A consideration of the highest importance in his opinion is that, under this new regime the colonial trade in cattle and meat would assume an enormous development, and that the competition among the various colonies—to which this duty would give a new stimulus—would tend to keep the prices down, and that it would be aided by the imports of duty on free cattle.

He then deals with the effect of the levying of a duty on the imports of meats of all kinds, such as bacon, hams, &c.

As hon. gentlemen know, Great Britain has to depend, for her food supplies, upon outside markets. In 1894, the imports from foreign countries were valued at the immense sum of £15,532,545, and from the colonies only at £3,878,085. The duty proposed by Mr. Colmer is 1s. 4d. per hundredweight, and he contends that it would hardly have any effect upon the price of meat. This is a point which ought to be taken into consideration, for, if that duty tends to keep the prices down, the objection raised against it are thereby obviated.

He then deals with the cheese question. A noteworthy fact is that a larger quantity of cheese is imported from the colonies than from foreign countries. He suggests to impose a duty of 1s. 6d. per hundredweight on that article, or a little more than a farthing per 2 lbs. In his opinion, the cheese from the colonies, remaining duty free, would dominate the market, and thus, the colonies would have the almost exclusive control of the British market for that article, which is so highly prized in England.

Butter is one of the 18 articles included in the list for which he advocates a preference in favour of the colonies. The trade in that product, in which Canada is so deeply interested, has been rapidly developing of late years. In 1894, the British imports of butter from foreign countries were valued at £11,932,149, and from the colonies at £1,524,550. The duty suggested by Mr. Colmer on that article is 2s. 6d. per hundredweight, or about 1 farthing a pound. Here again he says that owing to the powerful impetus which the imposition of this duty would give to colonial trade and to competition with foreign products on the British markets, the price of butter would not be increased.

Wheat is another article in which Canada is greatly concerned, and it is also included in Mr. Colmer's proposition. The British imports of wheat from foreign countries in 1894 were valued at £15,459,543, and from the colonies at £3,300,962 only. The proposed duty is insignificant, as it would amount to one shilling per quarter of 480 lbs., and would produce considerable revenue. This duty, he says, is not likely, in view of past experience, to in any way add to the price of bread.

Flour is an article which Great Britain imports to a considerable extent, and those imports go on increasing from year to year. In 1894, the British imports of flour from foreign countries were valued at £7,488,044, and from the colonies at £506,629 only. The duty proposed is 4½d. per hundredweight, and it would yield a considerable revenue to Great Britain, without, in the opinion of men who advocate this system, in any way adding to the cost of flour or making bread dearer to the English workers. The price of bread, they contend, varies very little, being free from those fluctuations which occur in the price of wheat and flour. In the opinion of economists, the competition would be so acute that there would be no increase in the price of those commodities. As to the other articles mentioned in the list, they are articles in which the other colonies are chiefly concerned.

Mr. Colmer shows what effect the imposition of that duty would have on the general trend of British trade. He shows that this measure would place the colonies upon a more favourable footing than foreign countries. Taking as a basis the imports of 1894, I find that, from the levying of the duties suggested by Mr. Colmer, Great Britain would raise a revenue of about £2,700,000. Such is the extent of that revolution in the fiscal policy of England, about which we have heard so much from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. WALLACE. As it is now near midnight, I would suggest that the debate be adjourned.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Does the hon. gentleman wish to adjourn the debate?

Mr. MONK. Yes; I move the adjournment of the debate.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Well, at this hour I think the hon. gentleman is entitled to an adjournment.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, April 23, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE LATE MR. HALEY, M.P.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to have to announce to the House that death has claimed another victim from the ranks of this parliament. Our colleague, Dr. Haley, member for Hants, N.S., after a long and protracted illness bravely borne by him, is now no more. So far as our deceased friend was personally concerned, death was, perhaps, a relief, because he has been enduring very great suffering for the last weeks and months of his life. Mr. Haley was a comparatively new member of this House as he came in with this parliament, but for years he was well known throughout his province, and had been long engaged in political life. The members from his province, who knew him well, will bear testimony, that though our late friend was a strong party man, he was always a most fair opponent, and those of us who have been associated with him in this parliament will all be happy to remember, that although engaged in party strife on the floor of this House, he had none but personal friends. Mr. Haley was one of those men who are so happily disposed that whilst they can always maintain their own views with great force and vigour, still they can do so in such a way as to offend nobody. I am sure that on both sides of this House he leaves nothing but most sincere friends, and I can express the sympathy of all when I say that we unite in offering our condolence to his bereaved family, to whom his loss is irreparable.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). In common with the right hon. the leader of the House I regret deeply that it is our painful duty to again refer to the loss of another member of this parliament. Mr. Haley came from my native province, and as has been said, he was well and widely known there. I may say that not only as regards this House, but as regards the province whence he came, no person who knew him failed to respect him. While discharging his duty to his party and to his country according to the light he had, Dr. Haley possessed the happy faculty of performing these duties firmly, and at the same time in so kind a manner as to secure the regard and most kindly feeling of every member on both sides of this House. The loss to his family, of course, is irreparable, and I am sure that every member will join in tendering their most heartfelt sympathy to those he has left behind in the sad loss they have sustained. I am glad to learn that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister proposes, as a mark of esteem, that this House should adjourn for the purpose of enabling us to pay a final testimony of respect to our friend and colleague, in following his remains on the first stage towards their last resting place.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). May I add a word to what has been so feelingly said by the right hon. the Prime Minister and by the hon. the leader of the opposition. Dr. Haley's death will be felt as a personal loss to all who had the pleasure of knowing him in this House, and will be particularly felt by the members from his own province, and to none more than to myself, whose privilege it was to know him intimately. I had an association of a quarter of a century with my friend Dr. Haley, and during the greater part of that time we have been together in public life. I entered the legislature of Nova Scotia on the same day as he did; for nine years we sat together, and when after a short time of absence from public life he came to Ottawa, fate ordained that I should come here too. While a strong party man, Dr. Haley was of such genial temperament and such moderate views that his life was well calculated to soften the asperities which sometimes enter into political affairs. It is well, Mr. Speaker, that we have such men in public life, who are able to draw both sides of politics more closely together in human friendship. In private life Dr. Haley was known as an enterprising and public-spirited citizen, who was ever ready to lend his efforts and his means to whatever objects seemed best for the good of Canada. While the loss to his family is beyond repair, it will, I am sure, be a great comfort to them to know that the right hon. the leader of the House and the hon. the leader of the opposition have spoken of him to-day in such a kind and sympathetic manner, and that the House is willing to suspend its labour for an hour in order that we may pay the last tribute of respect to our departed friend. This will be another evidence of the desire of hon. members on both sides to do honour to the memory of our departed friend, who was in every way worthy of our confidence and esteem.

The PRIME MINISTER. I beg to offer my thanks to the hon. the leader of the opposition, who has so readily assented to the suggestion—made in his absence to the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster)—that the House should suspend its sitting from this time until five o'clock. The remains of Dr. Haley will leave the Russell House at four o'clock, to be conveyed to the railway station, and the House will resume at five o'clock.

The House then took recess until five o'clock.

House resumed at five o'clock.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to rise to a question of privilege. On Friday last, when speaking on the budget, I made reference to two large industries in the county which I have the honour to represent—one a manufactory of gloves, the other a large industry for tanning sole leather, belting leather and harness leather. After having spoken at some length with reference to the glove industry, I made reference to the large tanning industry, and stated that from 150 to 175 men were walking the streets because their wages had been reduced. Unfortunately, in the report that appeared in some of the newspapers, my remarks were somewhat misunderstood. It was made to appear that the men who were on strike were the employees of the glove industry instead of those of the tanning industry. I do not wish that any injury should come to any firm as a result of my remarks being misunderstood, and I desire explicitly to say that the men engaged in the glove industry are harmoniously at work, perfectly satisfied with the wages being paid to them by their employer; but that the dissatisfaction to which I referred had reference entirely to the men engaged in the large tanning industry for the tanning of sole leather, harness and belting leather.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Prior) the other day called my attention to the subject of Japanese immigration. I have received from the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce a communication on this subject, which I will convey to him and to the House:

With reference to Mr. Prior's statement as to the number of Japanese arriving, I beg to state that so far as the 'Riojun Maru' is concerned, the number she brought on the last trip reported to this department was 310, 99 of whom were in transit to other countries.

Possibly she is about due again, and may have a larger number on board, but as yet we have no report of her arrival. We invariably get reports, as per form inclosed, in due course by mail immediately on the arrival of any vessel bringing either Chinese or Japanese.

Further, with reference to Mr. Prior's statement that in his opinion they were without doubt paupers, I beg to remark that no emigrant is allowed to leave Japan except under government supervision, and under guarantee as to his character, and I am confident that no pauper would be allowed to leave Japan, as he would not be able to furnish the guarantee required.

My observation goes to show that although a large number of Japanese usually arrive at this season of the year, the bulk of them are in transit to other countries.

The two last Japanese steamers reported, which arrived in March last, brought respectively 215, of whom 81 were in transit, and 548, of whom 298 were in transit.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

WELLAND CANAL—DYNAMITE EXPLOSION.

Mr. GEORGE E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals if he has any late information as to the amount of damage which is supposed to have been done on the Welland Canal by dynamiters?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I think, Mr. Speaker, that I am in possession of all the information which there is to be had on the subject. Following the occurrence which was duly made known in the public press, instructions were forwarded to the superintendent of the canal to have made what further examination would be required in order to ascertain the precise extent of injury that had been done. This necessitated the employment of divers to make the inspection, and I am happy to say that the result shows that nothing has been seriously injured with the exception of the gates, which will have to be replaced. We have gates on hand, however, and they will be put in place so that the canal will be opened at the date intended. The damage to the walls has not been very serious. Hon. members may rest assured that the canal will be opened at the time fixed for the opening, the 25th inst.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the minister any late information as to whether any light has been thrown on the matter by the examination of the men in custody?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No. The prisoners have been taken to Welland. There has been no examination of them at all, and no new or fresh facts of any importance have been elicited. There has been an enlargement of the examination, I believe, for eight days.

INQUIRIES FOR REPORTS AND RETURNS.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. As the Postmaster General is in his seat, I beg to ask him when his report will be brought down.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). On Thursday.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.). I would like to ask the Postmaster General when the return that was asked for on the 2nd of April with regard to the dismissal of Mr. Jones, late postmaster at Kamloops, will be brought down.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will make inquiries.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 121) respecting the Ontario Power Company of Niagara Falls.—(Mr. Flint.)

Bill (No. 117) respecting the National Sanitarium Association.—(Mr. Maclean.)

Bill (No. 129)—from the Senate—to incorporate the Canadian Steel Company.—(Mr. Calvert.)

Bill (No. 111) respecting the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 122) respecting the Lake Erie and Detroit River Railway Company.—(Mr. McGregor.)

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 131)—from the Senate—for the relief of Edwin James Cox.—(Mr. Montague.)

I.C.R.—MR. JOSEPH RYAN.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Morin) asked :

1. Was Mr. Joseph Ryan, foreman of the Intercolonial Railway shops at Hadlow Cove, Lévis, authorized to leave his work in order to engage in revising the lists on April 9 last?

2. What is his salary?

3. Has he been granted an increase within the past twelve months?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). In reply, I beg to say : 1. Mr. Joseph Ryan, foreman of the Intercolonial Railway shops at Hadlow Cove, Lévis, was not authorized to leave his work in order to engage in revising the lists on April 9 last, and the department has no knowledge that he did so. 2. Mr. Ryan's salary is $70 a month. 3. He was granted an increase of $10 a month in August, 1899.

I.C.R.—MR. FELIX PICHETTE.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Morin) asked :

1. Does Mr. Felix Pichette keep the refreshment table at the Intercolonial Railway station at Lévis?

2. What was his tender in 1897?

3. How much did he pay in each of the years 1898 and 1899, and how much does he now pay?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). In reply, I beg to say : 1. There being no dining room at Lévis, Felix Pichette who already had the contract for the news agency, &c., was given permission to keep a refreshment counter at Lévis station. 2. He made no tender in 1897. There was a public tender in December, 1896, and Pichette was given the contract for one year from January 1, 1897, at his tender price $520, which was the highest tender. 3. He paid in each of the years 1897, 1898 and 1899, $520 for each year. He now pays $420, since the Grand Trunk Railway retired from the Lévis station.

MR. J. A. OUELLET.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Morin) asked :

1. Is Mr. J. A. Ouellet, mail clerk at Lévis, a permanent employee?

2. Was he appointed to the duty of revising the lists at Lévis?

3. Has he been granted an increase of salary recently, or is he to receive such an increase at the request of the hon. member for Lévis?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). In reply, I beg to say : 1. Mr. Agapit Ouellet, whose duties are to be at the railway station at Lévis for the purpose of effecting the transfer of the mails between the trains and the railway station and where necessary from one mail train to another, and to superintend the handling of the British mails, going with them to and from the Quebec post office where necessary, is not an employee of the department at all, but a contractor under a memorandum of agreement with the department. 2. The department having no supervision over its contractors beyond what is necessary for the proper performance of the duties prescribed in the contract, has no knowledge of how Mr. Ouellet spends his time when he is not engaged with his contract. The duties mentioned in the question are not among the requirements of the contract. 3. There has been no increase in the amount paid Mr. Ouellet since the agreement came into operation on January 1, 1898.

LENGTHENING OF LEVIS GRAVING DOCK.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Morin) asked :

1. Has Mr. Thomas Power, contractor, executed a contract for lengthening the graving dock at Lévis?

2. What is the amount?

3. Is the work to be done by the day?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). In reply, I beg to say : 1. Yes. 2. $94,976. 3. No.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. DUGAS (by Mr. Morin) asked :

Has Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Prime Minister of Canada, taken cognizance of the following report, published by the Winnipeg 'Free Press' within the last few days, and republished by 'La Presse,' of Montreal, on the 14th instant :—

City Catholic School Question—Taking over five schools proposed to Winnipeg Board—A sub-committee appointed—A free interchange of views in a friendly spirit—The Clergy said to favour the proposed settlement.

A special meeting of the Public School Board was held last evening to receive a proposition from the supporters of the five Catholic schools of the city. The trustees present were Messrs. Bole, chairman ; Carman, Byrnes, Dr. Benson, Ross, Dulmage, Roberts, Horne, Browne, Fowler, McKechnie and McKechnie. Mr. McKechnie was applauded as he took his seat, this being his first appearance since the accident which befel him during his absence. The Catholic committee was composed of Messrs. J. G. Carroll, chairman; P. Marrin, secretary, and T. D. Deegan.

Mr. Bole, chairman of the board, introduced the object of the meeting by stating that last week two gentlemen of the Catholic School Board had called on him and told him they had a proposition to lay before the Public School Board, and expressed a desire that an early meeting be held to give them an opportunity of doing so. Hence the present meeting had been called. The gentlemen in attendance were Catholics, representing the Catholic people of the city of Winnipeg, who constituted a very large portion of the rate-paying public, and had a perfect right to a courteous and patient hearing, which he was sure the board would accord. The Catholics of Winnipeg had certain views on public education; they had a perfect right to their views, and he was quite sure their opinions would be respected. Addressing the deputation, the chairman stated that, so far as he knew, the individual members of the board were all Protestants; but, as the board had no religious affiliations and represented the whole people, he was of opinion that the law under which they were conducting the school affairs of the city would enable parents of all classes, Jew and Gentile, to elect to send their children to schools where they would be safe from interference with their religious faith. It was the desire of all classes to break down the line of difference that existed; the board would receive the delegation kindly, and the discussions would be carried on in the very best and most harmonious manner. He did not know what proposition was to be made; he had purposely avoided knowing, because of the trouble he had got into a couple of years ago. The board would give the matter the very best consideration, and let the delegation know their decision at an early date.

Mr. J. G. Carroll, chairman of the delegation, introduced the secretary, Mr. P. Marrin, and called upon him to read the proposition. He said they were making the offer in the most public-spirited way, and he thought the proposition they had to lay before the board embodied it very well.

The Proposition.

Mr. Marrin then read the proposition, as follows:—

To the Chairman and Members of the Winnipeg Public School Board:

Gentlemen.—The undersigned, on behalf of the Catholics of Winnipeg, beg leave to submit to your board for its just and favourable consideration the following:—

1. There are at present in the immediate neighbourhood 700 Catholic children attending the separate schools of Winnipeg, and upwards of 200 more who attend no school at all.

2. The Catholics of Winnipeg have for almost ten years past borne their portion of taxation for the erection and maintenance of the Winnipeg public schools, from which, for conscientious reasons, they are unable to derive any benefit for the education of their children.

3. That while thus paying their share of taxes towards the public schools of Winnipeg for the period above stated, they have had to assume the additional obligation of providing and maintaining schools for the education of their own children, and that despite all their efforts and sacrifices the double tax thus imposed has pressed so heavily upon them that their schools are now burdened with a heavy indebtedness.

Mr. DUGAS.

4. The city separate schools are now provided with teachers holding certificates from the Provincial Department of Education.

5. The Catholics of Winnipeg are willing to accept the public schools' system of inspection.

Therefore do we, on their behalf, request your board to rent our schools, retain the teachers now employed to teach in said schools and to assume the payment of their salaries and the expense of equipping and maintaining the said schools with the understanding that our children shall enjoy the right of attending thereat.

The registered attendance since September at the undermentioned schools is as follows: St. Mary's Academy, 191; Brother's School, 196; Holy Angels, 99; St. Joseph's, 70; Immaculate Conception, 175; total, 729.

The chairman inquired whether the deputation had anything to say in support of the proposal.

Mr. Carroll answered that the resolution covered the ground pretty fully, and they simply submitted it for consideration. They were ready to answer any question.

The chairman then read the document clause by clause, and a number of questions were asked and answered, and remarks made by both parties.

The chairman asked if the teachers referred to were regularly qualified.

Mr. Carroll answered: Yes.

Is there any proposition as to basis of rental, was asked in reference to the schools.

No, was the answer, we didn't discuss that; we thought it might be arranged on a percentage of the value of the properties.

Dr. Benson—Is it the intention to have this board rent the whole of the schools used by the Roman Catholics? Are you prepared, if we want for instance, St. Mary's Academy, to rent that whole building, the grounds and everything in connection with it as a school; and, if necessary, to take down your own emblems on the school and in it and give us full possession?

Mr. Carroll—That is a question which never arose. That school is a boarding school; a large portion is used for private purposes. He asked if it would not be possible to rent the portion that is used for public school purposes.

Dr. Benson did not think so, as the law makes the board responsible for buildings, grounds and everything on them. He asked the same question regarding the Immaculate Conception School.

Mr. Carroll asked if the board had not already leased rooms without having control of the whole building in which they were?

Dr. Benson thought not. He mentioned the Presbyterian Sunday School, the St. John's School-house, the English Church School in Fort Rouge; in every case the board had the whole building and the grounds.

Mr. Carroll thought that, although the question had not come into their minds, if the board were liberally disposed, it was possible the matter might be arranged in the near future. He understood it was the intention some day in the near future to erect another convent at an outside point.

Dr. Benson thought the board could not rent until such arrangements were made. He suggested that the fence be removed at the St. Mary's School and the grounds united with those of the Carleton School. At the Holy Angels and St. Joseph Schools the grounds and buildings could be had.

The chairman suggested that a sub-committee of the board meet a sub-committee of the Catholic board and see what could be done. The law lays down plainly that the board shall not assume responsibility for buildings which it does not control.

In answer to Mr. Carman, Mr. Marrin stated that in St. Mary's Boys' Schools there are four rooms with four teachers and about two hundred pupils—in the Holy Angels School there are two rooms.

Dr. Benson suggested that the deputation let the board know in writing whom they represented, if they represented the board of Catholic schools not authorized by law; if they had been elected by the clergy or the church, or by the voice of the public. He thought the board should have communication from the head of that church, stating his willingness to accept the settlement.

Mr. Carroll—Our authority is the Catholic ratepayers; we are acting as the laity. We come with the best of good feeling. We feel that there is a school law now that we can fairly take advantage of; and that by having a good, friendly feeling that we can overcome some of the difficulties. We are coming to make a request, and we want in every way to assist to settle the question. We will allow our children to attend school under the supervision of your own board. We also have certified teachers. The matter of detail as to grounds and separate buildings, I think, it can be arranged later on.

Mr. Dulmage—Is it your intention to allow a redistribution of the children by our inspector in case the schools are taken over; to allow us to put Protestant children in them and Catholic children somewhere else?

Mr. Carroll—The communication sets that forth.

Dr. Benson suggested a difficulty about retaining the present teachers. He did not think it could be meant or that the board would entertain the idea of them for ever and having no control over them. Besides, he added, there are more teachers than we employ for the same number of pupils. We could not very well take the teachers just as they are, some of whom would be clad in the uniform of the Sisters, which they would not discard.

Mr. Fowler—How many female and how many male teachers have you?

Mr. Marrin—Four male and fourteen female teachers.

Mr. Horne—If the proposition be accepted by the school board, will that settlement be acceptable to the clergy?

Mr. Carroll—I think I can take it upon myself to say yes, positively. This is absolutely a proposition from the laity, the Catholic ratepayers; but it would be acceptable to the clergy on the lines proposed.

Mr. Horne saw a difficulty in the uniform or surplices, worn by the Sisters. The schools would become public schools, and it would be the board's duty to see that no uniforms of any denominational distinction would be worn in those schools.

Mr. Carman asked if the retaining of all those teachers was absolutely necessary. Would it be absolutely necessary to take over the uniformed teachers?

Mr. Carroll—I don't think so, or that it would be absolutely necessary to take over all the teachers, that is a matter of detail. What we positively ask is, that you take over the schools at a rental and employ our teachers.

Dr. Benson pointed out that plenty of regularly qualified Roman Catholic young lady teachers were to be had, and that these might be fully as good as the present teachers. He did not see how they were to get over the difficulty of the clause in the Provincial Act, which provides that there shall be no separation of pupils by religious denominations except at the hour allowed for religious instruction.

Mr. Deegan referred to clause 4 of the Act, making provision that where there are forty Catholic pupils in any school, a Catholic teacher shall be engaged. He said, we ask you to interpret it liberally. In the suggestion as to a sub-committee, if it were carried out, they might discuss the matter more fully. Roman Catholic parents wanted their young girls educated by the teachers of their own sex. He was not aware of anything in the School Act that would debar the costume of the Sisters, but that was a matter that could be inquired into. They came in a spirit of conciliation, feeling that this is a time when they could try to live in peace. They wanted the board to put themselves in their places, view the matter from their standpoint and apply the golden rule.

Mr. Marrin asked what clause in the Act provided for costume.

It was replied that there is nothing in the Act.

Dr. Benson said he did not look upon clause 4 as Mr. Deegan did, and clause 7 was very clear. Under Mr. Deegan's interpretation, if it were rigidly enforced the Protestant teacher would have to be dismissed and a Roman Catholic appointed, where any one teacher is needed, for the Act says a Roman Catholic shall be employed. He (Dr. Benson) had been one of the first to favour the employment of Roman Catholic teachers; four were employed at first and since that the schools had never been without such teachers, and he hoped never would be.

Mr. Horne said all sympathized with the Catholics in their disadvantage of having to pay double taxes. No one would be more delighted to see the matter settled than himself.

Dr. Benson moved, Mr. Roberts seconding, and it was carried, that the chairman nominate three or more representatives of the Roman Catholic citizens to go over the matter carefully with a view to an arrangement to be submitted to the board at its next meeting.

Mr. Fowler thought it would be wiser to decide on the principle of the question at once, and vote whether the board was prepared to grant the petition; but the board did not favour this scheme.

Mr. Bole appointed as the sub-committee Messrs. Byrnes, Fowler, McKechnie and Dr. Benson.

Mr. Carroll thanked the board for the reception of the deputation, and the meeting adjourned.

Does the hon. Prime Minister still persist in saying that he has settled the Manitoba School question as to do full and complete justice to the Catholics of that province as he had promised to do?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: The Prime Minister has taken cognizance of the petition of the Roman Catholic ratepayers to the chairman and members of the Winnipeg Public School Board, to have their schools taken over by the said board; he has also taken cognizance of the report of the proceedings which took place when the said petition was presented to the board, and especially of the following statements made by the petitioners: 'Our authority is the Catholic ratepayers; we are acting as the laity. We come with the best of good feeling. We feel that there is a school law that we can fairly take advantage of; and that by having a good, friendly feeling that we can overcome some of the difficulties. * * * * This is absolutely a proposition from the laity, the Catholic ratepayers; but it would be acceptable to the clergy on the lines proposed.' The Prime Minister is more than ever of opinion that the Manitoba school question has been settled in a manner to do to the Catholics of that province the fullest and most complete justice that was possible under existing circumstances, especially as it appears that the Roman Catholics are willing to take advantage of the new law, and only ask to have it liberally administered by the provincial authorities, a demand in which all good citizens will heartily concur.

MAIL CONTRACT—ST. GEDEON.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Sir Adolphe Caron) asked:

1. Whether the contract for carrying the mail between the railway station and the post office of St. Gédéon, in the county of Chicoutimi, has expired?
2. If so, has it been renewed, and since when?
3. Who is entrusted with the service, what is the price, and for what period of time?
4. What was the amount under the contract?
5. Is it the intention to renew the contract by tender, and when?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The contract for the mail service between the post office and railway station at St. Gédéon, expired on the 31st March, and is being carried on temporarily by the contractor, Mr. George Potvin, on the same terms and conditions, pending the consideration by the department of the future arrangements for the service. The rate of pay is 19½ cents per trip.

SUBSIDY TO CHATEAUGUAY AND NORTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. GAUTHIER (by Mr. Talbot) asked:

Whether it is the intention of the government to grant a subsidy, this year, in aid of the construction of the Chateauguay and Northern Railway, which is intended to connect Montreal, L'Assomption and Joliette?

Is it also the intention of the government to help the said company to construct a bridge over River des Prairies, between Bout-de-l'Île and Charlemagne?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The question of granting subsidies has not yet been disposed of by the government.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

FINES OF POSTAL CLERKS.

Mr. DUGAS (by Mr. Morin) asked:

How much has been paid in fines up to this date, since 1896, by mail clerks, in the postal districts of Montreal and Quebec?

Is the said sum paid into the pension fund of the said officials?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. $104.35. 2. No.

DOCK AT HAWKESTONE.

Mr. BENNETT (by Mr. Kaulbach) asked:

1. Who is the contractor for the dock to be constructed at Hawkestone, Ont., and what is the price?

2. How many tenders were received for such work, and what were the figures of the different parties tendering?

3. Who is the local inspector of the work, if such has been appointed, remuneration to be paid, his occupation or fitness for position, on whose recommendation was he appointed?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. W. J. Bryce, price $2,475. 2. Two, $2,475 and $2,675. 3. Mr. P. McLeod has been appointed local inspector at $2 a day. He is considered quite competent for the work. He was recommended by persons in whom the minister had confidence.

ROCHE FENDUE AND CALUMET DAMS.

Mr. POUPORE (by Mr. Wilson) asked:

Has the Minister of Railways and Canals taken any action, since last session, in relation to the several claims arising out of the construction of the Roche Fendue and Calumet dams in 1883, which remain unsettled?

If nothing has been done, is it the intention of the government to take the necessary steps to adjust all such legitimate claims?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The minister has been looking into these claims, but cannot now make any announcement as to which, if any, of them deserves favourable consideration.

WORKS AT RIVIERE DU LOUP.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON asked:

1. What amount of money was expended by the government, last summer, for the works executed in River du Loup, which flows through Louiseville and falls into Lake St. Peter?

2. Whether it is the intention of the government to carry out the said works to completion?

3. Under whose supervision have the works been executed and on the report of what engineer?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. $3,565.50. 2. Yes, to continue the dredging of the channel when required. 3. Under supervision of Superintendent of Dredging, and the immediate inspection of Mr. Sam. Lesage. No special report was required, as it was the reopening of an established channel.

TRADE WITH THE WEST INDIES.

Mr. KAULBACH asked :

In view of Trinidad's rejection of Canada's offer of trade relations with her, and the report of an offer made by the Trinidad legislature in favour of reciprocal trade arrangements with the United States, has the government of Canada, through the Secretary of State for the Colonies, had any correspondence, or made any approaches by way of request, as between sister colonies, by way of an order, that whatever preference any of her colonies or dependencies—British West India or any other of her possessions—wish to give to the American Republic must be extended to the Dominion of Canada?

Has the government of Canada made any request of the Imperial government, through the Colonial Secretary, that notice be given to all British colonies and her dependencies, that they are not to be permitted to engage in a trade treaty giving preferences to a foreign country, that in any way would interfere with intercolonial interests or trades, or that on which sister colonies could not be admitted on similar terms?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). This matter was fully considered some time ago, and satisfactory assurances were given that in any arrangement that might be made between the United States and the British West Indies, there would be no discrimination against Canada in the West India markets.

CONTRACTS WITH RAINY RIVER RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

Has the government entered into any contract with the Rainy River Railway Company for any portions of the line subsidized at last session of parliament? If so, what?

Has any money been yet paid on these contracts? Will the Minister of Railways bring down the contracts, if any?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Yes, the government has entered into several contracts with the Ontario and Rainy River Railway. 2. The contracts are: (a) From Port Arthur, Duluth and Western Railway to Rainy Lake, 80 miles. (b) From 80th Mile to Fort Francis, 140 miles. (c) From Fort Francis to mouth of Rainy River, 70 miles. 3. No money has been paid. 4. There will be no objection, if asked for.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the minister mean that he wants a formal motion?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, if the hon. gentleman wishes I will bring them down.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like them any time within ten days.

VISIT OF W. W. STUMBLES TO BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, letters and reports between the Marine and Fisheries Department and Mr. W. W. Stumbles, the agent of that department, in connection with his late visit to British Columbia.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I may say that a large portion of this report which is moved for, is confidential.

Mr. PRIOR. What I want to get at, is the report he has made on the fisheries in British Columbia.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have received an intimation from the Commissioner of Fisheries to the effect that this is a report which he considers confidential. I have not read it since it came, but he says he thinks it would not be proper to bring it down. I just tell the hon. gentleman this.

Motion agreed to.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS.

Copies of all papers, letters, telegrams, &c., between the Post Office Department or any member of the government, and any persons whatsoever, in connection with the dismissal of D. McLeod Vince from the postmastership of Woodstock, N.B. Also, for the report of the commission which inquired into the case, and the evidence taken.—(Mr. Hale, by Mr. Foster.)

Copies of all correspondence had by the government with the British authorities, and with all parties in Canada, relating to the purchase of hay for the troops in South Africa.—(Mr. Hale, by Mr. Foster.)

Copies of all correspondence, reports and papers between the Marine and Fisheries Department, or any other department or minister of the government, and any person or persons in connection with the prohibition of exportation of fish caught in the waters of Lakes Manitoba and Winnipegosis during the summer months.—(Mr. Roche, by Mr. Gilhoour.)

Return showing all tenders, contracts and correspondence in reference to the purchase of locomotives and rolling stock for Canadian government railways from July 15, 1896, until April 15, 1900.—(Mr. Haggart, by Mr. Foster.)

Copy of the contract between the government of Canada and the Beaver Steamship Line for the carriage of mails between Canada and England, and all orders in council in relation thereto. Also statement showing the length of each voyage of the steamships of said line between Liverpool and Halifax, and Halifax and Liverpool, during the winter season of 1899-1900.—(Sir Adolphe Caron.)

Copies of all correspondence between the chief analyst of the Department of Inland Revenue, or any other officer or persons in the department, and the Canadian representative or agents of the Chemical Works (late H. & E. Albert).—(Mr. Domville, by Mr. Tucker.)

Statement showing total amount of money paid by years since July 1, 1892, to June 30, 1899, on each of the following accounts :

1. Salary of Governor General.
2. Travelling expenses of Governor General.
3. Expenditure on Rideau Hall, on capital account; expenditure on Rideau Hall on maintenance; expenditure on Rideau Hall grounds, on capital account; expenditure on Rideau Hall grounds, maintenance.
4. Expenditure on furnishings of all kinds for Rideau Hall.
5. Allowance to Governor General for fuel and light.
6. Expenditure on any other account in connection with the office of Governor General.
7. Expenditure on any other account in connection with Rideau Hall and grounds.
8. Total expenditure of every kind since 1st July, 1892, in connection with the office of Governor General.
9. Total expenditure of every kind in connection with Rideau Hall and grounds for same period.—(Mr. Wilson.)

