sorry if this were done, for I think it would be an injury, and no benefit. I have been an exporter of apples for many years. I understand the people of Nova Scotia argue that they export apples to the New England States, and get no more for them than they would if the barrels were smaller, which is ridiculous.

Here is a letter from Mr. Anderson, of Ontario, in which he speaks very strongly against reducing the size. Among other things, he says :

The state of New York, against the protestations of the American Apple Shippers' Association, passed the necessary legislation, making the 'pcny,' or 'stove-pipe,' the standard so far as New York State is concerned. To me that is no reason why we should follow in their steps. The barrel adopted and made the standard last session is all right, just the right size. They are just the right size for loading into cars, and the freight on them would be just the same as on a smaller package.

You can see that the question presents a good deal of difficulty, and it was complicated to a much greater degree by a letter I received three or four days ago from Nova Scotia, coming from Mr. Innes, who is the president of the Board of Trade of King's County, and one of the leading apple-growers in Nova Scotia. This letter explains to a certain degree the wish of the Nova Scotia people to have the size of the barrel properly fixed. It took me very much by surprise, and the moment I received it I wrote to Mr. Innes asking for a full explanation of something I never heard of before. He says :

The barrel prescribed by the Dominion legislation for apples has never been used in Nova Scotia.

This is something entirely new to me, and I dare say to the House generally. Mr. Innes continues :

We are using a barrel legislated for prior to confederation and supposed to hold about ninety-nine quarts.

I wrote at once and asked for explanation, but so far an answer has not been able to reach me yet. Now, before we go any further with the Bill, I would like to find out from hon. members if they are of opinion that the smaller barrel should be adopted for the whole Dominion, or that it should apply for the present only to Nova Scotia, in the expectation that by and by the result of this legislation would show whether it was right or not. Before getting the opinion of my hon. friends from the province of Ontario and Quebec on that point, I would like to reassure them by reading a proposed amendment to this Bill. It may be asked whether larger barrels will become illegal, or whether those who use them will be liable to be fined. I think this objection will be met by the following clause:

Barrels holding a larger or lesser quantity than above specified shall not be used for the sale of apples, unless such barrels are plainly marked on the outside thereof with the words, 'large barrel' or 'small barrel,' as the case may be, in letters not less than one inch in height.

This would provide for the difficulty that would certainly arise if the proposal of the Nova Scotia apple-growers should be adopted for the whole Dominion. When we limit the size of the barrel to ninety-six quarts, naturally it would upset completely all the arrangements made by the coopers and apple-growers in the other provinces; but, if we make this reservation, it is possible, I think, to avoid serious inconvenience. Before pressing the Bill, I think it is only fair that hon. members from Ontario and Quebec who take an interest in this question should speak from their experience and give their opinion whether they think the Bill ought to be limited to Nova Scotia, or whether under the circumstances they are willing with this reservation to adopt it for the whole Dominion.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). In the first place, I would just say this, that I would be opposed to a Bill that would be applicable only to Nova Scotia. If we want to deal with the barrel question at all, we want to deal with it as it will affect the whole of Canada. In my opinion, the apple-growers of this country will require to feed their apples to the hogs, between the Bill of the Minister of Agriculture in respect to inspection, and the Bill of the Minister of Inland Revenue in reference to the size of barrels in which they must pack their apples before they can sell them, defining exactly the measurement of the barrel between the heads. The poor farmer will not know what to do with his apples. I am not taking very much interest in this Bill, because I think it is uncalled for. But my hon. friends behind me who represent large apple-growing districts will have more to say upon it. I just rose for the purpose of reading a letter which I have just received from one of the largest tanners in Canada, asking me to draw the attention of the Minister of Inland Revenue to some important legislation which he should enact, and which he has promised to enact.

For some time past the farmers of Canada have been trying to get compulsory hide inspection made the law. The Hon. Mr. Joly promised great things, but he has failed to do anything except to appoint a chief inspector at a salary of $1,500 a year to look after the few hide inspectors who have been appointed, but it is not compulsory on any one to have his hides inspected, and the chief inspector has nothing to do, and does nothing, except draw his salary.

This is legislation that has been demanded for some years and which the hon. minister promised to bring down, but so far has not done so. Instead he is now introducing a Bill that, in my opinion, is going to affect the apple-growers of this country very prejudiciously and so will the Bill brought down by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, making it compulsory on apple-growers and packers to have their apples inspected for export. The Bill before us makes it compulsory on any one who puts up apples in barrels for sale, to put them in barrels of a certain size. The farmers at present take their apples to market in barrels with their heads open and sell them by the barrel, and this Bill will do away with that trade. If this government keeps on as they are doing, the farmers will have nothing to do but feed their apples to the hogs.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I could not expect my hon. friend to look with any kindness or favour on any Bill coming from this side, and it would be very foolish on my part to expect any help from him. In connection with the inspection of hides, if my hon. friend will do me the honour to call at my office to-morrow morning, I will show him the work that I have been doing in order to find out whether I would be justified or not in bringing down legislation in the direction of compulsory hide inspection.

Mr. TAYLOR. Why did you appoint an inspector at $1,500 a year?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. In order to watch over the inspectors we have now. In all the principal cities we have inspectors. I introduced a Bill once or twice, since I have been in charge of this department, providing for the compulsory inspection of hides, but I met with such strong opposition from both sides that I did not see fit to proceed with it. I wrote to England to find out whether our hides suffered in the English market through the lack of a compulsory inspection law here, and have received no information that they have.

On the one side we have the tanners asking for compulsory inspection and on the other side the dealers are against it. My hon. friend spoke of the poor farmer. The nearer we come to the elections, the poorer and poorer gets the farmer and the deeper the interest taken in him by hon. gentlemen opposite. My hon. friend can scarcely get up without speaking of the poor farmer.

Well. I have thousands of names of poor and wealthy farmers too, protesting against the compulsory inspection of hides, and the reasons they give are so strong that I do not know how to overcome them. They protest against the idea of being obliged, whenever they slaughter any cattle, to send for an inspector from town or to run to town and get the hides inspected before they can bring them to one of the country stations.

I am very sorry that the hon. member for Annapolis and some other members of Nova Scotia who take such a deep interest in the Bill now before the House are absent to-day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understand that my hon. friend has decided to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Annapolis and reduce the size of the apple barrel to that of the American barrel, which comes into competition with it in England.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have tried to make it as clear as possible that our present barrel contains half a bushel more than the American barrel, and I must throw myself on the mercy of the committee and find whether they approve of the section reducing the size of our barrel, with the reserve expressed in it. If they do not, I would like to try the experiment in Nova Scotia first, and if satisfactory there, apply it to the other provinces.

Mr. CLANCY. The Bill of the Minister of Agriculture, dealing with the inspection of apples, is limited to apples for export, but the hon. gentleman's Bill deals with apples both for home trade and export. If he would make his Bill agree with that of the hon. Minister of Agriculture by limiting it to apples for export, there would be no difficulty.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. My Bill was prepared before that of the Minister of Agriculture, and consequently I did not know that he intended only dealing with apples for export. I would like to know whether hon. members approve of limiting to Nova Scotia the provision as regards reducing the size of barrels.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend may take silence for consent. No one has raised any objection, and therefore he may take it for granted that everybody is satisfied with what he is doing.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I read a moment ago the correspondence of several growers in Quebec and Ontario, whose opinion, unfortunately, is so contradictory, that I thought it would be advisable to have some of the members from these provinces throw a little more light on the subject.

Mr. CLANCY. Other provinces are concerned as much as the province of Nova Scotia in not selling a larger barrel of apples than the Americans sell, and I approve of the Bill on that point. But the hon. minister does not seem to be satisfied with that, but has gone further. He tells us that this Bill was drawn before that of the Minister of Agriculture and without knowledge of what that Bill would contain. I would suggest to him to drop all that part of the Bill referring to any but the export trade. I have no doubt that should the other Bill become law, there would be no difficulty. But if he is dealing with any other than the export trade, some provision will have to be made about the minimum size of barrels, in order that a packer purchasing from a farmer shall not buy in larger barrels than for export. Provision should be made that the packer purchasing from the farmer may not take a larger barrel than that provided for export.

Mr. URIAH WILSON (Lennox). I have a letter here from an apple-grower in my riding who says that if the barrel is fixed at three bushels, and make that permanent so as not to be tinkering with it, it will be satisfactory. I am entirely opposed to legislation for particular provinces. Laws that we pass here should apply to the whole Dominion; we should not establish one standard barrel for Nova Scotia and another for Ontario, and so on.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have been much impressed by the remark made by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy). Evidently, if the smaller barrel is adopted, we shall need to provide for the case he mentions, so that when apples are purchased by the barrel they shall be purchased by the barrel of three bushels or ninety-six quarts.

Mr. CLANCY. And will the hon. minister consider the propriety of dealing only with the export trade? Otherwise his Bill must involve the disturbance of a custom, good or bad, that exists now. If he would drop all the provisions of the Bill excepting those relating to export, it would simplify the matter and there would be no difficulty in arriving at a reasonable solution of the whole thing. I have special reference to clause 18. I am not discussing the subsection, which we can discuss later on.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Though I agree with the idea of applying it only to the export trade. I know that there is a good deal of uncertainty with the members of this House whether it should be applied to the export trade or to the sale of apples in general. My hon. friend will readily understand that, under the circumstances, I am obliged to wait for an opportunity to consult my friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) to find exactly what stand he is going to take upon the question, to learn whether he is going to limit his Bill to export, in which case I would limit mine the same way. Therefore, I move that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

To assist in the establishment, maintenance and inspection of cold storage for bait for deep sea fishermen, under conditions to be fixed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries $25,000

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Last year the House, without exception, was good enough to vote $35,000 for this experimental purpose, and it is natural that the House should expect from me a full statement of what we have done in the matter since this vote was granted. The first thing that was done was to consult with Professor Robertson as to the manner in which he brought into operation the different factories for the manufacture of cheese and butter, and the manner in which he laid before the people the necessity and advantages of these factories, with the idea of more or less following in the same lines or in as much of the lines as commended themselves to our judgment. Doctor Kendall had taken a great interest in the construction of these bait freezers, and I requested him to come to Ottawa and consult with us about the investment of this $35,000 in the construction of bait freezers throughout the maritime provinces. He did so, and at my request he entered upon the work and lectured at a great many places in Nova Scotia to the fishermen, placing before them the advantages of constructing these cold bait freezers. He had the advantage of many consultations with Professor Robertson, and after going over the manner in which Professor Robertson so successfully carried out the construction of the cheese factories in co-operation with the farmers, he proceeded to prepare, in conjunction with Professor Robertson, pamphlets giving information to the fishermen as to how they should form themselves into organizations, as to what the cost of these different bait freezers would be, the modus operandi by which they could be brought into existence, and the terms and conditions under which the government would be willing to assist them.

Sir HENRI JOLY DE LOTBINIERE.

He then visited the different fishing stations along the coast, advertising himself ahead, and calling meetings and addressing the fishermen. The results were not altogether unsatisfactory, and this year we are enabled to state that in many places throughout Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island chiefly—for we have not yet reached New Brunswick and Quebec—the initial steps have been taken for the construction of these bait freezers. Two bait freezers have already been completed and put into operation, one at Ballantyne's Cove, Antigonish County, N.S., with a capacity of fifteen tons, and one at Frog Pond, in Prince County, P.E.I., with a capacity of fifteen tons.

Mr. KAULBACH. That is very small.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Of course, the hon. gentleman sees that the tonnage capacity would depend altogether upon the extent of the settlement and how much bait they will require. These bait freezers are different altogether in size. There are three different classes of bait freezers; the small one of about fifteen tons, a larger one of about twenty-five tons, and a very large one of about 100 tons. Besides these two that I have mentioned, another one at Alberton, P.E.I., on the north coast, will be ready for operation on the 10th of June.

Mr. CLANCY. What is the capacity of the last one you speak of?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Twenty tons. Then we have completed a building at Gabarouse, which is almost ready for taking in bait. But some little difficulty has arisen between the engineer of the department down there and the company of fishermen who built the Gabarouse structure, with reference to the accounts, and the department will not, until it receives a certificate from Mr. Fraser, the engineer there, assume their share of the liability for the construction of this building. This is a large one, of the capacity of 100 tons, and is to cost in the neighbourhood of $1,800. By the scheme which we laid before the fishermen and by the terms of the offer we made, we would be liable for 50 per cent, or $900. I have received a report from Mr. Fraser intimating that he is not yet able to certify the accounts for the factory to enable them to draw the 50 per cent which the government propose to pay.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the nature of the difficulty?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I could not tell exactly, it is with respect to the accounts. I sent Mr. Fraser, one of the assistant engineers of the department, down with instructions to superintend and watch closely the construction of these different factories, and to see, inasmuch as we were to pay 50 per cent of the cost, that proper accounts were rendered of the material and labour used in the construction of these buildings, and to certify these accounts so that we would have every assurance that business arrangements would be conducted in a proper way, and that we would not be made to pay a greater amount than we should be obliged to pay, that is, 50 per cent of the actual cost, not the assumed cost. There is some little difficulty about the accounts, for the material supplied for that building. He has not been able to certify, and therefore, we have not paid any of the accounts. Then, there is a building partially constructed at Whitehead, Guysborough County. That is one of fifteen tons.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the cost of a 15-ton building?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The actual cost, of course, is not known. But the estimated cost of a 15-ton one will be about $700.

Mr. FOSTER. You will pay half?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Who owns it?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It belongs to the association.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is that?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. An association of fishermen formed under the terms of a local statute. A local statute is passed in the different provinces enabling fishermen to form incorporated associations. They take stock in these associations, and as soon as a new association is legally formed they apply for assistance from the government. They have to submit their papers to Dr. Kendall, who is acting for the department, and as soon as he is satisfied that a legal association is formed, and that the members are prepared to put in their share of material and labour, he submits the plans that we prepare for them and provides a superintendent to superintend the construction, the building proceeds, and the engineer, Mr. Fraser, certifies the accounts for labour and material in order that we may contribute our proportion.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the hon. gentleman tell me in what year these local statutes were passed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have one of the statutes in my hands. It was passed the year before last, I think. It is called 'An Act to incorporate fishermen's bait associations.' It does not say the year on the face of it, but I think it was the year before last.

Mr. FOSTER. Being for the province ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are these statutes in the provinces to encourage these associations for building bait-freezers.

Mr. FOSTER. Cannot these associations be formed unless under these provincial statutes, or do you not form such associations ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We have not so far. I do not see very well how a corporation could be called into existence unless in this way. We do not allow mere partnerships between man and man to entitle people to the grant.

Mr. FOSTER. So that it is only effective when the provinces have given the power ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Do I understand it that none of these people in any association can get this help except by the recommendation of Dr. Kendall in Nova Scotia ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. Dr. Kendall goes to different localities and incites people to take action towards the formation of these associations. He endeavours to get the people to form an association, and after the formation of the association, and after determining the size of the building, the association proceeds to get their material. After they have ordered their material, he consults Mr. Fraser, the chief civil engineer, as to the stage he has arrived at, whether it is necessary for Mr. Fraser to go there to begin to superintend the construction. If he finds that that stage has been reached, he goes there and places a superintendent in charge to superintend the construction of the building for the people. Then, Mr. Fraser examines the accounts carefully, certifies to them, and we pay our proportion of the cost of the building.

Mr. FOSTER. Who directs the primary movements of Dr. Kendall ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He received his general instructions from the department here.

Mr. FOSTER. To go to what places ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. To places all along the coast of Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, before starting for Quebec. I was just giving the committee information of what we had completed, what bait-freezers are in course of construction, and what associations are being formed and intend to construct these buildings. In Drumhead, Guysborough

County, there is an association being formed, and a bait-freezer of the capacity of ten tons, to cost about $500 is being erected. At Clark's Harbour and Lockeport, in Shelburne County, buildings are being erected, one at the former place of twenty-five tons, and one at the latter place of twenty tons. In Prince Edward Island, bait-freezers are being erected at Tignish, Prince County, ten tons; Souris, Queen's County, forty tons; and Murray Harbour, King's County, forty tons. The organizations for freezers at Miminegash and Rustico are not yet completed. The following places, where the system has been explained to the fishermen, have so far not yet taken advantage of the project: Larry's River, Guysborough County, N.S.; Malpeque, Prince County, P.E.I.; New London, Queen's County, P.E.I.; Morrell, King's County, P.E.I. In addition to the foregoing, associations will be formed and freezers erected at nearly all the following places: Magdalen Islands: Amherst Island, House Harbour, Etang du Nord, and Grand Entry, Nova Scotia: Big Lorraine, Main-à-Dieu, Mingan, Port Morien, Little Bras d'Or, Ingonish, St. Ann's, Neil's Harbour, White Point, Cheticamp, Margaree Harbour, Port Hood, Arichat, L'Ardoise, Pictou Island, Malignant Cove, Beckerton, Prospect, Herring Cove, Portuguese Cove, Lunenburg Harbour, Port Medway, Liverpool, Shelburne's Beach, Wood's Harbour, Shag Harbour, Pubnico, Yarmouth, Digby and St. Mary's. These freezers will vary in capacity, mostly from fifteen tons to thirty tons. The only large one that an association has been formed to erect is at Gabarouse, which has a capacity of 100 tons.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the after-history of this ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Two have been completed, and we have contributed our share.

Mr. FOSTER. In what way will the movement go on? Will we get anything back ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, this is an absolute gift of 50 per cent, and then, for the next three years we agree to pay a bonus of $5 per ton on all the bait which they store. We agree to do this for three years from the inception, following on the lines which Prof. Robertson adopted in the construction and in the bringing into operation of the cheese factories.

Mr. FOSTER. What guarantee is there, after the bonus has been given and the association formed, for continued work ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We have no absolute guarantee except the self-interest of the people, from the fact that they put as much into the original construction as the government. For every dollar that we put in they put in a similar dollar, and when they have put in $500. or $600. they have an interest in continuing it. It is their interest and for their benefit and their benefit only. Hon. gentlemen who are acquainted with the fisheries do not need any explanation of this scheme. But, hon. members from inland parts do not know and ought to know its object. At certain seasons bait is a superfluity, and at other seasons it is scarce. The object is to put bait up and freeze it so that there will be a continuous supply of bait all the year round.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there no limit fixed by the department as to the number of persons or geographical sections?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, the only limit is the amount of money voted by parliament. Of course, we could not go beyond the $25,000. We have put in one-quarter of the amount this year.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it not open to an objection of this kind? If the hon. minister is going to take this policy up, I suppose he means it to be largely instructive, and that he will show by actual operation, as well as by help, that the system of bait-freezing is an economical and worthy one for the fisherfolk. If that be so, why should he confine its operation to one section of the country? Why does he not use his money to open several of these experimental freezing-stations in every section of the fishing country?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We intend to do that.

Mr. FOSTER. The minister seems to be devoting all this money to a very small, but no doubt deserving section. I should think he ought to put some of those experimental bait freezers in the fishery districts of all the provinces. I presume the idea is to get the people to see the benefit of these stations, and that this vote is to help them in the initial endeavour, as was done with dairy work in Prince Edward Island. It will not be a permanent charge upon the revenue.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly not.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is Dr. Kendall?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The circumstances in British Columbia and the Great Lakes as they have been represented to me, do not call for the establishment of these freezers at all. I have not heard of any scarcity of bait in these places. Along the coast of Nova Scotia and Cape Breton particularly, and to some extent in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, the scarcity of bait was so much felt that at one or two points private establishments were started. The fishermen themselves are not a wealthy class as a rule, and it was thought wise to educate them as to the manner in which they could procure a constant supply of bait for their precarious avocation, and to do it in a way that would be less onerous to them by giving them slight government assistance. We thought we did well in starting these freezers where there was greatest necessity for them. If this proves a success it may be extended, but we thought it well to commence with the places where the necessities were greatest.

Mr. CLANCY. Has the minister based this upon the plan of the assistance given to creameries in the North-west?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Very largely, but we do not contemplate any repayment. We think that if the building was to cost $1,000, and if the fishermen put in one $500 in labour and material, the government would be justified in giving the other $500. That policy was approved of by the House last session when the vote was asked for, and I am now giving the House details of the expenditure and the measures to provide that only a proper expenditure should take place.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is Dr. Kendall, and what are his duties?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Dr. Kendall is the man who was first responsible for initiating this work. He obtained from the provincial legislature of Nova Scotia a resolution favouring it; and he came here and pressed it upon the attention of myself and my colleagues. From the very great interest he had taken in it, I thought perhaps he was the best man to be appointed to instruct the fishermen upon the subject, the same as Prof. Robertson was selected to instruct the farmers on the subject of creameries.

Mr. FOSTER. Prof. Robertson was a specialist.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And Dr. Kendall has given great attention to this subject.

Mr. FOSTER. How much do you pay him?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We pay him on a basis that if he were engaged all the year round, would amount to about $1,600, but he is not paid during the session of the Nova Scotia legislature.

Mr. FOSTER. Why?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He is a member of the Nova Scotia legislature.

Mr. FOSTER. Is he a Conservative or Liberal?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think he is accused in his own country of being a Conservative.

Mr. FOSTER. I should not think so.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Your hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) beside you will recollect that Dr. Kendall ran a contest against him in Cape Breton County.

Mr. FOSTER. It is getting interesting now.

Mr. ANGUS McLENNAN (Inverness). I call the attention of the minister to the fact that I think every member on this side of the House from the maritime provinces called upon him on a certain occasion to advocate this plan for the establishment of bait freezers all over the maritime provinces. Judging from the remarks of the minister the inference would be drawn that Dr. Kendall was the only one instrumental in getting this grant from parliament. I must really take exception to that statement of the case, as a member of this House representing one of the counties most interested in this matter.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McLennan) misunderstood me, if he thinks I was ascribing the entire credit to Dr. Kendall. What I said was: That the initiative was taken by Dr. Kendall who first brought the matter to my attention. Afterwards I was waited upon by most of the maritime province members in the House, amongst them my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan) who pressed me to adopt the suggestion.

Mr. ALEX. MARTIN (P.E.I.) My hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) will remember that I asked a question about this matter in 1899, and the reply then made me by the minister was that the government had not given it very much consideration. I think I deserve a share of the laurels if they are being distributed. But I rise only to ask the minister to give us a detailed statement of the expenditure up to the present time. How much has been paid for salaries and expenses, and how much has been actually invested in these bait freezers up to the present date. I notice that for this large vote of $25,000, there are only two freezers in actual operation, capable of only holding thirty tons of bait. That is a very small result for such a large expenditure. The minister announced the places where he was going to put those establishments in Prince Edward Island, but he appears to have overlooked Rustico where there is more fishing done than perhaps in any other locality. Will the minister tell me why no progress has been made in the establishment of a freezer at Murray Harbour? I understand that at Murray Harbour the people were anxious to co-operate with the government and carry out the proposal of the minister; but so far nothing has been done there. The minister has told us that a 100-ton freezer would cost only $1,800, and a fifteen-ton freezer would cost $700.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The increased size does not necessarily mean a proportionately increased cost.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like the minister to give us his reason why no progress has been made with the freezer at Murray Harbour.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Progress has been made, but they were not able to agree upon a site. The officers of the department have visited Murray Harbour. I think, twice, and an association has been formed there, and the initial steps taken; but they could not do anything further until they agreed upon a site. When this is done, we shall be happy to assist them in every possible way.

Mr. MARTIN. Who has been engaged in this business, besides Dr. Kendall?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Fraser, the assistant engineer of the department.

Mr. MARTIN. Not Mr. McFarlane?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He is the carpenter, who superintends the construction.

Mr. MARTIN. I understood that the difficulty at Murray Harbour was to find lumber.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Possibly, but the report made to me was that the main difficulty in the way was to agree about the site. A good many associations were unable to build last year owing to the difficulty of getting lumber. A good many of them will build this year.

Mr. MARTIN. How about Rustico?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Rustico was one of the first places visited in Prince Edward Island, but an association was not formed there, I am not able to tell my hon. friend why. At New London and Malpeque, the people were not favourable to going into the scheme.

Mr. MARTIN. Can the hon. minister tell us about the expenditure?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. McFarlane has been paid for salary and expenses $1,080.90. He is a very excellent man whom we obtained from Prof. Robertson, having had a good deal of experience in the construction of similar factories. Mr. Fraser, civil engineer, has been paid $1,411. There has been paid out towards the cost of construction: Freight on waterproof insulating paper, $118.94; to Mr.

Lord, agent of the Marine Department, Charlottetown, freight on material, $36.25; carpenters' wages and expenses, $316.88; insulating paper, $2,146.16; galvanized iron, $463.62; lumber and shingles, $389.78; cartage, $124.26; blue prints of the plans of the different bait freezers, $84.66; door fasteners, $57; jute bags, $3.30; printing and stationery, $53.70; making a total of $6,286.47. Paid to Dr. A. Kendall, $1,311.83.

Mr. MARTIN. What is the date of Dr. Kendall's employment?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He entered on his work on May 25, 1899.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Can the minister tell us exactly what Dr. Kendall's duties are?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I thought I explained that his duties are to visit the settlements around the coast and lecture to the fishermen on the importance of these bait-freezers, the cost of construction, and the modus operandi by which they could obtain them, assist the fishermen in forming these associations, and circulate the literature necessary to enable them thoroughly to understand the matter.

Mr. FOSTER. How does he circulate that?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He takes it with him, and reads it over to the people and explains it. His duties are: First, to take steps necessary to start the people in the work; secondly, to instruct them as to the practical way in which the work can be carried on; and thirdly, to advise them as to the character of the freezer they should have. He has had a good deal of experience during the past two years in experimenting in freezing these fish.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman speaks of practical work. Does he mean the construction of these freezers?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The practical work of forming the associations. The practical work of constructing the freezers is done under the superintendence of Mr. McFarlane, the carpenter.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). As I understand, Dr. Kendall's duty has been to go around the country, and lecture with regard to the formation of bait associations. As a matter of fact, the Act under which these bait associations have been formed, was passed only two months ago. He could not be lecturing on the formation of a bait association ten months before the statute providing for it was passed. There is another thing I would like to inquire into, and that is whether or not there is a provision in this Act with regard to the raising of capital and how it must be paid.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We have nothing very much to do with that. As long as a legal body is formed and our officers are satisfied that the actual amount of money has been put into the building by the association, the internal arrangements do not very much concern us.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). They would to this extent. The Act prescribes that the capital must be subscribed, and the association would be entirely unauthorized unless it was subscribed. In the first place, let me say that I am informed that Dr. Kendall conceives it to be part of his duty to give some instructions to the fishermen with regard to their political views.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I hope not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I hope that is not done at the expense of the country. If done at all, it should be done at the expense of my hon. friends opposite. I am informed also that Dr. Kendall is telling the fishermen this: If you will subscribe for a certain amount in this particular association, you need not pay in any money at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am afraid my hon. friend's information is inaccurate.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I will tell the hon. minister what I understand to be Dr. Kendall's instructions to the fishermen: You need not pay in any money on your subscription, but you will do work on this building and pay for your stock in that way. But the work on a building of that kind is of a kind that requires skilled workmen. It is a very excellent thing to employ the fishermen, if they can do the work, but the criticism is a fair one, and the hon. minister should look into it. Then, the Act requires that whatever is subscribed should be paid up in money; and the difficulty would be, in the case of any arrangement such as I am told Dr. Kendall is proposing, that if any one of these associations should get into difficulties, you will find that these people, who imagined they had paid up for stock in work, will be sued by the liquidator of the company or some creditor and made to pay up in cash the amount they subscribed. There need be no difficulty in giving out the work to the shareholders, but under the Act they must pay in money for any stock they subscribe, in order to make the association valid. After that is done, it is perfectly competent for the association to employ a shareholder as well as anybody else on the work of construction. But you cannot, under the Act, go to the fishermen and say: You need not pay up any money, but you can subscribe for the stock and pay for your subscription in work. Any scheme of that kind will lead to trouble in the future.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I shall make inquiry to ascertain whether any such declaration was made. The statute requires the shareholders to pay in a certain amount of the stock for which they subscribe, and they must comply strictly with the requirements. Of course, there is nothing to prevent the association employing its own shareholders on the work and paying them for it. I shall make inquiries as to what the hon. gentleman said. I think he has been misled to some extent.

Mr. FOSTER. When does the department pay over that money? Suppose an association is formed and has paid or alleged to have paid $500, when and under what conditions is the $500 paid by the government?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is one of the reasons I sent Mr. Fraser, the chief engineer, there. He visits the places from time to time, watching the construction of the buildings generally—

Mr. FOSTER. To come to it more directly, who erects the buildings?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The associations.

Mr. FOSTER. What does Mr. McFarlane do?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He acts as foreman.

Mr. FOSTER. Under whose pay?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Under the pay of this government. He directs how the buildings shall be constructed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. His pay is not part of the 50 per cent?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No; we provide an inspector to go from place to place and direct them how the building is to be put up.

Mr. FOSTER. He is more than an inspector?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He is foreman of works.

Mr. FOSTER. He constructs the buildings?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He directs their construction—yes. And Mr. Fraser visits the building from time to time, examines the amount of material bought by the association and the accounts for that material, and satisfies himself that the material is on the ground and had been used in the construction of the buildings. And when the building is finished, he certifies to the fact. And only then we pay.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Mr. FOSTER. Does the department take any steps to satisfy itself that it is dealing with a legally constituted corporation?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We have in both the cases that have been dealt with so far.

Mr. FOSTER. What are the dates of the payments made?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have not the exact dates; they were within the last couple of months.

Mr. FOSTER. When were the associations formed to which this money was paid?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Just a short time before that, and completed, I suppose, after the Act came into operation.

Mr. FOSTER. How long were the buildings under construction?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I could not inform the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster).

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) know that they were legally formed associations when they commenced to build these buildings?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was so reported to me.

Mr. FOSTER. By whom?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. By the engineer, Mr. Fraser.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the engineer report on the legality of the associations? I thought he reported on the material that went into the work. Does Dr. Kendall have nothing to do with the reporting whether the company is legally formed or not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. minister does not know, in either of these instances, whether he has paid money for the benefit of associations that have complied with the conditions of the law?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. All the papers have been forwarded to the department and closely scrutinized. We have the subscription lists with the amount subscribed by each person—

Mr. FOSTER. And the amounts paid in?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The amounts alleged to have been paid in. I can only take the certificates as they are given to me. I do not assume, and I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) will not assume, that these people are engaged in a conspiracy. I have taken every reasonable precaution to see that the money's worth has been put in the building before we paid a dollar.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no question of conspiracy or imputation. If the statement of the hon. member (Mr. Borden, Halifax), is correct, there is great doubt whether these associations are legally formed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are two of them. They need not be legally formed until the building is completed.

Mr. FOSTER. They ought to be formed before the payments are made.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If they are formed legally when the building is completed, that is sufficient. I am satisfied on the certificates of Mr. Fraser that the money has gone into the buildings.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. minister thinks he knows that—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What more could I do to satisfy myself on that point?

Mr. FOSTER. There is an easy way by which he could be satisfied, I think. However, there is another question which I desire to put. I do not understand why these bills for paper and other materials were charged up to the government. Is that a part of the contribution of the government?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is part of the 50 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this bought by the government?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. FOSTER. But it was paid for by the government?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was bought by the association, and paid for by us.

Mr. TAYLOR. There is $2,146 worth.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There was an order given so as to have material for the different freezers—

Mr. FOSTER. How many?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know. There are two completed, and one nearly completed. Mr. Fraser satisfies himself, as the building goes along, that the material is provided and the work done, but he does not wait until the building is finished before he contributes a dollar. If he was satisfied that the material was on the spot to the value of four or five hundred dollars, he would not hesitate to give the government aid for say, several hundreds of dollars before the building was completed.

Mr. FOSTER. This order for paper would give about $700 for each of the three freezers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are a number of freezers in course of construction. That at Ballantyne's Cove is completed, and the ice is in. The one at Gabarouse is completed, but the ice is not in. There was great dearth of ice last year in the maritime provinces. The building is completed and ready for operation when they get the ice.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) was to have given us the amount of bait actually in store or frozen. He is probably under the impression he gave that, but I think he did not.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think I gave that. I said that according to the last advices there were four tons of frozen herrings in the storing room, and they were putting in more from day to day. They hoped to fill it to its entire capacity.

Mr. FOSTER. Has Dr. Kendall been employed by the government in any other capacity than this apostolic work?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, that is the only evangelical work that he has been engaged in.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the meaning of this item in the Auditor General's account: A. Kendall, Ottawa, expenses in connection with a trip to England?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That was in connection with the shipment of some lobsters which he undertook.

Mr. FOSTER. Has he any particular technical or skilled experience in the lobster business?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, he has devoted a great deal of his time to this particular subject, studying the question of transporting, in cold storage, lobsters and fish, and he has achieved a large amount of success in it. He went to different places where this freezing business has been carried on successfully in the North-west and in Chicago, and after he had done this at his own expense, he undertook to take a shipment of lobsters to London to see if they could be carried in cold storage successfully and placed upon the British market. I look upon it as one of the most important experiments in which he could be engaged, and if he had been successful, I do not know a greater boon that could be conferred upon the people than in opening up that market. He made a report, which I will be happy to bring down if required. We paid him $195 as a contribution towards his expenditure, the bulk and risk of which he bore himself. All we contributed was the small amount mentioned, money that we were well justified in paying, and which has borne good fruit. As a result of that experiment we are now considering carefully whether to put on cold storage cars for the carriage of our fresh fish from the coast back to the great cities of the west. That has been worked out, and we know now from the result of the experiments of Dr. Kendall the exact temperature at which this fish can be safely carried. Many details have been worked out by Dr. Kendall, not only in the experiments conducted by himself, but in some conducted in conjunction with Professor Robertson and under his direction.

Mr. WILSON. Were they a success?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not an absolute success, but sufficient information has been obtained to justify us in assuming it can be made thoroughly successful. I think before long we will reach a stage when we can say that we are not confined to the United States markets for the sale of our fresh lobsters, but we will have a market in England, and if we reach that stage there will be a magnificent opening for our lobster fisheries.

Mr. POWELL. How do they propose to take them across?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The lobsters will be boiled, of course. Dr. Kendall has ascertained the exact temperature at which the boiled lobsters can be transported to the London market.

Mr. POWELL. 212 Fahrenheit would fix that without any experiment from Dr. Kendall. I would like to know if there is any grave doubt as to whether cooked lobsters can be carried by means of cold storage. I should think that does not require an experiment.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would like to undertake a little speculation and see.

Mr. POWELL. A few years ago I understood that either Dr. Kendall or some other great scientist who had made a special study of this ichthyological subject, had solved the mystery of curing lobsters when canned so that they would never suffer from the blackness which was a great source of deterioration of the quality; and the minister announced to the House that the problem had been completely solved by the scientific knowledge of this gentleman.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I did not use that language.
 Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

age. I never used any language implying that Dr. McPhail's experiment was a success at all. I said he reported that he thought it was a success. Dr. McPhail was not appointed by me, but by my predecessor. He is an eminent scientist of McGill University. The hon. gentleman may sneer at his scientific abilities, but I think if he will inquire he will find that he is criticising without knowledge. The appointment was not made by me. When Dr. McPhail was appointed he went to the maritime provinces and spent the summer there, experimenting upon methods by which canned lobsters could be best preserved, and he thought he had discovered a means by which they could be thoroughly well preserved and kept free from this black taint. He came up here with the result of his experiments, and we paid him a certain amount, in compliance with the instructions that he had received, and the directions he had received from my predecessor. He published in a pamphlet the result of his experiments, giving instructions to all those who desired to know how he had achieved that result, and how boiled lobsters could be kept free from this black taint. I have reason to believe that to some extent his experiment was a success, but I never used any language indicating that it was a supreme success.

Mr. POWELL. So far as Dr. McPhail is concerned, I do not wish to reflect upon him in the slightest. I concede that his ichthyological knowledge is equal to that of Buffon or Cuvier, and that it even exceeds that of Agassiz. But the point I wish to direct attention to was the fact that the minister had advertised it as a great triumph of his department in aiding the lobster industry of the maritime provinces, and I am sorry to say that it has been an ignominious failure.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no foundation for that statement.

Mr. FOSTER. The total amount that was expended was $6,286, besides the items for Mr. McFarlane, Mr. Fraser and Dr. Kendall.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That sum includes everything except Dr. Kendall's salary, $1,311.83, and expenses, $902.66, to 30th April, 1900.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, will the hon. gentleman make a division between salaries and material?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The only salaries I read was Mr. McFarlane's, $416, and Dr. Kendall's, $1,311. Mr. Fraser is an officer of the department, he just charged his expenses.

Mr. FOSTER. That makes $3,500.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Did you put in $1,411 for the expenses of Mr. Fraser?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. How do you make up the $1,080?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. $416 for McFarlane's salary, and $664 for McFarlane's travelling expenses, making $1,080. J. F. Fraser, travelling expenses, $411.

Mr. FOSTER. That is $3,800 for travelling expenses and salaries out of the amount?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not heard the hon. minister make a satisfactory answer yet to the question put by the hon. senior member for Halifax, as to what Dr. Kendall's special qualifications are in this matter.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have no knowledge that he has any other qualifications than those that I have mentioned. He has, for the last three or four years, given a great deal of time to the consideration of this fishery question, and engaged in a great many scientific experiments in connection with it. He has studied the question of bait-freezers, gone to different places where they are in operation, studied and mastered their operation, satisfied himself of their advantages, and submitted the facts to the Nova Scotia legislature. The Nova Scotia legislature passed a strong resolution endorsing the scheme that he submitted, the construction of bait-freezers along the coast. That was in 1899. Then, Dr. Kendall spoke at a meeting here of the maritime provinces members, who were so impressed with the idea that they pressed its adoption upon me, and satisfied me that it was an excellent scheme. I submitted it to the House, and I satisfied the House, I think, that it was an excellent scheme. I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), criticised adversely, and we voted the money. I have no knowledge that Dr. Kendall has any other qualifications than his scientific knowledge, acquired from experience and the close study of the question for several years, perhaps more than any other man that I know of in the maritime provinces. I hope that his labours will not be continuous. The object that he was retained for, is largely achieved. I have read a list of twenty or thirty places where he has lectured, and begun the organization of these associations. He will not be continued longer in the work than is necessary.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is he in the present employ of the department while he is here in Ottawa?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, he is here for the purpose of reporting to, and discussing with the department.

Mr. TAYLOR. How long has he been here?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Two or three weeks, I think,

Mr. FOSTER. Is he here now?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He is.

Mr. FOSTER. He is not lecturing now?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, he is here in constant communication with the department.

Mr. FOSTER. What is he communicating to the department, now, particularly?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He is discussing the size of freezers.

Mr. FOSTER. Has not Dr. Kendall settled the matter of the size of freezers yet?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. FOSTER. He has built several.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, but that does not settle it.

Mr. FOSTER. And he has qualified himself so as to become a lecturer. He has been here two months.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, he has not been here two months—about three weeks.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I have no desire to depreciate Dr. Kendall, or his lectures, but I do not understand why he should be here two or three weeks, for the purpose of reporting respecting the lectures that he has delivered to the fishermen. The hon. gentleman said, in answer to a question, that Dr. Kendall devoted himself to lecturing to the fishermen, so as to enable them to meet and constitute themselves into bait associations. If there is anything in his lectures that could not be communicated in a letter of three or four pages, I would like to know what it is; instead of which we have Dr. Kendall in Ottawa for two or three weeks to report to the department in respect to his lectures. This is a state of affairs upon which the hon. gentleman ought to give the committee some more specific information, and he should tell us what Dr. Kendall is reporting. It is assumed that he is competent to give the fishermen instructions, and why he should require to come to Ottawa for two or three or four weeks at a time, for the purpose of reporting, is something that we do not understand. Cannot he condescend to use paper and pen, or has he to come personally to Ottawa to make his report orally?

Mr. FOSTER. Dr. Kendall's expenses are paid while he is here ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have no reason to see why they should not be, if he came on the purposes of his work.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Fraser is an engineer, is he not ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. And McFarlane is a master builder ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I believe him to be a very excellent one.

Mr. FOSTER. Has Dr. Kendall to consult two, three or four weeks with the minister, in order to instruct these men what size of freezers to build ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, what is he communicating to the minister ? What is the plan of campaign he is now discussing ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He is discussing as to whether he should go on with the work he is doing. Having submitted his report as to the different places he has visited, as to the interest he has evoked in the minds of the fishermen, as to the steps he has taken in these several places for the formation of associations to build bait-freezers, he is discussing as to where he shall go next, as to what he shall do next, as to what he shall do during the next two or three months, and as to whether he shall go on lecturing at other places or not.

Mr. FOSTER. How would a wire sent up to the minister, asking his opinion on those questions, do ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think it would be satisfactory. I think my hon. friend, if he had agents, would like to see them and discuss matters personally, face to face, with them. I have had a great many questions to ask him, and I want also to have some interviews with Prof. Robertson.

Mr. FOSTER. Is he going to wait until Prof. Robertson comes back ?

Mr. KAULBACH. What are the conditions of the contract between the government and the owners of these bait-freezers, what are the requirements of the owners of the bait-freezers, as to their continuing to use these freezers, and I would also like to know what quantity of bait is required for each ton of ice ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think I answered all these questions. The quantity of bait put up would depend upon the size of the freezer. It would depend entirely on the character of the bait-freezer which the people might determine to build.

Mr. FOSTER. The people determine that ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought it was Dr. Kendall.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The association determine what character of a freezer they will build, after having gathered all the information from Dr. Kendall that they require, and they may build one which will only require ten tons, or they may build one of twenty-five tons capacity.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That does not answer the question asked by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach), as to how the tonnage of ice and the tonnage of the bait compare. That is the question that, I think, the hon. member asked, and it is one in regard to which we would like to have some information.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman how the tonnage of the ice and the bait corresponds. I have not that information.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose the hon. minister could get that from Dr. Kendall ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If it is important, I suppose it could be got.

Mr. TAYLOR. The government undertake to pay one-half the cost. What is the limit that they might go to in putting up a building for this purpose ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no fixed limit. A building, say, of 100 tons capacity, would cost $1,800 or $2,000, and the government are prepared to pay 50 per cent of the actual cost of the building, and to contribute not more than $100 per year, for three years, towards the supply of the bait.

Mr. FOSTER. That will be twenty tons.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not to exceed $100; if they have a very large freezer they do not get beyond the $100.

Mr. TAYLOR. What is the cost of the two that have been completed ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Ballantyne Cove freezer cost $1,361, but I am informed by my officers that from the knowledge and experience gained the same freezer could be built now for $1,000.

Mr. TAYLOR. What county is that situated in ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is in Antigonish.

Mr. KAULBACH. The minister is aware that the county I represent has more tonnage employed in the deep sea fisheries than any other county in Nova Scotia. In fact, Lunenburg represents fully one-half of the fishing tonnage of the whole province, and the fishermen of that county consume about two-thirds of all the bait used in the deep sea fisheries. Why is it that a freezer has not been placed in that county—it is not because it has not been asked for.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There have been meetings held in several of the counties and the initial steps taken to establish freezers.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What is meant by a freezer ? Is it an icehouse ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no means of producing cold other than by the absolute presence of ice.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And the ice is so placed as to make it sufficiently cold to keep the bait frozen.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not quite understand the scheme which the minister is carrying out, because I have not the statute before me. Is it the idea, that the association shall buy bait and put it in these freezers and then sell it to the fishermen; or, is it the idea that the fishermen can get their own bait and put in the freezers to preserve it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The bait is procured by the fishermen themselves and the association sell to their own members at a certain rate. If they have a surplus they are permitted to sell to outsiders at a higher rate.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Then the association does buy bait ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They may if they like, but generally they get it from the members of the association. The regulations provide that the association shall freeze and store for shareholders who are actually engaged in fishing a quantity of bait up to 400 pounds for cash share held by a member if delivered at the cold storage. It provides that the association shall charge a rate not exceeding half a cent a pound for freezing and storing such bait, and it provides that if the shareholders do not provide such bait as shall be needed the directors may procure such quantity as is necessary.

Mr. TAYLOR. Where is the other completed freezer and what did it cost ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It cost $750 and is situated at Frog Pond, Prince Edward Island.

Mr. TAYLOR. What did the others that are nearly completed cost ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There was some question about the actual cost of the one at Gabarouse, Cape Breton County, which prevented the engineer from certifying. We have advanced money on some of the others, but not completed our share of the cost.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) Was there any advance on the Souris freezer ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Grant has given some of the paper used in the construction.

Mr. TAYLOR. The minister has paid out $1,055 to the two that are completed, and provided the other two are completed the advance would not exceed another thousand dollars. That would be a little over $2,000, and yet he reports an expenditure of $7,598, of which $3,802 has been paid in salaries. He has expended $3,796 over and above the salaries. Where has that money gone ? Last year the minister obtained this vote on the distinct pledge—a pledge renewed this year—that when each of these buildings was completed the government would pay half the cost. In the face of that pledge, we have here a waste of money which should not be allowed to continue. If Dr. Kendall has been here discussing this matter with the minister for weeks, as some of my friends say, it looks to me as if he is preparing bait for the general election, something on the line of the Brockville and West Huron business. The vote is not being administered according to the intention of parliament when it passed it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman must have understood from my statement to-day that when the engineer is satisfied that a certain amount of lumber is placed on the location by the association, he is authorized to assist them as the work goes along.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is right.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Therefore, he makes advances. If they have $400 or $500 worth of lumber on the ground, Mr. Fraser would be justified in giving them $200 worth of paper, taking care that he is within the 50 per cent limit. When the building is completed, he certifies the cost, and we pay whatever balance is due of the 50 per cent. If the hon. gentleman's plan were carried out, we would not advance a dollar until the whole building was completed—a proceeding well calculated to prevent the scheme ever going on. The hon. gentleman is not in sympathy with the scheme; coming from the interior he cannot know very much about it; but, it is of grave importance to the people of the maritime provinces, and the plan we have adopted is in the interest of the associations and of the public.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, I would like to inquire how many buildings have been erected to consume $2,146 worth of paper—I suppose ordinary tar paper? How much paper will be used in the construction of each of these buildings?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman a detail of that kind.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, did you authorize Mr. Fraser to buy the paper?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did, on Prof. Robertson's advice, authorize him to purchase a certain amount of paper in the United States, and deliver it to those associations as they require it, when he has satisfied himself that they have a certain amount of lumber and material on the spot.

Mr. DAVIN. Do I understand that the 50 per cent is a free gift?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. In that respect the arrangement differs from that in the North-west Territories?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 165) respecting the Montreal Bridge Company.—(Mr. McAlister.)

Bill (No. 164) respecting the Great Eastern Railway Company.—(Mr. McAlister.)

SUPPLY.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

To assist in the establishment, maintenance and inspection of cold storage for bait for deep-sea fishermen under conditions to be fixed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries..... $25,000

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). Before we took recess, the hon. minister undertook to read me a lecture. He said I was not in favour of this vote. I want to inform you, Mr. Chairman, that I am in favour of any vote of money that will assist the labouring men of Canada, whether fishermen or otherwise. When the hon. minister asked for this vote last session, there was no opposition from this side, because we accepted his statement. He did not take then all the credit to himself, because he said this matter had been brought to the attention of the late government in 1893, when some reports were made by Captain Gordon, who made an investigation into it, at the request of the then minister. He said, however, that at that date cold storage was still in the crude stage, but that today, when we have applied it to agricultural products, it can be more easily grappled with. Last year he said the intention was that the officials of the government should visit the different localities and see which were best suited for these establishments and talk the matter over with the fishermen. But he did not say he was going to appoint Dr. Kendall, who was one of his political supporters, and make a job for him out of this fund. I am informed that Dr. Kendall was here for two or three months continuously, except when in Toronto buying horses.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is wrong.

Mr. TAYLOR. I can furnish men who saw him here two months, and can prove it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is not true.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. minister stated that Dr. Kendall is under pay now, and was under pay while he was here two months, except when in Toronto buying horses. Last year he said that the government proposed to offer inducements to the fishermen to form themselves into these associations, and the intention was that the government should pay one-half the original cost of the buildings, and give a very small assistance for the purpose of running each factory, amounting to $50 per year. But before recess he said he wanted $100.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I said that the outside limit was $100.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. minister further said last year that after going into the matter with Professor Robertson, he concluded that the only mode of assisting the fishermen was in the direction he had indicated, and he was of the opinion that these buildings could be put up at a cost of from $500 to $600. The buildings were to be capable of holding ten tons of bait, and they were to be nine feet high, fifteen feet wide, and thirty feet long, and that Professor Robertson estimated the cost at from 15 to 20 cents per square foot, making an average of $500 to $600 each. But to day he tells us that one has been erected at a cost of $1,350. He said also last session that the inspector would submit plans, and that from time to time, as the buildings were being constructed, he would inspect them. And that if fifty freezers were erected, the government contribution would come to about $1,500. One member of each association would be appointed to receive the bait and another to deliver it. On that explanation, we voted him $25,000 last year, and he has spent up to date $7,598, and is asking for $25,000 more. Let him ask a sufficient amount to make up the $25,000, and there will be no opposition from this side. He appointed Dr. Kendall, a member of the local legislature, as inspector, and that gentleman has been going around doing campaign work, distributing campaign literature, buying up constituencies out of the money voted, and telling the fishermen that they could pay for the stock they took in the associations by their work. We find also that he has purchased paper to the amount of $2,146—enough paper to do all the fifty buildings. I know what the paper to line a building costs just as well as does the hon. minister. It would be either tarred paper or cardboard, and I presume it is tarred paper. My hon. friends opposite laugh. Well, if it is not tarred paper, it is the other kind.

An hon. MEMBER. To tar the fish.

Mr. TAYLOR. It could not tar the fish. All dwelling-houses in the north-west are lined with tar paper between the boards, and that paper would not give taste to the fish or the bait. All I want the hon. minister to do is to carry out the promise he made last year, when he said the government contribution would be $12,500 and $50 to each association, and then allow the officers of the department to look after this work and not employ political hacks who are using the money for the purpose of bribing constituencies. That is what Dr. Kendall is doing according to my information, and according to the information of the hon. member for Halifax. And he has been up here putting out jobs for the minister for the last two months. Now, I ask the hon. minister to reduce this vote to the amount that he has unexpended of the appropriation of last year. To vote $25,000 last year and $25,000 this year is unnecessary, and I certainly will oppose it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is nothing in the statement I made last year at all at variance with the statement I made this year. The price of the building I gave last year was about correct; but, after the officers had seen the different communities and consulted with them, they found it necessary to build larger buildings, and, of course, that meant larger expenditure. The one at Garbarouse is capable of holding 100 tons of bait, instead of fifteen or twenty tons, which was the quantity I estimated for last year. Of course, the cost of the building is enormously greater than that of such a building as I had estimated.

Mr. CLANCY. The minister has not kept faith.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, I have kept faith.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman got a vote last year on representation that a certain number of buildings of a certain size would be needed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. I said that the vote would cover fifty buildings at $500 each, but I did not say that fifty would be built. The House voted $25,000 for this laudable enterprise—and a more laudable or beneficial vote for the maritime provinces fisheries has never been given than this. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) thinks he is going to make political capital by reducing this vote, I feel confident he is mistaken, and his own friends will not support him in cutting down this vote. So far as Dr. Kendall's expenditure is concerned, the hon. gentleman knows that is not to be repeated. He has nearly covered the ground, having only a few more places at which to deliver his explanation, when his services may be dispensed with. The style of building has been chosen after the greatest care devoted to the designs by the civil engineer sent out by me, and after practical experiments made in consultation of Dr. Kendall and Prof. Robertson. We have had the assistance of the men who, so far as I knew, knew most about the matter. It would be absurd, of course, to have one style of buildings for large and small fishing communities. I do not see what the hon. gentleman hopes to gain by opposing this vote.

Mr. CLANCY. I am afraid the hon. minister is trying to dodge the question. He says this is a laudable vote. Nobody has said anything to the contrary. But the fact is, that he came last year and got a vote of $25,000 on the promise that a certain size of building would be erected. Now, I would like to ask him, as I suppose there must be some government policy, some scheme in this matter, how many buildings he proposes to pay half the cost of? I am not asking where they are to be located or any details, but merely how many he expects to assist. The style of answer the hon. gentleman gives is not a satisfactory answer. He told us last year that the buildings would cost so much, now he tells us that the buildings must be larger, and that more money will be required. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman if there is a limit to the assistance that is to be given. He stated last year that it would be limited to three years at $50 a year.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is for operating the bait factories after they are built.

Mr. CLANCY. But, I understood the hon. gentleman to say now that there was no fixed time.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I said that we proposed to assist in their operation for three years.

Mr. CLANCY. I am not disposed to say that it is not perfectly proper to grant this assistance. The hon. gentleman should not take the ground that everybody is opposing this measure and hoping to make political capital out of it simply because they want to understand it. The hon. gentleman would get on a great deal better with his vote if he simply explained it. No one wants to make political capital out of it. I do not wonder, however, that he is a little touchy, because the affair certainly looks a little fishy. Dr. Kendall came up and engineered up the whole thing, and it is stated he is doing a little missionary work.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I stated where we hoped to establish these bait factories, and also the number that were completed, and that we hope to have completed in a few weeks, and the places where we hoped to have them established within the next twelve months.

Mr. TAYLOR. How many in all?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are thirty-three places in which there are fair prospects of having bait-freezers established with the assistance of the government. There may be more, and I hope there will be.

Mr. CLANCY. I am sure that the country will expect some limit even in a good thing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot go further than to state that we are seeking to obtain $25,000 for next year and giving names of the places where we hope to establish these bait-freezers.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the hon. gentleman explain what these freezing houses are like, and what the system is. He may have stated this in reply to the leader of the opposition, but I did not catch it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is a large icehouse filled with ice, to be used during the season. Opening up from that icehouse is a bait-freezing room. Surrounding that there is a galvanized iron box, in which the ice is put, broken up and mixed with a certain proportion of salt. That effects the freezing. The bait is packed in barrels in the freezing room, and when frozen it is kept and sold and delivered as required. A constant process of freezing goes on as the bait is brought in by the fishermen.

Mr. TAYLOR. There is no machinery, simply the building. The government is not paying for putting in the ice?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. minister has named the two freezers that have been erected, two or three more that will soon be in operation, and others that he has hopes of—thirty-three all told.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are four more on the Magdalen Islands that I omitted. That is thirty-seven all told. And there may be others—I hope there will be—before the season is closed.

Mr. TAYLOR. There have been thirty-seven all told that he has any prospects of completing within the next year or two.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Proceedings are partially under way now. I must take the money for the next financial year.

Mr. TAYLOR. Even if these cost $1,000 each, that is twice the amount the hon. gentleman asked for last year. He can erect the whole thirty-seven for $18,500, and that will leave a surplus of $6,500 out of the $25,000.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is supposing we do not add another one. We will build more freezers if there are more associations formed. I hope we shall use up the whole $25,000.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think $25,000 is ample to complete forty of them, and leave $1,000 then for expenses for Dr. Kendall, and the hon. gentleman's other missionaries. The minister ought to be bound by his first statement that the building will only cost $500 or $600. But admitting they will cost $1,000, and that he completes all the places he has now begun, he has ample money voted last year to do the whole work.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman must not think that he is going to get this money without our understanding what it means. For instance, the hon. gentleman got this money last year on the distinct ministerial promise, that we used to think was a guarantee, that the policy would be carried out according to the promise of the minister, and he told us in so many words that this matter was to be carried out by his own officers, that is, that there was to be no extra cost with reference to it. He said moreover, that fifty of these freezers could be put into operation at an expense of $12,500. Well, the House accepted his explanations and gave him the vote. The very first thing he does is to make a place and pay for an altogether unnecessary officer in the person of a political partisan and adherent of his own. He takes a member of a provincial parliament, one of his own stripe of politics, one of the right hand men of his colleagues from Nova Scotia. I can remember when the right hon. gentleman who leads the government, and every Liberal leader said it was a very unnecessary and bad thing for the legislature here to link itself with the local legislatures, for the party here to link itself with partisans in the different provinces. The hon. gentleman is doing just exactly what he and his leader declared it was bad politics and corrupting to the public life of this country to do. After having last year declared to the whole House that his officers would carry out this work, he comes down this year and acknowledges an expenditure of $1,300 or $1,400 for Dr. Kendall, one of his own right hand men, given this salary to do everything in favour of the party interests. This is an alliance between the hon. gentleman who has the people's money to dispose of, and a member of a provincial parliament on his own side of politics. It is an alliance to strengthen the party here by the cord which he pulls upon the provincial government. What have the government done with regard to a member of the provincial parliament of Quebec? Why, Sir, a member of that parliament has been in the Yukon, paid for two years at a high salary by this government, and at the same time allowed to draw his salary at Quebec, even when he was not in attendance. The hon. gentleman and his colleagues are interfering in that way corruptly with the local legislature and spending for corrupt purpose the money which is given to them by the people to spend as stewards for the benefit of the country. The very immoral politics which they vehemently denounced until they got into office, are being put into effect with the public money of this country. Is dual representation the best thing? Is it right to take the money of this House and with it to fee a member of a local legislature? If you can do it in one case you can do it in all. Why does not the hon. gentleman go to work and employ every Grit member in the province of Prince Edward Island, or in the province of Nova Scotia, or in the province of New Brunswick? If he has the right to do it in one case he has the right to do it in another. The Pineau matter is another case. The hon. gentleman interfered in that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is keeping in Prince Edward Island to-day a moribund government in power by turning out one man who refused to follow the government, and by appointing another man who was elected after having been pledged in open convention, and against the efforts of the party in power, to oppose that party. By the arts which the hon. gentleman is employing they are trying to keep on their feet by a majority of one, the Speaker included, a government which everybody knows in Prince Edward Island ought to have been buried at least two years ago, by any straight course of politics. Now, Sir, this gentleman is no expert. He did not conceive this idea. The minister himself acknowledged that the representations were made in 1893, and have been made every year since 1893. Did Dr. Kendall first conceive the idea that bait preserved in this way would be a good thing in times of scarcity? Not at all. Other gentlemen have bait houses on the shores of Nova Scotia to-day, have had them for years, and are being interfered with to-day by this same action. But it is too late for the hon. gentleman to say that Dr. Kendall, out of his great brain, brought this idea, and that he deserves at least some employment because his idea was so novel, and has been put into practice. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has officials in all parts of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. They are just as clever men as Dr. Kendall, and certainly they are competent to take the printed literature which is for distribution and go amongst the fishermen and say: Would it not be a good thing for you to form an association? If you do, such and such a thing will be done. Are there any abstruse theories to be propounded in that? These fishery officers are not worth their salaries if they are not able to do that in the maritime provinces. They are able to do it, but hon. gentlemen wanted to pay a fat fee to a supporter of their own and to violate the principle of the Independence of Parliament Act against which they howled for years when they were in opposition and wanted to get into power. The corruptness, the badness, the immorality there was in a union between the party here and in the provinces was a theme of denunciation. The very same thing has been done in the case of a Quebec member. He may be an employee of the government to this day, and the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) knows that he suborned that man, took him away from his public duties in Quebec, from the place his constituents elected him to fill, paid him a large salary, put him into the Yukon, and kept him in the Yukon when he should have been doing his duties for his constituents? Why did he do this? For partisan purposes. If there is any principle in the independence of parliament it is just as good for the local legislature as for the Dominion legislature. Why was Dr. Kendall taken? What does Dr. Kendall do? He simply goes to a fishing community and says: Would it not be a good thing to form an association under a resolution which is to be brought in. That is what Dr. Kendall said first, because the Act was not brought in when he started out. It is not more than two or three months old. Dr. Kendall got the resolution through, Dr. Kendall got the ear of the ministers, Dr. Kendall got the money of the Dominion, and Dr. Kendall went on the anticipation that this resolution would become law. It is all for Dr. Kendall and all for the same partisan purpose. Will Dr. Kendall do one thing more than could be done by any intelligent fishery officer you have in Nova Scotia? You have intelligent fishery officers there. What does Dr. Kendall do? Build an icehouse? He does not know anything about it. The icehouse is built after consultation with Professor Prince, Professor Robertson; the measurements are made by your engineer and the work is supervised by your master carpenter. You would think that it was a Paris Exposition building that you wanted to build. What is it? Simply an icehouse—galvanized iron, paper sheeting, ice, sawdust and timber. Dr. Kendall has nothing to do with these. The sizes of your freezers are all made out by your proper officers. All that Dr. Kendall has to do is simply to go into a fishing community, talk with the people and ask them if they want to form an association. There are your fishery officers; they could do that. That is what you promised would be done last year, and that is what you have not carried out. You have put in a super-numerary and you have done that at the expense of what you used to call principle, which now counts for nothing. Dr. Kendall has been in Ottawa away from his duties for weeks and weeks. He has been here for what purpose. To make his report? What report is he making that he could not make if he were down there carrying on his duties? To discuss matters? What is he discussing? He is not discussing the size of the ice-houses. That is settled already. He is not discussing the quality of the galvanized iron, the width of the timbers; that is all decided by the engineer and the carpenter. What is he discussing? The places he is to go to? That does not require him to come here to discuss for two or three months. You promised that with $12,500 last year you would put up fifty freezers, and you got $25,000 and you have not put up fifty freezers. You have now two freezers constructed and thirty-seven in prospect. The thirty-seven that you have in prospect at $500 each, and they will not average that, might yet be overtaken by the vote of $25,000 that you have during this current year. Will the hon. minister get up and say that he has made arrangements to put up fifty ice-houses and thirty-seven more, making eighty-seven in all, and that he wants $25,000 more. If he would take off Dr. Kendall's salary, this useless, immoral expenditure, he could build two more and make it fifty-two. The minister must remember surely with some show of seriousness that he has not shown one shred of necessity for the employment of Dr. Kendall. The bait business is a good thing. I am not opposing, neither is any hon. member on this side of the House, a reasonable vote, reasonably applied for that purpose. The vote given last year, if carried, would have been reasonable, but the way in which it has been applied is not reasonable.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Dr. Kendall was selected for this work because he was the most competent man in the maritime provinces. He is a man, as I previously stated, who is well qualified to explain to the people the benefits they will derive from organizing themselves together and constructing these bait freezers. He has been eminently successful in his work. Two bait freezers are completed, four or five are nearly completed, thirty-seven are in process of construction, or the initial steps have been taken for their construction. We hope to have them constructed. Dr. Kendall's work is to go to the people and explain the benefits that they will derive from the construction of these freezers. Whether it was right or wrong for us to appoint Dr. Kendall instead of selecting some friend of hon. gentlemen opposite is a matter of controversy, but we do not generally select our opponents in a matter of this kind, but select men, who, from their experience and knowledge are most eminently fitted to discharge such duties. As regards the statement made by me last year, it is perfectly correct. I pointed out that freezers of a certain size, when we did not know whether the fishermen would be satisfied with that or not, could be built for a certain sum of money. Since then the fishermen want larger freezers and they have cost more. The cardinal principle of the policy which we adopted is that we should assist the fishermen in establishing bait freezers of the size that would be necessary to keep bait, and we agreed that we should contribute 50 per cent of the cost. The money that was voted last year for the present year will not all be spent this year. It will lapse. We propose to take a vote of $25,000 for next year, and if it is not expended it will lapse again. But we now propose to vote the money that will be necessary to carry out our promise to the fishermen, that wherever there is a bona fide building erected we will contribute a small sum towards its construction and for three years afterwards we will pay a small sum of money, in no case exceeding $100, for the purpose of assisting in its operation. This, I do not think, is too much. This is a matter which I think the committee will consider to be about fair and right, and it will result in enormous benefit to the people whom we propose shall be benefited by this expenditure.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not rise for the purpose of continuing this discussion as the ground has been pretty well covered, but, I had some communication with the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and I might speak of it in connection with this case, as it has to do with the bait question. It is in regard to a proposition made in various parts of the province of Nova Scotia to have fresh bait taken by trawl nets and keeping it in a harbour so that from time to time fishermen can obtain fresh bait, which, I believe, is better than frozen bait. There is some difficulty as far as the law is concerned, and I am not aware that it has been practically tested so as to show whether that could be done. When I communicated the reply of the minister, that it was contrary to law, the answer was that it was allowed in other places. What is really the position of that fresh bait question?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend's communication dealt with a technical matter, and I referred it to Prof. Prince, and he told me he intended to take the opinion of the different fishery officers throughout Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. He communicated with them, and I suppose he has not yet got their replies. I can promise the leader of the opposition that the matter will not be lost sight of. If during the session, later on, I can give him a reply, I shall be happy to do so.

Mr. CLANCY. What is the future policy of the government in respect to this matter? This may be a good thing, but we ought to know how far we are going to pledge the credit of the country in regard to it. Will the government continue the maintenance of these buildings at the end of three years? Whose property will they then become? Is the work being done by contract?—this is all information we should have.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. At the end of three years, the government aid will entirely cease; the buildings will become the property of the association, and the government will have no control over them. So far as I am able to speak for the future policy of the government, the idea is to make these freezers as universal as the necessities of the case require. The total value of our fisheries runs sometimes as high as $18,000,000 a year, and if we can largely increase that value, say by 25 or 50 per cent, I am sure no hon. gentleman will scruple to vote further to extend the policy. If the fishermen in Gaspé and New Brunswick decide to build similar freezers, there is no reason why they should not have the same aid as is now given in Nova Scotia. It may be that in future years the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy), will be called upon to vote another $25,000 in aid of this most meritorious work.

Mr. DAVIN. Has the minister considered the plan of getting the fishermen to pay this back, the same as in the case of the Northwest creameries?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was considered, and at my first consultation with Prof. Robertson, it presented itself to my mind. We came to the conclusion that there would be no hope of inducing the fishermen to enter into this scheme conjointly with the government, unless we were prepared to give them this aid. The fishermen, as a class, it must be remembered, are poor people, compared with the farmers.

Mr. DAVIN. What are the duties of Mr. Fraser?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He is the chief engineer, and he certifies to the character of the material that enters into the building, and he sees that the expenditure is bona fide, and that the building costs double the amount that we subscribe.

Mr. DAVIN. Why cannot Mr. Fraser do the kind of work that is done by Dr. Kendall?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is a different kind of work altogether. Going around among the fishermen, calling meetings, addressing them on the general subject, pointing out the desirability of forming these associations, that is a different thing altogether from the actual inspection of the buildings.

Mr. DAVIN. No one on this side of the House from the west, feels any disinclination to vote this money, and I am not going to say that it is not a perfectly proper thing to grant a subvention to people in the position of these fishermen, if their industry is likely to be recuperative. If the assistance that you give is calculated to extend their business to such an extent that their wealth is enhanced, and by consequence, the wealth of the country, it is a perfectly legitimate thing for the government to do. Although those of us from the west have nothing directly to do with the fishing industry, yet, we do not carp or cavil at this; but the minister cannot be surprised if this vote is criticised with a certain amount of doubt and distrust, because of the circumstances surrounding it. The minister has not made out a case to prove the necessity of employing Mr. Kendall. It seems to me that the construction of these freezing houses is a very simple matter, and that all that has been done by Mr. Kendall at considerable expense, could have been done by the machinery permanently at the control of the department. The minister, therefore, cannot be surprised if there has been a tendency to criticise the employment of Mr. Kendall, as being animated by political, rather than departmental considerations. We know what has taken place in the province in which the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies), is a leading figure in his party. We know very well that he has taken provincial and Dominion matters completely in his hands, and we know that Mr. Pineau has been controlled in all his movements by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is most unjust.

Mr. DAVIN. I have a letter here describing the way Mr. Pineau entered Charlotte-town.

Mr. FOSTER. The entry of the relief force to Mafeking, was nothing to it.

Mr. DAVIN. Here is how the letter describes it :

He was met here by Jack Whear—

A law student in the firm of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. FOSTER. It is coming home to him now.

Mr. DAVIN. The letter says :

He was met here by Jack Whear and taken to the Queen's. All the government met him at the hotel. He was introduced by McNutt and Richards. The scene was beyond description. An angry and prolonged hiss was heard so soon as he took the oath. Grit and Tory spectators hissed for all they were worth. The House was packed. His first vote was upon the appointment of the doorkeepers. He voted with them on two other motions. The whole Grit party is dumb—the best of them talk openly of the iniquity.

Why, so great has the talk been that the old Liberal element in the Island is in revolt against the tactics of the hon. gentleman. If that is the case, how can the hon. gentleman be surprised, in the face of what he has told us to-night about Dr. Kendall, at the criticisms which he has heard from these benches, and the suggestion that Dr. Kendall is employed, not for the behoof of these poor fishermen, but for the behoof of the poor Liberal party, which I grant you is in a very bankrupt condition at present. But look at it : a leading man like Mr. Wise abandons the party, and when he is reproached by a leader of the party in the local assembly, he challenges the leader to go back to their constituencies, and a solemn compact is made that they will do so. Mr. Wise carries out his part of the compact, but the other man breaks faith : and under these circumstances Mr. Wise thought he had a right to take his seat, and the result was the scandalous expulsion of a gentleman who had been made the victim of treachery. I want to read to the committee the letter of Mr. Wise, because it is very interesting.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But hardly germane to the question of the fisheries.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. DAVIN. It shows the methods by which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries works. Mr. Wise says :

In the meantime our affairs were becoming worse and worse; heavy taxes, large annual deficits, the debt mounting higher and higher, weakness and incompetency in the government, and dissatisfaction and disappointment among the people.

He put up with all this for a long time, and then he, a recent friend of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries he was impelled to action, which he thus describes :

I was forced to the conclusion that I was supporting a pack of political thieves, devoid of honour and principle, whose conduct was only actuated by the basest and most sordid motives, and so I gradually and reluctantly came to the conclusion that I must come out from among them. Reluctantly—yes. I had loyally supported the party all my life, and there is no one who has had to do with politics but understands how strong party ties are. But, knowing and feeling that these men were utterly incompetent, and that they were only holding on to power to promote their own selfish aims, I was overpowered with the conviction that the sooner they were driven into private life the better; and so I determined to vote, and did vote, against them at the last session of the legislature.

Then a plot was begun against him; but having gone against the government he was elected to support, he was told that he ought to resign his seat and go back to his constituency. Then came the challenge and the compact which I have described, and the Premier agreed, gave a written promise to that effect, and both promise and resignation were left in the hands of an official. But the Premier only made a pretense that there was something wrong, and another resignation was put in. In the meantime, his written promise was supposed to stand; and this is what Mr. Wise says :

A few days after the 3rd of March, about a week, my resignation was sent to the Speaker, Mr. Cummiskey, and the Premier's written promise was taken by him from Mr. Newbery, and he now holds it from the light of day, when it does not belong to him—a reproach to him for his broken faith and unkept word. Mr. Cummiskey promptly notified the Lieutenant Governor, and the latter, about the 12th of March last, ordered a writ for the election to be issued, and the order was promptly received at the proper office, and a writ was duly made out, leaving certain blanks to be filled up, and from that day to this, although two months have elapsed, nothing further has been done.

Can any one wonder, under such circumstances as these, that criticism like that we have heard here to-night should have escaped the lips of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House? How are we to be sure that the same kind of tactics were not behind the employment of Dr. Kendall? While expressing strong sympathy for the fishermen and approval of the policy of subventing any industry that is likely to prove recuperative and in which poor people are employed, I cannot help saying that having listened to the debate in committee, the whole thing looks suspicious. Dr. Kendall is not really a specialist like Professor Robertson, but he is professedly a politician. Therefore, the whole thing looks suspicious; and of all forms of corruption, none is so subtle, none so dangerous, none goes so completely to the root of the vitality of our public life as that form of corruption which is mixed up with public employment, so that where public employment commences, and where political machinations and contrivances commence, you do not know. I am glad, therefore, attention has been called to the peculiarities of this vote, which is one of those many cases which the people of the country will have to scrutinize: for the hon. gentleman must remember that out west we have public officials in the employ of the Department of the Interior, men like McCreary in Winnipeg, who are as much engaged in politics as they are in their legitimate official duties.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to bring one or two matters to the attention of the minister which form the subjects of communications which I had not under my hand before dinner. So far as the vote is concerned, I for one am heartily in favour of the scheme which the hon. minister proposes to forward by this vote. The only criticism I would offer is that a somewhat too large proportion of the vote goes to Dr. Kendall, and a not sufficiently large proportion to the fishermen. However, that is a matter of administration which I hope the hon. gentleman will remedy. One thing that is dealt with in this letter, which is from a firm carrying on a large fishing business, is this:

By the policy the government have adopted in the small bait freezers, they have made it almost impossible to be of any benefit. The idea of subsidizing these bait freezers is a good one, but instead of offering to pay half the cost of the building of such, they should have offered a bounty of so much per hundred pounds of bait sold to Nova Scotia fishermen, excluding any sold to American or foreign fishermen. In this way, small freezers would have been put up almost everywhere that they were needed.

Another suggestion made in the letter is this:

There is also no provision made under the present scheme, as expounded by Dr. Kendall, for the bait used by the banking fleet, and it would, we think, be advisable for you to ask the minister what is the intention of the government concerning larger freezers for supplying the banking fleet.

I mention this, because the vote is a general one, and the hon. gentleman seems to have a very large discretion in the application of this money. I would like to read also a short extract from a letter that is in line of what I said to be my recollection of it before recess:

The method adopted by the Doctor is to canvass a district and get the fishermen to subscribe for a sufficient number of $5 shares, on the understanding that they can put in work on the construction of the building to cover the amount of their subscription.

There might, as I have said, be difficulty afterwards, should the creditors claim that the fishermen had not paid up their subscriptions in money as required by the Act.

There is another matter to which I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentleman, and that is the sale by American fishermen of their fish in Nova Scotia under the claim that their vessels have come into Nova Scotia ports in distress. I wrote to the hon. gentleman on that subject, and he was good enough to give me a very courteous answer. Since then I have had further communication with my informant and have received further particulars. The complaint was that American vessels come into Halifax, and, although not really in distress, are allowed to sell their fish there and in that way to enter into competition with our fishermen. I did not know the names of the vessels at the time, but on receiving the reply of the hon. minister, I wrote my informant, who is Mr. C. W. Hart, of Sambro, a prominent and respectable man, and he said under date of April 1, that the two vessels were the W. H. Moody, Captain Dundas, which sold about 8,000 pounds of halibut in Halifax, and the Edith Whelan, which sold fish in the same place. I understand that neither of these vessels was in distress, the former having nearly slipped her anchor. I know nothing about the accuracy of these statements, but think it right to bring them to the attention of the hon. gentleman, because of course it is not right that such vessels should enter into competition with our own fishermen unless there are exceptional circumstances, as, for instance, if the vessel is in great distress and the cargo would otherwise be absolutely lost.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I can assure the hon. gentleman that this matter has caused us no small anxiety. In every case where an application is made,—on the allegation that the vessel has been driven into the harbour in distress for repairs—to be allowed to sell a small quantity of fish, which otherwise would be destroyed, we never grant the privilege without first communicating with the collector of customs and ascertaining from him whether the allegations are well founded. It may be that in the alleged cases, we were imposed upon, and I am glad the hon. gentleman has drawn my attention to them, as I shall again call the attention of the collector of customs to these cases and have them further inquired into, and shall also impress upon him that the policy of the department is not to permit the sale of such fish, except in the exceptional circumstances already mentioned.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the construction of these buildings let by tender?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is the association that build them and not we, and they generally build them among themselves.

Mr. CLANCY. The government has an interest in seeing that they are let by tender.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Indirectly we have, and that is one reason why our chief engineer, Mr. Fraser, is down there to see that the work is done, and the material supplied, and that the prices are bona fide prices. When we have there his certificate to this effect, we have nothing more to do with the matter. I do not think these buildings could be let by tender, to as much advantage as if built by the parties themselves.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. minister only asks a vote for association formed under local acts of Nova Scotia?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. TAYLOR. The association has to be formed before it can make an application. How many have been formed in Nova Scotia?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I could not really tell. It is perfectly impossible for me to tell that, but before any amount is paid the association must be formed.

Mr. C. E. KAULBACH (Lunenburg). While not condemning the present system, for I really believe that the government are doing an Act of justice to the fishermen in introducing the cold storage system among them as applied to their bait product, at the same time, I think a better plan could be brought about, that is, instead of erecting these buildings and spending the money in the way indicated, to appropriate this money in the shape of a bounty to the fishermen on every ton of fish placed in those buildings, and let the fishermen themselves put the buildings up. That would be a better system and give greater satisfaction to the fishermen themselves.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. member for Halifax brought that to my attention in a letter he read from a leading fishing firm down at Canso, and I will of course consider it.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose there are firms already engaged in the freezing of bait for the deep seas fisheries, and two or three establishments already in operation, what objection could the hon. gentleman have to give them a subsidy or a bounty? Why make it necessary, in order to obtain the government subsidy, to build up rival establishments?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman will see that we do not propose to assist in the construction of any bait feeding establishments for commercial purposes. We do not propose to enter into competition with establishments already erected for the purpose of supplying bait to bank schooners, though in the near future the present system may be extended to that. We have given instructions to our officers not to assist in the construction of freezers in any place where such establishments are placed already. There are some at Canso for the purpose of supplying the fishermen along the coast with the necessary bait during the season of deep sea fishing and for the purpose of selling bait to the large schooners. We do not propose entering into competition with those.

Mr. FOSTER. Your associations will sell too.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They can sell a little to their neighbours.

Mr. FOSTER. Can they not sell to any one?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is nothing to prevent it. But that is not the object in view, nor will the size of the buildings justify it.

Mr. FOSTER. The building with 100 tons of bait is large enough.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is at Gabarouse, where there is an immense number of fishermen, and the size is not at all incommensurate with the number of the people who will seek to benefit by it.

Mr. FOSTER. Each one of those is a commercial corporation?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. To that extent.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. minister say whether an American fisherman, having a license, would be permitted to purchase bait from these freezers?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, we do not allow them to buy bait.

Mr. CLANCY. I mean those having licenses. Are they permitted to purchase bait from these associations that are assisted by the government?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I do not anticipate that these associations that we are aiding will sell any bait to the deep sea fishermen at all. That is not the object; and the places where they are to be established and the size of the buildings indicate that they will be for the purpose of aiding the longshore fishermen.

Mr. CLANCY. Is there anything to prevent it, though?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If that case arose and it became necessary to guard against it, I suppose some regulations could be made. Some hon. gentlemen say that we should sell bait to the Americans. But it is not contemplated to erect buildings for the purpose of freezing bait to sell to bankers, though, indirectly, something of that kind may be done; but it will be to a small extent.

Mr. KAULBACH. This is a new feature. I thought this vote was for the deep-sea fisheries. If the deep-sea fishermen are not to get the benefit of it, I cannot see what advantage it will be. The deep-sea fishermen have immense capital invested in their business and they should be the first to get the bait.

Mr. A. G. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) I gather from the remarks of the last speaker (Mr. Kaulbach) that these freezers are intended for the benefit of the shore fisheries.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Primarily.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) I think it would be an outrage if the deep-sea fishermen could not take advantage of what the government is putting forward in the way of assistance to these bait-freezing establishments. While the boat fisheries are of very great importance, indeed, and while these establishments will be of great benefit to them, I think it is more important that the deep-sea fishermen should procure bait from these freezers when it cannot be easily procured otherwise. Though not interested in the deep-sea fisheries to the extent that my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) is, I venture to say that it would be well for the minister to consider the advisability of extending this thing so that the deep-sea fishermen can take advantage of it to the same extent as the shore fishermen.

Mr. FOSTER. This is interesting. The hon. minister (Sir Louis Davies) has proceeded up to five minutes ago, on the basis that this was for the boat fishermen.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Primarily.

Mr. FOSTER. Entirely. 'Primarily' is a word that he has but lately introduced. When my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) read the letter of his correspondent with respect to procuring bait for the deep-sea fisheries, the reply of the minister was that this was a matter that might come up later, but was not contemplated just now, as these establishments were meant for the boat fishermen. But when a protest is raised, the hon. gentleman says that they can buy bait from these establishments if they wish to, but, primarily, they are for shore fishermen. He has no consistency in his policy. He has wobbled and wobbled and wobbled. There are some of his own supporters who would not support his policy for five minutes if the deep-sea fishermen could not get bait from these freezers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Nobody said they could not.

Mr. FOSTER. What rhyme, sense, reason or honesty was there then in the hon. minister's reply to the hon. member for Halifax? That hon. gentleman asked whether their policy would be adapted to provide for the deep-sea fishermen, and the minister said it was not for that purpose, but if this was successful they would take up later the question of applying it so as to provide bait for the deep-sea fishermen. The hon. gentleman pleads good Lord and good devil—he is in favour of everything, one thing when one asks him, and of another when another asks him.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And what does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) himself favour? No one can tell from what he said whether he is opposing this vote or not.

Mr. FOSTER. Probably the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) cannot, but any one who understands English can understand my position. I said I was in favour of the proposal of the hon. gentleman, but that his methods were as bad and as unbusiness-like as they could possibly be. He has involved himself in many contradictions. And he knows as well as anybody does that when his freezers are established they can sell to any one who will buy, whether a boat fisherman, a deep-sea fisherman or an American fisherman, acting properly under his license. And I find that the vote we are discussing says distinctly that this is for deep-sea fishermen.

To assist in the establishment, maintenance and inspection of cold storage for bait for deep-sea fishermen, under conditions to be fixed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

But, varying the subject a little, I think it would be well that we should know the government's policy with regard to the employment and payment by this government of partisans in the provincial legislatures. Does this government approve of that and adopt it as a policy? Do they think it a good thing for the public life of this country? And do they propose to extend the system which they have adopted?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The government sees no reason to lay down any policy except as their actions indicate. They have seen fit to select a man pre-eminently qualified for the position for which he was chosen, and they did not think the fact that he was a member of the local legislature disqualified him.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it for the same qualification that Mr. Girouard was employed in the Yukon?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know.

Mr. FOSTER. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) may be able to answer.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I shall be glad to give any explanation that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is entitled to when we come to discuss the estimates for that department. Mr. Girouard has been appointed for the same reason that Mr. Kendall was appointed. I think he is a good officer, I have every reason to believe so; but at the same time this is not the time to discuss his case. Let us confine ourselves to the vote before the committee. By and by we shall have, I hope, if there is not too much obstruction in the voting of supplies, we shall come, in the course of the summer or fall, to discussing the estimates of the Interior Department, and then I will be very happy to give my hon. friend all the information he is entitled to.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman says we must judge of the policy of the government by their action. Well, their action in the Girouard case and in the Dr. Kendall case indicates that the policy of the government is to employ members of the provincial parliaments, and, therefore, to do what, in opposition, they vigorously denounced. This government, according to the policy of the new Liberalism, extends its tentacles into the provinces, and if they can find money enough, would pay every Grit partisan in every provincial legislature and support him out of the funds of the Dominion of Canada.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am sure it will be very satisfactory for the hon. gentleman to know that so far as this estimable gentleman is concerned, Mr. Pineau, I have nothing more to do with him than he has, and I do not think as much.

Mr. FOSTER. What does the hon. gentleman mean when he says not as much?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I want the hon. gentleman to understand that so far as I am concerned, I do not know Mr. Pineau, I never met him, never had anything to do with him, directly or indirectly. The hon. gentleman, I am afraid, has. I may be wrong. I would not make as strong a statement as he did about me. But I tell him that so far as his statements are concerned, wherein he seeks either to charge or to imply that, directly or indirectly, I ever had anything to do with Mr. Pineau's political action, they have not the shadow of a foundation. He can accept my statement or not, just as he likes, but that is true all the same. I submit to him whether it is proper or whether it is honourable to keep repeating every week in this House a charge that I have been or am in some way connected with, or responsible, for Mr. Pineau's political action. I am not, never was, never had anything to do with him, and the whole charge, so far as I am concerned, is without the shadow of a foundation.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman leaves himself open to suspicion. The hon. gentleman went down to the province of Prince Edward Island with a vote of $250,000 of the people's money given by this parliament. He went down there and took part in two by-elections, having in his right hand a vote of $250,000 that this parliament voted, expressly for carrying out certain public works. Having this money in his hand he went into these by-elections and virtually said to the people: You elect supporters for my party in the province of Prince Edward Island, or if you do not, you may find it very difficult to have this money expended. His language was tantamount to that. Now, that makes us suspicious. A man who has in previous years, when in opposition, subscribed to high political doctrines, and who, when he gets into power, in direct opposition to those doctrines, will take part in provincial by-elections, and use the people's money granted for another purpose in order to induce them to vote as he wants them to do, leaves himself open to suspicion.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) If this freezing establishment at Gabarouse succeeds, and it fills up to its full capacity with bait, does the hon. gentleman say that the parties connected with that freezing establishment will not have the privilege of selling that bait to any ship that comes along?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly they would, if they liked to.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) I do not see what connection the Pineau matter has with this vote, except in, so far as it relates to cold storage, because I think Mr. Pineau must have been kept in cold storage for some time by somebody not very far from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I know this, that Mr. Pineau was elected as a Conservative, he came to Ottawa, and he was invisible to everybody except friends of the local government, and people knowing that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was very intimate with the local government, very naturally connected him with Mr. Pineau. The result was that he was put into cold storage down in a town of Massachusetts, and when the meeting of the local legislature came round, Mr. Pineau turned up and he was surrounded by friends of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, conducted to the best hotel in the town, and so surrounded by them that he has hardly seen daylight since. The result is that the local government of Prince Edward Island is kept in power by this celebrated man.

Civil Government—Department of Inland Revenue

Revenue $38,000

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). The only increases are that five officers receive $50 a year of a statutory allowance, one of the messengers $30, and another $10, making in all an increase of $290.

Mr. FOSTER. How many are eligible for statutory increases?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There are ten officers who might receive a statutory increase, but we have recommended five. The first is Mr. Campeau, chief accountant, $2,200, increased to $2,250; Mr. Westman, his salary was $1,400, and we propose to make it $1,450. The next is Mr. Shaw, whose salary was $1,550, and we propose to pay him $1,600. The next is Mr. Doyon, $1,450, increased to $1,500, and Captain Winter, $1,200, increased to $1,250. Then there are two messengers. Mr. Potvin, whose salary is $490, receives an increase of $10, and Mr. Yetts, whose salary is $390, gets an increase of $30.

Mr. FOSTER. For what reason were the other five, of the ten who were eligible, denied their increases?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is not very easy to explain the situation, as it is difficult to understand exactly the meaning of the statute in connection with these statutory increases. We have taken those who appear to us, by the length of their service and the importance of their work, to be entitled to an increase, in preference to the others. Those who have been left aside, are those who have been appointed more lately. There is a number of our officers who have already reached the maximum of their class, so that they cannot claim an increase. In giving this $50 only to half of them, we have given it to those the importance of whose services appeared to have entitled them to the increase more than the others.

Mr. FOSTER. Were the services of the other five not sufficiently satisfactory to warrant an increase?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I would certainly not say that their services are unsatisfactory, but they were not of such an important nature as to entitle them to come under the same recommendation.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman has not accounted for another $50. He proposes an increase of $340, and he has only accounted for an increase of $290.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There is a mistake in the amount entered for last year. Instead of the vote for 1899-1900 being $37,660 it was $37,710. It was $50 more than was entered as the amount of last year's vote, so that it leaves a difference of exactly the amount I state. Five fifties make $250, and one messenger at $10 and another at $30, makes $290.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue whether instructions were given last year to the inspectors throughout the country in regard to the larger measure used as a tester? I am informed that no instructions have been given from the department to officers outside, although we had the hon. gentleman's express pledge when we gave him the vote last year, that such instructions would be given. I am now speaking subject to correction. I should be glad if the hon. gentleman is able to inform the committee that he has given such instructions, and if he has not done so, why, and whether he intends to do so?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. If I pledged myself to give the instructions, I must have given them. It is impossible for me, at this distance, to say positively, but if I promised last year to give the instructions, I must have given them. However, I will make a point of inquiring. Certainly, if I promised to give them, I must have given them.

Civil Government—Department of Inland Revenue

Revenue $6,250

Mr. FOSTER. I notice that the hon. minister has been offending again, in the old way, by buying books, which do not seem to be necessary for the health, comfort and efficiency of his department, 'Burke's Peerage' for instance.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I did not buy it, and I do not know how it was purchased. I never ordered the purchase of it.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid my hon. friend is not doing his duty to the country, as the responsible head of a department if these purchases are made of useless books, and he knows nothing of them. What subordinate dare spend $8.40 without the minister's advice and permission?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I really do not know. I was astonished when I saw it myself.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman ought to be astonished. It is proof positive that his department is entirely out of his disciplinary control.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I never said it was.

Mr. FOSTER. Who did that? Somebody must bear the blame. Does my hon. friend use the 'Peerage'?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. When I had the honour, at one time, of receiving that distinction, which Her Gracious Majesty was kind enough to confer upon me, I bought one copy at my own expense. Since that time I have been persecuted every year to buy one, and I have always refused. I am sorry to say that I cannot account for the purchase of this one.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman use ordinary diligence to see that it does not occur again?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I think I can promise that.

Mr. FOSTER. Here the minister has two 'Canadian Men and Women of the Times' at $6. What is he doing with those? Is that an irresponsible purchase, and is the minister not using them? Here again 'Discours a Conference,' by Thomas Chapais. The minister is getting heretical. Why, Thomas Chapais is a Conservative. Is it possible he allows a brochure from Mr. Chapais in his department?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is not a man's fault that he is a Conservative. Mr. Chapais was born that way. Some of the Conservatives are doing such good work that I am glad to acknowledge it.

Mr. FOSTER. The military fever has got into the Inland Revenue Department. I see they bought 'Hart's Army List.'

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is not the only department where there is military fever.

Mr. FOSTER. Here I see the department bought the 'Manual to Good Manners.' Now, what in the world does the Minister of Inland Revenue want with that? Who in the department is interested in using that?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. You know there are certain things it is very difficult to refuse, and the man who wrote that was no doubt a benefactor to society. Perhaps I may be able to lend it to some of my friends opposite.

Mr. FOSTER. The minister is not satisfied with two 'Canadian Men and Women of the Times,' but I see he has bought four 'Men of the Times.'

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Really they are all very useful works.

Mr. FOSTER. I see the minister has bought 'Political Appointments, Parliamentary. &c.,' and a number of other such works. These are not necessary for the work of the department, and, seriously, this is an abuse which has been growing since the present government came into power. It is an abuse which existed many years ago, but which the Conservative government had suppressed. The hon. gentlemen are making it hard for us when, in a short time, we get control of the government, to make head against this abuse. If the officers or the head of the department want these books for their own reading, they should pay for them and not charge them to the unfortunate taxpayers of the country. The minister will, I am sure, agree with me in that.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I agree with the hon. gentleman to a certain extent, and this is a practice against which I fought as hard as I could. There are certain books which are, of course, useful, but I must acknowledge that certainly to a great degree it is an abuse.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I wish to again mention to the Minister of Inland Revenue the claim of the two men, J. B. Ryan and Edward Kelly, which was brought to his attention some time ago. These men had deductions made from their salaries from year to year for superannuation, but they were not within the Superannuation Act. They were dismissed. An Act was passed providing that the amount paid by dismissed officials into the Superannuation Act should be refunded, with interest. These two men did not come within the Act, because the deductions from their salaries had been improperly made. The result was that they were placed in a worse position than those from whose salaries deductions were legally made. That does not seem to be right. These men were out of their money during all these years, and they got it back without interest, whereas those whose money was properly taken got it back with interest. I think the minister should see that the Act is so amended that justice would be done in these two cases. It is only a small matter to the government, but it is of considerable importance to Messrs. Ryan and Kelly, as neither of them has been employed, so far as I know, since they have been dismissed from office. It amounts to $60 or $70 each, and there is certainly no reason why it should not be paid to them. It was overlooked when the statute was passed, and therefore the Auditor General very properly objected to paying it. A slight amendment should be made to the Act so as to remedy the grievance.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I took a great deal of trouble about this matter. As the hon. gentleman says, it will require an amendment to the law to enable us to pay the interest. Of course, I had to take the law as I found it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the hon. minister consents, I will undertake to draft an Act for him which could be done in a few lines, and as there can be no possible objection to it, I am sure that parliament will pass it very quickly.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I am obliged to the hon. gentleman, but I would rather look into the matter before I do that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I have the letter of the minister in which the facts are as I have stated them to the House. These men, from whom not one dollar should have been deducted, are in a worse position than the men from whom deductions were properly made.

Mr. FOSTER. And the government had the use of the money?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Yes. The Auditor General says: You cannot pay these men because they did not come within the Superannuation Act, and the statute which the Minister of Finance introduced provided only for deductions which have been properly made. The minister will see that there cannot be any possible distinction in principle between the two cases. If there is a distinction at all, it is in favour of these men and not against them. What I ask the minister to do is really to perform a simple act of justice.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I cannot undertake now that I will ask the Finance Minister to amend the law, but I will consider it and see whether I can recommend it or not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the hon. gentleman will refer to his letter of the 16th of June, 1899, he will find that the facts are exactly as I have stated them. There is no doubt whatever about the facts. The Minister of Finance is also aware of the facts, because on one occasion I brought them to his attention.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think the hon. gentleman once mentioned the matter to me, but I did not follow it up. Do I understand that the Auditor General ruled that these sums should not have been deducted at all, so that even if the gentlemen had remained in office the money would have been returned to them?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Yes, I will read what the Auditor General says in his letter:

No interest is allowed on the abatements of Messrs. Ryan and Kelly, and the abatements of W. K. Leighton as weights and measures inspector, as they were appointed subsequently to June 2, 1886, and so were not entitled to come under the Superannuation Act. The Act of last session only covered the cases of those who came under the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

That is a perfectly proper position for the Auditor General to take, and I do not find any fault with it. The difficulty was that owing to the oversight of some one, the deductions were made from the salaries of these men when they were not under the Superannuation Act. The Minister of Finance was going to pay them interest, but the Auditor General raised this technical point, and so they have been ever since without their interest, amounting to a considerable sum to them. Although it is a small matter, I think justice should be done.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will promise to look into it again.

Mr. FOSTER. The matter would be much better got at by placing a sum in the estimates without amending the Act.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. If the hon. member will give me the letter, I will look into it.

Excise $457,742 50

Mr. FOSTER. Why does the hon. gentleman lower the item for preventive service? Is there an improvement in conditions to warrant that?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We think we shall be able to do with $2,000 less. We have dispensed with the services of one officer, whose name I forget at the moment.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad if the hon. gentleman can do with less; but will he give the House some information as to the comparative conditions which now prevail, and as to the duties of these preventive officers?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We used to have an average of about 300 seizures a year of every kind—for illicit distilling, smuggling tobacco, manufacturing without paying the duty, and so forth. The number of seizures has certainly diminished, especially for illicit distillation. It has been pretty hard work to insist on the execution of law, but I am happy to say that the examples we have made in many cases have produced a good effect. In some of the large cities, like Montreal and Quebec, we have found some cases of illicit distillation; but they are very rare, as compared with the cases that occur in isolated places, principally in new settlements, on the part of men who are completely, as it were, beyond the pale of civilization, and completely ignorant of the law. In some of the new settlements in the province of Quebec, in Cape Breton, and in some of the isolated parts of the province of Ontario, we have made some seizures for illicit distillation. I sent circulars to the priests in the different parishes in the province of Quebec, asking them to draw the attention of their parishioners to the evils of illicit distillation in every way—how it was against the public interest, and against their own private interest, and how they were ruining their health by absorbing poison, which their illicit liquor really is when it does not go through the different processes of distillation, and I have been happy to receive assurances that this has been the means of stopping illicit distillation in several places. We have had a great deal of trouble with the smuggling of tobacco, especially in those parts of the country which are quite close to the United States; and I have been accused with acting with too much harshness and severity in many cases. Then, the moment a man falls under the claw of our officers, he turns out to be a Liberal, and appeals to all the Liberal influences, to the services he has rendered in the past, and all that; and it is wonderful how difficult it is to do one's duty under these circumstances.

Mr. FOSTER. But the hon. gentleman does it?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I try. I must say I have not always done my duty to the fullest extent that I ought, but I do my best. In some cases there is a mitigation of the penalty where some illegal act has been committed through ignorance. Altogether we have been successful in diminishing illicit distillation as well as the illicit manufacture of tobacco and the smuggling of it.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman think that a good deal of tobacco is smuggled over?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. A good deal is smuggled. I hope there is not so much smuggled now as there was. One reason why I think there is not so much is that owing to the law which permits imported and Canadian grown tobacco to be mixed, the price of tobacco has greatly diminished. As I have had occasion to explain already, the amount of Canadian tobacco going into our factories, if the present consumption continues, will be over 3,000,000 pounds by the end of the year, and two years ago it was only about 600,000 pounds. No doubt this immense quantity will lower the prices, and I may say that lately we have not had nearly so many seizures as formerly.

Mr. FOSTER. Who are the preventive officers now?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have not got the list.

Mr. FOSTER. I notice in the Auditor General's Report that the Auditor General has under the heading of 'Preventive Service' four men on salary, and under the heading of 'Contingencies' I find a large number of officers, some of whom are also drawing salary. I refer to page T-96 of the Auditor General's Report. Why are Curless, Casey, Kelly and Prosser under 'Preventive Service' and the others under 'Contingency'?

Sir HENRI JOLY DE LOTBINIERE.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That I am unable to explain, but that was done by the Auditor General in his report.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to know what services are done by these respective officers I have named.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I must confess that I did not expect this severe cross-examination, which, of course, the hon. gentleman has a perfect right to make, and if he likes we can let the item stand until I can get the information he requires, but there are some preventive officers with whose duties I am more particularly acquainted. There is Mr. Boulianne, a temporary preventive officer, who is now travelling in the Saguenay district, and who has rendered good service in the discovery of several cases of illicit distillation. There is Mr. Cinq Mars, whose duties lie in the district north of Montreal, and I know he has done good work in putting down illicit distillation in that part of the country. There is Mr. Floody, who has rendered good service to the department. At one time he was employed in New Brunswick; now he is in Ontario. I remember his name as that of one of our useful officers.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Cinq Mars does not seem to travel very much. His expenses are only $114.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. His district is in the neighbourhood of Montreal, which is not an expensive one to cover.

Mr. FOSTER. But you cannot do much travelling on $114. The question I wished to settle was whether these officers who are supposed to be preventive officers really do that work or not. From whom do they take their orders?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. From the excise inspectors of the different districts.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. minister might look up the information with reference to Mr. Kelly and his duties.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. And does my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) wish the item to stand in the meantime?

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman does not object.

Stamps for Canadian and imported tobacco	$20,000
--	----------

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There is an increase in this item of $1,000. And, in the supplementary estimates, I shall be obliged to ask for a considerable sum to complete this year. I shall give fuller explanations when that item is before the House; but, in the meantime, I may explain that in 1891-2, the vote for this service was $27,000, and in 1893-4, $28,000.

In 1896, I was under the impression that it would be possible to make a considerable reduction, and we reduced the vote to $19,000. But we find that this is not sufficient. I do not think it is possible to do with less than $20,000. The expenditure on these stamps is very considerable, because we have to make a number of new stamps in order to provide for the new tobacco factories, called mixed factories. The stamps are of different colour and we have to have a complete set of them. When we consider that the revenue from tobacco will be about four millions, that every cent of that money is paid by stamps, and that some of these stamps are only of the value of one cent, two cents, and very few are of large value, it is easily to understand what an enormous quantity of stamps are required—several millions of them.

To pay collectors of customs allowance for duty collected by them for 1899-1900. $5,500

Mr. FOSTER. Is that carried on under the same principle?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes, we pay up to a maximum of $250 to collectors of customs in places where there is not enough business to have a special officer.

Commissions to sellers of stamps for Canadian twist tobacco $100

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. These are for Canadian tobacco. We send these stamps to the postmasters who ask for them. The stamps must be twisted in with the tobacco—that is the only way we can avoid fraud. If we were to put the stamp around the twist, it would be too easily removed. The operation must be performed by the farmers who put up the twist tobacco. Some of the postmasters in the places where this little industry is carried on generally write for stamps, and we send them.

L. A. Frechette, for special technical translation $100

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This is an item that comes every year. There are so many technical words in our report, that it has been found necessary to get it translated by a gentleman with special qualifications. Ever since I have been in the department, Mr. Frechette has been allowed this $100 for this work.

Mr. FOSTER. He is not in your department.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No.

To enable the department to supply methylated spirits to manufactories, the cost of which will be recouped by manufacturers to whom they are supplied; and to pay for rent, light, power, freight, salaries, &c. $50,000

Mr. FOSTER. I see that last year there was an expenditure of $67,418 on this service.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There is generally a much larger revenue than expenditure, as my hon. friend will see.

Mr. FOSTER. But last year your expenditure was $67,418. You now ask a vote for $50,000. What reason has the minister for believing that this estimate will be sufficient?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We never know exactly how much we are going to spend. We are recouped at once by the sale.

Mr. FOSTER. But the money that is received goes into the consolidated fund, and you cannot spend it.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We have never been able to tell exactly what we should need to spend. We have always sent to the treasurer much more than we received. We generally put in about the same sum.

Mr. FOSTER. The estimates must generally be somewhere about what the expenditure is supposed to be. When you take an estimate for $50,000 and spend $67,000, what basis have you for thinking you will spend equally as much next year?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We have always followed the practice of asking a certain sum. We never know what we are going to spend. This year our methylated works were burned, and it will be a month or two before we can produce any more. I do not know exactly what we will require this year, it would be mere guess work. So far, I have never met with any objection to the way in which we are putting these estimates.

Mr. FOSTER. A disparity of $17,000 on a vote of $50,000, is enough to make the minister think that he was not estimating sufficiently for the service.

Mr. CLANCY. How does the hon. gentleman cover the difference? He cannot expend $67,000 on a vote of $50,000, because he will have no authority for expending the surplus. Is it done by paying it out of some other fund?

Mr. FOSTER. He is probably asking for $17,000 in the supplementaries.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I never got anything in the supplementaries for methylated spirits. In nearly every case we have exceeded the amount.

Mr. FOSTER. The Department of Customs brings in a great deal more than the minister expends, but the Minister of Customs cannot expend any more than is appropriated by the House. I do not understand how the Minister of Inland Revenue spends any more than the House authorizes him by vote.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I am giving my experience for the last four years. In the Department of Customs, as in my own department, we are not allowed to spend anything for salaries, without it has been strictly voted by the House in the estimates. This is the only exception. This case has always remained so. I do not know if it was that way when the Conservative government were in power. This manufacture of methylated spirits by the government began eighteen or nineteen years ago. Before that time, private individuals were allowed to manufacture methylated spirits, but such frauds were discovered, that it became necessary for the government to take hold of the manufacture. I will certainly take a note and inquire into this matter.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will inquire into that, and cover everything that comes in as profits, into the consolidated revenue fund; otherwise we have no clear balance of revenue and expenditure.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Now that my attention is drawn to it, I will certainly look into it. This is a special thing altogether.

Culling timber $18,550

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There is one increase of $100 for Thomas Harley. He was appointed in May, 1892, as bookkeeper.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. gentleman the revenue from this timber business?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Were it not for the necessity of paying pensions to twenty or twenty-two cullers, who were discharged eight or nine years ago, I think the department of cullers would about pay its expenses. But under the circumstances we have to meet generally $5,000 or $6,000, which represents these pensions.

Mr. FOSTER. Does superannuation apply to the present cullers, or does it simply inure to those for whom the arrangement was made?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The arrangement was made in 1890 or 1891, when about twenty cullers were struck off the list, and a pension of $200 was given to each of them.

Mr. FOSTER. You do not pension the present cullers.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No, I do not think so.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no pension system?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No, I do not think so.

Mr. FOSTER.

Weights and Measures—Salaries of officers, inspectors and assistant inspectors of weights and measures $48,710

Mr. FOSTER. There is an increase in that item.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There is an increase of $1,850. I can give you a list of the officers for whom we ask these increases. I would like first, however, to state that we have brought down the expenditure of the Weights and Measures branch lower than, I think, we can afford to. The Weights and Measures expenditure in 1889, was $67,000; in 1890, $69,000; 1891, $72,000; 1892, $72,000; 1893, $71,000; 1894, $73,000; 1895, $71,000; 1896, $70,000; and then coming to 1897, the first year I was in charge of the department, we brought it down to $67,000; 1898, $63,000; 1899, $64,000; and last year, $64,860. Evidently I have cut my cloth a little too small in order to cover all the necessities of the service, and I am obliged to ask for more. I can give the names of the officers to whom the increases are given, making up this $1,850. We were obliged, owing to a change in the law, in regard to weights and measures, which calls for much more frequent inspection of public scales, market scales, mining scales and all those heavy scales, to appoint a new officer in Montreal, Mr. Collins, to whom we give $800. Then, there are a number of increases. For instance, there is Mr. Guay, our inspector of weights and measures at Quebec. He was appointed in 1896 at a salary of $1,000. His predecessor received $1,200, and I thought, as it was a new appointment, that I would start him at $1,000, with the hope that by and by, if his work was satisfactory, I would put him on the same footing as his predecessor. It will be four years from the time of his appointment until the new year begins, and I propose to give him $200 of an increase which will make his salary $1,200, the same as that of his predecessor. Mr. Gravel, the inspector at Three Rivers, was appointed in 1897 at a salary of $800, and as his predecessor had $1,000 I decided that I would put him this year on the same footing as his predecessor. Mr. Elliott, now in Ottawa, was appointed in June, 1893, at a salary of $600. I have recommended that he be given $100 more. Mr. Murdoch, of Toronto, was appointed in 1897, at a salary of $600. I have recommended that he should get $100 more. Then, there is Mr. Guay, of Lévis, who was appointed in 1892, at a salary of $600, and I have asked for $100 more for him. There is also Mr. Macdonald, of Ottawa. We brought him over from Kingston, where we found we could dispense with his services. He has been in the service since 1886. He is a very valuable officer. He was appointed at $1,300, and I propose to give him $100 more. He has very important work to do. He is in charge of the Ottawa district. Then, there is Mr. Milligan, of Toronto, appointed in October, 1896, at $750. I have recommended that he be given $50 more. Mr. Tomlinson, of Montreal, was appointed in 1899, at a salary of $600. It is recommended that he should get $100 more. Mr. Fournier, who is in the Montreal district, was appointed at $500 in 1894, and I have asked for $100 more for him. This makes up the increase of $1,850, counting the new officer, Mr. Collins, appointed at Montreal.

Mr. CLANCY. Has the hon. gentleman's attention been called to the case of Mr. R. A. Hughes, of Chatham?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have received an application for an increase for Mr. Hughes, and I have been in correspondence with him. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) likes to come to my office I will show him the correspondence. I receive so many applications for increases that it is difficult for me to remember all the details, but I think there is an application from the gentleman to whom my hon. friend refers. I am not perfectly positive about it, but I think I remember some correspondence showing that there are two other officers, who are of the same rank as Mr. Hughes, but who, having a specialty, being practical mechanics, have a somewhat higher salary than he has. This gave Mr. Hughes motive for complaining and for asking to be put on the same footing as the others. If I am not mistaken I think my remarks apply to the right person. I have explained to him why I do not see any good ground for putting him on the same level as his brother officers. But I am not positive about it. I receive so many applications that it is impossible for me to be perfectly certain if my remarks rightly apply to Mr. Hughes or to another.

Mr. CLANCY. I think the hon. gentleman is probably correct in his references to Mr. Hughes and to the other gentlemen whom he has spoken of as being in a sense technical officers inasmuch as they are mechanics. But my information is that they do the very same work as Mr. Hughes, notwithstanding that, and that there is none of the special work to do which the hon. gentleman speaks of that necessarily devolves upon these two officers. Mr. Hughes is doing the same work as the other officers, and if he does the same work the fact of these others saying that they are in a sense technical officers does not seem to me a fair ground for this disparity between the salaries of these officers. If gentlemen are put in a position and are paid a salary on the ground that they are technical officers and of having some sort of qualification for doing technical work, and they have no technical work to do, I do not think it is a fair way to deal with officers. I would like the hon. gentleman to make some inquiry and to find out whether the gentlemen with whom he has made a comparison are doing that kind of work. If they are not, they should not be paid for it on the mere ground of qualification. I am sure the minister has no disposition to deal unfairly with Mr. Hughes and I would like the hon. gentleman would make inquiry into the points I have mentioned.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have made inquiries. I asked the inspector for a report, and I find that the other men being practical mechanics their services are considered of more value. How is it possible for me to grant every application for an increase of salary? I am almost afraid to say how many such applications I have.

Mr. CLANCY. I am afraid I did not quite make myself clear. Now, these two men may possess technical knowledge; but are they doing technical work? If they are simply discharging the same duties as Mr. Hughes and if Mr. Hughes is doing the same work, and is in the same grade, it seems to me he should have the same salary no matter what qualifications the other men possess.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Our officers of Weights and Measures have to do technical work. It is generally considered a very easy job, but in order to do their work well, it is necessary for them to have technical knowledge, as they have, for instance, to test the composition of the metal of the small knives on which the weights are put. If the metal is too soft it would not be suitable. For this and other reasons practical men are more valuable than others, and that is the report that was made by my inspector in relation to Mr. Hughes.

Mr. CLANCY. As I understand it, each of these men has his own district to inspect, and each is doing the same work in his district as Mr. Hughes is doing. They do not interfere with Mr. Hughes's district, and if Mr. Hughes discharges his duties in his district as well as they do in theirs, it seems to me, that he being in the same grade, should receive the same salary.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There are two ways of doing work. One way is to do it well, and the other way is do it not so well. My inspector tells me that these two men are superior to Mr. Hughes in their efficiency, and do better work.

Mr. TAYLOR. What did this service cost in 1895-6?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. In 1895-6 this service cost $70,358.

Mr. TAYLOR. And a year after that the minister, with a great flourish of trumpets, brought in an estimate for $63,000 and said he was going to save $7,000. Last year he had to confess that that estimate was too low, and he asked for $89,000. This year he asks for $97,000, so that since 1896, when the work was done for $70,000, he has increased it by $27,000.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. If the hon. member remembers the flourish of trumpets I made three years ago, he has a better memory than I have. I did not make any boast about it, but I thought I could honestly and fairly do the work for a less expenditure. It ought to be remembered that while we decreased the expenditure we steadily increased the revenue. In 1895-6 the revenue was $37,000 and the expenditure $70,000; in 1896-7, the revenue was $33,000, and the expenditure $67,000; in 1897-8, the revenue was $44,000, and the expenditure $63,000; in 1898-9, the revenue was $48,000, and the expenditure $64,000. As compared with 1896, the expenditure last year was $4,000 less, and the revenue $11,000 more. I am obliged to confess that we reduced the estimate too much, and I am now coming back to what I consider necessary.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the revenue has increased since 1896 by $14,000 then the minister has increased the expenditure by $27,000.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is quite the reverse; I have diminished the expenditure. I would like to know where my hon. friend finds the increase of $27,000 that he speaks of.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will try and enlighten my hon. friend. In these estimates he is asking for $97,260.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That is for other things besides weights and measures. Gas and electric light inspection takes up about $26,000, which is almost exactly the amount the hon. gentleman spoke of.

Mr. MARTIN. Some time ago I asked the minister about an inspector of gas in Charlottetown who was dispensed with. A return came down from the Department of Inland Revenue, but I have it on good authority that there was correspondence with the Department of Marine and Fisheries which was not brought down.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. My hon. friend alluded to some petitions which I think he said might be in the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I obtained them from that department, and included them in the return that came from my department. That was all that came from the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. MARTIN. Those petitions were against the discharge of Mr. Brace. I have information that there was a petition sent to the Department of Marine and Fisheries asking for his discharge.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, nothing of the kind.

Mr. MARTIN. Then, I asked the minister the other day, and he stated that Mr. Brace had been paid up to the time of his discharge.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. So I was told by my officers.

Mr. MARTIN. I have a letter here stating that as a matter of fact he was relieved of his labours on the 15th of February, but was paid only up to the 1st of February. I have it also on good authority that a man named Davey, who was supposed to have performed his duties there, has not attended to his duties since his appointment, and no one has been sent down to instruct him as to his duties. The minister has told me that he has had reports from Mr. Davey; but the presumption is that these reports were in blank. I would like the minister to give me some idea as to whether Mr. Davey is attending to his duties or not. It is very important that in a large city like Charlottetown the inspection of gas should be properly attended to; but in the first place Mr. Davey has not been very much in the department, and in the next place he has not been instructed how to test the meters.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I remember that I answered every one of the questions which my hon. friend submitted the other day, from information which I got from the officers of my department.

Mr. MARTIN. As a matter of fact, has any one been sent down to instruct Mr. Davey in the duties of his office there?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I could not tell at this moment. I know our orders were to send some one down. I will make inquiry.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the hon. gentleman take a note of that, because there is some anxiety in the city to know whether or not that has been attended to?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Before the vote is passed, I beg leave to say a few words about the last item. The House has been voting a sum for the purchase of metrical instruments for two or three years past, and I have not been allowed to explain what they are for. I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the House but I think it is important that it should know why that money is voted, and I hope to induce the people of Canada to take more interest in the introduction of the metric system of weights and measures. That system has been introduced all over the civilized world. There are only three countries in the world which have not adopted it—England, the United States and Russia. I wish to state what is doing in England and the United States in order to show how the moment is approaching when the metric system shall be adopted in those two countries; and in what condition should we be if we had no one in this country who understood it?

Mr. POWELL. I always understood that the metric system was permissive by law in the United States.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is permissive by law, but not compulsory. I merely want to show what is being done in England and the United States in order that we may understand that at any moment we can be called upon to adopt the metrical system, and ought to be ready to put it in force when that moment comes. It is so ingenious a system as to fill one with admiration for its simplicity and for the ingenuity of those who invented it. One single unit is sufficient, not only for the unit of length, but also for the unit of weight. That unit of length is converted into a unit of weight and capacity. I have here consular reports to the Imperial government on the subject, all of which are in favour of the adoption of this system. I have reports from the English consuls in Paris and Lisbon and Constantinople, and even Bulgaria and Tokio in Japan, all of which urge strongly the adoption of the metrical system in the interest of English commerce. I would also draw attention to what has taken place in the Imperial parliament of England and the Congress at Washington. The select committee of the House of Commons on weights and measures, appointed to inquire into this subject, recommended, by its report in 1895, that this system should at once be legalized for all purposes. It was not then legalized in England, but they have legalized it since, although they have not made it the official system. They also recommended that the metrical system be taught in all the public elementary schools, as a necessary and integral part of arithmetic, and that the decimal system be introduced at an earlier period into the school curriculums than is the case at present.

I was speaking of what took place at Washington, and I have here a Bill introduced in Congress in December, 1899, to fix the standard of weights and measures by the adoption of the metrical system, and that Bill was referred to the Committee on Coinage and Weights and Measures. They begin very wisely by inserting the thin end of the wedge. By having the public department, when they have any contract calling for use of weights and measures, to try and get these specifications made according to the metric system. The Bill provides that after 1st July, 1902, all the departments of the United States government in the transaction of all business, except completing the survey of the public lands, shall use only the metric system of weights and measures, and after 1st July, 1902, the metric system shall be the only standard recognized by the government of the United States. So, you can see what efforts are being made in the United States to keep pace with England and introduce that system. I have here the last report of Mr. Gage, the Secretary of the Treasury, submitted to Congress in December, 1899, in which he refers to a circular issued by the American Chamber of Commerce and declares 'our present system is only a temporary one'—it has lasted a long time, but evidently he speaks for the future—and it is out of harmony of our decimal notation and monetary system.' He recommends the metric system. I desire to show also that there are people in Canada who understand the importance of being prepared for the metric system. I have been asked to explain this vote, but every year when I get up to explain everybody calls out 'carried,' and will not allow me to explain. I said to myself: I will explain it once for all. So, Mr. Chairman, I may say that we use this vote of $500 in sending out about 100 collections illustrative of the metric system of weights and measures to the normal schools, the boards of trade, the universities, colleges and convents all over the Dominion. I am glad to say that even the ladies in the convents are very anxious to get these collections. I have here a letter from the Rev. Mr. Mackay, superintendent of education for Nova Scotia, which shows that this work is appreciated, that the value of the metric system is understood, and that there are those in the Dominion who see the importance of being prepared for its adoption. He says:

I write to thank you in the interest of the people of this country who understand what it means, and to assure you of the fullest support of the Department of Education to so desirable a consummation as you have in view. I send you copies of our new arithmetical text-books, prescribed for our public schools, the one being now in universal use in the common school grades (the first eight years of the public school course), and the other in the high school grades. You will see that all the pupils in the schools of Nova Scotia will be as fully acquainted with the metrical system in theory as with the old system. In our normal school—

Notice this, Mr. Chairman.

—all our pupil teachers have to take a course in woodwork, and one of the exercises is to make a set of metrical standards, including a cubical decimeter box loaded with sand to the weight of a kilogram, &c., which products of their labour they are at liberty to carry with them to their schools. I shall have much pleasure in seeing that there are such standards in all our schools, as there may be many yet without them, if any onward step is to be taken by the Dominion. In one season our schools will be able to make the metrical system of weights and measures and the corresponding prices, the common system, if the Dominion parliament orders it, and all that with very little difficulty, I think, from my experience in the matter.

I have here the resolution passed by the Board of Trade in Toronto, appointing a committee to inquire into the metric system of weights and measures. We already have the system introduced in a measure. In the Department of Inland Revenue, all the chemical analyses have been made for years past according to the metric system. Thus the people are being prepared for the change. I do not believe that we should wait until forced to adopt it by compulsion. It is such a beautiful system that the teaching of it in our schools will be the finest form of mental gymnastics, by enabling the pupils to compare it with our present defective system. Even if we never had the prospect of working it out practically, there could be no more useful mental exercise for our young people than learning the metric system. I prepared a resolution, which I scarcely dare to expect would be adopted unanimously, but I will ask leave to read it, and I think it will be found to embody the idea that prevails among those who have studied this subject :

Whereas, the metric system of weights and measures has been adopted and is in use in all civilized countries except Great Britain, the United States of America and Russia ; and

Whereas, from the growing interest manifested by the Parliament of Great Britain and the Congress of the United States, who have both legalized the metric system, there is good reason to believe that they will, in the near future, adopt its exclusive use, when we shall have no other course but to follow their lead.

Resolved, that in order to prepare for its introduction in Canada, it is advisable to make the merits of the metric system known and appreciated by encouraging its teaching in the public schools and by giving a practical illustration of its working in applying it, as far as possible, to the business transactions of our public departments.

Of course, we have not the control of education. All we can do, and I think it is fully justified—as the question of weights and measures is entrusted to us—is to distribute these tangible illustrations of the value and beauty of the metric system. It has been the greatest satisfaction to me to receive so many requests for the collections and charts.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) May I ask if any of these have been sent to Prince Edward Island ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Certainly, some must have been sent. I have a list of the names. I think my hon. friend has asked me for one. If my hon. friend knows any educational institution in Prince Edward Island that would like one, and would study the system and apply it, I shall be glad to send one, if my hon. friend will only give me the address. I have still about a dozen to spare.

Sir HENRI JOLY DE LOTBINIERE.

Mr. KAULBACH. I would ask the minister to send one to the Academy of my town, Lunenburg.

Mr. MARTIN. I asked the minister the other day in conversation, if all the colleges in Prince Edward Island had been supplied, and he told me the Prince of Wales College and St. Dunstan's College had not been furnished.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I cannot say exactly what institutions have been furnished. I told the hon. gentleman, I would send to the addresses that he gave me.

Inspection of Staples—Purchase and distribution of standards of grains, flours and other expenditure under the Act, including salary of raw hide inspector.... $4,500

Mr. TAYLOR. I see the statement that the amount was $9,500 last year. What is the reason of the decrease ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Last year $5,000 was voted to the Grain Commission, the result of their work I communicated to the House by means of the Bill we discussed the other day.

Mr. TAYLOR. The minister includes in this vote the salary of the hide inspector. Is there one hide inspector for the Dominion ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There is only one paid chief inspector, the others are paid by fees. All the inspectors at Quebec, Montreal, Toronto and other places, are paid by fees, while the chief inspector is paid a salary. The chief inspector is Mr. George Roy, of Quebec. He was a tanner, a man of great experience, who appeared perfectly qualified for the work. I may mention that the inspection is not compulsory. As long as inspection is not compulsory, naturally there is a certain difficulty in regularizing the work of the inspectors. A system of compulsory inspection prevailed for nearly every one of the articles that comes under the inspection system, up to 1883 or 1884, then it was abolished. As I told my hon. friend this afternoon, I made an effort once or twice to introduce a Bill to restore compulsory inspection, but the opposition was so strong, and in view of the fact that there was no such inspection in the United States or in England, I hesitated to propose to the House a system of compulsory inspection.

Mr. TAYLOR. When was Mr Roy appointed ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. He was appointed about three years ago, at a salary of $1,500.

Mr. TAYLOR. His expenses last year were $275.52. What is the necessity of a chief inspector, when there is no compulsory inspection ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. If the hon. gentleman will come to my office, I will show him a circular that I sent to the chief inspector, and to all the inspectors. I asked the chief inspector to make a regular programme of what he considers the best mode of inspection. When I got his programme, I sent copies to all the local inspectors, and asked them to report. They have not all reported yet, but I have received the reports of a good many, who approved entirely of the programme indicated by the chief inspector. My intention now, is to see if it is possible to get these inspectors to inspect according to that programme. Now, there is great difficulty. I am told that the value of hides in certain cities, is one or two cents a pound more than in other cities. Evidently that results from the inspection. But on the question of compulsory inspection I am not ready to give a decided opinion, and I do not think any one in this House is ready either.

Mr. TAYLOR. I want to know what the duties of Mr. Roy are, and what is the necessity of his appointment ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. As I said to the hon. gentleman, if he will come to my office, I will show him the correspondence, and he will see that I have tried as much as possible to get the chief inspector to equalize all our inspections and visit the inspectors. We have not decided yet on compulsory inspection. What can we do ? Either have no inspection at all, or have such an inspection as we have got now, which is certainly better than nothing.

Mr. TAYLOR. This gentleman lives at Quebec, and the other inspectors are scattered all over the country. Does the inspector travel from Quebec and visit these local inspectors all over the Dominion ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes, he travels to different places, he came to Ottawa and Toronto. Of course it is impossible for me to say exactly where he was last.

Mr. TAYLOR. I find that his account for last year is as follows :

Georges Roy, inspector, salary	$1,500 00
Railway fares and pullmans, $103; hotel expenses, 16½ d., $37.50	140 50
Cab-hire; inspection at Quebec, $25.65 ;
cab-hire, inspection elsewhere, $35.10..	60 75

Typewriting, $16.50 ; expenses, meeting of Chamber of Commerce, $4.75.....	21 25
'La Semaine Commerciale'—article on inspection of hides and fifty copies of paper	6 00
Leliève & Frère, Quebec : desk, $25 ; sofa, $9 ; chairs, 6 at $1.50.....	43 00
Telegrams, $4.02 ; telephone, $2.60 ; ferries, 40c.....	7 02

Making a total of $1,775. He certainly did not travel very much outside of Quebec and up to Ottawa and back, judging from the fares that are here.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. He went to Hamilton and Toronto.

Mr. TAYLOR. He may have run up to Hamilton. I have received a letter from a prominent tanner stating that this gentleman does practically nothing but draw his salary and that it is useless to pay him this salary. The gentleman who wrote me this letter is a supporter of this government. He says that this man does nothing but draw his salary, that it is useless to keep him employed, unless you make the inspection of hides compulsory. You cannot force these local men to carry out any instructions if they are not officials of the government.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). They are officials of the government.

Mr. TAYLOR. They are but they cannot compel any seller of hides to have his hides inspected. It looks as if this is to give a man a job at $1,500 a year and expenses.

The PRIME MINISTER. Although you have not compulsory inspection, there is apparently an inspection going on at different places in Canada, and the duties of this inspector are to see that you have uniformity, and unless you have these inspections to go on regularly you would not have uniformity of inspection. The hon. gentleman knows, if he has been in communication with the tanners, that they desire uniformity of inspection.

Mr. TAYLOR. If there is to be uniformity it is very easy for the department to prepare instructions and send them out to local officers. It is not necessary to keep this inspector in this place. He has never visited the different parts of Canada.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The hon. gentleman should not say that he has never done it. That is a bad joke.

Mr. TAYLOR. You have inspectors at Vancouver, Halifax and Winnipeg. Has he ever visited these places ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. If the hon. gentleman wants to ask me where the inspector has been he should put a question on the paper, and I will inquire where he has gone.

Mr. TAYLOR. Certainly the hon. gentleman could inform the committee whether he has visited these points or not.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No, I cannot.

Mr. TAYLOR. Can you positively say that he has visited any of these places?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I think he has been in Toronto and other places.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think this is a useless expenditure, and I move that the item be reduced by $1,500.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) should never have asked for a vote of this House to pay a salary to Mr. Roy, the chief inspector, if it were not thought that compulsory inspection would be adopted. I am quite certain that no person would ever have thought of having such an officer if it were not with the view of compulsory inspection. But, public opinion was so strong against compulsory inspection that I think the minister should hesitate before adopting it, and I think he need not hesitate to abandon the idea entirely. I am sure that the inspectors are anxious to inspect in every case in which it can be done, but they cannot demand to be allowed to inspect, because the inspection is purely a voluntary matter on the part of those having the hides. I think the government might very well dispense with Mr. Roy. If uniformity of inspection is desired that can be secured from the department. It may be said that you want rules. If you want rules you can employ Mr. Roy to make rules without employing him as a salaried officer. But, the rules are not of such an important character that it requires a man of great technical skill and experience to draw them. I should judge, that they could be very easily obtained. When the government employed Mr. Roy it was in the mind of the government that there would be compulsory inspection and since that has failed, the government should abandon this office too.

Minor Revenues—Inland Revenue $200

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This is in connection with ferries, because we have charge of interprovincial and international ferries. We are called upon to ask for tenders for licenses to be renewed and one thing and another and this amount is to meet that. I do not know about these three first items. I only know about the last one.

Customs—Civil Government $37,600

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I have a few explanations, and I can get through before twelve o'clock with the customs, civil government and contingencies' vote.

Sir HENRI JOLY DE LOTBINIERE.

Mr. FOSTER. I rather think my hon. friend cannot get through by twelve o'clock.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have the explanations here and I will give them.

Mr. FOSTER. If you gave them to-night they would fade from our memories, and you would only have to repeat them on Monday. We have been here since three o'clock this afternoon, and I think we had better adjourn now.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There is an increase of $900 in civil government, and it can be explained in this way—

Mr. FOSTER. There are things in this department we will have to discuss. The very first moment we come to Customs Department I want to discuss the Lemieux matter, and if the minister wants to take it up to-night then we will take it. This is a most important matter, a matter in which the department was grossly derelict, and I would not feel I was doing my duty unless I discussed it the very first moment the items are taken up. I have the papers here and I can discuss it if necessary.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Mr. Lemieux does not come within this item.

Mr. FOSTER. But he is a customs officer, and the Department of Customs has not done its duty.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He comes under the inspector's branch.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not propose to wait until it comes to that.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. We cannot go on if the hon. gentleman wants to bring that matter up.

Mr. FOSTER. I certainly do.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The discussion could come up more properly on the inspector's office where Mr. Lemieux is.

Mr. FOSTER. I quite know where he is.

The PRIME MINISTER. Then it is not in order to discuss it on this vote.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. This vote is for the inside service and Mr. Lemieux is in the outside service.

Mr. FOSTER. He has been too long on the inside.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am only taking the inside service and I wish to explain that one second-class clerk in receipt of $1,150 is to be made a first-class clerk at an increase of $250. We give four first-class clerks an increase of $50 each which makes $200 more. We give three of the second-class clerks an increase of $50 which makes $150 more, and we give the six third-class clerks—all who are eligible in the third-class—$50 each which would make $300. If that item passes we can go on to contingencies.

Mr. CLANCY. This raises the whole question of the policy of the government in giving the statutory increases to their favourites and shutting out others. The service is becoming demoralized under this system introduced by the present government and the Minister of Customs has never given any satisfactory reason why it should be continued. The committee should insist upon knowing why the minister has selected some clerks for these favours while others have been left out.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. In the case of the third-class clerks whose salaries are not large, no distinction has been made and the increase was given on the report of the commissioner.

Mr. POWELL. Are these all the third-class clerks there are in the department?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes. In the other classes, we select those who were the heads of the departments, having considerable responsibilities, with the exception of one or two; Mr. Saunders for instance, who might be described as secretary of the commissioner, and Miss Christie, who is also engaged with the private secretary. Mr. Breadner is the chief check clerk. He has $1,300 and he gets $50 increase. Through the working of the department Mr. Breadner who is chief clerk, gets a lower salary than some of the gentlemen working under him. Mr. Bliss is head of the correspondence branch, and he gets an increase of $50.

Mr. CLANCY. Do you give an increase to all second-class clerks?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No.

Mr. CLANCY. Then explain why some have been selected for the statutory increases and some have not.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have explained to the hon. gentleman that those selected are those who have heavy responsibilities thrown on them. All the third-class clerks who have rather poor salaries get the increase. In the first-class clerks Mr. Farrow is the accountant, Mr. Code is the assistant accountant, Mr. Saunders is the secretary of the commissioner, and Mr. Morin is at the head of the seizure branch.

Mr. CLANCY. The explanation given simply condemns the minister's past conduct. When he adopted the system of preventing the statutory increases these third-class clerks were in the same position they are in to-day, and yet the minister made his selections and distributed his favours then as he is doing now. It is a proper thing for him to give an increase to the third-class clerks, who no doubt have small salaries, but the minister ought to have thought of that before. It simply shows how bad the system is that the minister has adopted in the past. I for one would be willing to see the service put on a good footing by weeding out the incompetent officials, so that those who are faithfully performing their duties should receive their statutory advance from year to year. That is the only healthy and wholesome system, under which men will depend on getting and keeping in favour with those who make the recommendations. I am going to ask the hon. gentleman to tell the committee who has made the recommendations for the statutory increases in these cases. There is absolutely no end to the evil that will follow a system of that kind, and the sooner the hon. gentleman gets rid of it the better. If there are men in the service not earning their salary, let us weed them out; it may be a painful task, but let us not escape from it by demoralizing the service by another system which the hon. gentleman is forced to recede from after having had some experience of it.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the minister tell us which of the first-class clerks have not been recommended for statutory increases?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The deputy recommended Mr. Bennett, who was made chief clerk last year, Mr. Blakeney, Mr. McKeil and Mr. Fawcett, and not the others.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has only given three second-class clerks the statutory increase.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, Mr. Bliss, Miss Christie and Mr. Breadner.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the reason for not giving it to the others?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The commissioner thought he would give it to the heads of the different branches. For instance, Mr. Breadner, who is chief clerk, is in receipt of less salary than some of the gentlemen under him. Mr. Bliss is the head of the correspondence branch. If we were making an all-round advance of $50 each, it would be a simple matter; but the hon. gentleman knows that that has not been the policy of the government, and I concurred in the recommendation of the commissioner. I thought the line which he took was fair, and would commend itself to fair-minded men under the circumstances.

Mr. FOSTER. If you give increases only to the heads of branches, where will the others come in?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is for this year.

Mr. FOSTER. What excuse will the hon. gentleman have next year?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The commissioner may think it desirable to make other advances.

Mr. CLANCY. Why should the commissioner think or not think in regard to a matter of that kind? Surely there ought to be some rule which would not leave it to the whim of the commissioner whether an advance should be made or not. The more the hon. gentleman turns the system over the worse it appears. It is a scandalous rule, and no civil servant should be subjected to it.

Mr. FOSTER. It amounts to simply a system of favouritism. The worst phase of that is the effect it has on the service itself. Every man in the service knows that from the beginning of the year to the end of it he has to get influence with the minister in some way or other, or he will not get the statutory increase. Every man knows that he will not get it because he does his duty well, but by an outside or an inside pull, he has to get into the favour of the minister. Everybody can see the effect that has on the service. A man who does his duty faithfully and well ought to have equal fair-play with the head of a department. They work about the same hours and each work to the extent of his ability and to the satisfaction of the department. The case is altogether different if a clerk is dilatory or has any habits which prevent him doing his work well. There is good reason for not giving him the statutory increase, or for disciplining him in other ways; but where you have a staff of clerks, each doing the work which a department sets him to do, and doing it well, it must be favouritism when one is taken and another is left; and the effect of that on the service is to make them feel that merit does not count and that a pull is necessary.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman has debated the question which has been debated before. I can see all the force of the argument presented from that side of the question; but administering a department as the hon. gentleman has done himself, he knows that without seeking any favouritism at all, if a department were being administered like a large commercial house, he would find certain persons who, by their attention, their capabilities, or perhaps the nature of their duties, would receive more than others who might perhaps do as much work. For instance, take Mr. Breadner's case. Under this system of advances year after year, men under him have been getting larger salaries than he has. He feels the responsibility of staying after hours, while other men do not feel the responsibility. I have had Mr. Breadner there working sometimes at nine o'clock at night. I think that the commissioner of my department is in his office until eleven o'clock every night in the year. Miss Christie, his assistant secretary in the minister's office, never thinks of going away until nearly six o'clock. The others, under the rule which, I think, is established with us, leave at five o'clock. They do not feel that responsibility which those who are at the head of my department, and who remain later. I see the force of what the hon. gentleman says with reference to this looking like favouritism, but sneaking for myself I can say that the department is administered without favouritism. As a rule, those third-class clerks were not getting sufficient salary, considering the expense of living in Ottawa, and I thought they were entitled to an increase. But when it came to the others, whose salaries are fair, I do not think I would be justified in increasing them. But those who are at the head of the department, and who stay beyond hours to see that things are put through, I thought were entitled to an increase. While there is some advantage in having a uniform advancement, that ought to be done on some other system than that of first, second and third-class clerk. It ought to be based on different classes of work. All work cannot be alike. In some of the departments the work is purely routine. I need not mention the particular departments, but you can put a man in some of them at $700 or $800, and in a month or two he would be doing just as good work as the one alongside of him does, who, by dint of the annual increase of $50, has reached a salary of $700. I think with this explanation that this vote might be carried and we will pass on to contingencies.

Mr. TAYLOR. Surely the hon. gentleman will not go on with contingencies. There is one item in the Auditor General's Report for 7,000 newspaper wrappers, amounting to $9.80.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRAYERS.

YUKON—THE JOHN C. BARR—INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). I desire to call the attention of the government at this stage to a matter of some urgency, now that the session has reached May 28. It is the case I have so often mentioned, that of the John C. Barr. As far back as May 7, I began to call attention to the incompleteness of that return, and was in hopes that it would be completed by the time the papers were printed. The letter relates to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and, I suppose, has been overlooked. On May 7, I pointed out to the Department of Marine and Fisheries that there were two letters that had not been replied to, one was of November 10 and the other of November 15. The letter from the department to the collector, of November 10, is included in the papers brought down, the letter of the 15th was not included. The order of the House covered all letters, and, obviously, there would be no objection to bringing that down, so I take it that was an oversight. At any rate, on May 7, I called attention to the fact that that letter of November 15, from the Department of Marine to the collector, had not been brought down. Then, recently, for the second or third time, I called the attention of the government again to what seemed to be an omission in another respect, and that was that Mr. Ogilvie's report that he was asked to make had not been brought down, and the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) asked me to send a memorandum across the House, and I did so. Since then I have a letter from the secretary of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), which may be the final answer, but—I think the Prime Minister will see my point—it is not necessarily so. He says:

By direction of the Minister of Customs, I beg to send you herewith copy of a letter from William Ogilvie, Commissioner of the Yukon, addressed to the Commissioner of this department, under date of June 20, 1899. You will observe certain notes by the Commissioner of the department appended to the copy.

Now, I want to point out that there is no answer yet from the government that this is the only report of Mr. Ogilvie. On its face it would not seem to be a report at all. Mr. Ogilvie, on May 6, 1899, was asked to investigate and report in regard, not to the valuation of the John C. Barr merely, but in regard to the charge that had been made that a fraudulent registry had been obtained, that is to say, that a Canadian registry was obtained in the name of a British subject, when the vessel was really owned by United States citizens. In the letter of instructions to Mr. Ogilvie, he is asked to investigate and report in reference to that. Now, the report which is referred to by the secretary of the minister, is as follows:

I am in receipt of yours of the 6th in regard to the valuation of the 'John C. Barr' for Canadian registry:

Then, he goes on to deal only with the question of valuation, as I have been pointing out. Now, I desire to explain that that may be the only report Mr. Ogilvie has sent, but I cannot assume that it is, because it does not purport to deal with the main charge at all. If the Minister of Customs will say to me across the floor of the House that this is the only report, it would satisfy my query. There should, it seems to me, be a report from Mr. Ogilvie as to the charge he was asked to investigate and report upon. But, the letter I have received, through the courtesy of the minister outside of the House, does not definitely state that was the only report that was obtained from Mr. Ogilvie on the subject of the John C. Barr. So, the matter stands incomplete. Then, perhaps the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) would allow me to say, while I am on my feet, that on May 7 I called his attention to the fact that an order of the House of May 29, 1899, had not been complied with. That asked for the report of Mr. W. H. Lynch, and the return gives only a draft report, which is, on its face, supplementary to the report, and in these papers Mr. Lynch refers to his main report. The order asked for the main report, and on May 7 of this year I called the attention of the House to that omission.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I would say to the hon. gentleman, speaking now from memory, that I gave instructions that every attempt should be made to get everything we could for the hon. gentleman. My recollection at the present moment is, that I said to some of my officers: It seems to me that does not cover what the hon. member has asked for. I think they said there must be a mistake in the date of the Ogilvie letter, if I remember rightly.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is explained.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Well, the returns were intended to be as full and as precise as I could give to the hon. gentleman. If he wants me to ask again whether there is any other communication from Mr. Ogilvie on the subject of the John C. Barr, I will ask that directly.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Thank you, that is all I want to know.

PAYMENTS TO MEMBERS FOR TORONTO.

Mr. McMULLEN (by Mr. Flint) asked :

What amount of money has been paid to each of the present sitting members for the city of Toronto over and above their sessional indemnity and mileage, by the government of Canada, from the 1st of January, 1879, to the 1st of January, 1897 ?

I. C. R.—FREIGHT BROUGHT INTO MONTREAL.

Mr. POWELL (by Mr. Casgrain) asked :

How many tons of freight traffic destined to Montreal have been brought into Montreal by the Intercolonial Railway during the period from December 1 last to March 31 last? Also during the year ending June 30, 1899? How many tons of freight traffic destined to points west of Montreal were brought into Montreal by the Intercolonial Railway during the period from Deember 1 last to March 31 last? Also during the year ending June 30, 1899?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The number of tons of freight destined to Montreal, brought into Montreal by the Intercolonial Railway :—From December, 1899, to March 1, 1900, 35,250 tons; during year ended June 30, 1899, 86,085 tons. The number of tons of freight destined to points west of Montreal, brought into Montreal by the Intercolonial Railway :—From December, 1899, to March 1, 1900, 18,399 tons; during year ended June 30, 1899, 55,746 tons.

Mr. WALLACE. The question asked for a statement for four months, and not three.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We are asked to make a return up to March 31. but I have only been able to give it to March 1.

YUKON TERRITORY—HYDRAULIC LEASE TO MR. ROBERT ANDERSON.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked:

Referring to return, May 10, 1899, re hydraulic lease two and one-half miles of Bunker Creek, and order in council January 12, 1898:

1. What evidence, if any, had the department that Robert Anderson was a mining engineer of London, Eng., when the order passed?

2. What evidence, if any, had it that he was an experienced miner?

3. Is Robert Anderson, mentioned in the order in council of January 12, 1898, the writer of the following letter now upon the Table of this House?

E.E.S.

Juneau 3rd July 1897.

dear Sam we arraved here thise morning and am leaving here for Yukon to Morrow Morning, we will have to pay $18 per 100 lbs. for packing across the pass about 30 miles to the Lakes, where we buy a Boat. I will here tell you my plan on wich I intened to operate, As soon as we get there i am goeing to bond all of the rich claims that i kan get there, and there is also a large amount of Land wich will pay $10 pr day to the man, wich Nobody wants at present that i am goeing to try and get hold of, then i am goeing to get out here thise fall wich gives us a Chance to float a Company in London thise Koming Vinter, and that will be an easy matter to float a Company of that description, because the Gold will be in sight, and the Claims proved thise summer, I am sure that i will get something good on thise trip therefore dont bother muche about travelling around looking at properties down there, Capt. Miner will stay at Clondyke during the Vinter and bond all good tings that he may see for us, and the News from there is the best that i ever heard from any mining camp, the Mail Carrier has arraved here from Clondyke a couple of days agoe, and he brings the News that the two Claims was sold there thise spring one for $30,000 and the other for $50,000, only a few Dollars payed down on sale then the purchasers went to work and in a month they took out the Money from the claims and payed for them. My Opinion is that there will be the greatest Mining Excitement there next spring that we have ever seen, and you know that I do not boast much about mining, but I feel sure that we will make all the money that we will need in the next two years; there is native copper in large quantities also and I hear that they have found Quartz also rich.

Keep this quietly until I come out this fall, of course you may write and tell the people in London to be ready for a good sure thing, meantime take it easy and don't worry.

Your partner, ROBT. ANDERSON.

My kind greetings to Clorinas.

4. In what particulars did the terms of the lease authorized on January 12, 1898, before the order in council, differ from this applicable to an application not covered by the said order in council?

(a) Before the said order in council was passed?

(b) Since the order in council was passed?

5. Referring to the 5th clause of the order in council providing that in addition to the rental of $500, the lessee should pay a royalty of 10 per cent on the output after it exceeds $20,000—how does this provision, compared with the provisions after the said order, apply to other leases?

6. Referring to the said clause 5 and the provision for the royalty of 10 per cent on a certain amount, 'as shown by sworn returns to be furnished monthly by him to the gold commissioner,' what is the provision respecting the amount on which royalty is paid generally in the Yukon, that is to say, how is the said amount to be ascertained, whether by sworn returns or otherwise?

7. When was the protest of November 30, 1897, against this lease received?

8. What action, if any, was taken upon it to verify the allegation contained therein?

9. When was the protest of February 4, 1898, received?

10. Did the Department of the Interior inform a committee of miners (who had protested against granting a lease) through the commissioner on April 19, 1898, that Mr. Anderson was given a lease of these bars, and I do not see that anything can be done to cancel it?

11. If so, was the statement accurate?

12. When was the lease actually granted?

13. Did Mr. Anderson inform the Hon. Mr. Sifton on December 12, 1898, that he had 'transferred benefit of order in council relating to Hunker Creek concession to Klondike Government Concession Company'?

14. Referring to following cable:

London, Dec. 12, 1898.

Sifton,

Minister of Interior,
Ottawa.

Referring to order in council dated January 12 for grant of lease on Hunker Creek to Robert Anderson already transferred to him by Klondike Government Concession (Limited), by transfer registered Dawson, July 29; capitalists here are ready to issue company, but before doing so directors desire your assurance that grant of lease will be made to company direct; about $50,000 has already been expended by capitalists in good faith. Anderson showed them your letter of May 13 to McLagan; Belcourt will see you. Kindly cable immediately.

(Sgd.) BURN & BERRIDGE,
11 Old Broad Street,
London Company's Solicitors.

15. Referring to the following cables:

Department of Interior,
Ottawa, December 13, 1898.

Robert Anderson,
Hotel Cecil,
London.

Belcourt advised lease will issue to you forthwith and sent London for your execution. Department will consent assignment to company if in proper form.

(Sgd.) SMART,
Deputy Minister of Interior.

London December 16, 1898.

Sifton,

Minister of Interior,
Ottawa.

Have seen your cable to Anderson dated 13th this so far satisfactory, but capitalists, although anxious to order machinery forthwith to ensure working during coming season stipulate for lease being previously vested in company utmost importance save time Anderson sending Belcourt power of attorney to execute lease his behalf and to transfer to company who also sending Belcourt power of attorney to do what is necessary its behalf is this satisfactory.

(Sgd.) BURN & BERRIDGE,
Department of the Interior,

Ottawa, December 16, 1898.

Burn & Berridge,
London.

Yes.

(Sgd.) SIFTON.

15. What information had the department at those dates that the company mentioned would be as suitable as 'Mr. Robt. Anderson, mining engineer,' and 'Mr. Robt. Anderson, who is an experienced miner,' 'who should be given an opportunity to ascertain whether or not hydraulic mining was practicable in the tract applied for' (quotation refer to order in council, January 12, 1898) to test the experiment?

16. What information at this time did the department possess as to the parties interested in this company?

17. Has the government any information as to the sworn statement of the alleged partners of Mr. Anderson that Mr. Anderson conveyed his mining properties to the above company for $2,500,000.

18. Is the government aware that Mr. Anderson received £5,000 on March 4, 1898, in respect of his interest in the said order in council?

19. When, if at all, was the necessary hydraulic machinery in operation on the ground?

20. Have all the terms of the order in council been carried out?

21. If not, in what respect has there been default?

22. What returns, if any, have been furnished to the gold commissioner?

23. What has been the output, if any?

24. What royalty, if any, has been paid?

25. In whose or what name is the title to the two and one-half miles on Hunker Creek at present?

26. What has been the result of the experiment referred to in the order in council up to date so far as the department is concerned?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1 and 2. There was no evidence other than that shown by the papers included in the return referred to and Mr. Anderson's own statement to that effect. 3. The only evidence in the department as to who is the writer of the letter in question is the statement of Mr. D. G. Macdonell, who was the solicitor for Mr. S. Lichtenstader in a suit against Mr. Anderson and who forwarded the copy of the letter to the department on December 28, 1898. In this connection it might be well to state that it is understood that Mr. Anderson is a Swedish mining engineer, and possibly has not fully acquired the facility of expressing himself in the English language.

4. (a) No leases were issued before the lease to Mr. Anderson was authorized on January 12, 1898. (b) The lease authorized by order in council of January 12, 1898, provided:—1. An annual rental of $500, being at the rate of $200 per mile frontage. 2. A royalty of 10 per cent on the gross output after the total amount exceeds $20,000. 3. The location to be operated by hydraulic mining machinery within one year from the date of the lease and if during one season when hydraulic mining operations can be properly carried on the lessee shall fail to maintain and keep the said hydraulic machinery in good and satisfactory working order, the lease shall become void unless the minister shall otherwise decide. The lease also provides that the location shall be worked by the method of mining known as hydraulic mining. The differences between this lease and the ones authorized by order in council of December 3, 1898, are as follows:—The latter would allow the lessees to work the claim by hydraulic or other mining process, whereas the lease issued to Mr. Anderson provided that the location should be worked by the method of mining known as hydraulic mining. Leases under the regulations exempt from royalty $25,000 of the annual output, the royalty to be paid in the manner provided in the regulations governing placer mining. The lease issued to Mr. Anderson provided that a royalty of 10 per cent should be charged on the gross output after the total amount thereof exceeded $20,000. The rental under the regulations is $150 per mile. The lease to Anderson fixed a rental of $200 per mile.