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

PROHIBITION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth) moved :

That this House has affirmed the principle that the prohibition of the liquor traffic is the right and most effectual legislative remedy for the evils of intemperance, and has also declared that as soon as public opinion would sufficiently sustain stringent measures, it was prepared to promote such legislation.

That the plebiscite of 1898, wherein a majority of the votes polled throughout the Dominion, including substantial majorities in all the provinces but one, were ascertained to be in favour of such legislation, as well as satisfactory evidence from other sources, shows that such measures will be thoroughly supported by the people of Canada.

That this House is now of the opinion, in view of the foregoing facts, that it is desirable and expedient that parliament should, without delay, enact such measures as will secure the prohibition of the liquor traffic for beverage purposes in at least those provinces and territories which have voted in favour of such prohibition.

He said : Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the House has been so long on the Order paper, and as it is merely an abstract of a somewhat more extended resolution which was discussed by us last session, it does not require any very lengthy explanation from the mover. In addition to that, the general question which this resolution deals with is so well understood throughout the country, has been so long debated in the press and at various meetings, and has absorbed such a large portion of the public interest for so many years, that this is another reason why a discussion in the shape of any very long speeches may well be dispensed with this evening. However, Sir, as there are many deeply interested in the progress of temperance reform and the establishment of a prohibitory liquor law, to as large an extent as may be possible in the Dominion, and as many of these people are not familiar with parliamentary usage, it would be only fair to myself and to the House that I should state some of the history of this resolution and its present position before us. Many of my friends in different portions of Canada have asked this question : Why do you not introduce a Bill dealing with the subject of prohibition, in which Bill you will state clearly and definitely what may be required in your estimation, and thus present it to parliament for adoption. No doubt if this course were constitutionally possible it would be far preferable to a resolution. But, as those acquainted with constitutional usage are aware, no measure can be brought before parliament by a private member which affects the revenues of the country, without first the passage of a resolution in which the principle of that legislation has been affirmed by parliament. This constitutional principle was established almost at the beginning of our parliamentary procedure, and is so well understood that it requires no further explanation. That is the reason why those who are interested in the establishment of a prohibitory liquor law are unable to present their views directly in the form of a Bill, and we are consequently obliged to take the step of placing a resolution upon the Order paper. As some have misunderstood the situation, and have asked : Why not bring this matter up earlier in the session, I may offer a few words of explanation. It would be certainly very advantageous to the cause of temperance reform if this resolution could be placed before parliament in the first or second week of the session in order that the discussion could be recorded in Hansard, could be reported to the country, and opinions formed from that discussion. Those who are members of this House are aware, that any resolution introduced by a private member must be placed on the Order paper, and can only come before the House on what is known as private members' day, when it must wait for discussion in its due turn. The fact that this resolution was on the Order paper on the 13th of February and was not reached for discussion until quite late on the night of the 9th of April, is an ample answer to any complaint on that score. At the suggestion of friendly members, we asked the leader of the House to give us a special day for the discussion of this resolution, in the hope that it would come up early in the day, so that every member who desired could express his view upon it, or move such amendment as he thought fit, in order that a vote might be taken upon the resolution and amendment at a reasonable hour. Circumstances of a melancholy nature (the obsequies of the late Mr. Haley, M.P.) have to-day prevented the discussion of this resolution until the present time. I hope, Sir, that those who address themselves to this subject will be as brief as possible in order that a vote may be taken this evening, so that the resolution may not go over to another Order and thus delay its being voted upon until too late in the session. I promise the House, Mr. Speaker, that my remarks, at any rate, shall be very brief.

The resolution states that this House already has affirmed the principle that the prohibition of the liquor traffic is the right and most effectual legislative remedy for the evils of intemperance, and has also declared that as soon as public opinion would sufficiently sustain stringent measures, it was prepared to promote such legislation. Of course, constitutionally speaking, the passage of a resolution by a previous parliament is not binding upon this parliament, but the passage of such a resolution in a previous parliament has, and ought to have, a certain moral weight upon any succeeding parliament. Inasmuch as no one, so far as I am aware, has seriously undertaken to repudiate the stand taken by the previous parliament, it is only fair to start our action this evening with the statement of that parliament. As long ago as the 5th of March, 1884, a motion, moved by the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), was adopted, declaring :

That this House is of the opinion that the right and most effectual legislative remedy for the evils of intemperance is to be found in the enactment and enforcement of a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes.

An amendment was added declaring :

And this House is prepared, so soon as public opinion will sufficiently sustain stringent measures, to promote such legislation, so far as the same is within the competency of the parliament of Canada.

That resolution stands upon the records of parliament, and I believe is generally concurred in by all temperance people throughout the Dominion. The great question, then, remains to be considered, whether this parliament is convinced that public opinion has reached that stage when it is sufficiently strong to support such a law if enacted. The resolution now in your hands goes on to state :

That the plebiscite of 1898, wherein a majority of the votes polled throughout the Dominion, including substantial majorities in all the provinces but one, were ascertained to be in favour of such legislation, as well as satisfactory evidence from other sources, shows that such measures will be thoroughly supported by the people of Canada.

The resolution, therefore, asks this House to resolve :

That this House is now of the opinion, in view of the foregoing facts, that it is desirable and expedient that parliament should, without delay,

enact such measures as will secure the prohibition of the liquor traffic for beverage purposes in at least those provinces and territories which have voted in favour of such prohibition.

Just here we reach the parting of the ways between those who contend that this is a weakening of prohibition action and those who believe that it would advance the prohibition cause. Last session a resolution similar in its tenor to this was moved, and my hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. McClure), gave notice that he would move an amendment in favour of the total prohibition of the liquor traffic throughout the whole Dominion. There can be no doubt that that is the view of the vast bulk of the temperance people throughout the Dominion of Canada; and if such an amendment were moved in this House and pressed to a vote, it would be my duty as a representative of the prohibitionist element to support it. The resolution in my hands emanates from the Dominion Prohibition Alliance, a body made up of representatives from the various temperance organizations in the Dominion of representative men, who have made a close and severe study of this whole question. They have asked the Legislative Committee to bring forward this resolution as a step, if adopted, towards the complete and total prohibition of the liquor traffic throughout the whole Dominion. I have no doubt that to the superficial eye it seems an advanced step to say, we will have nothing but total prohibition for the whole Dominion, and that any partial measure which provides for prohibition by provinces will not do at all. But the aim and desire of those who advocate this measure is to follow public opinion as pronounced in the various ways indicated in the resolution. This is a federation of provinces, and affords peculiar facilities for carrying out a partial measure of prohibition where that would likely be successful, when the effort to enforce a general measure of prohibition throughout the whole Dominion might possibly result in failure, and it is the desire to cultivate and to follow public opinion in this regard upon which this resolution is based. I do not mean to say that all the representative temperance people of the Dominion will look upon this particular method with absolute approval. I cannot deny, that in the maritime provinces there is a note of dissent—that the Maritime Prohibition Association, while strongly committed to prohibition to the most extreme extent, have not endorsed this resolution. They prefer to make the whole question a direct issue at the polls in the next election, and to await the growth of public opinion throughout the Dominion upon this question until a measure of total prohibition shall be accorded. In this they are not inconsistent, and they are showing an amount of wisdom which from their particular standpoint is not to be condemned. But we cannot but be aware that the province of Quebec, a large and influential portion of the Dominion, is decidedly hostile to the principles of this resolution, while in the other provinces, as far as the evidence is accorded to us, a substantial majority of the electorate, and of the population generally, is strongly in favour of prohibition. Confronted, then, with this peculiar situation, many ardent prohibitionists believe that it would be better to take advantage of our strength where we are strong, and to avoid the weak point where we are weak, and to carry forward the prohibitionist movement along the lines of least resistance, by bringing it into force in those provinces where decided majorities have pronounced in its favour from time to time, and still continuing to work in those provinces and those districts where public opinion is either hostile or not so much in favour of prohibition. We think this is the part of practical wisdom, and will tend more completely and satisfactorily towards the accomplishment of what we ultimately hope for. Now, Sir, there is no necessity, in the discussion of this resolution, to take up and argue out the question of temperance. That has been so thoroughly threshed out in every quarter of the Dominion, that probably every intelligent man has his mind made up as to the advantages or disadvantages of total abstinence in regard to himself, of the most strict license in his own neighbourhood, or of prohibition for his province or the whole Dominion. The evils of intemperance are admitted; but men who are at once patriotic, intelligent and cultivated, differ widely as to the most practical remedy. We know that in the maritime provinces, for instance, a liquor law, if constitutionally brought into operation, would be as well enforced as any law on the statute-book, because public opinion, as manifested not only by the plebiscite, but in a thousand different ways, in the press, in public gatherings, in the deliverances of various church organizations, and in elections of various kinds—shows that the temperance sentiment is so strong and the desire for the removal of the evils of the liquor traffic so great, that prohibitory legislation would be enforced there just as effectively as legislation on any other subject. In a province where a decided majority of the people has shown itself to be opposed to prohibitory legislation, of course such legislation would not have the support it otherwise would, and, therefore, the Dominion Alliance, and those who support it, have accepted this particular form of resolution as a reasonable step in advance. Their idea is that in any province, where the principle of the resolution is approved of, machinery shall be set up by law for the bringing of a prohibitory liquor Act into operation. It could be brought into operation in some such way as the Scott Act, or such other way as may be found advisable, and thus we would have this advantage that an important measure, touching a great many interests, meeting here and there with great opposition, meeting with a large amount of indifference, can be brought into operation in province by province, according as public opinion would support in any particular province a measure calculated to put an end to the importation, manufacture and sale of liquor in that province.

Mr. FLINT.

There can be no doubt that no matter how drastic or severe may be a local measure of prohibition, such as I understand is to be attempted in the province of Manitoba, and such as has been attempted, with better or worse effect, in various provinces, where no measure of local prohibition can be successful, because importation is allowed, and in such a case there are hundreds of ways by which the local laws can be evaded. Therefore, we place this resolution before the House, and if parliament should adopt it, then, it would become the duty of the government to frame a law that would meet the general conditions of the resolution.

Some may argue that such a law would be unconstitutional, and no doubt, at first blush, there would seem to be constitutional difficulties in the way. But, even admitting, for the sake of argument, that it is not strictly constitutional, under the present terms of the British North America Act, then this government should take the means to obtain an amendment to that Act such as would enable it to carry out a law based on the principles of this resolution. But, I do not think there is anything in the constitutional objection. As far as I have had the opportunity of studying the objection, it is based on section 121 of the British North America Act. That section provides:

That all articles of the growth, produce or manufacture of any of the provinces shall, from and after the union, be admitted free into each of the other provinces.

Therefore, it is argued that this parliament cannot pass a law which will prevent the free importation into any province of spirituous liquors manufactured in another. I think, however, that a closer examination of this clause and its consequences will not support that contention. What is meant by the word 'free' in this clause? It simply means that we shall not make a revenue out of one province for the benefit of the others. It means that we shall have no machinery for creating a revenue out of the importations of goods by one province which are the manufacture, growth or produce of another. This clause comes under the general head of revenue and taxation. It is simply a prohibition to this parliament to create any revenue for the advantage of any one province or to allow any province to create a revenue by any taxation on the growth, manufacture or produce of another. It does not apply to any action of this parliament based upon section 91, which gives us the power to legislate for peace, order and good government, and, consequently, it does not interfere with any law passed in the interests of peace, order and good government. In those interests we have the power to prohibit the use by any province of something which the people of that province consider injurious and inimicable to peace, good order and good government. We have applied this principle on more than one occasion. We have not allowed intoxicating liquor, the produce of Canada, to be imported into the North-west or the Yukon, and I think the same principle would apply if parliament should see fit, in its wisdom, to establish machinery for the carrying out of prohibition in any particular province.

I have briefly gone over all the grounds upon which this resolution is demanded of this parliament. If any one believes that this is a retrograde step and that parliament should wait until public opinion is so strong and so well represented in this House that it will promote prohibitory legislation throughout the whole Dominion, then parliament would be justified in postponing this resolution until that day. But, if parliament believes that the liquor traffic is such a great evil that its prohibition in sections where public opinion will support a prohibitory law is desirable at as early a day as possible, and that proceeding in that way, step by step, province by province, the benefits of prohibition will ultimately reach the people of the whole Dominion, we would be perfectly justified in giving our approval to this resolution.

I notice that the Maritime Prohibition Association take the ground that they recognize the parliament of Canada rather than any political party as the source of prohibitory legislation. And, in a circular issued by the president of that convention, the same point is emphasized. This leads me to refer to the attitude and position of the government of Canada as contradistinguished from the parliament of Canada, in dealing with this subject. Although I have been connected with the temperance agitation for many years, I have always contended that the worst thing that could happen to the prohibition movement would be to have either political party make use of it for solely partisan purposes. I have always contended that, so peculiar is this question, so far-reaching is it in its financial and social consequences, so large a number of the population are affected by it in various ways one political party can never hope to succeed in carrying it into effect, without the aid and encouragement and assistance, of the party opposed to it. In other words, if this question ever becomes or is made a question solely of one political party, the party in opposition, if it makes use of its position as a powerful political engine, can frustrate the efforts of the party supporting prohibition. As far as possible, I have always asked my friends on both sides of the House, irrespective of party, to support the principles of this resolution, or of any prohibition resolution brought forward from time to time, knowing well, that it requires the united efforts of gentlemen on both sides of ordinary political measures to make this proposed law successful. In the country at large, the prohibition element is made up of large numbers of people belonging to both Conservative and Liberal parties; and the same is true of the opposition to prohibition, as well as of that indifferent mass whose opinions upon the subject are difficult to ascertain, but whose sympathy it is very important to win. Whichever party makes this a purely one-sided party question will, if antagonized by the other party, fail in carrying forward the prohibition movement.

Therefore, I ask parliament, as a whole, and I ask hon. members on both sides of this House, irrespective of their party feeling, or of the effect upon their parties, to support this resolution as a fair and reasonable practicable step in the right direction, in the direction supported, I believe, by a majority of the people of Canada, of both political parties. That step once taken will mark an era in the history of the Dominion of Canada. If others choose and go further and insist that no partial measure shall be accepted by this parliament, but that the House shall adopt a resolution advocating prohibition for the whole Dominion, such a resolution as I have had the honour to move myself, as have several of my predecessors, on many occasions, I will most cheerfully support it. But, in the meantime, and until parliament feels like accepting a position of that kind, I ask the House in all fairness, and all reasonableness, out of regard for the large number of sincere people throughout the Dominion, who favour prohibition, and favour this form of carrying it out, to adopt this resolution. I believe they will be fairly well exemplifying, by so doing, the substantial public opinion of the Dominion of Canada. The recent plebiscite, if taken by itself is not so strong an argument in favour of the readiness of public opinion for prohibition as the other evidences I have mentioned; but, added to the other evidence, I believe that plebiscite must convince any impartial mind that the people of the Dominion of Canada, in all the provinces, except one, are in favour of prohibition in those provinces, and will support any law that parliament may enact in order to carry that out.

I commit this resolution to your hands, and I trust there will be a full and ample discussion upon it; and I hope we may be enabled to take a vote upon it, before the House adjourns to-night.

Mr. J. H. BELL (East Prince, P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, I rise to second the resolution so ably moved by the hon member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). About twenty years ago, the temperance people of Canada presented to this parliament petitions containing some three hundred thousand signatures, asking for the total suppression of the liquor traffic. Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, himself a prohibitionist, told the petitioners frankly that he did not think that temperance sentiment in Canada was sufficiently advanced to justify the hope that a prohibitory liquor law, if placed upon the statute-book, could be successfully enforced. But he did not entirely ignore the prayer of their petition. They had asked for bread, he did not give them a stone. Instead of absolute prohibition, he gave them the Scott Act—a measure adapted to the different stages of development of temperance sentiment in different portions of the Dominion; a measure intended to operate on a wider area of territory than the Dunkin Act; a measure with many salutary provisions; a measure, that, in many parts of the Dominion, has been put in force and kept in force, and has contributed to produce sobriety, morality, peace and material prosperity among the people who have adopted and maintained it. The prohibitionists of twenty years ago were reasonable men, they accepted the compromise offered. Last year the plebiscite was submitted, and with the result that 278,000 persons voted in favour of prohibition; a majority of 14,000 of those who voted declared themselves in favour of national prohibition; 23 per cent of the names on the voters' lists favoured prohibition and 21 per cent opposed it. How did the government meet the result of the vote? They met it by arguments in this fashion: They said, first, in view of the fact that the suppression of the liquor traffic requires a preponderating force of public sentiment behind it, we do not think that a vote of 23 per cent is sufficient to justify us in hoping for an effectual enforcement of the law; second, we must recognize the condition of affairs in the province of Quebec. We cannot coerce the people of Quebec, we cannot compel them to accept a measure against which they are manifestly hostile. If we attempted to coerce Quebec it would create an antagonism of races which would militate against our national prosperity. Further, if such an Act were put in force in Quebec it would everywhere be treated with contempt and violated, and the temperance cause, instead of being benefited, would be injured.

Mr. WALLACE. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that these are the arguments of the government?

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). Yes, these are the arguments presented by the government and its supporters. The temperance people of today are equally reasonable with those of twenty years ago. If the resolution proposed were adopted and acted upon, if the Scott Act, as applied to the counties was extended to the provinces; if the government bent its energies to improve the Act and render it efficient, then I have no doubt that the temperance people would be ready to accept this as a reasonable compromise of conflicting opinions. There is nothing in such a measure to antagonize those opposed to prohibition. This resolution does not propose to enact national prohibition, nor does it propose even to enact provincial prohibition, it only proposes to enable a province to have prohibition where a majority of the electors of that province votes for and demands it.

Mr. FLINT.

But, Sir, there is much in the proposition now before the House to satisfy the reasonable demands of the advocates of prohibition. In the first place the sting of defeat would be taken out of the plebiscite vote. Temperance reformers would feel that they have not been altogether robbed of the legitimate fruits of their victory, they would feel that they have made a substantial step in the direction of the goal of their ambition—national prohibition. It would give them encouragement to proceed with their good work, with a work that tends to diminish crime, to mitigate disease and poverty, to promote happiness and prosperity. It would give them to understand that the government is their friend, and their patron, and that the Liberal government can be relied on to fulfil all promises, express or implied, at any rate, to the extent that such fulfilment is desirable or expedient.

But if no action is taken by this government, what will follow? If there be no recognition given to the 278,000 persons who voted in favour of national prohibition, or to the majority of 14,000 votes polled, or to the fact, that seven out of eight provinces, by large, and in some cases, overwhelming majorities, declared for prohibition, or to the fact that 43 of the constituencies called on their representatives to support prohibition, or to the fact that a larger majority vote was polled for prohibition than was polled for this government, or to the fact that many urgent petitions have been received since the plebiscite asking the government to give effect to the result of that vote—if all these conditions are ignored, I fear that the results will be serious and in some localities possibly disastrous. I do not contend that this government made a specific promise that they would abide by the result of the plebiscite vote, that if a majority of the vote polled was in favour of prohibition they would enact a law. But I do say that in the absence of any definite statement upon the question, the very fact that the government of its own motion submitted this question to the vote of the people, the very fact that public sentiment can only be gauged by those who vote and not by those who refrain from voting; these circumstances have given to many of the temperance electors of Canada the impression that the government made at least an implied promise for which they should be held responsible.

Now, Sir, while it is true that among the Conservative party there are many honest temperance workers, it is nevertheless equally true that the large majority of temperance men are found in the Liberal ranks. Where you find an active, an influential, an intelligent man in the Liberal ranks, you generally find him an advocate of temperance reform. If no action be taken by the government in this matter, to my mind, the following results will flow. First, it will diminish the energy, it will dampen the enthusiasm of those Liberal workers to whom temperance reform is more important than party considerations. Second, many of them will manifest their dissatisfaction by refusing to take an active part in elections, and by abstaining from voting. Third, many of them will satisfy their resentment by voting against the Liberal party for what they consider, whether right or wrong, to be a breach of faith on the part of the government. It is no solace to these gentlemen to tell them that they have no hope from the opposition in this House, that there is not even a shadow of a promise from the hon. member for York N.B., (Mr. Foster). That, to them, is no excuse. As a member and supporter of the Liberal party, I deem it to be my duty to hold up a finger of warning, and to point out the results that in my opinion will follow if the government take no action. Assuming now, that the government will awake to its own interest, as well as to the public weal, and will make up its mind to take some action, the question is, what shall that action be? First, the Scott Act cannot be amended and improved so as to satisfy the people. It has fallen into disrepute in the province of Ontario and cannot be resuscitated. It is too limited in the scope of its operations. Second, national prohibition is considered to be out of the question in view of the 23 per cent vote, and in view of the conditions in Quebec to which I have already referred. The only other direction in which a practical and forward step can be taken is along the lines suggested by this resolution, an extension of the principle of the Scott Act to the provinces, and an honest and determined attempt made to render that measure efficient. What are the advantages that a measure of this kind promises? First, it will extend the field of operations of the Act. The Dunkin Act was chiefly restricted in its operation to townships and to small municipalities. What was the consequence? Along the borders of townships, those interested in the sale of liquors established taverns, drawing their custom partly from the places where the Dunkin Act was in force, and partly from the surrounding districts where license prevailed. Hence arose a demand for wider territory. The Scott Act, to some extent, met that demand. It extended the territory from townships to counties, but it was only a partial remedy. What happened in Ontario? The moment a county adopted prohibition the liquor dealers established a cordon of taverns around the boundaries of the county, and so nullified the provisions of the law. The Scott Act fell into disrepute. It was abandoned in almost every county where it had been enacted. This proposition is to extend the provisions of the Scott Act to the whole province so that it will be impossible for those who desire to nullify the law to go about their operations successfully. In Prince Edward Island we have three counties and one city. In the three counties the Scott Act is in force, in the city, they have had free rum. Within the last year, there is a species of license. The city of Charlottetown is in direct communication with every portion of the province. Those who cannot get their rum in the counties, go to Charlottetown, there they can buy it freely, they can drink it freely, and they can take any quantity of it to their homes. The result is that the city nullifies, to a great extent, the beneficial effects of the Scott Act in the counties. Now, if you extend the principle of the Scott Act to the Island, the result will necessarily be beneficial to the whole province. The second benefit to be derived from this act is that it will secure for the law greater respect and more general obedience. The common mind regards the Scott Act as being partial and arbitrary. People cannot see the justice of a law which provides that on one side of a road dividing two counties a man can be fined and imprisoned for the sale of liquor, while, upon the other side it is no infringement of the law. If you extend the operations of the Scott Act to the province, if you make the Act provincial in its character, the effect will be to give greater respect and secure more profound obedience to the law on the part of the people who are brought into contact with it. The third advantage is that such a law would not necessarily be brought into force in many of the provinces at once. Probably only one would at first adopt it, say Prince Edward Island, where the temperance sentiment is more active and emphasised than in any other part of the Dominion. There, it would be tested. If successful it would be an object lesson for the rest of the Dominion, and the example would be followed. If it proved unsuccessful none of the other provinces would incur the risk, or expense, of its submission, or adoption. The fourth advantage would be that by extending the principle of the Scott Act to the provinces, the Federal government, in the exercise of its control over trade and commerce, could prevent the importation of liquor, or control its importation, into any province where the Act had been put into force. It could also control the manufacture and wholesale, as well as the retail, trade. Our experience under the Scott Act teaches us this: That it is idle and useless to attempt to put an Act of that kind into force successfully, and at the same time allow the free and indiscriminate importation of liquor into the province where the Act may be in operation. In Summerside, the capital of Prince County, large quantities of liquor are imported from St. John, N.B., and from Quebec. This liquor being brought into contact with the people; the people being subjected to temptation to drink; temptation to sell and make a profit out of it; the result is, that the liquor soon finds its way into the avenues of illegitimate trade. All who have had experience of the operation of the Scott Act have come to the conclusion that a prohibitory law can never be made absolutely efficient unless the government exercises the power vested in it by the British North America Act, to prevent the importation of liquor, except for what may be considered legitimate purposes. Now, Sir, under this proposed Act better provision should be made for keeping the legitimate sales of liquor under control. I speak of legitimate sales, and what are these? First, that which is required for sacramental purposes in the churches; second: That which is used for medicine; third: That which is used in the arts and manufactures. No prohibitory law, whether it be national or provincial, would be tolerated for a moment unless it provided alcoholic liquors for these legitimate purposes. All prohibitory laws must recognize this. Under the Scott Act we have vendors. These men get their liquor wherever they can, and they are remunerated out of the profits of their business. The result is that the vendors are subjected to two temptations; first: The temptation to adulterate the liquor; and second: The temptation to sell as much of it as possible, because the greater the sales, the more the profit. In this new proposed law some change must be made to provide against these evils—to remove the temptations. I have given this question some little consideration, and the best scheme that I can suggest is this: That the government arrogate to itself, the control, the monopoly of the supply of liquor to be used for these legitimate purposes. Where will the government get the liquor? It may get it from either of four sources: From the manufacturers, from the importers, or, it may import it itself, or it may manufacture it itself. Already the government manufactures, and has a monopoly of the manufacture of methylated spirits. On the same principle the government could manufacture and control the supply of liquor required for legitimate purposes. Now, having obtained the supply the government would put it up in packages, they would seal it, they would stamp it as they stamp boxes of cigars and tobacco. Then they would distribute it to the vendors and they would require the vendors to account for every package sold with the medical or other certificate upon which the sale was made. The government would fix the price of each package, and it would pay the vendor by salary. The government would add to the prime cost of the liquor, first, what would pay customs duties so that the revenue would not suffer loss; second, the cost of handling and distributing to the vendors; third, the vendors' salary; fourth, the fines would pay part of the cost of the enforcement of the law. The balance should be made up in the manner I have indicated, viz., by adding it to the price of liquor. What would be the advantages of this system? The first would be that the people who required alcoholic liquor would get a purer article; the government not being under the temptation to adulterate it. The second would be, that the vendor would be paid by salary, and all temptation to push illegitimate sales would be removed. The third would be, that it would keep the legitimate sales of liquor under perfect control; the vendor having to account for every package committed into his hands, and every sale to be accompanied by a certificate. The fourth would be, that it would enable government officials to keep all illegitimate sales of liquor under control. How? Because it would draw the line sharp between liquor that has a right to be in the country and liquor that has no right to be here. Under the Scott Act, for instance, the officers of the law would search certain premises and liquor would be perhaps found there. There is no ear-mark to determine whether the liquor found is legitimate or illegitimate, but under the system I have suggested, all liquor stamped with the government stamp would be legitimate; all else would be contraband, and the liquor that is contraband could be seized and confiscated, and the party in whose possession it is found could be fined and imprisoned. In this manner there could be an effectual working out of the law. The fifth advantage would be, that it would enable the government to make the law perfectly self-sustaining. If one province asked for prohibition, let the province have it; but at the same time it should pay for it, and it should pay for all incidental expenses in connection with the working of the Act. There is no reason why the general funds of the Dominion should be drawn upon by any province to pay for any of the costs incidental to the operation or enforcement of the law in a particular province. The Act should be made perfectly self-sustaining. Now Sir, all these advantages and more would follow from the government assuming the control and the monopoly of the supply of liquor, to be used for what are regarded as legitimate purposes. Besides all this, there are certain other amendments to the old law which might be suggested. First, if two men conspire together to violate a law there is no good reason why you should punish the one and let the other go free. The vendor of the illegitimate liquor and the purchaser are equally guilty. They may not be guilty to the same degree, but nevertheless they are guilty, both of them, and the law should provide for the punishment of both. Second, the law being a federal Act, should be enforced by Dominion officials, who should be paid in the manner I have suggested. Third, it should not be optional to prosecute for first offences where the second or the third offence has been committed, and can be proved. The convicting magistrate should have no option. The penalties for the infringement of the law should be made more stringent. Especially should they be made more severe against medical practitioners, who abuse the confidence which the government places in them, and issue certificates in blank and without sufficient reason. Fourth, provision should be made for testing liquors in doubtful cases to ascertain the amount of alcohol contained therein. Fifth, the term during which the Act should be in force without repeal should be extended to five years instead of limited to three.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.)

Should an Act of this character be brought into force by a bare majority vote? It is contended by some that a violation of a law respecting the sale of liquors is differently regarded from the violation of any other statute. For instance, a man passing a tavern sees another selling liquor contrary to law. How many out of a hundred will inform on the illicit vendor and assist to bring him to justice? Not many. But, if a man is seen stealing a coat or setting fire to his neighbour's barn, how many out of a hundred will help to prosecute and convict him? Probably ninety-nine out of a hundred. The argument, therefore, is that you require a strong preponderating sentiment behind a law of this kind, else it is impossible to enforce it. Another suggestion is that often on a law of this kind only 20 or 30 per cent of the people vote who have the right to vote, and that under these circumstances a majority vote is not sufficient. These were the views held by the Hon. Sir Leonard Tilley, of New Brunswick, based upon his experience in that province. He held that there should be two-thirds, or three-fourths, majority of the votes polled in favour of any such prohibitory law before it is brought into force.

The arguments opposed to that view seem to be these. First, the majority vote polled is the usual method of testing public opinion—for example, on by-laws for voting money, on the adoption of the Dunkin Act or the Scott Act. The people are accustomed to and satisfied with this mode of enacting laws, and we have no ground for hoping that any other method would be equally satisfactory, or that the people would submit to a two-thirds or a three-fourths majority vote. Second, the majority vote is the British method of legislation in every parliament under the British Crown. Any other mode would be un-British, and, consequently, unsuited to our conditions. Third, the majority vote under the Scott Act has stood the test of the Privy Council, and has been deemed to be constitutional. There is no certainty that a two-thirds majority vote would be held to be equally constitutional. It would introduce a doubtful element which would be certain to suggest and invite litigation. Fourth, if you put an Act into force by a two-thirds majority, you must be fair to both sides; you can only put it out of existence by a like majority. The result would be that you might have an Act on the statute that you could never get repealed, you could never get a two-thirds adverse vote to repeal it. That condition of things would be manifestly unfair to the opponents of prohibition. The preponderance of argument would, therefore, appear to favour the bare majority vote.

Is a vote by the people the proper method of bringing this Act into force? Some contend that the people are tired of voting—that they have voted already, that they have expressed themselves once, and that that is enough; that it is idle and unnecessary to submit another plebiscite. They therefore urge that such an Act ought to be brought into existence by other procedure—say, for instance, by a resolution or an Act of the provincial assembly—that such a method would be cheaper and simpler. Against that contention the following arguments may be urged. First, this being a federal statute, this parliament should control all the machinery and assume the full responsibility. Second, each local legislature has its hands full already, and there is no reason why we should further burden it with the responsibility of declaring when a federal prohibitory law ought to be brought into effect. Third, the local legislature might ignore the responsibility cast upon it and refuse to act. There is no power in this parliament to issue what might be called a political mandamus to compel the local legislature to act as required. Fourth, the people have never yet voted on the question of prohibition by provinces—on the proposition which is now submitted to this House; and there is no certainty that if submitted, the prohibitionists of a province, much less the whole people, would be favourable to a measure of this character. Therefore, it is necessary that this new measure be submitted to the people for ratification. Fifth, every submission of such a law is an educator of the people. Their attention is specially called to it and to the necessity of it. When they vote on the measure and adopt it, they look upon it as the child of their adoption, and they become interested not only in the passage of the Act, but in its effectual enforcement. The preponderance of argument, therefore, inclines me to the view that the submission of the law along the old lines indicated in the Scott Act, is preferable to bringing it into force by a resolution or an Act of the local legislature.

It is alleged that the members from Quebec are opposed to and will vote against this resolution. I cannot see any ground for such a statement. When the result of the plebiscite vote became known, when Quebec manifested its hostility to national prohibition, how did the English portion of the people of Canada act? They had the majority, and they had the strict right to have their will carried into law; yet, for the sake of harmony, for the sake of the future interests of Canada, they forebore and did not insist on their strict legal rights but said they would respect the opinions and the feelings and the prejudices of their brethren in the province of Quebec. That sentiment expressed under these circumstances does honour to the English-speaking people of Canada. I do not believe that the French people of the province of Quebec will be behind the English people of the other provinces in the expression of generosity or magnanimity of sentiment. This resolution does not propose to affect the province of Quebec. It respects French Canadian sentiment; it proposes to coerce no province. Quebec has asked by the vote and the voice of its people that the old condition of things should continue, that it should have its Dunkin Act, and its license law and the sale of liquors for beverage purposes and the revenues therefrom, just as before, and it has got all that it asks. The people of Prince Edward Island and of the lower provinces and elsewhere ask for a prohibitory law, applicable to their conditions—that this parliament will give them the machinery by which they can obtain and put into force a prohibitory law in any particular province. Why should the people of Quebec refuse that request? Why should they act the dog-in-the-manger policy and prevent other provinces getting what they desire? I am perfectly satisfied they will not do that. I am satisfied that they will say to the English-speaking provinces: You have given us what we ask; you have been just and generous, now we are willing—nay anxious to give you that measure of prohibition which you believe would work for the best moral and material interests of your people. I am satisfied that the Quebec representatives as well as those from the English-speaking provinces will equally favour and support the resolution which I have now the honour to second and submit to the consideration of this House.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.)