5. The regulations allow an exemption of $25,000 of the output, after which 10 per cent is to be charged as royalty. 6. By sworn returns. 7. April 21, 1898. 8. No action was considered necessary, the gold commissioner had reported, when submitting Mr. Anderson's application, that the tract applied for had been passed over by individual prospectors and it was not considered likely to give sufficient returns to make placer mining profitable; and that he approved of any encouragement to introduce mining by the hydraulic method. It might be added, that Mr. Anderson was advised on January 17, 1898, that the location had been granted, the lease to issue on his filing plan of survey. 9. The 19th April, 1898. 10. The commissioner was advised on April 19, 1898, as follows:—

Mr. SUTHERLAND.

I beg to say that on the representations of the gold commissioner, Mr. Anderson was given a lease of these bars, and I do not see that anything can be done to cancel it, at all events, in the meantime.

11. Though the lease had not issued an order in council had been passed granting the lease on submission of proper survey returns. 12. The 24th December, 1898. 13. Yes. 14. (No question asked.) 15. The department had no information. It was understood, however, that Mr. Anderson had undertaken to secure the necessary capital in the old country to assist in developing the claim. 16. No special information. 17. Nothing further than what is shown by the papers already brought down. 18. No. 19. The only report received as to the work done on the claim is the following from the chairman and managing director of the company on August 20, 1899:—

Before we left England in May an extensive plant had been shipped to work the Hunker Creek ground, but owing to transportation difficulties which we could not have foreseen, the plant did not reach Dawson as soon as we expected. The result is that so far as productive work this year is concerned, the machinery sent from England will be of little use. Acting on the advice of two well known hydraulic experts whom we employed for the purpose, plans for the working of the property on a large scale, and by methods best calculated to secure profitable results, have been prepared, and additional machinery, specially adapted for such operations and of the most modern type, has been purchased, partly in Dawson and partly in Vancouver. This coupled with the machinery that had previously been sent out from England, will provide the company with an exceptionally complete and efficient plant, all of which will be in position and ready to commence operations at an early date. A good deal of sinking and drifting work remains to be done to determine the extent, direction, value and other conditions of the pay gravel in the property. For this purpose a numerous staff of men has been employed, and the indications so far are of a very promising character.

20. At the request of the Klondike Government Concession (Limited), the assignees of Mr. Anderson, a lease under the regulations of December 3, 1898, for the disposal of mining locations to be worked by hydraulic or other mining process, was issued in their favour on February 12, 1900. This lease was in substitution for the one issued under the order in council of January 12, 1898, but no reduction was made in the annual rental of $200, although the annual rental under the regulations of December 3, 1898, is $150 per mile frontage. The annual rental has been paid and it would appear from the report referred to in answer to question 19 that the other conditions of the lease are being complied with. No official report, however, has been received. 21. Answered by reply to 20. 22. The department has no information of any returns furnished the gold commissioner. 23. No report. 24. No report showing payment of royalty on gold taken from this location. 25. The Klondike Government Concession (Limited). 26. No reports having been received, the department is not in a position to furnish this information.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) be good enough to cause to be laid on the Table of the House the report of, I think, August 20, 1899, to which he referred and in which is a large part he has read, and also the lease granted in substitution for the old lease.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There can be no objection, I think, to laying copies of these on the Table.

INSPECTOR OF FISHERIES, MANITOBA.

Mr. ROCHE asked :

1. Is the government aware that the present inspector of fisheries for Manitoba is chairman and part owner of the Selkirk 'Journal' Company, a strong Liberal paper published in Selkirk ?

2. Is the government aware that the office of the inspector is in the printing office and is also the editor's office ?

3. Has the present inspector made any inspection of the fisheries of the lakes since his appointment ? If so, how many ?

4. Is it a fact that the department refused to furnish the inspector his expenses while inspecting his fisheries ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). To the first and second questions the answer is 'no.' To the third question the answer is 'yes.' Two of Lake Winnipegosis. To the fourth question the answer is 'no.'

MONTREAL POST OFFICE.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. Do the postal regulations authorize the imposition of fines upon the post office employees in Montreal ?

2. Is the government aware that the postmaster in Montreal has imposed fines lately upon the postal employees there upon the most trifling pretexts ?

3. What become of the said fines ?

4. Is it the intention of the government to reimburse the amount of said fines, inasmuch as it is the first time such fines have been imposed within the last twenty years ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. The postal regulations do not bear upon the subject. 2. The government is not aware that the postmaster at Montreal has imposed fines lately upon the postal employees there upon most trifling pretexts. On the contrary the fines so imposed were because of material neglects of duty. 3. Such fines become part of the consolidated revenue. 4. It is not the case that this is the first time fines have been imposed within the last twenty years. On the contrary it has been the practice of the department not only for the last twenty years, but throughout its whole history to impose fines when the circumstances warranted such action.

SCHOONER JAMES BECKWITH.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

1. Was fishing bounty paid the schooner 'James Beckwith' of River Bourgeois, owned by William Levesconte and Sons, for the season 1899 ?

2. If not, why has the bounty been withheld ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). To the first question the answer is 'no,' and to the second question the answer is: Because she was not engaged the length of time in fishing required by law.

Mr. GILLIES. Has the minister a report from his officers to that effect ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They must have or they could not give me the answer. I am only reading the official answer.

Mr. GILLIES. Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to bring down the report.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot say without seeing the report. I will look at the report.

Mr. GILLIES. How am I to know ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Move for it.

Mr. GILLIES. This is a matter of importance and I cannot move for it at this stage of the session.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is not open to discuss the question.

Mr. GILLIES. No, but I would ask the minister would he be good enough to lay the report on the Table. Will he give me an answer to-morrow ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot give an answer until I see the report.

Mr. GILLIES. Will the minister give me an answer to-morrow whether that report will be laid on the Table or not ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

JACOB SHEEHAN—FISHING BOUNTY.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

Was fishing bounty paid one Jacob Sheehan, of River Bourgeois, county of Richmond, for the seasons of 1898 and 1899 ?

If so, what amount was paid him during each of these years respectively ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Fishing bounty was paid to Jacob Sheehan, for the year 1898, but not for 1899. The amount paid him for 1898, was $4.50.

ALLEGED ELECTION FRAUDS—JUDICIAL INQUIRY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the right hon. gentleman the leader of the government to the pledge which he gave to the House some little time ago, that there should be appointed immediately a commission composed of the best judges in the land to investigate and report for the information of the House in reference to charges of electoral corruption. We have waited with considerable patience for some time past, and I wish to ask the Prime Minister if he is now in a position to state to the House: How soon that commission will issue; who the judges are of which it is to be composed; how soon they will be able to enter on the discharge of their duties; and the scope of the inquiry and the instructions that will be given to the commission.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). This is information to which the House is certainly entitled. I have to say to my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), that the personnel of the commission has been settled, and that the scope of the commission has also been very well advanced. But the work of proceeding with the commission and the announcement to the public has been somewhat delayed from the fact that the Minister of Justice is not in very good health, and he is away from Ottawa just now. We expect him in the middle of the week and as soon as he has come back, or immediately after, the commission will be issued and all the information which my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) has just asked for will be given to the House.

Mr. WALLACE. But the session may be over before that.

The PRIME MINISTER. I said this week.

INCOMPLETE RETURN RE YUKON SS. YUKONER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). I wish to state to the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), that the return in the case of the ss. Yukoner is by no means satisfactory. It does not cover the important questions which I withdrew, on the minister stating to me that the return would give the information I desired to obtain. It does not contain any information as to the opinion of the Department of Justice to which Mr. Davis in his letter refers. It does not even contain the letter of April 5, addressed to the Deputy Minister of Justice, from which the Minister of Customs read in part during the discussion; nor the reply thereto. Those are all absent from these papers, and that being the case many of the questions which I put are not met at all. I had hoped that the hon. gentleman, having recognized the desire I had, would have included in the return even a memorandum stating the ground on which certain documents were not brought down. As the matter stands, it leaves me exactly where I was when I put the questions. I had most of the papers which the hon. gentleman brought down, and I put the question to elicit further information or a statement from a responsible minister that for such reason as he might give he declined to answer such and such question. May I also call the attention of the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) to a very important document which should be got? On May 3 he telegraphed to Mr. Ogilvie to forward a report which ought to have been here long ago. That is a supplement to the annual report which ordinarily should have been presented to the House in February. The hon. gentleman must have expected that report at the usual date, but it did not come, and he was unable to say why it had not come; and on May 3, as he frankly told the House, he had wired to Mr. Ogilvie in regard to it. I asked two questions since in regard to the report, and the last one elicited the statement on May 23, that the hon. gentleman had got no reply to his telegram of May 3, and he was therefore in no position to state to the House when he might expect the report. Hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches will see that it is impossible to deal with that department satisfactorily or consider its estimates, or have any full or proper discussion of the government there during the past year, without Mr. Ogilvie's report; and under the circumstances I should have thought it would have been unnecessary for me to suggest to the acting minister that he should ask Mr. Ogilvie to give the official reason for this extraordinary delay—a delay not merely not anticipated by the department, but of an extraordinary and unprecedented character. I would like to know from the minister if he will take means now to ascertain by wire definitely from Mr. Ogilvie the reason for withholding his report.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Mr. JAMES SUTHERLAND (North Oxford). I may say that I have already done so. As the hon. gentleman knows, I was not in charge of the department until I saw the annual report, with a reference to this report in it. I asked the deputy about it, and he said that Mr. Ogilvie had been asked months ago to make a report, giving a resume of the business for the year, which would be suitable for the annual report; and I understand the annual report was delayed as long as possible in the hope of getting Mr. Ogilvie's report in time to include it. Then I suggested that the main report should be printed, and that Mr. Ogilvie's report should be printed as a supplemental report. About the same time a message was sent to Mr. Ogilvie in regard to it. No answer has been received to that message. In speaking to the deputy again about the report, I requested him to telegraph to Mr. Ogilvie and ask whether the report had been sent, and, if sent and lost, in some way to duplicate it. I can assure the hon. gentleman that we are anxious to have the report, as is shown by our having held back the annual report for several weeks for it. I shall at once make further inquiry of the reason for the delay, and make every possible effort to secure the report.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). With regard to the return to which the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has referred, my impression is that everything was brought down except the one letter from the Department of Justice, which I asked him not to press for at present, and which I am sure he would not expect to have brought down if he knew all the circumstances. It is a complicated matter, involving a question of law, and difficult law, and my endeavour is to find out exactly what is right and proper. That letter is not withheld from any desire to shield the officer; but, as the hon. gentleman knows, the matter is not yet closed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. So far so good. I hope the hon. gentleman will not misunderstand my pertinacity in restating my question. I do not do it for the purpose of adding any confusion, but in order that the hon. gentleman may give me, not a general statement that he does not intend to answer the questions, but answers to such questions as he feels he can answer, and a statement with regard to the others which he does not consider it proper to answer. These papers do not give me information which I know exists, and it may be that the hon. gentleman's view is right, that he could not give me that information; and I will restate the questions, and then the hon. gentleman can take the responsibility of declining to answer some and answering others which ought to be answered.

PAYMENT OF SESSIONAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorancy). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to bring to the attention of the proper authorities a matter which was brought up on the 23rd of this month by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron); that is, the payment of the salaries of the sessional clerks, messengers and pages. These people, I am informed, are usually paid every fortnight; but they have not received anything since the 25th of April, and I am informed that their families are suffering severe hardship in consequence. The Minister of Finance stated on the 23rd of May, I believe, that if the $92,000 were passed for the payment of these salaries, the Auditor General would then, probably, see fit to allow payment to be made. Since then I understand the Senate employees have been paid on a telegram from the Speaker of the Senate; but the employees of this House have not been paid.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The matter is not one within the control of the government at all. The Auditor General, of course, has the power to refuse the passing of cheques when the appropriations are exhausted, and we reached the stage that he declined to pass any further appropriations for this service. But now that the estimate has passed the House, even although the Senate is not in session and cannot complete the legislation, I still entertain the hope that the Auditor General may, under the circumstances, authorize the necessary cheques to be issued. I trust, that although the proceeding is not technically regular, he will do so, and I should be very glad to sustain him in doing so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS.

Mr. JAS. CLANCY (Bothwell). I would like to ask the right hon. the First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) if an opportunity will be given to reach those motions that are purely formal and not a subject of debate, in order that some of the returns desired may be brought down during the session.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I could not agree to the request of my hon. friend, but will talk over the matter with him, which he has in his mind, and perhaps reach the same object he desires to attain.

POINTE AUX TREMBLES LIGHTHOUSE.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Before the Orders are called, I would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) what steps have been taken to replace the lighthouse at Pointe aux Trembles. The hon. minister is probably aware that the lighthouse was destroyed by fire last autumn, and replaced by a lantern strung from a pole. I am informed that no steps have since been taken to rebuild the lighthouse, and this is a matter of the utmost importance to the navigation between Quebec and Montreal. Perhaps the feeling of the commercial community can be best expressed by the resolution of the 9th May, 1900, passed by La Chambre de Commerce of the district of Montreal:

La chambre de commerce du district de Montréal.

Assemblée du conseil,

Mercredi, le 9 mai 1900.

Présidence de M. Damase Masson, 1er vice-président.

Après délibération, la résolution suivante fut adoptée à l'unanimité des membres présents:

"Attendu qu'au mois d'octobre dernier (1899), un incendie a détruit le phare à la Pointe-aux-Trembles et que la lumière de ce phare a été remplacée par un simple fanal assujetti sur un poteau ;

“Attendu que cette installation provisoire et des plus rudimentaire ne peut tenir lieu d'un phare surtout en cas de mauvais temps, et afin d'écartier tout prétexte de nature à donner raison aux compagnies d'assurance maritime qui prétendent que la route du Saint-Laurent est négligée.

“Cette chambre prie le gouvernement de vouloir bien faire reconstruire ce phare le plus tôt possible, pour donner à la navigation toute la sécurité et la protection que le commerce en général et le port de Montréal en particulier sont en droit d'exiger.”

Vraie copie.

Le secrétaire.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). My hon. friend gave me no notice of the intention to put this question, and I am unable at the moment to reply. I shall make inquiries and give him the information later.

CRIMINAL CODE (1892) AMENDMENTS.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 137) further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.—(Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

(In the Committee.)

Amendment of Mr. Fraser (Guysborough), to section 205 of the Criminal Code, negatived.

Amendment of Mr. Russell, to section 419 of the Criminal Code, agreed to.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY—APPOINTMENTS AT MOOSE-JAW.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Before the House goes into supply, I wish to say a few words with reference to the way things are managed at Moosejaw. I asked the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) a question some time ago with respect to Mr. Gass, of Moosejaw. I regret the Postmaster General is not in his place—

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) will permit me : of course, he is quite within his right if he wishes to make any observations at this time ; but I am sure he will agree with me that it would be more favourable to a proper understanding of the question to be debated if he were to give intention of his notice to move—

Mr. DAVIN. I was not going to move.

The PRIME MINISTER. Or even to discuss—

Mr. DAVIN. If the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) wishes, I will postpone what I have to say, and all the more readily as the Postmaster General is not here. But, I give notice that on the next occasion of going into supply, I will call attention to certain grievances we have in connection with the post office at Moosejaw, and an appointment in the Customs Department there.

The PRIME MINISTER. It would be better not to bring it up on the next occasion for going into supply, for that is reserved for the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor).

Mr. DAVIN. Very well, then ; at an early day.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Civil government—Department of Customs—Clerical and other assistance, including $1,750 to be paid notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.... $7,450

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Explain this, please.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). This item shows an increase of $3,190. The extra clerks paid out of contingencies for 1899-1900, and their salaries are as follows : Fred Norris, $750 ; W. G. Bishop, $750 ; Mdme. Jolivet, $600 ; Miss E. M. Daws, $540 ; Miss Janet Young, $490 ; F. J. Slater, $430 ; W. Wall, $400 ; and F. Lessard, messenger, $300 ; total, $4,260. Increases of $50 each are to be paid to the first two, that is, Messrs. Norris and Bishop. These are the two gentlemen for whom the words are kept in 'notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.' As I explained to the committee in previous years, the way these gentlemen came to be employed was this : Subsequent to the passing of the main estimates in committee and before their final adoption, one of the first-class clerks, receiving a salary of $1,750 died. The main estimate was reduced by $1,750, and a vote was taken in the supplementaries for the same amount ; and we have used that $1,750 or a portion of it, to employ the two officers I have named, whose salaries last year were $750 each.

Mr. WALLACE. What are their duties?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Fred Norris is in the correspondence branch, and Mr. W. G. Bishop in the statistical branch. The others, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) will notice, are entitled to increases of $30 each—that is five of them : Mdme. Jolivet, having attained to $600, the law does not allow us to give any more. The increase of $30 to each of five represents an increase of $150, and Messrs. Norris and Bishop getting $50 each, this makes an increase of $250, which, added to the salaries of last year, makes a total of $4,510. Now, it is proposed to transfer from the Board of Customs and Customs laboratory, the following extra clerks : Miss B. Six-smith, $490; George Prentiss, $430; A. Carriere, $440; Miss E. Dalton, $425; Miss B. Mason, $480; and Miss Low, $490; total, $2,755. These were entitled to the statutory increase of $30, adding $180, and making a total of $2,935. Add that to the amount previously shown, and you have a total vote for the extra employees of $7,445.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman, while he is on the subject, tell us how many are in the laboratory now?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Miss B. Mason and Miss Low, and Mr. Babington. As I have explained to the committee, these are not extra hands that are being employed, but, as the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) will remember, under his administration, and, I suppose, prior to his administration, as since then, of these parties, four have been paid out of the estimate for the Board of Customs, which is a vote taken in connection with the outside service, and two of them have been paid out of the laboratory vote. The department thought that, inasmuch as they are employed in connection with the inside service, this transference should be made, which would not affect the amount to be voted. Therefore, the increase, which is only nominal, except in so far as we are giving what may be termed statutory increases, is not an extra charge upon the revenue, but it is paying out of contingencies this extra sum less the statutory allowance that was previously paid out of the outside vote. Printing and stationery are the same, sundries the same, making salaries paid out of contingencies, $12,175.

Mr. WALLACE. Has the minister deducted that $3,000 odd from the outside vote?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is a very natural question for the hon. gentleman to ask, and I expected it would be asked. I have not done that, for a reason that I will explain when we reach that vote.

Mr. DAVIN. Then, this is an addition to the cost of running the department?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It will not be for running the department inside, but if the committee are pleased to give me as large a vote for the Board of Customs and laboratory this year as they did before, it will be an extra amount of that much out of the vote, but not on the inside service. These parties have been for years working in the inside service, and instead of paying them out of contingencies, some of them have been paid out of this outside vote for the Board of Customs and laboratory. I think the committee will agree that as their work is wholly inside the department, the salaries ought to appear as charged against the inside department. With reference to Miss Mason, she works in the seizure branch; Miss Low works in the correspondence branch; these two have been paid out of the Customs laboratory. Out of the Board of Customs, Miss Sixsmith is in the accountant's branch, George Prentiss in the check branch, Albert Carriere in the supply branch, and Miss E. Dalton in the accountant's branch. They have been for years engaged in this work. While it was proper enough to pay them out of the outside vote, it seem to me it is better to have them charged to the inside vote and paid out of contingencies, and let the outside vote stand bearing the expense which is properly chargeable to it.

Customs—Salaries and contingent expenses of the province of Nova Scotia. $115,005

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). There is an increase of $4,755. I may say, in a general way, with reference to these increases, that, as the hon. gentlemen are aware, under the expanded business and the growing revenue, which has also made increased work in the matter of entries, &c., I am forced to ask for a somewhat larger vote this year. I have the details here, which I will give if the hon. gentlemen require.

Mr. WALLACE. Is the revenue the same for Halifax?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The total revenue was $1,069,425.17. There is an increase there. We had to have some extra officers at Halifax, we were pressed for them time and again.

Mr. WALLACE. The cost of collection is enormously increased. What is the reason?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. In salaries there is an increase of $1,280. There are increases at other ports as well. There is an increase at Annapolis of $15, that is in contingencies; of $10 at Antigonish.

Mr. WALLACE. I am speaking of the port of Halifax. Have you appointed new officers?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Some tide-waiters had to be appointed there. The increase in salaries, as furnished to me, is $1,280; increase in contingencies, $100.

Mr. C. E. KAULBACH (Lunenburg). In this connection I would draw the attention of the Minister of Customs to the salary that is paid the customs officer for the port of Lunenburg. He is a very efficient officer, indeed, I do not think his equal can be found in that province, and that is saying a great deal. He is worthy of a superior class, and his salary is very inadequate for the work he performs. It will be remembered that we have something like 260 sailing vessels at the port of Lunenburg, and all the entries and despatches have to pass in a measure, through his hands. The duties collected are not, perhaps, as large in amount as they would otherwise be shown in other counties, because this, being a fishing county, a great many of the goods entered are free—fishermen's supplies, &c.—but when you consider the duties of that official, they are far in excess of the duties that are imposed upon other officers in that province, and when you compare his salary with the salaries of others you will find that it is far short of those of others. You may take the port of Liverpool, where comparatively little work is performed, and you will find that the collector there is receiving a larger salary. Or, take the port of St. John, N.B.; you will find that the salaries paid to the different officers there are very large when compared with the salary paid to the official I refer to, Mr. Coldwell. I would ask the hon. minister if he would carefully look into the position of this official and see that his salary is made equal to the salaries of the rest doing like work.

Mr. WALLACE. What is his salary?

Mr. KAULBACH. I think $800.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Eight hundred dollars.

Mr. KAULBACH. I would ask the hon. minister to carefully view his work and give him an adequate return for the labour he performs. I am speaking in fair justice, and I think that the hon. minister will see that this official is not adequately rewarded for the work he performs.

Mr. WALLACE. Does he get anything from the Department of Marine and Fisheries as the registrar of shipping?

Mr. KAULBACH. There is no additional salary.

An hon. MEMBER. When was he appointed?

Mr. KAULBACH. He was appointed about fifteen years ago. I am not quite sure, but I only judge that from the time I have seen him in the office. I feel satisfied that if the hon. minister looks at it carefully and in an equitable light he will give this official the wages he is entitled to. He is overworked, and he has comparatively very small compensation for the services he performs.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kaulbach) says, I dare say, is correct. I have heard nothing to the contrary in reference to this officer. We are guided in a measure by the revenue, but not wholly, especially in our maritime ports where it would not be just to be guided wholly by that. What the hon. gentleman has pointed out is a fact, that there is a great deal of shipping at these ports which requires attention and care. The revenue at this place is not quite $10,000, and the collector is not alone, as he has two others with him. I see by the records that there were 458 arrivals of coasting vessels, and 379 departures; of sea-going vessels, 225 arriving and 278 departing, and I am quite aware that it requires a good deal of management and care to attend to that important part of the work. While $800 is less than some are getting, I think if the hon. gentleman will institute a comparison with others he will find that it is perhaps a little more than others are getting. There is not a perfect equality in the granting of salaries. I am endeavouring, as far as I can, without increasing the cost upon the revenue too much, to try to do justice to those who are performing work for the department according to their merits. Of course, some of our officers are paid salaries where the revenue is very much less, but, as hon. gentlemen understand, these officers are requisite for preventive purposes and for clearing vessels. I am bound to say to the hon. gentleman that I have not proposed an increase to this officer this year. Whether it was found that it was a case that really should be considered worthy, or whether we shall be able to find a little sum out of any saving that can be effected in other ways, I cannot say. But I will remember, or try to remember, what the hon. gentleman has said in reference to this officer.

Mr. KAULBACH. I desire to supplement my remarks in regard to this official by saying that this year alone we are adding to our fleet something like 30, and more are at present under construction. That will, of course, entail a larger amount of work. I would certainly ask if it is not provided for in this amount, that the hon. minister would get the money from some other source or ask for a special grant with which to supplement this officer's salary.

Mr. WALLACE. Before we go to the vote for New Brunswick, I would call attention to the fact that there is a very large increase in the item of North Sydney. North Sydney, we all know, is a town that is blossoming into a city. It is progressing quite rapidly, but the enormous increase in the proposed customs expenditure, I think, requires some explanation from the hon. minister, more particularly as I see, in face of the fact that the town is going ahead wonderfully, and we all rejoice to see it, the revenue has actually decreased in North Sydney.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) is confusing Sydney with North Sydney. They are two distinct places. North Sydney is not the town at which these great developments are going on, although we do expect similar developments there at an early date.

Mr. WALLACE. I would be rejoiced to see developments going on in every part of Nova Scotia. I have been down there in the last few days, I am quite in love with Nova Scotia, and as the political prospects are also delightful, there is nothing which charms or allures one so much as Nova Scotia. North Sydney is the place where the hon. Minister of Customs proposes to increase the expenditure in the Customs Department. I want to know why he proposes to increase the expenditure when the revenue is decreasing?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Sydney is the place where the present activity is going on, and the revenue of Sydney is increasing rapidly.

Mr. WALLACE. North Sydney has not increased. The revenue of North Sydney has decreased from $16,000 a year to $14,000, and I see that the expenditure has remained the same. In Sydney they report an increase of customs revenue of nearly 100 per cent. What does the hon. minister propose to do with the $2,350 of increased expenditure?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There is a total increase proposed of $2,350. There is an increase of $2,200 in salaries, and of $150 in contingencies, as follows: We have appointed P. Campbell as preventive officer at the chief port with a salary of $500. We could not expect to do all the business that is to be done there with the present staff.

Mr. WALLACE. What staff had you before?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The collector and some outport officers. In addition to the appointment of P. Campbell as preventive officer, we propose to increase an increased expenditure at that port to meet the new business of $1,500. We put it in that way. It is impossible just to tell what we will require there. We have had lately to appoint an appraiser, as it is very necessary that we should have an appraiser there. This port is going to be one of the large ports of the Dominion, and it will require a larger staff than what I am providing for here as the work progresses. As the imports develop it is possible that even with the amount I am asking now, that I shall next year—or whoever should be in my place if there should be any change—shall have to ask for a supplementary grant. Meanwhile I have appointed this officer at $500 and I take $1,500 to enable me to engage others. I think that already part of it will have to be paid out of the supplementaries for this year. There has been an appraiser appointed a short time ago.

Mr. WALLACE. But the revenues are decreasing.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Not at Sydney, they have gone up enormously.

Mr. WALLACE. The figures are as follows:—Customs duties, 1898, $11,343; 1899, $10,790.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The increase and activity has been within the last few months.

Mr. WALLACE. What justification is there for appointing an appraiser there?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I felt it was an absolute necessity.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the appraiser a specialist in?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He has been a large business man there, I am told. He was a general merchant, and I think he had a knowledge of hardware. His name is James McKenzie, and I dare say the leader of the opposition may know him. I do not know him personally, but I am told he is a man of large business experience. I asked for a capable man, because it is necessary to have a good man as appraiser there. We have an agent, a capable man from the county of Pictou, whom we are using as relieving officer at that port, but I am taking the vote for him in Pictou.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I am quite sure that the expectations of the Minister of Customs as regards Sydney will be borne out, and that instead of finding this appropriation too large, he will soon have to increase it. There is no question but that there is no other part in the Dominion of Canada which bids fair to make greater strides in the way of increased business. The port of Sydney will necessarily require large additional facilities from the Customs Department.

Mr. ANGUS McLENNAN (Inverness). I had occasion to make inquiry with regard to the customs receipts at the port of Sydney, and the returns show that for the first six months of the financial year, the receipts of the port of Sydney, instead of being $10,000 as in 1899, were $86,000, if my memory serves me right.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). Instead of being $10,000 for the whole year 1899, the receipts were $86,000 for the first six months of 1900.

Mr. WALLACE. Is there a proposal to increase the salary of the collector in this increased estimate?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is a question that will have to be considered. Of course I take that $1,500 without having definitely determined how it should be applied. My own impression is that in a port getting to be so important as that, probably it would only be just that the collector should have some little advance. However, that is a subject which will engage our attention.

Customs—Salaries and contingent expenses, New Brunswick $89,670

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). What is the increase in Moncton?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Two hundred dollars increase in salaries, and $25 in contingencies.

Mr. POWELL. To whom are the increases given ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Mr. Leger, sub-collector at Shediac, is increased from $500 to $600. Mr. James Hamilton, acting locker at chief port, from $400 to $500. Mr. Hamilton is now employed nearly all the year, and I presume he had not been before. Last year $250 was voted for contingencies, and $265 expended, so that I am taking $275 this year.

Mr. POWELL. What is the ground for increasing Mr. Leger's salary ? I was under the impression that there was rather a falling off in business there.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think perhaps you are giving him the same salary as his predecessor—

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Robidoux ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think so. Some of these officers do not commence at the same salary as their predecessors and after a time we deem them worthy of it

Mr. POWELL. What is the increase in respect to Sackville ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Mr. Prescott, collector at Baie Verte, will have his salary increased from $300 to $350.

Mr. POWELL. He is one of your own party, but I think you should have given him that increase long ago.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think it ought to be $400 at least.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Very strong recommendations were made in that direction, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell), knows the gauntlet we have to run in getting increases through this committee.

Mr. POWELL. So far as that $50 is concerned, I am generous enough, even to assist an enemy politically. I think that gentleman gets a salary that is simply ridiculously small.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hear, hear.

Mr. POWELL. He has a stretch of eighteen miles of territory to look after, and he has no assistant. It is only the good moral condition of the community that prevents smuggling to an extraordinary degree along the shores there. He ought to have $400.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I will make a note of it. It may be that there will be some little saving affected in other directions, and I will make a note of what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell), says.

Mr. POWELL.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would like to bear my testimony to this gentleman being an excellent official, and deserving of consideration. I am glad to see he got some increase, but I would like to see him get more.

Mr. WALLACE. In the port of St. John the increased expenditure is $1,400, while the revenue is nearly stationary. Even a slight increase of revenue does not indicate a larger amount of business ; because prices have advanced 100 per cent in hardware, and in other lines, and therefore, the increased revenue in St. John, being very small, it would rather indicate a decreased volume of business in that port during the past year. What is the minister's explanation and justification for increasing the expenses $1,400 there, in view of the conditions I have pointed out ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. My notes are that there is an increase of $500 in salaries, and $100 in contingencies.

Mr. POWELL. The total increase amounts to $1,400. What about the remaining $800 ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There must be an error in the printed detail.

Mr. WALLACE. Has the minister appointed a new collector of customs at St. John ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. What is his name ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. W. A. Lockhart.

Customs—Salaries and contingent expenses, Quebec $230,735

Mr. WALLACE. There is a large increase at Montreal ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, an increase of $4,575 in salaries, and $750 in contingencies. The increase in salaries includes the transfer of J. P. Coghlin from Paspebiac to Montreal, $600. Paspebiac was expected to be a large port, and this gentleman, who had been previously at Montreal, was sent there ; but that has not proved a success so far, and he has been returned to Montreal, and the amount which was asked last year for Paspebiac, is not asked this year.

Mr. WALLACE. Has the port of Paspebiac been closed ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, virtually ; I am not taking a vote for it. It is proposed to increase the salary of M. Charland from $750 to $850. Then, we have to employ the following extra officers at $1.50 per working day, or $475 per year : M. Gallery, John Rochette and L. Roy. Then, we are short of the amount estimated for services of acting officers during the season of navigation, $450. It is impossible to estimate exactly for these services, as navigation does not open and close on the same dates each year. So I take a bulk vote of $2,000 to meet the increased business, and if we can dispense with any extra officers, we will do so. The vote for contingencies must increase in a port where the business is growing as it is in Montreal. The vote for these last year was $8,750; for this year it is $10,500.

Customs—Salaries and contingent expenses, Ontario..... $322,590

Mr. WALLACE. Tell us about Port Arthur.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There is an increase of $1,450 in salaries, and $150 in contingencies. The increase in salaries is made up as follows: To George Barnes, sub-collector at Rat Portage, an increase from $500 to $600. Rat Portage is a growing place, and the business is increasing. E. R. Douglas, preventive officer at Mine Centre, gets an increase from $600 to $700. This is an out-of-the-way place, and living is expensive. Then, it is proposed to increase the salary of Thomas R. Boyce, clerk at the chief port, from $750 to $800. Then, there is a provision for appointing a new officer at the frontier at $700, whom we require on account of the building of the new railway. There is also an additional officer at Rat Portage, and there is an increase of $150 in contingencies.

Mr. WALLACE. What about the port of Toronto, where there is a large increase?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There is an increase of $3,040 in the salaries and $700 in the contingencies at that port. F. A. Campbell, tide-waiter, is getting $400 instead of $300. E. L. Garby, acting messenger, gets $400. He formerly had $240. Then, there are three officials who were getting $1.50 a day, and with regard to whom the estimate of $460 each was $10 short of the amount required. That should be $470, or a total increase for the three of $30. There is also the salary of an additional officer of $600, and an increase in the salary of the sub-inspector at Orillia of $100, from $500 to $600. There is, further, an amount for additional assistance that may be necessary, owing to increase of business, of $1,050. That will not be spent except if found necessary.

Mr. WALLACE. Has the hon. minister increased the salary of the old experienced officers in the Toronto customs, such as cashiers?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There needs to be some little advance to some of the old and faithful officers. We have this amount of $1,050, that will be available for that purpose or for new men. We are giving what consideration we can to these men. Of course, the hon. gentleman knows that I have applications from a great many, some of whom are, no doubt, deserving; and on behalf of the customs officers, I say that it cannot be charged that there is any extravagance in their salaries. That department has been worked with a great deal of economy in the past and at present.

Mr. WALLACE. Is Mr. Douglas a surveyor?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes.

Mr. H. CARGILL (East Bruce). I can bear testimony to the economical management of the Customs Department. I would like to call attention to the salary paid to a very efficient officer in the town of Walkerton—a very old and efficient officer, who attends closely to his duties. The revenue there has largely increased during the past two or three years, and I would like the hon. minister to see if he could not find it advisable to recommend an increase of salary there.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). I hope the hon. minister will take my hon. friend's suggestion into consideration. The gentleman referred to is a very old, laborious and efficient officer of the department. I hope the hon. minister will do what he can to meet the suggestion of my hon. friend. I am quite sure that an increase is very well deserved, especially as the returns are very much larger than before.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman who spoke first brought this matter up to my attention, and I have been thinking a good deal about it. Of course, you have to be guided somewhat by the revenue. This man collects over $5,000, and the cost of collection is a little over 10 per cent. I dare say that compares favourably with some districts, and perhaps not with others. But, of course, we cannot get uniformity in these matters, and I promise the hon. gentleman I will keep the case in mind. In a large service like the customs, there are vacancies that may, perhaps, not be filled immediately, and the saving thus effected makes a little sum on which the department would have to work in a case like this. This man, McNamara, gets $600.

Mr. J. McALISTER (Restigouche). Would the hon. gentleman let me draw his attention to the collector of customs in the town of Campbellton, where the receipts are very large and rapidly increasing? I find that the collector there only gets $500 per year, whereas collectors in other districts get $1,000. I think that in view of the importance of the port and the increase in its revenue, the salary of its collector should be also increased. It is true that Campbellton has always been a sub-port, and that Dalhousie is the port, and, consequently, Campbellton is not looked upon as of such importance as the port of Dalhousie. But now that the revenue from the port of Campbellton far exceeds that of Dalhouse, I think the salary of the collector at Campbellton should be somewhat increased. Five hundred dollars per year is very small for the services he renders.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He gets only $500, and he collects about $7,000. In comparison with the revenue, the salary is certainly more than some other ports, though it is less than some. We were just comparing with the port in Ontario. I find that the collections there are about $6,000, and the salary $600.

Mr. McALISTER. Would that include all the collections made at the port of Campbellton?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There was $175.18 of other revenue.

Mr. McALISTER. This $500 is not 10 per cent of the collections?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It is true that the salary does not bear the same proportion to the collection as in some other places. The salary at that port does look a little small.

Mr. WALLACE. But what is the minister doing in order to remedy this? Take, for instance, the port of Bowmanville. The collections are a little larger—but not much—than at the port of Walkerton, where the salary is $500, or Brampton, where the salary is $550. But the collector at Bowmanville starts at $1,000, quite a handsome salary. Mr. McNamara is an efficient officer, but after twenty years of faithful and efficient service he gets only $500.

Mr. WOOD. Why did you not increase it?

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) will allow men to finish, I will answer his very sapient question. The hon. minister says there is a little disparity, but he is remedying it as fast as he can. The way he is remedying it seems to be by giving good salaries to those he appoints, while he leaves those appointed under the Conservative government with their small salaries.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is not the way the department is run. The question asked by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) is there, and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) will find the explanation not so easy. He left Mr. McNamara with the same salary.

Mr. WALLACE. But, we were labouring under a decreased revenue, and we were decreasing the expenses of the department. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) is increasing the expenses by hundreds and thousands of dollars.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. As to Bowmanville, I simply followed the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Wallace's) example in the salary given to the collector there. Bowmanville is an important port, and there is the coasting trade as well as the collection of revenue to be considered.

Customs—Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports, Manitoba.. $45,060

Mr. DAVIN. I see that the increase here is in Brandon. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) seems to have made Brandon a port of entry. Will he please explain the necessity for that. The increase for that port is $5,300 for salaries and $600 contingencies, a total of $5,900.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Prior to my accession to office, the whole province of Manitoba, and I am not sure but part of the North-west Territories, were under the port of Winnipeg for customs purposes. Shortly before I came into office, Calgary was made a port of entry with some outports under it. With Manitoba growing as it is, it has been deemed advisable to make Brandon a port of entry. As the hon. gentleman knows, it is a town of considerable importance. When it was made a port of entry, certain of the towns which had been outports of the port of Winnipeg, being more convenient to Brandon, were made outports of the latter. They are: Deloraine, Carberry, Virden and Killarney. The collector at Brandon is Mr. H. C. Graham, and his salary $1,600. The salaries of the outports added to this make a total of $5,300. There are also, contingencies, $600.

Mr. WALLACE. The minister has taken Brandon away from Winnipeg and made it a port. I am in cordial agreement with that policy. When a place attains such importance as Brandon, it should be a port and not an outport. I was myself, while in the department, a convert to this system. But the point I make is, that the minister has taken away the $5,900 for the port of Brandon from the port of Winnipeg, and then he has increased the expenses in Winnipeg by $2,200. We would naturally expect that the expenses in Winnipeg would be decreased by that $5,900, instead of their being an increase of $2,200.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That would be the case were it not for extraordinary growth and prosperity of our western province that is going ahead so fast. It was found that we required an increased amount for Winnipeg as well. The receipts at Winnipeg have gone up by leaps and bounds, and I fancy I will have to have even more money there. When I was in Winnipeg this year I took occasion to make particular inquiries throughout the North-west and British Columbia, and I must say that, having gone fully into the cost of living there, I found it was not just to the officers of this department there that they should be paid only the same salaries as officers here. I found that in Winnipeg, houses such as you would expect an officer of Her Majesty's customs to live in, cost $25 a month, and living is somewhat dear. So we will have to grant some increases in the salaries there, and we may have to have some extra help, too.

Mr. WALLACE. Although the revenue in Winnipeg has increased, it does not indicate any increase in business, but only in the value of the products. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) knows that in the articles he deals in in Winnipeg, the prices have gone up more than is indicated by the increase in revenue, which is less than 25 per cent. He knows that the prices of the commodities he deals in have gone up more than 25 per cent.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The revenue in Winnipeg is $974,905.

Mr. WALLACE. A little more than 25 per cent. That does not indicate as great an increase of business as there has been an increase in the value of the goods.

Mr. WOOD. It is not all hardware, there are many other classes of goods brought into Winnipeg.

Mr. WALLACE. I was only appealing to him on the question of hardware, because that is the only commodity he knows the prices of. He knows that hardware has increased more than 25 per cent. It appears to me evident that the increased revenue is altogether produced from the increased prices of the goods and not from a larger volume of goods entered.

Mr. WOOD. You would not say that groceries have advanced 25 per cent or 26 per cent?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, I could pick out many articles that have advanced more than 25 per cent.

Mr. WOOD. Some items perhaps, but not the whole.

Mr. WALLACE. You cannot say the whole of any class of goods have increased. But I can show there are large quantities of other goods as well as groceries that have increased very much more than 25 per cent. Take the whole line of canned goods, and I can show that in round figures they have all increased 25 per cent, and these goods have always been largely consumed in Manitoba and the North-west.

Mr. PUTTEE. No doubt prices have increased, but at the same time there is less doubt that business in Winnipeg has rapidly increased; in fact it is complained there that business has increased more rapidly than the facilities at the customs for collecting the revenue. The service has been for some time undermanned, and to that extent inefficient. That is the trouble in all the government departments, that they do not increase their facilities as rapidly as there is need for it. I believe there has been an appointment of a new appraiser. I would like to know whether the minister has satisfied himself as to the competency and fitness of that gentleman?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Provision has been made for a new appraiser there, and a gentleman has been highly recommended to me, but I think he has not yet entered upon his duties. Sometimes we make temporary appointments to ascertain the capabilities of the parties. I can assure the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) that instead of there being too many officers at that port, there is, as the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee) says, an inadequate staff. While there has been an increase in values for some goods, I have figures showing that the number of entries has very largely increased. The increase is not for the port of Winnipeg alone, but it includes some of the outports.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad the minister has decided to increase the salaries in some instances, as it is a fact that the cost of living is greater in Manitoba and the North-west Territories than it is in Ontario. I quite agree with him that in Winnipeg, which is going ahead so rapidly, probably more help will be required. At the same time the figures before me seem to justify the argument of the member for West York that no additional strain could have been put on the staff in consequence of increased entries. But I am not disputing the propriety of adding to the staff.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The increase is not all made up at Winnipeg, as the hon. member for West York has said. At Winnipeg there is an increase of $2,215 over and above the amount deducted at Winnipeg, on account of the establishment at Brandon. Of this amount $2,160 is salaries, $55 for contingencies. There is provision for a new appraiser, $1,200. I forget the name of the new appraiser, I do not know whether he has been appointed.

Mr. DAVIN. Has he been recommended by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee)?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, I do not remember him waiting on me on that matter.

Mr. WALLACE. What branch of merchandise does he appraise?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. We have Mr. Bennie and another gentleman, Mr. Jones. One took the dry goods and groceries, and two or three other classes of goods, and the other hardware and boots and shoes.

Mr. DAVIN. I would like to ask the hon. minister: Did he actually appoint an appraiser without asking the advice of the hon. member for Winnipeg?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. We will allow the hon. member for Winnipeg to speak as to any conversation that I have had with him in reference to matters touching the benefit of the city that he represents in this House. But I think, in reference to the appraiser, that he did not offer me any suggestions; at least, I do not remember that he did. We had to appoint an officer at the boundary line on the south-eastern frontier at $800. This is a new officer.

Mr. WALLACE. At what point?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. On the railway that is being built between Manitoba and Ontario on the boundary. I do not know the exact point at which he is stationed. He will have to travel up and down somewhat.

Mr. DAVIN. What is the new man's name?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Mr. Gagnon. Then we have to appoint a new man at Emerson. There are outposts of Winnipeg yet.

Mr. DAVIN. An additional man to Cooper?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes. This is one of the points where perhaps the revenue has not gone up at all, but where there is a great deal of forwarding and a great deal of manifesting. This is work that it is necessary to do. It brings in no revenue, but it is absolutely essential, and the work had increased so that we were not able to keep up with it. Then, Mr. McColl was appointed as an acting landing officer at a salary of $700.

Mr. DAVIN. Where?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. In Winnipeg. Then, we propose to ask for $1,500 to provide for additional men. This is just another case of those large ports in regard to which we are unable to say what will be needed, and we assume that the committee will be willing to trust us with the vote of $1,500 to be used if it is required, and not to be used if it is not required. Then, there is the appointment of Mr. Bourne, as acting preventive officer at Portage la Prairie at a salary of $540, less the sum of $80 overestimated in 1898-9.

Mr. DAVIN. Is that a new appointment?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No. I am saying that we overestimated this amount by $80, and that reduces the vote to $460, and leaves his salary at $460. Then, we provide for the following officers. Does the hon. gentleman need me to read the names?

Mr. DAVIN. Read a few.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. This is what I was alluding to, that I was so impressed with the increased cost of living, that I propose to advance the salary of Mr. Heintz by $100, and of Mr. Bennie, the appraiser, by $100.

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. PUTTEE. What were their salaries before?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Heintz got $1,000, and we propose to give him $1,100. Bennie got $1,100, and we propose to give him $1,200. Most of our appraisers here get equal to that. We proposed to give Mr. Auger, a clerk since deceased, an increase of $50, and Mr. Waugh an increase of $50. Then, there are increases of $50 to nine others, making $450.

Mr. PUTTEE. What were the salaries before they were increased?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have not their salaries just in my hand. There are Bergeron, Telford, Adair, Eadie, Campbell, Stewart, Shaw and McColl.

Mr. PUTTEE. Some of these lower salaries should be raised also, to meet the increased cost of living there.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, I think that will be the case with these. That is the line that we are proceeding upon.

Mr. PUTTEE. As to the appraiser, it has been generally understood that the appointment has been made for some months. I do not know if the department knows anything about it, but I believe the gentleman has entered upon his duties. I believe it is a $1,200 position. I think, in creating new offices like this, the old officers in the department should be promoted to these positions and let the new men come into the lower ranks. I understand that Mr. Phillips, the late Queen's Printer of Manitoba, is now the appraiser in Winnipeg, and there are certainly several good officials in the customs-house who are deserving of promotion.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to know what the qualifications of this gentleman are as an appraiser?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He was a business man before that.

Mr. WALLACE. He was the Queen's Printer.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I understand he was in business.

Mr. WALLACE. What kind of business?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Probably stationery.

Mr. WALLACE. Probably! But, we want a specific statement why he was appointed to such a responsible position.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He has to pass an examination before being appointed as an appraiser.

Mr. WALLACE. What examination?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The examination qualifying for an appraisership.

Mr. WALLACE. What kind of an examination?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. A technical one.

Mr. DAVIN. What form does it take ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It takes the form of a technical examination before a Dominion Appraiser, to see that he is competent for the purposes of the work.

Mr. DAVIN. What is covered by the word technical ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It would cover that he is conversant with the values and nature of the goods that he is called upon to appraise. The ordinary civil service examination would be an educational test, but it does not necessarily mean that a man would be qualified to appraise properly the value of goods that come under his inspection, and therefore, he is required to pass an examination before a Dominion Appraiser to demonstrate that he is competent for the work before he can be appointed permanently as an appraiser.

Mr. WALLACE. Who was the Dominion Appraiser who examined him, where was he examined, and what is the nature of the report on the matter ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It has not been had. He is not appointed an appraiser yet. This gentleman has entered the service and is assisting at the duties of appraising, but he has to pass an examination before he can be permanently appointed. Mr. Jones was acting as appraiser. There was some little difficulty with Mr. Jones, and he is engaged at other duties now. This gentleman has entered the service, but before he can be permanently appointed, as the hon. gentleman knows, he will have to pass this examination. He is meanwhile added to the port.

Mr. WALLACE. I understood from the minister that Mr. Jones and Mr. Bennie had to have a third man, but now it appears that Mr. Jones is removed to some other position, and that a new man is appointed without having passed a single examination to qualify him for his duties. It is promised that at some time in the future when he has learned his business in the customs at the expense of the public, he is to be examined to see if he is qualified.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) never did it in any other way.

Mr. WALLACE. It is just the same thing as appointing a schoolmaster to teach a school and telling him that after he has been in office a year you will examine him to see if he is fit to teach or not.

Mr. WOOD. A man can learn a trade without serving an apprenticeship.

Mr. WALLACE. The apprenticeship should not be served at the expense of the country.

Mr. WOOD. You never did it any other way yourself.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think I ever made an appointment like that without being able to tell the House that the man had experience to discharge the duties of the office.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) had to make these appointments in just the same way. I ascertained that the man had experience in goods, but where is the man who has experience in all kinds of goods ? You might get a man who in a small store had to carry a varied stock.

Mr. WALLACE. You told us that the man in Sydney had business experience that qualified him.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I said he had business experience, but he cannot be appointed permanently until after he has passed his examination.

Mr. WALLACE. You said he had experience in a general store.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He was represented as a good man, and so was this gentleman. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) did not make Messrs. Bennie and Jones appraisers during the years he was in office. They were assistant appraisers, and I think they were made appraisers and passed their examinations, after I came into the department.

Mr. DAVIN. Is this Mr. Phillip or Philp, who has been appointed. Is he a brother of Philp, of Brandon ?

Mr. PUTTEE. I cannot say for certain.

Mr. DAVIN. A Queen's printer may have experience in printing, but that does not in any way fit him to be an appraiser. I find that R. I. Jones was appraiser and T. Bennie, assistant appraiser, and yet this man is taken in and placed above those two gentlemen, although he never passed an examination.

Mr. WALLACE. Both of these are appraisers now.

Mr. DAVIN. And I understand these gentlemen are placed in a subordinate position to this new man.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, and they have a lower salary.

Mr. DAVIN. This new man gets $1,200 a year, and they get $1,100. That seems very extraordinary, and it looks like favouritism, and bears the appearance of a job. It looks as if the shadow of politics had fallen upon the management of the department—which, of course, would be a very astonishing thing.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Amongst the advances proposed here, is that Mr. Bennie should be raised from $1,100 to $1,200. As to Mr. Jones, I do not know that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) would wish me to enlarge upon it, as I do not wish to do any harm to that officer, but it was found necessary to suspend him for a time for a rather serious matter, and he was taken back and his duties are somewhat changed. Under his appraisalment, came one department of commerce, which it was thought better he should not have, and which the hon. gentleman would approve of his not having if he knew all the circumstances. There was no desire to put in the new man at a higher salary than the others. There is nothing of that kind in the matter. The extra man is required, and if he should not prove equal to the duties he will be assigned to other duties. I do not know whether or not the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee) knows the trouble there was with Appraiser Jones.

Mr. PUTTEE. I do not, but surely the minister would be more apt to get a good appraiser out of the customs-house than to take in a stranger from the outside and afterwards put him through his technical examination with the probabilities that he would fail. You have officers there who have been in training for some years, and one would naturally think they would be entitled to promotion. I do not say that $1,200 is too large a salary, but there are a good many other officers who have a less salary than that, and it appears to me that some of these officers should be promoted and other men taken in at a lower grade.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Puttee) will understand that a man might be engaged in purely clerical work and that he would not be able to take hold of the appraiser's work unless he had learned the business all through. It is a matter of internal arrangement of the customs there, and I will consult with my officers in reference to this. We have our inspector there, and all I can assure the hon. gentlemen at present is, that if they have any fears there is anything wrong in the matter, I am not aware of anything of that kind.

Mr. DAVIN. I know Emerson pretty well, and I do not see how it was necessary to add an additional man to the staff already there.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) will give it a little thought he will see the necessity. I certainly hesitated a good while before I consented to increase the expenditure, but it was absolutely necessary in order to do the work properly that I should appoint one. If the hon. gentleman will consult the business men of that country he will find that they are in favour of it. It is a frontier point.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. DAVIN. I know it well.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The business has increased wonderfully. I tried to avoid appointing another officer, and I refused to do so until the representations were made so strong that I felt in the public interest I could not withhold any longer. There is a good deal of work to do in the manifesting and discharge of goods entering there.

Customs—Salaries and contingent expenses, North-west Territories $12,750

Mr. DAVIN. Will the hon. gentleman explain how the increase occurs at Calgary and Lethbridge?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The increase is $1,850. Of this amount, $1,550 is for salaries, and $300 for contingencies. It is proposed to appoint an officer at Moosejaw at $600, and it is proposed to increase the salary of Edgar Hooper from $240 to $600. There is an increase in the amount estimated to pay commissions to North-west Mounted Police on collections made by them of $590. The members of the force are paid 10 per cent commission. The increase of contingencies is largely to meet increased payments of commissions to postmasters on collections made by them. They are allowed 10 per cent commissions. As the department has made regulations providing that postmasters may accept entries of goods up to $25 in value, this expenditure has greatly increased. This was done with the view of meeting the convenience of people at points distant from a customs officer.

Mr. DAVIN. What is the salary paid to the sub-collector at Moosejaw?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It is to be $600.

Mr. DAVIN. The salary of Mr. S. B. Jamieson at Regina is $600, which seems to me to be a small salary at so important a point. About three weeks ago I asked the hon. minister what applicants there had been for the position of sub-collector at Moosejaw, and he told me that there had been but one applicant, Mr. Stephenson. He did not tell me by whom Mr. Stephenson was recommended, but he said it was by some one in whom he had confidence. The result is that I have received the following letter:

Moosejaw, May 18, 1900.

N. F. Davin, Esq.

Dear Sir,—In the Winnipeg 'Telegram' of the 16th inst., Hon. Wm. Paterson is reported:

'Mr. Davin was told by Hon. Wm. Paterson that J. K. Stephenson was the only applicant for the position of customs officer at Moosejaw, and was recommended by people in whom Mr. Paterson had confidence.'

I don't know what gave rise to the above statement, or why the hon. gentleman should state what he knows to be absolutely false.

I was an applicant for the position, and my application was supported by the business men of the town. I have letters from the department acknowledging both the application and the petition. Mr. Paterson is either ignorant of the business passing through his office, or he is endeavouring to screen his Moosejaw friends, who, like himself, lack the cardinal principles of Liberalism, truth and justice.

If this is a matter for parliamentary consideration, by all means let us have the truth.

I am, yours truly,

O. B. FYSH.

I may say that the gentleman who writes that letter is one of the cleverest men in the Liberal ranks, and he has been, to my knowledge, one of the most zealous, energetic and trusted members of the Liberal party in that district. Many a time that gentleman has met me on platform after platform, and there are few Liberals, in or out of this House, who can stand up against an opponent with more power, more knowledge or more effectiveness than that same gentleman; and it was a matter of perfect amazement to me that a man whose services to the Liberal party in the North-west Territories date from a long way back, should have been overlooked and neglected for some Mr. Stephenson recommended by some clique there. I cannot understand it. Speaking, not as a Conservative, but as a member of a party, and knowing how important it is to the working of constitutional government that we should have parties, and that men who work for a party should have due recognition, I regret, in the interests of the country, that Mr. Fysh has been thus overlooked and neglected by the hon. minister. It is quite clear that Mr. Fysh himself feels a certain amount of indignation at being thus treated. A great mistake has been made, and it is a mistake so serious to the hon. gentleman's party that even now I would recommend the removal of Mr. Stephenson and the appointment of Mr. Fysh.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not know what paper the hon. gentleman is reading from.

Mr. DAVIN. I am reading from the autograph letter.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman does not think I would give an untrue answer.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not say that.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Hansard, he will find the reply I gave. I think I said that there was no other application before the department when this appointment was made. Applications may have come in after the appointment was made. The hon. gentleman during recess will verify my reply, because I do not think he would say that I had given an incorrect answer.

Mr. DAVIN. Certainly not. I read merely this letter from one of my hon. friend's supporters.

It being six o'clock, the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

(The House resumed in Committee.)

Customs—Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports, North-west Territories $12,750

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does this include the Yukon?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, that will be found at page 68, item 334.

Customs—Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports, British Columbia $102,500

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is the explanation of the increase?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The estimate is $7,350 more than it was last year. Grand Forks was made a chief port of entry on July 1, 1899, and there has been increases of salaries and contingencies in the various chief ports of entry and sub-ports.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How is the reduction at New Westminster accounted for?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. By the increase at the ports of Nelson and Rossland, which were outports before. The expenditure for them when they were outports was charged against New Westminster, but now that they are made ports, it is charged against themselves.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How is the decrease caused in Victoria—$1,455?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The changes among the officers caused a net decrease of $455 in salaries, and there is a decrease of $1,000 in contingencies. The decrease in the contingencies is due to the transfer of officer Turner from Stikine to Dawson. He was allowed living expenses at Stikine, which come out of the contingencies for Victoria. All expenses connected with the Yukon are now found in the Yukon vote.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Are the officers in the northern ports, Stikine and others, given living expenses in addition to their salaries?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. At the passes, Bennett and Dawson, they are given living expenses. We have allowed $60 a month, but I think we are increasing that. There are none in the province of British Columbia that are allowed their living expenses, and the expenses of the others I have named will appear in the Yukon vote.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Under what authority was Mr. Turner given an allowance besides his salary?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He was paid out of contingencies.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The point I am directing the minister's attention to is this—I understand that attention was called by the Auditor General to the payment of officers in the Yukon in addition to the salaries voted by parliament. Under what authority, then, was Mr. Turner paid an allowance?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Under the authority of the vote for contingencies.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Nothing else? No order in council?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am not sure. I could ascertain.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It does not matter. Will the hon. gentleman kindly explain the increase in Vancouver—$2,500?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There is an increase of $2,150 in salaries, and $350 in contingencies. We are making provision for the payment of $2,000 for additional assistance, as we have done in some of the other items. It may not be used and it may; the business at these large ports is increasing very much, and we are asking the committee to entrust us with this amount. Then, there is an increase of $75 each to two clerks, a total of $150. Contingencies are increased from $1,000 to $1,350. The expenditure on this account was $1,150, and the indications are that the amount here stated will be necessary.

To cover unforeseen expenditures..... $1,000

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The estimate last year was $5,000; how do you get along with $4,000 less?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not remember. I suppose they have estimated more closely. I suppose the hon. gentleman will not object to that reduction.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, but a reduction to $1,000 from $5,000 seems worthy of an explanation.

Salaries and travelling expenses of inspectors of ports and travelling expenses of other officers on inspection and preventive service—Board of Customs—To meet expenditure in connection therewith, including $800 salary of Commissioner of Customs as chairman of the board..... $67,500

Mr. CLANCY. After the intimation given by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) on Friday evening, I think this item should be allowed to stand. It involves questions that will require some explanations from the Minister of Customs which the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) would like to hear. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I refer to the case of Mr. Lemieux. The ex-Minister of Finance is unavoidably absent this evening, and perhaps it would be well if the hon. gentleman would let that item stand for another day.

Mr. PATERSON.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I suppose it was thought by the other ministers that I would be going on to-night with this item, and I do not know whether they are here. I hope the hon. gentleman will not interrupt the work that way. I have not the slightest wish to prevent this being discussed. I pointed out to the ex-Minister of Finance that his discussion would come in more properly on another item, but he took the view himself that he did not care whether it was on this item or not, but that as soon as he was present when we reached the customs estimates, he would discuss it. There are the supplementaries to come on, and there is also the item for the Yukon customs concerning which I think the member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) might want more information than I have got. We might let that item stand and go on with the others. I suppose there has been the general supposition that these estimates would proceed to-night.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think this will be satisfactory to the member for Bothwell, with the understanding that the usual practice applies, that on any other item in the hon. gentlemen's department, the discussion will be just as free in regard to this subject the member for York has in hand.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, quite.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman was proceeding with another item on Friday evening. My hon. friend will remember that the ex-Minister of Finance said he expected some more definite explanation with regard to that question. The Minister of Customs then said: Well, there will be another item, that the item we have now reached would be the proper one. The ex-Minister of Finance assented to that, and he proceeded with some other items. I think that would be consonant with the understanding, unless the hon. gentleman has some reasons for pressing them to-night.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Not at all. If the hon. gentleman thinks it is contrary to any understanding, I would not for a moment press it.

Mr. CLANCY. I understood it that way.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Then let it stand.

Miscellaneous—Day books, ledgers, book-binding, printing and stationery, subscriptions to commercial papers, flags, dating stamps, locks, instruments, &c., for various ports of entry, legal expenses and uniforms for customs officers$30,000

Mr. TAYLOR. I presume upon this item I can bring up a matter that I purposed bringing up on another item last week. In the item under discussion the other evening, there were 7,000 wrappers for newspapers. I wish to inquire from the minister what these 7,000 wrappers for newspapers were used for. I presume they were used to wrap up literature the hon. gentleman sent out to his constituents. This was in the Auditor General's Report last year, so I presume that would be the number he required to go through his constituency. I am receiving every day through the mails copies of the Montreal Herald, that are sent out franked by the Minister of Customs, and printed as follows, on the inside as well as on the wrapper: 'With the compliments of Wm. Paterson, M. P.' I understand the country is being flooded with these papers sent out from the Customs Department, franked by the Minister of Customs. I want to know if in this sum an amount is included to purchase wrappers for doing up the Minister of Customs literature.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Not that I know of. I do not know that I have used any of these, or done anything in the way of purchasing newspaper wrappers. I do not know exactly what it may mean. What is the amount?

Mr. TAYLOR. The amount that is in the Auditor General's Report for 1899, is 7,000 wrappers costing $9.80. That would be last year or the year before. I presume that is all that was used that year. But from the information I get there is ten times that many being used this year from the Customs Department, sent out with the budget speech of the Minister of Finance as a supplement to the Montreal Herald.

Mr. DAVIN. Some are franked by the hon. minister, and some are franked by Mr. T. O. Davis, M.P. The whole Dominion is flooded with them. I may tell the hon. gentleman that he could not do anything better for the Conservatives.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I am pleased to know that the hon. gentleman is satisfied. Why should they not be franked by the Minister of Customs as well as by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor)?

Mr. TAYLOR. I have no objection at all to the minister franking millions of them, but the question is, when each member of parliament is allowed 5,000 envelopes and that is all he can get, can a minister surpass that number? If we require more than the number supplied to us, we have to purchase them.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I cannot remember anything about it. All I know is that I am not trying to get any wrappers, or anything else that I know of at public expense. I have not sent out documents myself that I remember, to any extent. I do not think he will find many items of extravagance in my contingencies.

Mr. CLANCY. What is the reason of this $5,000 increase?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. About $2,500 of that we propose to use to uniform a certain number of our officers who meet the public at trains or on the wharfs, and who come in contact with the travelling public in that way. We think it is desirable, we think that it is a thing that is necessary, that it will be for the credit of the country, the safety of the country, and the efficiency of the service. Altogether we are thinking, if the committee will agree to the grant, that we will expend this year something like $2,500 in that way. We may not accomplish it all at once. We do not mean to apply this to the inside officers, but the gentlemen who board trains, those that examine baggage on trains and steamboats and those that come in contact with the public, in that way we think, should have a uniform by which they should be known. They will have a cap on which they will be designated as officers of Her Majesty's Customs, a blue serge, or a woollen coat, so that they will look what they really are, and that a stranger, coming in, when they ask to examine his baggage, will at once see that they are officers whose duty it is to do so.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the hon. gentleman propose to spend $2,500 for uniforms?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. In that direction.

Mr. CLANCY. How many officers does the hon. gentleman propose to supply uniforms for?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Of course, it is not fully matured yet how we will do it: whether we will contribute part and require the officer to contribute part or not. But if we were to fix the contribution of the government at, say $10, towards supplying the hat and coat, that would accomplish the uniforming of something like 250 men. That is what we have been thinking of. We have not fully matured the plan. If we were providing the uniform altogether, the cap, coat, vest and pants, we could not do it for $10 a piece, and fewer, therefore, out of this vote, could be thus uniformed.

Mr. CLANCY. I am afraid the hon. gentleman has given rather a hazy explanation. The plan has not been matured yet, but here is an increase of $5,000. The hon. gentleman has accounted for $2,500 in the way he has spoken of. What is to be done with the other $2,500?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is required for the purposes that are mentioned in the vote for which the vote last year was not sufficient.

Mr. CLANCY. Is it proposed to appoint any new officers to the service?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, there are no new officers provided for by this item of 'miscellaneous.'

Mr. DAVIN. I read a letter from Mr. Fysh, of Moosejaw, before dinner, and the hon. gentleman wished to know what his answer to my question was. On May 16, I asked the following question:

Who were the applicants for the position of customs officer at Moosejaw? Was Mr. J. K. Stephenson appointed? On whose recommendation? Who were the other applicants?

To which the hon. Minister of Customs replied:

When the appointment of a customs officer at Moosejaw was determined upon, the only name or application before me was that of Mr. J. K. Stephenson, who received the appointment. He was recommended to me by parties in whom I have confidence.

The hon. gentleman will see that his answer was reported correctly in the Morning Telegram, of Winnipeg, which answer led to the letter that I had the honour of reading this afternoon.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the letter said that my answer conveyed something that was not correct. That is the reason I wanted the hon. gentleman to look it up.

Mr. DAVIN. I only spoke about the able character of the gentleman who sent the letter. The writer states:

In the Winnipeg 'Telegram' of the 16th inst. Hon. Wm. Paterson is reported:

'Mr. Davin was told by Hon. Wm. Paterson that J. K. Stephenson was the only applicant for the position of customs officer at Moosejaw, and was recommended by people in whom Mr. Paterson had confidence.'

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman sees the distinction.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The answer was that that was the only application before me when the appointment was determined upon. It does not say that subsequent applications had not come in. The application of Mr. Fysh may have come in; I think there was an application from him; but it came in after the appointment was made. My answer to the hon. gentleman was that there were no other applications at the time the appointment was made.

Mr. CLANCY.

Mr. DAVIN. The appointment, I suppose, was made by order in council?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, I think not. The appointment was made as an acting collector. I said that the salary was $600. I cannot say whether that is right, or whether it does not include contingencies for the office. I think it perhaps includes contingencies for the office.

Mr. DAVIN. I know nothing about that.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The reading of the report in the Telegram would put Mr. Fysh wrong.

Mr. DAVIN. What he says the Telegram said, is this:

Mr. Davin was told by Hon. Wm. Paterson that J. K. Stephenson was the only applicant for the position of customs officer at Moosejaw.

What the hon. gentleman said to me was:

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). When the appointment of a customs officer at Moosejaw was determined upon, the only name or application before me was that of Mr. J. K. Stephenson, who received the appointment.

That means that the hon. gentleman, at the time of making the appointment, did not know of Mr. Fysh's application, or of any other application, except that of Mr. Stephenson?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is the meaning. I believe it is correct. I think probably, Mr. Fysh was written to in that sense, but, I speak subject to correction.

Mr. TAYLOR. I had not in my hand the information that I wanted to give the hon. Minister of Customs, but I have it now. If he will look at page T-9, of the Auditor General's Report, he will find that seven thousand newspaper wrappers cost $9.80.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I will have to inquire into that.

North-west Mounted Police..... $353,750

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The estimates which I now submit to the House are exactly the same as last year. They are estimated for a force of 500 men, costing on the average about $700 a man, including horses, &c. Last year we maintained a force, exclusive of the men in the Yukon, of 520 men. At the present time the force in the North-west is 547 men. In consequence of the war a certain number of our men have enlisted to serve in South Africa to the number of 18 officers and 160 men, total 178 men. We have commenced recruiting all over the Dominion, and we have in Regina at the present time 547 men, being an excess of 47 over the number we intend to maintain. The men who are being recruited at the present time we intend to send to the Yukon. Last year we maintained about 250 men in the Yukon, but in consequence of the number of men who have gone to South Africa and the number who have been discharged and remained in the Yukon, we have now only 175 men in the Yukon territory. We intend to maintain a normal force of 250 men there. These men are to be taken from the North-west Mounted Police at Regina as soon as they are recruited and instructed. The amount we ask from parliament is $353,750, which makes an average expenditure for each man, and horse and so on of $700 per year, which is considered to be a very moderate estimate. The force in the North-west is distributed over the different districts as follows on the 1st of January :

	Men.	Horses.
Regina	151	130
Maple Creek	37	53
Battleford	62	87
Macleod	150	208
Calgary	62	54
Saskatchewan	61	69
Total	523	601

The force has been increased to 547 men, but we intend to keep the average force at 500.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I am very glad the recruiting is going on, because the strength of the force had gone down entirely below the needs of the Territories and entirely below the demands of efficiency. I understand that recruiting has been energetically proceeded with all over the country, and that a very good class of recruits, quite of the same type as heretofore, has been obtained. With regard to the vote for 'subsistence,' the right hon. gentleman is aware that I have been calling for returns bearing on the cost of the support of the force. I suppose the item of hardware is included in this vote ?

The PRIME MINISTER. I should think so.

Mr. DAVIN. The right hon. gentleman told us that since the advent of the present government to power no tenders have been called for hardware, but that men here and there have been allowed to get contracts without competing. In fact, the answer of the right hon. gentleman brought it down to two firms who seem to have got the lion's share : one Ashdown and the other Gurney. My information is that Ashdown has got the lion's share. That, in my opinion, is contrary to public policy, contrary to economy, and contrary to what is fair in the North-west. It is contrary to economy, because where there is no competition the man can charge pretty much what he pleases. In Calgary, in Regina, in Moosejaw, in Medicine Hat, in Edmonton, in Prince Albert and elsewhere, there are large stores as capable of supplying hardware as is Mr. Ashdown. The reason that Mr. Ashdown has got it, probably the Prime Minister himself suspects. The Prime Minister has pretty well handed over the patronage of his department to the minister from the west, the Hon. Mr. Sifton. As the Minister of the Interior is a Manitoba man and one who had lived in Winnipeg, and he also regarding Mr. Ashdown as a man who had run a constituency for them, and moreover, the Minister of the Interior having a kindness for him because he had abandoned his party and is one of the apostate Conservatives who has gone over to Liberalism : the Minister of the Interior has practically thrown the entire patronage for hardware into Mr. Ashdown's hands. Mr. Ashdown is a very sharp business man, and he has made great wealth in consequence of his sharpness, but the result of giving him a free hand in this way is not conducive to economy. We were promised economy in every detail of the management of affairs by this government, but here in regard to one important item we find that a sharp man like Mr. Ashdown is allowed free forage, so to speak, to do what he pleases, to get the prices that will suit him best, and to be free from all competition. So much for hardware. I have been waiting for these returns which I moved for early in the session with regard to the supply of tea. Copies of correspondence have been placed in my hand which I do not care to use until I see the copies of the originals, officially authenticated, brought down. What has happened in regard to tea ? I am informed that one firm having a lot of tea on hand that it could not get rid of, applied to a gentleman who has been hovering around the precincts of this House for three or four weeks, who has rather, I think, led the ministerial party into an ambush when they thought they were being led to victory headed by the wise gentleman from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). This gentleman, who was kicking hard, says it would be very convenient to him if he could get rid of this tea : in fact, he says he does not know what will happen if he does not get rid of it : he has a tremendous lot on hand, and it will be a great loss to him. Thereupon, this gentleman who manages the patronage for Mr. Sifton at the capital of the Territories, writes to Mr. Sifton and incloses this letter to him. Then the secretary of the Minister of the Interior writes to Mr. Fred White, and in some way or other the Department of the Mounted Police is put in communication with the Department of the Interior, and what is the result ? This gentleman who has this tea on hand gets rid of the whole lot without any competition whatever. Is that a sample of the wise and economical management that we were promised ? In another session I got from the right hon. gentleman the fact that in Prince Albert drugs were bought without tender. That has been the system along the whole line. It is a very unfortunate thing, and it is contrary to sound policy. As regards the management of the force itself, it has not been satisfactory, and for this reason. Ever since the present government came into power a system of favouritism has been in vogue. Men have been sent up from the east who never were connected with the mounted police, and placed as officers over the heads of men who had been twenty or twenty-five years in the force; and the system which had been inaugurated and carried to the greatest efficacy by the previous government, of appointing men to inspectorships from the non-commissioned officers—in other words, recruiting the officers from the ranks—was entirely abandoned by the right hon. gentleman. I do not know a single instance of a man having been promoted from the ranks under the right hon. gentleman; and there is a great deal of feeling on the subject, not only among the force, but through the North-west Territories generally; because it is not merely in the force alone that the management of that force excites interest. All over the Territories there are ranchmen, farmers, men in various positions who were originally in the force, and some of whom occupy high positions; and they take a great interest in that force. The whole country is aware of the fact that instead of the sound principle that obtained whereby every man who enlisted in the force felt that he had the sword of an officer in prospect, we have had men passed over, hopes disappointed, a laudable ambition blunted and balked, and favourites of friends of the right hon. gentleman sent up there to take the command of men who were experienced plainmen, and who, socially, intellectually, educationally, were the equals of the officers of any force in Canada. I say it is most unfortunate. From the point of view of economy, the system of buying goods is unfortunate; from the point of view of efficiency, the system of managing the force is still more unfortunate.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think I shall be able to satisfy my hon. friend that his criticisms are not justified by the facts as they exist in the North-west Territories. He has divided his remarks into two parts—the buying of the supplies, and the management of the force. With regard to the buying of the supplies, my hon. friend has told the committee that we have not adopted the most economical system, because he says the supplies are bought, not by open competition, but from private firms without tender. I am happy to say to my hon. friend that the information which he has obtained on this subject is not accurate. Eighty per cent of all the supplies are bought by competition, and only 20 per cent are bought without competition from dealers in Manitoba and the Territories. In a statement sent to me by the comptroller of the force, Mr. White, an officer of perfect reliability, as my hon. friend knows, he says that with the exception of the expenditure in the Yukon, which is quite uncontrollable, about 80 per cent of the supplies are purchased under contract, awarded after public competition. It is not possible to purchase 100 per cent of the supplies by public competition. A certain proportion, and a very small proportion, 20 per cent, have to be bought from local dealers. Take iron goods, which have been discussed by my hon. friend. In answer to a question put by my hon. friend some weeks ago, I stated that there has been no contract for the purchase of iron goods since 1895. At that time Mr. Ashdown, a renegade Conservative, as my hon. friend called him—at all events, a man who, in his estimation, has fallen from grace—was given the contract. Whatever may have been the merits or demerits of Mr. Ashdown for having left the Conservative party for the Liberal party—my hon. friend might say that was falling down, whereas, I might say it was going up; but we will not discuss that point, because we could not agree—Mr. Ashdown, if he fell from grace, supplied good iron goods, and at a cheap figure, because in 1895, not under the present administration, but under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, he was found to have been the lowest tenderer and was awarded the contract. Since that time the bulk of all the iron materials have been furnished by Mr. Ashdown and the Gurney Company. What we have to buy in the way of ironware is a comparatively small quantity, and the greater proportion of it has to be got from local dealers. As my hon. friend knows, the mounted police are distributed over a large extent of territory. There may be two men at one place, three at another, five at another, and so on. If these men want a kettle or a poker, they go to the nearest dealer and buy it. Purchases made in this way represent about 20 per cent of what we purchase. Therefore, I think my hon. friend will agree that his criticism was not justified by the prevailing condition of things. I am sorry to say that at this moment I cannot answer my hon. friend on the question of tea. However, that is a question which is not exactly germane to these estimates. I have asked Mr. White to give me a report on the matter at as early a day as possible, but I have not yet been able to furnish my hon. friend with that report. When it is brought down, I shall be very glad to discuss the matter with my hon. friend. I am altogether ignorant of the nefarious features my hon. friend sees in that transaction. I believe he has been misinformed, but, at all events, it is a question that will keep for discussion.

With regard to the management of the force, we have supplied the officers from three different sources—from the military college, from the militia, and from the ranks. For some time past we have not promoted any one from the non-commissioned officers.

Mr. DAVIN. Not since you came into power.

The PRIME MINISTER. Perhaps not, but it does not follow that we shall not do so. We have chiefly recruited the officers from the Royal Military College and the militia. Nobody else has been appointed. My hon. friend will not say that it is not a proper system to recruit the officers from the ranks of the militia or the military college. If we have a good officer of militia, who has proved his efficiency, my hon. friend will agree that he is a proper selection to make.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. For my part, I do not intend to close the ranks of the officers to the non-commissioned. They should have their share of promotion; and although we have not been able to promote any so far, I rely on the fact that the men we have appointed were well qualified and are a credit to the force.

Mr. DAVIN. The right hon. gentleman has made an ingenious, plausible and persuasive defence, but he has practically pleaded guilty to the indictment. The system followed under Conservative rule of promoting from the ranks has been entirely abandoned. He has not been able to give a single instance since he has been in office, of a man having been promoted from the ranks to the position of inspector.

The PRIME MINISTER. When we have been eighteen years in office, my hon. friend will not have that complaint to make, I am sure.

Mr. DAVIN. I am afraid that four years of uniform sinning cannot be condoned by promising that if the hon. gentleman be continued in office longer, he will repent of misdeeds and take a better course. The right hon. gentleman was cheered by one militia officer near me and by my distinguished and hon. friend, who formerly presided over the Militia Department, when he spoke about recruiting from the militia.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not object to the militia getting their share of the positions on the force, and under the late government some of the officers were taken from the militia and others from the military college, and a large number from the ranks. But, what I object to is ignoring the ranks altogether. I am not at all saying that the men chosen from the militia and the military college are not good men, for I am quite sure that as a rule any officer of the militia and any graduate of the military college is fit for the position of inspector of the North-west Mounted Police; but at the same time I am inclined to think that these men were appointed, in the first instance, because of their political pull. I could mention the names of men, very closely allied to ministers, who got these appointments. I am not saying that they were not fit, or that being closely allied to a minister is in itself a disqualification, but am only setting this in juxtaposition to the fact that, in promotions, the rank and file have been ignored altogether.

Coming to the question of supplies, my right hon. friend said that only 20 per cent had been purchased without tender. But that percentage is a very serious crime against the sound principle of inviting tenders. What is the object of calling for tenders, is it not to induce competition? And if 20 per cent be given without competition, and given into one or two hands, that is encouraging the very abuses which the right hon. gentleman himself admitted the other day existed when he said that corruption was rampant in the country. Some of the contracts were not let directly by the right hon. gentleman, but let under the management of the hon. the Minister of the Interior, to whom my hon. friend has practically abandoned the North-west Territories and Manitoba, and who has declared again and again his belief in the principle that to the victors belong the spoils.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the right hon. gentleman able to say that clothing was tendered for. If 80 per cent of the supplies had been tendered for, and the contracts given to the lowest tenderers, that is, perhaps, a fair average. But, take the matter of clothing; as the right hon. gentleman will see, a great many persons have been—

The PRIME MINISTER. What I said was, that 80 per cent of the appropriations for subsistence, fuel, light and clothing, are expended under contract awarded after public competition.

Mr. DAVIN. But that only applies to the clothing, light and fuel; it does not apply to food, nor to hardware. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) told me, in answer to a question, some time ago, that no tenders were called for during three or four years for hardware.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, but the hardware is a very insignificant expenditure. The statement I have from the comptroller of the force, and I have absolute reliance on his statement—and moreover it is done as the policy of the department—is that 80 per cent of the appropriations for subsistence, fuel, light and clothing, have been expended under contract awarded after public competition. I would say to my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), that it would not be safe to take the Auditor General's Report for only one year for the expenditure on clothing, because the expenditures for this purpose are not uniform year by year. But if he takes the expenditure in the Auditor General's Report for a series of years—say the last four years, during which we have had control of the expenditure—I think he will find that the statement I have made is correct.

Mr. CLANCY. Take the statement with regard to subsistence. If the hon. gentleman will turn to page N-6, of the Auditor General's Report, he will see that C. Kettles & Co., furnished beef at 7½ cents. Maunsell Bros., at 9 cents, and also at 8 cents, while Hull Bros. & Co., of Calgary, furnished beef at 13 cents, at 8½ cents, and 11 cents. And these are very considerable items too. The last one is for $1,840.03, and one is for $3,829.60. The price is not uniform, and there is no appearance of this having been let by tender.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend will see that, with the exception of Maunsell Bros., the items are small, running from $31 to $300.

Mr. CLANCY. The one just before Maunsell Bros., is for $560.34.

The PRIME MINISTER. That does not alter what I said—that the items are small. The explanation is—though I cannot be quite sure—that these are for small contracts which must be made with local dealers, as the meat is furnished at points where different detachments of the force are. It would be impossible to make a uniform contract, as local men must furnish the supply from day to day, or almost so. At Moosomin, for instance, we have five men, at Qu'Appelle, one man, at Wolseley, one man, at Saltcoats, three men, at Estevan, two men, at Wood Mountain, five men, and so on. The force is distributed all over the North-west Territories. My hon. friend (Mr. Clancy), must admit that we must deal with local dealers. But where we have large sums of money to expend, we follow the system of having contracts.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Auditor General's Report shows that Ashdown & Co., of Winnipeg, supplied goods under various items, to a total amount of $2,503.63. Mr. Ashdown, as I understand, was the defeated candidate in the last general election. For the same line of goods, considerable purchases were made from Messrs. Adams Bros., of Brandon, and Mr. Adams was the defeated candidate in the local election. They furnished a total of $2,460 worth. For instance, they sold horse blankets, 61 at $3 : 24 at $4. They furnished everything in the harness line. These goods, I am quite sure, could be furnished much cheaper by the largest harness establishment in the North-west Territories in Winnipeg, if competition had been allowed. But this would give a chance to Mr. Hutchings, and as he is a Conservative, of course it would not do to let him tender. I find that Bate & Sons, of Ottawa, appear in the accounts of the Yukon and the North-west Mounted Police, at M-38, Auditor General's Report, for $9,829.45. These groceries are purchased here at Ottawa, and sent out to the Yukon. Were these goods purchased by tender?

The PRIME MINISTER. I could not say, for I have not the management of the force in the Yukon. I do not intend to discuss the item now, but I think that these goods have been supplied under tender.

Mr. DAVIN. In the Auditor General's Report at page M-14, I find an item:

Galibert, P., Montreal, riding boots,
2,101 pairs at $4.85 $10,189 85

This is a very high price. These riding boots could just as well have been purchased in the North-west Territories. Suppose that, in consequence of not calling for tenders, this gentleman gets 20 per cent more than would have been paid, the difference is quite an item. It may be said: What signifies $500 or $700 of an item of $10,000? But it is in these small items that extravagance runs rampant. This argument that these small items do not matter, is the argument of the spendthrift, who says, because he has a good income: It is only an extra box of cigars, or an extra box of champagne. But, in the end he finds he has spent more than his income. We have not gone into any great public work, and yet here is an expenditure gone up to between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000, from the $36,500,000, which the right hon. gentleman, in 1893, called a convention to declare was a monstrous thing. And we have the Minister of Finance boasting of a surplus, money that he is taking out of trade, doing what the right hon. gentleman has declared, and what Gladstone has declared, was a monstrous thing. He is boasting of a surplus, and yet we are running into debt, and here, there and everywhere are shovelling out money to be picked up by the Ashdowns, the Galiberts and the Gauthiers.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman has delivered a very eloquent speech but without having any ground to base it upon. He talks of the Galiberts getting contracts without tender. The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong.

Mr. DAVIN. Were public tenders called for?

The PRIME MINISTER. Here is the contract, given after tender, and the articles are the very best to be had in the market.

Mr. DAVIN. By circular?

The PRIME MINISTER. By public tender.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the right hon. gentleman give us a copy of the tender?

The PRIME MINISTER. With pleasure.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If I understood the Prime Minister correctly, this amount which he is asking for to pay the force has nothing to do with the force employed outside of the Territories proper, nothing to do with the Yukon district.

The PRIME MINISTER. No, there is a special estimate for the force in the Yukon.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My hon. friend from Assiniboia has referred to me as expressing an opinion which I am prepared to stand by. I think that the force which was selected in the mounted police which went from the east was a success, and the fact of the west possessing my hon. friend is a further proof that a man going from the east does not injure the west in any shape or form. I do not think the right hon. leader of the House has made a very strong case when he discussed how he laid out his estimates for supplies. If you put 500 men in one place, as the hon. gentleman said, and 100 in another place, you do not thereby have an assurance that you can rely upon the supplies being furnished by local people. In a military course, as it is universally known, supposing your force is composed of 5,000 men, if you send five men to one place, and ten to another, and twenty-five to another, your stores are drawn upon by a requisition which is sent in by the officer commanding the different columns, and there is an end of it. But I think the right hon. gentleman has not consulted the Minister of Militia and Defence upon this very complicated question, because the Minister of Finance will tell him that it would be impossible for him to keep a thousand men according to the lines laid down by the right hon. gentleman in regard to supplies. I believe that every supply should be provided for by contract. As the right hon. gentleman properly stated, these are outside supplies. You go into a district where you require to expend $100 or $1,000 for a force, not because you did not call for tenders, but because the supply cannot be furnished from headquarters. Your stores at headquarters in Ottawa, or Winnipeg, or wherever the headquarters are for the mounted police, are drawn upon to meet every requisition that comes from the commanding officer, or the man who has to sign the requisition. Then the country knows that every requisition has been provided for by headquarters, that contracts have been called for by the government, and the goods have been supplied under these contracts.

Office of the Comptroller of the North-west Mounted Police, clerical and other assistance, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act $900

The PRIME MINISTER. This item of $900 is for the contingencies of the office of the Comptroller of the Mounted Police in Ottawa. It is a new item, and it is explained as follows: Last year we had a messenger who was transferred to the Inland Revenue Department. His name is Edward Hinchey, and he received a salary of $500. We want a new appropriation of $300 for a messenger, and apart from that we want $600 more for clerical assistance. The work of the office has been very largely increased, as everybody knows, largely on account of the Yukon, and we want for this additional clerical assistance $600, and for a messenger $300.

Office of the Comptroller of the North-west Mounted Police $10,300

The PRIME MINISTER. There is an increase of $150. The explanation is as follows: The chief clerk, Mr. Fortescue, whose salary is $2,050, will receive $2,100. Mr. Fisher, first-class clerk, whose salary is $1,650, will receive $1,700, and Mr. Duplessis, will receive an increase of $50, making, in all, $150.

Mr. PRIOR. Is Mr. Fisher a relation of the hon. Minister of Agriculture?

The PRIME MINISTER. No relation whatever.

Civil Government—Post Office Department $202,455

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) give some slight information about this large amount?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The item is not as large as formerly, being $600 less. This is for salaries of the inside service.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. But the hon. gentleman knows that he reduced salaries by cutting down the annual increase of the civil servants who were entitled to it. I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that this is the reduction which has been made in his department.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The inside service, in all the departments is undergoing certain changes because of the action of the late administration in having abolished third-class clerkships, and as promotions take place, or vacancies occur in third-class clerkships, it has only been possible to fill them by appointing temporary writers under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. These changes are going on continually in the public service.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I would ask the hon. gentleman to reply to the question which I have submitted to him. My contention is—it may be right or wrong, but I think it is right—that, under the law the hon. gentleman is bound to pay the annual increment to the men who are in his department. He refused to do so, and I still believe that if any of the officers in his department would appeal to the courts they would have the right to recover from the government the amount of money which they have been refused. I want to know whether the hon. gentleman, in discussing the item, without giving any explanation, does not admit that this annual increment, which should have been paid, is taken out of that amount.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman, I think, is quite in error in his law. I do not think that he will find any lawyer to support the view that the staff are entitled to an increase as a matter of law.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is not the opinion of the government, nor is it the opinion of the legal adviser of the government, the Minister of Justice. Increases do not take place merely because so many hours or days elapse after one is in the office. Other things have to take place. Not merely by the vote of parliament even can they be compelled. Even when parliament votes the money that does not give the officer a legal right to their increase. A recommendation would have to be made to council, council would then have to make an appropriation and pass an order in council, and the increase would then become a charge on the vote. At all events, this government has not asked for all the statutory increases that are spoken of. We are asking for increases on merit, and in that way considerable increases have from time to time been made. In the estimates hon. gentlemen will find considerable sums for increases running through the various departments.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). Not one increase in this.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes, there are some.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would you point them out? I have been looking for them and I cannot find them.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In the vote forty-three on the next page.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, but on this vote for the staff.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Vote 43 is part of it, and vote 43 contains sixty-one increases.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As I understand it, the minister is not asking for an increase for one single officer in that branch.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In the supplementary estimates for next year, there will be some items of increases in the inside service in connection with this vote.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then, the minister was wrong, and I am right, that there is not one increase provided for in this main estimate.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. We will discuss the supplementary estimates when they come down, but that has nothing to do with this. I tell the Postmaster General that there are two clauses in the Post Office Act, one which states that the clerks shall be paid so much per annum according to their rank, and that they shall receive so much a year as an annual increase. There is another clause in that Post Office Act which explains that the only reason why this increase shall be refused is when the civil servant is stated not to have fulfilled his duty, and that recommendation comes to the minister and the minister refers it to council. That is the law of the land in regard to this matter. When the hon. gentleman tells the country that he is saving so many thousand dollars a year by keeping away from the civil servants the money they are entitled to, he is not treating the country as he should. I believe that if a test case were taken before the courts the civil servants could recover their statutory increase under these two clauses in the Post Office Act. I am not going to tell the Postmaster General that his law is wrong as he said my law was wrong, but I will tell him that he has not read it or he would know differently; and I am quite certain that if an appeal were taken to the courts, the courts would decide against the view of the Postmaster General.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I confess that I cannot see where the decrease is here.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will tell the hon. gentleman. Mr. Matheson, the superintendent of the saving branch, was retired, and Mr. Harrington, next in command, was appointed in his place. Mr. Matheson's salary was $2,600, and Mr. Harrington's salary was made $1,800.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The figures are blurred in my copy of the estimates.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. And they will be blurred before the country also. If there is one man known in Canada as having been the best official in that department it was Mr. Matheson. I knew him when I was head of the department, and I know he is quite capable of carrying out his duties. The Postmaster General made a mistake in appointing a man who, I do not believe, is the equal of Mr. Matheson in so far as experience is concerned, and giving him an increased salary. The Postmaster General never told us whether this decrease is comprised in the reduction he has made by not paying the annual increases to the civil servants of his department.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not think my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron) seriously means to take exception to the retirement of Mr. Matheson. Mr. Matheson was a very efficient officer, and I endorse all the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) has said with regard to him. If the hon. gentleman wishes to insinuate that Mr. Matheson was retired at my suggestion, or that his was a compulsory retirement, brought about under the slightest pressure from me or from the government, I can assure the hon. gentleman he is entirely in error. I regret as much as my hon. friend, or any one else, the retirement of Mr. Matheson. Mr. Matheson, a year before his retirement, called upon me and stated he was in very poor health; that some years ago he had been seriously ill and had been obliged to go abroad on extended leave of absence. He complained of nervousness and pain in the head, brought about by extreme anxiety in consequence of his very responsible position. After travelling awhile and being under treatment, Mr. Matheson recovered and was well for some years. But, in the year preceding his retirement, he told me that he feared a recurrence of his old trouble. I told him that his appearance certainly did not sustain the view that he was at all likely to be incapacitated, for he looked the picture of health. I thought at the moment that it was only fancy, and I begged of him to consider the matter. A few months went by, and he again brought it to my attention, and about the end of the year, towards Christmas, he told me he was afraid he would have to retire. I asked him if he would not take a few months leave of absence to see if freedom from the cares of office might not give him the health he desired. He took a few months leave of absence, but after that he came back one day and said he was afraid his health would break down, and he could not stand the office, and so I very reluctantly consented to part with him. So much for Mr. Matheson's retirement.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The Postmaster General will permit me to say, that reluctant as he was to allow Mr. Matheson to retire, he was not reluctant to give increased pay to the man who succeeded him. Mr. Matheson was one of the best men it was possible to place at the head of that branch; he had almost established it; he had many years' experience in its management; and he must have known more about it than any new man could possibly know. I know that the hon. gentleman is quite sincere in stating that he recognized his merits; but, recognizing his merits and then giving a new man a larger salary than the man whose merits he recognizes is beyond anything I can explain.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My hon. friend seems not to have understood me. I did not say that Mr. Harrington was given a higher salary than Mr. Matheson. What I explained to the hon. member for Pictou was that the reduction of $600 arose from the fact that Mr. Matheson had been paid $2,400, while Mr. Harrington is being paid

$1,800. I find that I was in error in having stated that Mr. Harrington had received an increase. I believe there is a tradition, or rather a law, that when a man is at the head of his class, and is promoted from that class to the next higher class, the honour of the promotion counts for a time as emolument in lieu of increase of salary. Mr. Harrington is a worthy man, however, and is entitled to receive an increase in due course. But at present he does not receive an increase.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the hon. gentleman say that there are no increases in the salaries of the staff of his department this year?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There will be some proposed in the supplementary estimates. My hon. friend knows that a Bill has been introduced by the Minister of Finance to increase the maximum salaries of the packers of the Post Office Department, and if that Bill becomes law, parliament will be asked to make a slight increase in the salaries of the packers. I prefer to ask all the increases in one vote, instead of having part of them here and part of them in the Civil Service Bill now before parliament.

Mr. CLANCY. I understand that the Bill of the Minister of Finance goes further than that. That hon. gentleman, when he introduced the Bill, stated that it was for the purpose of filling up the gap between those in the temporary service and the second-class clerks, and that it will apply to the service generally. Speaking broadly, it is to provide a class to take the place of those who were formerly third-class clerks. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will be able to tell the committee now who are to be selected for special favours this year, because that is what it means, nothing more nor less. I venture to say that if there is a clerk in his department who has offended his superior, he will find a black mark placed opposite his name; and no matter how good an officer he may be, if he has not made a settlement with his superior in the meantime, he will get no advance. The system we have now has practically enslaved every civil servant to the will and the wish and the whims and the evil designs of those who will connive and plot to further their own positions in the service. It is all well enough to say that that does not happen. That is simply human nature, and to give a person a chance to do it means that it will be done, more or less. Whether the system which has been set aside was perfect or not, I will not say; but I will venture to say that no system could be open to greater objections than the one adopted by the present government. As time goes on the difficulties will not be minimized, but greatly increased, in spite of the diligence of the head of the department. It will be utterly impossible for him to control such influences as must arise. I do not care how strong the minister is, he is perfectly helpless to effect a remedy under a system of that kind. But I ask the hon. gentleman if he can give the committee the names of those who are to be selected on what we believe to be the score of favour which he may say is on the score of merit.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman has a very winning way, and I would like to give proof of my having recognized it by meeting his inquiry; but I would remind him that until the estimates are laid on the Table, it would be premature for me to proceed to discuss them. They will stand discussion then, and my hon. friend will have all the particulars of the increases when they come down together. I do not want to bring them down piecemeal.

Mr. CLANCY. I can tell the hon. gentleman that may seem a very good answer from him; but in the face of the fact that there is a statute providing for statutory increases, it does not look well for him in supplementary estimates to propose advances for the officials of his department. It bears all the colour and flavour pointed out a moment ago. Nothing could be worse for the service than to have the possibility of these increases held over their heads or to be delayed instead of providing for them in the main estimates if they are to be made at all. But the hon. gentleman has forgotten what he said a moment ago, that the increases were to apply to packers alone, or are they to be given to his staff generally?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My hon. friend has misunderstood me. I certainly did not say that the increases I intend to recommend to council would include packers alone. What I did say was, that there is a Bill before parliament to increase the maximum salaries of packers, and as that Bill will likely become law, the government would probably ask parliament to enable these packers this session to enjoy the benefits of it. For that reason, I do not think it worth while to put part of the increases in the main estimates and part in the supplementary estimates, but they will all go into the supplementaries, which will not be limited to the packers alone. I am sure that my hon. friend will approve of the measure the Minister of Finance has introduced, raising the maximum of the packers, who are a very meritorious class, from $500 to $600.

Mr. CLANCY. That Bill does not apply to first-class clerks and neither does it apply to second-class clerks now in the service. It simply applies to another grade to be established in the second-class. Is it proposed to make any increases to those who do not come within the scope of the Bill?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY.

Mr. CLANCY. Then one would naturally expect to have such increases provided for in the main estimates. The hon. gentleman may put the increases where he likes, but I do not see why these, which are not provided for in the Bill referred to, should be suspended for the present and put in the supplementary estimates.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It will not make any difference to the staff whether their increases are included in the main or the supplementary estimates. They will all go through in the one Supply Bill and become payable at the same time. The increases to be submitted to council will not be confined to the class covered by the Bill already alluded to, but the supplementaries will give the increases generally in all the classes.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I would like to know whether the decrease in the estimates is due to the amount which the hon. gentleman has saved by not paying the statutory increases, and also what amount of money the hon. gentleman has received for the new stamps he issued, and which stamp collectors inform me comes to a very large amount.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman will find that a considerable number of increases have been made. The staff is a continually changing one, and there are constantly vacancies and new appointments. The hon. gentleman knows that, under the measure of 1895, third-class clerks were abolished and now we have only the temporary writers class. It would require an audit showing the different clerks' salaries and what would have been expended if they had received the annual allowance which my hon. friend says should go to them as a matter of right. That is not of consequence here; we are dealing with what we are going to vote and not with what has been voted or what has been withheld in years gone by. I can only say, as has been stated by members of the government before that the law officers of the government at any rate, Sir Oliver Mowat and his successor Mr. Mills, have both held that what have been known as statutory increases are not a matter of right, but depend upon other conditions as well. My hon. friend wants to know how much we realized from the sale of Dominion stamps.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. From collectors.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am not aware of any account being kept or stamps being ear-marked so as to show that. All the stamps are sold in the ordinary way, and through the ordinary channels, and the government does not know what is done with them by those who buy them. But I should think it not at all surprising, if in admiration of some of these stamps, persons should treasure them as works of art.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Schedule 'B' of the Civil Service Act provides that the salaries of clerks in the Post Office Department shall be increased by $40 annually to $800. This shows that when a man goes into the department as a third-class clerk, he is entitled to increase until his salary reaches $800, and the only reason why he may be deprived of it is that he is reported to his minister as not attending to his duties as a civil servant. This is not a matter with me of making a point against the government; it is a question of appealing to parliament and to the country to give justice to men who have been deprived for four or five years of the increases of salaries that they are entitled to, and that they were deprived of by hon. gentlemen in an attempt to show—he has not succeeded; his work was clumsy—that he was reducing the expenditure of his department. I can give the figures to show that it is only by the extra revenues received from the sale of these extra issues of stamps that he has succeeded in bringing up the revenue of his department. That plan was recommended to me by those who were advising me when I was Postmaster General. They said: Make a new issue of stamps, and collectors will be glad to purchase them, and so you will make a lot of money. We see these collections all over the world. There are some collections that are worth thousands of pounds. Take the Duke of York for instance, his collections are estimated at a very large amount of money. When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) ceased selling these stamps, his surplus disappeared; and now he is relying on depriving the civil servants of their well-earned salaries. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman the amount of money that the new stamps brought into the department, and also the amount which, if these increases had been paid to which the civil servants were entitled, would have been added to the expenditure.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have answered the hon. gentleman several times already, but I have no objection to answering him again. The gross vote does not include any increases which my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron) calls statutory increases.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) never answered that before.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I intended to answer that; no doubt the error was mine. As to the amount received for the sale of certain postage stamps—

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Jubilee stamps.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Very well, call them Jubilee stamps—I have only to say that stamps issued by the department have been sent in the regular way to postmasters in response to their requests for stamps and by them sold in the regular way to the public. The department has no means of knowing what use has been made of them by the public. Some may have been treasured up, just as many other stamps are.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. But if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) knows the working of his department, he knows that his books show—or ought to show—the amount received from the sale of stamps. That is all I want, and the country is entitled to know these facts. What I want to get at is the amount received for the sale of Jubilee stamps. I wish to know how much money was spent by Canada for stamps, and how much money was received by the Postmaster General for stamps. That is a plain question, to which it is easy to reply. If I were in the hon. gentleman's position, by sending for Mr. Matheson, whom he replaced by another gentleman, I could get the whole thing in five minutes. These accounts are kept day by day, the book shows daily the expenditures for stamps, and the money which is received for them. How else could we control the expenditure of a great department like the Post Office, covering probably $2,500,000? It would be impossible. The hon. gentleman sees that I am not asking anything that is unfair or unreasonable. I am asking information that the people of Canada require.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The amount received for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, as appears on page 3 of the Postmaster General's Report, for the sale of postage stamps, post cards, &c., is set down as $4,091,116.11.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That proves my contention exactly. That is a normal year for the sale of stamps, and the hon. gentleman has placed that amount to the credit of his department, and he has tried to convince his supporters and the country that he made a great saving and increased the revenue enormously. I have all the figures. I gave them on a previous occasion, when I was sorry not to see the hon. gentleman in his seat. For instance, we had a comparison of the statements contained in the reports of the Postmaster General for the year 1896-7-8, showing that the expenditure for mail service, by stage and other vehicles, or by hand, was as follows:

1896.....	$847,080
1897.....	847,660
1898.....	765,660

For Steamboat Services.

1896.....	$79,218
1897.....	83,734
1898.....	84,743

For Railway Mail Service.
1896.....	$1,285,383
1897.....	1,350,786
1898.....	1,352,257
For Salaries (Outside Service.)
1896.....	$1,249,402
1897.....	1,250,609
1898.....	1,175,155
Total Expenditure.
1896.....	$3,665,011
1897.....	3,789,478
1898.....	3,575,411

The reduction in the whole expenditure for 1898, as compared with 1896, was $80,000. Of this reduction, $74,217 was saved by withholding from the junior members of the outside service the annual increase of their salaries. These are facts. The hon. gentleman's contention is, that he acted, under the advice of the law officers of the Crown, who advised that they did not consider it was proper for the hon. gentleman to give which I considered to be, under the law, an absolute condition of their engagement, if I may so call it, or, more properly speaking, their appointment to the civil service. Now, the hon. gentleman knows that the issue of the new stamps is practically exhausted in so far as the revenue is concerned, but that issue brought into the coffers of the government $100,000, and that was all put down as being due to the wonderful energy and practical ability of the Postmaster General. I do not deny his energy or his practical ability, but he has saved $74,000 in money which he kept back from the clerks who were doing the work of that department. The hon. gentleman has been so saving in his department that he has called upon his colleague, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), to carry his letters; he has actually placed his mail bags on the backs of the mounted police, and he has got his good friend the Minister of the Interior to pay the expenditure of carrying those bags. In my time, when we sent letters, and in the time of every Postmaster General, when we sent postal matter, we called for tenders, and the Postmaster General was bound to find the money by putting an amount in the estimate which he submitted to parliament. But the hon. gentleman does better. He says: The mounted police have been sent out there by my friend the Minister of the Interior, and I am going to get them to carry my mail bags and have the Department of the Interior pay for it. And he says: Look, the Yukon is giving us a very large revenue. And so it has been. But surely the hon. gentleman does not consider that the matter is properly put before the people of Canada. If $100,000 is paid by the Department of the Interior for post office service, and if the hon. Postmaster General does not tell the people what that amount of money is for, then, he does not take the people into his confidence, he does not take parliament into his confidence, and I do not believe it is a proper way in which estimates should be laid before parliament. I consider that if the hon. Postmaster General made use of the mounted police force in the Yukon to accomplish the post office service he should reimburse the Department of the Interior for the service performed by the mounted police. That is in accordance with my traditions of the cabinet, and in accordance with the way in which I used to treat my colleagues, and the way in which my colleagues used to treat me. When the Riel trouble was taking place several of the departments were brought into play and I used to have demands made against my department as regularly as I used to send claims in against other departments, and in that way the books were kept and the country knew what the expenditure was. When the hon. gentleman gets the Interior Department to perform his postal service in the Yukon, and takes the revenue for the Post Office Department he makes a statement which the country cannot understand.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If the hon. gentleman looks at page xiii., he will find a reference to the Yukon mail service. I may explain that last session this matter was discussed in parliament, and I stated then that I contemplated, as soon as possible, to obtain a safe contractor to carry the mails and to take the service from the mounted police, but, I considered it more important to secure the performance of the service than merely to try to take the service away from the police, and that therefore, until we could safely make the transfer we intended to utilize the mounted police. I also stated to parliament that at the end of the fiscal year an account would be taken as to the cost to the police of their carrying the mails, and that the accounts so ascertained would be returned to parliament, that it would not be withheld from the public, but that it would be made known to the public. Parliament assented, and nobody dissented from that proposition. When the fiscal year closed on June 30 last, the comptroller of the North-west Mounted Police, Mr. White, was asked to make up the account of his department, and he did make up his account for the cost of the service performed by the mounted police, and that account appears on page xiii. of the departmental report. It says:

During the winter season the North-west Mounted Police performed for the Post Office Department the following services:

Sixteen trips from Bennett to Dawson.
Thirteen trips from Dawson to Bennett.

It goes on:

The total value of the service so rendered has been fixed by the Comptroller of Mounted Police at $47,400.

Then, a detailed report of the revenue and expenditure of the department for the year is set forth on page 14. It says :

The post office revenue for the Yukon and Atlin districts for the year amounted to $10,846.61.

And the expenditure was a very much greater sum.

Mr. WALLACE. How much ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. $69,350.39.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CAMPBELL. One at a time.

Mr. WALLACE. There are some hon. gentlemen who have an intellect no larger than to howl out 'one at a time,' like a parrot if two hon. gentlemen get up. I want to ask the hon. minister whether the $69,000 was charged in the accounts of the expenditure of the Post Office Department.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Everything in connection with the Yukon is charged in the accounts of the Post Office Department with the exception of the amount of the service rendered by the North-west Mounted Police.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the hon. minister mean to tell us that this portion of the legitimate expenditure that he said he was so anxious to ascertain from the Department of the Interior so that it might be charged to his department, because that could be the only object of ascertaining it, was not charged against his department ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. During my tenure of office, when I had occasion to open a post office which cost us a large amount of money and really produced no revenue at all I did so. I remember that $9,000 was expended under one contract, I think, in the Peace River district. In any case it was one of the new regions. Under such circumstances if we received only $10,000 or $5,000 or $2,000 my department came down and stated it in the estimates. We called for estimates, a contract was given to A, B, C, or D, and that contract cost Canada so much. The hon. gentleman has admitted exactly the whole point of my argument. I repeat to the hon. gentleman that he has had the work of his department done and paid for by the Interior Department, and that no doubt he made a saving in that way. If the Postmaster General can get every other department to pay for the work of his department, it is quite an easy matter for him to make a saving, as compared with his predecessors in office. The Postmaster General is not right in telling the country that he expended so much money in his department, when the fact is that he expended a great deal more. I have the figures to prove that the North-west Mounted Police were carrying the mail bags on their shoulders, and that his good and well-intentioned friend, the Minister of the Interior was paying all this expenditure, so as to enable the Postmaster General to tell parliament that he made a saving of nearly $250,000. We will have another opportunity of discussing this matter, and that opportunity, I will not fail to take advantage of. If you take the expenditure paid for him by the Department of the Interior, and the money he has made by peddling out new postage stamps, together with the statutory increases unjustly deducted from the civil servants, his surplus will disappear. This extraordinary system of book-keeping in the Post Office Department ought not to be tolerated by this parliament.

Mr. N. C. WALLACE. Before we get away from this (and we do not intend to get away from it until we know all about this matter), I would like to ask why the expenditure for the year in the Post Office Department, was not charged to the year. I want to know why, in making a financial statement of the receipts and expenditures for the financial year ending June 30, 1899, the Postmaster General has omitted $11,000 from one side of the account, and omitted $69,000 from the other side of the account, leaving a balance of $58,000. I think it is a deliberate misleading of the people of the country in presenting a bogus statement like that. This report says :

The post office revenue for the Yukon and Atlin districts for the year amounted to $10,846.61.

The expenditure, including the sum so fixed as the value of the services of the North-west Mounted Police, amounted to $69,350.39, the cost thus exceeding the revenue by $58,503.78.

Every year during the existence of the postal service, new routes are opened, and long distances must be traversed to settlements; and that mail service, of course, is run at a loss, but these expenses are honestly included in the accounts every year. Why should there be any difference made in reference to the establishment of post offices in the Yukon? Here we have a dishonest statement, because we have $11,000 on one side and $69,000 on the other suppressed. I do not think we should have such a statement of the case from the Postmaster General. The minister in charge of a department is bound to present a fair statement to parliament and to the people. That statement should be presented whether favourable or unfavourable, and the minister can make whatever explanation he pleases in regard to it, but the House and the country must have a straight presentation of the case, and they have not got it here. The report of the Post Office Department tells us :

The financial operations of the year ending June 30, 1899, not including the revenue and expenditure in respect of the service in the Yukon and Atlin districts, as above mentioned (the same being above set forth), have resulted in a deficit of $398,917.79.

Why did they not present a proper statement, and say that the deficit is $398,917, plus $58,000, amounting to $456,000, instead of presenting a statement of the case which is untrue, unfair, and misleading in every way. The Postmaster General knows that the deficit is $456,000, and he knows that the $69,000 expenditure in carrying the mails to the Yukon, and the $11,000 receipts, are just as essential to be placed in the receipts and expenditure respectively, as are the expenditures on the mail service to Toronto, or Ottawa, or North York, or anywhere else in the Dominion. I would like to hear the Postmaster General give us an explanation of that, and when he is done with that, we have several other problems which we are going to present to him.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Considering the explanations already offered, it would seem scarcely necessary again to refer to the subject; but since the hon. member for West York asks me to explain it, I will try to meet his wishes. He states—I will not quote his words, which are extreme, violent and unwarranted—that these accounts are not correct; and I referred him to the very frank statement on pages xiii and xiv, and to the statement on page 4.

Mr. CLANCY. What the committee is most anxious to know is why that frank statement is put in there, and not charged up properly.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If I may be allowed to make that part of my explanation, I will proceed to do so. I explained before that the Yukon and Atlin service was regarded as a special service. In former days, at the opening of the North-west Territories, it was customary to put all such items into one account and charge them as expenditures in connection with the North-west Territories. That is what I am informed by the comptroller of the mounted police. With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Three Rivers, as to the manner in which he conducted the Yukon service—

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I never referred to it. In my time the Yukon was unknown.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have heard of only one case which the hon. gentleman had in connection with the Yukon; that was the case of a contractor who was given an order to take a mail in, and who got as far as the White Pass, lost his bag, and returned. Another one made a round trip or two, I believe, and sent in his account. That was all the experience my hon. friend had of the Yukon.

Mr. WALLACE.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That was not very good.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Now, the Auditor General, I presume, entered up in his own way, in the public accounts, in accordance with the vote of parliament, all the gross receipts and gross expenditures of each department up to the 30th of June; but in connection with this particular department, I explained to parliament how it was necessary in the public interest that we should continue to use the mounted police until we could arrange for an efficient service in another way. Parliament approved of that, and we did utilize the police. Any one who turns up Hansard of last year will find that I said that I did not ask parliament for a vote, because I had no idea what the service would cost, that we were not inviting tenders, but that when the mounted police ascertained at the end of the fiscal year how much it had cost them to carry the mails, we would report that in the Post Office Report. That has been done, and the report has been extremely careful to present a frank statement to public. On pages xiii and xiv it is stated that the service was performed by the mounted police, and that $47,000 was charged to us on account of that service. In this report the accounts are not dealt with as the Auditor General deals with them, but a paragraph, under the heading of 'financial operations,' shows how the revenue and the expenditure of the department for the year compared, and states that the result is a deficit of $398,917.79, over and above any deficit that might occur by reason of the Yukon mail service, and the deficit of the Yukon mail service was $58,503.78 in addition. As if that was not sufficient, you find on page 4 of the report a statement of the gross revenue and the net revenue of the department for the year, and the gross expenditure for the year; and a foot note states that the revenue set forth here does not include the revenue of the Yukon and Atlin districts, and that the expenditure set forth does not include the expenditure for the Yukon and Atlin service. So that you find that the net deficit on the Yukon and Atlin services for the year is $58,503, and the deficit on the balance of the service is $398,917. This makes it perfectly clear to any person what the financial results of the department for the year were.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the total deficit?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman can find out for himself by adding together those two figures.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is as clear as mud to my mind. The more the hon. gentleman explains, the more difficult it is for me to understand; I have no doubt it must be my fault. Nobody complains of the hon. gentleman making use of the mounted police for the Yukon postal service. It may be that in the conditions of that country it would be impossible to get up a service as efficient as the service the hon. gentleman organized; but what is a surprise to the country is that the hon. gentleman takes the revenue from that service as a part of the increased revenue of his department, but does not charge against it the total expenditure. Now, the country is entitled to know how much the Postmaster General spends per annum in his department, and how much the revenue of that department is. It is all very well for the hon. gentleman to pose as an economical minister, but when he gets the mounted police to do postal service, and gets the Interior Department to pay the expense, that is not a saving affected in the postal administration. The cost of the mounted police, when employed in the postal service, should be charged against the hon. gentleman's department.

When I had charge of the hon. gentleman's department, I remember having given out a contract that cost some $8,000 for establishing a postal service in a new country, which at the outset only gave $2,000 of postal revenue, but I was able to show that the increase in customs dues and inland revenue collections in that district more than recouped us for the loss in operating the postal service, without which that district could not have been developed at all.

Mr. PRIOR. I wish to call attention to the item of $215 for allowances paid to officers of the dead letter office, because of the increased cost of living in Manitoba and British Columbia. No doubt the cost of living there is greater, and I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman still continues to pay a provisional allowance to post office clerks and carriers, but it seems to me that the phraseology of this item might well be altered. We are trying to get as many people as we can into those provinces, and do not want to send out to the world, in an official blue-book, the statement that the cost of living there is greater than elsewhere, as such an official statement might be the means of keeping some people away. I would suggest that the item should read instead: 'Because of the exceptional circumstances of the service in those provinces.'

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have no objection to adopt that phraseology, although the item is worded as it has been for years.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not see how the wording can be changed, because the allowance is based on the statement of fact that the cost of living is larger in those provinces than in the others.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the hon. minister prepared to say, how much saving was effected in his department last year in consequence of the statutory increases not having been given?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There cannot be said to be a saving when we do not give the statutory increases. If the hon. gentleman wants to know the total amount that might, under the law, have been paid out in statutory increases to the various clerks, he could easily ascertain that by taking the staff and seeing how much each member of it would have obtained, but a calculation of that kind does not enter into our accounts at all.

Mr. PRIOR. With regard to the clerks and letter carriers in the Victoria post office, they were all given statutory increases in 1895-6. But in 1896-7 and 1897-8 the Postmaster General saw fit not to give them their increases, whereas in 1899 he did. Is there any reason why those men should have been kept out of their ordinary statutory increases in 1897 and 1898 and not in 1899? If justice were done, they would be paid the amount kept back in 1896-7 and 1897-8. The statutory increases can not have been kept back because they did not do their duty, and they went into the service expecting these yearly increases. I should like to have the hon. minister promise to see that these people are given their back pay.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am not able to go into the figures of 1897-8. No doubt it was then discussed.

Mr. PRIOR. No, it was not.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That would be the hon. gentleman's own omission. The whole subject was then threshed out from day to day. As to the question whether we propose to give these men back pay, I do not think that is a fair way to designate the non-increase in salaries. We are to-day increasing the allowance to the letter carriers by some $60 per year. The allowance which was formerly given them, under the late government, was $10 and we have increased that to $15 a month. We have increased them $55 or $60 a year; so that, even if we did not quite carry out the hon. gentleman's idea in adding to their remuneration in one way, we perhaps have gone a little better than he in another respect.

Mr. PRIOR. I suppose the hon. Postmaster General gives that as a reason why the back pay should not be given. The fact is, the post office inspector went to Vancouver and Victoria to see how the post office department was carried on, and reported that owing to the excessive cost of living at Vancouver, an increase of $5 a month should be given to the post office officials there. But he did not report the same as to Victoria. I think Hansard will show that I brought this subject up in the House and asked why the increase was given to Vancouver and not to Victoria. I am glad to say that the Postmaster General looked into the matter—I suppose—and promised it should be given, and since then it has been given. But, I do not think that that is a reason why the statutory increases on the regular salary, which were withheld in 1897 and 1898, should not be given now. When I said I thought the matter was not discussed, I believe I was mistaken—it was discussed, but no reason was given by the Postmaster General why the increases should not be given, except that it was not mandatory, that it lay with the Postmaster General to say whether they should be given or not. There are a number of points I wish to bring forward with regard to the post office service in British Columbia, but they may be more appropriately discussed on other items. But, as to the point now under discussion, I am of opinion that when men go in expecting that they will get these increases, the Postmaster General should give them, whether the law is mandatory or not.

Mr. CLANCY. A rather new doctrine was laid down by the Postmaster General to-night, and that is, that if the statutory increases have not been made, we did not make a demand for them. That is the sum and substance of his argument. Will he adopt the rule, that when a demand is made he will admit that he has no longer an excuse for refusing them? What we contend for is that there should be some regular system adopted in this matter. Now, coming back to the answer that the hon. gentleman gave me, it was to the effect that if I wanted the information asked for I could figure it out myself. I have been under the impression that it was the Postmaster General's duty to give such information as I asked for before he got his estimates through. I think my question was not unreasonable—namely, to state to the committee what the saving has been by reason of not giving the statutory increases to a portion of his staff, or the whole of it, as the case may be. If he does not like the manner in which the question was put, I am willing to modify it in any way to suit his taste.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I did not wish to be lacking in courtesy to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy); but he put a hypothetical case—

Mr. CLANCY. Not a hypothetical case.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL—supposing you had increased the salaries of so many officers, how much would it have amounted to? Well, there is nothing in the law to say that we shall increase them by any particular sum, the increase may be whatever parliament chooses to vote. He puts a hypothetical case; let me put another. Let him figure out what he thinks each clerk should receive by way of increase and tell me the total. That proposition has nothing to do with the financial accounts of the government; because we have not proceeded in that way to increase salaries, but have increased them according to our own construction of the statutes.

Mr. CLANCY. But the hon. gentleman and his friends are boasting that they have made great saving in his department. For instance, he shows what they have saved in mail contracts. I am not putting a hypothetical case, but am asking a plain matter of fact. In some cases, increases have been made, and in some cases they have not, and the hon. gentleman knows whether there is a saving by that method or not. The question seems to me so reasonable that the hon. gentleman can scarcely refuse to give an answer. The policy he is pursuing may be one affecting the efficiency of the service.

Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps I may be able to give the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) the information he wants. The clause in the Post Office Act under which the post office clerks are entitled to increases, is entirely distinct from the Civil Service Act. He speaks of having the opinion of the Minister of Justice. Perhaps it was an opinion on the Civil Service Act, but not on this clause in the Post Office Act. If the increases were given as they were ordinarily made, at the rate of about $70,000 a year. Had this been done, the estimate he would have required over his present estimate would have been about $200,000.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will not attempt to contradict the hon. gentleman's statement to-night; but, just for the sake of elucidation, when my supplementary estimates come up—and I shall have some increases to discuss—I shall be prepared with a statement showing what would have been the disbursements of the department if we had proceeded as he proposes. I think the hon. gentleman's estimate is wide of the mark, but I need not discuss that now.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I might save the hon. gentleman some trouble by giving him the exact figures. The amount is $74,217.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Probably the taxpayers of Canada will approve of my policy a little.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not think they will. The taxpayers of Canada do not approve of a policy that will keep a salary from any man who has earned it.

Mr. DAVIN. Is the Postmaster General doing anything to place the mail clerks in the North-west Territories in the position they were in when he made a cut in their salaries?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am not aware of having made a cut in the salaries of any clerks in the service.

Mr. DAVIN. Whether that be so or not, I think the original allowance they did have should be restored. The Minister of Customs has been up to the North-west and finds that the rate of living is so much higher than it is in the east, that he has decided to increase the salaries of the officers in his department; and I think the hon. Postmaster General should take the same facts into consideration, and increase the salaries of the mail clerks.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. When the hon. gentleman asks me to restore to the mail clerks the allowance originally granted them, he does not know what he is asking for. Let me tell him that the extra allowance paid them was 10 per cent of their salaries. Well, the average salary of mail clerks in the Territories is composed of the salary and mileage. The average salary of a mail clerk, leaving out his mileage, is $700. 10 per cent of that would be $70. Instead of increasing their special allowance by 10 per cent, which would be only $70 a year, I have increased it to $10 a month, or $120 a year. I do not think the hon. gentleman wants to go back to the former scale of payment.

Mr. DAVIN. I want to ask the minister what mileage he allows the mail clerks at present?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Their mileage is fixed by statute. I think it is one cent per mile during the day, and one and a half cents a mile during the night. The rate is found in the appendix in the schedule of the Post Office Act.

Mr. WALLACE. The minister said he was informed that in the olden days it was the custom to put the carrying of the mails in the Yukon country into the regular charges. Can he tell us any one year in which that was done, or quote us a specific precedent? If there were such a precedent it would not be justification for a misstatement of the case. In his report he explains the deficit was a certain amount of money: 'The financial operations of the year ended June 30, 1899, not including the revenue and expenditure in respect to the service in the Yukon and Atlin districts, have resulted in a deficit of $398,000.' Well, I asked what was the total deficit, and the Postmaster General told me, with his usual urbanity, that I could add up the figures for myself and ascertain. Of course I could, and I have, and I have ascertained that his statement is a falsehood, and that the House is being misled by that report of the Postmaster General. The statement I have from the public accounts which is one thing, his statement is another thing, and neither of them is the truth. Now, I turn to the public accounts for the year ending June 30, 1899, giving a statement of the revenue and expenditure of the post office for that year. I have the book here before me. The revenue is $3,196,776 and the expenditure $3,584,848, the difference between the revenue and expenditure being $388,072. That is the deficit, according to the report of the Minister of Finance. But, Mr. Chairman, are these figures all wrong because the hon. Postmaster General makes a different statement? Here we have the figures from the Postmaster General in his report for the same year, and he quotes $398,000, which is $10,000 more. But this is a false statement, because there is a deficit of $58,000 in addition in the Yukon. Why should the Yukon be separated from the statement of the business of the postal department, because the expenditure, I see, is very large and the revenue is pretty small? There are some places where the receipts are pretty large and the expenditures pretty small. They do not separate them, but they give the whole expenditure under the law, as the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) tells us. You ought to have a proper statement of the affairs of the Post Office Department. We have not got that. The hon. Postmaster General says further, that: We decided to put this matter into the hands of the mounted police and employ them to carry the mails. He said that parliament approved of that course. I would like to know when it was submitted for the approval of parliament, when parliament approved of it and in what way parliament approved of it. I am speaking to the hon. Postmaster General. The Postmaster General is too high and mighty to pay any attention to criticisms or remarks.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am listening.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. Postmaster General is not listening; he is attending to other work. I will wait until he is through, and then I will resume my remarks, because I think every member of this House is entitled to some courtesy, even from the Postmaster General. He might take a lesson from his leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who never fails in courtesy to the humblest member in the House, while the hon. Postmaster General has never given any courtesy to any member of the House. But, it would seem that he does not know the rules which should guide the ordinary intercourse of gentlemen one with another.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. He is not a Frenchman.

Mr. WALLACE. I think he might, with advantage to himself, go and live among Frenchmen for a while, and learn from them those lessons of politeness for which they are noted.

Mr. DAVIN. Or take dancing lessons like the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton).

Mr. WALLACE. I am afraid he has not those graces that would qualify him to take dancing lessons. But, there has been a deficit of $398,000 plus $58,000, and we want to know why the hon. gentleman does not present a fair statement of the deficit, and why he did not include the Yukon expenditure as one of the regular expenditures of the department which should be included. The hon. Minister of Finance tells us that there has been a deficit for the year of $388,000. We have the statement of the hon. Postmaster General saying that the deficit is $10,000 more, or $398,000. But, when we accept the polite invitation of the hon. Postmaster General to add up the various figures and ascertain for ourselves what the deficit is we apply to the reports and we find that the deficit in the Yukon is $58,503, and that it has not been included in the statement of the financial operations of the Post Office Department for the year. But, when we add them together we find that the deficit is $457,420. These are the figures after all, when they come to be analysed. I say that we want accuracy, and we want a fair presentation of the case by the hon. Postmaster General. I would like to ask the hon. Postmaster General a question now. How many deputy ministers to-day are drawing superannuation allowances?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know how many the late government superannuated, and who are yet alive. I think I remember one. I superannuated one officer who had been some fifty years in the service. If the officer superannuated by the hon. gentleman's government is still alive, that would make two.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. minister tells us that he does not know the simplest affairs of his department. We have an exhibition of ignorance of affairs of his department which is acknowledged by himself when he says he does not know. He says that the Conservative party superannuated one. Well, I think he might have told us that he was not satisfied with one superannuation, but that he superannuated another one himself and one well able to perform the duties of his office and who, I am informed, did not wish to be superannuated, but who was both able and willing to perform the duties of his office. I think the hon. Postmaster General has a very efficient deputy to-day. I have not one word to say in derogation of the present Deputy Postmaster General, but I do say that the country has come to the conclusion that the hon. Postmaster General found that the able Deputy Postmaster General was likely to supplant him in the affections of the people of North York, and in order to prevent that he asked him to accept the position of Deputy Postmaster General. I am told that the hon. Postmaster General is an exceedingly wealthy man. But he is taking the money of the country in order that he may serve his own ends. I see the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), a gentleman who has grown gray in the service of his country and of his party. Although he is not a millionaire he would not serve himself at the expense of his country in the way that I have indicated that the hon. Postmaster General has done. I know the disinterested and patriotic service that the hon. member for South Grey has given to his party and to his country and I would like to see the hon. member occupy a position on the Treasury benches for which his ability, his services and his experience eminently qualify him.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You are getting to be quite a good speaker.

Mr. WALLACE. It is customary for members of the House to address the Chair, and not to make personal remarks across the floor. I hope the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) will not spare his blushes at the recognition of his eminent services to his party and his country.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. And the empire.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, and the empire at large. The Postmaster General has told us he does not know how many he has superannuated, but he ought to know. He superannuated his deputy minister when there was another Deputy Postmaster General living and drawing his superannuation allowance. Are there not two superannuated Deputy Postmasters General drawing their superannuation allowance at the present moment?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. They do not draw their superannuation allowance from the Post Office Department.

Mr. WALLACE. I am aware of that, but the Postmaster General should know about it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know that any fatality has happened to the gentleman whom I superannuated, and so far as I know the Deputy Postmaster General whom the Conservative government superannuated many years ago has ever since continued to draw the allowance which the government of the day voted him.

Mr. WALLACE. I am glad to know that these two gentlemen are still living, and I am glad we got a satisfactory answer at last, although we are not accustomed to getting satisfactory answers from the Postmaster General. Now, as to the salaries of the country postmasters. The custom has been to ascertain the legitimate business done at the country post offices, and to give 40 per cent of that as remuneration to the postmaster. But, in the case of thousands of post offices through the country, the reduction from three cents to two cents has caused a decrease in the income. The increased business is much larger in cities and commercial centres than it is in the rural districts, and we will take it that in a post office where the business was formerly $1,000 a year that business is now $666, if the same number of letters passed through. Forty per cent on $1,000 would yield a salary of $400 a year, but if the revenue is only $666, the revenue at 40 per cent would be only $266. The Postmaster General has said: Oh, we have not disturbed the salaries of these post offices. But that is not an answer to the question, because there must be some principle on which the Post Office Department is proceeding. The Postmaster General cannot himself adjust all these matters in the thousands of post offices throughout the Dominion, but he must lay down a general principle which will guide the officer who has this matter in charge. Now, what is the principle? Here is a post office where the business was $1,000 and the salary of the postmaster $400, and the Postmaster General says: We are not going to disturb that. But another place grows up rapidly, and the revenue is increased from $100 to $1,000 in a few years, and what is the officer who has the regulation of the salaries to do about that post office? The postmaster in the old post office gets $400, but in the new place, where he does the same amount of business, the income is $666, and 40 per cent on that would be only $266 a year. Will that postmaster get the $266 or will he get the $400 a year, the same as the postmaster in the longer established office?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman states that the reduction of postage has, in his opinion, resulted in an increase of revenue, but he thinks it is chiefly in the city post offices.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It has not increased at all.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Well, that will appear at the end of the fiscal year. But, I would say, speaking generally, that I think the reduction in postage has led to a fairly ratable increase in revenue throughout the country. Perhaps it may be more marked at great trade centres. The principle on which all postmasters are remunerated, is not one established during the regime of the present government, but has existed since confederation—in fact, prior thereto; that is, that postmasters are paid a percentage on the revenues of their offices; as the revenue fluctuates, the salary fluctuates correspondingly. Changes in postal rates are constantly going on; they went on during former governments. On many occasions, hon. gentlemen opposite, claimed, and rightly claimed, to have reduced postage; and I am not aware that in any case, they adopted any special principle on which to deal with new appointees. New appointees came in under the rule I have stated. As to whether or not previous governments did as I have done, that is, maintain the salaries of the existing appointees at the time of the reduction, I do not know. I have never heard of their having extended special consideration to postmasters in office at the time of any reduction, by providing that if the reduction of rates resulted in a reduction of revenue, that would not be followed by a reduction of salary. They may have made such provision; I do not know whether they did or not. So far as the postmasters in office are concerned, their positions were protected in the way I have stated. New appointees come in on a percentage, according to the custom that has always been maintained.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I wish to say a word in reference to a remark that has fallen from the lips of my hon. friend, and has been taken up by the Postmaster General. I have not a word of complaint to make of the present deputy. I have not the pleasure of his acquaintance, as I had of the former one; but I can say that a better deputy to the Postmaster General, than Col. White, Canada could not very well find. He was trained in the Post Office in London, and was brought out here as a very young man; he grew up with the growth of the country, and he knew every branch of that department perfectly. Mr. Griffin, who was superannuated before I was Postmaster General, but who was in the office when I was Minister of Militia, was a very old man. He had rendered good service to the department. The building up of that department has been accomplished through the combined efforts of Mr. Griffin and Col. White, and nobody contributed more than Col. White to make it the successful department which it became. In the creation of the money order department and the savings bank branch, a vast amount of experience and knowledge of the requirements of the country were required, and Col. White was equal to every emergency. As he is superannuated, and as he was under me for some time, I wish to give my certificate at least, not only to his qualifications for that high position, but to the manner in which, day in and day out, he was always prepared to work for the country which paid him. I think he should not have been superannuated. Of course, the hon. gentleman, when he came into that department was new, and being a member of a Reform government, he supposed that it was absolutely necessary for him to make some reforms—he may have made them in the wrong direction. Still I say that of all the men who have been Deputy Postmasters General, Col. White is entitled to great credit for having carried on the work of that department in the manner he did, showing that he was the right man in the right place.

Mr. WALLACE. The Postmaster General tells us, in reply to my statement about the changes in the salaries of postmasters, that changes were made in the past, under Conservative governments, and that he does not know whether alterations were made in the salaries of postmasters then or not. Surely it is not a satisfactory answer for the Postmaster General, in reply to questions, to tell us that he does not know things which he ought to know. At any rate, he ought to know what his own programme is. He says that new appointees will have to take their chances. The Postmaster General has not told us what he proposes to do in the case of postmasters who went into office under certain conditions which have since been changed—men who perform the same amount of labour, while the receipts from their offices are so much less. If the receipts of an office are the same as before, the work must have increased about 50 per cent. In that case, does he propose to increase the salary 50 per cent?

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). I should like very much if the government could see their way clear to change the Act so as to allow a little more to country postmasters. A great many men are conducting post offices for a mere scanty pittance: they do not get half what they are entitled to. At the same time, I think the criticism of my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace), is hardly fair. The percentage now paid to postmasters is paid under the same law that existed when my hon. friends opposite were in power, and under which the postmasters are paid 40 per cent of the receipts. When the postal rate was reduced from five cents to three cents by the hon. gentlemen opposite, I presume the same laws was in existence.

Mr. WALLACE. You presume, but there is no evidence.

Mr. McMULLEN. The probability is it was, and there was then nothing said regarding the reductions in the case of postmasters who are paid by percentage instead of salary. These men knew the conditions under which they took office, and had no cause of complaint. Then the present Postmaster General decided to reduce the rate from three cents to two cents, and the postmasters are treated on the same basis as they always have been. It is impossible to put a law on the statute-books that will mete out the same measures of relief to everybody. In my opinion, the city postmasters are paid altogether too much. I think that their salaries should be reduced, and those of country postmasters, some of whom get only $12 to $15 per year, should be increased. The whole system should be recast, and I hope that this will be the next reform which my hon. friend the Postmaster General will accomplish. There is not a minister who has secured to a greater degree the admiration of the people for the reforms he has accomplished without impairing the public services, and for the ability with which he has administered his department, then my hon. friend. No doubt hon. gentlemen opposite realize this, and no doubt also that is a cause of the severe criticism to which they are subjecting him. I must say that when my hon. friend opposite (Sir Adolphe Caron) presided over the department, he was very courteous. I endorse all that he has said with regard to the deputy, but at the same time my hon. friend must admit that his deputy was getting up pretty well in years, and the change has met with general approval. I do not wish to flatter the present Deputy Postmaster General, but was glad to hear the remarks made from the opposite side with regard to him.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman seems to be under the impression that this is a back country school-house and not a parliament, judging by the lengthy remarks he has just made. I was not aware that it was incumbent on him to rise in his place and explain the administration of the Post Office Department. In so doing, the hon. gentleman seems to imply that the Postmaster General himself was not equal to the task. I desire to ask a question regarding the reductions in the emoluments of postmasters by reason of the reduction in postage rates. Take, for instance, the post office at Wallaceburg. In 1897, its revenue was $3,660, and at present its revenue is $3,414, or $246 less revenue at present. The salary of the postmaster, when the revenue was larger, was $950, but it is now $1,000. On what system has that change taken place?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. All these arrangements of salaries are made by the accountant on a regular scale. The accountant informs me that it is impossible, from the figures here, to answer the question, because the salary includes other things besides the percentage. It includes, for instance, night allowance in addition to the 40 per cent.

Mr. CLANCY. I know that this office closes every night at eight o'clock.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The accountant also tells me that the revenue column includes, besides the stamps, other items on which the postmaster may not receive the percentage. He only receives the percentage on the revenue derived from the sale of postage stamps. The accountant would have to turn up the ledgers to get the details of the revenue and salary before he could answer the question.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. We have been voting large amounts, and particularly after having finished this enormous vote of $250,000, I would, therefore, ask the Prime Minister if he does not think we might adjourn?

The PRIME MINISTER. It is not late, and we could go on for a little longer.

Mr. WALLACE. There is no real progress made taking up business so late.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is now only twelve o'clock, let us go on until half-past twelve.

Mr. WALLACE. You cannot take up business and dispose of it at so late an hour.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) has forgotten how, when he was on this side, he used to keep us up until two in the morning discussing estimates.

Post Office Department—Amount required balancing and summarizing depositors' accounts at close of year ending June 30, 1900..... $3,275

Mr. CLANCY. There is an increase there.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is due to the increase in the number of the accounts. The remuneration is based on an allowance of 1½ cents for computing the interest on each account; and it is estimated that there will be an increase of 15,000 in the number of accounts.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That used not to be the rate—there was no estimate based on any payment of 1½ cents for an account.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The accountant assures me that this scale has always been in existence.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I recollect going before council with the estimates for additional clerks, and my recollection is that the remuneration was placed at so much per day.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) is mistaken. I certainly did not originate this system, which the accountant says has been in existence for many years.

Civil Government — Contingencies — Post Office Department—Clerical and other assistance, including $120 to pay S. J. Carter of the dead letter office of Winnipeg, a provisional allowance for excessive cost of living in Manitoba, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act $32,305

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the Postmaster General if this increase is calculated to cover any increase in the cost of the service by reason of the Bill of the Minister of Finance?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No, it is not. There is an increase in this item of $7,870. It is arrived at in this way: Four clerks resigned, or were promoted, whose salaries were $430, $450, $460 and $360. You have added to the salary list, nine clerks at $400 each, and $30 for a short time for one clerk, and $4,000 estimated increase for additional writers, besides $120 for Mr. Carter, provisional allowance. Then, for six clerks there is a addition of $30 each. This makes up the total of $7,830.

Mr. PRIOR. Is this increase in the number of writers altogether in Manitoba?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No. The department is a growing one in all parts of the country. As the volume of business increases, the staff must increase. That will go on continually in the Post Office Department of a great and growing country like this.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. But will the expenses of living in Winnipeg go on increasing also? Of course, before the building of railways, I could understand it; but why should living be more expensive in Winnipeg than in Ottawa?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is.

Mr. PRIOR. Beyond doubt, it is.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am not discussing Mr. Carter—I do not know anything about his case. But, I say let us adjust this matter on a proper basis all around, and let us give salaries that will cover the whole requirements of living in Winnipeg, British Columbia, Montreal, Ottawa or Quebec. The civil servants themselves do not understand why one man should be paid more than another. I think that, with the facilities they have for communication, living in Winnipeg is not more expensive than it is in Ottawa, Toronto or Montreal.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I beg to say that the hon. gentleman is in error. The difference in the cost of living was recognized by my predecessors, but not sufficiently recognized. They allowed 10 per cent, but we have increased the provisional allowance to $10 per month for persons whose salaries do not exceed $800. Before making that change, I made a careful inquiry and became satisfied that in Manitoba, the Territories, and British Columbia the cost of living is very much in excess of what it is in the older settled parts of Canada.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I admit that when the country was undeveloped, or less developed than it is to-day, we made a difference in the salaries. But I do not see how the hon. gentleman can argue that the expenses of living at the present time are greater than they are in the east. A loaf of bread is not worth any more there than it is down here, nor is a pound of beef. Rents are much higher in Ottawa and Toronto than they are in Winnipeg. I have lived for weeks in Winnipeg, and I do not believe that the cost of living there to-day warrants the hon. gentleman in what he is doing. I think it is discouraging to the civil servants. If you have one man paid $150 more for doing the same amount of work in Ottawa than another man is paid in Winnipeg, or vice versa, you render the latter dissatisfied. I think it is a wrong principle, and I am opposed to any discrimination in favour of any portion of Canada, whether Winnipeg or British Columbia.

Mr. PRIOR. I may be allowed to enlighten the hon. gentleman from Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) with regard to the cost of living. I know he has been in Manitoba and British Columbia, and no doubt the way he lives he pays no more than he does in the east. When you go to a first-class hotel they charge just about as much in Quebec or Montreal as they do in British Columbia or Manitoba. Take this fact, for instance, that the least coin they have in British Columbia is 5 cents. There is nothing like the copper that we have in the east. When you buy a box of matches you have to pay 5 cents for it.

Mr. CLANCY. How much for two boxes?

Mr. PRIOR. Five cents, you can get nothing for less than 5 cents. If you want a clay pipe, it is 5 cents. Then the hon. gentleman does not seem to realize that British Columbia as yet is not a manufacturing country, and nearly everything that is used there in the way of clothing, furniture, and so forth, has to come from the east where it is manufactured, and freight is very heavy on a 3,000 miles journey. You cannot get labour at the same rate as you can here. Even your Chinese servants you have to pay $25 to $30 a month, besides board. The salaries that are paid to the same class of labour are double the salaries paid in Quebec, in almost any class of labour. Take the higher classes of labour such as captains and engineers of vessels. That matter came up when I was interviewing the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in regard to the salaries paid to captains on government steamers. You cannot get a captain of a steamer in British Columbia, a man on whom you can safely place responsibility, for less than $150 a month; while down in the maritime provinces they think they do pretty well if they get $80 or $90 a month. It is the same all through, the scale of wages is much higher on the Pacific coast. For that reason I think it is only fair that the civil servants should get a higher rate of wages, and should be allowed a provisional allowance such as was granted by the late government, and is granted by the present government. The Postmaster General says he sent an inspector out to inquire and report on the matter, and I believe he will find beyond doubt, that the cost of living there is much higher than it is in the east.

Mr. CLANCY. I notice the name of Mr. S. J. Carter is granted $120 for the same service for which he appears in the supplementaries.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. His name is James Carter, not S. J. His salary is $400 or $500 a year. He belongs to the dead letter branch, and is partly in the inside service. But we have decentralized that branch, and transferred two clerks from the centre here to other places in Canada. Mr. Carter being one of them, was sent to Winnipeg. The estimates the hon. gentleman now has are for the fiscal year beginning the 1st of July next; the supplementaries contain a provisional allowance covering the time since he went up there last summer.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Mr. WALLACE. In regard to this man Carter we have been trying to find out his pedigree. It is not S. J. Carter at all, but James Carter. I always notice in connection with the Postmaster General that when you trace up and find out who a man is that he is loading favours on you will find that he is a Liberal. This one here is one of those appointed by themselves who is receiving a special favour of $120 a year. The hon. gentleman does not propose that all of those who are living in Winnipeg shall enjoy a similar advantage in regard to salary. The salary he is getting now is $1,000 a year. Is that the salary he is getting? Is he drawing the maximum salary of a third-class clerk?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He is not a third-class clerk, but he comes in under the heading of temporary writers.

Mr. WALLACE. We will call him a third-class clerk. He is put down as a third-class clerk.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That is his father.

Mr. WALLACE. Then we have another disclosure. When was James Carter appointed?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In 1890 by my hon. friend's government.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is another disclosure.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. He must be a good man.

Mr. WALLACE. I beg to contradict the hon. gentleman in the statement that he was appointed in 1890. This man does not appear on the civil service list for 1889. There is a James Carter here. I was told by somebody that it is this man's father. This James Carter is a third-class clerk and he was appointed on January 1, 1877, when hon. gentlemen were in power before. His present salary is $1,000. He was born in the year 1846.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. A moment ago I assumed that the Carter named in the civil service list was the Carter mentioned here, and I told the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) so. I find that James Carter is in the dead letter branch as well, but that he has been in Toronto. S. J. Carter, for whom this vote is intended is what is called a temporary writer. Temporary writers are not down on the civil service list. He was not appointed by the present government. He was appointed by the preceding government some years ago prior to our taking office.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In the dead letter branch?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In the dead letter branch. He was transferred to Winnipeg, and he is in Winnipeg now.

Mr. WALLACE. What salary does he get?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Between $400 and $500.

Mr. WALLACE. What age is he?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I understand he is the son of the James Carter who, as the hon. gentleman says, was born in 1847.

Mr. WALLACE. Was he appointed in 1890?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He was appointed prior to our taking office.

Mr. WALLACE. The statement was that he was appointed in 1890.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I understood so from the officer, but it was prior to our taking office.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. These temporary clerkships are not permanent appointments.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I cannot recall his name, although my memory is rather good in that respect, as being one of the employees at that time appointed by us. Of course, the other man I know well.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He was appointed in your time.

The PRIME MINISTER. Your memory is not perfect.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The explanation is not perfect.

Mr. CLANCY. At what time was he sent to Winnipeg? Was he there during the whole year?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He went there upon the decentralization of the dead letter branch, which took place on July 1, 1898. His salary is $460 a year, and $120 and $460 makes $580. That will be his gross salary.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Well, then my memory is pretty good after all. It was the hon. gentleman who sent him to Winnipeg.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Certainly; I did not appoint him to the service though.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There is no appointment of a temporary clerk. You employ him for a month, or for a year, but there is no permanent appointment. It does not come before the Treasury Board, and it was quite impossible for me to believe that he had been sent up to Winnipeg from here or that he was a permanent member of the civil service.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. When the third-class clerkships were abolished, the late administration appointed a number of temporary clerks all over the civil service. I found a number of them in this department, both in the inside and outside services. A large number of these temporary writers have never been disturbed. We have treated them the same as if they were permanent officials. It would be considered a hardship to dismiss them unless their services were not required. I have never disturbed any of them.

Mr. CLANCY. They were only allowed to remain in departments where they could not hatch up some charge against them that they had voted Tory. Some of them suffered for their opinions, and their heads went into the basket. Perhaps there are some that escaped the hon. gentleman's notice.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The point I wanted to make was, that the change gave him this extra pay.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. $120.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Does not the hon. gentleman think that this is really a bad principle? I cannot at all understand why a man living in Winnipeg should get more salary than a man living in Ottawa. You discriminate in favour of a man who is living in Winnipeg against a man who is living in Ottawa. I am afraid my hon. friend's memory is worse than mine, because he drove out a good many men when he came into power. There were a lot of clerks dismissed by the new government. They were not considered good enough to work under the new ministers. But, the point I want to make is, that I do not see any reason why there should be a difference in the pay of a man living in Winnipeg from the pay of a man living in Ottawa.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. What does the hon. gentleman propose?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If you have a man living in Ottawa who receives $500 and a man in Winnipeg who is doing the same work as the man in Ottawa. I would give him $500 and nothing more.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. What is the business for to-morrow?

The PRIME MINISTER. We intend to go into supply, so as to give the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) an opportunity to amend his motion with regard to binder twine.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.45 a.m. (Tuesday.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, May 29, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I have not had an opportunity of consulting my right hon. friend opposite (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), but I would be glad if he would consent to allow the substitution of the name of the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) on the Committee on Banking and Commerce in place of that of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper).

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Certainly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved:

That the name of Mr. Borden (Halifax) be substituted for the name of Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.

Motion agreed to.

FIRE AT POINTE CLAIRE, P.Q.

Mr. FREDERICK D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I desire to call the attention of the government and the House to the situation created at Pointe Claire village, in the vicinity of Montreal,

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

by the disastrous fire which took place there on the 22nd instant. In a few hours two-thirds of the village was absolutely destroyed, the damage is estimated at over $130,000, and, as far as I can ascertain, there is not more than $25,000 insurance; twenty-four houses were destroyed, eighteen families were left absolutely in need, in a state of distress, and over 130 people are without homes. These are, briefly, the facts connected with that fire. The distress there is so great that a committee of relief was organized immediately, and we sought to find in the place itself, in the county of Jacques Cartier, and in the city of Montreal, such funds as were absolutely necessary to relieve the most pressing wants. I thought it my duty, acting under a resolution of this committee of relief, regularly organized, to call the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to this state of affairs, and I had the honour of seeing the Prime Minister yesterday with the view of finding out whether the government could not, to some limited extent, come to the relief of these people. Of course, I am aware that unless a calamity of that kind assumes national importance, the government is not expected, in the case even of an extensive fire, to interfere, but what I emphasized when I met the Prime Minister was the peculiar situation created at Pointe Claire by this fire. We have applied for relief. This disaster occurred very soon after the great fire at Hull and Ottawa, and we found it difficult to find a sufficient sum to meet the pressing needs. The reason of that is that at the time of the great calamity here a while ago, the people of Montreal subscribed, as everybody did, most generously. When the members of the committee applied for relief, where relief was expected, they invariably met with the objection that, really the purses of the people had been depleted by their efforts to come to the relief of the sufferers by the great Ottawa and Hull fire. Under these circumstances, we are at a great disadvantage, because our disaster has come so soon after the disaster at Hull and Ottawa; in fact, I have no hesitation in saying that, although we have collected certain sums of money, we would have had four or five times the amount to the credit of the committee had this previous disaster not occurred. It seems to us fair that the government should give us some assistance. I brought this matter to the notice of the Prime Minister, who promised to consider it and give me an answer in a few days, but from the information I have received since, and which I have communicated to the Prime Minister, the matter is urgent. It is certainly a case of a quick giver giving doubly, and, under these circumstances, I hope the government will find it possible to give us some assistance. We do not require a very large amount, but, at the present moment, some money is necessary. We cannot get what we might have expected on account of this fire that took place here. I would give the right hon. gentleman an instance. At the time of the Hull and Ottawa calamity, a collection was taken up under the order of the Archbishop of Montreal for the sufferers by that fire. That collection in the diocese of Montreal produced over $17,000. The same authority, being fully aware of the extent of our own disaster, because, proportionately, it is just as great a disaster, ordered a collection for last Sunday, the results of which I have not been able to ascertain, but it would be extremely probable that we would get very little because of this previous collection. I deem it my duty to bring these facts to the attention of the government, and I trust that some action may be taken.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend (Mr. Monk), before making the remarks with which he has favoured the House, placed in my hands a petition from the relief committee appointed to help the sufferers by the Pointe Claire fire for the assistance of the government in that disaster. I told my hon. friend that it was a question in regard to which, for the moment, at all events, personally, I could not give him any answer, but that I would have, first of all, to consult the cabinet on the matter. But, apart from that answer, I represented to him, and he rather agreed with me, that the government could not, in these matters, be guided simply by the instincts or opinions of any member, that we had to draw the line, and that no help had been given by the government up to the present time in cases of calamities of that kind, unless they were such disasters as to become of the character of national disasters, and be beyond the possibility of adequate relief through private charity. I cannot say whether or not the fire which has been brought to our attention is of that character. But, I would be inclined to think that it is not. I do not know whether private charity is adequate to come to the relief of the sufferers. It is a matter which has to be inquired into. There is great force in what the hon. member says, that private charity, which might have been abundant a few weeks ago, has been rather depleted by the unfortunate occurrence in this city and the neighbouring city of Hull. All I can promise to my hon. friend is the sympathetic consideration of the government for his request, but, more than that, I cannot say at the present moment.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, as I see the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) in his seat, I would like to draw his attention to a return which I have asked for. It is a return in reference to Mr. Stumbles' visit to British Columbia on fishery matters. I would also say, that he has brought down the return in regard to the new steamer for British Columbia. He has presented his part of it, and the other part is to be presented by the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). I would like the hon. gentleman to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Customs to the matter.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I shall do so. I would like to take advantage of the opportunity to reply to a question put by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) in regard to the lighthouse at Pointe aux Trembles. The contract has been let for some time to build this lighthouse at this place, and as soon as some material is delivered, which is expected in a few days, the work of erection will be proceeded with.