Mr. FIRMAN McCLURE (Colchester). As I am obliged, Mr. Speaker, entirely to dissent from the proposition made in this resolution. I propose to offer a very few remarks at present. It is not necessary that this question should be gone into to the same extent as on a previous occasion. I have not to any degree changed the opinion which I held when this resolution was proposed at the last session of this parliament, and I propose, therefore, to move an amendment to the resolution of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint):

That all the words of the resolution after the word 'that' in the main motion be struck out, and the following inserted instead thereof: That the object of good government is to promote the general welfare of the people by a careful encouragement and protection of whatever makes for the public good, and by an equally careful discouragement and suppression of whatever tends to the public disadvantage;

That the traffic in alcoholic liquors as beverages is productive of serious injury to the moral, social and industrial welfare of the people of Canada;

That, despite all preceding legislation, the evils of intemperance remain so vast in magnitude, so wide in extent, and so destructive in effect as to constitute a social peril and a national menace;

That this House is of opinion, for the reasons hereinbefore set forth, that the right and most effective legislative remedy for those evils is to be found in the enactment and enforcement of a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes; and this House is prepared to promote such legislation, so far as the same is within the competency of the parliament of Canada.

In effect, this resolution is the one which I proposed a year ago. The difference is in the preamble, and while it may be considered somewhat absurd to burden a resolution with all those statements, I wish to say frankly, that my reason for so doing is because I do not believe that any demand for prohibition can be successfully based upon the results of the plebiscite vote. I, therefore, have based it upon entirely different grounds, but grounds which, in my opinion, are much more substantial than anything that can be found in the result of the plebiscite vote.

I cannot accept the resolution of the hon. member for Yarmouth. In the first place I regard it as a resolution which, if passed by this House, would result in the kind of legislation that has been described by the mover and the seconder of the resolution, and I am prepared to risk the opinion that the majority of the prohibitionists of this country will agree with me in saying that even if this parliament should go to the full extent asked by this resolution, temperance legislation would not, in the provinces affected by it, be anything in advance of what it is to-day, or what it could be made by the enactments of the legislatures of those pro-vines. In the second place, I cannot conceive it possible that prohibition passed by this House, and applied to one or two provinces of the Dominion, leaving the others free, would be anything but a farce. I cannot conceive how it would be possible to work it, in the face of all the constitutional, legal and commercial difficulties that would hamper us in our attempt to enforce that law. In the second place, no body of men in the Dominion have ever asked for such a law as is now proposed. Who has asked for it? Who has proposed such a resolution? I absolve the hon. member for Yarmouth from all responsibility, because he has told us himself, that his resolution is but the expression of the opinion of the Dominion Alliance. Well, I am as good a prohibitionist as any member of the Alliance, I have the greatest respect for the members of the Alliance, but I say that the Dominion Alliance, which stands back of this resolution, represents nobody but the half a dozen gentlemen who constitute the executive of that alliance centred in Toronto and Montreal. They do not represent the prohibitionists of this country, or the maritime provinces at least. That scheme has been submitted to the prohibitionists of the maritime provinces, from time to time, and been condemned. I say unhesitatingly that it is not asked for by anybody and is not wanted by anybody. There are prohibitionists in this country who want prohibition for all Canada. They are more numerous than perhaps the government or hon. gentlemen opposite realize; but the prohibitionists who want partial prohibition can be counted upon the fingers of one's hand. Now, what is the position in regard to this question? We must look at it as a practical matter. I say unhesitatingly that when the present government submitted the question of prohibition to the people in accordance with the promises they had made at their convention, they did something the temperance people of this country had never asked them to do. The plebiscite was not a proposition of the prohibitionists of this country; it was a proposition of the Liberal party; and it was accepted by the prohibitionists as a step in the right direction, but not as what they wanted.

Mr. TAYLOR. Because they thought that political party were honest.

Mr. McCLURE. Perhaps they did, and perhaps they have changed their minds to-day; and perhaps if the political party now in power were not as honest as the prohibitionists thought, hon. gentlemen opposite were honest when they gave a commission to inquire into the evils of the liquor traffic and put upon that commission men biased against prohibition, men who had made up their minds to report against it before they began the investigation. But if the prohibitionists have found the Liberal party dishonest, it is not the first time they have found a political party ready to play with this question for votes without doing anything practical. I am not here to justify the action of the government in this matter. I have said that prohibitionists never approved the submitting of it to a vote of the people; I do not approve of it now. I accept it as a step in the right direction. The Liberals promised to submit the matter to the people, and they did so. I do not say that the plebiscite demanded of this government a prohibitory law; but I say that the plebiscite did not absolve the government from the responsibility that rested upon them to deal with this question—a responsibility which the Liberal party had admitted when previously in power, a responsibility which they had admitted when in opposition, a responsibility which, by the votes of its representatives in this House, it had time and time again declared rested upon any government in this country—to deal with the evils of the liquor traffic in a legislative fashion. They have not dealt with it in legislative fashion. They have played with the question to catch votes, the same as hon. gentlemen opposite did. But what do we find to-day? When I stand here and condemn the government for its attitude on this question, hon. gentlemen opposite say, 'Hear, hear.' But what did they do? What is their position? Do they think that the people of this country are such fools, do they think that the prohibitionists are such children, that they are going to be caught by the clap-net that they preach throughout the country? What is the position of the responsible leaders of that party? Why, only in November last the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), went down to Quebec and made a speech as one of the leaders of the party. He was asked point blank what was his policy on this question, and what was his answer? He said: I am going to wait and see whether you punish the government for their wrong-doing; and if you do that, maybe I will take it up. That is a proud position for a leader of a great party to take, a man who has declared in this House, that the evils of intemperance are so vast in magnitude that it is the duty of the government to deal with this question. And now he tells us: I have no responsibility; I am going to wait until I see if I can get into power on the question, and then I will consider it. What position are the prohibitionists in to-day as a matter of practical policy? They are not satisfied with the action of the government; they are not satisfied with the action of hon. gentlemen opposite. But the position it is attempted to place them in is to convince them that the only way you can advance your measure is by defeating this government, and putting the present opposition in power. What will be the result of that? If you can show me that by doing that I am going to advance the cause of prohibition, I am prepared to go with you ; but I do not see how it will advance the cause of prohibition. The only policy that will prevail on this question, the only policy that will be effective, is for the people of this country to elect not men pledged to prohibition merely, not men who in the heat of a campaign give their adherence to this cause, but men who believe in prohibition. Until that is done, you will never have a prohibitory liquor law. The trouble is that members of parliament do not believe in the principle of prohibition. It may be a question in the minds of some whether the majority of the people believe in it. There is no question that the majority of the members of this House do not believe that prohibition will be effective, and therefore, they do not vote for it.

I do not expect that this resolution of mine will pass. Some will say that, in that case, it is foolish to propose it. Not at all. It may be the duty of members of this House who believe in certain principles to propose resolutions embodying them, though they know that they will be defeated. The resolution will not pass in this House, I admit, but it will be part of an educational campaign which will result finally in prohibition by leading to the election to this parliament of men who believe in the principle, men who will enact a prohibitory law. There is no way under heaven by which prohibition can be enacted in this country save by bringing the people not only to believe in it, but to vote for the election of prohibitionists to this parliament. Until that is done, we cannot get the law.

The hon. member for Yarmouth said there is no need to preach about the evils of intemperance, that everybody admits them. I dissent from that position. I grant you that these evils are generally admitted ; but the members of this House do not appreciate those evils as they should do, otherwise they would not deal with this question in the light-hearted, in the cold-hearted manner in which parliament has always dealt with it. The magnitude of the evils of intemperance must be insisted upon in any argument on this question. It is upon the magnitude of the evils that flow directly from that traffic and upon that alone can we base a demand for prohibition. There is immense necessity that we should discuss the evils of intemperance. There is necessity that the commercial man be doctinated with the idea that the liquor traffic is a commercial curse, that it is a traffic that lives upon productive industries, and that it lives upon them without giving any return. It must be impressed upon the citizen that this traffic is opposed to the moral interests and welfare of this country, and that it must be dealt with by parliament as an enemy to society. These things must be insisted upon.

A strong appeal is made to punish this government. There may be justification for the appeal to punish this government, but while you may punish this government you cannot advance the cause of prohibition by simply electing opponents who are as bad as they are.

Mr. McCLURE.

Mr. TAYLOR. You cannot find in the ranks of the Conservative party those who are as bad as they are.

Mr. McCLURE. I am surprised to hear such a remark from an hon. gentleman who, not many years ago, stood up in this House and proposed, calmly and seriously proposed, a resolution to the effect that this question should be submitted to the vote of the people before any action was taken ; and yet, when this government came into power and proposed to do that very thing, he hounded them from Dan to Beersheba and said they were pursuing a clap-trap policy. It was the policy which he himself had advocated. If they took it from him, I do not wonder that he considered it clap-trap. But does he tell me that the Conservative party are not worse than the Liberal party on this question. If so, I dissent from his opinion. For, I tell him that among the prohibitionists of this country there is a firm and settled conviction that if there ever was a party that dealt dishonestly and treacherously with the prohibition question it was the party of the hon. gentleman who sit opposite. They came down to this House and proposed a resolution—to which, in itself, I have no objection—to submit this question to investigation by an impartial commission ; and they deliberately selected a commission which was composed, with one exception, of men who were not impartial, men who were not constitutionally or by education fitted to inquire into the question, but men prejudiced against the principle of prohibition and determined to report against it. And the evidence collected by these men is of such a character that no man in his sober senses can read it and come to any other conclusion than that they were searching for evidence that would favour their own prejudiced opinion, and deliberately and of set purpose excluded all evidence they possibly could that would tell in favour of prohibition. Yet when that report came down, although the very report of that biased commission presented to this House stated that legislation was necessary, stated that evils did exist that should be suppressed by law, these hon. gentlemen deliberately sat silent and refused to take any action. It does not lie in the mouth of the hon. gentleman to accuse this government of dishonesty, whatever it may lie in the mouth of other people to say. Although I cannot support the action of the government on this question, still I refuse to be made the cat's-paw of hon. gentlemen opposite to foist them into power, and to enable them to punish this government without giving any pledge that they will do anything else. That is not a position that we shall take upon this question, it is not an honest position, it is not one that will appeal to the people of this country. I can tell them that in the ranks of the Liberal party I know there are thousands of prohibitionists who are prepared to vote for prohibition if they can get it; but I say as emphatically, and I say it without shame, I do not believe it is a disgrace to say it, that there are thousands of prohibitionists in this country just as good and true as breathe in the world, who will support this government with all its wickedness, with all its treachery, as it is called, with all its broken promises, rather than be made the instruments to put in power in this country men who so long disgraced it by the kind of government they gave, and especially by the dishonesty that they practised towards the prohibitionists when in power.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). I did not want to interrupt my hon. friend till he finished his address, but he made a statement that is rather a grave one. If I understood him correctly, he says that the prohibition commission to which he alluded in rather sharp terms, deliberately and of set purpose excluded all evidence that could be deemed favourable to prohibition. Now, that is rather a broad statement for a young man to make in this House, and I would like him to give some proofs of it.

Mr. McCLURE. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am a young man, it is true, but I was old enough to attend some meetings of that commission, and I saw them deliberately excluding evidence when it was offered, evidence that no court of law would have excluded. I am old enough to have read the report of that commission, to have read the report of the nominees of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), and if he wants proof, let him read where the Rev. Joseph McLeod distinctly states what I have stated here to-day, that the commission did exclude such evidence, and what better proof does he want than that? Mr. McLeod deliberately stated that from the time the commission started out he had to fight to get in the evidence that he did get in, and that much that he sought to get in he did not get in. What better proof does the hon. gentleman want than that?

Mr. FOSTER. That is very different from what the hon. gentleman first stated.

Mr. McCLURE. Not at all. Only the day before yesterday I read the report to refresh my memory, and let any gentleman examine it, and he will find that my statement is substantiated word for word, and in stronger language than I have put it. So I say the hon. gentleman makes nothing by his interruption. Sir, I do not despair of the ultimate success of the prohibition movement. I do not regret that the plebiscite was taken; I dissent from the proposition that we lost ground by that plebiscite vote. Although not asked for, the campaign that was carried on throughout this country educated the people upon that question in a way they had never been educated before. We had many cobwebs cleared away, we had the leaders of both parties in this House stand up and brush away at once the bug-bear of the revenue which was flaunted in the face of the people as one of the terrors that they had to face, we had hundreds of other bug-bears swept away during that campaign; and there was such an understanding of the prohibition movement when that campaign was over as we never had before. That education and that agitation must still go on. Great reforms of this kind move slowly, and I am not going to be discouraged by the rebuffs that we have met with. You may call me an enthusiast if you like, you may call me an impractical man if you like, you may call me young and enthusiastic; all this is beside the question. I believe in spite of the dishonesty of political parties, in spite of the opposition of party caucuses, in spite of the opposition of party machines, that this principle is bound to have a fair test in Canada. What the result may be it is not for me to predict. But I do believe that in face of the gigantic evils of the liquor traffic, the enormous evils that press upon us every day, when we see not merely the victims of the traffic themselves, but the thousands upon thousands of others who are suffering indirectly from its consequences, when we cannot go into a home, when we cannot go into a community, without seeing these evils staring us in the face, then I say that the people of this country are forced to the conviction that not only must we have wide education upon this question, but we must have thrown around society the safeguards of restrictive legislation. Let it come from this government or some other government, some day it must come, and I do not despair that even from this discussion, and from the agitation that will follow it, the cause of prohibition will be advanced. If the principle be right eventually it must triumph, and such a proposition as I have made here to-night will be adopted by this parliament.

Mr. THOMAS CHRISTIE (Argenteuil). In rising to support this resolution, I do not intend to occupy the time of the House at any length. I merely desire to express my hearty approval of the motion now before the House in favour of the principle of prohibition, introduced by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). It is quite true that I would have been glad if we could have gone a step further and secured national prohibition at once; but as that is impracticable, I believe that this resolution, if adopted, will be a long step in the right direction, and is calculated ultimately to secure the total prohibition of the liquor traffic throughout the whole Dominion. In view of the fact that the majority of the electors voted in favour of prohibition, and especially since all the provinces with one exception gave a decisive majority for it, I think it devolves upon this House, it devolves upon the government, to see that some action is taken to meet the wishes of the electorate; indeed I think it is imperative that we should go as far as we possibly can in order to carry out the mandate of the electorate as expressed at the polls. It is quite true that a majority in the province of Quebec voted against it, but, whilst that might be a reason why prohibition should not be forced upon that province, it should not, in any way, bar the way to prevent other provinces from securing this great boon. If this measure is carried to a successful issue, as I hope it will be, we may reasonably expect that, even the province of Quebec will soon fall into line and be abreast of other provinces on this question, but, if no action is taken, if the vote of the people should be ignored, there can be no doubt that the country will be woefully disappointed. I trust that this measure will be carried, and that there will be ample measures taken for its enforcement, and if so, I have no doubt that it will be a great boon, that it will contribute very largely to the prosperity, the well-being, and the happiness of this Dominion. I will not further trespass on the time of the House, because I would like to see a vote taken, and it is not desirable that we should spend too much time speaking upon a question which has been so thoroughly discussed already.

Mr. T. D. CRAIG (East Durham). Mr. Speaker, I think that all the members of this House will admit that this question is one of the most important that we could discuss. I cannot say that I agree with the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) in stating that this question is not at all political, because, I think, it has been made political. I think the hon. member for Yarmouth, when he was in opposition, for several years, made this question a political one, and attempted to put the government in a hole at that time, on many occasions, by moving, not a resolution such as he has moved to-night, but a resolution in favour of total prohibition. I think it is worth while to contrast the attitude of the hon. member for Yarmouth at that time with his position at the present time. Then, he moved a resolution for the total prohibition of the importation, sale and manufacture of liquor in Canada.

Mr. FLINT. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) seconded it.

Mr. CRAIG. Yes; I stand just where I stood before. I am not going to second this one. That is the difference between the hon. member for Yarmouth and myself. I would not stultify myself by moving such a resolution as has been moved to-night in favour of partial prohibition. Now, I think there is one object of this resolution moved by the hon. member for Yarmouth, one very plain object, and that is, to get the government out of a very difficult position. The government placed this plebiscite in their political platform as one of the most important planks, and they gave the people the idea that they were favourable to prohibition. They did not say so distinctly, but they said: We will do this for the temperance people of the country. If we get into power we will grant a plebiscite, and if a majority of the electors vote in favour of prohibition we will give them a prohibitory liquor law. I think there is no doubt about that at all. I may have a little political feeling in the matter myself; I may look on it from my own standpoint, but, I think I can prove what I say by what was said by one of the hon. gentlemen who spoke here to-night, who belongs to the Liberal party, that the object of this resolution is to get the present government out of a difficult position. Just let me read some of the remarks made a few minutes ago by the hon. member for East Prince, P.E.I., (Mr. Bell). Referring to this resolution, the hon. member said that if this is granted, the sting of defeat will be taken away and the temperance people will feel that they have not been robbed. I think that amply sustains the statement that I have made, that this resolution has only one object, and that its object is to get the government out of the position they are in. A great many of the temperance people to-day feel that they have been robbed by the government, that the government have deceived them, that the government have not treated them properly, that the government promised to give them the plebiscite, and if there was not a direct promise there was an implied promise, that prohibition would be the result of a majority of votes, but we found afterwards that there was some secret understanding that there would have to be a certain proportion of votes cast before prohibition would be granted. I think the temperance people feel that they have been robbed by this government.

Mr. CHRISTIE.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig), himself said that there ought to be 50 per cent.

Mr. CRAIG. I am discussing the government; I am not discussing myself. I am not in a hole, and the government are. I did not propose the plebiscite. We did not go before the people offering them a plebiscite, but the government did, and they have placed themselves in this unfortunate position, that the hon. member for East Prince tells them that a great many people would abstain from voting unless they gave them something like this proposed measure, and that a great many others would vote against them. I do not say that; I am quoting what he says himself. He comes from the same province as the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, so that the hon. minister should be rather afraid of the result of the election in his own province. I want to read a little further what the hon. member for East Prince said. He said that the carrying of this resolution will show the temperance people that the government is their friend. That is political, I think—that the government is their friend, and that the Liberal government could be relied on to keep their pledges. I think the resolution is a very good one, taking it in that light. I do not think it is a bit of good for prohibition, but the hon. gentleman commends that resolution to the government because it will help the government out of the hole they have got into. I am not going to help the government out of a hole in that way. I do not think I should be called upon to do it. I think it is all right for their own supporters to do this; I think it is all right for members of the Dominion Alliance who belong to the Liberal party to do this, and there is no doubt that they are doing it, and that they are trying to help the government out of their difficulty. There is no doubt at all that a great many temperance people feel that they have been robbed, and now this resolution is brought forward to show them that they have not been robbed, and the hon. member for East Prince makes an appeal to the government to support this resolution and make the temperance people feel that they have not been robbed and that the government is their friend. The hon. gentleman says that it will show that the Liberal government can be relied on to keep their pledges. I am afraid that it will be found that the government cannot be relied on to keep their pledges. The temperance people will find that they have been robbed, and that the Liberal party cannot be relied on to keep their pledges. There is a great deal of politics in this. The hon. member for Yarmouth says that there is no politics in it. I want to read something from the Montreal Witness, which is an independent paper. We all know how independent it is. The Montreal Witness, in its edition of April 18, has an article entitled 'The Mandate of the Plebiscite,' and it goes on to say that Mr. Flint, of Yarmouth, will move in parliament demanding from the government a measure which will carry out the mandate of the people on prohibition. Which is not so at all because this resolution is not the mandate of the people. Then the article goes on to say:

The government has signified in the plainest terms that it does not regard the verdict of the plebiscite as warranting it in granting the legislation for which the country by a small majority pronounced.

And the Witness goes on to apologize for the government, and to excuse them from granting prohibition as a result of that plebiscite, arguing that they cannot and ought not do it because Quebec went against it, and the government should not do anything to offend the conscientious objections of Quebec. Well, there is no politics in that of course. The Witness is a very strong temperance paper, and the Witness is a very independent paper, but I venture to say, without fear of being at all libellous, that if the Conservative government had granted the plebiscite and the result had been the same as in the last plebiscite, we would not have found an article like this in the Montreal Witness. On the contrary, we would have found the Witness insisting that the Conservative government should bow to the will of the people, and insisting too that the temperance people all over Canada should demand that the Conservative government would give effect to that vote in accordance with the pledge made to this very important section of the community. I venture to say that that is what the Witness would have argued if a Conservative government was in the same position as the Liberal government on this question. But of course there is no politics in this. The Montreal Witness has written a very strong excuse for the government, and in fact, it says, that the government cannot grant prohibition under the circumstances. There is something else in this article, which of course is not at all political, as hon. gentlemen will see when I read it. It says:

A demand now that it should do this—

Referring to passing prohibition legislation for the whole country.

A demand now that it should do this would merely court the solid opposition of the government party on the ground that it was an expression of want of confidence, and of the majority of the Conservative party, because they do not believe in the measure.

Now, that is very kind of the Montreal Witness to allow the inference to go forth to the country, that if it was not a want of confidence motion the Liberal party are such strong prohibitionists they would vote for it; but the Conservative party could not vote for it, because they do not believe in prohibition. And yet there is no politics in that. The Montreal Witness goes further and talks about the excuse the government may make and it pretends to answer this excuse. It says:

Every one knows that prohibitionists want national prohibition, and demand nothing less. Every one knows that there must be many difficulties and imperfections about bringing about and enforcing provincial prohibition that would be eliminated by a national measure.

And yet the Montreal Witness goes on to argue in favour of the motion of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint.) It says:

The debate will, we hope, show to some extent where the members stand, &c.

I have merely read this article to show that as the member for Yarmouth, says, there is no politics in this. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that so far as I am concerned there is no politics in it. I have taken my stand on this question, and I shall abide by it. I was accused by members of my own party, and I was accused by the newspapers, of letting the right hon. the Prime Minister out of a hole by my statement, that I thought the government should not be asked to bring down a prohibitory Bill unless over 50 per cent of the voters on the list voted in favour of it. I stated that because it was my candid opinion, and I state so to-day. I stand right there, and I leave politics out of the question. I think this is a question above politics; but unfortunately this question is dragged into politics every time. I say without any offence to some hon. gentlemen, that many of the speeches made in this House with reference to prohibition are made from political motives, and made by members because they think it will be pleasing to their constituents; or because they feel they have to make them. I, Sir, do not believe in treating such an important question in that fashion. As was well said by the hon. gentleman for Yarmouth, or perhaps it was the member for East Prince (Mr. Bell), who said, that this prohibition Act could never be carried as a party measure. I agree with that. I say here to-day, that if the government will now bring in a prohibitory Bill, I will vote for it. If they bring in a Bill for the total prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in this country, I will support the government in that measure. That is where I stand, but I do not believe in these side winds which are brought in, and which are really brought in for political purposes, and I think the temperance people of this country should be done with them once and for all. I say, Mr. Speaker, that I have very little hope of seeing prohibition in this country. I have very little hope after the last plebiscite vote. That vote did not show that the people of this country were very anxious for prohibition after all. I say that frankly and sincerely. It did not show an overwhelming desire on the part of the people of this country for the total prohibition of the liquor traffic. I go further and I say, that I have not very much hope of seeing prohibition just because temperance men, the same as other men, stick to their party too much at election times and let the prohibition question stand to one side. We see that the Liberal party before the last elections were opposing the Conservative party because the Conservatives were in favour of protection. We heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), when in opposition denounce the Conservative party because they held to protection. Do we find any party in this country denounce any other party because they are not in favour of prohibition. We do not. Is protection more important than prohibition? It would seem so, for the members of the Liberal party will vote against a Conservative because he is in favour of protection, but they will not support a Conservative because he is a prohibitionist. I found that in my own experience. I found in my own election that I lost a good many voters who worked in a brewery because I was a prohibitionist, but I gained hardly any prohibitionist votes, because I was a prohibitionist. That is one reason why I have very little hope of seeing prohibition. I do not blame the members of this House; I do not blame the government, I blame the people themselves. If they want prohibition they can have it. I think it was Sir John Macdonald who told them, that they could have prohibition if they wanted it. If the people of this country want prohibition they can have prohibition, because they can send men here who can pass a prohibitory law and force the government to carry it out. I oppose the motion of the member for Yarmouth, and I do not think he believes in it himself in his heart. I doubt if he does. I do not think that any sensible person could believe in a motion of this kind. I have said that I have very little hope of seeing prohibition in this country, but I go further, and with reference to this motion before us to-night, I say that if it were carried into effect the condition under it would be far worse than any condition of things we have to-day. Just imagine prohibition in Ontario existing with the present state of affairs in the province of Quebec. I do not know how it could be enforced at all. One objection made to total prohibition is the difficulty of its enforcement, and that is a very great difficulty. It is a greater difficulty than the loss of revenue. Lying alongside a country like the United States for thousands of miles, the difficulties of enforcing total prohibition in Canada would be enormous. It might be possible—I do not know whether it would or not—but if there was total prohibition, the difficulties of enforcing it would be nothing compared with the difficulties of enforcing partial prohibition. So, Sir, I say that leaving politics out of the question altogether, and looking at it as a citizen of this country, and as a member of this parliament, I could not think for one moment of supporting the motion of the hon. member for Yarmouth. It would be impossible to enforce it. I have great sympathy with the temperance workers of Canada, and I stand along side of them. I said in this House before that I would always vote for a prohibition resolution, not that I thought prohibition was coming at once, but that I would like to see prohibition if we could have it, and it could be enforced. I would vote always for a prohibition resolution to show on what side I stood. I do not want to be ranked on the side of the liquor men. I stand on the side of the temperance people of this country. I respect them for what they have done, and even if they do not get prohibition, no one can look at what they have accomplished, and at the great strides in temperance which have resulted from their labours without having respect for the temperance people. I respect no temperance workers more than I do the Women's Christian Temperance Union. They are doing a great work in this country. They are exerting a great moral influence; and they will, no doubt, continue to do a good work. While I say all that, and while, if I were outside of this House, I would urge the government to pass a prohibitory liquor law, yet as a member of this House, I cannot stultify myself, with the sentiments I hold, by voting for the motion of the hon. member for Yarmouth. I hold in my hand a letter sent to me by the treasurer of the Dominion Alliance in Toronto, in which he points out that my constituency had a majority of 753 in favour of prohibition. I find, on looking at the figures of the plebiscite vote, that 1,368 voted for prohibition out of a total vote on the list of 4,700; whereas the total vote cast at the last Dominion election was 3,365. So that there were not half the number of votes cast for prohibition, that were cast in the Dominion election of 1896. I do not think that is any warrant to me to vote for prohibition; and especially I do not think I have any warrant for voting for partial prohibition. I am satisfied that this partial prohibition, if we were to have it, would be a complete failure. I do not intend to take up the time of the House. I have expressed my honest sentiments on this question off-hand. If the temperance people of this country are in earnest in their desire for prohibition, let them vote against every government that will not give them prohibition. If they do that, they may in time get a government that will give them prohibition; but until they do that they will never get it.

Mr. CRAIG.

Mr. ROBERT HOLMES (West Huron). Mr. Speaker, while there is considerable force in the remarks of the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), I am willing, as an individual, to go a step further than I did last year, and I intend to support the motion of the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure). The attitude which I took in the House last year, was that in my opinion, the government were not justified on the plebiscite vote in passing a prohibitory liquor law. That is still my opinion; yet I believe that the principle of prohibition is right, and that sooner or later it should be recognized in this country, in the form of law. I do not think there is an individual in this House who will attempt to minimize the evils that arise from the liquor traffic. I think these will be conceded by almost every member in the House; but whether we are able to put into operation and to enforce a prohibitory liquor law or not is an entirely different question. I believe that if a prohibitory liquor law were adopted, the people would rise to the emergency and would endeavour to enforce it. The argument has been put forth that this is a political dodge to get the government out of a hole. If the members on the opposition side of the House want to be consistent, it seems to me that, according to their own reasoning, they can put the government in a bigger hole than ever by voting for one of the two motions before the House tonight. I do not think the government is to be condemned because it has not introduced a law in harmony with the plebiscite vote. If we are to make any advance in prohibition legislation, we must do so apart from any political considerations. The question is one that is rising in public opinion; there is a certain amount of force behind it; and whether we desire to do so or not, we cannot as a legislature afford to ignore this important question. I see a great many obstacles in the way of the enforcement of a prohibitory liquor law, particularly provincial prohibition; yet we find prohibitory laws in force in some of the neighbouring states. In the state of Maine, so successful has the prohibitory liquor law been, that it has become a part of the state constitution. When I have been told that it has been a failure in that state, I have asked, how comes it that the people of the state of Maine, knowing the shortcomings of the law, as they must, and knowing the evils that would arise from its non-enforcement, have yet made it a part of the state constitution, and on two occasions have refused to repeal it? That is an evidence the measure is fairly successful; and, I believe, that if such a law were introduced into this country, there would be such a strong force of public opinion behind it, that it would become as successful as any law of that kind could be. I do not wish to take up the time of the House, as there are, no doubt, many others who wish to speak on the question; but I have no hesitation in saying, so far as my individual vote and influence are concerned, that I am in favour of prohibition of the liquor traffic, with all the objections and disadvantages of such a law, and I am willing, as an individual, to do all I can to assist in its enforcement.

Mr. PETER MACDONALD (East Huron). Mr. Speaker, this question has come before this House for many years. I think that there have only been one or two sessions during the fifteen sessions in which I have had the honour of a seat in this House, in which a resolution of this kind has not been moved. I suppose that there are not many here who do not know my opinions on this question. Personally I am a prohibitionist. I would like to see a prohibitory law on the statute-book of Canada, if I felt sure that the public sentiment behind it were sufficiently strong to carry its provisions into effect. It is said that the government are to blame in having given the opportunity to the people of this country to express their desire for prohibition. I think the government did what was fair and just in placing that opportunity before the people, free of all entanglements, so that each person had an opportunity of coming forward and voting for or against prohibition. I have never heard or read anywhere, where the government promised prohibition on a mere majority vote. My own opinion is, and I have candidly expressed it, that the vote given in September, 1898, would not justify the government in introducing a prohibitory liquor law, and placing it on the statute-book. When the opportunity was given to the people of this country to vote on the question, and only 41 per cent of the entire vote was polled, that fact conveys to my mind the strong conviction that those who did not vote, had the temperance question very little at heart indeed. When I spoke on public platforms on the question, I urged very strongly the necessity of the people coming out and polling a very large vote. I told them that the government would attach importance to the non-voters, and that I regarded seven out of every ten who did not vote, as being practically against a prohibitory liquor law—that any man who would not walk two or three blocks or drive two or three miles to vote, would not be likely to give any assistance in carrying out the law, but would probably tell us that we were the cause of bringing the law into effect, and might carry it out as best we could. Therefore, I regard a prohibitory law for the whole country as out of the question at present. But a large section of the temperance people, particularly in Ontario, in the western and in the maritime provinces, are desirous that some measure should be adopted whereby each province that felt so disposed, could have a prohibitory liquor law.

Although I must candidly say that I do not feel very much confidence in a local prohibitory law, still I do not feel justified in opposing this demand that is made by such a large and respectable body of men as the Dominion Temperance Alliance. If, after much consideration on their part, and weighing all the difficulties, they have come to the conclusion that a law of that kind would be beneficial, I do not think I would be justified in voting against it. Therefore, when the vote comes, I will record mine in favour of the resolution of the hon. member for Yarmouth, believing that in some of the provinces there is a sufficient preponderance of sentiment to enable the law proposed to be carried out in such a way as will tend to the great moral and material advantage of the people.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). I have just a word or two, Mr. Speaker, to say with regard to the amendment now before the House. I wish to say, in the first place, that I have received from a lodge of the Royal Templars of Temperance, a resolution, which they have asked me to bring before the House at the proper time. It is dated the 5th March, 1900, and is as follows:

Mr. Geo. Taylor, M.P.