Replying to another question put by my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Herbert Tupper), with reference to a letter dated November 15, which was referred to in a return brought down, I examined the letter—my deputy, Mr. Hardy, brought it to my notice—and it has no reference whatever to the John C. Barr. That is why it was not brought down in the return.

REPORT.

Report of the Experimental Farms for the year 1899.—(Mr. Fisher.)

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—NEW YORK CORRESPONDENCE OF LONDON TIMES.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a telegraphic communication to the London Times, from the New York correspondent of that paper. As I consider it is calculated to grossly deceive the London Times and the people of England, on a question of very great importance, namely, the attitude of public men in this House towards the action taken by Canada in reference to the war, a question which has excited a good deal of attention in this country and in England; I cannot allow this article to pass without comment. The New York correspondent of the London Times telegraphs under date of Sunday:

I have been in Ottawa since Monday. While there I met many Canadians entitled by position to speak for Canada. So impressive is their language and their attitude towards the Crown and the mother country that, needless as it is, I should like to testify to the prevailing spirit. The loyal devotion which the Canadian troops in South Africa are proving by their valiant and skilled soldiery, the Canadian people at home express in no uncertain tone. If there be Boer sympathizers among the French Canadians, as is alleged, I met none, though I met many eminent French Catholics. Sir Charles Tupper, whom I did not see, is accused of making himself the mouthpiece of whatever discontent exists, but Sir Charles Tupper is regarded as a politician with next year's election in view, and playing, therefore, sometimes to the local political gallery with local objects in view.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Other hon. MEMBERS. Shame.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not quite see the connection which Mr. Smalley, correspondent of the London Times intends by this, but such is his statement.

Quebec, where, if anywhere, dissent might be expected, is thought to be as faithful as ever to Liberalism and to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, her own leader, who is also leader in that policy which have brought Canada closer to England, and England closer to Canada.

I need not trouble the House with the remainder of Mr. Smalley's statement.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Would the hon. gentleman read the balance?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Certainly, with great pleasure, if the hon. minister wants it. Although, I do not think the remainder is of much value, I shall read it. It says:

It is not thought that the Prime Minister's hold on the people of the Dominion has been shaken. Most judicious observers appear to believe that he will retain his power, and believe that it is for the interest of Canada and of the empire generally that he should do so. That the Imperial interests entrusted to the Governor General were never safer than now, I found to be the general conviction.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

An hon. MEMBER. Good for Smalley.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad to find that hon. gentlemen opposite, who on very frequent recent occasions have treated any American authority as utterly worthless in this House, and as a piece of Yankee impudence; I am glad to find that these gentlemen opposite make exceptions to that, and, that there are occasions, when American testimony is given, as they think, in their own behalf, on which they can ratify it by their applause here. My object is not of a party character at all. It is, in my judgment, of the greatest possible importance that the London Times, that great organ of public opinion of the British people, should not be imposed upon by false statements coming from any source whatever. I say that Mr. Smalley was utterly ignorant of the subject upon which he spoke, or else he wrote what he knew to be untrue.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If he had had the opportunity, as he professes to have had, of learning the opinion of Canada, and of the

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

French Canadian people, he used his opportunities very poorly, when he arrived at conclusions utterly at variance with what every one knows to be the facts, and with what I shall prove to be the facts. This is not the first time I have had occasion to challenge Mr. Smalley's correspondence in the London Times. I remind my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, that when he was engaged in most important negotiations, representing Her Majesty's government, on matters affecting deeply, Canada, as well as the empire, this is the same Mr. Smalley, who stated in the London Times, that the claim of Canada, with reference to the Alaskan boundary, was only as good a claim as it would be for France to claim that the Channel Islands should belong to France. I denounced that gross misstatement at the time, but that statement is just on a par with the statement which I have read to the House today. Mr. Smalley is a man of undoubted ability, but I am sorry to say he puts his talents to a very bad use when he violates everything he ought to know, as an intelligent man (and everything which I believe he does know as an intelligent man), by such false and calumnious statements respecting myself as he has ventured to make in that article.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not wish to interfere with the freedom of the hon. gentleman's discussion, but it occurs to me that it would be better for the hon. gentleman to confine his statement to a correction of the present matter, rather than to refer to other matters.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am endeavouring to do that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. the leader of the opposition has, of course, the privilege of setting himself right.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And I shall endeavour to do it in such a way as not, in the least degree, to violate the rules of the House. Sir, is the statement true, that no person in Canada expresses any discontent with the action of the government, except Sir Charles Tupper, for political purposes? Why, Sir, that statement is known to be the very reverse of truth, and I will prove it out of the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite. I hold in my hand a report of a recent meeting at St. Remi, in the province of Quebec, March 26, last, in which the following statement was made by Mr. Bourassa, a member of this House:

When men do not enlist quickly enough, a commissioner will be appointed, and he will visit your homes, knock at your door, and if it is not opened, he will break it in, for he will have the law on his side. Then he will choose your ablest son, perhaps the very one you depended on to support your family in your old age, put a uniform on his back, a rifle on his shoulder, and send him to Asia or Africa to fight for the glory of England. While the shrieking loyalists of Toronto or Halifax will indulge in banquets and drink champagne, the poor old mother will be weeping at home for the son who has been carried off to war.

Was that inspired by Sir Charles Tupper? What more was said at that meeting? Mr. Monet, another member of this House, on that same occasion, proposed a resolution, declaring 'that the electors of Napierville protested against any participation by Canada in the wars of the empire, outside of Canada.' Mr. Monet was the first speaker:

He announced that he was directly opposed to any participation in the wars of the empire, even though England needed our help, which she did not in this case. He thoroughly approved the position taken by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in an interview which will go down to history. The 'Globe,' 'La Patrie' and other papers had condemned the participation of Canada in foreign wars.

That declaration of the Premier, which will go down to history was a declaration that he would do nothing to give England aid in South Africa, because he could do nothing, as it would be a violation of the constitution of the country—

Sir Charles Tupper had started this agitation for the sending of Canadian troops.

That is the statement of the hon. member for Napierville, not exactly bearing out the statement of Mr. Smalley, that Sir Charles Tupper is the only person who raises any issue on this question. Mr. Monet goes on to say:

The Premier, in his memorable interview with the 'Globe,' had taken a perfectly constitutional view of the question, but later became scared by the agitation aroused by Tupper, Clarke Wallace, Bergeron, and the other Conservative leaders, and the English members of the cabinet had forced Sir Wilfrid to consent to the sending of a contingent.

He had kept silence the more readily because the order in council provided that the sending of troops should not serve as a precedent. But when the second contingent was sent he considered it time to protest, and had offered to resign if twenty-five of his constituents asked him to do so. They had not done so, and he took it as an approval of his conduct.

It was only a trick of Hon. Joseph Chamberlain to bring about his dream of Imperial federation, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier had allowed himself and his followers to be cowed by Sir Charles Tupper, Clarke Wallace, Prior, Bergeron and the other Conservatives. The government had shown weakness in allowing their hand to be forced by Sir Charles Tupper and his followers. They should have refused to take part in the war; it was a bad precedent to establish.

Mr. Bourassa said:

He declared that he was a Liberal, and had supported Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but he had not been sent to parliament to support a Tory policy imposed upon the government by the Tupper, the Clarke Wallaces and the Bergerons.

Now, I ask my right hon. friend whether he thinks that Mr. Smalley or any other man who knows anything of the state of public sentiment and the history of this question in Canada, is in a position to say that the only discontent at the action that has been taken in giving aid to England, is shown by me. Mr. Smalley knows, if he knows anything of the history of this question, that a member of the right hon. gentleman's government, who represents Canada to-day in the face of Europe, put the statement in the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General, that the action taken by Canada in sending aid to Her Majesty's government in South Africa, was taken with the approval of the entire population of Canada.

The PRIME MINISTER. Order. That is not the question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I am giving evidence of the utter falsity of the statement made, and I now propose to give evidence out of the mouth of a minister of the Crown.

The PRIME MINISTER. I understood my hon. friend to rise to make a personal explanation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no objection to putting myself in order by moving the adjournment of the House. I say that Mr. Smalley spent his time in Canada studying the position of Canadian questions to little purpose, if he did not learn that a minister of the Crown, representing this government in the face of Europe at a great international exhibition, has given the lie direct to the statement put in the mouth of the Governor General by himself and the other members of the government. What was that statement? I repeat it—that this action of Canada, in sending aid to Her Majesty's government, was taken with the approval of the entire population of Canada; and yet this gentleman, to the discredit of this government, is at this moment a minister of the Crown. When my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) brought this question before the House, I took no part in the debate, because my right hon. friend, without attempting to defend what had been said by his colleague, said it was unfair to deal with a question of that kind on a mere newspaper report; and we gave him time and opportunity. That newspaper report had the imprimatur of La Patrie, the paper published by Mr. Tarte's sons, and the imprimatur of Le Soleil, the organ of the right hon. gentleman in Quebec, which copied it with approval; and down to this hour, although the hon. gentleman has had abundant opportunity to place himself and his government in a proper light, he allows a minister of the Crown, after having committed himself and the government of the day to the policy of aiding Her Majesty's government in South Africa, to declare the following in Paris :

It is very possible that in their own minds 99 per cent of French Canadians disapprove of the South African war, and are of opinion that the money spent by Canada on this occasion might have been expended with much more practical results elsewhere. Yes, that is very possible, but as good citizens we submit without restriction to the opinion of the majority.

A minister of the Crown making a statement so palpably and diametrically opposed to the statement made by the Governor General at the instance of the government of which he was a member, should not have remained an hour a member of this government—a statement more calculated to destroy all the benefit of what had been done by Canada in relation to that war than any statement that could have been conceived. At a time when it was of the utmost moment that the hands of England should be strengthened in Europe by the action of Canada, you have a minister of the Crown stating his belief that ninety-nine out of every hundred French-Canadians disapproved of the war and the expenditure made by Canada in connection with it, giving the most point-blank contradiction of the statement which he himself and the other members of the government had put into the mouth of the Governor General. Under these circumstances, I think Mr. Smalley has spent his time to little purpose in Canada if he has not learned that while we all rejoice in what has been done, if there is one man in this country who is not open to censure for having done anything to prevent that aid being sent by Canada to the Imperial government, that is myself. And yet, Sir, after Mr. Smalley has visited the seat of government here and professed to have learned the sentiment of the people of this country, I am to be held up as the one man in Canada who has objected and obstructed and created difficulty in connection with this matter. I have given, Sir, the answer, in the form of evidence not only from leading supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite, but from one of the members of the government themselves, that Mr. Smalley's statement is not accurate, and that he has spent his time to very little purpose in gathering such information as is calculated to mislead the people of England through that great organ of public opinion. I do not propose to permit Mr. Smalley or any person else, occupying so important a position as that of correspondent of the London Times newspaper, to assail unchallenged my reputation and standing in this country, in the manner in which Mr. Smalley has assailed it, and which is a perfect travesty of everything like accuracy and truth.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am at a loss, Mr. Speaker, to understand the motive which has induced my hon. friend to bring this matter before the House. I fail to see the motive unless it be, perhaps, to draw a herring across the track and prevent public opinion from dwelling too severely on certain dissensions said to prevail in the ranks of my hon. friend's party at this moment. My hon. friend is troubled over newspaper criticisms, but surely he is too old a politician, and has been too long in public life to deem it his duty to reply to such criticisms on the floor of this House. We are all exposed to newspaper criticism, and I believe that life is too short to notice on the floor of the House whatever may be said for or against us in the press. I have the greatest respect for the press, although the newspapers do not always speak of me in very kindly terms. I, however, can afford to put up with that without any discomfort at all. With regard to the particular criticism taken exception to by my hon. friend, I do not know what may have induced Mr. Smalley to speak as he did of my hon. friend. Perhaps during his short stay in this country, he read the speeches which my hon. friend delivered in Quebec and Montreal, in which he warned French Canadians to be on the lookout lest they would be soon called on to contribute to the wars of the empire to the tune of $40,000,000 annually.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have not the right to reply, and must be permitted to state that there is not the slightest foundation in fact for any such assertion. I never said anything of the kind.

The PRIME MINISTER. I hope the press will take due notice of my hon. friend's denial and will duly notify the people of Quebec that my hon. friend never gave them any such warning. For my part, I have only to thank my hon. friend for the exhibition of wabbling which he has afforded us to-day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was wrong, Mr. Speaker, in saying that I had not the right to reply. I find that I have, and I take this opportunity to tell my hon. friend that when he wants to find a wabblers, he will have to look closer home. I think that my record will compare pretty favourably with the right hon. gentleman's in that respect. I need give no better commentary on the position my right hon. friend occupies that his utter inability to say one word in justification of Mr. Smalley's statements to the London Times.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, and the fact that he sat down without the slightest attempt to defend Mr. Smalley, although I gave succinctly the facts and proved them. I rise for the purpose of correcting a statement my right hon. friend made a moment ago, namely, that in recent speeches which I made in Quebec and Montreal, I led the people to expect that at no distant date they might find themselves in the position of being heavily taxed for the wars of the empire. I did nothing of the kind. I treated the proposal, under which they would be taxed, as an utter absurdity and impossibility. I was dealing with my right hon. friend's declaration, made again and again in London, when he there represented this country, that after having examined into the best means of obtaining the unity of the British empire, he had come to the conclusion, that it would be found in a parliamentary federation in which Canada would be represented, and when my right hon. friend, with longing looks to the seats in St. Stephen's, hoped to yet live to see a French Canadian there representing Canada. I was discussing that question, and instead of saying to the people of Quebec that there was the slightest possibility of such a scheme ever being carried out, I endeavoured to show that it was an utter and palpable absurdity. To illustrate the position in which Canada would be, under such a system of parliamentary federation as is only known wherever parliamentary federation exist in the world, I said that Canada would be obliged to contribute, in proportion to her population, and the fact that this year her proportion, according to population, would be $46,000,000 for the army and navy alone, was sufficient reason to prevent the possibility of such a scheme ever being discussed.

In Montreal, where I found there was some controversy on that point, my attention was drawn to the criticism that no person proposed that the taxation would be according to the Chinese system of population, and I pointed out the fact that last year the taxation of the United Kingdom was £100,040,000, and that of that amount, Scotland, with a smaller population than Canada, contributed £13,909,000 sterling. Instead of making the statement which my hon. friend has put in my mouth, I said the very reverse. Instead of saying that this was a condition of things which we were likely to experience at no distant date, I pointed to its utter absurdity, and said I did not believe that in the bounds of Canada, a single man could be found, of position and intelligence, who had thoroughly studied that question, who would support the proposition of my right hon. friend, which would lead, in my judgment, to that severe taxation. That is the position I took, and I cannot allow my right hon. friend—to borrow his own elegant reference to my remarks—to draw this red herring across the scent by referring to some newspaper stories, which no doubt, he has been reading with great glee and delight, concerning some imaginary disintegration of the Conservative party. I may say that I am not aware of any disintegration in the Conservative party. I am aware of this, and the country is aware of it, that when a threat was held over my head, as the leader of that party, that unless certain claims were paid, that unless a certain amount of money was paid over, a certain party would put himself in communication with my right hon. friend, and draw his attention to the advisability of having an investigation into the general elections of 1882 and 1896, I was in the proud position of being able to say to the person who sent me that threat that he might communicate anything and everything he knew. I think it was hardly worth while for my right hon. friend, knowing the prompt defiance that has been uttered by the leader of the Liberal-Conservative party to any man, from any source, who ventured to insinuate anything to the discredit of that party or myself personally—I think it was hardly worth his while to go out of the record in order to bring that matter up to-day. It would be well for my right hon. friend if he were in the same position that I occupy. It would be well for him if he had exhibited in the past that same readiness to have the most thorough investigation into the purity of elections and that same care for the maintenance of the purity of elections that I always have shown.

Mr. WALLACE. Before the question is disposed of—

Mr. SPEAKER. I have declared the motion lost.

Mr. WALLACE. I have a few words to say with regard to this matter, but I will take another opportunity to express my opinions.

SUPPLY—MANUFACTURE AND SALE OF BINDER TWINE.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I purpose pointing out to you, to the members of this House, and to the people of the country the way this government has violated the many pledges given to the people previous to the general election of 1896.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. TAYLOR. Hon. gentlemen opposite laugh, but before I sit down they may laugh on the other side of their faces. I purpose more particularly to draw the attention of the people of this country to the manner in which this government have dealt with the manufacture and sale of binder twine in Kingston penitentiary. And I purpose concluding the remarks I shall make by moving an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply. Previous to the elections of 1896, the Prime Minister travelled from one end of Canada to the other making speeches, and in every speech he made promises to the people of this country. He promised, if he and his party came into power, to give a pure and honest government to the country.

An hon. MEMBER. So we have.

Mr. TAYLOR. I leave it to the people of this country to answer that when they have the ballot in their hands. But, I say this—and I think I shall be joined by a large majority of the people of this country in saying it—no government ever came into power under more favourable auspices, no government ever came into power with the current running more strongly with them. They had a return of general prosperity, and everything in their favour. Yet, in the four short years they have been in power they have brought about such a state of corruption, official and electoral, as no other government ever did. The Prime Minister promised that if elected he would surround himself with a body of business men, that he would have a competent business government. Has he done so? I will leave that to the people to say when I have concluded my remarks on this binder twine question. If they have conducted every other branch of the public service as they have conducted this manufacture and sale of binder twine—and I believe they have—you, Mr. Speaker, and the people of this country must condemn this government for not being a business government. The Prime Minister promised the people of this country that if he came into power he would decrease the national debt. Has he done so? He has increased it by about eight millions of dollars in the four years he has been in power. He promised to reduce the annual expenditure one, two, three, or perhaps four millions. Has he done so? Why, he has increased it this year over twelve millions. He promised to reduce the taxation. Has he done that? He has increased the taxation about eight millions a year. He promised to reduce the taxes on the necessaries of life and to let the taxation fall upon the luxuries. Has he redeemed that promise? He has increased the taxes on sugar, one of the greatest necessaries of life for every family in the country, and he has increased the taxes on tobacco, another necessary of life to the poor man. He promised to take the duty off coal oil. Has he redeemed that promise? Why, he sold out the Canadian business to the Standard Oil Company for a large election subscription previous to 1896. In talking to the people of the North-west he promised to take the duty off agricultural implements, has he done so? The duty on agricultural implements remains the same as it was when the Conservative government was in power. I could refer to many other promises that the Prime Minister made and has broken, but the last one I will refer to is that he made to the people of the Dominion, but more particularly to the province of Quebec, that if returned to power he would settle the Manitoba school question. And how would he do it? He said he would immediately send a commission headed by Sir Oliver Mowat, in whom every one had confidence, to ascertain the facts, and having ascertained the facts he would grapple with the question. Did he send Sir Oliver Mowat? No. Whom did he send? He sent that trusted man who runs the government, whether he be in Paris or in Ottawa, Mr. Tarte. And what did Mr. Tarte find when he got there? I will repeat what was told to my hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Broder) in conversation with a gentleman of standing in Manitoba last summer. This gentleman said to my hon. friend: I will tell you how the school question was settled. When Mr. Tarte came up here, he found that there were three men who had to be settled with—first Mr. Martin, then Mr. Sifton and then Premier Greenway. Mr. Tarte went to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and offered to make an arrangement under which Mr. Martin should leave Manitoba and go to British Columbia to be their solicitor there for a number of years for a consideration—

Mr. TAYLOR.

An hon. MEMBER. Ten thousand a year.

Mr. TAYLOR. Ten thousand a year, my hon. friend says. And in consideration of what the Canadian Pacific Railway was to pay Mr. Martin under this appointment, they were to get an increased subsidy on the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. They got an increased subsidy, which proves that the statement was correct. Mr. Martin went to British Columbia, the Canadian Pacific Railway employed him, and they got an increased subsidy to recoup them. Then Mr. Tarte went to Mr. Sifton and said: Withdraw your opposition, and you shall come down and be Minister of the Interior and shall have control of all the gold lands of the Yukon. You can administer that and every other matter in connection with your department without being under control of council. The Prime Minister ratified that bargain. After Mr. Sifton was made minister, the Prime Minister told the people of Canada that they had given Mr. Sifton full control to run his department to suit himself and not be subject to council. And Mr. Sifton made a bargain with his henchmen, Mackenzie & Mann, three days before parliament met, to give them all the gold lands of the Yukon for the building of 150 miles of tramway, a bargain whereby he and all his friends could have been made rich had it been carried out.

But the Senate intervened and threw out the bargain, and the country saved the gold lands. Mr. Greenway had yet to be provided for. The share offered to him was that all moneys that were deposited in trust with the Dominion government for the sale of school lands for the Manitoba schools were to be handed over to Mr. Greenway. That bargain was carried out, but the Senate refused to ratify it. And, after all, there was very little change made in the school law. They were nominally public schools, but they have what are virtually separate schools, and the government pays the money. That is the way the school question was settled. And I would refer the Prime Minister to a resolution passed in Winnipeg yesterday, and would ask him if this showed that Mr. Tarte had ascertained the facts and had actually settled the school question.

Now, I do not intend to deal at greater length with the broken promises of this government. I propose now to deal with a blue-book issued by this government, signed by David Mills, Minister of Justice. Under the late Conservative government, in fact, under all governments previous to this one, the blue-books of this country were looked upon as almost sacred: they were the Bible of the government, because they are supposed to be prepared by officers of the government, and any statement contained in a blue-book is supposed to be true, ought to be true, has been true in the past. But this government did what is unprecedented in the history of any government, they issued a blue-book signed by one of the ministers. What for? Simply to place in the hands of their election agents a book which they could show to the people of Canada and say: This statement is in the blue-book, therefore, it is true. The title of this book is: 'Action of the government in reference to the manufacture and sale of binder twine produced by convict labour, for the information of members of parliament.' Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask any member of parliament who has read that book, whether it contains one sentence of information for a member of parliament in reference to the manufacture and sale of binder twine. It is simply a campaign document produced by this government. Knowing that this is a live question with the farmers of this country, they had to meet it, and they thought the best way was to issue a blue-book which their agents can show to the people of Canada, saying that it was written by the Minister of Justice, and therefore, every statement in that book must be true.

An hon. MEMBER. And so it is.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will convince the hon. gentleman and this House before I sit down that whoever wrote that book did not do himself the credit that belongs to a third-class pettifogging lawyer, let alone a Minister of Justice. When he sat in this House we used to call him Philosopher Mills; when he was transplanted into the Senate he was called Professor Mills; now that he has commenced to write books, I think he might properly be called Prevaricator Mills.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman should not apply that term to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not say he is a prevaricator, but I will withdraw the word. I will say this, however, that the book is a tissue of misrepresentations, and is not founded upon fact, whoever the writer is. If I prove that this book contains one false statement, then the whole book should be condemned; but before I sit down I will prove that it contains many false statements. I will make this proposition to the Prime Minister: Let him name a judge, and I will name another; let these two select a third, and let that committee read my speech and the debate that will take place here-to-day: let them take this book, and call for papers and information in the hands of the government, and if this commission does not prove that there are many statements in that book not founded upon fact, I will pay the cost of the commission, or resign my seat in this House.

The first page in that book is devoted principally to philosophy: when the minister was writing that page he was philosophising, and even on the first page he makes one statement that is not correct. This is what he says:

One of the difficult problems with which the state has to deal is—how is it to give suitable employment to its prison population? There can be no doubt that if those persons were industrious and honest they would be at large, and, by their labour, would be entering into competition with every other labourer engaged in similar pursuits in the country. But being neither honest, nor for the most part industrious—

The Minister of Justice says that there is not an honest man in the Kingston penitentiary or any other of the penitentiaries of the Dominion, and there is scarcely an industrious man. Now, that statement is not true. I know persons in the penitentiary who have been honest and industrious all their lives, but who have, in a moment of passion, perhaps, committed the crime of manslaughter or some other crime, that has landed them in the penitentiary. I know a doctor who lived to be an old man, who was honest and industrious, but who is to-day in the Kingston penitentiary; and I know a lawyer who was also honest and industrious all his life, but who is now in the penitentiary.

An hon. MEMBER. Any cabinet ministers?

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not know there are any there yet, but I think some of them ought to be there, if they got their deserts.

An hon. MEMBER. Name them.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman can name them, they live pretty close to his constituency. Now, we will turn to the next page in this book and read this clause :

The government cannot advantageously employ commercial agents, pay their expenses, and send them abroad through the country, to make sales to retail dealers, and become an active competitor, without the risk of very great loss, and without incurring very great expense.

Now, that proves the incapacity of this government. They are not a business government, otherwise they would employ an agent and send him out to sell their goods. Does not every business man in this country do that? Why cannot this government conduct its business on the same principle that every business concern in this country does? Every man who sends out an agent to sell his goods, adds a percentage to the cost of production to pay the travelling expenses of the agent, and to meet bad debts. And the binder twine business could be conducted in the same way without losing a cent, as the late government conducted it for two years without losing a cent. The hon. member for North Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost), is a manufacturer of goods something on the line of binder twine; let me ask him what manufacturer in this country will run his factory for a whole year, and then send out a few circulars to friends and ask them to tender for the output of that factory. The member for North Leeds manufactures goods that he sells once a year, mowing machines and reapers. Does he run his factory for a year and then call for tenders, either in the newspapers or by circular, to purchase the output of his factory? Does he buy by tender and sell by tender? Is that the way he does business? Is there a man in this House, or a business man in this country, who conducts his business that way? That is the way this government do. They run their factory for a year, and they call for public tenders, either by advertisements, or by circulars to some of their political friends, to see how much they can get for the output of their factory. The member for Leeds and Grenville puts his agent on the road and gives him a commission, or pays him a salary, to sell goods for him, and that is the way every other business is conducted. Yet this government, for purposes best known to themselves, sell their binder twine by tender to their political friends. The Minister of Justice goes on to say :

I wish to show how our predecessors tried the experiment for two seasons, and the result of the trial was not such as to induce us to make a further experiment on the same line.

He says the late government tried the experiment for two years of sending out an agent. That would be for 1894 and 1895.

Mr. TAYLOR.

The industry was started only in 1894, that was the first year of the sale, and the Minister of Justice says the government tried the experiment for two years of selling by agents. To prove my statement as to the year when it was started, I will just read this from the Hansard for 1893,

Mr. TALBOT. Dispense.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman knows that before I take my seat this government and the gentlemen behind them will have to swallow a pretty hard vote.

Mr. WOOD. You will have to swallow a bigger one.

Mr. TAYLOR. And he will find that if he wants to make time, the less I am interrupted from that side of the House the better. The then hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet), speaking in March, 1893, said :

The machinery will be purchased in a short time and put in place. In the main estimates we took a vote with which to buy machinery.

Later on, he says that it seems almost impossible to get the machinery ready for the present harvest. That was on March 18. The machinery had not then been ordered, and, of course, could not be placed in position to manufacture binder twine to sell for 1893. Therefore, there was no manufacture of twine until 1893, and the twine was sold in 1894 for the first time. In the same discussion, the present hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) made this remark :

The government is taking this action with the view to employ prison labour, and at the same time keep the manufacturers of binding twine at Halifax from obtaining too high a price for their product.

These quotations which I have just read prove that the first sale of twine manufactured at Kingston, that could take place would be in the year 1894; therefore, the Conservative government only controlled the sales for 1894 and 1895. They further prove the object of the government to be twofold, in starting this industry; first, to employ convict labour, and, second, to regulate the price that farmers are called upon to pay for their binder twine. We have the proof that the instructions of the government to their agent was to sell twine on an average of 5½ cents a pound to the retail merchants of the country. This would allow the retail merchants to sell, and they did sell, at 1 cent a pound profit, and the farmers, in 1895 and 1896, got their binder twine manufactured in the penitentiaries at 6½ cents a pound. Further, the hon. Minister of Justice, in this book, says :

In February, 1896, the late government resolved to sell the binder twine by an agent to retail dealers. He was to be paid a commission of 10 per cent for his services. Let me ask by whom was this payment of 10 per cent to be borne? Was it to be added to the price, or was it to be a loss borne by the public?

Whoever heard of such a nonsensical question as that? Is it business to ask who pays this 10 per cent? Ask any business man in this country, when he gives an agent 5 per cent or 10 per cent for selling his goods, who pays for it. He certainly pays for it, but he adds it to the price of the article. This proves, further, that this same government that were in power in 1896, the late Conservative government, employed an agent to sell for the two years previous. The late government also made a bargain to sell in 1896, they made a bargain with Mr. Kelly extending for five years, expiring in 1900. But this government came into office in July, 1896, and they cancelled the arrangement with the agent that the late government had appointed to sell on commission, for five years, the output of the Kingston penitentiary.

Mr. WOOD. Who was the agent?

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Kelly. I will read, later on, who he was, and all about him. Therefore, the complaint was made that there was no twine sold in 1896. Who is responsible? After Mr. Kelly had gone out and taken orders, and the orders had been sent in, this government refused to fill them. As I will prove by this book, and as I will prove by the statements made by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), the government refused to fill the orders because Mr. Kelly would not give security for the amount of the sales that he made to merchants.

Mr. WOOD. Or, in other words, the government would not sell on credit.

Mr. TAYLOR. Or, in other words, the government would not sell on credit. Does not every business man sell on credit?

Mr. WOOD. Not the government.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will give the hon. gentleman enough of it before I am through. I am talking about doing business on business principles. The government started the manufacture of binder twine on business principles.

Mr. BERGERON. Not this government.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, not this government, but the late government. This government aids monopolies, as they did the Standard Oil Company, by giving them special legislation. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), who is a hardware merchant, has travellers on the road. I would ask him what arrangement he makes with these men. He pays them a commission or a salary. They go out and get orders from retail men, and submit them to the house for approval. If the hon. gentleman thinks that a merchant is entitled to credit he fills the order, but, if not, the order is cancelled. That is the way the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost) does. He sends his agents out through the country to take orders for agricultural implements, they submit the orders to him, and if the party giving the order is good, he will ship the implements, but, if not, he will cancel the order, and the agent simply gets a commission on the goods that are delivered. The hon. Minister of Justice had political friends in business in London. The Hobbs Hardware Company had control of the Central Prison binder twine output, they had a large stock on hand, and to assist the Hobbs Hardware Company in forming a combine, this government said: We will not sell any twine this year, and we will help to put the price up. The hon. Minister of Justice makes a further statement:

But it has been intimated, not so much that the system was wrong, as that there has been a ring formed for the purpose of bleeding the farmers who require binder twine, and of making enormous profits at their expense. No statement could be more unfounded, none more destitute of all foundation in fact.

Before I sit down I think that hon. members on both sides of the House, and, if not, I am certain the great majority of the people of this country, will come to the conclusion that a combine has been formed. Another statement was made by the hon. Minister of Justice, who writes this book, or who has had it written for him and who signs his name to it:

The experiment made by our predecessors in office in 1895 was not one in any way advantageous to the public interest, as a portion of the price is still unpaid.

Further on, he says:

Mr. Taylor also says that the government got paid for the sales which they made. This is a mistake. A part of the twine then sold is still unpaid for, and a suit by the Crown for about $9,000 is pending in the Exchequer Court in respect to it.

I may just say here that this work, from beginning to end, is an attack on a few hon. members of this House, who have dealt with this question for several years, since this combine has been formed by this government, placing binder twine in the hands of their party friends, who formed a monopoly and squeezed the farmers into paying two or three times its real value. This book is an attack on the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), and my name appears in it twenty-six times. I will refer to the points the hon. Minister of Justice tries to make against me as I proceed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this government, after coming into power, issued a black list against a great many merchants of this country who they said were indebted for binder twine, and the government described these gentlemen as party heelers. On behalf of these gentlemen, I questioned the veracity of the statement that they were indebted to the government, and I brought the Solicitor General and the members of the government to book several times in regard to it. It is true that these names appeared in the Auditor General's Report, but the Auditor General's Report is published on June 30, and the binder twine was sold on time, commencing in June, so that it could not appear in the Auditor General's Report that it was paid. However, when the money was due, it was paid. Time and again the matter was referred to in this House, and I questioned the Solicitor General if these merchants' accounts had all been paid, and his answer to me was yes. Here is the discussion which took place last year. (Hansard, 1899, page 9900) :

The late government disposed of this twine by supplying merchants all over the country, sending their agents out and forcing other manufacturers to do the same in order to get their goods on the market.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. They never got paid for it.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, they did get paid for it. I asked the question of the government if there was a dollar due for binder twine, and the answer of the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) was that every dollar had been paid.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. TAYLOR. I made the statement, and the government did not contradict it.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. This government must have collected it.

Mr. TAYLOR. It was practically all collected by the late government. The return brought down was up to the 1st of July. The twine had been sold at four months, and, of course, the merchants had not paid, but they paid their bills as soon as they became due.

The only indebtedness that stood was some disputed accounts between the government and Mr. John Connor, which went to the Exchequer Court. The government had ample security for that debt, but they postponed the trial on two or three occasions, and paid the costs, in order to get the delay. It only came to trial a short while ago, and the government got a judgment, but they were obliged to throw off the interest. Mr. Connor had a counter claim against the government which he could not get adjusted, and so he asked that the matter be sent to court in order that the matter might be settled, and that he and the Messrs. Connolly might have returned to them the ample securities which they deposited with the government for this twine. The government were not in danger of losing a dollar at any time, because they had ample security and, therefore, the Minister of Justice is not right when he says in his book that the accounts were not all paid, and that there was a suit pending. But even if this paltry sum of $9,000 had been lost, how much better it would have been for the farmers of this country to get their twine at a cheap price, as they would have got it. I will prove later that the cost of the raw material did not in any way affect the price at which the twine should be sold. The government should have sold the twine each year to the farmers at from 5½ cents to 6½ cents per pound, but for two years past the farmers of Canada have been obliged to pay from 12 cents to 15 cents per pound for their twine. Would it not have been ten times better to have lost that miserable sum of $9,000 than to leech out of the farmers of Canada hundreds of thousands of dollars for the benefit of the Hobbs Hardware Co., and other members of the combine. Why, my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), here tells me that the farmers of the Territories are paying 17 cents per pound for their twine. I want to ask the members of this House, what information this is on the manufacture and sale of binder twine, which the Minister of Justice puts in his report. He says :

Mr. Rees wrote Mr. George Taylor, the member for Leeds, asking for his support. Mr. Taylor forwarded this letter to Mr. Dickey, and accompanied it with a recommendation which stated that Mr. Rees was supported by the friends of the government in his locality. Mr. Mucklestone wrote Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Taylor forwarded Mr. Mucklestone's letter to Mr. Dickey, Minister of Justice, and he added a note at the bottom, in which he informed the minister that he had written Mr. Mucklestone, and he told Mr. Mucklestone that, in his communication to the Minister of Justice, he had pronounced him a first-class man for the position. And so Mr. Taylor persuaded both Mr. Rees and Mr. Mucklestone that he was actively supporting each of them, although he knew that the intention was to appoint but one agent. Both were grateful to Mr. Taylor for his support.

The facts are these : Messrs. Rees and Mucklestone lived in the city of Kingston—my hon. friend (Mr. Britton), will perhaps know them—and they wrote me, applying for this position, and I simply forwarded their letters to the Minister of Justice, with the memo. which Hon. Mr. Mills recites in this book. What is there in that ? What makes the Minister of Justice say that I made these gentlemen think I was supporting each of them, and that they were both grateful ? There is no foundation for the statement of the Minister of Justice. There is not a word of truth in it. I did simply what any member of this House would do. I sent the letter I received on with the recommendation at the bottom, saying : This gentleman is a good business man.' or 'he has the support of friends in his locality.' These gentlemen are not constituents of mine, and when the minister wrote that, he had no other object than to do me a personal injury. I was merely doing for these gentlemen what I would do for any citizen. I forwarded their letters to the government, in order that the government might deal with them as they might see fit. The Minister of Justice has imported this matter into his book, solely for the purpose of making political capital against your humble servant, whom he selects specially as the one who has started up the excitement in the country, with regard to this binder twine business, and the Minister of Justice thought he would kill me if he could. Again the Minister of Justice makes this statement in reference to Mr. Kelly :

An agreement was ultimately made with Mr. Kelly to sell for the government the output of the year. The first three months of 1896 seemed to have been taken up in deciding which of the candidates for employment was to be preferred. Mr. Kelly, an employee of the Cordage Company, was to be agent for a period of five years, ending the 1st day of September, 1900.

That proved that the government, early in 1896, had selected an agent to sell the output of the binder twine for five years ending in 1900. Further on the same page, he said :

The security which Mr. Kelly offered was a security against any fraud on his part, but not a security for the payment of the value of the twine which he received for sale; he declined to be answerable for the debts of the purchasers, and so, being unable to give the security required, the arrangements made with him were terminated in August, 1896.

Who terminated that? This government did. They refused to fill the orders, this agent had taken, and they cancelled them because he would not give security for the orders he had sent in. Is there a merchant in this country who would expect his agent to be responsible for the goods he may sell? When the agent forwards the order to the firm he is working for, they can refuse to take the order if they like, or they can take the order and run chances of collecting the debt. The agent is paid his commission on the sales that he makes, and on the goods delivered and paid for.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). The point in this book which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor), is reading from is : That he agreed in the first place to become responsible and afterwards refused.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend as a lawyer may read it that way, but I as a layman cannot, and the book does not say so. The book says that the security which Mr. Kelly offered was a security against any fraud on his part, but not a security for the payment of the value of the twine.

Mr. BRITTON. It says that the person shall be responsible for the aggregate value of the twine sold.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is the statement of the Minister of Justice, but not the agreement made by Mr. Kelly. He was to sell for five years on a commission of 10 per cent; and when this government came in, they wanted an excuse to dismiss him, and they looked at the bond and said, 'Unless you put up security for the goods sold by you, we will not sell;' and the warden got instructions accordingly, and the twine was piled up there. He says further :

Yet, after this policy of a sale upon commission had been tried, and had absolutely failed, Mr. Taylor informs parliament that the sale by our predecessors in office had always been a sale by public tender in the open market, when it is perfectly clear that the course of action to which the late government was committed did not admit of tender at all.

Where does the Minister of Justice get that statement? If my hon. friend will turn to Hansard of 1899, revised edition, at page 9900, he will see what I did say, and I want you to put this against the statement of the Minister of Justice in this book, and then tell me who makes the false statement :

The binder twine manufactory was started at the Kingston Penitentiary by the late government for the express purpose of giving the farmers binder twine practically at what they could manufacture it for and allow other manufacturers a fair living profit. The late government disposed of this twine by supplying merchants all over the country, sending their agents out and forcing other manufacturers to do the same in order to get their goods on the market.

There is the policy I stated as having been adopted by the late government. The hon. gentleman and the Minister of Justice cannot find in the pages of Hansard that I made the statement that the late government always called for tenders; yet the Minister of Justice writes that palpable falsehood with my statement before him as plain as day, directly to the contrary. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I might ask you whom that book was written by—whether it was by Philosopher Mills, Professor Mills, or by the gentleman whom you called me to order for naming a short time ago—a man who does not state the facts. The next statement which the hon. Minister of Justice makes in this book is this :

Mr. Taylor said that he would prove that the government sold the output of binder twine at the penitentiary, as soon as it was made in 1896, without tender, and handed it over to the Hobbs Hardware Company. This statement is wholly without any foundation in fact. The sale was not made to the Hobbs Hardware Company at all, but to Coll Bros., of St. John.

There is the statement of the minister; he says I made the statement that it was sold to the Hobbs Hardware Company. Now, what did I say? Here is what I said, on page 9898 of Hansard of 1899 :

When this government were elected they immediately looked around to see how they could benefit some of their political supporters, and then went up to the Kingston penitentiary and discovered there some 500 tons of binder twine lying on hand. They did not call for tenders and sell that binder twine at the highest price. They sold it to private friends, Coll Bros., who purchased 500 tons at a small price. Coll Bros. handed that binder twine over to the Hobbs Hardware Company, of London.

There is the statement I made which no man having even the sense of a third-class pettifogging lawyer, let alone the Minister of Justice, could so pervert as to make it read as he makes it read in this book. He says I made the statement that it was sold to the Hobbs Hardware Company, whereas I said it was sold to Coll Bros., and they handed it over to the Hobbs Hardware Company when the combination was formed.

Mr. BRITTON. That is what you say now.

Mr. TAYLOR. But the Minister of Justice does not put it that way. Lawyer and all as my hon. friend from Kingston is, he cannot pervert that statement to make it appear that the sale was made to the Hobbs Hardware Company, of London.

Mr. BRITTON. I do not want to pervert anything; but if the hon. gentleman looks at this paper, he will see that the statement is that Mr. Taylor said that he would prove that the government sold the output of binder twine at the penitentiary, and handed it over to the Hobbs Hardware Company.

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not make that statement at all. Just read on:

This statement is wholly without any foundation in fact. The sale was not made to the Hobbs Hardware Company at all, but to Coll Bros., of St. John.

That is what the Minister of Justice says, and that is what I said. I said it was sold to Coll Bros., who handed it over to the Hobbs Hardware Company. The next statement he makes in this book I want my hon. friend from Kingston to listen to, because it is the worst that we have struck yet. After saying that the sale was made to Coll Bros., of St. John, he says:

It was a sale after tenders had been publicly called for by advertisement. It was made in December, 1896.

My hon. friend no doubt understands that statement, which is quite plain. Well, I happened to move for a return, and I have in my hand the return which was brought down, and what does this return prove? Does it prove that that statement was true? Here is the agreement that was entered into between Hobbs and Coll Bros.:

Memorandum of agreement between William Richard Hobbs and Thomas Saunders Hobbs, of the city of London, in the province of Ontario, merchants, doing business under the name, style and firm of 'The Hobbs Hardware Company,' of the first part, and the warden of the Kingston penitentiary, of the second part

Whereas, by a certain memorandum of agreement, bearing date the 4th day of September, 1896, Messrs. Coll Bros., of the city of St. John, province of New Brunswick, merchants, became the purchasers from the warden of the Kingston penitentiary of 500 tons of binder twine, of which they agreed to take delivery, and for which they agreed to pay at the time and according to the terms and prices set forth in the said agreement, copy of which is hereunto annexed.

I may say that that copy did not come down on the file laid on the Table in reply to my motion for the return. But this copy has since then come down, and it proves that the sale was made to Coll Bros. on the 4th September, 1896, and yet the hon. Minister of Justice states in his blue-book that the sale was made in December. He sends this information out to the country in defiance of the proof that the contract was completed, and signed, sealed and delivered on the 4th September, 1896. What confidence then can we place in a government that will put such statements officially before the people, which are proved by the documents in their own possession utterly unreliable and untrue.

Then he goes on to say:

And so Messrs. Coll Bros. were purchasers, and could only be the purchasers for consumption in the following year. Now, this sale, which had been made to Coll Bros., was assigned by them on January 25, 1897, to the Hobbs Hardware Company, who were dealers in a large way in binder twine.

Mr. BRITTON. That looks as if the sale were made in December.

Mr. TAYLOR. The return brought down proves the contrary, and I will prove that it was made in September by other evidence. My hon. friend from Kingston now tries to make it appear that the sale was in December, because the contract was handed over in January. But Coll Bros. held the contract two or three months. We had it in evidence, the other day, from Mr. Connors, that the purchase was made in September. He swore to that. Again this book says:

Coll Bros. were as free to sell to the Hobbs Hardware Company as they were to any one else. The transaction, so far as I know, was one into which the parties had a right to enter, and over which the government had no kind of control. Mr. Taylor says the twine was sold by the department at 4 cents. The fact is that the contract was as follows: Sisal, 4 cents; Beaver, 4½ cents; Maple Leaf, 5 cents.

That is what the Minister of Justice says the contract was for. I had not the figures when I was discussing the matter last year, because this document had been abstracted from the file before the file was laid on the Table.

But I want, before proceeding further, to refer to a statement of the Solicitor General, to which I intended to refer when dealing with Kelly. It will be found in the Hansard of 1896, at page 1462:

Of that quantity ten tons were sold and 490 tons are still on hand. Kelly, the man with whom the contract was made, not having fulfilled the conditions as to security, the twine was not delivered, and the department is proceeding now to dispose of 490 tons, and we have called for tenders.

On the 17th September, the Solicitor General made that statement. He told us why this twine was not disposed of, and that they had called for tenders. That was on the 17th September, but the record proves that the twine had already been sold on the 4th September. I ask the hon. Solicitor General to explain that, and why he did not produce the document, which was abstracted from the file I moved for. The agreement says there is a document attached, giving the prices and the date, and that document gives the date as the 4th September.

The hon. the Minister of Justice makes the statement that I said that the twine had been sold for 4 cents a pound. He will not find that I ever made any such statement. But he will find that I rose in the House to correct an article in the Ottawa Journal, which attributed to me the statement that the twine had been sold at 4 cents a pound. If my hon. friend will look at the unrevised Hansard, he will find on page 7235 the statement that I then made:

They were allowed to purchase 600,000 pounds from the Kingston penitentiary without tender last year, at 4½ cents per pound.

Then the Journal had an interview with Mr. Bate, and Mr. Bate, quoting the Journal, said I had made the statement in the House that the twine had been sold at 4 cents. The next day, the 12th July, I rose to correct that misstatement, and spoke as follows:

Before the Orders of the Day are called, I have something to say of importance to myself and the country, and to put myself right I will conclude with a motion. In the Ottawa Journal of yesterday the following statement is made by the writer in the gallery, I have no doubt, who reported the proceedings of this House:

'Proceeding, Mr. Taylor said that as shrewd business men, Bate & Sons knew that their action would put the government under an obligation to them. They bought the government binder twine the next year at 4 cents, and sold it at an average of 13 cents, thus making enough to pay for two or three houses.'

The statement I made in the House, as reported in 'Hansard,' is as follows:

'They were allowed to purchase 100,000 pounds of binder twine from the penitentiary without tender last year, at 4½ cents per pound.'

So that the only place the Minister of Justice could find this figure of 4 cents was the Ottawa Evening Journal, whose statement I promptly corrected, and if he will refer to the discussion that took place on the Coll Bros. contract, page 10.152 of the unrevised Hansard, he will find what I really did say.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). In what year was the purchase made?

Mr. TAYLOR. In the fall of 1896. Here is what I said in discussing the question last year:

By that agreement Coll Bros. purchased these 500 tons of binder twine in the fall of 1896, and banded it over to the Hobbs Hardware Company, of London.

Mr. WOOD. Had they not a perfect right to do that?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, but this goes to prove that there was a ring formed then, which ring is in evidence to-day, and before I get through with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood), I think I will prove that the hon. gentleman is in it.

Mr. WOOD. You are not able to do that.

Mr. TAYLOR. Wait until I get through to-day.

It just goes on to prove that there was a ring formed then, that ring is in existence up to the present time. Binder twine has been sold at 4 cents and 4½ cents a pound by the penitentiary, and this ring has compelled the farmers of Canada to pay from 12 cents to 15 cents per pound during the last two or three years.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). In what year did the penitentiary sell twine at 4 cents?

Mr. TAYLOR. I will give the figures each year before I sit down, and the dates. In the papers that came down, there was a memorandum of agreement between the Hobbs Hardware Company and the Kingston penitentiary, which states:

Whereas, by a certain memorandum of agreement, bearing date the 4th day of September, 1896, Messrs. Coll Bros., of the city of St. John, province of New Brunswick, merchants, became the purchasers from the warden of the Kingston penitentiary of 500 tons of binder twine, of which they agreed to take delivery and for which they agreed to pay at the time, and according to the terms and prices set forth in the said agreement, a copy of which is hereunto annexed.

And whereas, the said Coll Bros. did assign to the said Hobbs Hardware Company, by a certain memorandum of agreement, bearing date the 25th day of January, 1897, the said hereinbefore in part recited agreement, and the said binder twine therein mentioned, and all their right, title and interest, under and by virtue of the said agreement, as will more fully appear by reference to the said last mentioned memorandum of agreement, a copy of which is hereunto annexed.

After reciting the above agreement, I proceeded to say:

I may say here that there is no copy annexed, and that the prices are not given, but they are in a detailed statement, which is furnished of the receipts of the penitentiary, showing that they sold 500 tons of twine at about 4 cents per pound.

The statement I made was 'about 4 cents a pound.'

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). What did you mean by 'about 4 cents'?

Mr. TAYLOR. I will show the hon. gentleman, and he will be somewhat surprised to find what the facts are after this statement by the Minister of Justice that he had sold this binder twine at 4 cents, 4½ cents and 5 cents. That twine was handed over by Coll Bros. to Hobbs. Here is a statement of the actual money received by the Kingston penitentiary brought down in this return which has been furnished showing that the price paid was 4½ cents a pound and the contract was made on February 16, between Hobbs and Coll Bros.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). What year?

Mr. TAYLOR. I cannot furnish brains for my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald, Huron).

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). If I wanted brains, I would not ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) for them.

Mr. TAYLOR. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, for protection against the interruptions of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald, Huron). There is the statement made by the Minister of Justice that this twine had been sold at 4 cents, 4½ cents and 5 cents, and here is a statement of the money received showing that what the Minister of Justice said is not true.

Mr. FROST. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) ought to give the year.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have told you four or five times that this was in September, 1896. This is the statement of the money received from the Hobbs Hardware Company in the spring of 1897. The Hobbs Hardware Company purchased the output. The contract dated February 16, 1897, was for the purchase of 5,078 at 4½ cents, and 5,013 at 4 cents, making an average of 4½ cents, or about 4 cents as I stated. The next statement he makes is this:

Simply this: That on the 6th of August, 1896, the penitentiary warden represented that they had on hand 1,001,550 pounds of twine—

That is the quantity accounted for in the return:

—after the harvest season was over, and when no sales could be made except for consumption in the following year, when, by the deterioration in quality, a loss would be sustained.

The minister here says that he called for tenders and sold it in December, yet the contract was dated September 4. Where was the time to advertise for tenders? The warden made his report on August 6, and it would probably arrive in Ottawa on the 15th; and the contract was signed, sealed and delivered—probably according to a bargain made some days before—on September 4, handing over more than a million pounds of twine to Coll Bros., and they, on February 16, handed it over to the Hobbs Hardware Company. He makes the statement that the twine deteriorates in value by keeping, and reiterates it over and over again in this book. Could not the government stand the deterioration as well as Coll Bros.? Would Coll Bros., keen business men, make a contract to buy a lot of twine in the fall if it was the goods that would deteriorate during the winter. A more nonsensical statement never was made—

Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. WOOD. You know it deteriorates.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know it does not. We have had it in our store for two years, and it is as good as ever. It is only necessary that it shall be kept in a cool place. Why, every farmer will be able to contradict my hon. friend (Mr. Wood). Every farmer has some twine left over after his harvesting operations. Does he throw it away or burn it? No, he puts it in a bag and keeps it in a cool place, and some farmers say that it is actually better in the following year.

Mr. WOOD. It is not as good, and you know it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will have to call my hon. friend (Mr. Wood) down if he continues his interruptions. Now, I come to another statement in this book, and I want to ask the Prime Minister why he allowed his Minister of Justice to import the statement I am going to read professedly to give information to the members of this House as to the action of the government in respect to the manufacture and sale of binder twine produced by convict labour. He said:

Mr. Taylor made a personal attack on the Prime Minister. He said that he was under obligation to Messrs. Bate & Sons. This charge Mr. Taylor was compelled to withdraw the next day. Nor were the other statements Mr. Taylor made in any degree more accurate.

Can there be any other object in importing this statement into the blue-book than to discredit me in the country. He leaves it to be inferred that I had to retract my statement because it was untrue. You, Mr. Speaker, and the Minister of Justice, know, and the Prime Minister knows, that when a member of this House makes a personal statement with regard to another member and that statement is contradicted by the hon. member whom it affects, the member who makes it must withdraw the statement regardless of whether it is true or false. If a member during the recess had stolen a horse and had been arrested, convicted, and imprisoned, and, after being liberated appeared in his place and were accused of having stolen a horse, if he denied that statement, his denial would have to be accepted, and the statement withdrawn even though the man who made it and the members of the House and the whole country knew the statement to be absolutely true. I took back the statement I made with regard to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice uses it in this book as an argument to prove that every statement I made dealing with this question was not worthy of belief. My statement having been challenged, I am obliged to investigate this matter. I made a certain statement with regard to the Prime Minister and gave the authority for it. The Prime Minister contradicted that statement and I withdrew it and that should have been the end of it. But the Minister of Justice uses it as a means of discrediting me before the people of this country. And why? Because the supporters of the Prime Minister will have to go into the country and discuss this binder twine question. And when it is said on the platform that Taylor said so and so about the binder twine question, the attempt will be made to meet it by quoting from this book that I retracted the statement in this House, and that this should be made the criterion to judge every statement I made with regard to this binder twine question. I may say that the next day after the Prime Minister's contradiction of the statement that I made appeared in the newspapers, going down street I met a gentleman of high standing in this city. He said: Why did you take back your statement with regard to the Prime Minister? My reply was: Because the rules of the House compelled me to. Well, he said, it is true; I pass by the Prime Minister's residence two or three times a day, and I have seen Mr. Bate himself superintending everything that was done, I saw his men and his horses there—go down to the registry office and you will find that your statement was true. I said: You seem to be pretty well acquainted with the matter; send me an abstract of the title. I have here an abstract of the title, and I will produce it and see how it agrees with the statement the Prime Minister made. In contradicting me, the Prime Minister said:

I bought a house in the city of Ottawa. I bought it from the Leslie estate. The price agreed upon, if I remember rightly, was $9,500. I paid down $5,000 cash, and gave a mortgage on the balance for $4,500.

The Prime Minister, who ought to make a correct statement, says that he purchased it for $9,500, paid $5,000 down, and gave a mortgage for $4,500. After he made that statement, I spoke as follows:

I accept the hon. gentleman's statement; but I am sure he has not lived in Ottawa without having heard, as I have heard from friends of his own, sitting on that side of the House, and from many other responsible men in Ottawa, whose word for truth and veracity I would take as soon as I would that of any gentleman in this country, that what I stated last night was the fact. The statement being common rumour, I heard it time and time again, particularly since the contract for these Yukon supplies was given to Messrs. Bate & Sons without tender, and at these extraordinary prices, and also since that firm were given the binder twine, belonging to the people of this country, at about one-third of what it was sold for. This is the statement that is prevalent in Ottawa, and I think the hon. gentleman ought to be under a compliment to me for having brought it to his attention publicly, so that he might give it a flat denial, as he has done to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. TAYLOR. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but you cannot go down street and ask any merchant in town without hearing him make the same statement that I made here last night. When the hon. leader of the government sat on this side of the House, he and his friends behind him charged the late lamented Sir John A. Macdonald with having, through his wife, accepted a trinket from the then Sir Donald Smith, who was at that time, as he is to-day, connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and who saw fit to make Lady Macdonald a present of a gold necklace. Not only was that charge hurled against Sir John A. Macdonald, but when the people of this country made Sir Hector Langevin a present, the Prime Minister stood in his place and declared that no public man occupying the position of a minister of the Crown should receive a gift from his friends without having their names made public and laid on the Table of the House.

I was not finding any fault, but I referred to the matter to show how Mr. Bate had received such favours. The Prime Minister stated what his transaction with the property was. I accepted his statement and apologized, as the rules of the House compelled me to do. Now, Mr. Speaker. I ask you a question. If you purchase a property you remember at what price you purchased it; if you pay a certain amount down, you remember how much you paid; if you give a mortgage for the balance, you remember how much you owe, how much the mortgage is for. The Prime Minister stated, as I read in the Hansard a moment ago, that he gave a mortgage for $4,500. Now, we will see what the Registry Office says.

Mr. BRITTON. What has that to do with binder twine?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I rise to a question of order. I ask if the hon. gentleman is in order in bringing these matters up in connection with the subject he has brought before the House. If the hon. gentleman can show in any way how this can elucidate the question of binder twine, I think the House is entitled to know that; but unless it can do so, I think the hon. gentleman is not at all in order in bringing these personal matters before the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before you rule, I would call your attention to a sentence in the book I have here, and which I will read:

Mr. Taylor made a personal attack upon the Prime Minister. He said that he was under obligations to Messrs. Bate & Sons. This charge Mr. Taylor was compelled to withdraw the next day. Nor were the other statements Mr. Taylor made in any degree more accurate.

The Minister of Justice published that broadcast against me for the purpose of discrediting my word for truth and veracity. He says that every other statement I make is like that, and I think I have a right to answer that statement that he has published throughout the country.

Mr. SPEAKER. I confess that I cannot quite see the connection between the purchase of a house that the Premier may have made in this city and the question of binder twine. If the hon. gentleman wishes to repudiate a statement credited to him I think he has a right on personal grounds to do so; but I think it is not in order for him to enter into an extended argument in doing so, otherwise we would be led into fields of discussion that we would never get through. I do not wish to limit any member in this House from setting himself right where he feels he has been put wrong; but I think he ought to do so by simply making his own statement.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is all I purpose doing, and I intend to put the bare facts before the country to allow the people to judge for themselves. I am not going to say whether these things are true or not. But I say the Minister of Justice made that statement to injure me, trying to show that the statement I made last year was untrue, and that consequently every other statement I may make is not to be relied upon.

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I do not think he can discuss that whole question of the purchase of a house by the Premier, or endeavour to show that there was something wrong about it. I think it would be in order for him to repudiate the statement from his own standpoint, and say that it was not correct; but I think it would be unfair to the House to allow him to open up an argument on another matter that was so distantly connected with the matter under discussion.

Mr. SPROULE. I think my hon. friend should be allowed to give the evidence he has in his possession to verify the statement he made.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is all I propose doing. I wish to contradict the Prime Minister, who obliged me to make an apology. I have read the statement that the Prime Minister made to the House at the time, and I have read mine. Now, here is the abstract of the title:

JAMES T. MOXLEY, [Seal]

Deputy Registrar of the City of Ottawa.

Mr. TAYLOR.

The sale was made by Jennie L. Code, administratrix of the Leslie estate, on the 13th of April, 1897, to Madame Zoe Laurier, for $9,500. Madame Laurier gave the mortgage back to Sarah K. Gooderham, on the 17th of April, for $5,500.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. TAYLOR. Hon. gentlemen are prepared to laugh about a falsehood of $1,000 uttered by the Prime Minister of this country—a false statement. But that it not all of it. That mortgage was given to Miss Gooderham. Who paid that mortgage off?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). That is none of your business. If you had any shame about you you would not be doing this.

Mr. TAYLOR. The mortgage was made for five years at 5 per cent, and it was paid off by Mr. H. N. Bate, Robert Mackay, and W. C. Edwards, who paid Miss Gooderham her money, and got the mortgage signed to them as trustees, without any responsibility. This abstract proves it. Now, I leave it to the people of this country to form their own conclusions. I never would have referred to this matter were it not that the Minister of Justice dragged it again before the people and tried to discredit me. On the 3rd of September, 1898, just after the binder twine contract was completed and the Yukon supplies had been furnished by Mr. Bate, he paid off the mortgage from Miss Gooderham that had been made to run for five years.

Mr. DOMVILLE. This is disgraceful.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, it is disgraceful that we have a Prime Minister in this country and a government that will give favours to H. N. Bate & Sons in this manner, after the Prime Minister himself, when sitting on this side of the House, condemned the late lamented Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Hector Langevin for having received favours from men to whom they had given contracts. I say it is disgraceful to have a Prime Minister that will do it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has stated that the leader of this government has given favours to H. N. Bate & Co., in return for favours he has received from Mr. Bate. I say the hon. gentleman is out of order. he has no right whatever to make such a statement as that without being immediately called to order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I merely ruled at the moment that the hon. gentleman had no right to make an extended statement. He, however, has gone on to place before the House an abstract from the Registry Office. I think the House will agree with me that after what he had previously said it would be better that he should do so, in order that every man can judge for himself. With regard to personal references, individual members must take the responsibility upon themselves as to whether those references are in good taste or in bad taste.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would never have referred to the matter if the Minister of Justice had not made an attack upon me. I have given the facts to the country, the country will decide, and I do not express another opinion at all. But, I will deal with another opinion of the hon. Minister of Justice, and I want to ask hon. gentlemen opposite why they will make statements that have no foundation, and why they will applaud these statements of the hon. Minister of Justice which I have contradicted. They will be repeated on every hustings in the country, notwithstanding this contradiction, and notwithstanding the fact that I have offered to refer the matter to a commission of judges, one appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and one appointed by myself, and if they do not find a verdict in my favour, I will pay the costs.

Mr. CAMPBELL. You are a big man.

Mr. TAYLOR. If I do not pay the costs, I will resign my seat and walk out of the House.

Mr. DOMVILLE. You ought to be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). You have no shame about you.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I want you to call the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald), to order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I tell you distinctly that you have no shame about you or you would not make the statements you have been making this afternoon.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I want you to name the hon. gentleman for making a statement that an hon. member has no shame about him. When you call the hon. gentleman to order, I will proceed and not before.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). If so, you will not proceed to-night.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. TAYLOR. The next statement the hon. Minister of Justice makes in this book, is as follows:

Mr. Taylor said that Messrs. Bate & Sons, besides purchasing the output of the Kingston penitentiary, controlled the output of the Brantford factory.

Further down he says:

They sold the twine not long after, to another party at a very moderate advance in price, and this, I believe, is the extent of their dealing in binder twine. From no other manufacturer did they purchase. So much for the talk about monopolies.

I will allow Bate & Sons to answer that, to see if the hon. Minister of Justice or Bate & Sons make a correct or an incorrect statement. Bate & Sons make this statement in their interview in the Journal :

The government advertised for tenders. We replied. We do not know whether there were other tenderers or not. We got the contract in March, 1898, at an average of about $4.50. That this was a reasonable price was proved by a purchase we made later, when prices had risen. In March, on the rising market, we bought from a private firm in Brantford 307,000 pounds of binder twine at $4.80 per 100 lbs.

The hon. Minister of Justice says that this was the only transaction that Bate & Sons had. Bate & Sons say that they bought binder twine at Brantford to the amount of 307,000 pounds, and that they paid $4.80 per 100 pounds. Which tells the truth, this book, or Bate & Sons? Bate & Sons say that they bought twine in March, 1898, which they did. They entered into a contract, and we have it here. On February 28, Bate & Sons wrote a letter to the Minister of Justice. They talked the matter over with the Minister of Justice before, and on February 19, 1898, the following letter was written on behalf of the Minister of Justice :

Referring to the interview between the Minister of Justice and your Mr. H. Allen Bate, I am directed by the minister to state that he is prepared to consider any definite proposal which you may submit in connection with the manufacture of binder twine at the Kingston penitentiary.

I may also inform you that we have on hand at Kingston penitentiary a quantity of three different grades of twine, and the minister will be glad to receive any offer which you may make in that connection, such offer to be treated confidentially pending a definite decision in reference thereto.

The interview with Bate & Sons was confidential. It was confidential all through. On February 28, Messrs. Bate & Sons wrote to the Minister of Justice as follows :

Ottawa, February 28, 1898.

To the Hon. David Mills,
Minister of Justice, Ottawa.

Sir,—Referring to the request contained in yours of the 19th instant, relative to making you an offer for the binder twine on hand, we beg to submit the following:

For about 60 tons of Sisal.....	$4 50 per 100
For about 120 tons mixed Man- illa	4 95 "
For about 100 tons pure Manila	4 95 "

Subject to cash settlements on dates of deliveries at our option, f.o.b. Kingston, providing of course that the manufacturing is well done and in perfect condition.

We are, awaiting the favour of an early reply,
Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) H. N. BATE & SONS.

On March 5, the government sent out a circular to a few of their own political friends, asking for tenders to be submitted by March 19, in about two weeks' time. On March 19, 1898, Bate & Sons wrote another letter which is as follows :

Ottawa, March 19, 1898.

To Douglas Stewart,
Inspector of Penitentiaries.

Dear Sir,—Referring to your circular of the 5th inst., calling for sealed tenders for the pro-
Mr. TAYLOR.

pective output of binder twine at the Kingston penitentiary for the current year, we beg to say you may consider our offer made on the 28th ult., and addressed to the Hon. David Mills, Minister of Justice, for certain quantities of twines as applying to the output for the current year.

In regard to the deposit of $2,000 asked for in your circular and referring to our conversation over the 'phone this morning, we will be pleased to send you our accepted cheque on Tuesday next, if desired; kindly advise us on this point, and oblige.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) H. N. BATE & SONS.

That letter was received on March 19, and no deposit with it, but, they had a talk over the 'phone. That letter was sent, and the contract was entered into on March 28, between the warden of the Kingston penitentiary of the first part and Henry Newell Bate, Herman Gerald Bate and Thomas Cameron Bate. I refer to that, just to show that the contract was entered into on March 28, 1898. That contract was signed on March 28—signed, sealed and delivered. I was a little interested in this question and I asked a question of the government. If hon. gentlemen will refer to page 3659 of Hansard, 1898, they will see the question that I put. It is as follows :

Has the government sold, or agreed to sell, the binder twine manufactured and to be manufactured, in the Kingston penitentiary for this season? If sold, to whom, and at what prices for the different brands? Were tenders called by public advertisement?

Now, I want the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), to pay particular attention to this answer. Here is the answer of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), speaking for the government. He says :

No arrangement has yet been completed for the disposal of the output for the current year, but tenders have been called for by circulars, and are now under consideration of the department.

That statement ought to be true.

Mr. BRITTON. It is true.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Hansard and find out when it is dated, he will find out that it is dated April 18, 1898, and that this contract was signed on March 28.

Mr. BRITTON. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor), if he does not know that it happens time and time again that contracts are written out and the date filled in, and that they are not actually entered into until days and weeks after?

Mr. TAYLOR. I would ask my hon. friend to look at the correspondence I have just read, to remember the conversations over the 'phone, the deposit of $2,000, the fact that the contract was completed on March 28, signed, sealed and delivered, and executed in the department, that I put the question on the paper, and that this government comes down and makes the statement that they were only then considering the matter, having sent out circulars. What position does this place the government in? When members on this side of the House put questions, they expect truthful answers, but here the minister gives an answer which purports to be true, but a year or two afterwards, when we get the return, we find that the minister's statement is absolutely untrue in every respect. This was the answer given on April 18, by this government:

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). No arrangement has yet been completed, for the disposal of the output for the current year but tenders have been called for by circulars, and are now under the consideration of the department.

That was on April 18. I thought I would lay a trap for the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) and he walked right into it. This proves to my mind, as it will prove to the mind of every farmer in Canada, that there was a ring in the binder twine business, and that the government were shielding that ring, and they did not want the information to get out while the House was in session, and so they gave us an answer not in accordance with the facts. Long after this the twine had been disposed of.

Mr. WOOD. How could there be a ring, if binder twine is free of duty coming into this country?

Mr. TAYLOR. I will answer that before I get through. I have a note about it, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) will find he is interested. Here is another quotation from this book:

The only year in which the output of the Brantford factory was controlled by the purchasers of the Kingston product, was in 1895, under the preceding government.

There is another statement the Minister of Justice makes. Having already stated, on two or three occasions, that the twine was sold in 1894-5 by an agent, he now makes the statement that the government sold the output in 1895, and the same party purchased the output of the Brantford concern. How can the Solicitor General explain a statement of that kind made by the Minister of Justice, as follows:—

The government cannot advantageously employ commercial agents, pay their expenses, and send them abroad through the country, to make sales to retail dealers, and become an active competitor, without the risk of very great loss, and without incurring very great expense. I shall show you, our predecessors tried the experiment for two seasons, and the result of that trial, was not such as to induce us to make a further experiment on the same line.

There he defines what has been the policy and yet, he says in this statement, that the only year the output of the Brantford factory was controlled by the purchasers of the Kingston product was in 1895, under the Conservative government, again he says:

The experiment made by our predecessors in office, in 1895, was not one in any way advantageous to the public interest, as a portion of the price is still unpaid.

And again he says:

The only year in which the output of the Brantford factory was controlled by the purchasers of the Kingston product, was in 1895, under the preceding government.

Is the Minister of Justice aware that under instructions it was sold by the agent in 1895 at 5½ cents a pound to the retail merchants of this country? How can the Solicitor General reconcile those two statements of the Minister of Justice? Now, then, we come down to 1899, the Connolly contract, and at page 10, the minister says:

With regard to the sales for the year ending in August last, tenders were asked for by advertisement in a large number of the leading papers so that the matter was made known to every one interested. Notwithstanding this, we received in the department but four tenders. The price obtained was greater than in the former years, because of the enhanced price of the raw material. The contract was awarded to the highest tenderer, and in every instance the business transacted was open and straightforward. The prices received were:

Manila	$7.25 per 100 lbs.
Mixed.....	6.15 "
Sisal.....	6.00 "

Let us see how open and straightforward it was. Who was the highest tenderer? Mr. Connolly was. Did Connolly get the contract? Oh, no; it had to go to the ring. Hobbs got it. I have the tenders here, and I have some correspondence, and it reveals a funny state of things. Mr. Stewart, Inspector of the Kingston penitentiary, says:

The question arises as to the best method of disposing of the output of twine for the current year. There seems but two practical methods:

1. The employment of an officer of the penitentiary or other agent to dispose of the output direct to the trade;
2. The sale of the output in bulk by advertisement for tenders.

And then he leaves it to the minister to decide. The next is the form of the advertisement calling for tenders, and then we have the tenders. There is one from Bate & Sons, one from the Hobbs Hardware Company, one from Coll Bros., and last, but not least, one from Martin P. Connolly. These tenders, as it was proven, were handed into the office by the parties interested. The tender of the Hobbs Company was made out on a sheet of paper, of the Russell Hotel, the day the tenders were to be received. Hobbs was on the ground, Connor was on the ground, and tendered for Coll Bros. Bate & Sons were on the ground, and sent the tender in by one of their messengers. These three tenders were in, and they ran in this way:

Bate's tender.....	$5 45	$4 95	$4 65
Hobbs "	6 25	5 75	5 25
Coll Bros. tender.....	7 25	6 12½	5 08½

That shows that Bate was out of it and that Hobbs was out of it. Connor, who, the year before, had been a partner with Hobbs, and then with Bate & Sons in their tender, had a dispute with them. He put in a tender on his own hook, and he was higher than either Hobbs or Bate. Then a tender was signed by N. K. Connolly, with the cheque for the deposit sent in by Mr. Purdom. Hobbs solicitor. This tender was brought in before dark by a gentleman whom I now see sitting in the press gallery. What telegraphing was done to let N. K. Connolly know, or to let Hobbs know, that Coll Bros. was the highest tenderer, I do not know, but it is evident from the figures Connolly put in that there must be some telegraphing going on. Connolly is the same price as Coll Bros. for manila, namely, $7.25, but he is 2½ cents higher on the mixed, and 12½ cents higher on the other. Remark that there was a tender brought in signed by Connolly, but Connolly was not in the country that day, for he was away down in Mexico. Who forged Connolly's name?

Mr. WOOD. The government were not responsible for that.

Mr. TAYLOR. They were responsible for their actions next day. I asked for the papers, and they were brought down, and this much was brought down. Here is a telegram from Hobbs, Toronto, to Mills, Minister of Justice, which reads:

Connolly will sign contract in Ottawa to-morrow. To keep matters straight with department? Thought it best for him to complete tender. His interest is same as ours.

That is a telegram from Hobbs that Connolly's interest in their tender is the same as theirs. This proves that the tender of Connolly was raised a few cents over Connors. How the information was got I do not know, but it must have been got in some way, because the figures prove it. All the evidence proves it, because the cash deposit sent in with that tender was the cheque of Hobbs's solicitor, or was a draft on London.

Mr. WOOD. The government got more for the twine.

Mr. TAYLOR. Oh, yes; no matter about the ring; no matter about the poor farmer. Here is another telegram from the Hon. David Mills to Mr. Hobbs:

We must have responsible person from the outset. If you want arrangement to stand, you had better come forward to sign the contract yourself.