Dear Sir,—At the last regular meeting of Gananoque Council, No. 284, on motion of Brother C. H. Hurd, seconded by Brother R. Sheppard, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Whereas the present Dominion government took a plebiscite of votes of the people as to the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes in Canada on the 1st day of September, 1898;

And whereas, out of the total number of votes polled a large majority thereof were for prohibition;

Therefore, be it resolved, that the Council No. 284, Royal Templars of Temperance, duly in council assembled, demand that the Dominion government redeem the pledges given to the electors of this country and at once, without further delay, introduce the question of prohibitory legislation in parliament;

Also, that a copy of this resolution, officially signed and sealed with the seal of this council, be forwarded by the secretary to our representative, Mr. Geo. Taylor, M.P.

Signed in behalf of Gananoque Council, No. 284.

Yours in H., L. and T.,

O. W. SHEETS,

Select Councillor.

C. R. HURD,

Recording Secretary.

R. SHEPPARD,

Financial Secretary.

It appears to me that that has the true ring about it, without any politics. This government did make a distinct pledge to the people. They pledged themselves that, if returned to power, they would have a plebiscite on the question of prohibitory legislation, and that if the people declared in favour of prohibition, they would give effect to their will. The people took them at their word and elected them to power. After waiting a year or two, this government submitted the question to the people; but in place of allowing the people to express their unbiased opinion, without being influenced one way or the other, three cabinet ministers took the stump in the province of Quebec against prohibitory legislation. They said to the habitants down there: If you vote in favour of prohibition, you will put the government in a hole, you will ruin Sir Wilfrid Laurier, you will drive him from office, and not only will you do that, but you will tax yourselves $2 a head to make up the deficit in revenue. You can well imagine, Mr. Speaker, what a heavy tax that would be in the province of Quebec, where it is not unusual for families to number fifteen or twenty persons. That would mean a tax of $20 or $30 per family. When we found such men as the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) telling his constituents that if they voted for prohibition, they would be voting for a tax of $20 or $30 per family, besides drive Sir Wilfrid Laurier from office, how could it be expected that they would cast a vote in favour of prohibition? Why did not the government submit the question fairly and honestly to the people, and leave the people free to form an unbiased judgment?

I have also a letter from a political organization, the Dominion Alliance, which has been running this question for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite for years. That cannot be doubted. I have seen Mr. Spence and his associates up here, year after year, assisting my hon. friend, the author of the resolution before the House. (Mr. Flint), to manipulate temperance sentiment, and help this government out of the hole they got into. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have a circular from Mr. Orr, on behalf of the Dominion Alliance, one of the many which he has sent out to hon. members of this House, asking them to support the resolution of the hon. member for Yarmouth.

An hon. MEMBER. Read it.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is too long and absurd, and the hon. gentleman has one himself, which he can take every opportunity to read. I have also a letter from a Methodist minister in my own constituency, who writes to me as follows:

I understand that you are the prohibitionist—

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. TAYLOR. He is correct in that——yet, though I ask your support for the resolution of Mr. Flint, I do not feel satisfied with it. It seems to me it should have been a Bill instead of a resolution—giving effect at once to the policy it advocates.

That gentleman is honest, straightforward, and sincere, and the resolution is not. If my hon. friend from Yarmouth wants a law put on the statute-book, why does he not propose a Bill, or use his influence with the government to introduce a Bill, giving effect to the pledge they made to the people. If the government cannot go the whole hog, if they want to exempt the province of Quebec, let them bring in a Bill, and not a bald resolution—a resolution carefully devised and with an amendment already prepared to be tacked on to it. The whole device is too thin, and the people can see through it—a resolution from a supporter of the government and an amendment from the same side. My hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), did not ask my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Bennett), who has been always honest and straightforward in his principles, to support his amendments or his resolutions, introduced from year to year, sometimes on going into supply, when the carrying of such an amendment would have the effect of defeating the government.

Mr. FLINT. It never was moved on going into supply.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend, the Minister of Inland Revenue, when I referred to him a moment ago, rose from his seat, and I thought he was going to reply, but he simply went out, and I see he has returned.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) I did not hear what my hon. friend said, and would be glad to hear him now.

Mr. TAYLOR. Had my hon. friend remained in his seat, I intended to make other references to the plebiscite in Quebec. Not only did three members of the government take the stump against prohibition, but the ballot boxes were kept open for weeks after the polls were closed. In some polls the ballot boxes contained more votes against prohibition than could be found on the roll. How did these bulletins get into the ballot boxes, if they were not stuffed?

I have another statement to make before resuming my seat. Mr. Spence, the secretary of the Dominion Alliance, when he worked out this percentage on behalf of the government, made the statement that he had counted every name on the voters' list. Well, I know that in my own municipality, the names of hundreds of voters appeared two or three times on the lists, and they were all counted as voters, although only one vote could be given. But in the province of Quebec, one man would have his name on the lists in several municipalities, and would cast a vote in each, so that his vote would be counted seven or eight times against prohibition. That is the way the percentage of 23 per cent was arrived at, to which my hon. friend has referred. It must be admitted by any one who is not biased, that there was just as large, or nearly as large, a vote given when the plebiscite was taken, as is usually given in a parliamentary election.

An hon. MEMBER. Larger than in the last election.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, and yet they say the vote cast was only 23 per cent. It certainly was more than 23 per cent of the persons entitled to vote. I am prepared to support any honest movement in favour of total prohibition. And I am not in favour of trying to get this government out of the hole they have got into with the honest temperance people of this country, when they promised to submit a vote so as to have a fair expression of public opinion and if the majority favoured it, they would give effect to the will of the people. Now, let them do it.

Mr. GILBERT W. GANONG (Charlotte). Last year, when this question came before the House, we had an effort made to relieve this government of responsibility, which is repeated this year. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) appeals to keep this question out of politics. He also states that this parliament is responsible, that any parliament would be responsible rather than the government. I would like to know what action that gentleman has ever taken to find out what the opinion of this parliament as constituted to-day is. This evening he stated that he was simply carrying out the views of the alliance. I would like to ask him if he ever submitted this resolution to the leaders of this government before he brought it to the House. The hon. gentleman is not prepared to answer. His instructions last year from the Temperance Alliance were to make his resolution cover just as much as the members of this government would allow him to bring into the House. Did he do that? No, Sir. I have it on the word of Mr. Spence, the secretary, that he did not follow out his instructions. This year, we have the same farce over again. Last year they put the job up, they did not even placard it upon the door, that the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) would move an amendment, and the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmalee) would be on his feet before it was possible for any one to move. I do not know whether the hon. member for Shefford has gone back on them this year or not. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) is not here to move the adjournment of the debate. Perhaps some one else will fill that place. I believe, as the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) has stated, that this is nothing more than a farce to get the government out of a hole. Even the hon. member for Colchester says he does not want to hold the government to the plebiscite. Of course he does not, for that would make the government responsible. He is fulfilling his part also, with the post office over in Truro in prospect. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) does not seem to take the word of the hon. member for Colchester. The hon. member for Colchester stated that this does not suit the maritime provinces, but the hon. member for East Huron says that it is desired by the maritime provinces. Let us see what they say :

Provincial prohibition has been proposed by resolution in parliament. It was not the humour of our association to confuse the direct issue by approving of partial and untested measures.

This is part of a resolution passed by the Maritime Prohibition Association in the city of Moncton, where all the maritime workers for prohibition met within the last few weeks. The secretary, I believe, comes from the county of Yarmouth.

Now, there is no question whatever that this is one of the most important questions that has ever come before the country ; but, it is evident the government do not think so. How many are there on the front benches to-night? The right hon. leader of that party (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), not only on this question, but on every other question, has had his roller skates on ever since 1896 ; and when he makes the next political circuit these same rollers will land him in opposition again. I say to those hon. gentlemen : You cannot very well stand on the old platform, for you have put it in pawn, and you will never take it out again. What did the right hon. gentleman say in the past ?
Mr. TAYLOR.

If the plebiscite meets with the support of the majority of the people, those who find themselves in a minority will have to concur in the verdict of the majority.

Is he on the same platform, or has he rolled out of sight on that question? But that was before an election. He was trying to head a procession, and he had as his lieutenant the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) to assist him. Now, things have changed. He knows that he has 278,000 people that he has to be responsible to pushing behind him, and he knows with that vote against him, he will be where he was before 1896. They claim that the government were not bound by the plebiscite. Is this government bound by anything? The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) comes down to my county and says : You must not judge the government by the statement of one member of it. And the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) stood on the same platform and made the same statement. I have it here in a Grit paper, if he would like to hear me read it. But, where is the right hon. First Minister? What did he say in regard to this question? He committed every member of the Liberal party, if he is leader of the Liberal party, when he made the statement recorded in Hansard, pages 94-95, 1899 :

Let me say this: When we put that plank into our platform there was an implied agreement between the members of the party who believed in prohibition and those who did not believe in prohibition. The implied agreement on the part of those who did not believe in prohibition was that if the voice of the people spoke unmistakably, if it should be shown that the great majority of the electorate were in favour of prohibition, then those who did not believe in it would surrender their views to those of their brothers, and would work honestly for the success of that policy.

But he did not stop there.

On the other hand, there was an engagement on the part of those who believed in prohibition that if the voice of the people on the subject should not be of sufficient strength to warrant the adoption by the party of the policy of prohibition they would also square their views to those of their brothers——and we would hear no more of that question in the ranks of the party. That was the policy we adopted, and that was the policy we carried out, and what is the result?

What next?

Where is the First Minister to-night? Has he changed his opinion? The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), who sits behind him, when questioned by the late Mr. Ives, shrank from answering as a square man should answer. He hid beneath the skirts of his leader. Will he hide beneath the skirts of his leader on this question? He is as much pledged to-night as the First Minister, and every man in that party, was pledged by the statement of the First Minister that, so far as the Liberal party is concerned, the prohibition question will never be heard again in the ranks of that party. I would suggest to hon. gentlemen opposite that, when sending out campaign literature they should send out this declaration that, so far as prohibition is concerned, you will never hear more of it in the ranks of the Liberal party.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture, when he was asked by Mr. Ives in regard to that statement on the question as to the vote—and I believe the hon. member for Yarmouth is in the same box as the Minister of Agriculture—answered:

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ives) must know perfectly well that the Prime Minister has made a statement here on the floor of this House, and he is bound to accept that statement. I have nothing further to say in the matter, Mr. Speaker.

Now, there were other statements of the Minister of Agriculture, one of which was to this effect:

He felt that he had been selected for a seat in the cabinet largely as the representative of the temperance sentiment, but he assured his hearers that the temperance cause had many other friends in the Council Chamber.

Mr. Speaker, would you be kind enough, for the information of this House and this country, to ask the other members of that council who favoured it to stand on their feet. We know that there are several who spoke against prohibition in Quebec. We know that the new member of the cabinet, the member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), when he was chief whip of the party, told his followers in the committee room upstairs that they were making fools of themselves, and that they did not know what they were talking about. So we would like to have some expression from the other members of the cabinet. I see there are three of them in the House at present, and if those who were in favour of prohibition would show it by standing on their feet, it would be a great satisfaction to the country. Now, Sir, the fact is that the member for Yarmouth has been used merely as a scapegoat for the party. He has used up hundreds and hundreds of pages of Hansard advocating prohibition. He offers a resolution to this House to-night for which he has no mandate from the electors of his county. Not a man who will vote for that resolution to-night, if it be voted on, will have a mandate from his constituents behind him. The majority of those who voted on the plebiscite voted for total prohibition and not partial prohibition. Now, the member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) is very much afraid that possibly he or somebody else might be called upon to vote for a good Liberal prohibitionist. I have only this to say with regard to that matter. I take the statement of the Prime Minister that so far as the party is concerned that question has been dropped by the party. I do not believe that any honest temperance worker, either Liberal or Conservative, can vote for a Liberal at the next general election, because if he votes for a Liberal he votes for the leader who has given his word that so far as the Liberal party is concerned the question of prohibition has dropped for ever. I have just had placed in my hand a copy of the Hansard where I find that the Minister of Agriculture has stated:

There was no secret arrangement made of any kind whatever.

Well, where is the First Minister? He is on his rollers again. Is it possible that the member for Yarmouth can tell us just what his resolution means? Does it mean the total suppression of the manufacture as well as the sale? The resolution is very indefinite when you come to read it. Today a prominent temperance worker outside of this House, expressed to me his surprise that such a construction could be put upon the resolution. Unless it does mean that it would be possible to manufacture all the whisky you had a mind to in Ontario or Quebec, even if they passed a law so that they might carry out the question of restricting the use of alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes. It may possibly not be open to that construction, but it is quite evident that the temperance workers have already put that construction on it. Now, Sir, I will go a little further perhaps than any of the prohibitionists who have spoken this evening. I am a prohibitionist on principle, I believe that prohibition is possible, and perhaps I am a little too radical in my opinions on that question. If a law were passed I should make it a Dominion law with all the force of the Dominion parliament behind it, the same as a customs law. I would go further. I do not think the Customs Department is overworked, and I would authorize our hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), to enforce that law through his numerous officers. I would go further still—and I am very glad to say that this would not apply to the present Minister of Customs—I would set a limit of time within which every officer in that department should quit using alcoholic beverages, or else lose his position. That, Mr. Speaker, is my position on the temperance question.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). In rising to speak on this question, I will say at the outset that my principles as a temperance man lead me heartily to desire that the legislation of this country should be of a character to forward the interests of temperance. I should be glad if we could have a law upon our statute-book prohibiting the manufacture, the importation and the sale of intoxicating drinks. That is a position that, as a temperance man, I am prepared to uphold, a position, which in my opinion, is unassailable so far as the principle at stake is concerned. But while it may be desirable to have a certain kind of legislation, while it may be desirable to attempt to regulate the habits of the people of this country in such a way as to promote their welfare and temperance habits, yet the question will naturally arise as to the ability of this House to perform that task and to carry out such legislation. Now, Sir, the question of prohibition was referred to the people of this country for an expression of their opinion, and the government pledged itself to be governed by the clearly expressed opinion and desires of the electorate. That question, upon reference to the people, received the votes of 44 per cent of the entire electorate. At the previous election, on a list three years old, 66 per cent of the electorate voted. Upon this occasion there were 22 per cent less than voted in the previous general election. Now, while I would have been glad to see a pronounced expression of the public opinion of Canada in favour of prohibition, yet I am sorry to say that such a pronounced expression of opinion was not given, that but 23 per cent of the entire electorate voted for a prohibitory law. Under these circumstances I cannot believe that the government received a mandate from the electorate of Canada as to the course it should pursue in this regard; I think that under the terms of the reference of that question to the people, the government were not warranted in taking action in a direction which only 23 per cent of the electorate sanctioned by their votes. For that reason, although I would have been glad to have seen a pronounced expression of public opinion in favour of such a law, although I would have been glad to have seen that law on the statute-book, yet, I think, that a greater disaster than the ravages of intemperance, to-day, would be the placing of a law on the statute-book in reference to the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors which was a dead letter, and having no public opinion to sustain such a law, the law would be a dead letter. I have known, in the course of my experience, cases where prohibitory laws have been placed on the statute-books of commonwealths, and I have known cases where these laws were totally disregarded, where there was no public opinion to back them up, where there was no public opinion demanding their enforcement, where there was, in consequence of the existence of such laws, no regulation whatever in regard to the liquor traffic, where it was a matter of free trade in liquor with no government supervision and no check upon the traffic, and I believe that such a condition of things in this country would be infinitely worse than it is under the plan whereby the liquor traffic is regulated by the different provinces in this Dominion. I repeat, that, while my opinion and wishes would have been in favour of such a law, yet, I do not think that, under the circumstances, the government were warranted in taking the step that many of our friends think they should have taken, because, they have no evidence of the existence of a public opinion that demanded such a law, or that it would have sustained such a law in its operations if it had been enacted. Last year when this question was discussed I thought the demand that the government should have enacted a law on the mandate of 23 per cent of the electorate of the country was not a reasonable demand, and that, if it had been complied with, it would have resulted in disaster, and in the defeat of the wishes of those who desired the adoption of the resolution. Taking this view of the case, I am not prepared to vote for a prohibitory law much as I would desire to see one enacted. But, while the condition of the matter is in the shape that it is in, I am quite prepared to say, that if the government sees fit to enact a prohibitory law in the provinces that pronounced in favour of it, and to refrain from enacting such a law in the province that pronounced against it, I am quite willing as a temperance man, and I would desire to support the motion, but, I think it would be an outrage on a province, such as the province of Quebec, to force upon it a law which the electorate has pronounced against. I do not believe it would be in the interest of confederation, I do not believe it would be productive of good results to enact a law of this parliament to provide for prohibition, not only in every province that voted for prohibition, but, for the great province of Quebec, that voted against it. I would hesitate very much before I would think of supporting a measure such as that. But, in regard to the other provinces, if a law which is partial in its application, which is applicable to one province, or to a number of provinces, and which excepts some provinces, or one province, from its operation, is constitutional, I would support such a measure. There is, however, the question as to the constitutionality of that Act. That is not a question for me to decide, and in supporting the motion of the hon. member for Yarmouth, I state freely and fully, that, while I am in favour of the application of the principle, if it can be applied, the question of its constitutionality will have to be settled, and if it is unconstitutional in this country to adopt partial legislation that relates to a particular province, and relieves from the application of the law one or more provinces, that is a question which I am not called upon to decide, and that difficulty, if such a difficulty does exist, may be overcome, may be obviated by the relegating of this entire question to the provinces, and saying to the provinces: We authorize you to deal with this question on your own behalf. If the different provinces choose to adopt prohibition they may do so, and each province that chooses to refrain from adopting prohibition may refrain from doing so. Under these circumstances, while agreeing fully with the advocates of prohibition as to the desirability of such legislation, while agreeing fully that the evils of intemperance are gigantic and that they cannot be overstated, while expressing the desire that it lay in our power, or was possible for us to attempt to pass a prohibitory liquor law, yet, under the circumstances of this verdict of the people, or want of a verdict of the people, because out of 44 per cent that voted only 23 per cent voted in favour of prohibition, it would be folly, in my estimation, for the government to act upon that verdict of the people in the direction of passing a prohibitory law for the entire Dominion. This is as far as I would attempt to go, as I would think myself justified in going as a member of this House, to vote for the motion which has been tabled by the hon. member for Yarmouth, a motion which I will support with the statement I make that I have doubts as to the constitutionality of the application of the principle that is contained in that motion, although, perhaps, the necessity would be found to exist, if the motion was passed, that we should come to the point of relegating this question to the provinces themselves.

Mr. J. GUNION RUTHERFORD (Macdonald). Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy very much time in the discussion of this question. I regret exceedingly that a question such as this should be treated by hon. members on the other side of the House as a political question. I think it is a question altogether apart from the ordinary political issues that we are called upon to discuss, and it was with a feeling of sincere regret that I heard hon. gentlemen, calling themselves prohibitionists—ardent prohibitionists—attacking the hon. member for Yarmouth, (Mr. Flint), as if he were actuated by political motives in bringing this resolution before the House. It appears to me that there need be no great discussion of the question of the advisability of introducing a prohibitory liquor law applicable to the whole Dominion, because, as has been stated by several speakers, here to-night, neither the government, nor this parliament, have received any mandate from the people of Canada, asking for such legislation. The plebiscite was, to the prohibitionists throughout the Dominion, myself among the number, a very great disappointment because it showed, that, while there were certainly prohibitionists in Canada, there were not enough of people earnestly desirous of having prohibitory legislation enacted to make it safe or reasonable for the government, or this parliament, to pass such legislation. The small percentage of votes cast did not warrant the government in introducing a general prohibitory law, while there were other difficulties. The vote of the province of Quebec, was an insurmountable obstacle, and, as has been stated, there was considerable difficulty in the way of having an Act enforced throughout the whole Dominion, unless there was a very much greater popular sentiment in favour of it than was demonstrated by the vote on the plebiscite. This resolution, while, perhaps, open to the objection raised by the last speaker, the hon. member for North Norfolk, (Mr. Charlton), that it is not constitutional, I must confess, appears to me, a very reasonable substitute for a general prohibitory law. I read this resolution somewhat differently from the hon. member for North Norfolk. I think under this resolution, it would be quite competent for this House to pass legislation, giving the provinces power to regulate the liquor traffic for themselves.

An hon. MEMBER. Does the resolution say so?

Mr. RUTHERFORD. We will take this last sentence of the resolution:

—enact such measures as will secure the prohibition of the liquor traffic for beverage purposes in at least those provinces and territories which have voted in favour of such prohibition.

Now, the question arises whether that applies to the general plebiscite or to the provincial plebiscites. For instance, the province of Ontario voted strongly in favour of prohibition in the provincial plebiscite, and so also did the province of Manitoba whence I come. Not being a lawyer, it is just a question with me whether or not this resolution is so worded that it would be competent for the government to pass legislation relegating the power of legislating on prohibition to the provinces themselves. Taking the ground that it is, I am certainly in favour of this resolution. I think it is a very good step on the way towards general prohibition. Those of us who have watched the trend of public opinion upon this question all know that popular sentiment in favour of the abolition of the liquor traffic is steadily and rapidly growing. In the memory of the youngest members of this House, a very great change has taken place in public opinion upon this important question. The suggestion made by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Ganong), in a mere jocular way I suppose, that the officials of the Customs Department should be informed that if they did not desist from the use of alcoholic liquors they would be dismissed; while perhaps not practical entirely, is one which is well worth the consideration of this government, and not only in regard to the officials of the Customs Department but in regard to all the other public servants in the country. We know that very many of the largest employers of labour in Canada are now making it a rule that their employees shall be abstainers from alcoholic beverages.

Mr. ELLIS. You should begin with parliament.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I think it would be a very good idea. I may say that so far as I am concerned I began some time ago.

Mr. ELLIS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. There is to my mind no good reason for this House refusing to allow the provinces to legislate on this question for themselves. There might be a constitutional reason, however. I understand that the British North America Act gives the power of dealing with trade and commerce entirely to the Dominion parliament; but I fancy that even that could be got over if this parliament were to approach the British House of Commons with an amendment to the British North America Act, excepting the liquor traffic from the operation of that clause. As was mentioned by one speaker on the opposite side, the late Sir John Macdonald informed the people of Canada that if at any time they wanted prohibition they could have it. Well, if at any time the people of Canada want to give the provinces power to legislate on prohibition they can do so; the one is as true as the other. Taking this view of the case the argument of the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), that it would be impossible for us to enforce the law if it were passed in the provinces individually, can have no force; because it would devolve upon the provincial governments which brought the prohibitory legislation into effect to enforce the law, and not upon this government or upon this parliament.

I wish to speak for a few moments upon the purely local aspect of this question as it affects Manitoba. The hon. member (Mr. Craig) stated that great difficulties would exist in maintaining a prohibitory liquor law against the province of Quebec and against the United States. As far as the province of Manitoba is concerned, this argument does not apply. The province of Manitoba not only gave an overwhelming vote in favour of prohibition in 1892, and again in 1898, but it is so situated geographically that there would be little or no difficulty in enforcing prohibition there, provided the power to deal with the question were vested in the local legislature. Manitoba is bounded on the east by an almost uninhabited portion of the province of Ontario; it is bounded on the south for the greater portion of its length by the state of North Dakota, which has been a prohibition state for a great many years. There is a small portion of the state of Minnesota on the south-eastern part of the province, but that can be very easily guarded against. On the west it is bounded by the North-west Territories, a sparsely-settled country, and on the north, of course there is no settlement at all. I do not know where there could be a more favourable field for the experiment of provincial prohibitory legislation than in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. RUTHERFORD.

Mr. TAYLOR. Do not grant any licenses and you have got it.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. That would not interfere with the importation or with the manufacture, and these are the two difficulties which we have to meet.

Mr. CASEY. You would reduce your revenue.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. The revenue of the province would be very little reduced by prohibitory legislation, but, as I have pointed out, the refusal to grant licenses would not do away with the importation or manufacture. Now, Mr. Speaker, the people of Manitoba are really very largely in favour of prohibition. In my own constituency they voted 10 to 1 on the Dominion plebiscite, and I think even a larger percentage in the provincial plebiscite in 1892, voted in favour of prohibition. The people there in many cases are total abstainers. The part of the country in which I have the honour to live, the Portage Plains district, is noted for the sobriety and temperance of its citizens, and I may say that in that part of the province the licenses are exceedingly few and far between. In the town of Portage la Prairie there are several licensed hotels, but for 90 miles in a north-westerly direction no license exists. No license at all exists to the north unless it is in that newly discovered country at the North Pole. No license exists within 56 miles to the east, no license exists within 50 miles to the west, and no license exists within 40 miles to the south. You have there an enormous area of country which is to-day practically under prohibition. I am satisfied that the local conditions of that province are entirely in favour of such an experiment as we have outlined in this resolution. I have dealt with the geographical and local conditions, and I shall now deal with the political conditions. The people there are anxious to have this legislation and the late provincial government went as far as it possibly could in that direction. In 1893 it approached the Dominion government and asked for legislation having in view the granting of the power to the province to pass prohibitory legislation, but without success. The present Prime Minister of that province, Mr. Hugh John Macdonald, has pledged his word to pass prohibitory legislation as far as he possibly can, and I think it would be a mistake for this government and this House to stand in the way of the hon. gentleman's ambition in that direction. I think that the government of that province should be given full scope to deal with this question in whatever way it might deem best. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Ganong) said that no member on this side of the House who would vote for this question had a direct mandate from his people to do so. Well, that just depends upon whether the mandate given by the people of, say my own constituency, at the provincial election plebiscite in 1892, holds good in this case or not. For my part I think it does. When the people of my constituency voted in 1892, they voted in favour of obtaining just such rights and privileges as are outlined in this resolution, and therefore, I consider that I for one have a direct mandate from the people of my constituency to vote for it. So far as I am concerned, I am a practical prohibitionist; I prohibit myself, and I fancy that if all the people of Canada would do the same thing, we would have no difficulty in enforcing this legislation. I am also in this case an advocate of provincial autonomy. I believe that the provinces should have the power to legislate on this as on other questions. I do not think it is fair that the great majority of the people in the province of Manitoba who are in favour of prohibitory legislation should be denied that privilege, because people many hundreds of miles away, under entirely different conditions, do not desire it. Therefore, without taking up any more time of the House, I have much pleasure in stating that I will support the resolution of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint).

Mr. A. H. MOORE (Stanstead). Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy very much time in the discussion of this subject. My constituents, and in fact all the people of the eastern townships, know pretty well my views on this question. There is one thing on which we all agree, that is, that it is a very important subject. I think we also agree that the liquor traffic is a great injury to individuals as well as to the community, and a great obstruction to the prosperity of the country. That it is an evil all will admit. Efforts have been made for many years to do away with this evil by means of different laws. We have had the Dunkin Act of 1864, and the Scott Act of 1878; but both of these laws have proved ineffectual. The Scott Act has been cited as the most important Act in the way of prohibition that has ever been placed on the statute-book of this country; but that Act has been discarded in almost every part of the country where it has been tried. I have in my hand the reasons assigned for the repeal of the Scott Act by the secretary of the Dominion Alliance in a book entitled 'The Facts of the Case.'

The Scott Act was not what the people wanted. They had petitioned parliament for total prohibition. They were given a local law, and therefore manifestly difficult of working. The measure was a compromise, and as such did not enlist the enthusiasm that would have hailed the measure which the people desired.

The Scott Act, which the hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Bell) now proposes to extend to the provinces, was thus condemned by the secretary of the Dominion Alliance. Another objection to it was 'the giving of evidence by witnesses against their neighbours, thus leading to much bitterness and hard feeling.' Another objection was 'the conflict between the Dominion and the provincial authorities,' which it has taken a great many years to settle, and which is not settled yet; and, from the indecision of all the lawyers who have spoken on this question, we have reason to believe that the conflict will continue for many years to come if the resolution of the hon. member for Yarmouth is adopted. I think some hon. gentleman cited the Witness as stating that the Dominion Alliance had demanded this resolution. I would like to know what right any one has to say that. I regretted very much to hear the hon. member for Colchester speak so disrespectfully of that large and important institution. The resolution is entirely contrary to the principles of the Dominion Alliance, unless those principles have changed since 1898. Let me read what some of those principles are:

The council watches Dominion legislation and persistently seeks to press upon the parliament the important question of national prohibition.—

Not local prohibition.

—that the traffic in intoxicating beverages is hostile to the true interests of individuals, and destructive of the order and welfare of society, and ought therefore to be prohibited.

Nowhere in the articles of faith of the Dominion Alliance can it be found that local prohibition is what they recommend. After the repeal of the Scott Act in all the counties of Ontario and all the counties of Quebec except perhaps one, the temperance Reformers of Canada came to the determination that they would accept no local option law, but that they would follow the advice of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), and strike out straight from the shoulder for prohibition. That was the advice he gave from the public platform to the temperance people in the eastern townships, on many occasions; he advised them to accept nothing short of total prohibition, and that is what the people want at the present time, and not a local option law. We have good evidence of that in the vote in Ontario. Twenty-five counties and two cities in Ontario adopted the Scott Act, a local option law, and in 1898 and 1899 it was repealed in every one of them, while in the plebiscite vote a large majority of the electors of Ontario voted in favour of prohibition. In the county which the hon. Minister of Agriculture represents, since the vote on the plebiscite, the Scott Act was submitted for repeal, and while that county voted by a majority of about 500 in favour of prohibition, it voted by a majority of nearly 500 for the repeal of the Scott Act. The county of Stanstead also voted on the plebiscite in favour of prohibition by a majority of 1,000, while it gave a majority of 142 against the Scott Act. This shows conclusively that the sentiment of the people of this country is in favour of prohibition and not in favour of a local option law such as is proposed in the resolution of the hon. member for Yarmouth. My feelings are well known with regard to the action of the government in connection with this matter, and I need not take up the time of the House in saying that I believe that the temperance organizations, the churches and all who have expressed their views on this matter, hold that the government are reprehensible for their action. I will say no more with regard to this question, but if it comes to a vote, I will vote for the motion of the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure), which is for the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors throughout the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). I would like some of the hon. gentlemen opposite to point out what they mean by saying that the government have had a mandate to bring in a prohibitory liquor law. I do not know of any moderate prohibitionist in Canada, one who is not a blind partisan, who will not admit that the plebiscite was not by any means a mandate to the government to bring in a prohibitory measure.

My hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig) stated distinctly in this House tonight, as he also did previously, that he does not consider the vote given a sufficient mandate for the government to bring in a prohibitory measure, so that there is at least one gentleman, among hon. members opposite, who is prepared to do the government justice on this point. My hon. friend, however, seems to think that this resolution of the hon. member for Yarmouth was intended to get the government out of a difficulty. He should remember, however, that the resolution was not prepared by the hon. member for Yarmouth, but by the temperance organization of this Dominion, the head of which is in Toronto, and was not introduced by my hon. friend from Yarmouth as the resolution prepared by him, but as one drafted by that body.

Mr. MOORE.

My hon. friend from Durham has told us that although a prohibitionist who has always voted in favour of prohibition, and who is known to have very pronounced views on the subject, yet Reformers in his own riding, who profess to be very strong temperance men, did not give him their support. Well, I can reply to my hon. friend that I have met with similar treatment from the Tory temperance people in my constituency. I know that in one township there is such a pronounced temperance sentiment that you could not get a sufficient number of men to endorse an application for one hotel license, and yet, although in every instance in which prohibition has been before the House, I have voted for it, these very men went solidly against me, which shows that, just as in the constituency of my hon. friend from Durham, some men are Reformers first and prohibitionists afterwards, so in my riding they are Tory first and then prohibitionists.

We are told that my hon. friend from Yarmouth should have brought in a Bill instead of a resolution, and that this resolution was merely a subterfuge. But it seems to me that any hon. member who has been in parliament any length of time should know that there is a rule prohibiting private members from introducing any Bill affecting the public revenue. All such Bills must emanate from the government itself. To talk of a private member bringing in such a Bill is absurd. And it must be admitted that the government would not be justified in bringing in a prohibitory measure without first being assured that there was a substantial majority in the country in its favour.

I am quite in accord with all that has been said concerning the abuse of spirituous liquors. No one who has been at all mixed up in the public life of this country could defend a continuance of the sale of liquor if its sale could be suppressed by law. I must say that I was greatly disappointed at the result of the plebiscite. I think it was a great pity that the people of Canada did not take advantage of that opportunity to express their views decidedly in favour of prohibition. If they had, they would certainly have put the government in such a position that it could not avoid introducing a prohibitory law.

It has been stated that the vote cast at the plebiscite in favour of prohibition was as large, if not larger, than that cast for the present government at the last general election. That certainly is not in accord with the facts. In the province of Ontario, the total vote on the Dominion lists, on which the general election is held, was 638,947, and on the municipal lists it was 574, 526, so that there was on the lists upon which the plebiscite was taken, 64,421 votes less than on the Dominion Federal lists. Now, the total vote polled in 1896 at the general election in the province of Ontario was 418,240, and the vote polled in opposition to the late government was 222,678, whereas the total vote polled in Ontario for prohibition was but 114,499. Therefore, the present government holds power, so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, by a majority vote over the plebiscite of 68,179. I have gone carefully through the figures, and the figures emphatically contradict the statement made by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and others. I have no doubt it is the same in the other provinces. With regard to the enforcement of prohibition you must have a substantial majority back of the Act in order to secure its enforcement. After the discussion took place in Kingston between Mr. Lucas and Principal Grant, I noticed in the public prints that Mr. Lucas had stated that prohibition was an entire success in Kansas, where it was adopted some years ago. I happened to be in Kansas City some time afterwards, and I mentioned to a man that I had seen that statement made. He told me that it was not so; and in order to satisfy myself as to whether prohibition was carried out or not I went into the city of Kansas and in the state of Kansas, and, though prohibition was supposed to be in force, I went through eighteen saloons where liquor was sold every day in the week, including Sunday. I went through them in order to satisfy myself. I was surprised to find that that was the condition of things where a prohibition law had been enacted, and I made some inquiries on the subject. Among the people with whom I spoke was one very ardent prohibitionist. He said that the city of Kansas had given a very large majority against prohibition, and that from that time up to the time I was there, they always elected a council and city officials opposed to prohibition who would not enforce the law. The saloon-keepers were hauled up once a month and fined $50, or $600 a year. The city received from these saloons $10,800 a year, which they spent in improving and maintaining the streets. The saloon-keepers understood so well that they had to pay the fine that they did not wait to be subpoenaed but went up every month and paid the $50, so that it became virtually a license fee. I made up my mind then that unless you have a very substantial majority, you cannot enforce a prohibitory law. Of course, in our country magistrates and judges are not elected, and in that respect we have an advantage. But there are so many ways of getting around it that a strong public sentiment is necessary to the enforcement of such a law. There can be no question asked as to the evils of intemperance. One who has seen homes made desolate and endless misery caused by this traffic cannot but feel that it would be a national blessing if we could get rid of it. For my part, I do not think it can be got rid of until the government take the manufacture and sale into their own hands. Liquor must be produced; there is nobody who will deny that it has its place as a medicine. No druggist can carry on his business without spirits as a means of conveniently and satisfactorily preparing prescriptions. Every intelligent druggist will admit that it is an absolute necessity. But the question is, how you are going to produce it for manufacturing and medicinal purposes and still not have it used for beverage purposes. In my opinion this question will never be satisfactorily settled until the government itself takes over the manufacture and sale of liquor. One thing we have to rejoice at, and that is the improvement in the habits of our people. I can honestly say that in the section where I live you will not see to-day on any public occasion one drunken man for twenty that might have been seen fifteen or twenty years ago. The use of liquor is not now anything like so great as it was even a few years ago. I have been mixed up with politics, municipal, provincial and Dominion for thirty years; and it is a gratification to me to be able to say that I never was associated with a soberer and more temperate body of men than sit in this parliament to-day. I have been here a great many years, and I believe we have the most sober body of men that ever graced this assembly. So far as I know there is not one man with whom the drinking of liquor is an abuse, and I am proud to be able to say it. This is great improvement over what we used to see years ago. If the improvement in the habits of our people goes on at the same rate for another fifteen years, prohibition will be hardly necessary in my opinion. For my part, I shall vote for the resolution of the hon. member for Yarmouth.

Mr. C. H. PARMELEE (Shefford). I am quite aware that this debate has dragged along and, perhaps, there is not very much more to be said either for or against the resolution or the amendment already proposed. I myself feel, to some extent, sympathy with the object sought by the resolution of the hon. member for Yarmouth. I know it has been contended by debaters speaking on that side of the question that possibly such a state of public opinion exists in all the provinces outside of Quebec as to warrant the hope that prohibition could be enforced in those provinces. Whether that is so or not, I think, perhaps, it would be well to call attention for a moment to some of the figures of the plebiscite taken two years ago in the different provinces apart from the province of Quebec.

	Total No. electors.	Total vote polled.	Percentage vote polled.	No. electors in favour.
Ontario	576,784	269,774	47	154,499
Nova Scotia	101,708	40,048	39½	34,646
New Brunswick ...	89,954	36,487	40½	26,911
Prince Edward Is- land	25,245	10,607	42	9,461
British Columbia..	35,469	10,487	29	5,781
Manitoba	49,260	15,397	31½	12,419
Territories	23,042	9,062	39	6,238
	901,462	391,862	...	249,955

You will see, Mr. Speaker, by these figures that after all the percentage of the vote polled for prohibition, in comparison with the total pollable vote, is pretty small, I fear almost too small to warrant the optimistic view of the member for Yarmouth and others, that these provinces are ripe for prohibition. Take the province of British Columbia, for instance, and we find that less than one-sixth of the electors voted for prohibition. I do not think it can be contended in the face of a percentage so small, that British Columbia at any rate is ripe for prohibition. When we come to the province of Ontario, we find a lack of interest exhibited in many districts. The returns show that in the great city of Toronto less than one-fifth of the electors voted for prohibition. In London, Muskoka, Parry Sound, Carleton, and the two Renfrews, less than a quarter of the vote was polled for prohibition. In the four ridings of Middlesex, in the Ontarios, Perths, and in Peel, only about 33 per cent of the electors voted for prohibition. In Nipissing less than one-ninth of the electors voted in favour of prohibition. I do not think we can fairly argue from figures of this kind that Ontario is ripe for prohibition. In this connection, it may be proper to mention that on the plebiscite vote only 44 per cent of the electors on the list voted; of these 22½ per cent voted for prohibition and 21½ per cent against. Fifty-six per cent of all the voters on the list did not take the trouble to go to the polls at all. But, perhaps, that is not quite a fair way to put it; perhaps we ought to take the pollable vote and go back to the elections of 1891 and 1896 for our guide. We find on these occasions that about two-thirds of the votes on the list were actually polled, or about 66 per cent. Making a comparison in that way, we find that one-third of the people voted in favour of prohibition and just about one-third against, leaving the other third, which did not vote at all. Looking at the circumstances under which the campaign was carried on last year, I think it is fair to assume that, perhaps, a large proportion of the unpolled vote was not in favour of prohibition. I give the prohibitionists credit for having conducted a very able campaign in this country, I think they did all they possibly could to mould public opinion, and by organization to get out their full vote, and I am bound to believe that they did actually poll as large a vote as the public opinion of the country would warrant.

Mr. PARMALEE.

Now, the hon. member for Colchester has declared that he is in favour of total national prohibition. Well, that is an object with which, I presume, a great majority of the members of this House are sympathetic, and one which a great majority of the members of this House would like to see attained. But, we are here to legislate and everybody understands perfectly well that when you pass sumptuary laws you cannot hope to have them at all effectively enforced unless you have a very strong public opinion behind them. Now, can it be contended that one-third of the people of this country represent a public opinion sufficiently strong to secure the enforcement of a prohibitory law, a law which would revolutionize our whole fiscal system, a law which deals with the habits of the people, a law which, as I said before, is the most difficult kind of legislation in the world to enforce? In the county which I have the honour to represent, a large number of the electors are prohibitionists; but the majority of them at any rate take this broad view, that while they want prohibition, while they believe that, given the proper conditions, and supported by a sufficient force of public opinion, a prohibitory law would achieve very desirable results and would raise the moral and material standing of the people, still they do not desire to see prohibition tried under conditions which would ensure its failure. They want to see prohibition tried under conditions that would give it some measure of success, and would enable them to regard its operation with satisfaction.

Now, in respect to provincial prohibition, that is, perhaps, something that we could obtain in this country. I do not believe that it would be wise for this parliament, in view of possible constitutional difficulties, to attempt to legislate upon the liquor traffic by means of partial or provincial prohibition. I would remind my hon. friend from Yarmouth that already the means are provided by which each province may have prohibition just as soon as the state of public opinion will warrant. In 1895, a series of questions were submitted to the Privy Council respecting the jurisdiction of the federal and provincial legislatures in regard to the prohibition of the liquor traffic. One of the questions was this:

Question No. 3: Has a provincial legislature jurisdiction to prohibit the manufacture of such liquors within the province?

Answer to Question No. 3: In the absence of conflicting legislation by the parliament of Canada, their lordships are of opinion that the provincial legislatures would have jurisdiction to that effect if it were shown that the manufacture was carried on under such circumstances and conditions as to make its prohibition a merely local matter in the province.

Now, it would seem, in view of that decision, that the provinces have it in their power to prohibit the liquor traffic within their bounds, both the sale and the manufacture. I think, moreover, we already have local option laws which cover the case. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would remind the prohibitionists who say they ought to have more legislation, that legislation has kept pace with, if it has not kept a little ahead of, the state of public opinion in this country. Our provincial laws already provide means by which we can for all practical purposes obtain provincial prohibition. In all the provinces it requires a majority of the ratepayers in order to secure a license. In New Brunswick, for instance, the law is as follows :

No license shall be granted or issued within any parish or municipality in this province when a majority of the ratepayers resident in such parish or municipality shall petition the municipal council against issuing any license within such parish or municipality.

There is a provision which the people of the municipalities may take advantage of to do away with the liquor traffic. Perhaps there might be a locality here and there where the state of public opinion would not warrant it, but if the opinion is so strong in favour of prohibition as we are led to believe it is, there is a way already provided by which, to a large extent at any rate, the people may get rid of the liquor traffic. In Nova Scotia, this is the law :

Licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquor shall only be granted by the council upon the presentation of a petition of two-thirds of the ratepayers of the polling district in which the tavern is intended to be established, praying for such license.

Licenses in incorporated towns are granted on petition signed by two-thirds of the ratepayers of the ward in which such license is proposed.

In the province of Quebec our license laws give the people the same privilege. In the municipalities outside of the large cities the people may ask the council to submit the question to the vote of the ratepayers, and in the event of the majority declaring for no license, the councils, or the government, grant no licenses whatever. It seems to me that with provisions of this kind in our provincial laws the people who favour prohibition ought not to feel utterly dissatisfied. They ought to take advantage of the local option laws until a considerable public opinion has been created warranting total prohibition in this country. A good deal has been said at one time or another about the state of public opinion in the province of Quebec. A year ago a good deal of suspicion was sought to be cast upon the honesty and integrity of the vote in that province. I believe, coming from that province, that the plebiscite election in Quebec was conducted as honestly and as above-board as in any part of Canada. I believe that, perhaps, it more nearly expressed the opinion of the people than the vote in many other parts of Canada, because, I cannot help remembering, and I presume it is within the personal knowledge of almost every hon. member in the House, that a very considerable vote was cast, not because it was a vote in favour of prohibition, but, from motives of political expediency. I know that such a vote was cast in my own part of the country, and I believe it was cast largely throughout Canada. In the province of Quebec there is no very strong feeling in favour of prohibition. The French Canadian people are a sober people. I think that the French Canadian farmers are, perhaps, the soberest people in the world. But they are not in favour of prohibition. They believe it to be legislation in restraint of the natural liberty which they always have enjoyed and which they wish to enjoy in the future, and I believe that the province of Quebec has come nearer to the ideal state of prohibition than any other province in the Dominion. I believe that to be the case. Take the rural parts of the country. Out of nearly 1,000 rural municipalities we have only about 250 in which there are any licenses at all. There are no licenses in the others simply because there is no demand for liquor, because the inhabitants are sober, because they are abstemious in their habits and because they have no use for licenses or licensed hotels. I, perhaps, ought not to speak at any greater length, but I wish to say that I cordially support the wisdom of the policy of the government in refusing to see, in the plebiscite vote, a mandate for attempting to pass a total prohibitory law in this country and in taking that position I am supported by moderate prohibitionists all over the country. When the results of the plebiscite campaign became known, when the people knew what the vote had been, there was a consensus of opinion, from one end of the country to the other, that the results left no hope whatever that we could pass and enforce a prohibitory law in this country. Men like Dr. Potts, Dr. Dewart, Dr. Rose, Dr. Kerr, in all cases leading prohibitionists, and in many cases opponents of this government, declared, and they have declared many times since, that the vote was not strong enough to warrant the government and parliament in putting on the statute-book a prohibitory law. It is the opinion, to a large extent, to-day, of moderate prohibitionists, who do not want prohibition in advance of public opinion, that if it were put on the statute-book and not enforced, it would be wiped out in a year or two. They want it tried under conditions that will give some guarantee of its ultimate success. This is the view I hold, and holding it, I believe the action of the government was wise in the interest of the country and in the interest of prohibition itself. Before I sit down, I wish to move a resolution which embodies my views, at least, and which, I think, will secure the support of a very large majority of the members of this House. I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey):

That all the words of the amendment after 'thereof' be omitted and the following substituted therefor: 'at the Plebiscite of 1898, only about 23 per cent of the registered electors of the Dominion voted for prohibition; that in the provinces and territories excluding Quebec, only 27 per cent of the registered electors voted for prohibition; that these results show that there is not an active prohibition sentiment sufficiently pronounced to justify the expectation that a prohibition law could be successfully enforced, and therefore in the opinion of this House such a prohibitory law should not be enacted at present.'

Mr. GEO. E. CASEY (West Elgin). Mr. Speaker, in rising to second this resolution, I wish to offer a very few remarks. I notice that some hon. members of this House have spoken as if they understood the resolution, proposed by the hon. member for Yarmouth, to mean that the provinces ought to be invested with the power to prohibit within their own boundaries. The resolution does not ask for anything of that kind. It says that this House should enact partial prohibition within the bounds of those provinces where the plebiscite has shown that prohibition would be popular. As that other proposition has been discussed, although it is not directly before us, it may be remarked that any such proposition in a motion to that effect would be entirely out of the question. This House cannot delegate to the different provinces any powers which are inherent in this House under the British North America Act. If the provinces have the power to practically prohibit, within their own boundaries, as has been urged with great force by the mover of the present resolution, then, they do not need to be endowed with that power either by this House or by the Imperial parliament. If they have not that power, nobody but the Imperial parliament can give it to them. I therefore think that any discussion of provincial prohibition, enacted by the provincial legislatures, is entirely out of place in this House, and in the consideration of the present resolution. Returning to the proposal that this House should enact partial prohibition, should enact, rather, provincial prohibition in the provinces where the vote has shown that it is called for by the people, I beg to doubt the whole of the premises on which that proposition is based. In the first place, the vote, even as taken, does not show that the majority, or anything respectably approaching one-half, even of the electors of any province, want prohibition, but, we must not forget that the proposition laid before the people of the provinces was Dominion prohibition. They were not asked to vote whether they wanted prohibition within the limits of their own provinces. Any one knows that they would have voted differently on a proposal of that kind. We will say that 25 per cent in Ontario voted for Dominion legislation. Does any one suppose that 25 per cent of the people of Ontario would vote for a bogus half measure of prohibition, which only applied to the province of Ontario? No, Sir, I do not believe that 15 per cent of them would vote for it. Why not? Because such a measure would in its essence and of necessity, be an ineffective measure, incapable of being enforced and would be a distinct detriment to the province in which it was enforced. Look at what would be the position of this city of Ottawa if there was prohibition here and free liquor on the other side of the river. Does any one suppose that the people of Ottawa would vote for a proposal to have prohibition confined merely to the province of Ontario. Not by a large majority, Mr. Speaker. The assumption, therefore, that the people of any province have asked by a majority of votes, that prohibition should be adopted within such province, is utterly baseless, and should not form the foundation of any resolution adopted by this House, or even of any argument to be laid before this House. Let us come to the other proposal we have actually before us, which is in itself, comparatively speaking, a logical one, namely: That this House should declare in favour of prohibition throughout the whole Dominion. There is, at all events, a straightforward resolution, calling upon this House to declare distinctly what the members believe to be their duty in regard to this great issue. But, Sir, this resolution, logical enough in its form, is supported like the other resolution, by arguments, which, I believe, to be unfounded. The only ground on which we can be asked to carry that resolution is, that the people of Canada, as a people, do desire by a considerable majority to have prohibition enacted throughout this Dominion. My hon. friend (Mr. Parmalee) put as clearly as any one could put, his reasons for believing that that argument is utterly baseless. We are not here to legislate for carrying into effect the views of one-quarter of the people of Canada. We are here for the purpose of carrying into effect the views of the majority of the people of Canada, and, I believe, that no one in this House really disputes in his own heart and conscience, the assertion, that the plebiscite vote distinctly showed that a great majority of the people of Canada are totally opposed to prohibition as a Dominion measure. We all know that those who favour prohibition used every influence of platform oratory, of domestic persuasion, of ridicule, even by casting shame on a person who would not vote for prohibition, and all that sort of thing, to bring out a large vote in favour of that measure. We know on the other hand, that the liquor men of the country foreseeing what the result would probably be, did not take active measure to influence public opinion or to drum up the vote against prohibition. They knew very well, that if they came out canvassing actively, in that direction, they would turn a large number of other people in the direction which they did not wish, and they consulted their own interests by letting things have their way. The result, as a matter of fact, was that the full prohibition vote was polled, and that, on the other hand, the vote of those who did not believe in prohibition, was not fully polled. It was looked upon by every one, not so much as a question of who should get the majority vote, but, of what strength the prohibitionists should show at the polls, and whether they could show strength enough to justify parliament in passing such a measure. It was not an ordinary vote between two opposing propositions; it was an opportunity given to one side to show what strength they could muster at the polls without regard to what strength the other side could muster. It was a one-sided expression of opinion, and it turned out that all those who could be induced to express their opinion, in favour of prohibition, were roughly speaking, about one-quarter of the electorate. We all know that very many of those who voted in that way, did not vote from their conviction; did not do so with the idea that their vote would lead to prohibition, but they did so in part, for the purpose of embarrassing the government. We all know that of our personal knowledge among the circle of our acquaintances. They did so in part again, because they were urged and teased to vote that way; and because they did not believe that anything would come of it. But, after all this, not more than one-fourth of the vote was polled in favour of prohibition. Now, Sir, the question immediately before us is a choice between these two last resolutions—the one declaring logically and directly for general prohibition; the other declaring that the vote taken on the plebiscite would not justify this House in passing a resolution in the direction asked for by the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure). I have no hesitation in casting in my own voice with the resolution which I have seconded. In fact, Sir, I would be prepared to go further than the actual wording of that resolution. That resolution says: 'That the plebiscite vote has not shown that we would be justified in expecting a prohibitory law to be carried out. I go even further. I say that that vote has shown that no government with due respect to its duty to the majority of the people, could honestly propose such a measure. I go this far again, and say, that any government that did propose such, could not be returned to power again. We know that the great majority are against such a measure. We know that those prohibitionists who are opposed to the government politically, would not support the government because they had introduced such a measure. We had sad experience in that, in the case of the Canada Temperance Act of 1878, commonly known as the Scott Act. That did not win the support of Conservative prohibitionists; but it did lose to the government of the day the support of a great many who were opposed to such a prohibitory measure. No government could carry such a measure as this and live through an election, and no government, I say, who proposed such a measure has any idea of its duty to the majority of the people of this country. For both these reasons, I am very glad to see the straight issue taken as it is between the resolution of the member for Colchester, and the resolution of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmalee). I hope that it will come to a vote. I hope that the vote will be decisive. I would say to my colleagues in this House: Let us be honest in this vote on this question. It is about time that individuals—I will not say parties, because no party has been unanimous on this question—it is about time that individuals in this House or groups of individuals in this House and throughout the country should give up the attempt to make prohibitionists believe that what they are asking for is a practical thing or can be carried by the aid of this or that party, or this or that individual in the country. We all know in our own hearts that it is an impossibility. Let us honestly vote that the result of the plebiscite has shown that, and let us clear our minds and our consciences of this question for a number of years to come.

Mr. PARMALÉE.

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). I wish to say that I intend to support the motion of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint); not because I agree with everything that is contained in it, but because I wish to be one to affirm the principle that the people who want prohibition are entitled to have it. I do not agree with the argument that is held by a number of the members of this House, that a vote means nothing unless the majority of the people vote. I hold that when a general vote is called for, the only possible construction that can be placed upon the action taken is that that vote is to be followed by legislative action in accordance with the vote. Now, the circumstances connected with the plebiscite were such that apparently it was not possible to follow it by legislation as demanded or expected. I am not speaking now of my own view. This was the conclusion arrived at at the meeting of the Dominion Alliance, held here last year—that prohibition for the Dominion was not immediately practicable, on the evidence given by the vote cast in the plebiscite. Admitting that for the sake of argument, I still claim that if the whole Dominion is not entitled to prohibition on the strength of that vote, certain parts of the Dominion just as certainly are; and it is because this motion contains that principle that I am prepared to support it. The point in which I do not agree with the motion is, that I think under our system of government, in the circumstances in which we find ourselves, and particularly in view of the result of the plebiscite, prohibition would be much more practicable, and in much nearer reach, if it were made a provincial instead of a Dominion matter. If it is a fact that the provinces are not now empowered to pass prohibitory laws, my judgment would be to secure for them that power; and instead of this parliament passing legislation which would be applicable to the provinces, as suggested in the motion, this parliament should be a party to an amendment to the constitution that would place the whole control in the hands of the provinces. The reasons for that view are many. One is that experience has shown the difficulty of making prohibition a leading issue in the Dominion House—for the very good reason that there are many other important issues which must be dealt with, which cannot be dropped out of sight, and which it is impossible in the interests of the country to subordinate to the single issue of prohibition. That is not the case in the provinces. It would be quite possible to make prohibition a leading issue as a provincial question; and I believe that to have effective legislation or the effective enforcement of legislation on the subject of prohibition, we must get it by having a legislature elected to pass the necessary law and to provide for the enforcement of that law. That could only be secured by making that question a leading issue in a general election. Our experience is that we have not been able to make it a leading issue in a general Dominion election; but it would be possible to do so in a provincial election, and to secure the election of a legislature that would be pledged on the subject of prohibition. Then, if that legislature were in a position to pass legislation you would be in a better position to get it passed and in a better position to get it enforced.

As to the enforcement of this kind of legislation, it is generally taken for granted that the enforcement of prohibition would necessarily be more efficient in the hands of the Dominion than in the hands of a province. I hold a directly opposite view. I take it that inasmuch as the administration of the civil law under our constitution is entirely in the hands of the provinces, and as the enforcement of prohibition would necessarily be a part of the civil law, it is under provincial administration that a prohibitory law could best be enforced. Where does the enforcement of any law begin, and where does it end? When you undertake to put any law into force, you begin at the local magistrate. He is the appointee of the province and he administers the law under the direction of the provincial government. If the case goes beyond the magistrate, who gives the final decision? The neighbours of the accused in the form of a jury. The court of local public opinion is the beginning and the end of the enforcement of law, particularly civil law; and inasmuch as the province has the jurisdiction over civil law, it would be impossible for the Dominion to enforce prohibition in a province having a local government hostile to prohibition; but it would be possible for a provincial government to enforce it within the province when the majority of the people of the province were in favour of it; as I claim the majority of the people of several provinces are—taking their word for it, according to the vote cast two years ago.

Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. GODBOUT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth). Mr. Speaker, I object to the debate being adjourned at this early hour. I think we ought to have a vote on this question. A great many people will be disappointed if the House of Commons adjourns the debate without a vote. If we do not vote to-night, it is very probable that this matter will stand over several weeks and then not be reached. Last year the House reached the hour of three o'clock and many members, who desired to speak, had not been heard, and I did not feel warranted in then pressing for a division, but I think that to-night, at this hour, we ought to continue the debate or take a vote.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) I think that the right hon. leader of the House should either allow us to vote to-night, without the intervention of a motion to adjourn, or promise us that another sitting will be devoted to this question. To-night's proceedings bear a most striking resemblance to those which took place last year, when the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) moved a motion, and the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) moved an amendment, and the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmalee) moved an amendment to the amendment. The only dissimilarity between the proceedings to-night and those of a year ago are that my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Godbout) intervenes in the place of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who intervened last year. Last year the whole matter was shelved. The motions, although different in words, were almost identical in meaning, and the motion to adjourn finished all discussion and precluded a vote. I think that the House ought to have an opportunity to vote on these different motions. The country would rather see us vote after we have spent several hours valuable time, than have the question shelved until another year comes round. I make these few remarks in the hope that the right hon. First Minister will give us another day for the discussion of this question and an ultimate vote on it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am very much of the opinion that the country is entitled to have a vote from this House, but my hon. friend will agree with me that it is useless to expect a vote this evening. The House is very thin. On the opposition side I do not count more than twenty members, so that under the circumstances it would not be fair, even to the opposition, to take a vote. Better let the question stand until another day. I am not prepared to say that the rules of the House should be broken to bring it up again out of its regular order, but, if that be the wish of the House we can do so. Several aspects of the question have not been discussed, for instance, the constitutional aspect, and I think we can very well spend another day in discussing the matter.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). As in all probability this resolution has been heard of for the last time during this session, I desire to state where I stand on the question. I intend to be guided by the voice of my constituents. In 1888, the county of Halton repealed the Scott Act, which was a partially prohibitory measure, and thus declared that it was not in favour of a measure of that kind. The resolution of the hon. member for Yarmouth is simply an extension of the Scott Act, and, therefore, is not in accord with the views of my constituents. In 1898, when the plebiscite was taken, they voted strongly in favour of total prohibition. I intend, if this resolution comes to a vote, to give effect to the sentiments of my constituents in the manner they have indicated to me in those two votes.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that an opportunity will be furnished the House to take up this question again?

The PRIME MINISTER. I said that this would be taken into consideration.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, I am not ready for a vote on the motion to adjourn, because, with a good many others, I have something to say on this question. The right hon. Prime Minister knows whether he intends to let the House have another opportunity to decide this question, and should have the courtesy to say so. If he does not intend to give us another opportunity, let him say so, so that we may know exactly how the matter stands.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend is aware that in all probability this motion will come up again for discussion under the rules of the House. It will go on Public Bills and Orders next Monday, and be probably taken up, because there are no debatable motions on the paper. If we do not take it up then, I will be prepared to consider the question of setting apart a day for it.

Mr. FOSTER. Favourably?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes.

Motion (Mr. Godbout) agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.45 a.m. (Tuesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, April 24, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PORTAGE DU FORT AND FRENCH RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. GEO. E. CASEY (West Elgin) moved:

That Bill (No. 97) to incorporate the Portage du Fort and French River Railway Company be referred back to the Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines for further consideration.

Mr. TISDALE. I would like some explanation of why this Bill is to be referred back.

Mr. CASEY. The explanation is simply this. This Bill came up on a day on which a good many of us did not expect that the Railway Committee was to meet. For example, I only received the notice after I had come away from the Railway Committee meeting. The notices had been sent out late the night before, and we did not all receive them before the meeting of the committee. When the committee did meet there was a rather exciting Bill before it, which took up most of the time. When that Bill was disposed of, a large number of the members of the committee left; and when this particular Bill came to be discussed and voted upon, there were only forty members present, as was shown by the call of the roll. The majority against the preamble was only two, the vote being 21 to 19. Seeing that a company was granted a charter by the same committee last year by a very considerable majority for a railway covering the same ground, with an extension for a greater distance, I see reason to think that the accidental vote taken upon this Bill last Friday was not a real expression of the views of the Railway Committee. For that reason, at the suggestion of a large number of members who feel as I do, I have moved that it be sent back for further consideration, feeling convinced that in a full committee, with full consideration, the result would probably be different from what it was.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the course which the hon. member has just proposed to the House to adopt is one fraught with a good deal of inconvenience. We spend a great deal of time in the large committees appointed by the House to discuss questions relating to railways and other matters. The hon. gentleman proposes to refer this Bill back to the committee which has already decided upon it, but he has not given any strong reason why that should be done. The hon. gentleman says that the members were absent from the committee. Well, Sir, the notices were sent out, and the order of proceeding always accompanies these notices, so that the members know whether it is important for them to attend or not. But, I beg to differ from my hon. friend in regard to the size of the committee. It was a very full committee. It was not as full as I have seen it on other occasions; but there were a larger number of members present than I have seen on occasions when very important Bills came before the committee. The hon. gentleman says that owing to the fact of a very exciting Bill having been discussed before the present Bill was taken up, many members had left. Well, Sir, was it because of fatigue after that excitement that members could no longer stand the strain of remaining in the committee to take up the discussion of the other Bills that were to follow? I leave it to any hon. gentleman who was in that committee. The Bill had an exhaustive discussion. It came up, not merely once, if I remember rightly, but twice before that committee; and it seems to me that when it was known to the members that it was coming up a second time, it was their duty to be present. After an exhaustive discussion, the committee decided against the preamble of the Bill. The company opposing the granting of this Bill is a company which has expended a large amount of money in building a railway which is altogether in the interest of the district which it traverses, and which, up to the present time, has not paid its working expenses. I believe the object of every member of parliament is to develop the country; but, how can that be done if after granting a charter for a railway such as the Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway, which is not paying its working expenses at present, we grant a charter for another line to run parallel and compete with that railway throughout almost the whole of its course? I have no more interest in the matter than the interest I have taken in the discussion before the Railway Committee; but when we grant a charter for a railway, we must believe that in so doing we are promoting the interests of Canada, and we should not destroy our work by permitting another road to run alongside of it and prevent it doing the good we intended it to do. I think it would be establishing a bad precedent to pass this motion. If the work of the large committees is going to be revised by the House after those committees have expended a great deal of time in discussing the questions submitted to them, we shall have many applications of the same kind, and a great loss of time and inconvenience will result.

Mr. CASEY.

Motion negatived.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yeas and nays.

Other hon. MEMBERS. The Speaker declared the motion lost.

Mr. CASEY. As Mr. Speaker spoke in a very low tone, and what he said was not heard throughout the House, I should think some allowance ought to be made, and a vote taken.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. I declared the motion lost, and I think the House heard me. I must say that the call for the yeas and nays was not made for some considerable time.

ELECTORAL DIVISIONS OF THE COUNTIES OF DRUMMOND AND BAGOT.

Mr. LOUIS LAVERGNE (Drummond-Arthabaska). (Translation.) I beg to introduce a Bill (No. 140) called 'Act concerning the parishes of St. Eugène of Grantham, in the county of Drummond, and St. Nazaire of Acton, in the county of Bagot.'

The object of this Bill is to provide for the franchise of certain electors of the 12th Concession of Upton, which was taken from the parish of Ste. Hélène of Bagot, and put in the parish of St. Eugène of Grantham, in the county of Drummond.

It is but fair to enable those electors to vote in the county of Drummond, to which they now belong, for all purposes whatsoever, whether provincial, municipal or school purposes. This House, I hope, will let this Bill pass without offering any opposition, as it is only fair to give the franchise to those electors, the more so as at the general elections held in 1896, and at the by-elections held on the 13th November, 1897, and in December, 1898, they could vote neither in Bagot nor in Drummond and Arthabaska.

The same remark applies to that portion of the township of Grantham which was taken from the parish of St. Germain of Grantham, in the county of Drummond, and put in the parish of St. Nazaire of Acton, in the county of Bagot. Those electors have no franchise in the county of Bagot.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I promised my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, the other day, that I would lay the correspondence with regard to the Imperial commissions on the Table, but owing to the absence of my hon. colleague, the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), who has had to go to Niagara for the dedication of a monument, I will not be able to bring down those papers until the day after to-morrow. The hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) asked me for some papers with regard to representation in the Yukon. They will be brought down to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. Did the right hon. gentleman prevail on the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), to amend the defective return he brought down?

The PRIME MINISTER. I spoke to my hon. colleague, and he told me that he had sent one of his officers to my hon. friend to find out exactly what it was my hon. friend wanted.

WELLAND CANAL—DYNAMITE EXPLOSION.