What arrangement is that? That proves that there was a private understanding between Hobbs and the government that the twine must go into his hands, and the Minister of Justice tells Hobbs that he must come forward and sign the contract.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). How do you know there was a private understanding?

Mr. TAYLOR. Because this telegram says so.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Read it.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have read it, but I cannot supply brains to the hon. gentleman. This is the telegram:

Toronto, March 1, 1899.

The Hon. David Mills,
Minister of Justice, Ottawa.

Connolly will sign contract in Ottawa to-morrow. To keep matters straight with the department, thought it best for him to complete tender. His interest is same as ours.

(Sgd.) T. S. HOBBS.

Next morning they came, and the contract was made out in the name of the Hobbs Hardware Company. Does that not show that there was a ring or combine to throw the product of the Kingston penitentiary into the hands of this monopoly?

Mr. WOOD. There is no evidence of that.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will read how truthfully the minister answered the questions to show whether or not he gives correct information. I put this question on the Order paper:

To whom and at what price was the binder twine manufactured at the Kingston penitentiary since the 1st July, 1898, and to be manufactured up to the 30th June, 1899, sold? Were tenders called for?

The Prime Minister answered:

To the Hobbs Hardware Company, of London. Tenders were called for by advertisement in the newspapers, and the highest tender accepted.

There is the Prime Minister's answer to me, that the Hobbs Hardware Company were the purchasers of the twine that year, while the fact is that Connolly was the purchaser. A month or two afterwards, I got the information that Connolly had been the successful tenderer, and my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) put this question on the paper:

1. Has the tender of Martin P. Connolly for the current season's make of binder twine, at Kingston, been accepted by the government? If not, to whom has such twine been sold?

2. What are the prices to be paid to the government by the purchaser of the different brands of such twine?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. The tender of Martin P. Connolly has been accepted, and a contract based upon that tender has been executed with the Hobbs Hardware Company, of London. 2. The prices cannot be given until the output has been marketed by the purchaser.

Wanting to shield the ring—not to let the country know what price they had paid for it until they had disposed of it, but giving a different answer to the hon. member for Halton from that which he gave me. The fact is, it is very little use for members of the opposition to put questions on the paper at all, expecting to get truthful answers from any member of the government. Again, the Minister of Justice says, on page 10:

If the government is to continue to give employment to convicts by the manufacture of binder twine, it must deal with the product in a businesslike way, and upon business principles. As I have already stated, from the attempt made to create political patronage, and to deal with the retail merchants in binder twine throughout the country, the season of 1896 was lost, and when the harvest was over, the department had the entire output of the year on its hands. I need not say that it would be impossible to continue the production of binder twine upon any such plan. Binder twine always deteriorates in value by its retention. If large losses were sustained, the men who now undertake to censure the department because we are running it on business principles, and relieving the public treasury from what would otherwise be an increased charge, would be the first to condemn the government for these added burdens.

Talk about business principles, and sell the output of any binder twine industry in this country by tender. The manufacturers all employ agents and send them through the country to retail merchants and take their orders for the quantity they are likely to dispose of. But this government could not do business on business principles. They adopt a plan of their own. They hand the output over to their political friends, and allow them to make huge fortunes by charging the farmers two or three prices for what they require.

I do not purpose at this time going further with this book; but I now intend to answer a few questions which my hon. friend opposite put to me, and which I promised to answer before I got through. I may say that this year the government got frightened. They know that they had been imposing on the farmers through the ring which had the control of the binder twine in Canada. I promised to enlighten my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood), who does not appear to know that the Hobbs Hardware Company are the agents in this country for the American trust, so that they not only control the arrangements of the manufacturers in Canada, but they control the American output.

Mr. WOOD. Oh, no, no. They sell merely for one factory.

Mr. TAYLOR. Does my hon. friend know that when Coll Bros., represented by John Connor, purchased from the government in 1896 the twine on hand, he made an arrangement with the Hobbs Hardware Company of London, under which the agreement I read here was entered into by the Hobbs Company for taking it over; that at that time Connor made a written agreement with the Hobbs Hardware Company, a copy of which is in the hands of the Department of Justice, showing that Connor and Hobbs were partners in this transaction? But previous to that agreement having been sent down here, the firm of Wood, Vallance & Co., the Hobbs Hardware Company and Connor, were each to have an equal share. The document providing for that was prepared, and when it was submitted to the solicitors of the hon. member for Hamilton, they said, 'If you go into that, it will unseat you.'

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a point of order. I say that no such statement was ever made, and no such contract was ever presented to my firm for signature.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend says he knows nothing of the agreement, that no such agreement was made so far as he knows. The man who told me was Connor himself. He says the bargain was made with the hon. gentleman's partner but when it was submitted to his solicitors, they said it would unseat the hon. gentleman if they went into it. Then, a new agreement was drawn up, a copy of which is filed with the Department of Justice, providing that Connor and Hobbs were partners in what they bought on the 4th of September, 1896, and the 25th of January, 1897.

Mr. WOOD. Will the hon. gentleman tell me when that took place?

Mr. TAYLOR. In the fall of 1896.

Mr. WOOD. I tell the hon. gentleman that such a thing never took place.

Mr. TAYLOR. It was between the fall of 1896 and the time the agreement was made with Hobbs, some time early in 1897. But, as I have stated, this year the government got frightened. They knew that there was a commotion among the farmers who had been paying two or three times the value of the binder twine; and I am satisfied that every member of the government has been deluged with letters, asking why this state of affairs existed, and why they had to pay such prices for their binder twine. They put up their faithful henchmen, the hon. member for North Wellington, this year.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TAYLOR. If that is out of order. I withdraw it. And they asked this question:

Whether it is the intention of the government to allow farmers to purchase binder twine manufactured at the Kingston penitentiary at or about cost. If so, up to what date might purchases be made?

That was the question the government framed and put into the hands of the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then I will say, the question which the hon. member for North Wellington framed.

Mr. McMULLEN. That statement is entirely untrue. I framed the question myself, and the statement is incorrect from beginning to end.

Mr. CLANCY. It does seem to me that unless the debate is to be unduly limited, it is not at all out of order for an hon. gentleman to say that the government may have framed a question and put it into an hon. gentleman's hands.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must rule, whether the hon. member feels satisfied or not, that that style of statement is unparliamentary.

Mr. TAYLOR. I withdrew it immediately, and said that the question which the hon. member for North Wellington had framed and put on the Order paper, was answered as follows by the Solicitor General :

It is the intention of the government to allow farmers to purchase binder twine manufactured at the Kingston penitentiary until the 1st March.

That was the first decision of the government. Then the Solicitor General further replied :

It has been the practice with the government 'as soon as the contract season' is over, to sell binder twine to farmers or other parties requiring it until a new contract is made.

That was the reply of the hon. the Solicitor General to the hon. member for North Wellington. Then the pressure began again, and the limit was extended to the 20th of March. Then another question was put, and the time was further extended. But the prices continued the same, in the interests of the parties who control the manufacture in Canada. The Solicitor General's reply was very plausible. He said :

It has been the practice with the government to sell to the farmers every year after the contract season is over.

Let me show by the return how much the government sold the farmers. Here I have the return from the receipts of the binder twine industry as taken from the Auditor General's Report. The small lots sold in 1897 amounted in all to $16.68. In 1898, there was not a dollar received from any other person except Bate & Sons, Coll Bros., Connor, and the Hobbs Hardware Company—in all $68,000.

H. N. Bate & Son.....	$38,695 82
Coll Bros.....	7 83
John Connor	6,415 10
C. E. Gagnon.....	0 36
Hobbs Hardware Company.....	21,439 40

$66,558 51

And in the next year, 1899, the Auditor General's Report shows that only $20 were received in all for small lots sold from the penitentiary, but whether these consisted of binder twine or oil barrels or anything else we cannot tell. There were five items of $4 a piece, sold to different parties, and the balance was taken by Bate & Sons, John Connor, the Hobbs Hardware Company, the Manitoba penitentiary and Martin Sullivan. So much for the answer which the Solicitor General gave, that it has always been the practice of the department to sell in small quantities to the farmers.

Mr. CLANCY.

I put a question on the paper this year. I asked the government :

Have the government sent out schedules of prices at which binder twine will be sold at Kingston penitentiary up to 1st March, 1900, as follows :

Schedule of prices.

Quantities.	Manila.	Mixed.	New Zealand.
	cts.	cts.	cts.
In lots of 50 tons and upwards..	12½	8½	8½
In car-load lots (less than 50 tons).....	13	10	9
In lots of one ton up to a car-load.....	13½	10½	9½
In lots of less than one ton....	14	11	10

Terms, in all cases, cash on delivery.

If not, at what price will it be sold in above quantities up to 1st March ?

The right hon. the First Minister replied :

Yes, the prices are correct and the time has been extended to the 20th March.

I have here two letters from a farmer out in Manitoba who wanted a quantity of binder twine. He wrote the warden of the Kingston penitentiary, and at the same time he wrote to the Consumers' Cordage Company at Montreal, and here are the replies :

Kingston Penitentiary,
Warden's Office,
Kingston, February 3, 1900.

P. R. Lamb, Esq.,
Carroll, Man.

Dear Sir,—I have your favour of the 29th ult. re binder twine, and in reply beg to quote you the following prices and terms for the different brands I have for sale.

	Manila.	Mixed.	Standard.
Lots of one ton up to car-load	13½	10½	9½

f.o.b. Kingston. Terms cash on delivery.

I am mailing you samples which you will notice have been clipped, but they are a true type of strength and evenness.

Yours sincerely,
M. PLATT,
Warden.

Montreal, February 16, 1900.

Mr. P. R. Lamb,
Carroll, Man.

Dear Sir,—Replying to your favour of the 12th inst., we would quote you binder twine, subject to change without notice :

Best manila	16 cents.
Manila.....	15 "
Mixed.....	12½ "
Golden Crown.....	11 "

f.o.b. Montreal. Terms net cash 1st October we will allow 7 per cent interest per annum for cash paid before that time.

The present unsettled value in raw material makes it hard to issue firm quotations, and though we cannot guarantee it, we look for much easier prices.

Yours truly,
CONSUMERS' CORDAGE CO. (LTD.)

The Kingston penitentiary prices are cash, and taking the discount into consideration, the prices quoted by the Consumers' Cordage

Company and the Kingston penitentiary are practically the same, proving conclusively that the penitentiary fixed the prices to suit the Cordage Company. I am prepared to show that the cost of production does not warrant any such prices. We have the statement in the official blue-book of the hon. the Minister of Justice, that binder twine can be manufactured at a cost of three-quarters of a cent per pound, and adding that to the cost of the raw material, we can easily find what it can be sold at, and there is certainly nothing to warrant the prices which the government charge.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, before you left the Chair at six o'clock, I had read letters from the warden of the Kingston penitentiary and the Consumers' Cordage Company giving quotations of the prices at which binder twine would be sold to the farmers this year, and I had promised you, Sir, and the House that I would give the price for twine for several years back, showing the cost of production and the immense profits that have been made by the manufacturers during the last three years owing to the course pursued by this government in throwing their twine into the hands of the combine, thus forcing the farmers to pay these prices. The fibre purchased in 1893-4 by the Conservative government, when they started this industry, as shown by the Auditor General's Reports—and all these figures that I give are from the Auditor General's Report, and can be relied upon as absolutely correct—was 4,200 tons in quantity, purchased at a cost of $22,792.04, which, together with insurance and freight makes an average cost laid down in Kingston of 4½ cents per pound. In 1894-5 they purchased 31¼ tons, costing $2,528.38; 32½ tons costing $2,838.09; 123½ tons for $10,904.78; 62½ tons for $5,741.14; 54½ tons for $5,855.21. Interest on ditto, $67.67. Then they bought another lot of 361,452 pounds of sisal at 2½ cents a pound, making $8,954.60; 199,368 pounds at 3½ cents, $6,167.95; 365,939 pounds at 3¼ cents, $11,760.16; 132,525 pounds at 3½ cents, $4,612.47. Making a total of $61,044.04 for twine purchased in 1894-5, or an average of 3½ cents a pound for the raw material for that year. The raw material that was bought the preceding year was under the administration of the late government, when the farmers get their twine at 6½ cents per pound. Now we come to the time of the present government. The fibre purchased in 1896 that went into the twine that was sold in 1897, was purchased from Robertson, Fleming & Company, 26 tons and 375 pounds, costing $2,560.46; from Thebeaud Bros., 156,095 pounds of current hemp at 3 cents a pound, and 273,925 pounds of seconds at 3½ cents a pound. Total cost, $14,428.95, making altogether for that year $16,984.41, or an average of 3½ cents per pound. What was on hand on August 1, 1896, and all made from then to July 31, 1897, was sold, as I have already proved by the money returned, at 4½ cents per pound to the Hobbs Hardware Company. That sale and the sale in January made an average of $4.65 per 100 pounds for which the farmers had to pay 12 and 13 cents per pound.

Now, we come to the year 1897. The raw material purchased in 1897, that went into the twine sold in 1898, which was purchased by Messrs. Bate & Sons. It was purchased from G. Anisinch & Company, 270,538 pounds, sisal hemp, at 3¼ cents, and 117,383 pounds at 3 cents, making $13,953.70. 324,000 pounds were purchased from F. Malcolm & Son; also 1,000 bales of manila, for $11,507.35. There was purchased from Thebeaud Bros., 664,822 pounds of current hemp at 3 cents a pound, amounting to $19,727.50; and another lot of 1,376,733 pounds, in all, making the total cost of raw material that went into the twine of 1898, $47,441.51, an average of about 3½ cents a pound as the cost of the raw material that went into the twine that was sold to Bate & Sons at 4½ cents a pound.

In 1898, not a farmer in this country purchased his twine for less than 10 cents a pound, and in some cases he paid 14 cents and 15 cents a pound. Now the hemp that was purchased in 1898, and was sold to the farmers last year, was purchased, as shown by the Auditor General's Report, from W. F. Malcolm & Company, London, at an average of 4 cents a pound for 250,000 pounds. The output was sold at an average of 6½ cents a pound, owing to Connolly having put in a tender to take it away from the Hobbs Company. Now we come to this year. The twine that is being sold to the farmers this year at 14 cents a pound, what did the raw material cost? It was stated in the papers that as soon as the combination was formed, the fact that prices run up was due to the war in Manila. Where have we war prices in what I have quoted thus far? Here is the material that was bought in 1899. It was purchased, as is shown by the Auditor General's Report, from Landaur & Company, 2,149 cwt., making 240,797 pounds of New Zealand, costing $13,678.06; from Malcolm & Company, 54 tons 458 lbs, costing $5,451.28. There were purchased from Smith & Schipper 62½ tons of manila hemp, and 135,000 pounds of fine seconds, for $6,995.82; also from the same firm, 263,679 pounds of the same quality for $14,458.66. So the total cost of the purchases that year was $39,984.72, and the average cost per pound was 5½ cents for the manila that went into the twine the government are selling this year at 14 cents a pound. Some people may say they purchased a large amount since the Auditor General's Report was made up. In the Senate Sir Mackenzie Bowell put the question, and this is the reply he received from the Hon. David Mills :

Hon. David Mills stated that between July and December last, 53,049 pounds of sisal and 59,198 pounds of hemp for the manufacture of binder twine had been purchased. There was a large amount of raw material on hand. Sir Mackenzie Bowell said the information was valuable as far as it went. The question was the quantity, the price and the parties from whom bought. The Auditor General's Report would give them the amount purchased before last July. He understood the minister to state that it was against the policy of the department to give the price until after the output was disposed of. He had already entered his protest against this policy, and again protested, in the interest of those who wanted the information, against the policy.

There is the total quantity and cost of the raw material that has gone into the manufacture of the twine that is on the market to-day. It cost an average of 5½ cents a pound. Every person knows that in the manufacture of binder twine, about 20 per cent of oil is put in to increase the weight. Oil costs precious little, but it increases the weight 20 per cent. Therefore, the twine is manufactured, including the cost of the raw material, at 5½ cents a pound, and three-quarters of a cent for the cost of manufacturing, making 6 cents a pound, but it would not cost the manufacturer more than 5½ cents a pound, because the increase in the weight will reduce the total cost. Therefore, the twine that the farmers are being charged to-day 14 cents a pound for, costs the government to produce 6 cents a pound, at the outside, putting the material at 5½ cents. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), the other day had a simple question on the paper, in which he wanted to know whether the government were going to sell the twine manufactured at the Kingston penitentiary practically at cost. The government said : Yes, up to March 1, and they issued a schedule of prices quoting 14 cents, 11 cents and 10 cents, when this binder twine only costs them 5½ cents to 6 cents per pound. That is the way the government are dealing with the farmers of the country, and when the farmers come to understand the question, because I defy the hon. Solicitor General, or any other hon. gentleman, to contradict the figures I have submitted as to the cost of the production of binder twine, the farmers will see how much profit they get out of it. No wonder that the Brantford Binder Twine Company were able to pay 60 per cent dividend two years ago, and 100 per cent dividend last year. They could not do it unless there was an understanding between the government and the other manufacturers, to put the price two or three times above the cost of production, to wring money out of the farmers. They could not do it in any other way. The Brantford Binder Twine Company, the Central Prison, the Hobbs Hardware Company, and the government control the output as well as the twine coming in from the United States ; therefore, they dictate the price to the farmers, and the farmers have to pay. Yet, the hon. member for North Wellington asks if the government are going to sell binder twine manufactured in Kingston penitentiary this year, practically at cost. Neither he, nor the Solicitor General, nor any one else can contradict the figures I have given, that the cost of the binder twine manufactured at the Kingston penitentiary this year will not exceed 6 cents per pound. Therefore, I say, in face of these facts, that this government have not conducted the manufacture and sale of binder twine at the Kingston penitentiary on business principles, and when the farmers come to understand the question, as they will understand it when they come to cast their ballots for this, or some other government in the next election, they will say, that, if on no other question, this government ought to be condemned, as it will be condemned, for having joined the combine to force them to pay for a necessary article two or three times more than its value, for the purpose of enriching their political and personal friends, and giving employment to their heelers. This man, John O'Gorman, of whom we have heard so much about, being a heeler and a ballot box stuffer, has been the agent for the Hobbs Hardware Company, and has been engaged in selling binder twine all over the country for the last two or three years. They say that they do business on business principles and that they sell by tender. No business industry in the country, the Montreal Cordage Company, the Brantford Binder Twine concern, or no other manufacturing concern of binder twine, or of any other article, will manufacture their goods for a year, place them on the market, and sell them by tender, either by newspaper advertisement or a circular sent to their political and personal friends. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I purpose and I do now move in amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) :

That all the words after ' That ' be struck out, and that the following be substituted therefor: ' in the opinion of the House the system adopted by the government in disposing of the output of the binder twine manufactured at the Kingston penitentiary for the last three years through their political friends has imposed a monopoly upon the farmers of Canada and has forced them to pay from 100 to 200 per cent more than the cost of manufacture.

That the proposal of the government to sell the binder twine manufactured this year up to the 1st May to farmers in small quantities at the prices quoted, namely: Manila at 14 cents, mized at 11 cents, and New Zealand at 10 cents per pound, while the cost of production did not exceed 6 cents per pound, is unjust to the farmers, and that the same should have been offered for sale to the farmers, in limited quantities, at a price not exceeding 7 cents per pound for the best quality.

That it is evident from the prices quoted to the farmers for this year, and in view of the low cost of production, that such prices have been fixed in the interests of the combine which controls the binder twine trade in Canada.'

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Mr. Speaker, I am quite certain that we are all agreed that this is a serious subject, as are all subjects which affect that portion of the community which is engaged in the greatest of our national industries, agriculture. It is one, I am sure, that we are all agreed upon, deserves thoughtful consideration and serious treatment. I appeal to all those who have listened to the speech made by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), and I ask them to say whether that speech is anything except a tissue of inaccurate statements interlarded here and there with vulgar abuse of the lowest kind. He has thought proper to be what he considers, severe, in addressing the hon. Minister of Justice as a philosopher, a pettifogging lawyer, and a prevaricator, for what reason has not been made apparent up to the present time. His references to the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), I will not deal with, because I am absolutely certain that all those who are within sound of my voice, and this includes hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, with the exception of the hon. member for South Leeds, will agree with me that it would be belittling the Prime Minister to answer the insinuations made by the hon. gentleman. It strikes him as a most extraordinary thing that a man who occupies the prominent and responsible position of Prime Minister of this country should be in the position of having a mortgage of $5,500 on his house. If I were willing to follow the course adopted by the hon. member for South Leeds, I would say that while this strikes him as most extraordinary, if the positions were reversed, these conditions would not exist. Let us deal with the facts that we have before us. The hon. gentleman has thought proper to attack the hon. Minister of Justice as a prevaricator, and to justify his statement, he has referred to a pamphlet issued over the signature of the hon. Minister of Justice in reference to the action of the government in connection with the manufacture and sale of binder twine. Of all the statements the hon. member has made, there is but one founded in fact. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) has referred to the contract made with Coll Bros., and he said that in this pamphlet the Minister of Justice states that the contract was made in the month of December, 1896. It is true that that statement is contained in the pamphlet, but if my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) had desired to treat this House fairly and impartially, and had desired to be accurate, he would have gone on to say that that word 'December' is merely a misprint, because a few lines below in the same paragraph, that contract is referred to as having been made when it was made in the month of 'September,' 1896. Therefore the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) had at the time under his hand the information necessary to enable him to see that this was a misprint and that that apparent inaccuracy did not in truth exist. But, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) had no intention of endeavouring to treat the House fairly. He had no intention of treating this question seriously. His sole object evidently has been to endeavour to cast dust in the eyes of the farming community and to create the impression that this government had dealt unfairly with them in connection with the binder twine industry. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) repeated three or four times over that he challenged any one to put in doubt the accuracy of the statements he made, and he was good enough to say that he was willing to have one judge appointed by himself and one by the government who would select a third, and to these three judges he would agree that all the facts in connection with this matter be referred. It is not necessary to have three judges; there is a very simple manner of proceeding. I here take the responsibility of saying that substantially every statement made by the Minister of Justice in this pamphlet is correct, and I tell the hon. gentleman that I shall now make some statements the accuracy of which I want him to challenge. The answer I make to his challenge is, that this whole matter be referred to the Public Accounts Committee where it will be dealt with and we will there test the accuracy of his statements and the accuracy of the statements made by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Solicitor General referred to the word 'December' as being a misprint and said that if I had read on a few lines I would have found I was inaccurate. I ask him to read a few lines further on, and I ask him to see if he can find anything in this book which showed that the sale was made in 'September.'

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Oh yes; that is one of the many traps that my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) has left open for himself. On page 5, the statement is made:

The sale was made in December, 1896.

On page 6, about the middle of the second paragraph you will find:

A part of the twine then sold is still unpaid for, and a suit by the Crown for about $9,000 is pending in the Exchequer Court for it, but the system has been in every way most unsatisfactory, and the sale to Coll Bros. in 'September,' 1896, of twine that ought to have been sold in the preceding February or March shows how complete a failure the system of the late government was.

Now, that reads to me very like 'September,' 1896. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) has said that this pamphlet is bristling with inaccurate statements. He has told us that in the year 1899, the twine was sold at 13, 14 and 15 cents a pound.

That may be true or it may not be true with reference to the farmers, but I state that in the county of Grey up to July 15, 1899, twine was sold to the retailers at less than 7 cents a pound. If the retailers subsequently dealt it out in the way the hon. gentleman has described whose responsibility is that? Is that a responsibility on the government, or is it a responsibility on what he is pleased to call the combine, with which I shall have occasion to deal later on? I say that the twine was sold by the wholesale dealer to the retailers, up to the middle of July 1899, at less than 7 cents a pound, and I have got in my hand now a list of the persons to whom these sales were made during that period.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) has said: That the Kingston penitentiary output of twine should be used for the purpose of controlling the price of binder twine in the country. My hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) has a reputation as a business man.

Mr. GIBSON. Where?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I venture to say that no one who has heard his speech this afternoon will believe for one single instant, that if he has been honest in his statements he can have any of the elementary attributes of a business man. For instance, he said that the twine industry was installed at Kingston for the purpose of controlling the price of binder twine throughout the country. Let me point to what Sir John Thompson said on July 21, 1894. When dealing with this question he was asked by Mr. Davin as to whether or not he would send some twine to the Northwest Territories and pay the freight upon it, and here is what Sir John Thompson said:

I should very much like to be able to do so, but I am afraid I cannot make such a promise. Companies already engaged in the binding twine business are in the habit of paying freight as far west as Owen Sound, but we would not be able, without involving loss and without calling on parliament to make good that loss, to pay the freight on binding twine sent to the Northwest Territories.

Mr. MULOCK. I should like to ask if the binding twine is being sold under cost?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, it is not. I mentioned the rates the other day, and I forget them for a moment, but binding twine is not being manufactured under cost—the price covers the cost and an allowance for the labour of the prisoners.

Mr. MULOCK. Is that calculated as free labour or as convict labour?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As convict labour, 50 cents per day, because their hours are shorter and work lighter than free labour. The product is sold at a price covering the cost of the material, also interest on the expenditure for plant, allowance for deterioration and everything that enters into the calculation of a private manufacturer.

That is the way it was intended that this business should be run. My hon. friend

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

(Mr. Taylor) says that we are in the hands of a combine and that these goods were sold in such a way as to enable the combine to regulate the price of the twine. Let me again quote from Sir John Thompson, who said in the same debate:

In addition, I may say that we are selling the product at the same prices as the Central Prison in Toronto, the firm at Brantford, and the Consumers' Cordage Company.

That is to say that even at that time the government had made an arrangement by which they were to sell the twine at the price at which these other manufacturers of twine in the country were selling it. But that is not all. I said a moment ago that my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) had the reputation of a business man.

Mr. GIBSON. You made a mistake.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. And he endeavoured to convey to the House the impression that it was possible for us to control the price of twine in this country by the output of the Kingston penitentiary, let us see how possible that is. What is the total quantity of binder twine used in Canada? The total quantity of binder twine used in Canada, is something over 8,000 tons a year, and the whole output of the Kingston penitentiary has never exceeded 500 tons. That is about 6 per cent of the total output. I would like my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) to point out with his business acumen, how, by the aid of 500 tons, you could control the price of the 8,000 tons that are sold in Canada? My hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) has said that the present high prices of twine are the result of a combine which has existed between the wholesale dealers and the government. That statement is absolutely inaccurate: and, moreover, my hon. friend knows full well that it is impossible for us to believe that he was honest when he made that statement. What was the price of the raw material which entered into the manufacture of binder twine? In 1898, it was 4½ cents a pound: in 1899, 8½ cents, and in 1900, 13½ cents: and the hon. gentleman tells us that we ought to sell it at 7 cents a pound. The rise in price is due to the war in the Philippines. So much is that the case that at the present time the export of manila hemp from the Philippines is absolutely ended, and the manufacturers have turned to Mexico for an article to substitute for manila hemp.

Mr. CLANCY. What was sisal in 1898?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Four and seven-eighths cents a pound. In 1899 it was 8½ cents, and in 1900, from 9 cents to 9½ cents.

Mr. CLANCY. I am afraid the hon. gentleman has not the correct quotations when he gives the same price for sisal as for manila.

Mr. WOOD. It has frequently been the same price as manila, and even higher.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am giving these quotations, not from my personal knowledge. I have absolutely no knowledge on the subject—no personal knowledge; but I will never say, as the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) said last year, that twine was being sold, as a result of the combine, at 14 cents or 15 cents a pound.

Mr. SPROULE. I will put under oath the men in my village who sold it, and I will show my own account, showing that I paid last year 16 cents a pound. I want the minister to understand that I make no statement in this House that I do not absolutely know to be correct or honestly believe to be correct. In this case I know, because I bought it myself. I will not take back water on that.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman would take back water on that or anything else that he set his mind to. But, I wish to state that in the village in which the hon. gentleman lives, the village of Markdale, previous to July 15, 1899, binder twine was sold to Frank Graham at less than 7 cents a pound, and to Mr. Telford, in the same village, at 7 cents a pound.

Mr. SPROULE. That does not alter my statement at all. I am giving exactly what I paid for it, and I have still the bill receipted in my possession; so that, I can prove it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I beg my hon. friend to bear patiently with me, because there are other things to come which I think will startle him even more than the statement I have made. The hon. gentleman said that the rise in the price was due to the combine that had been entered into between the government and the wholesale dealers who bought from the government. I have pointed out what the prices of the raw material were in 1898, 1899 and 1900. Now, how did we help the combine? We helped it by taking the duty off binder twine, the result of which was that the importations of binder twine into Canada rose from 2,000,000 pounds in 1895 to 10,000,000 pounds last year. That is to say, this government has helped to keep the manufacturers of Canada in possession of this market by establishing such a condition of things as has increased by 500 per cent the importations of this article since we came into power. Now, let us deal with the question of the combines, and let me remind hon. gentlemen opposite that Sir John Thompson was frank enough to say in 1894 that in fixing the prices at which binder twine was to be sold, he had consulted the other manufacturers in the country and sold it at the same prices at which they sold it.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). What was the price at that time?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have not the faintest idea. I am going to tell you what the government sold it at to Mr. Connor.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Your friend Connor.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am quite satisfied that he should be dubbed my friend Connor. Now, let us see to what extent hon. gentlemen opposite favoured the combines, by the uses to which they put the binder twine factory in Kingston. The binder twine plant was installed in 1893 and 1894, and it first went into operation in April, 1894. The output of the whole of that year was controlled by Mr. John Connor. He was the gentleman who installed the binder twine plant at the Kingston penitentiary. He was the gentleman who, after he had installed that plant, was careful to instal his own brother as a director of that industry. He got hold of the output for that year, and got all the money that was realized out of its sale. The position was this, that he got 200,000 pounds of twine at a cost of $12,700; that this was delivered to him during the summer season; and that, on December 9, 1894, he paid on account $1,683.50, and gave his notes for the balance. So that, he got all that twine in that year, manipulated it to his own advantage, got the money for it, and on December 9 he was indebted for the whole amount less $1,683.50. What happened after that? On April 13, 1895, he makes a contract with the government by which he is charged with the selling of the whole output of twine for the whole of the ensuing season of 1895. He gets the whole of the twine handed over to him, although at that time he was indebted to the government for his previous year's purchase to the extent of $6,362.78; but that does not appear to have made any difference. The agreement by which he got possession of the whole output of that year was the result of an agreement made by him with the Messrs. Connolly in the month of February, 1895, in which agreement it is provided that the partnership then entered into shall extend to such transactions as the said parties or any one of them may have or conclude with the Dominion government in respect to the manufacture and sale of binder twine from the Kingston penitentiary; and also to extend to any business that may result to any one of the parties hereto, in respect of the Central prison output now controlled by the provincial government of Ontario; and also to include the output of any factory, leased or acquired by the parties hereto.

They made this arrangement in January, 1885, by which the two Connollys and Connor, under the name of the Continental Binder Twine Company, formed a co-partnership to control the Binder Twine Company of Brantford, and also get possession of the government output at Kingston. Where is the combine now? What was the object of handing this output over to Connor, who was then interested in the Continental Binder Twine Company? But that is not all. He then gets possession of the output, and what does he proceed to do? He has the penitentiary binder twine, to the value of $11,000 of the whole output, shipped to this Continental Binder Twine Company—sold to this rival concern. He sells to this rival concern, in which he is interested, a large part of the binder twine of this government, for which he was acting as agent. Then we have the hon. gentleman talking of combines. But how does he qualify such an arrangement as that? Not only was that the case, but Connor then disposed of the larger portion of the balance to the wholesale dealers, so that of the whole output of that year, not more than one-third went direct into the hands of the retailers. The rest was all controlled in the way I have described.

That is pretty bad, but there is worse to follow. The hon. gentleman talks of combines, but look at those facts. They actually handed over to a member of the firm, Connor, called the Continental Binder Twine Company, the sale of our whole output of binder twine for that year, and allowed him to dispose of a large portion of it to that firm in which he was personally interested. That was bad enough, but what happened afterwards. Connor got possession of the binder twine and sold it. One million and a few thousand pounds of our binder twine, of the value of $56,000, was handed over to Mr. Connor between the months of April and August, 1895. Over 1,000,000 pounds of binder twine left the Kingston penitentiary in that interval, on Connor's orders aggregating in value, to be precise, $56,835.43. From the sale of that binder twine, Mr. Connor received $26,710.97 before the 1st September, and in addition not one dollar of the quantity shipped by him to the Continental Binder Twine Company was, up to that date, paid for. That $26,710, which had been received by him, he used for his own private purposes; and in the month of December following, 1895, when he was called upon to account for the output for that year, he gave the government two promissory notes—one of $20,000, and the other of $29,000—notwithstanding the fact that he had this money in his possession. And that is a condition of things to which the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) wants us to revert.

But that is not all. Mr. Connor's notes were taken in December, 1895. The notes were, of course, short date notes and never paid, and in the month of March, 1896—parliament being then in session and the government, no doubt, being anxious not to have an inquiry into the management of this industry—Mr. Connor was obliged to make an abandonment of certain securities he then held, so as to secure the government for the amount of their claim against him, which then amounted to $49,000. And on the 1st March, 1896, notwithstanding the fact that this man had received during the year previous over 1,000,000 pounds of our twine, and ought to have received its full value of $56,000 for the sale of it, the government of that day had only received on account of that sale $184.75. I trust that hon. members follow me. The output of the penitentiary was handed over to Mr. Connor in April, 1895, to be disposed of by him, as agent for the government. As a result of that, he received binder twine to the value of $56,000 between April, 1895, and September, 1895, and in the month of March, 1896, all that he had paid to the government on account of this binder twine was $184.75. Yet this was done by these business gentlemen who complain of the business methods of this government.

Subsequently on the 22nd of March, 1896, the sum of $23,641 was paid on account of this twine delivered the year previous, and you must now bear in mind that I have traced three deliveries, which aggregate $27,000, made in the months of June, July and August, 1895; and in the month of March, 1896, all that was received by the government was $22,641. What then have we got? The balance due was $26,000. That is to say, that, as a result of the system adopted by the Department of Justice at that time, and to which the hon. member for Leeds now wishes us to revert, as the result of the appointment of an agent to dispose of our binder twine, we find, a year after all the twine was sold and delivered, we have a shortage of $26,000; and on account of that shortage there is still due in the vicinity of $9,000 unpaid. There is a transaction of which hon. gentlemen opposite are, no doubt, proud.

But that is not all. One would imagine that they would have learnt a lesson by experience, but what do we find? In the month of March, 1896, the government took an assignment from Mr. Connor of certain securities in order that they might be placed in a position to endeavour to collect the balance due, which balance was still $26,000. And then what did they do? They deliberately set to work, and, on the 6th April, 1896, they made another agreement of absolutely the same character with a man named Kelly, who, at the time, was book-keeper for the Connolly Bros., who had been interested as partners in the transactions of the previous year. Not content with their former experience with Connor, they appointed as their agent Mr. Kelly, who was at that time the servant and in the employ of Connolly Bros., and also in the employ of the Continental Binder Twine Company. Now, let me see where the combine comes in. Let me say to you that Kelly had not $5 in the world at that time, and under this agreement it was provided that he was to give security to the extent of $30,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We will see how these 'hear, hears' are going to come out. The Connolly Bros. were interested in keeping our output of binder twine out of the market for that season, and what did they do? An agreement is made on the 6th of April, 1896, and when the change of government took place in July, 1896, that agreement was not perfected. And what is the result? On the 6th of August, 1896, the penitentiary at Kingston reported to us that they had on hand, practically at the end of the binder twine season, over a million pounds of twine that ought to have been sold previously. And what then happens?

Mr. R. R. McLENNAN (Glengarry). May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) a question? I asked it some time ago, and he said he would answer it shortly. What was the cost of binder twine—

Some hon. MEMBERS. That was given.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). It was not given. I would like to know what was the price of the raw material in 1899 and also what was the cost of the twine. It was sold for $4 in 1895, according to the report of the Minister of Justice, and he would not make it any less than it was. The farmers are not interested in knowing these matters that may be of interest as between the political parties, but so far as they are concerned this is a business matter in which they are interested, and what they want to know is, what did the binder twine cost.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not know that the farmers are much interested in knowing what the binder twine realized to the penitentiary, but they are interested, I believe, in knowing how it came to pass that the output of the Kingston penitentiary was tied up in the spring of 1896 and was not put on the market. They are interested in knowing also how it came to pass that the late government made a contract in 1895 with the agent of the combine to control the output of the Kingston penitentiary, and in 1896 they repeated the dose, notwithstanding that there was a balance of $29,000 still due on the transaction of 1895. How does it come to pass, if there was no combine and no desire to keep the Kingston output out of the market, that an agreement made on the 5th of April, 1896, was not executed or finally completed on the 6th of August, 1896, when the change of government took place? How does it come to pass that the whole output of the Kingston penitentiary had been, as a result of this agreement made with the agent of the combine, kept in the penitentiary instead of being allowed to go on the market? What explanation have we had of it? What has been the result? Not only was this binder twine that ought to have gone on the market 'to relieve the market,' as the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) would say, in the spring of 1896, kept in the Kingston penitentiary by the department to the profit of the combine, in the interest of whom the gentlemen were acting—and I do not say that as a matter of insinuation, but I state it as a matter of fact—not only was it kept out of the market, but it was kept where it was depreciating in value and would cease to have anything like the value that it had in 1896.

Now, we had this record before us. We saw that in 1895, as a result of the management of this Kingston penitentiary industry by hon. gentlemen opposite, there had been a loss to the country of $17,119.20. We saw that, as a result of their management during the year 1895-6, the country had suffered a loss of $21,524.03.

Mr. CLANCY. Of course the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) sees that it is not enough for him to make these statements; he should give some proof.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am ready to give proof. As a result of the investigations I was compelled to make, in preparation of the case of the Queen vs. Connolly, I came to the conclusion that it was necessary to have a complete audit of the binder twine accounts from the beginning of the Kingston penitentiary industry. This audit was made by Mr. Mackay, accountant of Toronto; and that gentleman will be delighted to appear before the Public Accounts Committee and give his explanations before them.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) lay on the Table a report of this audit?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am prepared to put these figures on the Table.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman has quoted a document and he ought to be prepared to lay it on the Table. I would ask your ruling on that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) to be quoting from an official document, but from the result of the investigation he made in a suit in which he was acting—

Mr. CLANCY. Under the authority of the department, I understand.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am prepared to meet the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Clancy's) difficulties.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) is undoubtedly right, if the document that the Solicitor General is quoting is in any sense in the possession of the government as a public document. In that case, it should be placed on the Table.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I will meet the difficulty. I said, that so far as I was concerned, I had never managed the Kingston penitentiary binder twine industry and did not pretend to have any special knowledge on that subject. But I am prepared to say this—I will lay on the Table the complete audit, and I repeat the challenge that I gave, that if any hon. gentleman thinks there is anything inaccurate in any statement I have made, I give my authority for it, and the Public Accounts Committee is open to the hon. gentleman opposite, where the matter can be fully investigated.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the Solicitor General have any objection—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CLANCY. Hon. gentleman opposite surely can afford to keep quiet, if they have a good case. I ask the Solicitor General if he would have any objection to letting me see the report from which he has just quoted.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have just made the statement that the figures I have given were taken from a report prepared by an auditor specially appointed for the purpose of investigating the figures. I have not the full report here, but I am prepared to lay it on the Table, and, on twenty-four hours' notice, I am prepared to produce the auditor for examination under oath before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. I have a right to speak. I consider that the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) is bound to produce that document.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think so, from the description of that document that we have had. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) has gone as far as the House can ask him to go when he has stated the source of his information and the circumstances under which the document came into his hand, and has offered to make it the subject of an investigation if the House chooses.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Further than that, if I may be permitted to add a remark, the full and complete report of the auditor I am prepared to lay on the Table of the House the moment I receive it. This is an interim report that I have, but I shall have the full report within forty-eight hours.

Mr. CASGRAIN. If this is an interim report produced in a suit in which the Crown is concerned, it is a public document, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) quotes from it, I take it, he must produce it.

An hon. MEMBER. That has been settled.

Mr. CASGRAIN. No, it has not been settled.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I rise to a point of order. From what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) has stated, I say this is a public document. It is a document filed in a suit by the Crown—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Nobody said that.

Mr. CASGRAIN—and it is an interim report made by a man who was officially charged with that duty by the government.

Mr. DAVIN. Here is what Bourinot says :

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CASGRAIN. If hon. gentlemen opposite think they will advance business by this sort of interruption, they are mistaken. It has been laid down by the highest authorities that when a minister of the Crown quotes a public document in the House and founds upon it an argument or assertion, that document, if called for, ought to be produced.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may say that the statement upon which I founded my ruling was what I understood the Solicitor General to say, that in the course of a suit to recover certain moneys, he had to make a certain investigation in this direction, and he was quoting information he obtained from that document. In that view I considered he had a right to use the information without being obliged to place that document, which was in no sense an official public document, on the Table of the House. I think that when he offered to submit the accountant who made that statement to an investigation on oath before the Public Accounts Committee, with any documents he might have, he had put the House in possession of a sufficient guarantee of the accuracy of his statement. But when my hon. friend went further and said this was an interim report, I must say that unless he made a slip in the matter, the House has a right to its production.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have not the slightest objection. I have referred to certain figures which I said had been prepared for me for the purpose of investigating the Kingston penitentiary. I was asked to produce a report of the auditor, and I said I would do so. I was then asked what I was quoting from, and I said from an interim report.

Mr. DAVIN. An interim report is a public document.

Mr. SPEAKER. In what sense ?

Mr. DAVIN. In the sense of being a public document.

Mr. SPEAKER. This arose out of a suit to recover certain moneys from a certain individual on behalf of the Crown. In what sense would that make it an official document ?

Mr. DAVIN. Nothing can be more public than a record in a court of record. The Solicitor General knows well that an interim report is a public document, and he is bound to let us have it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I take the same view as an individual member in that respect. I am not a lawyer, and, perhaps, am not able to define the difference; but it does occur to me that until the Solicitor General stated this was an interim report, there was no evidence to indicate that it was an official document.

Mr. DAVIN. Is the hon. gentleman going to let us have the interim report ?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman might allow the Solicitor General to finish his statement, with the understanding that he presents the interim report as soon as he is able. It would be unreasonable to ask him to do so in the middle of his argument.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I was proceeding to say that when the present government came into power in 1896, we found ourselves face to face with the situation which I have just described. An agent had been appointed ostensibly for the purpose of selling binder twine to the farmers, but in reality for the purpose of enabling him to control the output of the Kingston penitentiary as well as the output of other industries connected with the manufacture of twine, and for the subsidiary purpose of enabling him to receive moneys of the government in one year to the extent of $12,000, and in the next year to the extent of over $40,000, without accounting for them for over twelve months and as to a portion for over five years. In addition to that we found ourselves face to face with this further position, that the result of the binder twine industry was to give a deficit of $17,119.20 for 1896, and of $21,924.03 for 1896. Now, what did we do ? Were we to continue a condition of things such as that, or were we to make a new departure ? We found ourselves obliged to make a new departure. When we saw that the hon. gentlemen opposite, with that acumen and business capacity of which they boast, had produced no better result than that, we humble mortals could not expect to do anything better than they did, and we then proceeded immediately to bring about a change. We came to the conclusion that if the binder twine had come out of the penitentiary for the sake of being disposed of by a combine, and for the benefit of persons who did not account to the government, it was better to adopt a new system. We proceeded then to sell binder twine by public tender. A notice was issued in the newspapers to the effect that a certain quantity of twine was at Kingston, and calling upon those who wished to purchase twine to make application and to put in the figures which they were willing to give. In the month of September, 1896, Coll Bros. of St. John, N.B., put in a tender, and the twine was sold to them. In December of the same year we had on hand the balance of the output of 1895, and the output of 1896, which was sold to Coll Bros. Then we had to deal with the output of 1897. Notices were published in the newspapers, and tenders were called for, and tenders were put in, and the result was that the man who offered the highest price got the twine. The same thing was done in 1898, and again in 1899. The hon. gentleman has referred to the action of the Hobbs Hardware Company in this connection. He said that in 1899 they put in a tender in their own name, and then Coll Bros. put in another tender, and another tender was put in in the name of M. P. Connolly, which was in reality for the benefit of the Hobbs Company. It is true that in 1899 a tender was put in by the Hobbs Hardware Company. A tender was also put in by Bate & Co., and another by Coll Bros.; and a new tender was put in afterwards in the name of M. P. Connolly, but which was really for the benefit of the Hobbs Hardware Company. The explanation given to us is this: The Hobbs Hardware Company said: We tendered at what we thought the market price, we put in our tender, and we soon ascertained that Coll Bros. were putting in a tender also; and knowing the relations that existed between Coll Bros. and John Connor, we were not satisfied that our tender would be fairly dealt with, and that Coll Bros. would not get the twine over our heads. We then put in a tender in the name of M. P. Connolly, and that tender obtained the twine. The result was that the government got the highest price that was offered, and the public got the benefit to that extent. Now, I challenge the hon. gentleman to come before the Public Accounts Committee and to give an opportunity to the Hobbs Hardware Company to explain their relations with this contract. I challenge them to bring these gentlemen before the committee and to give them an opportunity under oath to explain their action with reference to these tenders; and then we will get at the bottom of it, and find out how it was that the tender of Coll Bros. was only a fraction higher than the first tender put in by the Hobbs Hardware Company. We will know all about the relations of Connor with the Department of Justice. The country expects to have an opportunity of knowing that, and we are prepared to say that it shall. Now, I will not weary the House with a recapitulation of what I have already said. I have stated the facts in connection with the relations of Connolly and Connor with the Department of Justice, and, I say that the Public Accounts Committee, and again I repeat it, is open for any examination of the Department of Justice and everybody under the control of the Department of Justice is at the disposal of the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would just ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) to state again the reference to the Public Accounts Committee that he is willing to make.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am willing to make a reference to the Public Accounts Committee of every transaction connected with the binder twine industry from the first day it was begun at the Kingston penitentiary down to the present time—every transaction connected with it. I will say more than that; I will produce before the Public Accounts Committee an auditor of repute in this country, of the highest standing, who will prove that he has examined these accounts from the first day down to the last, and he will show what the condition of this industry has been up to May 1 instant. He will show, as I said a moment ago, that as a result of the management of this industry in 1895, there was a loss of $17,000, and in 1896, of $21,000.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman's first proposition was that he would submit the proposition I made to the Public Accounts Committee.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That will go too.

Mr. TAYLOR. I made the statement that the book published by the hon. Minister of Justice is not in accordance with the facts, and that I was willing to submit it to a court of judges. My hon. friend said that he would submit it to the Public Accounts Committee. I am prepared to submit the dealings of this government since they came into power to the Public Accounts Committee for investigation, but if hon. gentlemen want to go back and prove that the Tory government were as bad as they are, I would say that it is not a question for the Public Accounts Committee. The Public Accounts Committee would be a packed jury. I will submit it to a court of competent judges, the government to select one and I to select one. I will submit the book the government has issued, and the statements I have made here to-day.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. gentleman made a statement. He said that the book prepared by the hon. Minister of Justice is full of inaccuracies. He then went on to say that the management of the output of the penitentiary twine by the present government was bad, that they had put the output under control of a combine which had increased the price, and he compared the management by the present government with the management of the last government. I am willing to let the whole matter of the management by both governments go to the Public Accounts Committee. I will give the hon. gentleman a report from the auditor within forty-eight hours, and he can get any auditor he pleases to examine it and test the accuracy of it. I will lay this whole transaction from beginning to end, the management by the late government and by the present government, before the Public Accounts Committee, and the farmers of this country will know how the binder twine industry has been managed and how an attempt is now being made to beguile the farmers and to represent to them that they have been improperly treated by the present government, whereas they were deluded by the late government. Not only that, but we will inquire further. I can understand that the hon. gentleman does not want the relations of the late government with the binder twine industry to be investigated, but we will inquire how the plant was put into the penitentiary, and we will find out something about the cost. We will find out how it came to pass that Connor was paid $40,000 to instal a plant in the Kingston penitentiary when there were tenders for the same work, or almost the same work, for $17,916. We will find out how it came to pass that the plant was installed in the way in which it was by Connor, and how it was that he came to be paid a lump sum. That I may be strictly accurate, I will say that Connor was paid $40,000 to put in the plant, and that there were two other tenders, one for $17,916, and the other for $19,450, each of which was for a plant one-quarter larger than the one put in by Connor. It is true that Connor, in addition to the machinery provided for by the other two tenders that I have referred to, was obliged to instal the plant and to put in a few extra pieces of machinery. The installation of the plant and the extra pieces of machinery at the prices which existed in 1894 amounted to $4,539, so that if my figures are accurate, the plant could have been put in for from anywhere between $21,000 and $25,000, while the country paid $40,000. We will inquire into all these things, we will know about this industry from the beginning, we will ascertain where all the wrong has been and in what respect the public have been defrauded. The whole burden of the hon. gentleman's song is that it is immaterial how it comes to pass that the price of twine to the manufacturer has been at a certain figure, but it is material that the price to the farmer should be lower. I pointed out at the opening of my remarks that it was impossible for us to control the price of 8,000 tons and over of binder twine when we simply had at our disposal 500 tons. But, more than that, hon. gentlemen have so burdened down this industry with this excessive cost at the time they installed this plant and with this excessive expenditure at the beginning that they have made it impossible for the government to sell this binder twine cheaply. Have we not to account to the people of the country at large for the management of this industry? Can we take out of the public exchequer a sum of money for the purpose of enabling us to manufacture cheap binder twine and sell it at a low price to the farmers? Is there an honest and intelligent farmer in this country who expects that we should do anything of the sort? What the farmers are anxious that we should do is, as far as possible, to make binder twine cheap to them. They want us to make binder twine cheap to them, and we have done that by taking the duty of 12½ per cent off binder twine and allowing it to come into the country free. But, we have done more than that. We have published it broadcast through the country, that the output of the Kingston penitentiary shall be at the disposal of the farmers, that they are free to take it as a small price above the cost of production, and the whole series of statements made by the hon. member for South Leeds is characterized by the statement that he made in reference to the output of the Kingston penitentiary, when he said that we could afford to sell binder twine this year at 7 cents a pound. This statement characterized his whole speech as being a baseless fabrication from beginning to end. How is it possible that we should turn out binder twine to the farmers of this country at 7 cents a pound when we have actually paid for the raw material in 1900, manila hemp, 9 cents a pound? What were we to do with the labour that we were to charge 50 cents a day for, according to the late Sir John Thompson, how are you to get the interest on cost of the plant, to provide for depreciation, interest and capital, because all these things have to be taken into account in any well managed business industry? These things go to show that the hon. gentleman did not intend to be serious in this matter. He had no desire to treat the people of this country to a serious speech on this subject, as they have a right to expect. He desired to lead them astray, and to endeavour to create the impression that the government is responsible for the rise in the price of binder twine. He did that, notwithstanding that he knew there has been this enormous increase in the price of raw material; notwithstanding that he knew that this industry was unnecessarily saddled by hon. gentlemen opposite, and without any justification, with this enormous expenditure at its inception.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). Before I proceed, Mr. Speaker, I would like your ruling on the point that the interim report which the Solicitor General has read from, should be placed on the Table. The House will, I am sure, agree, that it would be quite unfair to permit the hon. gentleman to base an argument upon that document without producing it. According to the rules of the House, it is now the property of the House, and I ask that your ruling be obeyed with respect to it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am entirely in the hands of the House. I am quite prepared to produce this interim report which is dated May 2, 1900, if Mr. Speaker orders me to do so, but with the understanding, of course, in justice to the auditor who prepared the interim report, that the full report should be produced. I again ask: Are these gentlemen willing to refer this to the Public Accounts Committee?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it better in the interest of all concerned, that the House be put in possession of the document, with the proviso that the Solicitor General has made. For the protection of the gentleman who has furnished him with these figures, the hon. Solicitor General has a right to make that statement to this House. It would be unfair that the House should look upon that document as strictly official, under those circumstances, but I think the House should be placed in possession of it. I think, perhaps, the House should wait, as the Solicitor General has promised, to be put in possession of the complete official report. Aside from that, there is this to be remembered: That a minister has always the right to use any source of information within his reach and to exercise his judgment with reference to the production of such papers. It would be far from us to say that a minister, on all occasions, should be forced to produce official documents.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I will lay the document on the Table of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) propose to go on with his argument?

Mr. CLANCY. I am not quite clear yet what your ruling is.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman does not proceed I will put the question. The document is on the Table and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy), wishes to go on with his argument, perhaps the business of the House can proceed.

Mr. CLANCY. The Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), has made his speech, but like a gentleman who has made a good speech from a brief, when the brief is wrong, then the Solicitor General is wrong. The Solicitor General has gone a long way to blacken the character of Mr. John Connor. I am not here to defend Mr. John Connor, because so far as the merits of this case are concerned, it is a matter of indifference to me what the character of Mr. John Connor is. I would remind the House that there is scarcely a crime in the calendar that Mr. John Connor has not been charged with by the Solicitor General. Let us see what part this Mr. John Connor has played under the notice and knowledge of the Solicitor General himself. What was the first thing this government did when they took power in 1896? Why, the first thing they did was to sell to Mr. John Connor practically the binder twine output of 1896.

Mr. POWELL. The same John Connor?

Mr. CLANCY. That same John Connor, about whom the Solicitor General had so much to say. This government sold him the output of the Kingston penitentiary for 1895-6, and that output the Solicitor General correctly stated, amounted to about 1,000,000 pounds.

Mr. POWELL. And that after he made the default.

Mr. CLANCY. After he made the default, and after the Solicitor General himself had risen in this House and made that statement. After that, the bargain was closed with Mr. John Connor in the name of Coll Bros. We have it in the evidence of Mr. John Connor before the Public Accounts Committee, that he was the man who conducted the deal, and was interested in the deal; and it was known to the Solicitor General and to the Justice Department. I will state the case, and after the character that has been given to Mr. John Connor, I will leave it to the Prime Minister, who, I fancy, has not much knowledge of the transaction, owing to his other duties; I will leave it to the Prime Minister to form his own opinion, when I tell him the part that Mr. John Connor played in this transaction of the sale of twine from year to year, from first to last. In September, 1896, the binder twine was sold practically to Mr. John Connor. What followed? Mr. John Connor put up $1,000. He was to have taken delivery of the twine in the name of Coll Bros., but we have it on his own oath, that he was the man, and not Coll Bros. The essence of the agreement was that he was to take delivery of the binder twine on December 31, and he was to pay the balance of the whole cost of the twine, and to take it on April 31st following. What followed? Why Mr. John Connor made a forfeit, and he was not entitled to a single cent according to the agreement, yet no step was taken by the Justice Department to see that Mr. John Connor or Coll Bros. had fulfilled the agreement. Then again, tenders were asked for in the early part of 1897 for the next year's output of binder twine, namely,

Mr. CLANCY.

1896-7, and who were the parties who tendered? Why, the Hobbs Hardware Company, of London, of which Mr. T. S. Hobbs, M.P.P., is the head, and the other tenderer was Mr. John Connor, but Mr. John Connor did not put up any deposit. He simply put in a blank tender. That was held until both of them went—I charge, with the knowledge of this government—to Toronto. The Justice Department was perfectly aware of the collusion between Connor and Hobbs, and it was held in that department until they went to Toronto, and secured the binder twine produced in the Central prison, amounting to one and a half million pounds. They came back, and with the knowledge of the government of the day—the Justice Department knew it; it is stated in evidence that from the minister down they knew it—they became partners. They had one million pounds that John Connor bought in 1896, and failed to pay for, which was held by the government for them; they had a million pounds sold to Hobbs Brothers, without any tender against them except Mr. Connor's blind tender, without any deposit; they had the output of the Central prison, and therefore, they held three and a half million pounds of binder twine, and so controlled all the binder twine in the province. Who were the persons? The Solicitor General states that John Connor formed one of what he calls The Continental Binder Twine Company, a dangerous corporation, a corporation for the purpose of forming a combine; and yet, with that knowledge in the hands of the Department of Justice, what did they do? They permitted this agreement between Connor, in the name of Coll Bros., and the Hobbs Hardware Company to be entered into, controlling 3,500,000 pounds, in connection with an agency of the American Cordage Company. They were able to form a combine between the Continental Binder Twine Company and John Connor and the Hobbs Hardware Company. Could there be a more complete combine? Was it because of an advance in the price of raw material that the farmers were obliged to pay from 12 to 13 cents a pound that year? There is absolutely not a shadow of truth in the statement that there was any advance in the price of raw material that year. What was the cost of the raw material in 1896? The average price was $3.66. Adding a cent a pound, which is more than the Minister of Justice adds himself to cover the cost of manufacture, it would cost $4.66. Now, I charge the government and I charge the right hon. first minister with having their attention drawn to the fact no later than last year that that twine was sold without tender and practically to the combine, and the twine handed over to the Hobbs Hardware Company. There was no attempt to get any other tenders, and the government was perfectly aware of this collusion by which the country was being robbed, and twine was sold to John Connor, in the name of Coll Bros., for $4.25, or 41 cents per cwt. less than it cost. The Solicitor General talks about it being a loss. I want no better case than for the hon. gentleman to quote here a document which he dare not produce. He has taken a position which is not creditable to him as a parliamentarian, a minister of the Crown, or a lawyer of standing: he knows that he had no right to quote a document and found an argument upon it, which he was not ready to put in the possession of the House. I charge him with knowing that John Connor was a member of the Continental Binder Twine Company, and with knowing that John Connor, as he has stated more than once, had played a part with regard to the binder twine business in former years, and that he was a dangerous man; and the hon. gentleman sat on the Public Accounts Committee and listened to evidence that there was collusion between John Connor and the Hobbs Hardware Company.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It was not within my knowledge until Connor was examined as a witness before the Public Accounts Committee a few days ago, that he had ever had anything to do with the Department of Justice, except in the capacity of a defendant, since 1896.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman should not come here with a brief to go to the country; for the hon. gentleman professes to present to the House a statement of the case in its true light, and he is now forced to acknowledge that he knows nothing about the facts. At the sitting of the committee at which the hon. gentleman was present, Mr. Stewart was examined. I will not read all the evidence, but I will read that part which is pertinent.

The PRIME MINISTER. Order.

Mr. CLANCY. I am not reading from the Public Accounts Committee of this year. I would not think of quoting from evidence taken this year. I am quoting from evidence taken in a former session:

Was it withdrawn?

Meaning the tender of Connor which was put in on behalf of Coll Bros.

A. Yes.

Q. When?—A. On February 15, about the time of the second tender.

Q. That was before the Hobbs second tender?—A. About that time.

Q. What time was that in February?—A. I think about the 15th.

Q. They withdrew it two days before the Hobbs put in their second tender?—A. Yes, just about that time.

Q. Did it ever occur to you that there might be collusion between these tenderers?—A. I knew it was, because it was definitely so stated.

Is the hon. gentleman's memory failing him? What does he think of having sat at a Public Accounts Committee when evidence of that kind was given, that there was collusion between the Hobbs Hardware Company and the man whose character he has blackened to-night as being a most dangerous man who would not be trusted by any person? But, I am going to call his attention to one thing more. The hon. gentleman professes to give an audit here to-night. I pledge my existence as a member of this House that in the presence of the hon. gentleman himself, Mr. Hughes made the statement on oath showing that for the last five years the whole output of the Kingston penitentiary, from the inception of the industry, had shown, not a deficit, but a profit of some $5,000. My hon. friend shakes his head, but I promise to produce the evidence and give it to him. I will go further, because I think my memory is better than the hon. gentleman's. The hon. gentleman tried to defend the position of those examining Mr. Hughes by showing that there was no such profit. That was the position of the hon. gentleman then. We find him in a different position now. I think I need not do more than recount the character which the Solicitor General gives to Mr. Connor, and let the country judge whether there was likely to be a combine. I am not going to defend Mr. John Connor. It is no business of mine nor of the opposition to do so. We are not concerned in that; but we are concerned, when the hon. gentleman sets up such a model as he does to-night, in showing the part this model has played in the combine from start to finish. In 1897, as I have stated, the combine commenced. Hon. gentlemen opposite were then comfortably seated in office. That combine was permitted with the knowledge of the Department of Justice and of the government. Whether they knew it or not, they were all responsible for it. What followed? Twine went up in price. That was not because there was an advance in the cost of raw material, for Mr. Stewart said there was a decline in the cost of raw material, saying that was one of the reasons for selling the twine low. That was in the year 1896, the year of the sale to Connor through Coll Bros. Who put up the price at once 10 to 12 cents to the consumer? It is enough to say that that occurred without giving any reason for it but a combine. It would never have happened without a combine. When the prices ranged from $4.25 in one year to $4.64 the next year, the prices at which the twine was sold to Connor and Hobbs it would have been utterly impossible. But with the combine having control of the two years' output of the Kingston penitentiary and also the Central prison amounting to three and a half million pounds, the average cost of which was not over 4½ cents it was an easy matter to advance the price to 12 cents per pound to the consumer, the government having facilitated the combine. It is idle for these hon. gentlemen to declare that there was no combine. Ask the farmers who were fleeced, and they will tell you whether there was a combine or not. There may have been some cases, in which a man purchased twine at a price somewhat less, but 12 cents per pound was that the average price paid by the farmers?

Mr. WOOD. Whom did the farmers get their twine from?

Mr. CLANCY. I bought some myself at 12 cents per pound from a gentleman, not worth so much, but quite as respectable as the hon. gentleman himself. I bought it from a firm in the town of Wallaceburg, who are hardware merchants and large dealers, and who are a very respectable firm.

Mr. WOOD. What have the government to do with the prices that merchants put on their goods?

Mr. CLANCY. If my hon. friend had paid attention to what I have been saying, he would know. I have pointed out that the Hobbs Hardware Company were able to secure the handling of the output of our binder twine, they had the output for two years of the Kingston penitentiary and the output for one year of the Toronto Central prison. They had the control of three and a half million pounds, and were able, in conjunction with the cordage companies of the United States, to put up the prices to any figures they liked. I am not undertaking to prove just who were in the combine, but am proving beyond doubt that the farmers were fleeced. The hon. gentleman asked what have the government to do with the raising of the prices. Well, the hon. the Solicitor General, if the statement he has made be true, must have known what kind of a man Connor was and what danger there was in permitting him to enter into that combine. This man Connor owed for twine delivered to him the year before and still unpaid for, and the contract with him might have been cancelled, yet the Solicitor General never made an attempt to secure a tender outside. And further, what was done? I believe that the hon. gentleman from Hamilton was a tenderer himself.

Mr. WOOD. No.

Mr. CLANCY. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. He was not a tenderer that year, but the next year, I believe, he did put in a blind tender. What followed? It followed that the Continental Binder Twine Company, with which this man Connor was connected, put up the prices on the farmers. I am not saying that the Solicitor General knew all about it, but it is very extraordinary if he did not. The Solicitor General was investigating the case, he had a suit in which Connor was concerned, and it is impossible to believe that he was oblivious to Connor's antecedents.

Mr. CLANCY.

This arrangement started with Connor and was shifted from party to party, each taking his turn in fleecing the farmers, and finally the whole thing ended up in a quarrel in 1899, in which the public purse did not suffer, but on the contrary, benefited.

Mr. WOOD. How could a combine exist, when there is a free market and you can buy in a dozen different factories in the United States, which can bring in their products free of duty. Does the hon. gentleman think that the farmers and merchants are fools?

Mr. CLANCY. The innocence of my hon. friend is overpowering. He says we have free binder twine, but I have pointed out the manner in which this combine was carried out. I have pointed out that the United States manufacturers were in league with the parties in the business in this country.

Mr. WOOD. That is absurd.

Mr. CLANCY. I have pointed out that the government was a party to allowing those belonging to the combine in Canada to put up the prices of the three and a half million pounds manufactured in the Central prison and the Kingston penitentiary, and furnished to parties in this country the means of forming a combine with the United States manufacturers, by which the prices of the 8,000,000 pounds imported in the same year were also put up. I am not called on to prove the existence of a combine, but I have proved that we have had the most vicious results that a combine could produce, and yet the Solicitor General never raised a finger to prevent it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I would like the hon. gentleman to indicate to the House how the government, in his opinion, could have disposed of our binder twine in any better way than by inviting public tenders and selling to the highest tenderer.

Mr. CLANCY. That is a very fair question, and I will give it as fair an answer as I can. I think that it is the duty of the government to ask for tenders in a public way and give the contract to the highest tenderers, if they have no reason to suspect collusion with the object of raising the prices beyond a fair figure. There was but one tender practically put in. The Hobbs Hardware Company put in a tender, and so did John Connor, through the Coll Bros., and we know the unsavory character which surrounded this man Connor, and which caused the public to look on him with, I might say, a national distaste in a financial sense, if we are to accept the description given of him by the Solicitor General. Mr. Connor did not even as much as put up a deposit, and it then became the duty of the government to have asked for new tenders, they should have advertised publicly for new tenders and given the public a chance of having some knowledge of what is going on, and should have refused to accept the single tender put in, when they knew there was collusion, as has been sworn to by Mr. Stewart. The very moment the government knew there was collusion, their plain duty was to advertise again for tenders. The government was not without some information. I am going to give some evidence that the government had their attention called to the facts. While Connor and the Hobbs Hardware Company were arranging the deal at Toronto, while the matter was being held over by the department here, while the whole thing was suspended for a whole month, what transpired? Mr. Hobson, a respectable dealer of Waterloo County, wrote a letter to the Justice Department, inquiring if the binder twine had been sold. He was told that it had not, but let me see what was done? This is what Mr. Hobson wrote:

Referring to your favour of January 14 regarding binder twine, I would say that your samples arrived too late for a tender to be put in your hands by January 20.

In other words, the samples were sent out so late—I am not saying designedly—that parties intending to tender found it too late to do so. I am not now going to charge that it was by design, because I have no proof of it. He says further:

Now that the department will have had ample time to consider the matter, will you please say if open for tender for, say, two cars, about thirty tons net, on terms of advertisement, 5 per cent, marked O.K., to be deposited with tender, and spot cash in full as shipments are made.

Should the matter not be closed, think I could make satisfactory proposition to you for placing the entire output, as I have connection with the trade throughout Ontario, and have twenty years' experience.

Would buy on terms stated, say number of cars with option of larger lot up to a stated date, then go on the road and place, thus arranging to place the full production.

Could satisfy you as to my ability in all respects to carry out any negotiations entered into. If still open, would call upon you and talk matters over with a view to business.

Can give names for security and ability to carry out any deal entered into that cannot be other than satisfactory from a business or party point of view, but would ask for no favours not in strict accord with business principles.

They were in possession of that while this deal was going on. What encouragement did this gentleman get? Here is the reply of the Department of Justice:

Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 5th I beg to say that negotiations are pending for the sale of the entire output in one lot, but the matter is not yet closed. The minister is going to Toronto to-morrow, and it might be feasible for you to see him there and talk the matter over. In the meantime, your offer of prices for two car-loads might be forwarded, so that it may be considered by way of comparison.

What are the questions asked Mr. Stewart following that?

Q. Did you have any further negotiations with him?—A. I do not remember that we had. I do not think there were. I do not know if he saw the minister, and I do not remember if I heard from him afterwards.

Q. You are sure that you had no communication with him afterwards?—A. I am quite sure I had no communication with him afterwards.

Now, I think I have explained sufficiently to the hon. gentleman who asked the question. The Justice Department had an offer—good or bad, I am not prepared to say—from a gentleman who said he was ready to handle the whole output, and who asked no favours or any terms other than those in accord with purely business principles.

Mr. WOOD. What was his name?

Mr. CLANCY. Hobson. I understand that he lives in Berlin, and I am told that he is a reputable business man there. But it is unnecessary to prove that; it was the duty of the government to have inquired into that, and, if they did not care to negotiate with him, knowing that there was collusion, they should have made it a public matter, and asked for tenders. I have shown beyond the shadow of a doubt that in 1897 there was a combine, and that the government knew of it, and even, according to the Solicitor General, they were warned of it. What followed in 1898? I was about to say that tenders were called for. But they were not—a very different state of things was brought about. About the last days of February, Mr. H. N. Bate, a member of his firm of H. N. Bate & Sons, had an interview with the Minister of Justice. I relate now what occurred as shown by the correspondence. The Minister of Justice directed Mr. Stewart to write a letter a day or two afterwards asking Mr. Bate to put in an offer, and he would treat it as a confidential matter. That is, Mr. Speaker, he would treat an offer for a million pounds of binder twine as a confidential offer. Why should he receive a confidential offer in a matter that concerned the public? If the Solicitor General disputes what I have stated, I will read the correspondence; but if not, I need not take up the time of the House in doing so. Mr. Stewart did write the letter he was directed to write, and Mr. Bate put in the confidential offer. The government were anxious that he should get the twine at his own price, but it was felt that some show of public competition should be made. So, what did they do? Circulars were sent out to a number of firms, but those were chosen who were not likely to disturb the peace of the mind of H. N. Bate & Son in this matter. The first of these was Messrs. Wood, Vallance & Co., of Hamilton. I take it that the hon. member for Hamilton is a member of that firm. He knew better than to put in a tender.

Mr. WOOD. I did not hear what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) said about my firm.

Mr. CLANCY. I said that a circular was sent to Wood, Vallance & Co. The year before that, the hon. gentleman's firm had put in a tender. Does he deny that?

Mr. WOOD. I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. CLANCY. I think he had better refresh his memory. If he denies what I have said, I will produce the evidence.

Mr. WOOD. I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. CLANCY. I will let it go on the hon. gentleman's want of knowledge. He did put in a tender, and put up a deposit, and it was afterwards withdrawn. I can give the hon. gentleman the date—

Mr. WOOD. I am not disputing it; I only say I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. CLANCY. I am glad the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) does not dispute it. Of course, though a circular was sent to him, he could not put in a tender, because if he had done so, and had got the contract, he would have forfeited his seat in the House. Another firm to which a circular was sent was the Hobbs Hardware Company, one of the old combine. Of course, it was arranged that they were to have their turn at fleecing the farmers. They had had one year, and now Mr. Bate was to have his turn and the rest were to stand back. Then, a circular was sent to Mr. John Hallam. Mr. Hallam is a very respectable citizen of Toronto, a dealer in wool and hides, not in hardware at all. In a general sense, he is a good party supporter, a gentleman who will take the wink and act upon a suggestion for the carrying out of a scheme. Then there was Rice Lewis & Son. It was stated by one gentleman that they are Conservatives. I am told that the men who gave the firm its name were Conservatives, there is not a single active man in the management of the business who is not an active Liberal.

Mr. WOOD. And I know to the contrary. Mr. Arthur B. Lee, the head of the concern, is a pronounced Conservative.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) knows that Mr. Lee is not the manager, but that Mr. Martin is the manager.

Mr. WOOD. I know that Mr. A. B. Lee is the president of the company.

Mr. CLANCY. And living in England the greater part of his time.

Mr. WOOD. Not at all—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CLANCY.

Mr. WOOD. I want to correct the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Clancy's) statement. Mr. Lee is a director of the bank of whose board I have the honour to be a member, and I sit with him every week. So, I know he cannot be in England.

Mr. CLANCY. Well, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) seems to have found a sleeping partner in the firm who is a Conservative. If he takes any consolation in that let him have it; he needs it very much. A circular was sent to H. Mooers, of Kingston. I am told that he is a very active gentleman in the Liberal interest, and that he is not a hardware man at all. I am told that he takes more than an active part when the elections come on, and the boys go to see him during the campaign. He is a grain dealer and not a hardware man, and would no more be looked to to tender for binder twine than the man in the moon—who does not use much, I understand. Another firm was Dalton & Strange, of Kingston. They are Conservatives, I believe.

Mr. TAYLOR. They are not dealers.

Mr. CLANCY. I believe they are hardware men in the city of Kingston, and the information I have is that they know nothing about such a circular. Then, there is J. H. Ashdown. Perhaps the hon. gentlemen opposite know who Mr. Ashdown is. I believe he was defeated by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) in the last election. A circular was sent to him. Well, I am sure Mr. Ashdown would not be guilty of so great a crime as to disturb the family peace by putting in a tender against H. N. Bate & Sons' private offer. Now, there is Coll Bros. Who are Coll Bros.? Mr. John Connor turns up again, one of the old combine, and a circular was sent to him. Mr. Connor knew what was going on as well as the Hobbs Company. The circular was sent to him, he was one of the chosen dozen. Then there was the Farmers' Binder Twine Company, a set of gentlemen who boasted that in that same year they made 100 per cent profit out of the farmers on their own twine. They were making twine to sell, they were in the same business, and not likely to be competitors. All they wanted was for Mr. Bate to get into the combine. Then, there was Mr. Charles Braithwaite, a very respectable gentleman, I believe, who is an inspector of noxious weeds under the Greenway government in Manitoba, and never handled binder twine, and never will. Was that gentleman likely to be a competitor? Why, the hon. gentleman, with all his ingenuity, could not have devised a better means of defeating any bona fide tenders than the selections he made of parties to whom he sent the circular. Then, there was Mr. Jas. Elder, of Virden, a farmer, who would be greatly surprised to see a circular of that kind coming to him. Well, the result of it all was that the twine went to H. N. Bate & Sons, grocers in the city of Ottawa, men who are extremely unlikely to handle binder twine. Now, what took place? Not a single tender was put in. Everybody could see that the job was completed, everybody could see that there was no intention of putting in tenders on these circulars, everybody might have known that there would be no tenders put in. The result was that Bate & Sons got the binder twine without competition, at their own price, at a price less than what it cost at Kingston to produce it. The raw material cost, in 1898, $3.72 per 100 pounds, adding 1 cent a pound for making it, would bring the cost to $4.72, and Mr. H. N. Bate, on his private offer, received the twine at $4.60, although in one of the city papers he stated, in an interview, that he only paid $4.50. Now, what occurred in 1899? Remember that there is no possible doubt of the accuracy of these figures. There was a meeting of the Public Accounts Committee, which I am afraid the Solicitor General has forgotten about, at which the original invoices were produced in every case of the material for making binder twine, from 1896 inclusive to 1899 inclusive. We learned from those original invoices that the raw material cost during the year 1899, $5.25. Add to that 1 cent a pound, and you have the cost of the twine which was sold to the Hobbs Hardware Company for $6.51. Now, I want to point out to the House the menace to the public interest in the way the Justice Department is managed to-day. There is no possibility of any man getting justice against this combine, they are bound to get the twine, it makes no difference who tenders. Now, who were the tenderers in 1899? Why, it was the Hobbs Hardware Company, John Connor, and H. N. Bate & Sons. These latter gentlemen put in a funny tender, in view of what hon. gentlemen opposite have said in their defence. Notwithstanding that hon. gentlemen have been stating that raw material had advanced double what it was before, Bate & Sons put in a tender in 1899 for three kinds: Sisal, mixed and pure manilla, at $4.55 for the first, $4.95 for the second, and $4.45 for the third. Everybody knew that was a mere blind, that Bate & Sons never intended to get it, the figures are conclusive on that point. There was a sort of family difficulty that arose, and Mr. Connor put in a tender pretty high, away above that. The difference between Connor's tender and that of Bate & Sons, on the lower grades, amounted to $1.35, on the next grade to $1.20, and on the higher grade there was a difference of $1.80 per 100 pounds. Well, the Hobbs Hardware Company had to come up to these prices, and what followed? At the last minute a gentleman rushed in and put in a tender in the name of Mr. Connolly. We had the evidence before the Public Accounts Committee that the Hobbs Hardware Company stated that that tender was theirs, Connolly was not known in it, indeed Connolly was not in the country. I am pointing out, not that the country sustained a loss, but that the country gained by the falling out of these parties. The government cannot separate themselves from responsibility and connection with these parties. From the Prime Minister down they must answer for their conduct. They are responsible for the state of things in the Justice Department commencing in 1896, in view of the information the Solicitor General has given the House, and they know the character of some of these men, who are no better than criminals, if the Solicitor General's statements are to be relied upon, and if they are not within the walls of the jails of this country it is because the evidence that the hon. Solicitor General has in his possession has not been made use of. These men were defaulters.

Mr. WOOD. They are the men they found there when they went in.

Mr. CLANCY. Yes, my hon. friend (Mr. Wood) sleeps with them, lives with them, defends them. The hon. gentleman is here to-night as the defender of these men, and in order to justify his government, and to defend his vote on the motion he must go out upon the streets and defend, according to the Solicitor General, the criminals whose records are as black as they can be. From 1896, dealing with transactions from the time hon. gentlemen came into power up to the last moment of which we have any information, we find the Department of Justice is walking hand in hand with them. We find also that they formed a combine to keep out any proper competition, and that, when, at the last hour, a tender was put in, nothing will remove from our minds the conclusion that there was a strong suspicion attached to this transaction, a suspicion so strong, so palpable that it almost takes the form of an object you would fall over—that information was given from the Justice Department about those tenders. What Hobbs is going to make the people pay for their binder twine I do not know. We know pretty well that they are paying a high price. I do not propose to detain the House at greater length. I say in regard to the challenge that the hon. Solicitor General made that he would have the matter before the Public Accounts Committee, he has had it before the Public Accounts Committee before, and I tell him that he has not done himself or the House justice when he quotes, here, for the purpose of making a point, that there has been a deficit year after year in the past when the evidence already shows that there really was a surplus from year to year. The hon. gentleman refused to lay the documents on the Table of the House in reference to that. The hon. gentleman had a brief, but he was loaded up the wrong way. He is forced to confess that he made a speech on a subject of which he had no knowledge whatever, and if ever there was a record against a government we have it in connection with this matter. They have acted as they have either through design or because they have failed in their duty. It makes no difference which. They are guilty in both cases no matter which side it may be. The management by the department of this industry is a disgrace to this country, the farmers will pay the penalty, and now the hon. gentlemen may defend the criminals if they dare.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I trust that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) will not forget to give me that evidence which he said was given before the Public Accounts Committee by Mr. Stewart who, he said, declared on oath, that he knew of the existence of this conspiracy in 1896.

Mr. CLANCY. I will send it over to the hon. gentleman if he will be good enough to give me his documents.

Mr. FRANCIS T. FROST (Leeds and Grenville). Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the speeches of the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), and while they both agree in condemning the government for the so-called conspiracy to defraud the farming community of their reasonable due in regard to the price of binder twine, their whole argument appears to be based on entirely false premises. The natural course of the trade in binder twine during the past three or four years, does not warrant any such conclusions. The hon. member for South Leeds has been following up a phantom for the last two years, and were it not for the high price that the raw material has reached in that time he would have no ground whatever for any argument in the matter. But, unfortunately for the farmers, and unfortunately for the country, the price of raw material from which binder twine is made has, during the past two years taken a sudden jump upwards, and this has led the hon. member for South Leeds to make an attempt to gain a little political capital against the government in regard to the price of binder twine. The position of the government, as far as I can see, is practically unassailable. There is no justification whatever for any charge being brought against them, for any conspiracy on the part of any of the tenderers, or any other party in connection with the purchase of the binder twine made in the Kingston penitentiary. We are told to-night that there is a combine. We have heard this statement for the last two years. The only combine that ever was in Canada was under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite. Look at the character of the trade in binder twine. If they will go back a few years and notice the fluctuations in the price of binder twine, if they will recall the fact that, at one time, one concern controlled the whole binder twine trade of this country, and that under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, they will at once see that it was not really until after the present government came into power that the combine was practically broken, that binder twine became free, and that the farmers themselves received the great advantage which came about by the legislation of this government. We go back to the year 1890, and we find that the firm of A. W. Morris & Co., changed itself into a joint stock company, known as the Consumers' Cordage Company of Montreal. We find that at that time binder twine was selling wholesale at 13 cents a pound, and that it was sold throughout the country to the farmers at 15 cents and 16 cents per pound by the retail merchants. Immediately after this company was formed they bought up all the binder twine factories in Canada. We know that they purchased one establishment belonging to a Mr. Brown, in Quebec, for which they paid something like $30,000, and that they closed it up. We know that they paid another gentleman in Lachute $6,000 a year, and closed him up. We know that there had been a binder twine factory in Port Hope, that it was bought up for $40,000, and closed. We also know that the same thing occurred at Brantford, and at one or two other points, so that by 1891 the Consumers' Cordage Company of this country had the entire trade of Canada in their own hands, and had an absolute monopoly.

Mr. CLANCY.

Mr. DAVIN. In 1891?

Mr. FROST. In 1891. That industry flourished right along until 1896, when this government came into power. In the meantime the industry was established, as we have heard to-night, at the Kingston penitentiary, in the year 1894. The monopoly also was an object of animosity on the part of the farmers of the country, and they started a binder twine factory in Brantford, called the Farmers' Binder Twine Factory, and from that time prices began to fall. It is true that the cost of raw material began to fall. I have here the prices which had been paid during all these years for binder twine. I have in my hand invoices of twine which the company to which I belong purchased, as we were very large dealers in twine during all these years. I have selected the invoices ranging from the year 1890, when the combine was established under the Consumers' Cordage Company, and I find that these prices ranged from 13 cents down as low as 5 cents in 1897, the year following the date of the accession of the present government to power.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman give the price of the raw material for these years?

Mr. FROST. Yes, the price of the raw material ranged from 1½ to 2½ cents from 1894 to 1897. Then it began to rise, while last year it took a jump from 2½ up to 9 cents a pound.

Mr. CLANCY. I can tell the hon. gentleman that when he states it was 1½ he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. FROST. Then, I shall quote the current price of the raw material taken from a trade paper called the Commercial. With regard to the price of the present year, it says :

Binder twine factories in the United States are holding their prices firm at figures fixed some time ago. Current quotations are 11½ for sisal, 14½ for manila and 16 for pure manila at point of shipment. Dealers are having considerable trouble keeping on the right side of the market, as they do not wish to be caught short, nor yet with an over-supply of twine, which might have to be carried over until next year.

That is one quotation.

Manitoba jobbers are selling twine now, and have been throughout the season, on a basis of 11½ cents per pound for sisal, 14½ cents for manila (mixed), and 16 cents for pure manila twine, f.o.b point of shipment.

That is another quotation. I have still another reference to twine, which says :

The signs of the market just now are all against anything in the way of lower prices. Stocks of twine carried over from last season were comparatively small, and the twine was made so late in the year as to rank almost as high in the cost as this year's product.

Now, I will give you the price of twine as it is quoted at the present time at Minneapolis, a prominent western city, in the midst of a great agricultural country :

Pure manila	15½c. to 16c.
Manila	14½c. to 14½c.
Standard	11½c. to 11½c.
Sisal	11½c. to 11½c.

I wish to say that the stock of raw material coming from the Philippine Islands has been so scarce of late that a large amount of the sisal coming into Canada at present comes from Mexico, and in this same trade paper, it says that the cordage manufacturers have about concluded using manila hemp for binder twine purposes. It says :

Cordage manufacturers have about quit using manila hemp for binder twine purposes. The twine works engaged on what is said to be the only stock in Canada, the supply being considerably less than 600 bales. This has created a large demand for sisal hemp obtained in Mexico, which is inferior, however, to the manila product, and much heavier in bulk. Manager Thompson, of the Ontario Binder Twine Company, states that the Mexican article is now 9½ cents a pound delivered in Toronto, against 6 cents last year and 2½ cents in 1897.

I trust my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) will note that the inferior quality of Mexican sisal is to-day 9½ cents a pound, delivered in Toronto, as against 6 cents a pound last year, and 2½ cents in 1897.

Mr. CLANCY. We did not deal at all with the year 1900. We dealt with 1896, 1897 and 1899, and, therefore, the hon. gentleman is making an argument we did not touch.

Mr. FROST. This paper says :

Farmers will have to pay at least 12½ cents for sisal twine this year, against 10 cents last year's price. The manila cord to be placed on the market will bring 15 cents.

One characteristic of the debate on this question, both last session and this session, has been the entire avoidance by gentlemen opposite of reference to the various qualities of twine, and also to the length of the twine per pound. There is twine that will average 650 feet to the pound, and there is other twine that will average only 500 feet, and the longer twine comes a little higher than the shorter twine. In the Kingston Penitentiary the twine has not been as good as that manufactured in the United States, or as manufactured by the Consumers' Cordage Company, for the reason that they had not the same appliances for the manufacture of twine in the penitentiary, nor did they have the skilled men to put that twine through in as good shape for the market as these companies have, which have been a long time in the business and thoroughly understand it.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Noxon swore to the very contrary. He stated that they made from manila hemp 650 feet to the pound.

Mr. FROST. I have been handling this very twine for twenty years, and I know the quality of these different twines. I can point to a member of the House who purchased prison twine last year, and he returned it from his own store and bought a higher priced twine. That is the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and I have this information from the agent in Toronto. Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as I can see, the difference between the policy of the present government and the policy of the late government in reference to this binder twine is : That the late government put in the plant and started the factory and placed the twine in the hands of one man right through and did not get all the money paid for it. They were extending the time and giving credit, so that the present government has been compelled to prosecute to get the balance of the money due the late government. Now, on the other hand, the present government have every time put the twine up to tender, either to dealers or through the public press, and invited competition. They have taken the highest tender in every case, and in no case has there been one dollar of the money lost from beginning to end.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is that the way you sell your goods ?

Mr. FROST. No, but I hold that the government should not give credit.

Mr. POWELL. How was the late government's transactions with Connor? Was that put up to tender?

Mr. FROST. The late government's contract with Mr. Connor was given privately. He was the manager of the concern, and he formed the Continental Twine Company, and carried on business on the outside, he himself being on the outside and on the inside too.

Mr. POWELL. Will the hon. gentleman allow me? I am in a position to state authoritatively on that matter, for I was engaged in the Exchequer Court case. John Connor did not buy one pound of that twine from the government. He was the government agent, and furthermore, he was bound by the contract, if my recollection is right, that not a pound should be sold by him on behalf of the government at a greater price than 7 cents a pound. The hon. gentleman is entirely at sea when he is talking about Connor's contract as he is.

Mr. FROST. Then, how does it come that his indebtedness to the government for over one million pounds of twine was only about 5½ cents a pound?

Mr. POWELL. I will inform the hon. gentleman as to that point. The Connollys and he constituted the company, not incorporated.

Mr. FROST. A private arrangement.

Mr. POWELL. A private partnership, of course. They wanted money, Mr. Connor got it, and it was not handed over to the government. It was the government's money; but that had nothing to do with the contract. It was simply that the agent had not handed the money over to the government.

Mr. FROST. The argument I am making is practically correct.

Mr. WOOD. Did not Connor collect the money and hand it to the Connollys?

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Connor collected it and handed it to the Connollys; but they did not hand it over to the government till the month of April.

Mr. WOOD. The Connollys had nothing to do with the government; but this was the payment of John Connor's indebtedness to the Connollys.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. gentleman is entirely at sea there again.

Mr. WOOD. I am not at sea.

Mr. POWELL. Maybe the hon. gentleman knows more of the matter than I do; but I happen to have been in the case before the Exchequer Court. The money was handed over to the Connollys to enable them to redeem certain stock that was going to be sacrificed, and they were to return it in a few days. The hon. member for Hamilton knows a good deal about it, because the firm of Wood, Vallance & Company was the largest purchaser from Connor.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. WOOD. I had not the honour of a seat in the House at that time.

Mr. FROST. There is this to be said anyway, that so far as the present government is concerned, there is not a member of the opposition who can point to one particle of crookedness and prove it. I have heard them speak about it, but we have seen no proof up to the present moment.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the hon. member not know that I read to-night from the evidence of the inspector that he knew there was collusion at the time?

Mr. FROST. Time is too short to-night to go over all the evidence of the inspector. So far as the inspector is concerned, I do not know anything about it; but looking at the whole matter from a business standpoint, the government could not do anything other than what they did. There are not more than a dozen dealers in Canada who handle binder twine in a wholesale way. There are many small retail dealers selling it to the farmers; and the government in taking the course they did, of sending out circulars to the dozen or fifteen wholesale dealers in the country took a practical and reasonable course. Of course, this year they are advertising to farmers direct; but that has not been the usual practice of the department; and for hon. gentlemen opposite to come forward with a charge of malfeasance or wrong-doing in connection with the sale of binder twine simply because the government were carrying out the ordinary practice of the department, is a very far-fetched method of bringing a charge against a government. The price of binder twine has been fluctuating for ten years. During that time it has been as high as 13 cents a pound and as low as 4½ cents. Within a year it has taken another jump to 10 or 11 cents, while in 1898 I purchased twine from the Plymouth Company in Massachusetts, for 5½ cents a pound. We made our contract in the month of January at 5½ cents, but after that stock of twine was gone and we wanted more, we had to pay 10½ cents for it. That was in the following July, and from the same firm. So that this was a matter over which the government could not have any control, because in the handling of twine you must make your contract in the fall. Our contract for this year's twine was made last November. If the government are to sell their twine to wholesalers, they must make their contracts before the 1st of February every year; but if they sell it direct to the farmers, as they are doing this year, they can keep on advertising it. But I can assure the government that they will have a considerable amount of that twine left over in the months of July and August. They are not going to sell all their twine, notwithstanding the fact that their product is only 500 tons. Last year I heard the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) remark that twine should be kept by the government anyway as a leverage by which the price could be kept down. In view of the fact that about 8,000 tons of twine are used in the Dominion every year, 500 tons will have very little effect upon the market. Moreover, as I have already said, the twine made in the penitentiary has never been as good as the twine sold by the Plymouth Company, by Deering, of Chicago, by the McCormick Company, of Chicago, and by a dozen other firms in the United States; and that brings me to the question of a combine in the United States. We have been told that Hobbs was the agent not only of the combine in Canada but of the combine in the United States. I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that there is no such thing as a binder twine combine in the United States. There are no less than thirty or forty distinct factories in that country, and there is a factory being started in Chicago to manufacture 3,000 tons of twine this year. We know as a matter of fact that among these men there is as keen competition in regard to binder twine as there is in regard to any other article of commerce on this continent. We have heard a great deal about profits. We heard the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) last year put the price up to 15 or 16 cents a pound. I know as a fact—because we sell twine in every province in the Dominion—that we never sold a pound of twine last year for more than 10 cents a pound, except towards the close of the season, when we paid 10½ cents and sold it for 12 cents. There is not a retail dealer in Canada to-day who asks more than 1 cent a pound on his twine, and in many cases he does not get that; but there is no doubt that a sudden demand for twine in 1899 did give some retailers who had purchased early in the season at a low price, a chance of making for the time being a snap. They cannot make that this year. The Farmers' Binder Twine Company, of Brantford, made a large dividend last year because they had a large stock of sisal which they had put in the year before, and they sold it for four or five times the price they would have got but for the sudden rise in the market. This government is not responsible for the war in the Philippine Islands, nor for the rise in the price of raw material. Nor in iron, nor in any other article of commerce. I do not think that any government can control the sudden rise, or the sudden decline in prices that takes place every once in a while. Business men can readily understand that, and there is not the slightest chance as my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood) has so well said, of any combine existing in Canada in binder twine, so long as that article is on the free list. It may be possible that there was collusion among the tenderers, but how is it possible for the government to know that? Hon. gentlemen opposite will not stand up on their own responsibility, as members of this House, and charge the hon. Minister of Justice, or any other member of the government with being in collusion with these tenderers. It is very easy to say that the Hobbs Hardware Company, and Coll Bros., or Connor, were in collusion. But is it an unusual thing, in the case of government contracts, for different parties to put in different tenders, and then share up? Has not that been the practice in this country, and in every country for years? How can the government know that such a thing is being done? The government surround their contract with every possible safeguard. They call for tenders, and they give the contract to the highest tenderer, and he has to lay down a deposit, and comply with the other safeguards surrounding the contract. Therefore, I cannot see how you can charge the government with collusion with any of these gentlemen, and no business man would think of making such a charge for a moment, nor has any hon. gentleman opposite ventured to stake his seat or his reputation on such a charge. I cannot see where the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), can get one tittle of evidence against the government to show that they were in any conspiracy to defraud anybody; and so far as the farmers are concerned, they have to submit, just the same as the rest of us, to whatever prices binder twine, or cotton, or anything else they consume, may command on the market, because they cannot, nor can the government regulate the rise and fall of the market.

As I go over the prices which the government have received, I can see that they agree almost precisely with those which I have received from the Consumers' Cordage Company, and from the Plymouth Company of Massachusetts. To give you an idea of the rise in prices, let me say that my firm bought our binder twine for 1898, in the fall of 1897, and paid 5½c. per pound for it, and that was not for sisal, but for the standard twine, which is two-thirds manila, and one-third sisal, and which runs 650 feet to the pound, but here is a letter written on February 21, about four weeks later, in which the writer says:

In view of the continual rapid advance in the cost of sisal and manila fibres, we have been instructed by the factory to go slowly in taking further orders at present prices. We send you this information, not for the purpose of inducing you to give further orders, but simply for the purpose of enabling you to sell your goods accordingly, for it is very doubtful if we will be able this season to again repeat our present quotation. But you may also depend on our prices being as low as the cost of the raw material will permit. Thanking you for past orders, and hoping to merit a continuance.

A month later, March 22—mind you we had been paying 5½ cents per pound—the same correspondent wrote as follows :

We beg to advise you to-day of the following advance in binder twine :

Plymouth.....	6½c. per pound.
Green Sheaf	6¾
Gold Medal.....	7½

It was the Gold Medal—the standard brand—free on board at Plymouth, Mass. ; terms October 1. With regard to terms, it must not be forgotten that the government were asking cash down for their twine. The Consumers' Cordage Company and the Plymouth people, and the Deering people, and all these big dealers and manufacturers, date their payments October 1, and their prices are all quoted six months or 7½ per cent off, if paid in cash within thirty days. So that taking the prices tendered by the Hobbs Hardware Company or Connors, or any of these gentlemen, and remembering that these prices were net cash, payable on receipt of the binder twine, and considering the fact that they are only jobbers and have to resell what they buy, they could not make very much on the transaction, and could not afford to give a cent more than they did. In fact I consider that for the last two years the prices which the government received for binder twine are the very best possible which they could have expected, under the circumstances, considering that these prices were net cash, and that the parties buying had to compete against the American makers and the Cordage Company of Montreal. And further it must be remembered that these parties had to pay freight to wherever they sent the twine. If they put up their binder twine in packages of one or two tons and pay the local package rates on it, sent everywhere all over Canada, you will see that after all there is not a great deal of money in it. In fact, it is very difficult to-day, in the Canadian market to get an ordinary retailer to keep on hand a little stock of twine himself, because he knows that there is not enough in it to pay for the handling ; and for hon. gentlemen to stand up here and speak of the immense fortune that some of these men are making out of the farmers, and undertaking to prejudice the farmers against the government, is the veriest claptrap. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to make all the political capital they can out of the government, when the government are handling a business transaction ; but so far as my business knowledge goes, I cannot see how the government could have acted differently or done better. I know that in 1897 and 1898 they might have offered their binder twine to the farmers direct, as they are doing this year, but that had not hitherto been the practice.

Mr. FROST.

Binder twine has to be sold early in order to get it off your hands and have none left over. I heard the hon. member for South Leeds say that it did not make any difference if binder twine was laid over. In that he was entirely mistaken, because it depreciates 15 per cent. I know that at one time the Consumers' Cordage Company bought all the binder twine that lay over in Ontario, and had to run it all through again. It has to go through a certain process of oiling, just the same as rope, and when that oily substance dries out of it, its flexibility is lost, and it will not go through the needle of the binder. That is one reason why the government have always had to take an early bid for the binder twine manufactured in the Kingston penitentiary.

Mr. CLANCY. And the hon. gentleman (Mr. Frost) was in the Public Accounts Committee and asked that question and was told the very contrary.

Mr. FROST. I do not care what anybody says, I know from my own experience that what I say is true. Binder twine that we carry over is worth only about half the price of the new twine. In 1899, when we were selling new twine at 12 cents, we were selling the old twine at 6 cents and 7 cents. The Consumers' Cordage Company have put tons and tons of their twine through the machinery again in order to oil it and get it into selling condition. Now, we have heard a good deal from my hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) about this matter being left to the farmers. I am quite willing to go into his constituency or my own or any other farming constituency and talk the binder twine question. I do not believe there is a farmer in the country who is not conversant with the fact that the raw material of binder twine has gone up over 500 per cent in the last two years.

Mr. CLANCY. Everybody knows better.

Mr. WOOD. Yes, every farmer knows that. And when he knows that, I do not think that anything the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) can say will have the slightest weight with him.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, if the material cost 5 cents two years ago, it must cost 25 cents now.

Mr. CLANCY. That is a clincher.

Mr. FROST. I did not hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor's) statement.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Frost) stated that the raw material for binder twine had increased 500 per cent in two years. In that case, if it cost 5 cents two years ago, it must cost 25 cents now.

Mr. FROST. Perhaps, I was a little wide of the mark. It went up from 2½ cents to 9½ cents, which would not be quite 400 per cent. I do not know that I need to say anything further. I simply wanted to place these figures before the House as against the sophistical argument of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy). I do not see why hon. gentlemen should treat in this manner a plain business question. If they should make a charge, if they should say that there was collusion with any of the ministers or put the matter in any form in which we could take hold of it, their position would be stronger. But to come here and rail against the government and ask the farmers to condemn them because they have done something that any honest government would do seems to me supremely ridiculous. For my part, if these hon. gentlemen are honest in the position they take upon the binder twine question, if they were anxious as they would have us believe, simply to protect the public interest from actual or threatened injury, they would have the matter investigated by the Public Accounts Committee. Let them bring it before the Public Accounts Committee, and I am satisfied the government will give them every opportunity to go into the whole matter and investigate every detail from the beginning of the binder twine industry in the Kingston penitentiary. Then we should see which government was wrong and which was right. Then, if hon. gentlemen opposite are not prepared to accept that challenge and go into the matter in a parliamentary way so as to establish the truth or falsity of the charges, the position they take before the country will have very little weight. I am not prepared to support the amendment. I feel satisfied that the government have done their duty in this matter and that they are not responsible for the rise or fall in the price of raw material. I look upon the amendment as mainly intended to influence the farmer vote, which, I am satisfied, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) will not get in the elections. As long as the government continue doing business in a business way in binder twine or anything else, I am prepared to support them.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Frost) who has just taken his seat has told us he could not support the amendment. But there is one thing he seems determined to support, and that is the high price of binder twine. He seeks to make us believe that high prices for binder twine must rule and the people must be content to pay them. To use the language of an hon. gentleman opposite, and I think the hon. member for North Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost), 'the farmers have to submit.' On our side our contention is that the farmers have not to submit to the kind of thing exposed by my hon. friend who moved the motion, and still further exposed in so masterly a manner by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) who replied so crushingly to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The Solicitor General used an argument, which has been echoed by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, that the output from the Kingston penitentiary could not affect the price of so large a quantity as eight thousand tons. But the zeal with which the combine seeks to crush out the smaller competitors, is proof that a very small competitor can affect the success of their efforts to keep up prices. But the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) forgot his superior in the department. In the pamphlet which he eulogized as a magnificent emanation of a master mind, this is what the writer says :

I am perfectly satisfied that it would be quite impossible for the government to appoint agents, and to make sales to retail dealers throughout the country, without serious injury to competing establishments.

The Minister of Justice himself says that if this leverage had been used, serious injury would be done to competing establishments. And Hon. John Dryden, who is a foremost man among the Liberals, speaking on January 24, 1894, at Columbus, said :

Another reason why this industry was adopted was that the farmers laboured under the burden of a monopoly, and it was thought desirable that the products of the prisoners' labour should be in the interest of the farmers.

He showed how the farmers had paid the monopolists for the ropes, wrappings, &c., at the twine price, but in future they would have a guarantee that the prison twine would be all right in quality and weight. He intended to use his influence in the future to supply the farmers with the twine at first cost. Business must of necessity be done on a cash basis. But as all farmers cannot pay cash, some means will be devised to give them the benefit of this industry.

The Minister of Railways and Canals asked my hon. friend the question, how he would dispose of the twine? The Minister of Railways and Canals seems to think that the only way was by handing it over to merchants, to gentlemen like the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), and the hon. member who spoke last (Mr. Frost). But the idea of those who started this industry in the prison, the idea that was in the mind of the Hon. John Dryden was this, that the way to benefit the farmers was to deal directly with them and not with the merchants. Once you knew there was a combine, once you knew that that nefarious conspiracy against the well-being of the farmers existed, the way was not to play into the hands of the combinesters, but to sell to the farmer directly. We have heard to-night the words 'crime' and 'criminal.' These words have been used pretty freely in this debate, and if there be criminals, the criminals are the government and the combinesters. Now, we have had the Solicitor General defending the criminals, and we have had a speech from one of the criminals themselves. I have often heard of the skill of the Solicitor General in defending criminals, but he must have had a bad case on the present occasion, because he made a very poor fist of it. As for the hon. gentleman who spoke last—I do not say it offensively—he is, of course, one of the criminals. He did not make out a very good case, and if we are to accept all that he says, there can be no remedy for the farmer for the things of which we complain.

As for the interim report, I think the Solicitor General attached too much importance to it. I must refer to that interim report and express my surprise that we have not got the full report of the auditor. I must say that after seeing the interim report I for one do not look with any confidence to the full report of the auditor, because this interim report gives me but a very poor idea of the capacity of that gentleman. What is the last clause :

You would have had the completed report by to-morrow if it had not been for the antagonism of the officials here. I include the warden, who will not do anything until he is compelled to. You will, however, have it by Wednesday or Thursday morning at latest.

The warden is Mr. Platt, I believe, an appointee of the Department of Justice. This was written on May 2, and the following Wednesday was the 9th, and the following Thursday the 10th, and I suppose the warden is so recalcitrant that the auditor is unable to get out his report. Let me point out one peculiarity of the Liberal party. When my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) who proposed this motion, and who has multifarious duties to perform as party whip, rose to go out, hon. gentlemen said : Wait and hear the reply. My hon. friend at once sat down and waited to hear the reply. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken, I see, has fled from his seat, and the place that knew him knows him for the time being no more. He boasted of knowing all about binder twine. He told us what the twine cost him, and what a very small profit he was able to make on it. I have no doubt there is not a single thing the hon. gentleman sells of which he would say the same thing, although he and his confreres in the business have become millionaires in a short time. Now, he tells us that binder twine will not keep, that the oil will evaporate, that it is a very delicate kind of goods to handle. But, Sir, anybody who is at all acquainted with farmers knows that the farmer will hold over surplus binder twine until the next season, and find it, instead of being dry and wanting in lubricity, is all that could be desired. So that, in the matter in respect of which that hon. gentleman professed to be able to give us expert knowledge, we find he is utterly untrustworthy. And it was simply the twaddle of a dealer. And in this matter, when trying to throw a cloud over the circumstance that in 1897, in 1898, and in 1899, the conduct of this government has dealt out a great wrong to the farmers of this country, why, Sir, the innocent way in which hon. gentlemen explained how it was that, in a promiscuous way as it were, all this fat patronage, this easy means of making money, should have been afforded the combinesters, the guileless air he assumed was really a triumph of acting on his part. It shows that although he is an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no guile, yet he might even deceive you, Mr. Speaker. Now, Mr. Speaker, here is the evidence on that point. The Solicitor General is examining :

Q. What was sold in August, 1896?—A. It was the output of the factory from the 15th September, 1895, up to about the time the contract was made.

Q. Was it an inferior kind?—A. It was not, it was the ordinary grade of twine.

Q. I understand it was sold at this low price, because it was inferior twine?—A. I do not know that. I do not think that any person could have rightly said it was inferior twine, but I do know that if it had lain on our hands another year, it would be two years old, and then it would be inferior twine.

By Mr. Frost :

Q. Would that have to be gone over and lubricated again?—A. Not necessarily.

I have quoted the documents that I have in my hands just to present a point of view that I do not attach as much importance to as I do to the price the farmer has to pay, because the one thing I care about is the price the farmer has to pay. This government forewent the leverage that would enable them to have guarded the farmers against this combine. We find that in one year the Farmers' Binder Twine Company of Brantford made a profit of 60 per cent, and that in another year they made a profit of 100 per cent. In these years here is the way our government have managed our affairs. In 1897, according to this interim report, there was a loss of $4,221; in 1898, of $4,098, and in 1899, of $8,234. When we look at this government's conduct in this matter, I am sorry to say that the trail of the serpent is over these things, as it is over much else. When I look back on the record of the past four years of crime and folly, it is hard to say which overtops the other, crime or folly, but I must say that whether we place this in the category of folly or crime it is an offence against the interests of the farmers of this country, an offence of such a sort that the farmers will regard it as a high crime and a great misdemeanour in which their interests were forgotten in the interest of men who contributed to party funds, and were active in elections.

Mr. D. D. ROGERS (Frontenac). Mr. Speaker, at this hour of the night I will only say a few words. I have discussed this binder twine question on previous occasions, and I deem it my duty upon this occasion, as I did upon previous occasions, to give a reason for the vote which I propose to give upon the question before the House. I do not intend to go into the details of the question. It is well known that the manufacture of binder twine was commenced at the Kingston penitentiary in 1894. What actuated the government at that time in its determination to enter upon the manufacture of binder twine? They felt, no doubt, that the curse of protection, which was the cause of the Consumers' Cordage Company buying up many of the different factories all through the country, and getting them into their own hands would be so manifest that when they came before the country the farmers would find it out. The farmers did know it through the Patron organizations, and they became so alarmed at the future prospects that they also organized a binder twine company. The Farmers' Binder Twine Company started up in 1893 or 1894, because they realized the results that would follow from the fact of the Consumers' Cordage Company buying up so many factories all through the country. The fact that these factories were bought up has been stated so often in this House that I was surprised that no hon. gentleman opposite mentioned it to-day. None of them even made a reference to it. I think that this was a very alarming state of things. I have mentioned the fact before, and shall not go into details now. These factories were bought up by the Consumers' Cordage Company, and it cost them $35,000 a year to keep them closed. They commenced to buy them up, I think, in 1889, and within a year or two they had all these factories under their control. One factory alone cost them $140,000, nearly double what its actual value would be. I do not think it is necessary to mention all the others.

An hon. MEMBER. No, no, of course not.

Mr. ROGERS. If hon. gentlemen want them, I will give them. It is surprising that hon. gentlemen opposite made no reference to this alarming state of affairs when they were speaking to-day. Of course, the Consumers' Cordage Company could not have organized this combine if it had not been for the protection of 25 per cent.

Mr. TAYLOR. Twelve and a half per cent.

Mr. ROGERS. It was cut down from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent. The government realizing the curse of protection, were obliged to reduce the duty.

Mr. CLANCY. That was less than three-quarters of a cent a pound.

Mr. ROGERS. It was enough to enable them to pay $35,000 a year to keep these factories closed up. The Farmers' Binder Twine Company was organized to manufacture binder twine and to break the combine.

Mr. TAYLOR. They made 100 per cent profit.

Mr. ROGERS. The government of that time naturally felt that it would be a very serious thing for themselves, they concluded that they had to do something, and they started to manufacture binder twine at Kingston. Of course, I do not suppose they would like to make it known that there was an intention on their part of counteracting the evil influences of their own legislation, and they made it appear that the new industry was inaugurated for the purpose of employing prison labour. We commended the idea and were very pleased to see it. It is said that the Farmer's Binder Twine Company made from 60 per cent to 100 per cent. It is evident that they did make that, but for all that we know they succeeded in keeping down the price. I do not know where it would have gone if it had not been for them. They manufactured about 1,000 tons, while Kingston manufactured only 500 tons.

Mr. DAVIN. Eight hundred tons.

Mr. TAYLOR. They made $65,000.

Mr. ROGERS. The Farmers' Binder Twine Company bought quantities of raw material at about 3½ cents a pound, and sold their output at 7 cents and 7¼ cents a pound for the best brands to the Consumers' Cordage Company, and to any one that wanted to buy it. They bought such a large quantity of raw material in 1898 that they had enough over to manufacture 800 tons in 1899.

Mr. CLANCY. How does the hon. gentleman know that?

Mr. ROGERS. I have it from one of the directors. They had business ability enough to buy their raw material at a cheap rate, and that is the reason why they paid such a dividend. I may say that had I been one of the directors I would have sold the twine a little cheaper. But, that is the reason why they made 100 per cent. Where would the farmers have been if it had not been for the competition of the Farmers' Binder Twine Company? I feel also that the government did not do exactly as I would have liked them to have done. But, it is evident, as has been pretty plainly shown to-night, that the late government did make quite a mess of it. I do not think they did it intentionally, but they got it into a pretty bad mess, and they left it in that condition. When I first came to the House I asked a question about the amount of binder twine left at the Kingston penitentiary. There was two years' production, and that left about 1,000 tons to be disposed of. I always urged that this twine should be kept out of the hands of this cursed combine which existed at that time. I did think it would have been in the best interest of the country if they had left the purchase of binder twine open to public tender. It has never been shown in this House that any man who got the tender made a large lot of money out of it. They sold it at a reasonable profit. We all know that when these six or seven factories were closed up it was easy for the combine to handle the two or three factories left in existence. It was the policy of the operating factories to pay many thousand dollars a year in order to close up the others, and they were enabled to do that because of the high protection. In the year 1897, there was a good harvest and they used up every bit of twine, none being left over, and so when the government put the twine on the free list they said: We will teach those fellows a lesson, we will buy up all the twine we can, and we will force the price up. I stated to the House last year, and it is a fact, that a friend of mine was offered in the spring, tons of twine at 6½ cents, but when it got into the hands of the dealers the price was put up. How can the government be blamed for that? I do not see how. The only thing I do blame the government for is that they did not do in 1898 and 1899 what they are doing this year. Last year hon. gentlemen pointed out that there was something radically wrong but no one suggested a remedy for it. I considered the matter seriously, but I could not understand how the small quantity of 500 tons turned out in Kingston could control the price, when there are nearly 10,000 tons sold in Canada. If the government got a man to handle the twine, in justice to the country he should go to every part of the Dominion, because it would not be fair to sell it around Kingston and leave Manitoba and the lower provinces without the benefit. Of course the government could not be wise beforehand, but as they have learned a lesson, they will not commit the mistake any more that they did in 1898-9. If the government manufactured 5,000 tons of twine, instead of 500 tons they could control the market and it would be the best stroke of business they ever did. It has been said that protection encourages manufacture and that competition will level the price, but we see in this and in every line of business in Canada that the effect of protection has been to encourage these combines. People say there is no combine, but there is. I have proved to the House before, and I can prove it again, that the combine would not exist in Canada except for the curse of protection.

Mr DAVIN. There is no protection on binder twine and you say there is a combine in it.

Mr. ROGERS.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, but the manufacturers of twine got into the hands of a combine before and they shut up all the other factories.

Mr. DAVIN. The combine is more perfect now than it ever was before.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, but as twine is on the free list, that cannot last very long. We know that the high price of raw material is the chief cause of the present high price of twine this year. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) said, that the government charged 14 cents, when it only cost 6 cents to manufacture, but it is clear that he and his colleague from Halton (Mr. Henderson) do not agree because that hon. gentleman in his speech said:

I find that on the 1st of March, 1899, manila in New York cost 7½ cents, and sisal, according to an excellent authority, cost 6¾ cents.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) is out of order in quoting from a past debate.

Mr. HENDERSON. Although he is quite out of order, it is a good speech, and I have no objection to him quoting it all.

Mr. ROGERS. The member for Halton said the raw material cost 6¾ cents—

Mr. TAYLOR. He did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. ROGERS. He is quoting from the Cordage Journal of New York, which he says is an excellent authority. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) said that in 1900 it cost 14½ cents for manila and 9½ cents for sisal.

Mr. DAVIN. When did he say that?

Mr. ROGERS. In his budget speech.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman is out of order in referring to a past debate.

Mr. ROGERS. You quoted yourself a dozen times and I have a right to do it and I shall do it. I have positive proof that sisal cost 8¼ to 8½ cents, and manila 13½ cents for the raw material, and how could the government charge 6 cents for the finished article from that raw product? Either the statement of the member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) or the statement of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) is incorrect.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was correct.

Mr. ROGERS. Then the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) was not correct. If the government had laid in a large stock of raw material before the price was increased as the Farmer's Binder Twine Company did, they could have sold their twine cheaper, but I doubt very much whether the government under the circumstances would have been justified in doing that. Hon. gentlemen opposite are never done talking about combines increasing the cost of articles, and they never seem to remember that protection, of which they are the authors, is the father of all these combines. How the hon. member for West Assinibola (Mr. Davin), who claims to have the interests of the farmers at heart, can consistently advocate and support a policy of protection, I cannot see. I often wonder when I hear him speak on these matters.

Mr. DAVIN. If you will come to my room, I will make it all plain to you.

Mr. ROGERS. I hear the hon. gentleman so often in this House that I do not want to hear him any more. On this question I do not intend to dwell at any length. A wrong method has been pursued in handling the prison-manufactured binder twine until this year, when it has been handled in the interest of the farmers. As I said before, the farmers of this country have more respect for our public men than to believe that the government, whether Conservative or Reform, would enter into any combine to fleece the farmers. They might have done it through mismanagement or inadvertently, but they would not do it intentionally, and I do not believe any political capital can be made against the government on that score. It is very difficult for any government or corporation to prevent outsiders, who may buy the stock, from manipulating it for their own advantage. A great wrong existed in the past, and the government found that out, and did the next best thing, namely, to advertise the binder twine in the press, and let the farmers buy it direct from the government. In putting binder twine on the free list they have also made a move in the right direction. I can see no grounds for censuring the government for what they have done, and therefore I do not intend to vote for this amendment; only I say that they should have done last year what they have done this year, that is, advertise the binder twine for sale to the farmers direct.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). Mr. Speaker, the House has, I am sure, listened with pleasure to the few interesting remarks that fell from the lips of the new-found convert who has just taken his seat (Mr. Rogers). He has considered it necessary to curse that system of protection of which he was the upholder for a great many years. For reasons best known to himself, he has seen fit to change his convictions, and he is now an ardent supporter of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. We on this side of the House must thank the hon. gentleman for one expression he has made use of to-night, at any rate. He is the first hon. gentleman on that side who has admitted that there was a combine in connection with binder twine; but I do not suppose the hon. Solicitor General will be equally grateful. As that fact, however, has been brought to his attention by an

hon. gentleman on his own side of the House, I hope that he will now see that the anti-combine clause in the tariff is brought into effect.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the hon. gentleman not know that binder twine is on the free list now?

Mr. ROCHE. The combine exists all the same. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend engaging the attention of the House for any length of time; but as this is a question affecting the farmers of the country, and especially the farmers of the west, and representing as I do an agricultural constituency, I desire to protest against the manner in which the government has dealt with this binder twine question. When the government are challenged to point to a single promise they have fulfilled since coming to power, they point to the fact that they have put barbed wire and binder twine on the free list. They have run the whole gauntlet when they have enumerated these two articles. As the city of Sodom was to be saved if one righteous man was found in it, so the government think they can be saved from the wrath of the electorate by pointing to the fulfilment of one single promise. But if by taking off the duty on binder twine the farmer would have been benefited, the subsequent actions of the government in manipulating that industry in the interests of political favourites and party contractors, have prevented the farmer from deriving the slightest benefit, but on the contrary have resulted in increasing the price several cents more per pound than he would otherwise have had to pay did the old system remain in vogue. Now, what is the history of this binder twine question. As you are aware, it was under the regime of Sir John Thompson, and when he was Minister of Justice that he decided to install a plant for the manufacture of twine in the Kingston penitentiary—not as the present Minister of Justice says, solely to give employment to the convicts and to keep them from idleness. That to be sure was one object, but not the principal one. It was only incidental to the main object, which was to hold a lever over those who engaged in the manufacture of twine to prevent any combination that would result in running up the price to the farmers. For that purpose a plant was purchased and established in the penitentiary, the manufacture was proceeded with, and any person could purchase twine in car-load lots who desired to and who had the cash to pay for it. In those days farmers could purchase their twine very cheaply, and they had no grievance against the government for the manner in which they disposed of it. But no sooner were the Liberals in power than they changed that policy, and disposed of the twine in such a manner that their political friends, the contractors, have reaped the benefit. Those contractors have been protected by the government to the extent even of keeping secret the price at which they sold the year's output until the contractors would have time to dispose of it to the farmers at large profits to themselves. The result is that the farmers have to pay more for their twine than they would have had to pay if this industry had been conducted by the government in a businesslike manner. When we ask why the farmers have to pay more for their twine, hon. gentlemen opposite answer that it is by reason of increased cost of the raw material; but I think it has been shown to-night that that is not the reason at all. In the year 1896, as has been shown by the invoices which appear in the Public Accounts, the cost of the raw material was \$3.66 per cwt.; add the cost of manufacture, which, according to the Minister of Justice, is $\frac{1}{4}$ cent a pound, making the total cost of the twine \$4.41. The price at which the government sold that twine to Coll Bros. was \$4.25 per cwt., actually less than cost; and Coll Bros. transferred it to Hobbs & Co. In 1897 the cost of the raw material was \$3.43 per cwt.; add the cost of manufacture, which would bring it to \$4.18, and the government sold it for \$4.64 to Hobbs & Co., while the farmers paid that year from 10 cents to 13 cents a pound for it, so that the cost of the raw material did not cut much of a figure. In 1898 the cost of the raw material was \$3.72; add the cost of manufacture, which would bring the cost of the twine up to \$4.47, the price at which it was sold to the contractors, Bate & Son, was \$4.60, but the price the farmers had to pay was from 11 cents to 14 cents a pound. In 1899 the cost of the raw material was \$5.25; add the cost of manufacture, which would bring the cost of the twine up to \$6, the price at which it was sold to the contractors Hobbs & Co. was \$6.51, and the price the farmers had to pay in that year was from 13 cents to 15 cents a pound. So that you see the reason given by the government and their supporters that it is entirely owing to the increased price of raw material owing to the war is purely a myth.

In our western country, as it is being settled more and more each year, an increasingly larger area of land is being brought under cultivation, and therefore, there will be an increased demand for binder twine, and it is most desirable that our farmers should be enabled to purchase it at lowest possible price, consistent with a legitimate business profit. Over 2,500,000 acres of land are under cultivation in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. On an average it takes three pounds of twine to the acre. If the crop is heavy it takes more, but three pounds is about the average. That makes 7,500,000 pounds of twine. Every cent of an increase in the price of twine means $75,000 increased cost to the farmers of the west. That is to them a very important consideration, and when they are forced to pay several cents a pound more than they should, as they have been doing, you will readily see how necessary it is that the government should dispose of this twine in such a manner as to prevent its falling into the hands of the combine who hold up the farmers for thousands of dollars over and above what they should legitimately pay.

The government are not in the twine business to make money out of it, nor to assist other manufacturers to declare 100 per cent dividends, as the Brantford factory did last year, but by disposing of it in car-load lots for cash, direct to the farmers or retailers, the profit of those contractors would be saved, the country would not be a loser, and the farmers would obtain their supply at the lowest possible price.

Now, the government tried to create the impression that by allowing the opportunity to the farmers to purchase their twine direct from the penitentiary for two or three months this spring, they were conferring on them a great boon, when, as a matter of fact, for the great bulk of the farmers, it was practically useless; and as a proof of this assertion, I have only to turn to this blue-book gotten out by the Minister of Justice, page 7, where he states:

There are several thousands of persons engaged in the retail trade, which is an accommodation to the farmer, who seldom purchases the twine until he actually needs it.

So you see, here is an admission that our farmers do not purchase their twine until they need it. They cannot afford to pay out their money months in advance of the time they require the twine; they do not know what quantity they will require, how their crops are going to turn out; and so I say it is a practically valueless concession.

Those contractors have been playing into each other's hand every year. Hobbs & Co. would obtain the supply one year direct, the next year a secret agreement would be entered into with other contractors, by which, when the contract was obtained, it would be transferred to Hobbs & Co., and being a member of the American combine, they commanded what prices they liked, and the farmers had to pay the piper. I charge the government with being parties to this combine either wittingly or unwittingly, by which the Hobbs Hardware Company were the favourites, and the fact that Mr. Hobbs was the Liberal member for the city of London, in the local House, did not militate against his firm. At any rate, he has had the big end of the stick in the deal all the way through, and his firm has been put in the position of being enabled to extract hundreds of thousands of dollars over what they should have made, if the twine had been handled by the government in a businesslike manner.

The Minister of Justice states as a result of the late government's attempt to dispose of the twine in car-load lots by means of an agent, in 1896, the whole season's output was left on hand. On page 6 of his pamphlet, the Minister of Justice says :

What, then, was the result of this effort to create a little political capital by the appointment of an agent, which ultimately failed. Simply this: that on August 6, 1866, the penitentiary warden represented that they had on hand 1,001,550 pounds of twine, after the harvest season was over, and when no sales could be made except for consumption in the following year, when, by the deterioration in quality, a loss would be sustained.

But, why was it left on hand? Simply because this present government cancelled the arrangements entered into between the government and the agent, Mr. Kelly, in August, 1896, because he would not be personally responsible for every dollar's worth of twine he sold. But, was the harvest over by August 6? That may have been so in Ontario, but the Minister of Justice admits on the last page of his book that the season when the North-west harvest begins, is only on August 15, and it is in that country the great bulk of the twine is required. So that they allowed all that time to go by, from their accession to office in the middle of July, 1896, without having taken any steps to dispose of that year's output. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, this book is a tissue of contradictions and misrepresentations from beginning to end, and I am surprised that a minister of the Crown should father such a production, and send it broadcast throughout the country in blue-book form, and that at the expense of the country, to mislead the public in his lame attempt to apologize for the government's actions in their unbusinesslike method of dealing with this question. As has already been said it is a purely campaign document, a tirade against three hon. gentlemen in this House, and I venture to say that no precedent can be found where a member of a government has ever published a political speech in blue-book form, and called upon his opponents to assist in defraying the expense and circulating them by the thousands throughout the country, in the history of Canada. And then, to add insult to injury, he states on the frontispiece that this pamphlet is for the information of members of parliament. He must have poor respect for the intelligence of the members of this House when he thinks that we cannot discriminate between facts and fiction. In this book he contradicts himself dozens of times. I have pointed out several contradictions, and my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor), and my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), have done their duty in pointing out others. I must say that this book does no credit to the hon. the Minister of Justice. It is nothing but a tirade against two or three hon. gentlemen, to whose charges it purports to be a reply, and it is a disgrace that any member of the Crown should send such a production, one-half of which is pure fiction, broadcast throughout the country by the hundreds of thousands at the expense of the people.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not rise to take part in the general debate, but to call the attention of the House before it adjourns to a statement which the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) made this afternoon in the opening sentence of his address. Speaking of myself, he said that I had sold out the coal oil industry of this country to the Standard Oil Company for a subscription given by them previous to 1896. I do not know what the hon. gentleman exactly meant by this statement. But I have to give it the most unqualified denial. If the hon. gentleman meant by so stating, that at any time I received any subscription, directly or indirectly, from the coal oil interest, I give that statement the most unqualified denial. I did not receive anything from the Standard Oil Company directly or indirectly; I never had any transactions with them directly or indirectly; and if the hon. gentleman has any authority for the statement he made, I call upon him to give it to the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. I made the statement in the presence of the Prime Minister on two different occasions, that I was credibly informed—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER. Give your authority.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will give my authority before I get through. I made the statement and can turn it up in Hansard—and will do so to-morrow before the Orders of the Day are called—that the Standard Oil Company had made a contribution of $200,000 to the Liberal campaign fund, provided they got the legislation they asked for in allowing tank vessels; and I quoted the former hon. member for West Lambton, the present Judge Lister, as stating that if this was done it meant that the Canadian oil industry would be ruined. The government came down after the elections and carried out what I predicted they would, and made this concession of tank vessels. The report was current that the Standard Oil Company had given a subscription of $200,000 to the campaign fund of the Liberal party; and I have made that statement twice in the presence of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and never heard it contradicted before.

The PRIME MINISTER. Mr. Speaker, I heard the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) make the statement to which he refers on one or two occasions, but paid no attention to it, because I took it to be a sort of general statement without any meaning, a simple inference without anything substantial behind it. But, if the hon. gentleman means to say that when he spoke of me, I had received a subscription from the Standard Oil Company, either directly or indirectly, of $200,000, or even of $1, I give the statement the most unqualified denial.

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not intend, and I do not think that Hansard will show that I did, refer to the Prime Minister personally. I made the statement that the Prime Minister promised to take the duty off coal oil, and when he came into power, instead of removing the duty he continued it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) has associated my name with that of the Prime Minister in this matter. Whatever quibble there may be about words, there is no doubt as to the purpose of the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Taylor's) charge, which was, in effect, that there was a corrupt bargain between the right hon. Prime Minister—whether he referred to him individually or in his capacity as Prime Minister, or as leader of the Liberal party, is of no consequence—and the Standard Oil Company, whereby certain legislation was to be had, and in consideration of that the Standard Oil Company was to give a contribution of $200,000. I say that that is an infamous slander. The hon. member (Mr. Taylor), if he expects to have any character or reputation in this country, should prove his statement or have the manliness to withdraw it. I had something to do with that legislation with respect to tank steamers. I introduced it. I had, perhaps, more to do with it than any other member of this administration. It was the result of an agitation, chiefly in the lower provinces, where our people thought that we had a right to the cheapest possible means of transportation, and as water transportation is the cheapest, we know of no reason why we should not be as free to have our oil brought in a tank steamer, as the hon. member (Mr. Taylor) and others in Ontario are to have it brought in a tank car. I state that no member of the Standard Oil Company, and nobody else in the oil interest, promoted that legislation. It was promoted simply by representatives of the people of this Dominion who are interested in cheap oil. So far as the hon. member has associated the government with this alleged transaction, I repeat in the strongest terms that the rules of parliament will permit, that his statement is wholly unfounded and that it is an infamous slander. The hon. gentleman should prove it or take it back.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). I do not intend to take part in the discussion of the binder twine question. I merely wish to tell the Premier that I remember very well on one occasion he was called to task by Senator Drummond for certain statements he made as to contributions being made by sugar-refining interests to the Conservative party fund. On that occasion, I recollect—I have not the quotation at hand, but I feel that confident that my recollection is correct—the right hon. gentleman, in reply to Senator Drummond, simply said that the statement had been frequently made and he was only repeating a statement that was current throughout the country. There was then on the part of the Premier no attempt to back up the truthfulness of his statement, and he had to back it up only what my hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) had, current rumour. And, as to the way in which the Standard Oil Company's influence is shown, let me remind the Premier that when the present Judge Lister, who, I venture to say, stood as high in the opinion of the people of West Lambton and the town of Sarnia, where he lived, as any other man, received a majority of eighty in that town. But when the gigantic interest of the Standard Oil Company were behind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Johnston) who now represents the constituency, in the by-election that was held, his majority there, instead of being eighty, was about four hundred. It ill-becomes hon. gentlemen on that side to say that when hon. members on this side make a statement they should bring proof before the House and the country, considering the statement that was made respecting the sugar-refining interests by the present Premier, at that time in opposition. I think he will agree with my recollection that he wrote a letter to Senator Drummond, and that no proof was forthcoming, but simply the statement that the rumour was going the rounds and he had the right to use it.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have only to say that when Senator Drummond called attention to the statement and denied it, I accepted his statement without qualification.

Mr. BENNETT. I cannot speak for the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), but I presume that after the statement made by the Premier and the Finance Minister, he will probably do as the Prime Minister did.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor), moved his motion, and in his opening remarks complained of the method that had been adopted to meet his former criticisms in this House, I felt very much in sympathy with him. I do not think it is right or proper that such statements as are contained in this pamphlet 'The action of the government in respect to the manufacture and sale of binder twine produced by convict labour,' should be published under the covers of a blue-book. We should preserve the sanctity of our blue-books, preserve their character. Let us keep them as free from party influence as possible. To that extent, I felt heartily in sympathy with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor), when he addressed the House. As regards the amendment he has submitted, I feel that he has failed to justify it either by his comparisons, by his facts, or by his inferences. Hon. members in this House often make very wild statements, and I think that the hon. member for Leeds would not resent that impeachment if made against himself. But I feel very strongly that right here on the floor is the place to contradict and controvert those statements, and not in the blue-books.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Taylor).

Amendment (Mr. Taylor) negatived.

Motion (Mr. Fielding) agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Department of Customs—Additional amount required to provide for statistical returns of imports and exports, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act $2,000

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). This item of $2,000 will be followed by another item for next year, of perhaps $20,000. It is proposed to effect a change in the Department of Customs.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We will let it pass without prejudice to the $20,000 item.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Of course if the committee does not want to hear the explanation, we can defer it. As I said, the object is to change the system that has hitherto prevailed with reference to the statistics that are compiled by a department of the government; and whatever hon. gentlemen opposite may think with reference to this matter, I can assure them that it is a subject that the commercial interests of this country take a deep interest in. The committee is manifesting a disposition, and a willingness to carry this $2,000. Hon. gentlemen have given their consent thereby to the proposed change.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. And in that case I will defer the explanation to another time. Hon. gentlemen will not expect to give a vote of $2,000 to commence a work which cannot be completed without a supplementary vote of $20,000.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How much of the $2,000 is already spent?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. None is already spent. Some of it will need to be expended during the present year.

Committee rose and reported progress.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I would ask the hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) what he intends to take up to-morrow?

The PRIME MINISTER. We will take up Bills and then supply.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). I would like to say that when we reach supply I intend to move a motion censuring the government in connection with the Walsh-Carbonneau agreement which is referred to in the evidence taken before Mr. Ogilvie. I may state to the right hon. Prime Minister that the motion I propose to move will refer to the evidence of Louis Carbonneau rather extensively, and the censure of the government that I will ask the House to pass is for not having further dealt with the facts that were brought out in that inquiry, and as shown by the documents before the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am very glad that the hon. gentleman has given me notice of his intention, and I will fix a day when we shall take the question up. It is better that we should take up immediately some other business. To-morrow, we want to dispose of some of the Bills for the Senate when they resume.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What Bills?

The PRIME MINISTER. Most of the Bills on the Order paper, the Elevator Bill, the Criminal Code and the Election Bill.

Mr. BERGERON. The Election Bill will take a long time.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Oh no.

Mr. PATERSON.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I make the statement so that the hon. gentleman will know what I propose to do when we reach that stage.

The PRIME MINISTER. I will give a day to my hon. friend.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the Election Bill is to be taken up there is a point I would like to call to the attention of the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Of course, the hon. gentleman knows that under the present Act Indians are disfranchised. I do not know as regards other reserves, but on the Six Nation reserve, and I am sure the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) can bear out the statement, there is a large number of intelligent white men who are tenants and who have a perfect right to express their opinions at the polls. If some special amendment is not made to the Act these gentlemen may not be on the lists. They are not in any ward because they are on the Indian reserve, and they cannot possibly get on the list.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Are they qualified to be on the local list?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No.

Mr. R. R. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that lumbermen, students, and others who are away from home are allowed their votes. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who has charge of this Bill if he proposes to give the franchise to those Canadians who are away in South Africa if they return previous to the election.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is provided for in the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1 a.m. (Wednesday.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, May 30, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

GRAND TRUNK AND CENTRAL VERMONT RAILWAY BILL.

Mr. LEIGHTON McCARTHY (North Simcoe) moved:

That that portion of the 49th rule which limits the time for receiving petitions for private Bills be suspended in reference to the petition of the Central Vermont Railway Company, presented this day, authorizing them to acquire and operate the Montreal and Province Line Railway, the Stanstead, Shefford and Chambly Railway and the Montreal and Vermont Junction Railway, in accordance with the representation contained in the seventeenth report of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders; and that the said petition be read and received forthwith.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). At this stage of the session, the House should not pass a motion of that kind without some sufficient reason being given to the House for departing from the rule.

Mr. GEO. LANDERKIN (South Grey). I understand that under the rules I am prohibited from mentioning what happens in a committee of the House. I may say, however, that this is a Bill which deals with matters of a domestic character to the Grand Trunk Railway. As was stated by Mr. Wainwright to-day, it was impossible for them to bring in the Bill at an earlier period of the session, and it is of considerable importance to the interests of the people in several counties of Quebec, that this Bill should pass, and that the Grand Trunk Railway should have legislative control of these branch lines, which are really under their control at the present time. The committee felt justified, under the circumstances, in recommending, after they had listened to Mr. Wainwright, that the rule be suspended. They felt that the interests of the country and the interests of the road itself would be best conserved by making that recommendation.

Mr. T. C. CASGRAIN (Montmorency). It appears to me that no sufficient reason has been given to satisfy the House that the rule should be suspended. Why was not the Bill brought in before, and why was not the petition presented before now to the House? This a most important measure. Here we are, I hope, getting near the end of the session, and we have a great many more important Bills which will come before us in the Railway Committee. I feel that we cannot give this Bill sufficient thought and study to make it satisfactory to the interests of the different parties concerned, and I, for one, cannot agree to anything of the kind.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The reasons that were given satisfied the committee, and the committee was well represented. This committee, I believe, are as anxious to observe the rules as any committee in the House, and I think that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) would not have made the statement he did if he had heard what the committee heard, and which it is impossible for me to communicate to the House.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Not at all.

Mr. LANDERKIN. A letter from the solicitor was read, and he gave reasons which were good and sufficient, and which the committee accepted as being sufficient.

Mr. CASGRAIN. What were the reasons?

Mr. LANDERKIN. The reasons were, that they had not the arrangements completed until a late date. The letter was read by Mr. Wainwright, and it satisfied the committee, and as I have said, this committee is as anxious as any one can be to observe the rules, and to act in the best interests of the country. I do not want to hear anything said against the committee. I am only the presiding officer, and I am not responsible for what the committee does, but I am here to justify what it did in this case, as well as in every other case since I have presided over it. Since these rules were made the conditions of the country have changed. At that time news was only communicated to the community by canals, but now we have telephones and telegraphs and newspapers everywhere, and when under the constitution the House has power to suspend the rule, I do not see why they should not do so when a great interest is concerned.

Mr. J. HAGGART (South Lanark). On the face of it this appears to be something very objectionable. It is legislation which is new to this House. It is giving to the Central Vermont, an American company, the right to acquire two railways in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No. It is the Grand Trunk Railway, not the Central Vermont.

Mr. HAGGART. That is the purport of the Bill, and it is a most extraordinary one. There is no precedent for giving an American railway company the right to acquire railways in Canada.

Mr. W. GIBSON (Lincoln and Niagara). As I was the member who presented the petition a week ago, I should, perhaps, say something in regard to this matter. There was no opposition to this Bill before the Standing Orders Committee this morning. It is purely a domestic Bill, and not at all in the direction referred to by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart). It is well known to every hon. gentleman in this House that the Montreal and Province Line Railway, the Stanstead, Shefford and Chambly Railway, the Montreal and Vermont Junction Railway, have been under the control of the Central Vermont Railway for some time. Now, the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada have assumed control of the Central Vermont Railway, and for that reason, as stated by the chairman of the committee (Mr. Landerkin), all the negotiations leading up to the consummation of the control of the Central Vermont Railway Company passing into the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, were only executed the other day; so that, if this legislation is stopped it will practically prevent the Grand Trunk Railway Company from exercising that efficient control, which this House alone can give, over the Central Vermont Railway, which is now running into Montreal over the tracks of the Grand Trunk Railway, and which is part and parcel of the Grand Trunk Railway system.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may, perhaps, be permitted to say, as I took exception to this without any explanation, that I suppose the intention is that this Bill shall go in due course to the Railway Committee.

Mr. GIBSON. Certainly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The facts will all be gone over there, and we shall there be in a position to judge of the question on its merits.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL BANK OF CANADA.

Mr. B. RUSSELL (Halifax). Mr. Speaker. At an early period of this session a private Bill was passed to change the name of the Merchants' Bank of Halifax to the Royal Bank of Canada. Through some misunderstanding between the solicitor of the bank and the manager, the Bill was not passed in a form acceptable to the bank or in which the bank understood it would be passed. I want to ask the House, therefore, to suspend the rules so as to enable me to introduce a Bill to correct what I regard as a clerical error in that Bill. Of course, I would prefer that the Bill should go before the Committee on Banking and Commerce, so that the House will be assured that it is only a clerical error which I wish to have corrected; and I would ask the House to agree to a resolution suspending the orders and rules of the House, so that it will not be necessary to advertise this Bill or pay any fees upon it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understand that the hon. gentleman will propose that this Bill should go to the Banking and Commerce Committee in order to see that it carries out his purpose?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes. I move:

That all the rules and orders of this House be suspended as regards a Bill to amend the Act respecting the Merchants' Bank of Halifax, and to change its name to the Royal Bank of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 170) respecting the Merchants' Bank of Halifax, and to change its name to the Royal Bank of Canada.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the first and the second time, and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. GIBSON.

THE NORTH AMERICAN TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

Mr. TAYLOR asked:

Who are the persons who compose the firm of the North American Transportation Company? Have they been paid for the steamer 'Eureka'? If so, out of what vote was the money taken?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Mr. N. K. Connolly is president and M. P. Connolly secretary-treasurer. 2. Yes, paid out of appropriation 'Ship channel, River St. Lawrence.'

YUKON—CLEARANCE OF SS. YUKONER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked:

1. Did the firm of F. C. Wade (Messrs. Wade & Aikman), on July 10, 1899, request D. W. Davis, collector of customs at Dawson, to refuse clearance of the ss. 'Yukoner' until the wages of the crew were paid?

2. Did the collector of customs clear the ss. 'Yukoner' and afterwards, at the request of Mr. F. C. Wade, detain the said vessel? If yes, what are the respective dates of clearance and detention?

3. If yes, in what capacity did Mr. Davis act in clearing the said vessel, and in what capacity did he act in detaining her after clearance?

4. If Mr. Davis detained the said vessel after clearance granted, under what statute and section thereof or under what authority did he act?

5. Did Mr. Davis, in connection with the claim against said vessel, allow the firm of F. C. Wade (Messrs. Wade & Aikman) the sum of $750 for legal services rendered to the master in the prosecution of the crew of the 'Yukoner,' notwithstanding the solicitors or the owners of the vessel had declined to prosecute under the facts alleged?

6. Did the collector of customs at Dawson receive, in his official capacity, a cheque for $5,099.45 from the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner' after tying up the ship subsequent to her first clearance?

7. Did the owners of the 'Yukoner' request an accounting and return of the said sum, or at all events that it be paid into the court of the district pending the determination by the proper court of the question in dispute between the vessel-owners and the master and mate of the said vessel?

8. Did the Department of Customs obtain any opinion or advice on the subject from the Department of Justice?

9. Did the Department of Customs, on December 16, 1899, request Mr. Davis, 'in view of the opinion from the Department of Justice,' to arrange a settlement with the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner'?

10. Did the opinion from the Department of Justice, if any, refer to Mr. Davis's conduct as 'high-handed and improper'?

11. In reporting to the Department of Customs, did Mr. Davis say he was 'submitting to all these details without prejudice,' and did he comply with the advice of the Department of Justice as above in question 9?

12. After communicating the report of this public officer to the solicitors of the ss. 'Yukoner,' did the Customs Department of Canada write to the solicitors on April 21, 1900, and say: 'This information as received from Mr. Davis, together with a copy of further statements submitted by him in relation to this matter, has been furnished to you (without prejudice)?'

13. Does the Department of Customs, or the Crown, represented by the Canadian government, admit that it is accountable to the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner' for disposal of the proceeds of a cheque made payable to the collector of customs at Dawson for the sum of $5,099.45 in connection with the ss. 'Yukoner'?

14. Has the Department of Customs declined to account for the money in question?

15. Has the Department of Customs left the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner' to its remedy against the collector of customs personally in connection with the receipt of the said $5,099.45, and repudiated all responsibility for his conduct in regard thereto?

16. Has the hon. the Minister of Customs declined to produce for the information of parliament the opinion of the Department of Justice referred to in question 9?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. The correspondence laid on the Table of the House shows that the firm of Wade & Aikman on the 10th July, 1899, informed Mr. Davis, collector of customs at Dawson, that the wages of the captain and mate of the vessel Yukoner had not been paid, and requested that the vessel be not granted a clearance until the owners settled with these officers. 2. The correspondence laid on the Table of the House shows that the collector of customs did clear the Yukoner, and afterwards detained it. A protest was made by Wade & Aikman to the collector against granting a clearance to the vessel. The collector claims that the clearance was obtained by misrepresentation, which, he says, was his reason for cancelling it. The department has no information from the collector as to the precise dates of clearance and detention. 3. Mr. Davis appears to have cleared the vessel as a customs officer. Further information would seem to be necessary before giving a positive answer to the second branch of this question. 4. Mr. Davis has not informed the department under what statute or section thereof, or under what authority he acted. 5. As appears by the correspondence laid on the Table of the House, Mr. Davis states that in his private capacity as arbitrator he awarded to the master the sum of $750, being the amount of the account of his solicitors, Wade & Aikman, for legal services rendered in prosecuting the crew and attempting to regain possession of his ship. 6. A deposit of $5,099.45 appears to have been made with Mr. Davis, but he does not report whether the deposit was made by cheque or otherwise. Mr. Davis claims that the deposit was made with him in his private capacity as arbitrator. 7. As appears by the correspondence laid on the Table of the House, Messrs. Lewis & Smellie, solicitors for the owners of the Yukoner in a letter to the commissioner of customs, under date 4th November, 1899, made the following requests :

The money of the Trading and Exploring Company (Limited) having been received by the collector of customs at Dawson, in his official capacity, to the amount of $5,099.45, the company asks the Crown to account for the same, and renews its request of August 19 last for a refund of the amount; or, at all events, that the $5,099.45 be paid into court of the Territories pending the determination by the proper court of the questions in dispute between the vessel-owners and the master and mate of the 'Yukoner.'

8. The Customs Department has been and is in consultation with the Justice Department in this matter. 9. As appears by the correspondence laid on the Table of the House, the Department of Customs requested Mr. Davis to furnish detailed information as to his action in disposing of the moneys deposited with him, and to arrange for a settlement of the matters between himself and the owners of the Yukoner or their representative. 10. As this case is not yet closed, and may be the subject of litigation or of an investigation, the department thinks the hon. gentleman should not press for a disclosure of any opinion received from the Department of Justice in connection with the matter, at least at present. 11. As appears by the correspondence laid on the Table of the House the solicitors for the owners of the Yukoner asked for details without prejudice to the rights of the owners of the vessel, and Mr. Davis submitted such details without prejudice, as he claims he acted in his private capacity as arbitrator. In reply to the advice of the department that he arrange for a settlement of the matter with the owners of the Yukoner, Mr. Davis states that he acted throughout the matter with nothing but the strictest regard to the performance of his duties as an official, and the proper and honourable performance of his duties as an arbitrator, and submits that, under the circumstances he is entitled to the fullest protection possible. He also respectfully submits that if the owners of the Yukoner think he has acted outside of his jurisdiction, that the courts of the country are open to them, and they should be left to the courts for the proper relief, which they will no doubt get if they are entitled to it.

Collector Davis also reports as follows :

As the majority of vessels navigating on the Yukon River visit but once a year and then run to foreign ports, unless clearance is withheld when wages are due, the officers and crew are rendered quite helpless. They are left here destitute, a new crew is taken on, and the vessel leaves port. Outside of the regular transportation companies, a great many speculative concerns are operating on this river, often without capital or at a loss, and every measure possible has to be taken to protect the officers and crew. In this connection, the steamer 'Yukoner' has had anything but an enviable record. Apart from the fact of the mutiny and the scandal of the owners of the steamer seeking to protect the mutineers against British law, every effort is made by the owners of this steamer, whether ill-advised or not I cannot say, to resist the payment of wages and claims of every kind. To show you the methods adopted, I would not say by the owners, but on behalf of the owners of this steamer, I may say that after clearing here on the occasion referred to for a United States port, she crossed the boundary and proceeded down the river past Circle City without stopping there to have her clearance papers endorsed, nor did she report at Circle City on her return to Dawson, the object being to defeat legal claims against the vessel at that port. Since that time her course has been up the river from here to White Horse instead of down. She cannot now proceed to American waters without being subject to fine or forfeiture.

12. Yes. 13 and 14. Mr. Davis does not report the receipt of a cheque. He states that the amount of $5,099.45 was deposited with him in his private capacity as arbitrator. The department has not admitted any liability for payment of the money in question. 15. The matter is not yet closed. 16. The Minister of Customs is not aware that parliament has ordered the production of the opinion of the Department of Justice referred to.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I want to draw the attention of the hon. minister to a matter involved in the last question, No. 16. I think the hon. gentleman must admit, now that he has read to us for the first time that long letter of Mr. Davis's, in which Mr. Davis criticises, paragraph by paragraph, the opinion sent to him by the Deputy Minister of Justice, we ought to have a copy of that opinion. As the hon. minister knows, this matter will become the subject of further discussion, and it is unreasonable that we should have to discuss it without being in possession of the written opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice to which Mr. Davis has replied, in the letter the hon. gentleman has just read. I cannot understand why the hon. minister should persist in keeping this opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice back, particularly as he has given us Mr. Davis's reply to that opinion. I would press my request in view of the fact that, at as early a date as possible, I propose to bring the matter forward in the shape of a resolution.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I cannot control the action of the hon. gentleman, and if he proposes to bring before the House a matter that is still undecided, he is acting within his rights. But it seems to me very inadvisable to bring on a discussion without knowing what future action may be taken. When the matter is decided, then the subject can be discussed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not propose to deal with the future action of the government, but with what has passed. I do not know what will happen in the future, but I do insist that we ought to have the full record now.

Mr. PATERSON.

THE PARIS EXPOSITION.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). I rise for the purpose of drawing attention to the statement made in the House on May 10, with regard to the closing of the Canadian section of the Paris exhibition on Sundays. It was said on that occasion that the matter was in the hands of the Imperial authorities, and that there was difficulty in controlling it, so far as the violation and action of the Canadian authorities were concerned. I see, however, in the press, a statement that the Canadian section of the exposition is to be closed on the Lord's Day. I hope that this statement is correct, as it will be received with delight by the Christian community of Canada. I rose for the purpose of asking the government to inform the House and the country as to whether this report was well-founded or not.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I understand that the Canadian section is to be closed on Sunday. I am sorry that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is not here; and I would not like to undertake to give a definite answer in his absence. If my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) will repeat his question to-morrow, he shall have an answer.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. LOUIS E. DUGAS (Montcalm). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to draw the attention of the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to an article that appears in the Mail and Empire of Toronto, of May 28, as follows:

Winnipeg, May 27.—The city Catholics met this afternoon to consider what steps they should now take in view of the refusal of the Winnipeg School Board to take over the Roman Catholic schools of Winnipeg on certain terms suggested by the Catholics. At to-day's meeting reports and correspondence were read showing the terms proposed, and the inability of the Public School Board to accede to the same on account of the school law, and after some uncomplimentary remarks anent the fashion in which Sir Wilfrid Laurier 'settles' things the following resolution was unanimously adopted by the meeting:

'Whereas, the Catholics of Winnipeg have for ten long years suffered under the odious burdens imposed upon them by the school law of 1890; and whereas, the recent negotiations with the Public School Board of Winnipeg made it plain that, as the law at present stands, we can expect no relief; be it resolved, that we, the Catholics of Winnipeg in meeting assembled, hereby instruct the committee to take immediate steps to lay our grievances before the Dominion and provincial authorities, pointing out to them the severity of our long persecution, and praying them to come to our relief on the lines laid down in the Privy Council's decision.'