Mr. WILLIAM McCLEARY (Welland). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the government to the distasteful attempt made on Saturday last by three or four scoundrels, to blow up one of the most important locks on the Welland Canal. A detachment of the 19th Battalion of the city of St. Catharines was called out to protect lock 25, and it was found that there was not a single round of ammunition in the armoury, and they had to borrow forty rounds from private sources. It appears also that there is not a single shell in the armoury at St. Catharines for the splendid guns, with which the Welland Canal Field Battery have been equipped, nor is there any ammunition in London, Hamilton or Toronto. I am not an alarmist by any means, nor do I consider this miserable attempt of those scoundrels to do nefarious work on the canal, of any national importance. But living on the border as I do, I know very well the feelings towards this country of the people on the other side, and it has been for more than six months a topic of conversation in the hotels of the city of Buffalo and along our neighbourhood, that something might be looked for. I think that the government cannot be too alert regarding the providing of ammunition in western Ontario. I understand that the ammunition factory is in the province of Quebec, but that is too far away for the supply to reach our district readily. I bring this subject forward at the present time, because my attention has been called to it by those connected with the militia in my own neighbourhood. I am sorry that the Minister of Militia is not in his place so that he could give us some definite information in regard to the subject.

The PRIME MINISTER, (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I also am sorry that the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), is not in his place to-day. He is absent, however, in pursuance of a very meritorious object. I have just had a telephone message sent to the Deputy Minister of Militia, and he will be here in a few minutes, and will give us information in regard to the whole matter.

Mr. WM. GIBSON (Lincoln). I may say that if my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. McCleary), instead of trying to make some political capital against the Minister of Militia and Defence—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. GIBSON. Wait until I get through. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCleary), instead of trying to make political capital, against the Minister of Militia and Defence, about the volunteers in St. Catharines and other places, not being supplied with ammunition, should have presented the subject on its merits. I happened to be in St. Catharines, on Saturday and Sunday, and there was not a word of anything of that kind from the officers of that battalion, whom I met. My hon. friend (Mr. McCleary), who lives almost on the banks of the Welland Canal, probably knows that the present superintendent of the canal, some years ago, wrote to the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) or the department, and asked—and very properly asked—to have every lock tender, and bridge tender on the canal, made a special officer, with power to arrest any one of a suspicious character, found upon the canal whose business did not take him there. This power should be given to the superintendent of all canals. The work that was done on Saturday, might have been done at any time, and it would not have mattered if every volunteer in the counties of Lincoln and Welland had been supplied with ammunition—that would not have prevented it. These men came in open day, at seven o'clock in the evening. They dropped off a train and lowered a canvas bag of dynamite down very carefully in front of the lock gate, and set a fuse on fire with a detonator at the end of it to explode the dynamite. It is quite evident, that the information must have been given to them, or in some way they must have been very familiar with that section of the canal. The point chosen was lock 24, at the head of the long level which comprises about a mile and a half of water stretch of 16 feet depth. The damage would have been terrible if the lock gates had been blown open, as fortunately they were not, the reason being that the men applied the detonator to the wrong side of the lock. Instead of blowing the lock gate open, the force of the explosion made them, if possible, tighter on their hinges. On the other hand, if the explosion had been successful, as a result of this nefarious trick—and there is no language too strong to denounce such an outrage, and in that respect I agree with every word spoken by the hon. member for Welland—these scoundrels would have destroyed the lives of 500, or 1,000 innocent persons, as well as, probably, a vast amount of property. The water would have run over the top of the canal bank and swept away the railway station and embankment and works of the Grand Trunk Railway, at that point. If all the volunteers of both Lincoln and Welland had been supplied with ammunition that would not have prevented this outrage taking place. What I wish to point out to the government, is, that no time should be lost in giving power and authority to the superintendents of all the canals, to arrest every suspicious person found upon the canal bank, who has no business there, and that the use of the canal banks should be prohibited to every one except those in the employ of the government. Because, if any evil disposed persons had put a detonator cartridge down the chain hole, as it is called by the lock tenders, he could have blown out the whole side of lock 24; and if this had taken place, there would have been no possibility of repairing the lock gates at the entrance to the canal at less than from six weeks to two months. It is quite evident to me, that they choose not only the proper place to go to, but they choose the proper time, almost within a day or so, of the opening of the canal, which, I believe, takes place to-morrow. Some have said that this is a Fenian rising. I do not take that view. I believe that there is a feeling among the grain shovellers in Buffalo, that there is a probability of a divergence of the grain trade from Buffalo by way of the Welland Canal, and I dare say that an agitation has been got up which has had this result. There were strikes in Buffalo not very long ago. This affair has no political significance beyond the fact that it might be a labour agitation got up among the grain labourers of Buffalo, and they took this means of trying to destroy one of the most important public works in the Dominion.

Mr. GIBSON.

Mr. CLARKE. What do the Buffalo labourers gain by an effort to destroy the Welland Canal?

Mr. GIBSON. As I have just said, they were under the impression that the building of elevators at Port Colborne and Montreal, would have led to the grain trade being diverted from Buffalo. So far as the damage is concerned, I am happy to say, it is not of a character to stop the working of the canal for a single hour.

Sir, CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I think the House will agree with me that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson), who has just sat down, has made a very foolish speech. He has pointed out to these miscreants exactly how they can destroy the Welland Canal in the easiest and most complete manner. He has explained that the reason they did not succeed in this case, was that they did not understand what to do, and he has told them exactly how to proceed when they wish to make another such attempt. However, I did not rise for the purpose of referring to that particular point. I listened to the hon. member (Mr. Gibson), very carefully for some justification for the statement that he made with reference to the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary), whom he charged with having introduced this question for party political purposes. But, I listened in vain. I am sure there is no person on either side of the House who does not feel that the hon. member for Welland, would have failed in doing his duty to the House and the country if he had not taken the earliest opportunity to call the attention of the government to the want of ammunition and the absolute want of means of protecting that section of the country at a most important crisis and at a time when, it has been shown, many very serious results might have followed, if any need should arise. A more unfounded charge than that made by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson)—and all the more uncalled for because the hon. member himself says that he agrees with every word that fell from the lips of the hon. member for Welland—never was made. Never has so discreditable a charge been made upon a smaller foundation of fact.

Mr. J. G. HAGGART (South Lanark). The hon. member for Lincoln referred to a letter which he said the superintendent of the Welland Canal had written to me when I was Minister of Railways and Canals asking that the lock labourers along the canal and the superintendent should have power to arrest parties suspected of attempting damage on the canal, and said that if that power had been given, this trouble would not have arisen. The hon. gentleman, I suppose, has authority for his statement. He says he has seen a copy of a letter which the superintendent had written to me. This is the first time I ever heard of any such letter. If the hon. gentleman understood the power of the Minister of Railways and Canals he would never make such a statement as that. How could any Minister of Railways empower any man along the canal to arrest any party upon it? The hon. gentleman blames the member for Welland for introducing politics in his remarks, that he made this statement with a political object. What political object is to be gained by charging that the superintendent of the canals did not do his duty? If the Minister of Railways and Canals had the power of empowering any one to make arrests, what has he to say about his friend the present Minister of Railways and Canals who has been in office for four years and has neglected to do his duty? The hon. gentleman had no grounds whatever for making the statement. I venture to say there is no such letter in existence as the hon. gentleman speaks of. If there is, it was never brought to my attention.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). I was over in St. Catharines on the Sunday this accident happened, and I was also there yesterday morning. The public opinion of the Niagara peninsula is that the time has come when we must have one or more companies of the regular militia located on the Niagara frontier, and when there must be increased police protection either in the shape of provincial police or Dominion police. There is too much public property jeopardized over there, there is too much political agitation going on in the United States, to make it prudent for us to leave an immense amount of national property on that frontier unprotected as it is to-day. Any man with a package of dynamite can do millions of dollars of damage, he can destroy half a dozen bridges that cost millions of money, and I believe there are on the other side of the river individuals or associations of individuals who would attempt such a thing. In view of what has happened it is high time now that this government or the provincial government should strengthen the police force. There ought to be a second military station there, certainly we ought to have our militia headquarters over there well supplied with ammunition in case of emergency.

Mr. McCLEARY. I am sorry that a political motive has been attributed to me in bringing up this matter, as there was nothing further from my mind. I cannot see that any political advantage can come to any one from bringing such an important matter to the attention of the government. I hope the condition of affairs is not what I have been told it is. The member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), has referred to certain letters, he says that the superintendent asked to be clothed with power to send out to any of the canal locks—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can only speak again to make a personal explanation. No motion has been made.

Mr. McCLEARY. I want only to add that when the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals had control of the department he had guards on that canal at every tunnel. At any point that was unprotected by the lock tender, he had armed guards. Since that time that protection has been withdrawn. I agree with what the member for East York (Mr. Maclean) has said regarding the necessity of the government being on the alert on the frontier.

Mr. D. TISDALE (South Norfolk). As the member for Welland (Mr. McCleary) has said that he acquainted me with his information, I may say that I told him that if he was satisfied with his information I thought it would be quite proper for him to mention it here, but to be careful that the information was such as he could rely upon, and he told me he could. But I told him I could hardly believe it was so, because I thought that every battalion in the country always had a certain amount of ball cartridge at headquarters in case of being called out to aid the civil power. I think it is unfortunate that any gentleman should have ventured to state how this trouble originated, because we have not sufficient information before us yet to justify an expression of opinion. It is a regrettable thing, and probably the authorities are carefully and prudently investigating it.

INQUIRIES FOR REPORTS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to draw the attention of the right hon. gentleman to a most important matter, and that is the absolute impossibility of carrying on the work of the session, either in committee or in the House, until the public reports are brought down. The law is being violated to an extent that I believe is entirely unparalleled. The House is now on the eighty-third day of the session, and although the statute requires that within fifteen days after the session opens nearly all these reports should be laid on the Table of the House, and in the case of the others, the time is extended to twenty days, still at this time, on the eighty-third day of the session, we are without the report on printing and stationery, the report on life insurance, the report of the Secretary of State, the report of the Postmaster General, the report of the Department of Railways and Canals, the report of the Department of Militia and Defence, the report of the chartered banks and of the bank balances, the report of the Department of Agriculture. I may just mention here that the Committee of Agriculture are called to meet to-morrow for the purpose of examining two very important officials, and it is absolutely impossible that the committee can do justice to its work in the absence of the report of the department. These officials are summoned from a long distance for the purpose of giving the information that the department requires, and in the absence of that report time will be wasted, and the parties will have to be called again after that report is brought down. Then we are without the report of the Geological Survey, the report of the Experimental Farm, the report of the Department of the Interior. The report of the Department of the Interior, which the law requires to be brought down within fifteen days after the opening of the session, is still withheld on the eighty-third day of the session. We are also without the report on the archives, the report on the North-west mounted police, the report on the penitentiaries, the report on public works, and on insurance. Now, Sir, I say that it would seem that the government, for some purpose unknown to me, some object with which the House has not been acquainted, wish to prevent this session coming to an end at any reasonable period, although the summer is already upon us. Here, the summer is upon us. I cannot understand the cause of the delay, unless it be that the government really have a design to prevent this House from doing its duty and getting on with the public business. I say that it is absolutely necessary, and I believe it will be my duty, from day to day, to call the attention of the House and of the country to the fact that public business will be delayed and cannot be proceeded with in consequence, either of the incapacity of the government, or of their inability, or unwillingness to let the House have this information, that, by law, they are compelled to lay on the Table of the House, at the outset, 21 days after the opening of the session. We have appealed again and again to hon. gentlemen opposite in reference to these reports, and I say that the time has come that it amounts absolutely to a scandal that this House should be allowed to remain in session 83 days without this House being furnished with the information that is absolutely indispensable to enable it to proceed with the public business, either in the House, or in the committee.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), that, if all the reports have not been brought down, there is no sinister intention on the part of the government. We are just as anxious as he is, and I believe we are more anxious than the opposition for the blessing of a prorogation. There is no occasion why we should prolong this session one day more than is absolutely necessary for the transaction of public business. It is true that some of the reports are behind time, and that they should have been brought down. The hon. gentleman has, I think, with some degree of pleasure, magnified the evil, because, he has referred to several reports which come properly under the same head. The reports of the Department of the Interior, of the Postmaster General, of the Department of Justice, and, I believe, of the Department of Public Works are, at present, behind time, and should have been brought down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. BERGERON. Militia and Defence.

The PRIME MINISTER. I should have said the report of the Department of Militia and Defence.

Mr. WALLACE. Railways and Canals.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, Railways and Canals.

An hon. MEMBER. Go on.

Mr. BERGERON. The Department of Agriculture.

The PRIME MINISTER. I mentioned that. I mentioned the reports of the Departments of Railways and Canals, Public Works, Interior and Justice.

Mr. BERGERON. Agriculture.

The PRIME MINISTER. Agriculture I have mentioned. I have communicated with the several ministers and looked into the departments myself. Just four days ago my attention was publicly called to the backward condition that these reports are in. I personally appealed to all of the ministers concerned, and upon inquiry I found that in some places the blame was with the Printing Bureau, and that in other cases the blame was elsewhere. I have given most strict orders to have all the reports brought down this week, and I am confident that I will be able to implement this pledge with the exception of bringing down the report of the Department of Public Works. I am sorry to say, but I say it frankly to the House, that in regard to the Department of Public Works, I cannot promise that the report will be brought down this week. One of the officials is sick, another has been removed by death, and the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has been obliged to go away, so that I cannot promise that the report will be brought down within a week, but I have every reason to believe that all the others will be brought down within a week.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I must apologise to the House for having omitted a very important report which I did not name, and that is the report of the Department of Justice.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, I mentioned it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So far from having overstated the case, the right hon. gentleman will find that I understated it.

The PRIME MINISTER. But, my hon. friend will see that I came to the rescue of the hon. gentleman and supplied the omission.

Mr. A. H. MOORE (Stanstead). Mr. Speaker, while this subject is being discussed, perhaps the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will give us a little information in regard to the Statistical Year-book. Old members of this House, perhaps do not require quite so much instruction, but the younger members do, and I find on looking up the records that the latest edition of the Statistical Year-book, which is to give us the information we desire, will be two years old on June 30. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman could give us some information why we have this delay of two years before we can make use of a book of such vast importance as the Statistical Year-book should be.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Moore), I would say that whilst the Year-book, which is available now, appears to be two years old, it was only issued one year ago. The Year-book always comes out one year, or very nearly one year, after the date at which it is supposed to be issued. This is due to the fact that the statistics in the Year-book are based on the returns contained in other departmental blue-books. These blue-books have to be issued before the work of preparing the Statistical Year-book can be commenced, and although the Year-book itself is dated the same year as the ordinary blue-books of the departments it does not appear until ten or twelve months after the blue-books appear. The Year-book, which will appear shortly, which is in the hands of the printer now, is dated last year, although the printing is not yet finished, and that is the practice which has been followed every year since the introduction of the Year-book.

Mr. MOORE. It would be a good idea not to require nine months of the year to issue that book. I think that the United States government place the information in the hands of the printers in two months' time, and I do not see why we should have to wait for nine months if the public documents are furnished to the statistician. I think that the matter should be hurried up.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The statistician who has charge of the Year-book commences his work as soon as the blue-books are out and continues it as industriously and effectually as he can until the Statistical Year-book is issued.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). The very statement made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), that the preparation of the Statistical Year-book cannot be started until the blue-books are out, is the strongest argument why these blue-books should be out at the earliest possible moment. The financial year, the year for nearly all of these purposes, closed on the 30th of June, 1899, almost ten months ago. The Department of Customs issued the Trade and Navigation Returns only a few weeks ago. Almost nine months had elapsed. The value of these reports which cost the country tens of thousands of dollars for compilation and for printing, depends on the promptness with which they are presented to the people, to the importers, to the manufacturers, the politicians and to everybody. It is astonishing to hear the hon. minister declare that this Statistical Year-book is a year, or two years, behind time. We look forward to the publication of a document in the future, which, when it comes, is largely valueless because of the oldness of the information that is contained in it. The government should wake up. The right hon. Prime Minister has told us that he has done his best, that he has given notice to his ministers to hurry up matters. I would suggest to him that he should get ministers who have some capacity and capability. He seems to be the only member of the government who, in these matters, is right up-to-date, and I would suggest, that, if his ministers cannot do this work, he should get some one who will. The excuse is made that the Printing Bureau is to blame. I dismiss that excuse entirely; there is no foundation for it. Hon. gentlemen control the Printing Bureau. They know its capacity. If a farmer has 600 acres of grain which he does not harvest and he is asked why, he says: I have no binders, I have no men, I have no appliances for reaping my crop. Then, you would reply, you should not go into the business if you cannot do it. Hon. gentlemen opposite know what is required every year in printing. They can cipher it down to a dollar or to a day's work almost. The government should have taken care that the Printing Bureau was supplied with the necessary number of employees to get that work off promptly. We have in this House asked in vain for our voters' lists, with which, by law, we ought to have in our possession, and the excuse of the government there also is, that the Printing Bureau is to blame for the delay. Well, Sir, the Printing Bureau does all this work under the control of the government, and it should be done promptly and efficiently. The government should have its arrangements made so that the Bureau would be able to have all the parliamentary documents ready for presentation to this House in proper time. But, Mr. Speaker, I assume that it is not the Printing Bureau that is to blame, but it is because there are some things in these reports that the government are afraid to present to the House, and to the people. That is the reason why we have yet to await these reports, in the absence of which we cannot intelligently discuss the matters that come before us or properly discharge our duties to the people.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). I am surprised that a member who has been so long in this House, as has the hon. member (Mr. Wallace), should insinuate that the object of keeping back these reports may be because there is something in them that the government does not want to be made public. I have made inquiries, and I find that the Printing Bureau is run to its full capacity, and that the reason why the reports are not down is because the Bureau is not capable of coping with the immense volume of work.

Mr. MILLS. Then get a Printing Bureau that is capable.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the hon. gentleman keep quiet. The government will either have to add to the capacity of the Bureau or will have to let out a large amount of the work that is being done there now, if these reports are to be got out in time. The manager of the Printing Bureau is doing all that can be done, and he regrets as much as we regret, and as much as gentlemen opposite regret, that the reports are not now in the hands of members. As the business of the country increases, the work of the Bureau increases, and it is impossible for it to overtake the work in good time, unless the government make an addition to their printing establishment or give the work to outside firms. I have no doubt that the government are anxious to economize, as far as possible, and to have all the work done in the Bureau, and with that end in view, they are doing all that they can. It is unfair for the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), to make such an insinuation as he did. I am surprised that a man who has been so long in the House as he, should make these small petty insinuations.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. J. ROSS ROBERTSON (East Toronto). It seems to me the question is: Whether the manuscript has been prepared in the different departments in proper time, or, whether the Printing Bureau was to blame for the delay with the work. The right hon. the First Minister has not explained whether the delay was in the preparation of the manuscript for the Queen's Printer, or, whether the delay was in the Bureau itself. I am perfectly satisfied that so far as the Printing Bureau is concerned, there is no better managed department in connection with any government on this side of the Atlantic, or for that matter on the other side. I am certain that we cannot have a better superintendent than Mr. Dawson, and I am perfectly satisfied from what I have seen of the Printing Bureau (and I have been through it from the cellar to the garrett) that unless the Printing Bureau is largely improved by additional space, it would be utterly impossible for that Bureau, or any other Printing Bureau, with the amount of work given it, and with the quantity of machinery, and space at their disposal to do the work in the time required by this House. I would, therefore, suggest that if the Printing Bureau is to blame (and I do not think it is) then the Secretary of State, in whose department it is, should be apprised of the fact, so that the Printing Bureau may have the accommodation it undoubtedly requires, that is, an additional wing, and additional machinery, to ensure that the work can be accelerated. The superintendent has told me, that if they had another wing to that building, they could do the work in probably 25 per cent less time. Therefore, the sooner some public money is spent in that direction, the sooner will the public printing be facilitated, and discussions of this kind prevented.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). It is a very convenient excuse for the non-appearance of these departmental reports, to say, that the Printing Bureau is to blame. There can be no blame attached to the Printing Bureau, and if the First Minister would acquaint himself with the dates on which the manuscripts were supplied to the Queen's Printer, he would find that the reports were gotten out this year as promptly as in any previous year since the establishment of the Bureau. The fact of the matter is, that the reports have not been prepared in time by the departments, and I am perfectly satisfied that an investigation by the Prime Minister will reveal a state of affairs in that respect which is not at all satisfactory. In the early days of this administration, it was called by some of its most ardent admirers, a business government. But, Mr. Speaker, an administration that permits 298 days (almost 300 days) of the succeeding year to elapse, before half the departmental reports for the previous year have made their appearance, can no longer claim to be a business administration. The Printing Bureau is not at the present time, in some of its departments, worked up to its full capacity, because there is a lack of symmetry in the different departments, but if the demands made from time to time, by those in charge of the Bureau had received the consideration from the government to which they were entitled, there would be no complaint to make now against the administration of that department. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), said he was amazed at the remarks made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), who accounted for the delay in publishing these departmental reports by the assumption that the government desired to keep back from the public certain information contained in these reports, but I would like to draw the attention of the hon. member (Mr. McMullen), to the fact, that he was not always as careful of the reputation of his political opponents as he ought to have been. I find that in the Hansard, of April 29, 1895, when a question exactly similar to this, was brought before the House by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), did not hesitate to allege that one of the reasons why the report of the Auditor General had not been brought down, was because some revelations might be made from its pages that would not be creditable to the then government. In Hansard, 1895, 29th April, page 315, the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), said :

I think the reason is to be found in the fact that the Auditor General's Report forms the basis of the investigation held, and therefore it has not been laid upon the Table.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the report of the Postmaster General is amongst those which have not yet been brought down, and, I notice that in 1895, the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), expressed some surprise at the delay in bringing down the departmental reports, as well as some returns ordered during that and the previous session. At page 321 of Hansard, 1895, he said :

It seems rather singular that the House should be called together for the despatch of business when the government are not prepared to make the proper returns and render an account of their stewardship, as they are bound to do. They appear not to have known their own minds. They have done those things which they ought not to have done, and they appear to have left undone those things which they ought to have done.

Then, there was an interruption, which I need not read. The hon. gentleman went on :

The government think they are all right when they assemble parliament and bring us to sit here day after day, with no business to discharge. What an exhibition before the country! We may well ask, have we got a government at all?

This statement was made after the House of Commons had only been eleven days in session. As has been pointed out, this House has been now over eighty days in session, and from time to time requests have been made to the government for the presentation of the departmental reports, and many of them have not yet put in an appearance. I think very good ground exists for complaint against hon. gentlemen opposite for their neglect of duty in not having the fullest information laid before parliament and the country at the earliest possible moment. We on this side of the House have also reason to complain, because in debates which have taken place from time to time statements have been made and figures quoted which we have no opportunity of checking. We do not, of course, allege that the statements made are not correct; but, it would be much more satisfactory, when such statements are made—for instance, as to the number of immigrants arriving in Canada—if we had an opportunity of checking those statements, and ascertaining where the information comes from which hon. gentlemen opposite make use of. I think we on this side of the House have a right to the fullest information on all these matters. It is manifestly unfair that information of any character relating to the affairs of this country should be given to gentlemen on one side of the House and withheld from gentlemen on the other side. I hope that no further delay will take place in bringing down these departmental reports, because the business of the House is certainly impeded by reason of the fact that one-half the members do not know what has been done by the departments during the year, and cannot, therefore, intelligently discharge their duties to the people who sent them here.

Mr. ROBERT HOLMES (West Huron). Mr. Speaker, I fancy that this is one of the many opportunities taken advantage of by members of the opposition to try and create a little capital against the government. It may be a disadvantage to them not to have all the departmental reports before them; but it does not follow that the government is responsible for holding them back. Two of the gentlemen who have spoken are newspaper men and practical printers, and know something of the congestion of a printing office. Two of the ministers stated, over a week ago, that their reports have been in the hands of the printer for some time. They showed that the responsibility for the non-appearance of the reports did not rest with them. They showed that their copy was in the hands of the printer, but that the printer was not able to put it up. A question has been asked as to the publication of the voters' lists. I take for granted that there can be no object in holding back the voters' lists, even if there could be any object in holding back the reports ; yet, the fact remains that the voters' lists have not yet been got out, simply because the Printing Bureau has not been able to get them out. If any of these gentlemen will visit the Printing Bureau, especially those who are newspaper men, they will find that the congestion of the bureau was so great that the responsibility rests with it and not with the ministers. I think it was unfair and exceedingly bad taste on the part of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), after the denial of the First Minister that there was any delay on the part of the ministers, to try to hold them responsible, when the fact is that the delay may be due to the congestion of the Printing Bureau.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity of inquiring why we have not some of the reports of the Finance Department that do not seem to require much preparation. For instance, the House has not yet received the blue-book containing the returns of the chartered banks, nor the annual abstract of statements in connection with insurance, unpaid dividends and annual report of insurance companies. As these are returns which have to be made to the government by a certain day, it does not seem to me very clear why we should not have them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The abstract of insurance is down. I brought it down myself yesterday, on behalf of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I made application to-day for a copy to the clerk upstairs, but could not get it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is the fault of the clerk upstairs.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The explanation of the Prime Minister leaves this House in the dark as to whether or not this singular want of information is due to the neglect of the ministers to complete their returns or to any want of capacity in the Printing Bureau. It strikes me that the effort made by members on the government side of the House to hold the ministers entirely guiltless on the ground that the fault is in the Printing Bureau, is rather a weak defence. If the Printing Bureau is inadequate to do the business of the country, on whom should the responsibility for that state of affairs rest? Should it rest on the opposition, who can do nothing but point out the defects, or on the government, who are responsible for the condition of all the public business? This statement of the Prime Minister is very unsatisfactory. On the eighty-third day of the session, he informs us that only four days ago, on the seventy-ninth day of the session, did he become aware of the fact that the parliament of Canada was sitting here in a state of profound ignorance on almost every subject on which it requires to deliberate and decide. That is a very evasive statement. No doubt it is true, since the Prime Minister has seen fit to make it; but it makes it almost impossible to believe that the government are paying proper attention to the business of the country. On the one hand, the several ministers composing the government did not have their work in readiness; and in addition to that, the Prime Minister, on whose shoulders rests the responsibility, is unaware that this neglect on the part of the officers of his administration is going on from day to day. While the country has a parliament which is assembled once a year to do its business, it is a great wrong to the people of the country if the government can be shown to be at all derelict in their duty, either in withholding information from the House or in failing to give information to the House within a reasonable time. While I would not for a moment attribute any motive or design to the government, I think it is sufficient to put the government in a very bad light before the people if it can be shown that, through their neglect, the representatives of the people in parliament are denied the information which it is absolutely necessary, in the public interest, they should possess. If the fault lies in the Printing Bureau, as stated by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes), then the government should spend more money in properly equipping that department. Had the government shown itself exceedingly economical, we might make some allowance for its lack of zeal in this direction, but inasmuch as it has shown itself quite the reverse we think it should include in its liberality the Printing Bureau and have that Bureau properly equipped to do promptly the work required of it. It is most unsatisfactory that we should now be here three months and still not have the public documents we require to properly criticise the policy of the administration of the government. I rose more particularly to ask the right hon. First Minister when we may expect to have the returns from the Finance Minister, more particularly the return of unpaid bank dividends and the annual insurance report.

Mr. HOLMES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I could not give the information at this moment to my hon friend.

Mr. URIAH WILSON (Lennox). I am more particularly interested in the report of the Interior Department, because that report deals with immigration. I asked the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture not to call the deputy minister or the other parties who have to do with immigration before the committee until we had the report, and he agreed with me that it was desirable we should have the report before examining these gentlemen. But as it was difficult to get anybody else to appear before the committee, the deputy minister came before the committee at its last meeting and was examined, and to-morrow we are to have Mr. Pedley and Mr. W. T. R. Preston before the committee, and it is very unsatisfactory that we should not have the report in our possession before questioning them. A good deal has been said about the Printing Bureau being behind, but I doubt very much whether it is the Printing Bureau that is to blame. Last year we had the same trouble about the Auditor General's Report, and the Printing Bureau was made the scapegoat, but I see in the report of the Queen's Printer to the Joint Committee on Printing of both Houses, that he had to wait sixty-two days for copy, and that was the reason he was behind.

The PRIME MINISTER. We are not responsible for that.

Mr. WILSON. Somebody must be responsible. Does the right hon. the First Minister pretend that the government is not responsible for the delay in sending copy to the Printing Bureau.

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly not in the case of the Auditor General's Department.

Mr. WILSON. Perhaps not, but I venture to state that very few of the departments are up to time, and I have no doubt that if the right hon. gentleman will investigate the matter he will find that the fault does not lie so much with the Bureau as with the departments.

Mr. M. J. F. QUINN (St. Ann's, Montreal). It is abundantly evident, Mr. Speaker, from the discussion so far, that it is not due to any fault on the part of the Printing Bureau, but rather to the ministers themselves that these reports are not before the House. What do we see to-day? Of the ministers complained of, the only one present is the Minister of Agriculture, and the right hon. the First Minister refused to assume any responsibility for the delay in his report, because he was there to answer for himself. But, although present, he has not answered. My right hon. friend told us that he had communicated with his colleagues and asked them to bring down their reports and that these reports would be down in a week. But he does not seem to know as much about the matter as does the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), for that hon. gentleman immediately rose and suggested that it was not the ministers who were in fault at all, but the Printing Bureau. Then came the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes). He probably recognized that in the outfit of the Printing Bureau, there was a lack of that machine which was so effective in West Huron, particularly in printing matters, because I believe they issued a new lot of ballots out there; and recognizing the lack of that machine in the Printing Bureau, he was very loud in his condemnation of that department and in his excuses for the ministers who are behind with their reports.

I have in my hand a very striking instance of the want of candour on the part of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. In the report of the Justice Department for 1898, which is supposed to go as far as the 30th June, 1898, would you believe it there is a report of the commissioners appointed to investigate some charges against the late engineer of the Kingston Penitentiary, which is dated the 29th December, 1898? So that this departmental report, which is supposed to go only as far as the 30th June, 1898, contains matters that should be only put in the report for 1899. Evidently the intention, when making up that departmental report, was to go before the country, and this was considered proper election material to be circulated during the campaign. The government afterwards changed their mind, and are behindhand with their reports. They do not want the House to see the substance of these reports; they do not want us to see the campaign documents that they will contain. We are justified in concluding that the government are preparing campaign sheets to go into the reports, and do not wish us to be in possession of these documents until it is too late to discuss them.

And I am informed that if there is any congestion in the Printing Bureau, it is not due to the work that legally devolves on the Bureau, such as the printing of the voters' lists, because there are complaints from every part of Ontario that not one of the lists is yet printed. In fact there is only one county in Ontario represented on this side, that has the last list, the one at present in force in that province. But the reason why the Printing Bureau is behind is because its time is taken up getting out campaign literature for hon. gentlemen opposite, which is being circulated by the ton every day.

The PRIME MINISTER. Would my hon. friend specify what literature?

Mr. QUINN. I am informed that speeches of hon. members of the government are being printed by the thousands to the exclusion of all other work. If that is the condition of affairs, it should be put an end to at once, or otherwise we will be kept here during the dog days, if we are going to do our duty to the country by discussing the departmental reports as they are brought down.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). I wish to call attention to what I think is a mistake on the part of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn), who has just addressed the House. I believe it will be found upon investigation that the report with reference to penitentiary affairs is brought down to the end of the year, and, therefore, it is perfectly proper that the report for 1898, which was brought down to the 31st of December, should be appended to the report of the Minister of Justice. I think that on investigation the hon. gentleman will find that his discovery is a mare's nest.