I would like to know from the right hon. leader of the government if he still thinks that the school question is settled, that being the statement he has made on many occasions in the province of Quebec, in this House and elsewhere.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dugas) had given me notice of his intention to ask the question, I should have had much pleasure in giving more information than is contained in the newspaper paragraph which he has just read. I understand that paragraph to be to the effect that some Roman Catholics in the city of Winnipeg have expressed the view that the settlement was not satisfactory. Had I had notice, I could have brought numerous resolutions of other meetings of Catholics expressing their satisfaction with the settlement of the school question. I have stated in this House that the settlement was the best that could be made under the circumstances, that, though it was not perfect, it was acceptable. And, in a speech delivered by Mr. Greenway on the 13th of December, 1896, he stated that he would be prepared to listen to the minority when they chose to make application to him. I notice that the Catholics referred to in the paragraph that has just been read say that they will appeal to the provincial and Dominion authorities. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dugas) knows that the Dominion authorities have no power except to hear an appeal of an appeal; so, I suppose, we shall hear of an application to the provincial authorities, and, if those who apply are not satisfied with the decision given, that they will appeal to the Dominion authorities.

COLD STORAGE VESSELS FROM P.E.I. PORTS.

Mr. ALEXANDER MARTIN (East Queen's, P.E.I.). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) if any arrangements have been made for steamers with cold storage accommodation between Prince Edward Island and Great Britain. The hon. gentleman knows that during the last two seasons the service he has given there has been very unsatisfactory. I think that only one trip of one steamer has been secured during the last season. I believe that the hon. minister called for tenders some time ago for this service. I would like to ask whether he has completed any arrangement to give to that province accommodation that every other province in the Dominion have had for a number of years.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). As the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) did not give me notice of his intention to bring the subject forward, I can only reply from memory. We have been endeavouring for some time past to meet the wishes and wants of the people of Prince Edward Island as well as we could with the sum at our disposal. Last year, owing to causes of which the hon. gentleman, no doubt, is well aware, chiefly the extraordinary demand for transport, only one trip was made. This year, I advertised with the hope of obtaining tenders, but, I suppose owing to the continued demand for steam vessels, I was unable to obtain tenders. I am now negotiating with private parties to see if I can get a reasonable number of trips in return for the sum which I propose to ask parliament to put at my disposal for this purpose. The negotiations are not quite concluded, but are still in progress.

PAYMENT OF SESSIONAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) for a moment to the question of payment of some of the employees of the House. The hon. gentleman knows that for a considerable time, sums have been due to certain members of the staff, some translators and others. I think the statement was made to the House, that if the item was allowed to pass in Committee of Supply, an arrangement would be made with the Auditor General by means of which the sums could be paid. That, of course, would be a little informal, but it would be quite reasonable, and it would be a great convenience to the employees. The same difficulty exists in regard to the employees of the Senate: and I notice that the matter has received some attention. And notwithstanding the fact that an estimate has not even been passed—if I understand it—for the payment of these back salaries, yet an arrangement has been made in some way by which these officers attached to the Senate who were unpaid have received their pay. In some way, the Auditor agreed to pay them. In another place, a statement has been made by a member of the government:

I might say, further, the reason I spoke about sitting longer than to-day was that I hoped that a Supply Bill would be presented to-morrow for our approval. Of that there is not any prospect now, unless we remain here until Monday. I have no doubt, if the payment of certain officers can be made without the formal sanction of this House, before we meet again, as they are officers in the public service, that the proposed payment, with the approval of the Auditor General, will be sanctioned by the Senate. Although the proceeding is not strictly regular, it is, nevertheless, one which I presume they will approve of as a matter of course.

If that statement is concurred in by the House, perhaps the Auditor will venture to carry out the wishes of the House without it being put in the form of an Act.

That was agreed to in the place to which I refer, and the sum has been paid by the Auditor, without even the item having passed in Committee of Supply under which that money could be taken and paid. Now, the Minister of Finance knows that upon May 23 a vote was taken in this House: Item 280. Legislation, Senate and House of Commons. We have there the sum voted to which I refer, for the payment of these officers of the House. I am surprised to know that the Auditor refuses to pay these sums, notwithstanding that the Senate and the House of Commons have passed the item in supply, he standing upon the strict technical procedure that no Supply Bill has been assented to, and, consequently, that no money has been legally appropriated for the purpose. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to this matter. It may, perhaps, seem a small sum, but it is distributed over a large number of employees who depend upon this pay for their living, and I am told that it is a matter of exceedingly great inconvenience to a number of employees, an inconvenience to which, I am sure, neither side of the House would wish to subject them. I may add that this money does not cover alone the salaries for the session in which we are now engaged, but it is money which is due these gentlemen for services performed in the session of 1899, so that the sum has been due to these employees, in some cases, over a year, and in some cases nearly a year. That makes the matter all the more serious and deserving of attention.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I hoped to be able to see the Auditor General this morning and discuss this subject with him, so that I could inform the House of the view which he takes, but owing to a very important engagement, occupying all the forenoon, in the Banking and Commerce Committee, I did not have that opportunity. I feel sure, however, that the Auditor General would not discriminate in the way the hon. gentleman thinks he would; he will hold the scales evenly and justly, I think, between the Senate and the House of Commons. I shall make it a point before to-morrow's sitting to ascertain the view he takes, and I hope to be able to say that the money due these employees will be paid to them.

CARMANAH LIGHTHOUSE, B.C.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I feel it is my duty to call the attention of the government, and especially of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to the state of affairs that exist on the Pacific coast with regard to the telegraphic communication between the Carmanah lighthouse and the shore. A letter was written by Mr. Daykin, lighthouse keeper, on May 6, to Capt. J. G. Cox, shipping owner of Victoria, which I will read to the House:

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Carmanah, May 6, 1900.

Captain Cox, Victoria, B.C.

Dear Sir,—At eleven p.m. May 2, a large steamer signalled off here. The wire was in working order to Victoria, but no attention was paid to my call, and I was unable to report the steamer.

May 4.—Large Japanese steamer signalled at 10 a.m., to be reported all well, but I could get no one east of here. I got the message as far as Cape Beale, but the wire was down between there and Alberni, at least there was no communication.

May 6, 11 a.m.—A large Russian steamer passed in, signalling to be reported. I have called over an hour, but can get no one, although the wire, I know, is working to Otter Point.

These are only a few instances. Since the first of the year I have missed reporting fourteen steamers alone. If this is going to continue, I would like to know, for it is useless for me to signal these vessels. I would like to hear from you, if that petition is doing any good.

I remain, yours truly,

W. P. DAYKIN.

Got the Russian steamer in 1.30 p.m., over two hours after she passed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious state of affairs for the shipping interest. I may say that the shipping going past that lighthouse to Nanaimo, Victoria and Vancouver is of an enormous quantity now. We have the large Canadian Pacific Railway steamers running between China and British Columbia, the Australian steamers, and a large number of large colliers carrying coal from the collieries to San Francisco. Besides the detriment to the shipping interest, there is an increased danger to wrecks that often take place on that coast. I am informed that the pilots going out to meet these vessels often have to get their reports from the American side. I would like the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to give this matter his attention, and see if a remedy can not be found for this state of affairs. I think some arrangement ought to be made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Telegraph Company about keeping their office open. I am informed that the office in Victoria, where these messages ought to be sent to from Carmanah lighthouse, is closed from one o'clock in the morning to eight o'clock, and that any signals that ships may make to the lighthouse cannot be forwarded between those hours. I think the government might make an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway to keep that office open so that shipping men might find out when vessels arrive. The telegraph should certainly be kept in better condition. I may also mention that Esquimalt is a large naval station, and in case of war, which may break out we never know when, it is important that a lighthouse like that should be enabled to signal to the naval authorities when any vessels enter and are coming in.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I do not want to challenge the propriety of the hon. gentleman bringing these facts to my notice in this way on the floor of the House, but it is obvious that, as I have received no notice from him, I am not able to reply to him at the moment. I had no notice whatever of the facts he mentions, and I am unable to give him any information whatever. If the hon. gentleman had communicated to me the facts which he has given to the House to-day, I might have been able, possibly, to get some information on the subject for him. All I can do now is to promise to ascertain whether any reports have reached my department of the character to which he refers, and to take whatever steps are in my power to have the evil he speaks of remedied.

Mr. PRIOR. I did not intend any discourtesy to the minister, far from it. These facts are stated in several newspapers in British Columbia, and I also had a letter from the British Columbia Board of Trade asking me to take this matter up, as they had notified the government or their agents.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. J. B. MILLS (Annapolis). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Prime Minister to invite the Minister of Agriculture, who I do not see in his seat, to lay upon the Table all papers, correspondence, telegrams, charters and agreements with reference to the chartering of the following steamships: Massapequa, 1,935 tons; Janeta, 2,197 tons; Mantantic, 1,760 tons; Masconomo, 2,738 tons; Mohican, 1,741 tons; Fashoda, 1,782 tons; Manhanset, 1,743 tons. I desire to have an inspection of these papers before the estimates are gone into with reference to these matters, and I take this, the earliest opportunity I have, of asking the Minister of Agriculture to have them laid upon the Table, as I wish to discuss the propriety of the government chartering these steamers largely through foreign brokers in preference to Canadian brokers.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Will my hon. friend send me a note of the information he desires to obtain, so that I can communicate it to the Minister of Agriculture?

HALIFAX HARBOUR.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) to a report of the sub-committee of the Halifax Board of Trade respecting the desirability of improving the approaches to the Halifax harbour.

I understand that a copy of the report has been sent to the hon. gentleman. I do not ask him to deal with the question now, but I would like to have him inform himself, so that when his estimates come up again he can give all the necessary information respecting what he has done or proposes to do in response to the statements contained in the report.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is that in respect to the bell buoy?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Yes, and also in respect to the lightship. The date of the report is March 16, 1900.

GRAIN INSPECTION IN MANITOBA.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) moved:

That the order for the third reading of Bill (No. 141) respecting the grain trade in the inspection district of Manitoba be discharged, and that the Bill be recommitted for the purpose of inserting the following amendment at the end of clause 40: 'Except that in the case of each such additional warehouse the land upon which the building is to be erected and the siding or spur required to reach it shall be provided by, or at the expense of, the person or persons to whom the building belongs.'

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that would completely nullify the operation of this clause. I think that all this clause is intended to obtain would be greatly modified by that. It would, in fact, make some of the concessions of this clause a futility, because you never can expect that farmers who want an additional warehouse would go to the expense, or would be able to go to the expense, of putting in a siding and paying for the land. I apprehend that the danger in the mind of the railway company that this is intended to guard against would hardly ever arise, because if this Bill be made the kind of Bill it ought to be made there will be very little using of flat warehouses at all. But having the right to erect flat warehouses where there is an absolute necessity is a leverage that will place the elevator men in the position of being compelled to concede what is needed by justice as regards the farming community. I cannot concur in the amendment and will divide the House on it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I would call the attention of the House to the Bill which we now have before us and the motion which has been made by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). Let me call attention to clause 40, and read it so that we may understand where we are. Clause 40 reads as follows:

40. On written application to the commissioner by ten farmers residing within forty miles of their nearest shipping point, he may give permission to any person to erect, under the provisions of this Act, a flat warehouse covered with metal of not less than 3,000 bushels capacity, with power to enlarge the same should necessity require it, at such shipping point. Such flat warehouse shall be erected on the railway company's premises after getting location of a siding, and the railway company shall be compelled to give such location with siding on its premises, in some place of convenient access, to be approved of by the commissioner, at a rental not greater than that charged to standard elevators. If, in the judgment of the commissioner, more than one such warehouse is required at a station, one or more additional warehouses may be authorized by him, and in such case all the provisions of this section shall apply to the construction of such warehouses.

I think the clause may be recast in some way so as to make it clearer, but the point to which I wish to call the attention of the House is this: The Bill, as it was introduced, provided for the erection of flat warehouses on the premises of the railway company. This provision has been made necessary because of the condition of things which now prevails in the North-west Territories. At the outset of my remarks on this matter, I would say that I think all parties in the North-west Territories should understand that there is no one interest here which ought to be independent of all the others. The producers are not independent of the carriers, the carriers are not independent of the producers, but the producers in order to have the benefit of their labour must have the assistance of the carriers, and the carriers, of course, must have their profit out of the producers—a legitimate profit it must be. But, in order to have this result it is impossible to admit that any one interest must have exclusive consideration at the expense of any other interest. The producers of the North-west Territories owe a great deal to the railway companies. Without the railway companies they would not have been in a position to have their wealth taken to the markets of the world. They owe a great deal also to the elevator companies. Without the elevator companies they would not have been able to dispose of their grain as they have been able to do. While they owe a great deal to the railway companies, and while they owe a great deal to the elevator companies, at the same time, there has arisen a condition of things in which, the elevator companies cannot supply the wants of the producers adequately at the present moment and new provisions have to be brought into the law so as to give the producers the benefit of more elevator space and accommodation. It has been found necessary, after due consideration of the matter, to give the producers of the North-west Territories the right to erect elevators of their own to be, in a manner, independent of the existing companies. The Bill, as introduced, provided for the erection of one flat warehouse at a station. The railway company has been forced to give the site, to give the accommodation and the siding which may be necessary. But, when the Bill was before the committee the other day, it was thought advisable to give power to the farmers of the North-west Territories to erect more warehouses if they saw fit. And this amendment was introduced into the Bill:

If, in the judgment of the commissioner, more than one such warehouse is required at a station, one or more additional warehouses may be authorized by him, and in such case all the provisions of this section shall apply to the construction of such warehouses.

This Bill puts it into the power of any ten farmers in the North-west Territories to put upon the land of the railway company one, two, three, four or five elevators, or ten, if necessary. It empowers them to put their elevators on the land of the company whether it is convenient for the company or not, whether it might involve the consequence of having their whole space covered with elevators and compel them also to give all the sidings that may be necessary for the purpose. That is to give very extraordinary powers, and powers which, if carried out to their full extent, would mean confiscation. It is not in the spirit of British legislation to give power over one man's land to another man unless adequate compensation is provided for it. The object of the amendment is simply to provide that if a number of farmers want to have additional elevators, they shall have to pay for it. They will be able to compel the railway company to give them the land and to give them the siding, but as the Bill is now, it is not sufficiently provided that this shall be done at the expense of the parties who shall be benefited by it. The amendment is one which, I think, commends itself to the judgment of the House, and although it may not be final in its wording, we can change it in committee. It says:

Except that in the case of each such additional warehouse, the land upon which the building is to be erected and the siding or spur to reach it, shall be provided by or at the expense of the person or persons to whom the building belongs.

The object is not to prevent the farmers from having additional warehouses. They have only to apply to the commissioner, and if the commissioner thinks the demand is legitimate, he can compel the railway to afford them all facilities, but at the same time the amendment provides that all this should not be done at the expense of the company, but at the expense of the parties for whose benefit the work is intended. That is to say, that the company shall not be compelled to give the land and build the sidings for these warehouses without compensation. I would suggest that the whole section should be carefully considered in committee. What I call attention to now is, not so much the wording of the amendment as the spirit in which it is conceived. There is nothing in the amendment to prevent the farmers of the Territories to have one, or five, or ten, or any unlimited number of flat warehouses which they may require. The only thing which is sought is: That this should not be a burden upon the railway company without their having proper compensation. The amendment is simply intended to carry out the principles of justice which are understood in all British countries: that no proprietor ought to be compelled to part with this property unless he receives some compensation. It is an amendment in the sense of substantial justice, and it is therefore, in the spirit of fair-play to all parties, to the farmers, who want an additional elevator on the one hand, and on the other hand to the railway companies, which shall not be compelled to give their land and labour unless they receive adequate compensation.

Mr. DAVIN. More than one warehouse could not be erected unless the commissioner would consider there should be more than one? And, of course, it is unlikely the commissioner would consent to the erection of another one unless it was needed.

The PRIME MINISTER. Suppose three warehouses are erected and the commissioner concedes the erection of a fourth warehouse to another ten men. Then the company under the Bill as it stands, would be bound to give its land and to build the siding at his own expense.

Mr. DAVIN. If the commissioner thought it was needed.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, and it is provided that in such a case the company shall not be bound to give its land until it is paid for it. That seems reasonable, and that is what the amendment asks.

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). I wish it to be understood that I am in no way to be considered as in favour of this amendment. I am sorry that I can not see this amendment in the light in which the right hon. Prime Minister sees it. I cannot see it in the light of fair-play to the settler, nor can I see that there is not in it a desire to prevent the erection of as many flat warehouses as may be necessary or desirable. It is because I see the amendment in a directly contrary light to that of the Prime Minister, that I oppose it. I understand the purpose of this amendment to be essentially, unfairness to the farmer, and a desire to prevent the erection of any more than one flat warehouse at a certain point. I am sorry to say that I have to dissent from the view taken by the right hon. the Premier in more points than this. I deny that there are several separate interests in the North-west. The carrying interest, the mercantile, and the producing interest are identical. It is the interest of the producer, upon which the other interests depend. They can only exist by reason of the producer, and from my point of view when we consider the best interests of the producer we thereby consider the best interests of the dealer and of the transportation company.

Now, as to the idea of confiscation in demanding the right to erect flat warehouses upon the railway property; I deny in the first place that the right of way of the railway company is the private property of the railway company, any more than any of the property of the railway is its private property. It is the property of the railway company for a purpose. The railroad is the property of the company for the purpose of transportation. It is not the private property of the company to be used as the company may please, and no more is the right of way the private property of the company to be used as the company may please. The right of way of the railway company belongs to the railway company for the purpose of being used in connection with transportation over that railway. Our demand is that we shall have the right to use the right of way for the purpose of promoting transportation over the railway. We deny that there is any confiscation in such a proposition. The railroad company does not buy property for its own private purposes; it buys property for transportation purposes under the laws and regulations passed by this House and this government, and it has no more private right in the right of way than it has in the railroad, and it has not the right to deny the use of the right of way for the purpose of the transportation of grain in the Northwest Territories. What we demand is, that the right of way of the railroad company shall be allowed to be used for the purpose of erecting the necessary warehouses for carrying on the grain trade of the country, for the benefit of the producers of the country. As to the intention of this amendment, when the House the other night decided that it was necessary that there should be a right to erect more than one flat warehouse on any certain siding, there was no idea that this amendment would be necessary. It was only after the House had reached that conclusion that this suggestion was thought of. It was admitted that there was room at any siding for one flat warehouse. A siding is from 600 to 1,000 feet in length: a flat warehouse is from 30 to 40 feet in width; and if there is room for one flat warehouse on the length of any siding, there is room for two or three or four or five. To say that there is not room is simply to say that you do not want to allow flat warehouses to be built. The whole object of desiring the erection of flat warehouses is that there shall be a cheap means of handling grain at a particular station without the investment of a large amount of capital in buildings or plant; and the purpose of this amendment is that there shall not be the right to handle grain in more than one flat warehouse at a siding unless there is a large expenditure of money in a dead investment for siding and rails. The idea of the amendment is that instead of a second flat warehouse costing $1,000 at a certain siding, if there be more than one these shall cost $3,000. The figures may not be accurate, but the facts are as stated. That is the necessary result of the amendment, and I stand here, Mr. Speaker, to say that it is the purpose of the amendment. The producers of the North-west ask the elementary right to handle their grain in any way they please, and to have it transported over the railroads of the country according to the laws and regulations under which those railroads are run. That is all they ask: but they ask that, and they will not be satisfied with anything else. Talk about concessions to the people in the matter of the transportation of grain. There are no concessions asked. All the people want is the right to handle their grain and to put it on the railroad cars in whatever way is most convenient to them; and they demand the use of the right of way of the railroad company, which belongs to that company only for that purpose, in transacting their grain business.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). Mr. Speaker, I think it is just as well that we should discuss this matter now, seeing that there are a large number of members in the House, as that we should discuss it later on, when it reaches the committee stage. When the Bill was before the committee the other day, the view was taken both by myself and by the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), than whom probably no one in the west has taken a deeper interest in this matter, that this clause 40 was the crux of the entire Bill. If this clause goes through as it is proposed in the reprinted Bill, especially if it goes through with the amendment which the right hon. leader of the House has just supported, I believe that the whole idea which the farmers of the North-west have been fighting for all these years will be utterly destroyed. Let the House remember the history of this elevator agitation in the North-west. I do not think anything has more deeply agitated the people in the west than the restrictions which have existed for years upon the handling of grain. Statements have been made in regard to the vast amount of money which it cost the farmers yearly for the handling of their grain by virtue of those restrictions and the privileges enjoyed by the elevator companies. Three sessions ago I myself introduced a Bill for the purpose of remedying the evil. My hon. friend from East Assiniboia introduced one for a similar purpose. His Bill being first on the Order paper, I gave way to him. An effort was made to prevent that Bill going through. Certain influences, not on behalf of the farmers, but on behalf of the railroad companies and grain dealers, were brought to bear, with the result that the Bill was not passed that session. The same agitation continued, and last session the hon. member for East Assiniboia introduced his Bill again. That Bill was referred to a special committee of this House, which listened for days to arguments presented by the grain interests and the railway interests to show why it should not become law. The result was that the Bill did not pass that session, and a Royal Commission was appointed for the purpose of taking evidence throughout the country with a view to arriving at a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. Let me briefly quote from the report of the Privy Council, authorizing the appointment of the Royal Commission:

Mr. OLIVER.

The principal causes for the necessity of legislation being had in the nature of the provisions of that Bill were alleged to be as follows:

1. That a vendor of grain is at present subjected to an unfair and excessive dockage of his grain at the time of sale;

2. That doubts exist as to the fairness of the weights allowed or used by owners of elevators; and

3. That the owners of elevators enjoy a monopoly in the purchase of grain by refusing to permit of the erection of flat warehouses where standard elevators are situated, and are able to keep the price of grain below its true market value to their own benefit and the disadvantage of others who are specially interested in the grain trade, and of the public generally.

The Minister of the Interior further states that in the discussion which took place before the special committee above referred to, great difference of opinion was expressed respecting the actual facts of the case, and it appeared to the minister to be impossible to reach a satisfactory decision as to the necessity of legislation, or should legislation be necessary, as to the scope and tenor of such legislation without a full and impartial investigation of the whole subject.

The minister having given the subject careful consideration, is of the opinion that the subject is one in regard to which the public interest requires that there should be full and accurate information in the possession of the government, and to that end that an inquiry should be made under a Royal Commission in accordance with the provisions of chapter 114 of the Revised Statutes of Canada.

Now, let me read what the commissioners in their report say: and surely this House does not require any better evidence. They say:

We find that the grievances complained of have arisen largely from the above-mentioned protection offered by the railway company to elevator-owners to induce them to build elevators, which resulted in placing the shipping of grain at elevator points in the hands solely of the elevator owners. Owners of flat warehouses were not allowed to ship at points where elevators were erected, and their warehouses were practically done away with. No one desiring to ship grain in bulk could get it on cars otherwise than by having it handled through elevators.

So that, according to the admission of the commissioners themselves, the whole point was that the farmers of that country should be allowed to use flat warehouses, if they so desire. The elevator owners enjoyed a monopoly, and a farmer could not ship his grain except through these elevators. Hence a great cry arose throughout the west for freedom in the shipping and selling of grain and for the right of erecting flat warehouses. The commissioners further say :

While the evidence taken leads us to believe that from a number of the causes above given, farmers have in many cases been over-docked and have realized less than they should have, it also shows that since the privilege has been extended to farmers to themselves load cars and ship direct, they have realized not only in that way, but from elevator operators better proportionate prices than they previously got.

As the result of the agitation carried on for two or three years, the railway companies allowed the farmers the privilege of loading directly on the car. A farmer living near a railway station was able to get a car set apart for him and draw his grain and load it directly on the car. But farmers, living from five to twenty miles from a railway are absolutely unable to avail themselves of this privilege of shipping a car-load at a time, because they cannot bring their grain in vehicles in sufficient time to avoid being charged heavy demurrage on the cars, and they asked to be allowed to erect flat warehouses on the sidings in which they could store their grain and ship it when convenient. What business has a railway company to dictate to the farmers how they should ship their grain? These railway companies make their money out of hauling grain, and it is their duty to afford proper shipping and handling privileges to the people who raise the grain. I again read from the report of the commissioners :

The above privilege to farmers of getting cars for shipping has, however, only partially removed the evil, as only those farmers living within four or five miles of shipping points can draw their grain fast enough to load a car within the time reasonably allowed by the railway company for such loading. This privilege of direct shipping has, therefore, given no practical relief to those living beyond that distance.

Surely this House will not go back on the conclusions of the Royal Commission itself. That commission states that while the privilege of shipping directly on to the car has been a relief to the farmers who live adjacent to a railway, it is of no practical value to those who live at any distance. That is the finding of the Royal Commission itself. The commissioners say further :

Farmers giving evidence have generally agreed that full freedom of the right to load direct on cars and through flat warehouses would remove most of the trouble. We consider that proper relief from the possibility of being compelled to sell under value, and of being unduly docked for cleaning, is only to be had by giving the fullest obtainable freedom in the way of shipping and selling grain. It is only in such a way that the great agitation and bitterness of feeling which has arisen can be ended.

What more do we want? That is the position which the hon. member for Alberta takes; and if these commissioners, who went from one end of the country to the other and who were bombarded with evidence, from day to day, to show how bitter the feeling was, report in favour of perfect freedom in the handling and shipping of grain, surely it is the duty of this House to see that perfect freedom is granted to the farmers in this country. The report continues :

So long as any farmer is hampered in or hindered from himself shipping to terminal markets, he will be more or less at the mercy of elevator operators.

We want to place this matter in such a position that the farmers will not be at the mercy of the elevators operators.

The discontent on this point is very serious; and, without further discussing the causes giving rise to same, this discontent seems to us an inevitable result of the restrictions under which farmers have been labouring as to the marketing of their grain.

If we adopt section 40 of this Bill, we will destroy entirely the very object for which the inquiry was supposed to be held. This country must have spent $40,000 to $50,000 to send that commission over the country, and yet we find a clause put in this Bill which utterly destroys the value of the Bill altogether, and is directly contrary to the conclusions of the commission. If we restrict the farmers to one warehouse, of what particular value will this Bill be to them? Let me read the clause :

40. On a written application to the commissioner by ten farmers residing within forty miles of their nearest shipping point, he may give permission to any person to erect, under the provisions of this Act, a flat warehouse covered with metal, of not less than 3,000 bushels capacity, with power to enlarge the same should necessity require it, at such shipping point. Such flat warehouses shall be erected on the railway company's premises after getting location of a siding, and the railway company shall be compelled to give such location with siding on its premises, in some place of convenient access, to be approved of by the commissioner, at a rental not greater than that charged to standard elevators. If, in the judgment of the commissioner, more than one such warehouse is required at a station, one or more additional warehouses may be authorized by him, and in such case all the provisions of this section shall apply to the construction of such warehouses.

Let me read also the last subsection of clause 40, and the House will see how the rights of the people are circumscribed :

No owner or operator of any such warehouse shall be allowed to store in or ship through grain purchased by or for himself.

You are going to tie up the operators and the owners of warehouses.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. RICHARDSON. From the Bill as reprinted, subsection S, of clause 40. We struggled the other evening, when this Bill was in the Committee of the Whole, to have that clause 40 amended. As originally printed, you would be astonished to learn that the only concession allowed to the farmers was the right to build one flat warehouse with 6,000 bushels capacity. We took the view that such a provision afforded no relief whatever. Farmers may not desire to club together to build a flat warehouse of 6,000 bushels capacity. If any number of farmers—whether ten farmers or more or less—living ten miles or twenty miles from a station desire to erect a warehouse which will satisfy themselves, and in which they can store their grain and escape demurrage charges, surely they ought to be allowed to do so. I entirely agree with the commissioners in their conclusion that unless we grant these things, this bitterness will not end in the North-west. We cannot wipe out an agitation by giving the people a stone when they ask for bread. But notwithstanding the fact that we succeeded in getting this clause 40, amended in the Committee of the Whole, so as to reduce the capacity of flat warehouses from 6,000 to 3,000 bushels, and allow the commissioner in his discretion to permit more than one to be erected, what do we find to-day? We find another clause proposed as follows and it is for that purpose this House is being moved into committee:

Except that in the case of each such additional warehouse the land upon which the building is to be erected and the siding or spur required to reach it, shall be provided by or at the expense of the person or persons to whom the building belongs.

That means that there is not a farmer in the west, or any number of them, who will be able to avail themselves of this privilege. That will destroy entirely the value of clause 40. It means that a farmer must pay for a piece of railway for himself. He must buy a piece of land, though he may desire only to spend $200 or $300 to put up a flat warehouse in which to store his grain until he desires to ship it.

I endorse the position taken by the hon. member for Alberta. I entirely dissent from the view expressed by the right hon. leader of the government, when he says that the producers of that country owe a debt of gratitude to the Canadian Pacific Railway, or to any other railway company—I do not say the Canadian Pacific Railway alone, for this applies to all railway companies. These railway men get their charters and build roads—for the purpose of benefiting the settler? Not at all, but to make dividends for their shareholders. And let me tell this House that they have been able to make very handsome dividends for their shareholders in that country. We do not find the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west here by the hundred and thousand button-holing members of this House to get a Bill through in their interest, but we do find the emissaries of the company here trying to convince members that the House should protect their special interest. It is not the interest of the railroads that representatives should be here to protect, but the interest of the people. And it is the people who grow the grain, who bear the burden and heat of the day, who should be protected. I cannot possibly support this clause, and I gave notice four or five days ago that when the Bill came up for consideration in the committee I would move that clause 40 should be expunged entirely, and the following substituted. And I think that if this amended clause is adopted, it will cure the evil:

The commissioners shall give permission to any person who demands it in writing the privilege of erecting, maintaining and using free of charge on some portion of the company's right of way adjoining its main track, siding or spur at each such siding or station, an elevator or warehouse for the purpose of storing and shipping grain in car lots, but the said elevator or warehouse shall not be used for any other purpose.

Now, the railroad company builds a siding. My hon. friend says it extends from 600 to 1,000 yards in length. What is that siding for, if not for the accommodation of the public? The railway companies are not our masters; it is our duty to regulate the railway companies, and to see that they provide the proper and necessary facilities for the people. I repeat that if we let the Bill go through as it is, and still more, if we adopt this damning amendment that is proposed, I believe the agitation in that country will continue, and will be increased in bitterness. Nothing but the most absolute freedom in storing, selling and shipping grain will satisfy the people of that country. The commissioners themselves say in their report:

We believe that the erection of flat warehouses will not, in all instances, be called for. The knowledge that farmers will have the right, under certain restrictions, to get the same erected, or to erect same, will lead to a desire on the part of elevator owners and employees to give fair prices for grain rather than to stir up feeling which will lead to the erection of those flat warehouses.

That has been my contention all along. If we legislate so as to allow the farmers to build all the flat warehouses they like, that will be such a corrective on the elevator owners and companies, that it will not be necessary to build large numbers of them, and this bugbear that has been raised by the railway companies will fade away. I do not believe that any large number of flat warehouses will be erected. But if by this Act, we deprive the farmer of the rights that he should enjoy under all circumstances, we shall be doing him a serious injustice. I repeat that if we allow the most perfect freedom, we shall correct the evil, and satisfy the people of the country and this parliament will deserve the thanks of the people for having placed proper legislation on the statute-book. Anent this amendment that I propose, an hon. gentleman said to me the other day: You are proposing socialistic legislation. I have no desire to pose as proposing socialistic legislation in this House. This clause was proposed by my hon. and reverend friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), who is neither a socialist nor an anarchist. I took it from his Bill and propose it as an amendment to clause 40 to rectify the evils that I fear will flow from the clause as it is proposed. For the reasons I have given, I shall oppose very strongly this proposition, and I shall endeavour to divide the House upon it in order that we from the west, who dissent, may be able to place ourselves on record when the proper time comes.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I call particular attention, Mr. Speaker, to the respect with which my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) referred to the report of the Royal Commission. You heard the quotations he made from page eight and page ten. Though he was speaking rapidly, I was able to write a few sentences in which he expressed the utmost confidence in the Royal Commission. He said: The House cannot go back on the finding of the Royal Commission: It is our duty to accept the report of the Royal Commission. At the same time he used words which make me feel certain that he did not read the whole report. He said: That is all I care to read about the report of the Royal Commission. I do not wonder at all that that was all he cared to read about that report. If he had taken the trouble to read on page thirty-one at schedule 'E.' which was prepared by that commission to serve as a guide for the legislation to be adopted, he would have read these words:

That on a written application to the warehouse commissioner by any ten farmers residing within twenty miles of a shipping point, he (the warehouse commissioner) may give permission to any person or persons to erect, under the provisions of this Act, one flat warehouse of not less than 6,000 bushels capacity at such shipping point.

This does not provide for flat warehouses, such as my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Oliver) suggests, to contain as little as 600 bushels. Why, we could fancy the whole road lined with warehouses that would contain that quantity. A car has a capacity of from 600 to 1,000 bushels, so that one of these flat warehouses would hold something less than three-quarters of a single large car.

Mr. OLIVER. Why not?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Why not fill the whole station with warehouses? It is almost incredible that such a thing should be proposed. I will show how we have taken to heart the interest of the farmers, who are justly looked upon as the hope of the North-west and the Dominion at large. My hon. friend comes with the report of the commission in hand and begs the House to adopt the report, he says the House cannot refuse to adopt the report. Then I come here with the recommendation of the commissioners that only one flat warehouse should be erected, and in order, as much as possible, to meet the wishes of my hon. friend, and to show that it was our intention to remove all subject of complaint from the farmers. I consented to an amendment providing that more than one flat warehouse could be placed at a station. But we attached a condition which I look upon as fair. I will read the section covering that matter:

On a written application to the commissioner by ten farmers residing within forty miles of a shipping point, he may give permission to any person to erect, under the provisions of this Act, one flat warehouse of not less than 6,000 bushels capacity.

We consented to reduce the capacity from 6,000 bushels to 3,000, in order to meet the wishes of my hon. friend, and at the same time we added this, which was not in the first Bill:

—with power to enlarge the same should necessity require it at such shipping point. Such flat warehouse shall be erected on the railway company's premises after getting location of a siding, and the railway company shall be compelled to give such location, with siding on its premises, in some place of convenient access, to be approved of by the commissioner, at a rental not greater than that charged to standard elevators.

Now, what follows was introduced in order, as much as possible, to meet the wishes of my hon. friends:

If, in the judgment of the commissioner, more than one flat warehouse is required at a station, one or more additional warehouses may be authorized by him, and in such case all the provisions of this section shall apply to the construction of such warehouses.

What are the provisions of this section? The provisions of this section are that such additional warehouse should be erected at the request of ten farmers residing within a certain limit. But my hon. friend wanted to put in an amendment providing that an additional warehouse should be erected, not at the request of ten farmers, but at the request of any person, notwithstanding that the commissioners recommended that at least ten farmers should unite in the request before a warehouse could be erected.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The hon. gentleman will remember that I moved that clause in committee, having given notice of it. But, failing to get that, and fearing I might not get it even on the third reading, I made an effort to get the best I could on the clause as it was.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. My hon. friend made an effort to get the best he could on the clause as it was. He says he feared he would not get anything. There was no division in the committee, and this was adopted. My hon. friend comes, now, after showing how much respect and how much value should be attached to the report of the Royal Commission, after having himself consented that no such flat warehouse should be erected except on the application of ten persons at least, residing within a certain radius, he comes coolly now and gives notice of an amendment, which appears in the Votes and Proceedings as follows, page 297 :

The commissioners shall give permission to any person who demands it in writing—

Not ten persons residing within a certain distance, but any person—I could go and get permission if I liked. I need not be a resident even in that neighbourhood.

—the privilege of erecting, maintaining and using, free of charge, on some portion of the company's right of way adjoining its main track, siding or spur at each such siding or station, an elevator or warehouse for the purpose of storing and shipping grain in car lots, but the said elevator or warehouse shall not be used for any other purpose.

Well, this is the idea of my hon. friend, after having stated he would accept the Bill as introduced on the recommendation of the Royal Commission, providing that the application should be made by ten farmers residing within a certain radius. But now he comes and says that any person whatever, he need not reside within 100 or 1,000 miles of the place, may demand the erection of a warehouse. What are we to think of him? I do not wish to speak at random, but, it seems to me, evident that the hon. gentleman is riding for a fall. He knew very well that his proposition could never be adopted. But, I dare say, when he goes back to the west he will say to the people: See what I tried to do, and the government would not consent to it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is exactly the position that I have taken for four years. I am quite right in taking that position. I proposed my amendment, and it was voted down, and I made every effort to get the clause modified, and I succeeded to some extent, with the assistance of the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas).

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. He says he has worked for many years in the same direction, and I hope he will be able to work until, at all events, it is decided whether the people in the North-west will allow themselves to be caught by such tactics. I understand the appeal he is going to make for popularity; he expects to gain public favour, but nothing more. Now, I hope my hon. friend will turn his attention to another part of the report of the committee to which he objected so much. He addressed himself particularly to the leader of the opposition. The eighth subsection of section 40 he considered a gross injustice, a gross unfairness. It is this :

No owner or operator of any such warehouse shall be allowed to store in, or ship through, grain purchased by or for himself.

That is exactly the recommendation of the Royal Commission, which my hon. friend does not care to read. You will understand at once, Mr. Speaker, why this wise provision has been adopted. These flat warehouses have to be erected at the request of ten farmers residing within a certain circuit, not to the advantage of the man who erects the warehouse, but for the advantage of the farmers. The man who erects a flat warehouse erects it in order to be only a warehouseman. He is to be nothing more than a warehouseman. He is not to speculate in grain, because if he does, if he buys grain from the farmers, then the results which have been spoken of in the report of the commission will arise. I am going to read from pages 8 and 10 of the report of the commission, from which my hon. friend read :

The evidence has shown that where farmers' elevators have been erected, which do not buy, but only ship and store grain, complaints of the grain shipped out being of a lower grade than that furnished have been very few.

Hon. gentlemen can readily understand that if these men, who are allowed to erect flat warehouses, were going to build them, not for the use of the farmers, but for their own use, the danger to which the Royal Commission pointed in their report would arise. My hon. friend did not forget to mention the conveniences which have been afforded to farmers for the last year or two in being allowed to load directly from their wagons into the railway cars. My hon. friend admitted this, and it shows at once that the railway companies are glad to receive freight in any way it comes. I wish to say further, that every care has been taken, under the recommendations of the Royal Commission, to give every facility to the farmers. Clause 41, which comes immediately after the clause which is the subject of conversation between my hon. friend and myself, reads as follows :

On a written application to the commissioner by ten farmers resident within twenty miles of their nearest shipping point, and on approval of the commissioner, the railway company shall erect a loading platform suitable for the purpose of loading from vehicles direct in the cars.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you will see the way in which this convenience is to be provided. I will read to you what follows in order that you may see that provision has been made to enable the farmers to avail themselves of this privilege :

Provided, however, that the railway company shall not be obliged to erect any such platform outside the limits of the station yard.

Here is a description of the platform :

Such platforms shall be at least ten feet wide, and of such length as is in each case determined by the commissioner, in addition to the approaches at each end, and shall have on the side farthest from the track a guard rail not less than three feet high.

So that, the length is not limited. It may be one hundred or two hundred feet. It is left to the commissioner to determine the length of the platform which the railway company is required to erect. You will, therefore, see that the complaint of my hon. friend and also of the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) have very little ground. I would like to answer the views advanced by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken by quoting subsection e of section 4, which shows exactly what is the purpose of the Bill. The Royal Commission was appointed to hear complaints from the farmers of the North-west Territories on three grounds :

1. That the vendor of grain is at present subjected to unfair and excessive dockage of grain at the time of sale.

The dockage means the proportion of dirt or small wheat that is removed from the grain. The farmers complain that they have to submit to very great loss by unfair dockage.

Mr. DAVIN. The dockage is not what is cleaned out, but what is estimated will be cleaned out.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Exactly, and that is just where the difficulty comes in. The complaint is that the dockage estimated by the elevator men is too great. For instance, the elevator man will say: I will have to take one pound per bushel or two pounds per bushel from your grain to clean it. My hon. friend from Western Assinibola proposed that the sieves should be of a certain proportion, of ten wires to the inch, doubtless to ensure fair dockage.

2. That doubts exist as to the fairness of the weights allowed or used by owners of elevators; and

3. That the owners of elevators enjoy a monopoly in the purchase of grain by refusing to permit of the erection of flat warehouses where standard elevators are situated, and are able to keep the price of grain below its true market value to their own benefit and the disadvantage of others who are specially interested in the grain trade, and of the public generally.

These three were the points that were the subjects of investigation by the Royal Commission, and I will now read, in a few words, the embodiment of the policy of the government which is designed to meet these complaints. It is contained in subsection e of section 4. At the outset the Bill provides for the appointment of a warehouse commissioner. In section 4 the duties of the warehouse commissioner are described at full length. These are his duties among others :

To receive and investigate all complaints made in writing, under oath, of undue dockage—

This is the first item of complaint which was the subject of investigation by the Royal Commission.

—improper weights or grading,—

This is the second item of complaint.

—refusal or neglect to furnish cars within a reasonable time.

It has been said that everything is given up to the railways. If we had hesitated to deal with the railway companies we would certainly not have put a clause in like that giving the commissioner power to deal with the refusal or neglect of the railway companies to furnish cars within a reasonable time.

All complaints of fraud or oppression by any person, firm or corporation owning or operating any elevator, warehouse, mill or railroad, and to apply such remedy as is provided by statute.

I say that these provisions alone show exactly what the purpose of the Bill is. This Bill of 55 clauses and of 20 pages is only designed for the purpose of rendering justice to all parties. This is what the Bill has attempted to do, and that is what I hope it will do.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS (East Assinibola). It will be remembered that when this Bill was presented for a second reading I expressed a general approval of it, reserving my right to state my opinion upon certain clauses when it should come up for discussion in Committee of the Whole House. When the various parts of the Bill were discussed, I had ample opportunity to express my views, and I took exception to certain clauses which the Bill contains. While the Bill as a whole is in accord with my judgment, especially as far as the general interests of the trade are concerned, I regret to say that when the Bill comes to deal directly with the producers, I find that the more it is amended—it is like a pool in which men begin to puddle—the more dirty it becomes. I am exceedingly anxious that nothing, however, should be done in connection with clause 40, as it passed committee. There are it is true twenty pages of matter in the Bill dealing with the whole question, but there are only two pages that affect the farmer directly with regard to his presenting grain for sale, and the shipping of his grain for the market. I do not think that I need detain the House with any declaration of my own personal views upon the question. I have always declared there ought be on the part of the producer, perfect freedom in the shipment of grain. I would call attention to the fact that while the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) has pointed out that this clause giving the farmer the privilege of one flat warehouse is the recommendation of the Royal Grain Commission—and he seems to lay very great stress upon this as being what was really needed to meet the necessities of the case,—yet I point to the fact that the recommendation of the commission as represented in the original Bill was wholly impracticable. It would not require me very long to demonstrate that the Bill as read a second time and before being amended in committee was utterly worthless from the standpoint of those farmers who live at a distance of twenty miles or thirty miles or forty miles from the point of shipment. The time allowed to occupy a bin in a flat warehouse was not sufficient to enable the farmer to deposit the grain and to load a car. The provision in the Bill originally was of no practical benefit, and I showed how it was necessary to extend the time from four days to a full week. For instance, if I should want to load a car of 1,000 bushels, then in view of my distance from the nearest shipping point it would require me six days, driving four teams forty miles a day, in order to accomplish it within the time allowed at first in the Bill, and that is a state of things which any one who knows anything about North-west farming can easily see would be entirely impracticable. Let me emphasize this point. The work of the Royal Commission throughout the country was valuable. It has given us a mass of important evidence. I had an opportunity of being present at the great majority of the meetings; I had the privilege of having certain parties subpoenaed and I had the privilege of cross-questioning them, and I know very well the nature of the evidence that was submitted to the Royal Commission. If there was one thing more than another that marked the whole trend of the evidence it was this: That from one end of the country to the other there ought be perfect freedom of trade in the shipping of grain, and no restrictions.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Hear, hear; that is the idea.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is the point I wish to emphasize, and I regret that I have to differ from the Minister of Inland Revenue in this: That I do not want any further restrictions to be inserted in this clause 40. The decision of the Royal Commission anent clause 40, I am satisfied, has been largely modified by the influence of the grain trade at Winnipeg. It has the stamp of the grain trade upon it. Every part of it indicates, that they meant that this flat warehouse business should be a failure, and they have surrounded it with so many restrictions as would make it a failure. We have in Committee of the Whole House, introduced certain improvements in clause 40, that will make it somewhat more presentable to the people, but why should there be only one flat warehouse? One flat warehouse to a radius of country extending from 10 to 30 miles is only an insult. It would not accommodate the ten parties who might make application for it. My own idea of this clause is that it should be perfectly open. There is too much specification now in clause 40. It ought be left perfectly open so that if people wish to ship their own grain in car lots they should have the privilege to do so. I could specify farmers in my own district who could save $600 a year if they had the privilege of shipping directly through cars to the commission merchant at Fort William. They would save elevator fees, and escape the dockages under which they have laboured and under which they have complained for many years. If they have business capacity to ship their grain to commission merchants through car lots why should they not have the privilege to do so. I am opposed to any further restrictions being placed on clause 40. Apparently the idea is here that a flat warehouse is a very bad thing if it is under the control of the farmers, but it is all right if it is in the possession of an elevator company or a milling company in Manitoba or the North-west Territories. I would remind the House of the fact, that there are a number of flat warehouses in use and have always been in use by elevator and milling companies, and we hear nothing about them in this parliament. They are harmless; they are useful; they are all right. But when it comes that a flat warehouse is to be used by a farmer or by a small dealer, then it is not a thing that ought to be allowed. It is high time that this idea should disappear. I see certain reasons why the railway company should wish to change clause 40. If I were a member of a railway company I doubtless would want some change in the clause.

Mr. DOUGLAS.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 146) to enable the city of Winnipeg to utilize the Assiniboine River water power.—(Mr. Puttee.)

Bill (No. 153) respecting the Western Alberta Railway Company.—(Mr. Casey.)

GRAIN INSPECTION IN MANITOBA.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the proposed amendment, I have endeavoured to point out to the House the importance of meeting the wishes of the people by granting to them unrestricted privileges in regard to shipping grain in car lots, and that in order to do this the flat warehouse is essential. A good deal of stress has been laid upon the fact that the recommendation of the Royal Commission was inserted in section 40. We endeavoured to show that the judgment of the commission in this case should not be followed, as this clause was largely stamped with the opinions of the grain trade of Winnipeg, and the promoter of the Bill saw fit to make various changes to make it practicable. There has also been considerable made of the idea that there has been a disposition on the part of the railway companies and elevator owners to make concessions with a view to securing such a Bill as would tend to consolidate the trade and remove friction. The House should keep in mind this one fact, that whilst we are not at all desirous of offering any factious opposition to the railway company, for we are proud of the railway that makes the country, at the same time we are not blind to the fact that the people know and can appreciate the privileges and the experiences they have had in past years; and I wish to point out that the company which desires to make this amendment has not expended very much money in meeting the necessities of the country by affording ample facilities for the shipment of grain. They have terminal elevators at Fort William, which ought to command the admiration of any business man. These elevators are up to date and in every way fitted to meet the demands of the trade at that point; but further west, it is my opinion that the railway company has not to-day a single elevator or warehouse to receive the grain. So that when we ask the company to build a siding and platform on which to load grain or to allow the privilege of building more than one flat warehouse at a given shipping point, we are making no great demand on it, and the company ought to be willing to go to some reasonable expense in connection with this trade. I have been informed by the highest officials of the company that they could not afford to allow this dissatisfaction to continue, because the position taken by the western members and the western country generally was calculated to injure the company in the financial markets of the world. I would say to them what Sam Jones once said to some people in his congregation, who were not very orderly. He said: 'If you want to do well, quit your fooling.' All I have to say to the officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway, who are pressing for this amendment, is, that if they wish the people to be quiet and peaceful, they must consult the people's wishes, and I think that the people's wishes in this respect are not unreasonable. As citizens, they have the right to perfect freedom in shipping grain from any point they wish, provided they are willing to pay the usual charges. I am not offering a factious opposition to the railway company, but I do not think that it is in the interests of the company itself to press this amendment. And it would be a great deal more to its credit and in its own interests, if this amendment were withdrawn altogether and section 40 left as it stands.

I wish also to point out another fact. If the proprietor of a flat warehouse has to purchase his own site and construct his own siding, why are not the owners of elevators compelled to do the same thing? Why single out the proprietors of flat warehouses?

Further, by subsection eight of section forty, the proprietor of a warehouse is not allowed to buy and ship for himself or any one else. Apparently this is intended to preserve the capacity of the warehouse for the full accommodation of the farmers, but it is also intended to shut out competition; and I would like to know what business man in the country would be willing to construct a warehouse for the revenue to be derived from the fee of one cent a bushel, as a return on the capital invested. If he is not allowed to make use of the building in any other way, he will scarcely venture on the undertaking. This is a further restriction laid on the trade in order to shut off competition. The object of this clause is, no doubt, to shut out all small buyers, and to keep the bulk of the business in the hands of the elevator monopoly.

I have no special argument to offer against the elevator system as such. All I have to say about it is that it is a most expensive system—too expensive, I believe, to be forced on the country in its present history. More than that, the fees, dockages and the drainage that the people have been subjected to in the past, have been such that three years' fees and dockages would have bought out the entire plant as it now stands, and the farmers would then have the elevators free altogether. If the fees and dockages in three years are sufficient to purchase out the entire plant, the elevator system is certainly costing the country too much money; and while we do not oppose the elevator companies in their legitimate business, they have erected too many elevators and cannot make them even now pay. We are assured, on sworn testimony taken at Winnipeg, that these elevators require to be filled up three times during the season in order to make them pay expenses, and it is found difficult to do that. This, however, is no fault of the people, and the people ought not to suffer, should these parties have been foolish in the investment of their capital. The rights of the people should not be curtailed, and the freest possible opportunities at least should be given them to bring their goods to market in their own way, and according to their own inclination. I believe, then, in the interests of all parties—the farmers, the railway companies, and the people generally—that it would be far better if this amendment were dropped, and the Bill adopted as it now stands. I am ready to give my assent to the Bill as calculated to establish confidence and promote the general interest of the trade, but it has its defects, and these defects, no doubt, will appear in the working of the measure, and future years will bring future changes.

I might say that I have some sympathy for the railway company in its refusal to be absolutely under the dictation of the grain commissioner provided for under this Bill. There ought to be some control in the hands of the railway company with regard to the number of buildings to be constructed on its property or right of way. The company regards this as clothing the commissioner with absolute power and dictation, and putting the railway company absolutely into his hands. That part of the Bill does not appeal to my judgment. I also object to subjecting the interests of the country to the dictation of any one individual, however well he may be chosen by the government. I do not think it is safe to put so much power into the hands of a single grain commissioner. The Royal Commission, and those who drafted this Bill, followed largely the Minnesota Act, and I am surprised that they did not follow that Act more closely, and instead of asking the government to appoint a single grain commissioner, have asked for the appointment of a grain commission as is provided for in the Minnesota Act.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. At page 12 of the commissioner's report, they advise that only one commissioner be appointed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am only expressing my surprise that the commission did not follow the example set in the Minnesota Act, and advise the appointment of a commission instead of a commissioner. I should be glad, personally, to see a commission of five individuals, for example, a railway expert—because the railways have interests to be looked after in such work as the commissioner is called upon to perform—a legal man and three grain men. Such a board would be more likely to handle successfully the many questions which should come under the notice of such commission and do better justice to all parties than could be expected from any one individual. And we know how, when a commissioner of this kind is to be appointed, there will be a dozen worn-out politicians who will press their claims for appointment, even though they may not know wheat from barley. With such men looking after the position the interest of the country may not be properly maintained. Now, if the railway company is exceedingly anxious to curtail the demand for flat warehouses, I would like to suggest an amendment that would have that effect. In clause 53, in the third line, instead of leaving it to read as at present 'where cleaning is done, have ample opportunity, if they so desire, of personally ascertaining the net weight of the cleaned grain if facilities exist for doing so,' make it read, 'in all elevators have ample opportunity,' and so on. This will provide that all elevators shall have facilities for cleaning grain and this grain shall be cleaned in the presence of the man who offers it for sale. If this were done it would remove the question of dockage wholly from the region of private judgment to the region of actual fact. And I know that the opinion of the commissioners was that there should be an end to all controversy. It is objected to this proposal that it would put the milling companies to a great deal of expense. We have heard the statement made that it would require one milling company to expend something like $200,000. I took the trouble, this forenoon, to look up the number of elevators possessed by the Ogilvie Milling Company, which is a fair example. They have no cleaning apparatus in their elevators. At present, according to the Grain Exchange Report for the current year, they have forty-five elevators. The cleaning machinery for an elevator, as manufactured and sold by the Stratford Company, which gives us the quotation, can be put on board the cars for something like $165. That would mean an expenditure for the Ogilvie Milling Company of $7,425. Then, to accommodate the new machinery, a lean-to would have to be added to the elevator at a cost of perhaps $50 each; an addition of $2,250, or a total of $9,675. Suppose that they were asked to spend $12,000 in putting in this modern machinery, which is capable of cleaning 1,000 bushels an hour, and the buildings to accommodate it. They have to-day much lumber which has been used in the construction of their platforms which are only a public nuisance to the farmers on account of the heavy grades they present and the difficulty of getting over them. If they took the lumber in the platforms and used it to make a lean-to for each elevator, a good deal of expense would be saved. The farmers could then drive up to the elevator on the level and empty his load into the hopper. The grain would be weighed in sight of the farmer, and he would know his gross weight. It would then be cleaned, and he would know his net weight. He would also have an opportunity of having the cleanings weighed in his presence. And all these figures would appear on the face of his certificate, so that he would return to his home with the conviction that he had received justice, that it was no longer a matter of judgment concerning which there might be difference of opinion between him and the purchaser. It would be an end to all strifes. If such facilities were provided, there would be very little demand for flat warehouses. I do not wish to detain the House longer. If the Bill is allowed to pass without amendment, I believe it will be a general public benefit; but I do not wish to see it added to or mutilated any further.

Mr. DOUGLAS.

Mr. DAVIN. May I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Douglas) a question? I understand him to be supporting the contention that I made the other night. Surely, with the opinion he has expressed, he wants further amendments of the Bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would have no objection to seeing clause 53 amended, but I do not want any further additions to clause 40. I would agree to have subsection 8 of clause 40 struck out.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I have listened with a great deal of interest to the statements made in favour of this proposed amendment as well as to those in opposition to it, and I must say I am not prepared to take the ground taken by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), that there is no common interest between the carriers and the producers. I think there is a common interest and that the railway companies are most vitally interested in the development of the country. There are none who are so likely to suffer from any failure on the part of the producers who are creating that country. Let production stop, let any course be taken that obstructs development or hinders the raising of grain in that great north-western country, and those who will suffer most severely are the railway companies, the carriers. I hold, as the right hon. Prime Minister has said in presenting this amendment, that there is a common interest between the producers and the carriers, and that it is desirable that the Bill shall be so framed as to be just in its operation both to the railway company and to the great farming population. I listened with great attention to the statement of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), that this matter had assumed such importance that a Royal Commission was appointed and went through the country from end to end investigating this question in all its bearings and made a report, which report he eulogized in the strongest terms and said that the House could safely rest upon the judgment of the commissioners. Well, my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue took up that report and founded a Bill upon it, and we find that this Bill has been drawn upon the lines recommended by that Royal Commission, and it appears to me that fact ought to have great weight with the House. The Royal Commission have taken the whole subject into consideration, and it is quite evident to any person who peruses the report of that commission that they have given the most close and careful attention to the necessities and interests of the great farming population.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Will my hon. friend allow me to remark that there were three farmers on that commission, besides a judge, who was chairman.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am obliged to my hon. friend for the information. The fact adds immense strength to the report of the commission, because a commission composed of three farmers out of four members is not very likely to fail in making such recommendations as would absolutely be to the advantage of the farming population. Under these circumstances, I feel that the greatest possible weight should be attached to the report. Now, what do they recommend? The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) declares that the railway company should provide, not one, two, three, six, a dozen flat warehouses at a station, and he might have gone up to one hundred; he might, in fact, block up the whole station and prevent any business being done by occupying the whole space with flat warehouses. That is the very unreasonable proposal, as I think, of the member for Alberta. Having carefully listened to the discussion on both sides, I am bound to say that, in my judgment, this amendment is a reasonable one, and one that, I think, is in the interest of all classes and all parties in that country, and is calculated to secure its development. There is one provision in section 40 that I will allude to. It not only meets the recommendation of the commission, but it goes further and provides:

On a written application to the commissioner by ten farmers residing within forty miles of their nearest shipping point, he may give permission to any person to erect under the provisions of this Act, a flat warehouse, covered with metal, of not less than 3,000 bushels capacity, with power to enlarge the same should necessity require it at such different points.

That not only contains the recommendation of the Royal Commission, but it contains a provision that there may be, under certain circumstances, additional warehouses provided. But there is, I think, a necessary and proper proviso in the amendment that is offered to the House:

In the case of each such additional warehouse, the land upon which the building is to be erected, and the siding or spur required to reach it, shall be provided by or at the expense of the person or persons to whom the building belongs.

There is a provision that additional warehouses may be provided if the accommodation is not found sufficient; but, there is a further provision that the additional warehouses shall not take up the whole of the station grounds, as the hon. member for Alberta proposed to the House, but that at a convenient point the parties may be permitted to erect other warehouses, but the land on which they stand shall be provided by themselves and the railway connection shall be made by themselves. As the hon. gentleman who spoke last took his seat without having attempted to meet the argument of the Minister of Inland Revenue in support of this resolution, I come to the conclusion that it is a fair and just proposal, and I shall feel bound to give it my support.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. CALVERT. I beg to call the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), has not voted.

Mr. DAVIS. I am paired with the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Hale). If I had not been, I would have voted against the amendment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I beg to move an amendment :

That all the words after 'That'—

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Order.

Mr. DAVIN. What is the point of order ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The motion has been carried.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion that I do now leave the Chair has been carried.

Mr. DAVIN. Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, I want to argue the point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Mr. DAVIN. The motion that is carried is the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. No, let me read the motion, and the hon. gentleman will see at once :

That the order be discharged and that the Bill be recommitted for the purpose of inserting the following amendment:—

And so on.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, that is all right.

Mr. SPEAKER. That involves that I leave the Chair.

House resolved itself into committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) moved that the following words be added to clause 40 :

Except that in the case of each such additional warehouse, the land upon which the building is to be erected and the siding or spur required to reach it shall be provided by or at the expense of the person or persons to whom the building belongs.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Before this amendment is carried, I would like to call the attention of my hon. friends who have opposed it, to the fact that they have, in my estimation, misconceived altogether the object which it intends to serve. We realize very well, and for my part, I think I realize how important it is that the farmers of the North-west should have every facility to carry on their business and to ship their grain in the best manner that they deem to be conducive to their own interest. As to that there can be no two different opinions. We all recognize that they should have full liberty and full privileges. The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), said that the farmers of the North-west Territories claimed the right to handle their grain—if I took his words down correctly—absolutely free from any trammel. Whilst it is important to concede, and whilst there is every disposition to concede to the farmers of the North-west Territories every possible facility to handle their grain in a manner which is conducive to their best interests, free from any trammel, still, I believe the hon. gentleman will agree with me, when I say that there are some principles which, in this House, we cannot forget, and one of these principles is the sacred right of property. We find railway companies there; whether they have been subsidized too heavily or not, is not for me to discuss at this moment. I do not particularize or select the Canadian Pacific Railway for comparison, I do not care whether or not the railway companies have been too heavily subsidized. Whatever has been done in the past we recognize the principle that whatever property is now vested in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or any other company, is theirs, and must remain theirs under the law. There is no disposition. I am sure, on the part of the hon. member for Alberta to violate this principle of justice, of fairness, of British liberty, that every man is master in his own castle. That applies to corporations as well as to individuals. The rights which have been vested in railway companies by the power of this parliament are absolutely theirs, just as much as any property that has been bought and paid for. Here, we introduce legislation necessitated by the circumstances under which the transportation question has developed in the North-west. I stated this afternoon, and some objection was taken to my remarks, that there should be no hostility between one interest and another in the North-west Territories, that no one interest can claim to be independent of another. Under our system of civilization, every one is dependent upon his neighbour, every interest is dependent on another interest, and if you were to sever one interest from another, you would have a disruption that would lead to disorganization. My hon. friend remembers that the Plebians of Rome withdrew from the city to Mount Aventum, and they would have nothing more to do with the Patricians. A friend was sent to them, and he repeated to them the famous fable of the stomach. The stomach had to be fed to sustain the body, and everybody had to work for it, and unless the stomach was fed, the whole body would die of inanition. This comparison, trifling as it is, at the time, serves its purpose to-day, and my hon. friend must admit that in this matter, every man must look after, not only his own interest, but to some extent, the interest of his neighbour also. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), very justly remarked a moment ago, that the carriers and producers' interests are linked together. The interests of the producers are the interests of the carriers, and the interests of the carriers are the interests of the producers. And it must be so. While the railway had served its purpose to a large extent, the time has come, under the present development, when more accommodation is required by the producers. In the same way the elevators which were constructed in the early days of the settlement of the country, had served a very good purpose, and I put it to the fairness of my hon. friend, and to every one coming from the North-west Territories: Where would be the country, to-day, west of Lake Superior, but for the construction of the elevators? They served a legitimate purpose at the time, and the farmers were glad to have them. Now, under the development of the country, it is found that these elevators no longer adequately serve the purposes for which they were intended. New facilities must be given to the farmers to ship their grain. This Bill is intended to provide these facilities. This Bill provides, although there are elevators now at every station, that it shall be in the power of any ten farmers to build a flat warehouse. That is the provision of the Bill as it was introduced, and provision was made that it should be done under very advantageous conditions indeed. What are the conditions? It has been provided that every ten farmers can build a flat warehouse. Such flat warehouse shall be erected on the railway company's premises, whether the railway company are willing or not. They have the right to their own property, but still the law steps in, and says that the railway company shall, for the purposes of the public, be compelled to give a site for this flat warehouse. We evade the right of ownership and of property to the extent of the power that we have, under the law of eminent domain, in this parliament. We compel them to do that, and they submit to it. They submit also to give the location of a siding:

The railway company shall be compelled to give such location, with siding on its premises, in some place of convenient access, to be approved of by the commissioner, at a rental not greater than that charged to standard elevators.

Mr. DAVIN. What clause is that?

The PRIME MINISTER. Clause 40.

Mr. DAVIN. Is it in the first subsection?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes.

Such flat warehouse shall be erected on the railway company's premises after getting location of a siding, and the railway company shall be compelled to give such location, with siding on its premises, in some place of convenient access, to be approved of by the commissioner, at a rental not greater than that charged to standard elevators.

I call the attention of the committee to the last disposition:

At a rental not greater than that charged to standard elevators.

That means to say without compensation, because at the present time the rental paid by the standard elevators to the railway companies is purely nominal, being one dollar a year. The flat warehouse shall be allowed to come in under the same conditions :

—upon a rental to be paid not greater than that paid by the existing elevators.

Which is to say, free of charge. So that, under the law, whenever a flat warehouse is to be erected, the railway companies are bound to give the land, to furnish the site at a rental purely nominal, or free of charge. The railway companies agreed to this. But a new disposition is introduced. Some hon. members who come from the North-west Territories say that this is not sufficient, but that they want further privileges. They want the privilege for every ten farmers to build one, two, three, four, five, or any number of flat warehouses that may in their estimation, be necessary. They want the privilege to put up as many flat warehouses as they choose. But, the railway companies require their land and their yard space for their own business. The companies require a certain amount of space for carrying on their business. They claim the right to cover all the railway property at a little village with as many flat warehouses as they choose. It may be that the power will not be abused, but there is the power under the law to do this. The companies say: Very good, we agree to this, but if you are thus to take the power to evict us from our property, if you are to take possession of our property, not only to put up one flat warehouse, but two, or as many as you think fit, and if you want to build spurs and sidings, we think it is only fair that we should not be mulcted for the cost of them, we think that the party who wants to have this power should bear the expense necessary to carry out his intention. It is proposed that not only every ten farmers shall have the power under this clause to build a flat warehouse on the land of the company, but it is proposed to compel the company to give them the sidings that they need to do it. I ask any fair-minded man in this House, or out of this House: After you have compelled the company to give you a piece of land for the purpose of erecting a flat warehouse, after you have compelled the company to give you a siding also at the company's expense, is it not right and just that it should be done at the expense of the party for whose benefit it is intended?

My hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) spoke very warmly this afternoon; but if you compel a company to give up its land for your benefit and if you compel them to build a siding for your benefit at their own expense and without compensation, if that is not socialism I do not know what is. After all, socialism is taking the property of other people without their consent and without giving them compensation. If there is a principle which is embedded in British legislation ever since parliaments in Britain have been legislating, it is that every man is master of his own castle, and that you shall not compel a man to give up an inch of his property, even for public purposes, without adequate compensation. The railway company may have to expropriate a part of a farmer's land, and if this principle were carried out which is now in the Bill, that very farmer might get back a portion of the land without cost for the building of a flat warehouse. It seems to me that it is sufficient to place this fact before parliament to see how unfair and unjust the principle is. I am quite prepared to say that the farmers shall have every facility for shipping their grain and storing it at the stations, and that they shall build one flat warehouse or four flat warehouses or as many as are needed, but in the name of British justice I ask that the party who is evicted from his property shall have compensation for it, and that is the object of the amendment we have before us. I do not know but that the amendment may be susceptible of re-drafting, but what I insist upon at the present time is, the absolute and inherent justice of the principle which is embodied in that amendment.

Mr. DAVIN. After hearing the speech of the right hon. gentleman the committee will be thoroughly convinced that if the amendment is to do anything in the interest of the farmers of the North-west, it will require considerable re-drafting. The right hon. gentleman argued that the property of a railway company is precisely in the same position as the property of a private person, and he used language very important in this connection. He said: How are you going to compel the proprietor of property to do anything with that property that he does not wish to do. In the light of that, interpret this clause and what does it mean? It simply means that while it appears to concede the right to the farmers to get a second elevator at a certain point, yet in fact and in truth, the railway company can say: We will not grant you a second elevator because we will put up a prohibitory price on the land. The right hon. gentleman was very inconsistent because he argued against the absurdity of interfering with the rights of railway property to build a second warehouse, but he has no scruple about interfering with the same rights to build a first warehouse. If the property of a railway company is in the same position as the property of a private citizen, how are you going to interfere with the rights of property for one warehouse, and to say that you cannot touch the rights of property for a second warehouse. I do not see what principle there is in that. The real truth is—if my right hon. friend permits me to say so—the real truth is, that he entirely misapprehends the character of the property held by a railway, in England or in Canada. The way railway property is held in England is different from the way it is held here, and his broad proposition in regard to railway property would not be as true if applied to England. But, although railway property may be construed as of that extreme sort as the right hon. gentleman has described it; nevertheless it is a fact that under statute, and always in this parliament, we are in a position every day to interfere with that railway in the management of its property. You cannot give to a railway the right to build a line without divesting yourself of part of the sovereignty of the country. And in the case of a large railway over a vast extent of land you cannot part with that sovereignty in the same way as you part with a field, but you must part with it under conditions defined by statute, and these conditions are most vital to the community. We constantly see that railway companies in every country are fighting against the conditions laid down by parliament in the interests of the community. The right hon. gentleman made this syllogism. He said: The railway company might expropriate from a farmer a piece of land and you would compel that railway company to give that land back to the farmer. The very word 'expropriate' explains the matter. The railway company is able to get land because it is armed with powers to force that hypothetical farmer to sell that land whether he likes it or not, and to sell it at a fair valuation. Therefore, you cannot for one moment say that a railway company obtaining property in that way and originally getting a vast tract of land to run its line over, excluding every one else, is in the same position as a private person. The right hon. gentleman, as did his colleague the Minister of Inland Revenue, raised a bugaboo by stating that a village of these warehouses might be erected. You cannot erect one without having ten farmers within a radius of forty miles, and these ten would represent a large number of farmers who would use that warehouse. To get another warehouse you have to secure ten more farmers, with the number they would represent. Why, after you have your second warehouse you would have to bring your farmers from a distance that would certainly be within the radius of some other shipping point. Therefore, this bugaboo about a village of warehouses belongs to the region of the visionary and impracticable. The important point about the clause is, that really what it means is,—and you might as well put it in plain words—that no second warehouse shall be erected at any shipping point except on conditions to which as the railway wishes to agree. I will not say that that could not be argued, from the standpoint of certain gentlemen, to be a fairly reasonable arrangement, but it is not the arrangement that commends itself to the North-west Territories, and it is not the arrangement that will give the leverage which is desired. Now, I do not believe, if you make this elevator Bill what it should be, that within two years or within one year you will have within the length and breadth of Manitoba and the Territories, a single flat warehouse, and I will tell you why. If you make this Bill what it should be, you will provide for what Mr. Whyte, the manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway, said was so important, that is, that at the point of shipment the elevators must clean the grain, and why? Because, if it is not cleaned at the point of shipment, as Mr. Whyte saw, you make the farmer pay, not merely for the dockage, but also the freight on the dirt to Fort William. I ask the attention of the right hon. gentleman to this, because with the speech we have just listened to, we are bound to accept his description of his own standpoint, that his desire is to do the best he can for the farmers of the North-west Territories. Let me read what Mr. Whyte said before the commission:

This morning I gave you my reasons for the establishment of elevators. I am not saying now that the allowing of grain to be loaded from farmers' vehicles is the proper method of shipping grain, although it was free to every one this year to do so, and I have also given evidence that instructions were issued to our agents that preference was to be given in the supply of cars to farmers who wished to load direct from their own vehicles. Last year there were 804 cars shipped in this way, or slightly over 5 per cent of the total crop shipped. While we granted that privilege, I am not an advocate of increasing what I may term an improper way of handling the crop. I also mentioned this morning one of the reasons why the railway company went into the arrangement with the elevators was that the wheat might be cleaned.

In passing, let me point out that this statement of Mr. Whyte furnishes another argument against the position taken by the right hon. gentleman and against this clause. Notwithstanding that the railway company had arrangements with the elevator companies, embodied in deeds and documents, solemnly signed and sealed, binding itself to take the grain only through them, why was it the railway company took wheat from the farmers direct? For this reason, that no doubt the lawyers of the Canadian Pacific Railway advised Mr. Whyte that no such deeds and documents could take away from the farmer his common law right of going to a common carrier and saying to him, you must take my grain. So that, the right hon. gentleman will see that the weight of the argument is very much against him. This is what Mr. Whyte further says:

The railway company believe that it is in the interest of the farmer to have his wheat put on the market in as good shape as possible. They have no wish to make money out of hauling seeds and dirt from the point of shipment to Fort William.

If the railway company has no wish to do so, a fortiori the North-west farmer has no wish to pay for hauling dirt from the point of shipment to Fort William. I thought, the other night, in the early part of the discussion, that my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue was going to accept my amendment; but, afterwards, when we went into committee, I saw that I had misunderstood him, for he then argued that it would be a great hardship to the elevator companies to compel them to put cleaners in their elevators. I said then that I had consulted with a scientific person, who had told me that the cost of these cleaners would be trifling; but since then I have had a friend go to those who supply such cleaners and to those who buy them, and I have found that the cost is from $150 to $165. The hon. gentleman who spoke on the other side seems to have got some one to make similar inquiries for him, and he entirely confirms what I stated. Mr. Whyte goes on:

Q. There are two of the companies that do not pretend to clean the wheat at all?—A. Yes, but they don't haul it as far.

Mr. Whyte is a large-minded man, and is on the spot, and he knows, speaking broadly, that the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the interest of the farmer are one. But, I must say I thought the right hon. gentleman was indulging in a fallacy that must surely have been patent to himself, when he declared, as he seemed to do, that in all cases the interest of the railway, the interest of the elevator company and the interest of the farmer are one. That cannot be, because the farmer on a certain occasion is a seller and the elevator man a buyer, while on another occasion the Canadian Pacific Railway is a seller and the farmer a buyer; the Canadian Pacific Railway sells freight, and the farmer buys it. Under these circumstances I defy you to say that their interests are the same. The interests of buyers and sellers are supposed to be antagonistic, as the buyer wants to get as much as he can for his money and the seller wants to get as much money as he can for what he sells. Of course, in a large sense, the interests of a great corporation like the Canadian Pacific Railway and the interests of every man in the North-west Territories are bound up together, and I will say here, what I have frequently said before, that no corporation has ever been endowed with such powers as the Canadian Pacific Railway have been and used those enormous powers with such moderation. Mr. Whyte said:

We have a greater interest than making money out of hauling dirt. We want to see the farmers making money and contented.

Why, because the more money the farmer has the more he will travel and the more he will buy, and the more freight for which he will pay. The right hon. the First Minister's argument was in itself a fallacy, namely, that the moment a farmer goes to buy a ticket, it is in the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway to get as much for that ticket as they can.

Mr. DAVIN.