Mr. QUINN. In explanation, I may say that the first meeting of the commission of which I have note was on the 1st of January, 1898, and the last on the 4th of August, 1898; and they are in the report which is said to be for the year ending 30th of June, 1898.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) is of opinion that hon. gentlemen on this side have discovered a mare's nest, in complaining of the absence of these reports. But what is the object of getting out these reports? Is it not to inform the people of the country as to what is being done in regard to public business, and to provide members of parliament with the information that they must have to enable them to do intelligently the work that is given them to do? For that purpose, the law orders that the reports shall be down, many of them, fifteen days after the opening of the session of parliament. What reason can there be for this, but that members of parliament may be provided with the facts to carry on intelligently the discussion of public affairs? We have been here going on 80 days and are still without many of these reports, including those that we most require. Yet we are told that we are over-critical because we ask for them. What were we here for? The Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says: It is not our fault, it is the fault of the Printing Bureau. But is nobody responsible for the Printing Bureau? And whom are we to hold responsible, whom can the country hold responsible if not the government of the day? The government cannot shirk responsibility in that way. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) himself recognizes his responsibility, for he has told us that he sent to the various departments and told them that they must send in their reports, that parliament wanted them. Did he send to the Printing Bureau? No; he sent to the departments under the control of the several ministers in order that they might speak to their subordinates and have them push forward the preparation of these reports. Is parliament to be paralyzed by the indifference or want of business capacity on the part of the government of the day? This is a very strange state of affairs that confronts us. For my part, I do not admit that the government has given us any reasonable defence against this charge that is brought against them of being derelict in their duty. If the Printing Bureau has not the facilities to turn out the reports, the government has it in its power to provide additional means. We know that a great deal of the government printing is done outside of the Printing Bureau entirely. Why do they not do the same with the reports? Or, if the Printing Bureau is not large enough, why do not they enlarge it? They are spending money in every other direction, we know. But this is the one above all others in which money must be spent if it is necessary to avoid this unreasonable delay. I am satisfied that the country will hold the government responsible for this dereliction of duty. I was amused to hear the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) speak in their defence. For years and years that hon. gentleman attacked the late government for dereliction of duty if the reports were not down at an early day; but now he comes forward as the apologist for his friends and urges every excuse that he can think of, in the hope that some of them may be accepted as good reason for the delay for which this government is responsible. Through the absence of these reports we are unable to do our duty in this House. The hon. member for Lennox (Mr. Wilson) has pointed out, very properly, that we shall be engaged to-morrow in the consideration of immigration in the standing committee of this House having charge of that matter. We have had the deputy minister before us giving us information as to how the immigration work is carried on. Hon. gentlemen on the other side have quoted statistics of immigration that are not available to members of this House generally. They could only have got them privately from persons in the department. We cannot refute those figures, or explain them, or even admit them—because we know nothing about them. And why? Because the report of the Minister of the Interior is not before us. We cannot deal intelligently with this subject either in that committee or before this House. Will the people be satisfied with that kind of management of their affairs? I think not. Can the members of the government plead innocence? No. What is their position to-day? Their position is that they are not faithfully discharging their duty or else that they are incompetent. We are to continue our work in the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization to-morrow. We are supposed to criticise and to ask questions in regard to immigration. But we cannot do it intelligently, because we do not know the result of the operations of last year. We are told that the department has 275 agents in the United States promoting immigration. But we do not know what they are doing, how many people they sent in last year, or how much money has been spent in this service. We are literally in the dark as to what has taken place and yet, to-morrow, we shall be expected to bring out such information as the House ought to have to enable it to discharge its duty to the country with regard to immigration. The estimates, also, are under consideration here from time to time. But we have no reports of the departments to show what has been done with the money that was voted last year. We are kept in the dark through the carelessness or want of business ability of the members of the government in preparing and presenting these reports. Some of the ministers plead innocence—that they do not know. They sit here and do not know whether the reports, even of their own departments, are presented to this House or not. How much must they know then, of the work of their departments? It is a shame and a disgrace to any members of the government—

Mr. BRITTON.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. SPROULE. I say it advisedly; it is disgraceful to have the head of a department sitting here and not knowing whether his report has been presented to parliament or not. He pleads ignorance. He ought to be ashamed of himself. He ought to vacate his place and let some one take it who will have information laid before parliament at the proper time.

Mr. O. E. TALBOT (Bellechasse). It is amusing to hear hon. gentlemen opposite complain that information is not supplied to them. They have kept us here three months, a good many of them making four-hour speeches. If they have not had the information they required, they must have been drawing largely on their imagination, or they must have rehashed information supplied in previous years.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I am quite willing to accept the responsibility of what rightly falls on my shoulders. But, I would like to inform the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), if he does not know it, that the immigration returns and the returns dealing with the immigration department, are not in the Department of Agriculture, and do not appear in my report. Therefore, it does not at all matter to him whether the report of the Minister of Agriculture is down or not. I must confess that I am much disappointed that my own report has not been laid on the Table of the House before this. I urged my officers from the very commencement of the year to prepare their several parts of that report and send it in as quickly as possible. It was a few days after the opening of the House that the report was sent to the Printing Bureau; I cannot give the exact date from memory, but that report was sent to the Printing Bureau within a few days after the opening of this parliament. I may say, in view of the remark made by an hon. gentleman opposite, that these reports dated from the 30th of June, or the 1st of July last, that the report of the Department of Agriculture and the report of the Experimental Farm are made up until the 1st of November, and that, consequently, there has not been so long a delay in respect to them as hon. gentlemen have led the House to believe.

Mr. WILSON. Why do they extend up to that date?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. These two reports deal largely with agricultural operations, and it is desirable that they should cover the season's operations up to the 1st of November.

Mr. GEO. GUILLET (West Northumberland). I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture how he explains the state of congestion in the Printing Bureau at so early a period in the session? There could be no extraordinary amount of work to be done at so early a period of the session.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman must remember that I am not in charge of the Printing Bureau and cannot give detailed information. But, I may mention one thing that may account for it, and that is, that a large new press was ordered for the Printing Bureau to obviate this delay, but the director of the Bureau has not been able to install that machine, because the firm from which he ordered it has not yet delivered it from pressure of work. I talked the matter over with him, and I had hoped most earnestly that this year the printing would have gone along more rapidly than it had been done, and to accomplish that end we asked for a sum of money last session to put in a new press of larger capacity, but, unfortunately, that press is not yet in operation, and, consequently, the work has not been proceeded with any more rapidly than before.

Mr. CLARKE. When was that press ordered?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It was ordered soon after the vote was passed last year.

Mr. GUILLET. At least, the manuscript of the reports ought to have been in the hands of the printers long before the session opened.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has spoken once.

Mr. GUILLET. I merely wished to make a remark on an answer to my question. I do not yet understand why the machinery of the Bureau is not sufficient to do the ordinary work. If the government found that the session was going to be of such a character as to furnish more work than anticipated, their explanation would be in order, but, at first it was thought the Printing Bureau would be sufficient to do all the ordinary work. Besides, the pressure of work on the Bureau has been relieved to some extent by giving large contracts to newspaper offices in different parts of the country, work which had usually been done by the Printing Bureau, so there could have been no especial strain upon the ordinary plant of the establishment.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a supply to be granted to Her Majesty ; and the motion of Sir Charles Tupper in amendment thereto.

Mr. MONK (Jacques Cartier). (Translation.) I have very little to add to the remarks I have offered the House, the other evening, in fact, that evening, as I had to deliver my speech to the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), who alone composed my French audience, I spared no effort in order to carry conviction into his mind, and to induce him to vote in favour of the amendment now under consideration. I do not know whether I have succeeded or not.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). (Translation.) I think not, but my hon. friend may try again.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) If I have failed, I am inclined to think that I was right when I said that the hon. minister was asleep.

I was saying, when concluding my remarks the other day, what was the position taken by Mr. Colmer, and what was his proposal in connection with the imposition of a slight duty upon the articles which are of large production in Canada, such as meats, breadstuffs, and a few other commodities, imported from foreign countries into England, and already referred to ; and I said that the imposition of that duty, according to a leading statistician, would not lead to an increase in the price of those articles in the English market, and further that it would be of the greatest advantage to the farming community, and would open for the country an unprecedented era of prosperity ; but I need not dwell at any greater length on this aspect of the question. That scheme, which won the approbation of the congress of the chambers of commerce of the empire, when it was expounded before them, would entail for Great Britain the imposition of duties to the amount of £2,700,000 sterling. But that proposal, in order to win popular favour, needed some amendment. Mr. Colmer altered it and showed how the tariff could be readjusted by reducing the duties which are actually imposed on tea, coffee, cocoa,—articles largely consumed by the working classes—representing a loss of revenue of about £2,000,000 sterling, the revenue derived from the duties on foreign produce being about £700,000.

Mr. GUILLET.

Now, as I said, when this proposal was explained to the congress of the chambers of commerce, the scheme of mutual trade preference evoked much more sympathy than it had done previously ; and from careful perusal the speeches delivered by the men of eminence who took part in that congress, one must come to the conclusion that this scheme is quite within the range of practical politics ; and to-day there is no doubt that it would be hailed with satisfaction and favourably received at the hands of the public of Great Britain, notwithstanding what English papers may have said to the contrary.

There is another document, Sir, to which I desire to draw the attention of this House, and it is entitled : ' Proceedings of a conference between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Premiers of the self-governing colonies.' This conference was held in July, 1897, and the report of its deliberations was submitted to both Houses of the British parliament. Upon that occasion, Mr. Chamberlain had to address the premiers of the self-governing colonies which were represented in London ; and what does he say about this mutual trade preference system ?

Does he give them to understand that this proposed amendment of the fiscal system is a chimerical scheme, outside of the pale of practical politics ? Not at all. Page 10 of this important document, I find the statement made by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and it reads as follows :—

I pass on, then, to another question, and that is as to the future commercial relations between this country and her colonies. How far is it possible to make those relations closer and more intimate ? I have said that I believe in sentiment as the greatest of all the forces in the general government of the world, but at the same time I should like to bring to the reinforcement of sentiment the motives which are derived from material and personal interest. But undoubtedly the fiscal arrangements of the different colonies differ so much among themselves, and all differ so much from those of the mother country, that it would be a matter of the greatest complication and difficulty to arrive at any conclusion which would unite us commercially in the same sense in which the Zollverein united the Empire of Germany. It may be borne in mind that the history of that Zollverein is most interesting and instructive. It commenced entirely as a commercial convention, dealing in the first instance only partially with the trade of the empire ; it was rapidly extended to include the whole trade of the empire, and it finally made possible and encouraged the ultimate union of the empire. But this is a matter upon which at the present time, rather than suggest any proposals of my own, I desire to hear the views of the gentlemen present.

In the meanwhile, however, I may say that I note a resolution which appears to have been passed unanimously at a meeting of the premiers in Hobart, in which the desire was expressed for closer commercial arrangements with the empire, and I think it was suggested that a commission of inquiry should be created in order to see in what way practical effect might be given to the aspirations. If that be the case, and if it were thought that at the present time you were not prepared to go beyond inquiry, if it were the wish of the other colonies, of Canada and of the South African colonies to join in such an inquiry, Her Majesty's government would be delighted to make arrangements for that purpose and to accept any suggestions as to the form of the reference and the character and constitution of the commission, and would very likely take part in it.

It is clear, from the tone of the remarks of that eminent statesman, that the scheme which he advocated before the congress of the chambers of commerce of the empire was by no means impracticable. But what he desired for the moment was to hear the suggestions of the premiers as to the carrying out of that plan.

And, later on, did the government of this country give effect to the invitation which was extended to them under such solemn circumstances? Did they confer about the matter with the Imperial authorities, prior to introducing the extensive changes which are embodied in the resolution now under consideration? Since 1886, no attempt has been made by the government to promote that great movement, inter-Imperial preferential trade; they have not taken a single step nor approached the Imperial authorities with a view to the carrying out of that proposal which was one of the planks of the Conservative platform.

I stated in the course of this debate, that public opinion in the province of Quebec was favourable to no concessions which fall short of the complete realization of mutual trade preference. We have fresh evidence of it in the report of the Montreal Chamber of Commerce, which is composed of French Canadian business men residing in the great commercial metropolis of Canada or in its immediate vicinity. This report coincides in the views expressed in the reports of the other chambers of commerce. The document from which I am going to quote derives a fresh interest from the fact that it conveys the views of the French Canadian people. Not only does it contain an expression of opinion from that important body on the matter which is engaging our attention, but it also discloses their views on each of the questions which are going to come up for discussion in June next at the congress of the chambers of commerce of the empire. The committee which prepared this report was composed of Messrs. L. E. Geoffrion, D. Masson, H. A. A. Brault, L. E. Morin, sr., J. Contant and Armand Lalonde.

As to the question which is now engaging our attention, do these gentlemen hold that we ought to make concessions without receiving anything in return? Quite the contrary; but let me now quote from that report which is in English:

Then, why should not this meeting examine—the matter being within the jurisdiction of boards of trade—the possibility for England to admit the principal of compensation to her colonies, in the shape of premiums (or in some other forms) on their trade—that is to say, on the exports of the colonies shipped direct to British ports, and that according to a schedule that might be fixed?

As far as we can see, the foreign countries to which the empire is bound by commercial treaties could find no plausible objection to this.

Those premiums, acknowledgments or compensations—the name matters little—could not be considered as the equivalent of a preferential duty, which England cannot grant without compromising the system of her commercial revenue, but rather as an invitation to the trade of her colonies to increase their productions, and the empire can probably as easily give such encouragement to its subjects beyond the seas as it can furnish subsidies and grants to its subjects in the United Kingdom.

The view respectfully submitted by this 'Chambre' is open to developments which the limits of this report will not allow, but it may be that the discussion of the subject (as well as that of how the colonial governments should use the premiums referred to), will bring on a solution of the problem of the difficulties created by the commercial system of the empire, and show distinct situations and needs.

I shall quote no further from this report; but, I ask, does it not clearly state that England ought to impose a duty on foreign produce, in favour of her colonies, as suggested by Mr. Colmer in his essay? The principle is formally laid down here, that we ought to obtain a compensation in return from concessions. Such is the prevailing opinion in the province of Quebec.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). (Translation.) What is the date of that report?

Mr. MONK. The 14th March of this year. I think that, if these gentlemen, who have, no doubt, considered attentively the question, as shown by the able way in which they have dealt with it, had thoroughly studied Mr. Colmer's essay, they would have completely endorsed the proposition which he develops in his book. At all events, they admit that we should get something in return for our concessions, and rightly so.

Let us consider our position. It is my firm belief that this preferential tariff policy is going to lead to retaliation on the part of foreign countries. Germany and Belgium have already done so, and the other European countries are going, before long, to take example from the United States in this respect. We shall find ourselves isolated. We have, it is true, the British market, but we find ourselves, in this market, exactly on the same footing as the other countries which compete with us, and especially agricultural countries like the United States.

In the details of the scheme proposed, Mr. Colmer does not mention all the articles on which duties should be levied, so as to give us a preferential treatment. He selects only 18 out of 219, but there are others: the trade in eggs, for instance. That is an article which we export in large quantities, but the American competition in this respect is very acute. Should a light duty be levied on eggs coming into Great Britain from foreign countries, it would not increase the price paid by the British consumer, but it would be a great boon to our farming classes. I do not want to take any more of the time of the House, in discussing this scheme. But, before resuming my seat, Sir, I wish to refer briefly to attacks, altogether unjustifiable—and I may say, disloyal attacks—on the part of a paper, which is the organ of the hon. Minister of Public Works. We all know, Sir, by experience, what are the troubles of life; I mean the real anxieties and trials of this life; and, in the face of such trials, one may well remain impassable and indifferent to the attacks of a political sheet; but there are certainly limits to human endurance in this respect. The organ of the hon. Minister of Public Works seems to take this position: that it is impossible for us to criticise the acts of the minister, without assailing or offending the French Canadian nationality. Such is the proposition, as I understand it. But I say that, for those of us who have a thorough knowledge of the condition of affairs in Montreal, such a proposition is simply grotesque. Are we then to be told that this gentleman is the expression of all that is noble and virtuous in his race? Are we to be told that he typifies and represents to such a degree the qualities of his race that it is impossible to upbraid him without attacking thereby the whole French Canadian people? Such a pretension is unreasonable. From time immemorial, and as early as the period of the Conquest, in 1759, we have had truly representative men. There are still men of such a character nowadays; but I doubt very much whether the hon. Minister of Public Works is entitled to rank among them.

Sir, it was but fair that we should be represented by a French Canadian at the Universal Exhibition which France is giving to the world, at the dawn of the new century; but I am satisfied that, if there had been a plebiscite taken in the province of Quebec, in order to ascertain who should represent us in Paris, I am satisfied, I say, that the name of that hon. gentleman would never have come out of the ballot-box.

Once only, Sir, I deemed it my duty to call the attention of the House to what I thought was a contradiction in the statements of the hon. gentleman. We all know that his health is not very good, and I have never said anything to the contrary; all I ventured to say was that the activity displayed by him in Paris could certainly lead us to believe that he could have remained here.

Mr. MONK.

Well, what am I, for having said that and for having had the audacity of criticising the conduct of the hon. gentleman who represents us upon this memorable occasion? The language I used was unimpassioned and moderate; and yet, in spite of all that, it seems that I am no gentleman, that I am but a clown. That is how we are treated on this side of the House, when we venture to criticise the acts of the hon. Minister of Public Works.

All I can say is this: that the title of gentleman is not delivered by letters-patent, as formerly nobles were created by means of letters of nobility. Should I wish for the certificate of character, I would not go and look for it in the office of La Patrie.

I have spent most of my life among French Canadians, and I ought to know them. I may say that upon every occasion,—and those occasions were numerous—I have received the most generous treatment at their hands. Are the attacks of the salaried writer of that article, with its ill-construed and obscure sentences, in which the rules of grammar are trodden under foot and the rules of syntax murdered, are those attacks, I say, going to change my feelings towards the French Canadians? No, never.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). Mr. Speaker, I certainly will not undertake to answer, in his own language, my hon. friend (Mr. Monk), who has just taken his seat. I wish that I had a knowledge of the French language, but, unfortunately, I have not, and I shall leave the reply to him to some hon. gentleman who will follow myself. I shall endeavour to pay some little attention to the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). That hon. gentleman made a very extended speech in the House a few evenings ago, and he made a great many statements, that, in my humble opinion, should not be allowed to pass without some reference to them, and without being answered. He said, in the first place, that prosperity comes in spite of the government. We admit that prosperity is not absolutely dependent on the action of any cabinet, but a good government can do a great deal in helping forward the prosperity of the country. We know that hon. gentlemen opposite, from 1874 to 1878, charged the Mackenzie government with being responsible for the unfortunate condition of things that existed during that period. They said that they were flies on the wheel, that the country was languishing for want of a government that could handle its affairs successfully and in a statesmanlike way, and that if the country had such a government, prosperity would be at once experienced by the people. They persuaded the country that a change of government, in order to bring about prosperity, was absolutely necessary, so that, on that occasion, while they appear to have argued before the country that a change of government, for the sake of prosperity, was necessary, on the present occasion, they argue the very reverse. They say that the present government have nothing to do with the prosperous condition of the country. I claim that they have a very great deal to do with it; I claim that the change of government was a happy incident in the history of this country at the time at which it took place. I claim that immediately upon that change taking place, there came about a general change in the condition of things, which, at least, points to the fact that the change was absolutely desirable, because it revived trade and brought about a condition of things that we had not experienced for many years previously. The hon. member for Halton said that we had not largely increased the free list. Well, Sir, I contend that the changes that we made were very much in the interest of the farming community. While the government and their supporters sat in opposition, they claimed that it was necessary that some things that were the raw materials of the farmer, should be placed on the free list, and the government, for better or for worse, and I consider it was very much for the better, placed these things on the free list, such as barbed wire, binder twine, and some other commodities that they thought it was necessary should be placed on the free list in the interest of the farming community. Then, my hon. friend referred to the Intercolonial Railway. He said that a million of money had been thrown away, through the deal that had been made with the Drummond County Railway people. If ever there was a condition of things in the history of any country that warranted and virtually required the government to take active and immediate steps to bring about such a change in the management of a public enterprise, that, instead of there being a deficit, it would, at least, pay running expenses and return something to the country for the enormous amount of money sunk in it, it was to be found in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim to be blessed with all the statesmanship that is to be found within the bounds of this Dominion. They are actually under the impression that under their hats all the brains that are available for the direction of the affairs of this country, are covered. They believe that they themselves possess all the wisdom that is in the country, but, for many years they allowed the only road owned by this Dominion, to remain in such a condition that there was a never-ending deficit, year after year, which amounted, in the aggregate, to something like $8,500,000 for the number of years which it had been run, to pay the running expenses, and in addition to that, all the interest paid on the $55,000,000 of money sunk in that road, had to be paid out of the pockets of the people. They allowed that condition of things to exist, and made no effort to improve it. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that, in some years, they were able to show that it was paying running expenses. How did it pay running expenses? At the time that the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) was Minister of Railways, in order, if possible, to show that the road was paying running expenses, he actually charged to capital account snow fences all along the line, and snow sheds. He charged everything to capital account that he could charge to it, and the result was that he showed a very small surplus. Then, again, we know, that the recent Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart), when he came into power, endeavoured to bring about the same condition of things, or to show that the road was paying running expenses. When he came into office there was about $700,000 worth of supplies scattered along the line and principally at Moncton, and when he left the management of the road, there was $350,000 less of supplies than when he went in. He had taken these supplies for the improvement of the road, he had not replaced them, and he claimed that he was running the road within the limits of its earnings, when, the fact was, that he was exhausting the supplies that had been bought in former years and put in for the purpose of maintaining the road. In that way, he presented a statement that led the House to suppose that he was meeting running expenses, when he really was not. With all these experiences, the government, when they came into power, made up their minds that a change should take place, and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), and the government of the day deserve credit for the manner in which they have so successfully handled the road, and for the change that has taken place in its connections and management. Hon. gentlemen opposite charged that the bargain that was made with the Drummond County Railway Company was a corrupt bargain. They endeavoured to impress that upon the House and upon the country. I cannot understand why hon. gentlemen opposite, on all occasions, have endeavoured to fasten on the government corrupt acts in reference to every single transaction that they have put through. They tried to do the same thing in connection with the Yukon, in connection with the Drummond County road, and in connection with every public expenditure. They appear to have had the idea that corruption permeated every transaction of that kind. I suppose they were, in all probability, actuated, in coming to that conclusion, by the experience they had, when they sat on the Treasury benches. They evidently must have thought that the government of the day were bound to conduct the affairs of this country on the same principles on which hon. gentlemen opposite conducted them when they occupied the Treasury benches, and as a result they came to the conclusion that corruption was rampant in every department. After a very vigorous search, after the search-light had been turned on every transaction of the government from the time they were elected to power down to the present moment, they have failed to fasten one improper transaction upon any minister of the cabinet, or to point to one improper thing that has been done that reflects discredit on the government, or any member thereof. I contend that the transaction with the Drummond County Railway Company, resulting in the bringing of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, was a most happy and prudent act on the part of the government, and this is evidenced by the fact that to-day, we have the prospect, that the road, at least, will pay running expenses, and eventually return something to the country for the very large amount of money that has been sunk in it.

The next thing that the hon. member for Halton spoke about, was the Franchise Act. He said, that we had a Franchise Act with such an absurdity in it, that, in the province of Quebec, men, in some cases, have the right to vote five or six times, while men in the province of Ontario, only have the right to vote once. We know that the province of Quebec elect to this House some 60 members, and that, in the province of Ontario, they elect some 80 or 90 members to this House. Each province is confined to a certain number, according to the population within the province. I would like to know what concern it is to the people of the province of Ontario how the people of the province of Quebec choose to elect their 60 members and send them here. If they choose to give a man a vote for every piece of property he has in the province of Quebec, or, if they choose to enfranchise all the ladies in the province of Quebec, or if they choose to give votes to all the children in the province of Quebec, of what moment is it to us, as long as they only elect 60 members and send them to this House? It is a matter of their own concern how they shall elect these 60 members. In the province of Ontario we give one man one vote, and we elect 90 members, and send them here. It is entirely a matter that concerns that province, and if every man in the province of Quebec had 20 votes, it would not make a bit of difference so far as the representation in this House is concerned, so that it is a matter of no moment from the standpoint of the representation in this Chamber.

Mr. MACLEAN. Will the hon. gentleman let me tell him the difference?

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. McMULLEN. You can tell it when you make your speech, I know it already, and it is not worth while occupying time listening to it now.

Mr. MACLEAN. All right.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) spoke of railway bonuses, and he said that the government were now paying $6,400 per mile in place of $3,200, which the Conservative government paid. In the case of some difficult railway construction this government considered it prudent to add an additional amount to the $3,200 per mile, but they did it in connection with a statesmanlike policy by which they asked these railways to contribute 3 per cent upon the amount of the bonus, which should be returned to the country in the performance of such work as the carrying of the mails or other government business. That is an idea which never struck the Conservative government. While the railways are now getting an increased grant towards construction, they are called upon to pay interest at the rate of 3 per cent upon that grant, and as Canada is to-day borrowing her money for something over 2½ per cent, then while we are helping these roads, we are simply lending them money, and lending it to them at a rate in excess of what we are paying for it ourselves. Every road which is put into full operation will certainly be able to pay at least 3 per cent on the $6,400 per mile which is granted by this government. The policy in that respect adopted by this government is a wise and prudent one, and it never occurred to the Conservatives during the eighteen years they were in power.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) next referred to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and he claimed that a large sum of money was sacrificed in connection with that road. Well, when the Conservative government built the Canadian Pacific Railway they inserted conditions which placed the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories in a very unfortunate position, and the progress of these provinces was greatly restricted by the enormous freight rates the people had to pay on shipments going into the country and coming out of the country. The settlers appealed to the late government in vain, and they again appealed to the present government, and the present government thought it was a good opportunity to get the Canadian Pacific Railway to relax their enormous freight charges. It was, therefore, made a condition precedent to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway subsidy that the Canadian Pacific Railway should relax these freight rates. An hon. member from Manitoba stood up in this House and declared that the conditions imposed by the government on the Canadian Pacific Railway in this connection would be worth $600,000 a year to the people of Manitoba alone. That shows that the bargain made by this government was a prudent one, and that it relieved the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories from the thralldom into which the Conservative government had plunged them. The hon. gentleman from Halton (Mr. Henderson) tried to persuade the House that under the preferential tariff the people were actually paying more for coloured cotton than they were paying under the Foster tariff. Let us see how that is. The amount of printed cottons imported into Canada from Great Britain last year was to the value of $2,247,683, and the imports from the United States amounted to the value of $769,600; in all, $3,017,283. Under the Foster tariff of 30 per cent, these coloured cottons would have paid in duty $905,184.30. Under the Fielding tariff, 35 per cent duty, with 25 per cent preferential off, the goods coming from Great Britain, and 35 per cent on the goods coming from the United States, this importation of cottons would have paid $859,376.79, or $45,808.11 less under the Fielding tariff than would have been paid if the Foster tariff was in operation. My hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) will not attempt to challenge this statement, I am sure. I have given him the actual figures of the importations from Great Britain and of the importations from the United States, taken from the blue-books, and if he will go over the figures carefully he will find that my statement is correct.

Mr. HENDERSON. That does not contravene my statement, because it is an answer to a different thing altogether.

Mr. McMULLEN. The statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) was that the people had paid more duty on printed cottons coming into Canada last year than they would have paid under the Foster tariff. Well, the reason why they paid more duty last year was simply because they imported more goods. The reason why each family paid more duty last year was simply because the good wife used two printed cotton gowns instead of one. Under the improved condition of the people last year they were able to buy more goods, and of course, they had to pay more duty, but it is a very unfair argument for the hon. gentleman to use, that because the gross amount of the duty last year was larger than previously, therefore, the people paid more duty. The figures I give to the House are correct, and if under the Foster tariff people imported and used the same quantity of cottons as they did under the Fielding tariff, then they would have paid $45,808.11 more under the Foster tariff than they had to pay under the Fielding tariff. Again, let us suppose that the people of Canada will import the same amount of printed goods next year as they imported last year. Next year the preferential tariff will be 33½ per cent off, and the duty the people will have to pay will be $793,819.37, as against $905,184.91, which is the amount of duty they would have to pay if the Foster tariff were in force. Therefore, on printed goods alone there will be an actual saving to the people on the year's transaction of $111,385.53. My hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) was therefore far astray in his argument. Now, suppose the hon. gentleman was a retail merchant and he imported ten bales of printed goods, fifty pieces in the bale, being 12,500 yards, at say 10 cents a yard, or $1,250. The duty under the Foster tariff would be 30 cents on the dollar or $375. Now, we will take it under the Fielding preferential tariff. The ten bales of cotton, containing the same 12,500 yards, at 10 cents a yard would cost the same price, viz., $1,250, and at 26 per cent, which would be the preferential rate, the duty would be $328.11, or $46.87 less than the Foster tariff. If my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) bought $1,000 worth of cottons and he was importing them into Canada, I would like to know whether if he had the choice he would import them under the Fielding tariff or under the Foster tariff. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) answer that?

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). My hon. friend desires me to answer the question, and I shall. The statement I made with respect to coloured goods was absolutely correct, namely, that in the first two years of the preferential tariff we paid more duty on coloured cotton goods by $17,025 than we would have paid under the Foster tariff. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) makes another proposition with which perhaps I may deal. I submit this to him: That if he cannot get these goods in England, which at the present time he cannot get of the character named, viz., the coarse cotton goods to which I referred, then there is no competition between Great Britain and the United States, and the result is that we pay for the goods, as before plus the 5 per cent duty that the Liberal government added in 1897.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend will not answer the plain question which I put to him, simply because he knows perfectly well that if he said he would import his goods under the Foster tariff, he would admit that he was paying $46.87 more than he would pay under the Fielding tariff, and the result would be that nobody would believe him. My hon. friend is a money-lender, and I would like to know, if he tried to make his customers believe that 30 per cent is less than 26½ per cent, how many would he get to believe him? Suppose my hon. friend imported $1,000 worth of carpets. The duty under the Foster tariff would be $300, and under the Fielding tariff, with 25 per cent off, it would be $262.50, which gives a saving of $37.50 on the $1,000 worth of carpets. Again, suppose he imported $1,000 worth of cutlery. Under the Foster tariff the duty would be 32½ per cent, amounting to $325. Under the Fielding tariff the duty was reduced to 30 per cent, and 25 per cent off, that would make the duty on the $1,000 worth of cutlery, $225; so that under the Fielding tariff you could bring it in for $100 less than under the Foster tariff. Take oilcloth: $1,000 worth brought into the country would have to pay, under the Foster tariff, $300, and under the Fielding tariff, $225; so that there would be a saving of $75 on $1,000 worth of oilcloth imported from Great Britain. The hon. leader of the Opposition said that the tariff was a deception and a fraud. He said there was nothing in it for the British manufacturer. If the hon. gentleman wanted to buy a parcel of oilcloth or carpets, and he had laid before him the American sample, the German sample, the French sample and the British sample, all equal in weight, texture and quality, I would like to know where he would place his order. When he looks over the duty and finds that on $1,000 worth of carpets or oilcloth he could save $100 by buying from England rather than from France or Germany or the United States, if he is an intelligent man he will buy his goods in England. I would like to know if that condition of things is not a decided advantage to the English manufacturer? It undoubtedly is. Take an importer of silk, say a wholesale merchant of Montreal, who imports $4,000 worth in a year. On that importation, under the Foster tariff, he would have to pay 30 per cent, or $1,200; under the Fielding tariff he would pay the same rate, less 25 per cent, or $900; so that on the importation he would save $300. I do not think he would find a merchant in Montreal who, under these circumstances, would place his order in France or Germany rather than in England. It is quite clear from these statements—and they are all taken from reliable sources—that the present tariff works admirably well in the interest of the English manufacture. Now, let us see how it works in the wholesale line, because we cannot pay too much attention to this feature of the tariff. Take an English manufacturer who exports to Canada $200,000 of printed cotton goods in a year. The duty on these under the Foster tariff would be $60,000. Under the Fielding tariff the duty would be 35 per cent, with 25 per cent off, or $52,500, a saving on the whole importation of $7,500. Take a man who imports $200,000 worth of carpets and oilcloth, which are largely imported from the United States as well as from England, France and Germany. The duty on these under the Foster tariff would be $60,000, and under the Fielding tariff, $52,500, or $7,500 less. Take cutlery: A man who imports $100,000 worth, or an English exporter who sends that amount to Canada, would have to pay, under the Foster tariff, a duty of $32,500, and under the Fielding tariff, only $22,500. Under the Fielding tariff he would save $10,000. The result would be the same in many other lines, so that it is quite clear that when hon. gentlemen opposite are endeavouring to persuade the consumers of this country that they are not benefited by the Fielding tariff, they are trying to impose upon the intelligence of the people. Again, when the leader of the opposition attempts to persuade the people of Canada, and also the people of England, that there is no advantage whatever in the Fielding tariff, he is setting himself in opposition to the expressed opinion of the entire press of England itself. It is amazing that a man of his extended experience and education should make such a statement.

Mr. McMULLEN.

My hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) claims to be a very pronounced and loyal Canadian. He pretends to be a stickler for home manufacture, and to believe in patronizing everything Canadian. He poses as the apostle of protection, and was sent by our manufacturers to Washington as their agent to look after their interests. But my hon. friend, with his two brothers, are interested in a fair at Woodbridge, and when he wants show bills for this fair he goes to Cincinnati to have them printed. He did this at the last fair in order to save to himself and his associates some $5 or $6. Here is one of the bills (showing bill), displaying in vivid blue and yellow all the grandeur and attractions of the Woodbridge Fair. On this bill, I find the names of no less than three Wallaces. One is secretary-treasurer, the hon. gentleman himself is president, and another Wallace occupies some other position. They manage the whole business. My hon. friend knows that he could have had his bills printed in Toronto; he knows that the Toronto Exhibition has all its lithographing done in that city, so as to patronize our home industries; our hon. friend himself has been a very pronounced champion of home industry, and has lectured us by the hour on that question. But in a moment of weakness—and what a fall, Mr. Speaker, was there!—for the purpose of saving some $8 or $10 to his exhibition company in the town of Woodbridge, he sent the order for his posters to Cincinnati, and in that foreign city he had them printed by foreign labour, to be circulated throughout the province of Ontario. I do not think the hon. gentleman went so far as to smuggle these bills through the customs, but he certainly got them printed across the line, and he told us the other night that he saved $20 or $30 by the transaction. Yet he is the same hon. gentleman who would prevent a Canadian labouring man or farmer going across to the other side to buy a buggy or a wagon. Woe betide any man in his riding who would dare bring discredit on that riding and on the reputation of the hon. gentleman, as its representative, by purchasing a wagon on the American side. That man would be disgraced for the rest of his life; but when it is a question of saving a few dollars for the hon. gentleman himself and his associates by getting their show bills printed by American labour, then the hon. gentleman's patriotic principles vanish into thin air.

Mr. HENDERSON. Would the hon. gentleman let me put him a question?

Mr. McMULLEN. I am dealing now with my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) and prefer not to be interrupted. I wonder if the manufacturing institutions of this country will again employ my hon. friend, after this lapse from grace, to go down to Washington and look after their interests the next time we have a Washington conference. Probably it was down at Washington that the hon. gentleman learned about the cheapness of bill printing on the other side, and conceived the idea of having his posters printed by American instead of Canadian labour. When I think of the invectives and the denunciations of my hon. friend against the policy of letting Americans come in here and take away the bread of our labouring men, when I remember the paths with which he depicted the ruin caused our artisans by American cheap labour, and his denunciations of this government for not enforcing the labour law and keeping out American workmen from this country, I can hardly realize that it was this same gentleman who had his show bills printed in Cincinnati. But here, Mr. Speaker, are the bills which speak for themselves. Here they are witnesses of the delinquency of this hon. gentleman, who stole away quietly and secretly to a foreign city and placed his order with a foreign industry to the detriment of home labour.

My hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) has told us that our farmers have been injured by the present tariff. I am really at a loss to know where he got his inspiration. As I have said before, our farmers have not been for years in so prosperous a condition. I do not think that my hon. friend will deny that. The farmers themselves are perfectly satisfied. They are getting the highest price for live hogs that has been paid in Canada during the last ten years. They are getting something like six cents a pound, live weight.

My hon. friend also endeavoured to persuade the House that the government were charging the farmers more for twine than they should. He quoted the price and said it was the price of sisal, and taking the price of sisal and the price of twine he said that the government was charging an excessive rate. That is not correct. I have here a letter addressed to the Minister of Justice on this question, and the prices of sisal as certified to by the Department of Justice are as follows:

On April 1, 1898, the price of manila hemp was 4½c. to 4¾c. per pound. In April, 1899, it was 8¾c. In April, 1900, it was 13¼c. per pound. The price of sisal hemp on April 1, 1898, was 4½c. per pound. In April, 1899, it was 8¼c.; and in April, 1900, it was 9c. to 9¾c.

In the face of this statement, which gives the correct figures at which the penitentiary bought its raw material, my hon. friend should revise the statement he made. I believe my hon. friend should wish at least, to make a correct statement, but the statement he has made is incorrect.

Mr. HENDERSON. No, my statement is correct.

Mr. McMULLEN. Here is the certificate of the Minister of Justice, in whose department the sisal and manila are bought showing the figures at which those purchases were made. My hon. friend was trying to show that while they bought sisal at 4½ or 5 cents per pound, they were charging the farmers 13 cents and 14 cents for the twine. That is not correct, as shown by these figures from the Department of Justice. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson), may have got his figures from wrong sources. He knows perfectly well that the supply of sisal is bought a considerable time before it is used, some years. But, even take the prices previously paid. In 1898, they paid 4 cents and 5 cents. In 1899—and it certainly would not be bought a year over the time it was used—the price paid was 8 3/8 cents. My hon. friend says it was some 4½ cents. That is most unfair. He may be able to persuade his constituents—perhaps they do not read beyond his speech—that his statement is correct. But I earnestly hope that the people of the county of Halton are an intelligent people, and will read for themselves; and if they do, they must begin to lose confidence in my hon. friend, when he attempts to bulldoze them with a statement of that kind. The hon. gentleman may have taken his position from the Auditor General's Report—

Mr. HENDERSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. McMULLEN. But, that report may show what was paid for a previous year. But, the sisal has been used, and here I give the actual prices paid. These show that the farmers of this country are getting twine at the actual cost of manufacture. It is unfair that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson), should attempt to make the farmers believe that the Department of Justice is treating them unfairly, by charging them more for the twine than it is worth. They get the twine at the lowest possible figure, the government allowing the farmers to buy until the 1st of May; and I believe they will extend that time, so that any farmer wishing to buy twine for next harvest may get it at actual cost.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. McMULLEN. When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I was endeavouring to reply to an address made by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson.) I referred to several points he had endeavoured to make with regard to the advantages of the old tariff over the new, and was answering those points wherein he challenged this government to show that the public are reaping as much benefit under the new tariff as they were under the old. The hon. gentleman stated that the ex-Minister of Finance had given us true tariff reform in 1894. Well, the ex-Minister of Finance, made some effort at changing the tariff in 1894, but I think most members of this House will remember that he went back to the original condition of things under the guise of correcting clerical errors; in fact he was forced by the manufacturers to go back to the point where the tariff originally stood. It would be impossible for any Minister of Finance, who was committed to the principle of protection to the extent that the ex-Minister of Finance was committed to it, to reform a tariff in the interests of the consumers. His object, his aim, his entire life as Minister of Finance was devoted to promoting the interests of the manufacturers, and the interest of the consumers was regarded by him as a secondary consideration.

Now, my hon. friend, in another statement, said that farm implements were not reduced by the present government. Surely he did not mean to convey to the House the idea that the old government had reduced all farm implements to 20 per cent. Some were reduced to 20 per cent, but it is an error to say that all farm implements were reduced to 20 per cent. There was a large line of farm implements that remained at 30 per cent and 35 per cent, and it was left to the present Minister of Finance to alter the law, so as to bring them down to the tariff at which they now stand. So I think the hon. gentleman was astray when he attempted to lead the House to the conclusion that farm implements were reduced to 20 per cent.

Again, he referred to the increase of the debt, and he challenged us to say what items in the national debt we objected to. Well, there are a great many items in the national debt that we object to, a great many items in which we say the country has not received value for the money spent. Take, for instance, the St. Charles branch, that cost this country over $1,700,000, while the estimated cost in the first place was $450,000. We object to that. We object to the enormous amount of money spent on the labour improvements in Montreal and Quebec, and on the graving dock on the Pacific coast. We object to them on the ground that they cost the country far more than they should have cost. It was proved before a committee of this House, that instead of their costing the country $2,000,000, they actually cost over $3,000,000. It was proved clearly that $964,000 were actually stolen in connection with the construction of these works. We object to the Baie des Chaleurs Railway in which $620,000 of the people's money has been sunk. That was a scheme got up from the beginning for hoodling purposes, it was carried on for those purposes, and it has now dropped into the hands of the sheriff. We object to the Langevin Block, having cost so much money. The original estimate of that block was $300,000, while it actually cost $740,000. We object to the manner in which the money of the country has been squandered in connection with that work. We object to the Tay Canal, where $473,000 of public money was sunk for the purpose of producing a trail race to the saw-mill of the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals, a work that only yields a revenue of $134 per annum. We also object to the Onderdonk contract. In an investigation which was held here it was clearly proved that the rolling stock was taken off the hands of Onderdonk at something like $200,000, when it was not worth $70,000. We know perfectly well, that the men who were appointed to arbitrate on that work were badgered and virtually forced into consenting to an award that took $200,000 out of the treasury of this country, on the urgent appeal by the then Minister of Railways and Canals. But, I shall have something more to say about that later on.

Then the hon. gentleman said something with regard to superannuation. He said that the present government had promised, prior to coming into power, that they would abolish superannuation. The government did promise that superannuation should be done away with. But, who is responsible for its not yet being done away with? When the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), introduced his Bill into the House it had for its object the abolition of superannuations to the extent that it was possible to abolish them. Who fought against its being abolished? Hon. gentlemen opposite. They rose, one after another, at that time and opposed the provisions of that Bill. They fought against doing away with superannuation; they fought for the civil service of Canada, as a man would plead for an only son, day after day, and eventually we were led to understand that unless the government were willing to take such a Bill as they were willing to give, the probability was that it might receive the same treatment at the hands of the Senate as the Redistribution Bill received, and that it might be thrown out. In the face of that fact hon. gentlemen opposite know that they opposed the abolition of superannuations, that they fought for its existence, that they fought for its continuation, and yet, they have the hardihood and the brass to get on the public platform and say that the government have not abolished superannuations. The government would have abolished superannuations had they been permitted to carry through their Bill, which was at last, whittled down to a point that its provisions should only apply to those who entered the civil service after the Bill became operative. Had hon. gentlemen opposite consented to the abolition of superannuations, the country would not be called upon to-day to pay the amount of money that the government are called upon to pay on account of superannuations.

Mr. MACLEAN. Have the government a majority in this House?

Mr. McMULLEN. There is another subject that I wish to refer to. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) said that by the admission of corn into Canada, the government had very seriously injured the price of coarse grains raised by the farmers of this country. He said that the price of coarse grains had gone down—

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. McMULLEN. I hear an hon. gentleman cry, 'Hear, hear.' I have, in my hand, a list of the prices of oats, on the 3rd day of March in the city of Montreal in each year from 1892 to the present time. The prices were as follows:

Year.	Per bushel.
1892.....	29c.
1893.....	34c.
1894.....	41c.
1895.....	40c.
1896.....	30½c.
1897.....	22c.
1898.....	33½c.
1899.....	31c.
1900.....	31c.

It will be noticed that the price of oats on the 3rd day of March last was 31 cents, and that on the 3rd of March, 1892, it was 29 cents, so that hon. gentlemen opposite, when they are claiming that the introduction of corn into Canada free of duty was a serious injury, or an injury at all, to the price of coarse grains are stating what the condition of the market in the different periods which I have quoted will not sus-tain or carry out. Then, I have the prices also of oats in the city of Toronto, on the 2nd of March in each year from 1892 to 1900. They are as follows:

Year.	Per bushel.
1892.....	34c.
1893.....	36c.
1894.....	41c.
1895.....	37c.
1896.....	29c.
1897.....	22c.
1898.....	34c.
1899.....	34c.
1900.....	31½c.

That shows that none of these coarse grains have suffered by the admission of corn. Oats, to-day, are as high in price as they were before corn was admitted free.

Mr. TAYLOR. What about 37 and 41 cents?

Mr. McMULLEN. As was pointed out by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) the admission of free corn is one of the greatest boons that the farmers of Canada have had for many years. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) further said that the admission of free corn had stopped the growth of corn in Canada. I hardly think he was serious in that statement.

He drew attention to the fact that the Liberals had promised to reduce expenditure. It is quite true that some of the hon. gentlemen, who were supporting the government on this side of the House and who were in the House at that time, did promise to reduce expenditure and to reduce it considerably, and had the items of expenditure to be provided for remained such as they were during the time that hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, there would have been a substantial reduction in the annual expenditure. But, in place of remaining at the point at which they were when hon. gentlemen held office they very largely increased. As has been already shown there was an enormous increase in the postal service. Then again, in regard to the Yukon Territory, that was little known when hon. gentlemen were in office, the government have had an additional expenditure. The government had to undertake a very large expenditure in connection with the development of that particular territory. They had also to undertake several additional expenditures in connection with the development that has taken place in British Columbia. Take, for instance, the city of Rossland, B.C. In the year before last the collection of revenue there amounted to something like $144,000. The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) had to provide a staff of officers for that place. He had to make the necessary provision to do the business of the Customs Department, and in doing so it required an increase of expenditure. Where you have to overtake trade of that kind, and when there is such a large expansion in trade, it is necessary for the government to rise to the emergency and to provide efficient services and in doing so they must increase the expenditure. But, had it remained at the point at which the trade of this country was when hon. gentlemen opposite held office there would have been very large savings in the matter of public expenditure. I have already referred to the fact of the enormous increase in the postal service. I think if there is any minister of the Crown who deserves special thanks for the manner in which he has handled the affairs of his department, that man is the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). There is not a man in Canada who has done more to try and give the country the service that is necessary and to overtake the arduous work devolving upon him in connection with a public department than the hon. gentleman has done. He has acted admirably, and I believe the people of the country appreciate his efforts in that direction. He has established 559 new offices, and he has increased the mileage in mail services in the country to the extent of about 2,500,000 miles as compared with the services that were performed when he came into power. I would like to know if hon. gentlemen opposite would expect, that, in the face of such an enormous expansion, the government are to be condemned because they have not reduced the volume of expenditure. It is absurd. If they simply had had to deal with the items as they found them when they came into power, and if they had exceeded their predecessors in the matter of expenditure, they might then fairly have been challenged, in view of the professions they made in opposition, but in the face of the expanded trade that had to be overtaken, and the enormous extent to which the services of the country have expanded within the last four years, it is not to be wondered at if they had to increase the expenditure. The hon. member for Halton made a very loud and pathetic appeal in regard to the old wagon. He said that it was subject to a tax of 25 per cent, and he described to this House, in a very vivid way, what use was made of that particular old wagon. It is true that it served a good purpose in years gone by, and I dare say it has served that purpose up to a very recent date. He said that it was used, not only for drawing in the farm produce but for carrying the family to church on Sunday. I believe that was the experience of a great many farmers during the life of hon. gentlemen opposite politically. I can tell the hon. member that the people in my district, on account of the improved condition of things, are able to purchase better and more commodious buggies to go to church in than the old farm wagon, but, perhaps, in the county of Halton they are sticking to the old farm wagon yet. Does the hon. gentleman not know that this government has very considerably reduced the duty on the articles of which the old wagon is composed—iron reduced from $10 to $7 a ton, and to $5 if imported from England. Then, curry combs have been reduced from 32½ per cent to 25 per cent, and saws from 32½ per cent to 25 per cent. These are items much used by the farming community, and the farmers appreciate reductions of that kind. The hon. gentleman told us that the farmers threshed their grain with a windmill. I have heard of such a thing, but I earnestly hope that under the present prosperous conditions, the people of Halton will be able to get better appliances for threshing their grain than windmills, and I trust that after next election they will not send any more windmills to this House—

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. TAYLOR. From North Wellington.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) told us that the average price of cattle has been much reduced during the past few years. I dare say that the price per head dropped, but that is largely due to the shipment of poor cattle from Manitoba last year, and the year before. Those who have knowledge of the cattle trade know that last year a great many cattle were sent across the Atlantic that should never have been shipped; I saw them going aboard myself. In view of that, I do not wonder that there was a reduction in the price per head, but I contend that the Ontario farmer got as good a price for his cattle last year as he realized any other year. I am satisfied that the farmers who produced the proper kind of cattle were satisfied with their returns. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) spoke about the reduction in the duties on sugar, but he forgot to say that after the duty was reduced on sugar in 1895, the Conservatives had a deficit that year of $4,153,000. The Liberal government reduced the duty upon commodities imported by $1,735,500, and they had a surplus that year of $4,837,750. There is a contrast for you. After the Conservatives reduced the duty the rate of taxation rose the following year to $18.26 per head, and they still had a deficit of $330,000. The average rate of taxation from 1887 to 1891 inclusive was $21.14, or $4.45 more than the rate of taxation under the Liberal government in 1899. Mr. Foster, in 1899, would have collected $6,840,000 more than what was collected from the people under the Fielding tariff, so you see that the Liberal government have taken over $6,750,000 less from the pockets of the people, and they have a surplus to boot of $4,837,000. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) claims credit for having put sugar on the free list. Well, he did put a certain quality on the free list, namely, raw sugar under 16 Dutch standard. But, he put the duty on refined sugar at 80 cents per 100 pounds, which gave the refiners just that much an advantage, and they got the raw material free. The present government have changed that, and they have put 50 cents per 100 pounds on raw sugar and 1 cent per pound on refined.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). $1 per 100 pounds.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, $1 per 100 pounds on refined sugar. The result of that is, that upon the 200,000,000 pounds of sugar consumed in Canada, as was shown by the Minister of Customs, there is $600,000 a year of a saving to the people upon that commodity alone, compared with the tariff that was in force under the Conservatives.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McMULLEN. When I get through.

Mr. CLANCY. Did the hon. gentleman say that the duty on refined sugar was 50 cents per 100 pounds?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McMULLEN. The percentage on total imports for 1896 was 17·13 per cent; in 1899 it was 15·86 per cent, a lower rate under the Liberals by 1·23 per cent. The total imports were $162,764,300 multiplied by 1·23, leaves $2,148,490 of a saving to the people. That was the money that was retained in the pockets of the consumers of this country, simply because, by the application of the new tariff it was not taken out of their pockets, and if the Foster tariff had been in operation the people of this country would have paid just that much more money. The Tories collected on barbed wire an annual duty amounting to $126,885, and this government made barbed wire free. Hon. gentlemen opposite continue to repeat the charge that this tariff has done nothing for the farmers, notwithstanding the clear proof given by the Minister of Customs as to the advantages that the Liberal tariff confers on the farmers, yet, it is necessary to repeat it again, lest the people might come to think that hon. gentlemen opposite have some ground for their statement, which they everlastingly reiterate. The Tory government, under the Foster tariff, collected a duty of $45,000 on cream separators, and this government made cream separators free. On spades and shovels, under the Foster tariff, there was collected a duty of $10,851, and under the Fielding tariff, only $8,665. There was a substantial reduction made by the Liberals in the duty on coal oil. On account of the regulations they made enabling coal oil to be distributed all over Canada in tank cars and tank boats, coal oil was able to be delivered cheaper than if the Foster tariff was in force. But, coal oil has gone up in price. Hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to clothe the government with the responsibility for that, by stating that the Liberals encouraged the Standard Oil Company to come to this country. That is not so. We defy them to prove that, and we offer them a committee if they want to try and prove that this government is in any way connected with the Standard Oil Company. The Standard Oil people came to Canada as other speculators do, and I am here to say that this government have no connection, directly or indirectly, with the Standard Oil Company in Canada. Looking at the history of that company on the other side of the line, and the manner in which they have extorted large sums of money out of the pockets of American consumers, I would have been glad if they did not get a foothold in Canada. But they are here. We did not invite them, and we did not encourage them. There was nothing in the tariff to induce them to come here. The duty on coal oil was never so low as when they established themselves in Canada, and it was not because of the tariff that the Standard people came. On the contrary, if the tariff had been higher, as it was under the Conservatives, there would be more inducement for the Standard Oil people to come to Canada. We know perfectly well that those who are anxious that coal oil should not be interfered with came to Ottawa and strongly urged that the duty on coal oil should remain as it was. However, in the interests of the consumers of Canada this government did reduce the duty. Had the supply of crude oil remained what it was, they would be getting oil as cheap to-day as they did before. On coal oil there were $85,000 less taxes in one year. On woollens there was a saving of $451,000; on silks $63,000; on hats, caps and bonnets, $52,000; on fancy goods, $32,000; on iron goods, $32,000; on flax, hemp and jute, $35,000; on earthenware and china, $41,000; on drugs and chemicals, $21,000. The total reductions amounted to $2,885,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite persist in asserting that the consumers in Canada reap no advantage from the tariff changes; and yet these are all substantial reductions that have been made, as will be proved by reference to the blue-books. During the eighteen years of Conservative rule, the trade of Canada had increased $19,000,000 or $1,000,000 a year, whereas, during the Liberal rule, it has increased $14,000,000 a year. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the government are not to be thanked for that increase of trade. There is one thing certain, however, that immediately on the leader of the government taking control of the Treasury benches, there prevailed a spirit of confidence that the affairs of the country would be properly conducted, and the people have not been disappointed in that respect. That feeling has become more and more confirmed every day. The people of Canada are satisfied that the affairs of the country are being prudently and well managed, that there is no boodling or stealing, but that their money is spent honestly and in the public interest. They are not so exacting with regard to the amount of money that is spent, so long as they feel that they are getting value for it, and that honesty characterizes every transaction. During seventeen of the eighteen years of Conservative rule there was an average excess of imports over exports of 17 per cent. During the four years of the present government, there has been an average excess of exports over imports, of 9½ per cent. That shows that according to the ordinary style of keeping accounts, Canada can show a considerable amount to her credit. I always like to see the balance on the right side of the ledger, and I think Canada's balance is on the right side of the ledger to-day. The percentage of duty on the total value of goods imported in 1896, was 18·23 per cent, in 1897, 17·87 per cent, in 1898, 16·95 per cent, and in 1899, 16·70 per cent, showing a continuous reduction. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite will persist in asserting that there has been no reduction. I admit that the imports this year are some $4,000,000 over the exports. This may be accounted for perhaps by the rise in freight rates, and by the difficulty in getting space for cattle; otherwise there would have been a large export of cattle from the North-west. I was talking to a ranchman in the Russell House a short time ago, and he told me that the reason more cattle were not shipped from the North-west last year, was that they could not get space on account of the war in South Africa; therefore, they were compelled to hold over their cattle. But next year there will probably be more cattle exported from the North-west than in any previous year since its settlement. In the North-west Territories there has been an enormous increase in the amount of duties collected. Since the year 1891, the average was $218,023 a year. Last year it was $2,511,460. Then, my hon. friend said that they had increased the debt $118,000,000, and we unearthed a steal of $964,000 out of an expenditure of $3,000,000. If the public expenditure during the time of hon. gentlemen opposite was characterized by such transactions as were unearthed in connection with the harbour improvements at Montreal and Quebec, there must have been an enormous amount of money stolen that no one knows anything about. There was hardly an item of expenditure investigated by us when we were in opposition, in connection with which there was not proof of something wrong. Then, the ex-Finance

Mr. McMULLEN.

Minister claimed that in 1891, he gave back to the country $15,000,000 in sugar taxes. He had not the money to give back; he never collected it. The reason why the late government were compelled to reduce the duty on sugar, was that it was reduced across the line, and they knew that if it were kept up to the old point, on this side, the people would come to realize that they were paying enormously under the protective system. Then the hon. gentleman says that governments may come and governments may go, but trade will go on and develop the country. That is a very different doctrine from what these hon. gentlemen preached during the time they were in power. When one doctrine does not suit them, they are willing to adopt another one. They now claim that the trade of the country goes on whether they are in power or not. They claim that the present government have had nothing to do with the great development that has taken place in the trade of the country. From the time they came into power in 1878, until we had a streak of bad times, they boasted that the price of wheat, eggs, cattle, and everything else that was improving was influenced by the national policy. They credited the national policy with the increased price of every commodity which the farmers had for sale. But now it does not suit them to admit that the government deserve any credit, and so they say, governments may come and governments may go, but the development of the country will go on. Then, the ex-Finance Minister said that everything the farmer has to buy is increased in price, and everything he has to sell is reduced. I have already shown that that is not so, but that the farmers are getting a fairly good price for everything they have to sell; and the evidence of that fact is that there has never before been in Canada such a widespread spirit of contentment among the agricultural classes as there is to-day. They are well satisfied with the existing condition of things, and they hope it may continue. To give some little idea of the expansion of the trade of Canada, I have in my hand a statement showing the exports from the mines, the fisheries and the forests of Canada to Great Britain:

	Great Britain.	United States.
Mines—
1894.....	$ 257,613	$ 5,128,881
1895.....	388,407	6,270,247
1896.....	175,512	7,436,205
1897.....	354,769	10,532,689
1898.....	212,304	13,835,690
Fisheries—
1894.....	4,586,715	3,260,677
1895.....	4,143,994	3,025,171
1896.....	4,462,002	3,301,671
1897.....	4,366,081	2,998,655
1898.....	4,822,688	2,979,404

	Great Britain.	United States.
Forests—
1894.....	$2,722,606	$4,079,932
1895.....	1,843,224	3,644,362
1896.....	2,803,274	3,239,958
1897.....	2,381,626	3,651,606
1898.....	2,645,627	3,334,178
Animals and Other Products—
1894.....	28,986,095	2,311,100
1895.....	30,022,479	3,713,148
1896.....	32,523,071	3,341,275
1897.....	33,600,891	5,081,811
1898.....	39,737,089	4,192,943
Agricultural Products—
1894.....	12,431,275	2,784,520
1895.....	10,414,380	3,710,022
1896.....	9,551,316	3,232,793
1897.....	13,507,342	2,419,814
1898.....	27,747,140	1,133,293
Manufactures—
1894.....	11,873,700	11,678,176
1895.....	11,076,889	11,870,206
1896.....	13,182,798	13,820,937
1897.....	15,295,087	14,998,722
1898.....	17,893,728	8,834,725

The total exports of these different commodities is as follows :

	Great Britain.	United States.
1894.....	$ 63,538,856	$35,809,940
1895.....	61,856,990	41,297,676
1896.....	66,690,288	44,448,410
1897.....	77,227,502	49,373,472
1898.....	104,998,818	45,705,336
1899.....	99,091,855	45,133,521

This shows the enormous increases from time to time in our exports and the countries to which those exports went.

I propose, now, to deal, for a few minutes with the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper). That hon. gentleman, in the speeches he makes in this House never fails to pay himself a compliment. A few evenings ago, replying to the hon. Minister of Finance, he said the only portion of the Finance Minister's speech worth repeating was a citation which he read from a speech made by the leader of the opposition. Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is in the habit of treating us to addresses on ancient political history, and never fails to tell us of all that he has done for Canada ; and the last time he spoke he brought to my mind a passage in the Good Book, 'Ephraim has turned to his idol, let him alone.' But the hon. gentleman had a compliment left which he bestowed on the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster), who, he said, was the highest authority on finance in Canada. No doubt that is the opinion of the hon. leader of the opposition, but no one who knows anything of the conditions of things in this country for the last four years, and who is not blinded by partisanship, can fail to recognize that the gentleman now at the head of the Treasury is far superior in every respect to the ex-Minister of Finance. We gave the ex-Minister of Finance credit for a certain amount of ability ; but there is a smallness about him that is recognized by every man in this House and that we have seen exemplified on several occasions. He may be the best financial gentleman on that side of the House, and I believe he is—and that is no very great compliment to him—yet I do not think the leader of the opposition is doing himself credit, to say nothing of doing Canada credit, when he says he is the greatest financial authority in Canada. Then, the leader of the opposition paid some little attention to my esteemed friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). He always appears desirous of having a particular fling at him. And that is not much to be wondered at, because the Minister of Trade and Commerce has dealt many a strong and effective blow at the leader of the opposition. I do not think there is any man in this House or any man in Canada whom the leader of the opposition fears more than he fears the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He said the Minister of Trade and Commerce was carried back on the shoulders of the people to a position and to a seat in the cabinet. There is one thing certain—the Minister of Trade and Commerce has rendered very valuable service to the people of Canada and the people of Canada fully realize it and appreciate it, at least they do in the province of Ontario. The sacrifices he has made and the devotion he has shown to the best interests of the country, and the way he has fought to secure a better state of things in Canada than existed a few years ago have won him the gratitude and admiration of the people. He and his family have never cost the country anything like the money that the leader of the opposition and his friends have cost. When hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) and his friends used to draw from $35,000 to $40,000 a year. There are no two ministers of the Crown who together draw anything like that amount to-day. No doubt, the leader of the opposition is anxious to get back to the sweets of office which he enjoyed for so many years. The hon. gentleman administered a very undeserved rebuke to the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), saying that he was totally incapable of discharging the onerous duties of arranging for the fast Atlantic service, to arrange for which he had crossed the ocean. If the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) had thought for a moment, he would never have challenged the sending of the hon. member for Quebec West on that service. If there is a man in Canada who would be an unwelcome visitor to the financial markets of England, that man is the leader of the opposition himself. Consider those who were induced by his efforts to invest in the Chignecto Ship Railway, in the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, in the dead meat scheme, and it will be readily understood that there would be very few who would care to invest money in a project on a recommendation of his.

The leader of the opposition found fault with the government because they did not send the contingent to South Africa very much sooner than they did. He complained, and a number of his followers complained very loudly and declared that the government had sent the contingent only when they were forced to send it. And the people of this country are under the impression that the government acted at the proper moment; they did not act a moment too soon or a moment too late. They waited until they had felt the pulse, not only of the press, but of their supporters and opponents as well; and when they came to the conclusion that they should act, they acted promptly and effectively. There is one point in this connection that has not been touched upon, and I wish to mention it. The leader of the opposition had he been in power would have sent the contingent entirely at the cost of Canada. He would have said to the millionaires, the dukes and lords of England: Keep your money in your pockets; do not spend a dollar; I am going to put the whole cost upon the taxpayers of Canada and they will have to pay for it. You millionaires, you lords, you men of unlimited wealth in England, we do not ask you to pay anything; the poor, laden-down taxpayer of Canada will bear this burden in addition to the burden he bears. I want to know if the people of Canada will appreciate action of that kind on the part of any man, whether he is a member of the government or a member of the opposition. The people of Canada think that, under the circumstances, the government have acted very liberally; they have taken advantage of all the money England is disposed to pay, and, after England has contributed in proportion to what she pays to her own soldiers, Canada makes up the balance. But the leader of the opposition would have put the whole burden upon the people of Canada if he had had the opportunity.

The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) went to Toronto for the purpose of making a speech in reply to that of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. He went to Massey Hall and delivered a long speech. In the course of that speech he made one particular recommendation to the young men of Canada. He said: Young men read the political history of your country in the light of the record of the great Conservative party. Well, Sir, I am going to go over something of what these young men would gather from the political history of this country for which the Conservative party is directly responsible. We will commence at the east. I will not go back to such things as the Pacific scandal; I will not go back to such things that are properly chargeable to the men who are gone. I will take things chargeable to the men who are here. Take, for instance, the Chignecto Ship Railway. There was a scheme set on all fours by the leader of the opposition. The hon. gentleman committed this country to a payment of $170,000 a year for 20 years, which amounts to $3,400,000. He promised that Canada would contribute that amount of money towards the construction of that scheme when it was put through. There was never a scheme that was undertaken in any civilized country in the world that bears any comparison in folly with that undertaking. The scheme was to build a railway that would carry a ship loaded with 100,000 tons, lift it out of the water, put it on the track, run it across the isthmus ten or eleven miles and dump it into the basin on the other side. No one ever heard of anything like it in any civilized or uncivilized country. There it stands, a monument of folly. It never was finished and never will be, unless the leader of the opposition gets back in power; and if he does, he will commit this country to an expenditure of 3,400,000 to complete that work. I say to the young men of Canada: Read the history of your country in the light of the record of the great Conservative party and admire their statesmanship, copy their example. Now, we come to the St. Charles Branch Railway. There is another thing that was recommended by the leader of the opposition. He made the statement to this House that it could be built for $400,000, that it would vitalize the whole line and be a grand achievement. He painted in such glowing colours the construction of that road that my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) and the rest supported him in this project, and the line was built. Now, what has been the result? In place of its costing Canada the anticipated amount that he stated in his speech, it cost over $1,700,000. Then take the Oxford and New Glasgow branch of the Intercolonial Railway. He came to this House and stated that the construction of that branch was vital to the whole system, that the grades upon the old line between New Glasgow and Stellarton were so heavy that the engine could not draw more than ten or twelve cars over it; and he said that by building this branch as the crow flies it would be 45 miles shorter, and the grades would not be half as heavy, in fact it would be almost level all the way from Oxford to New Glasgow. What was the result? The result was that in place of its being 45 miles shorter, it was only 4½ miles shorter; and in place of the grades being lower, they were actually higher than upon the old line, as was proved before a committee of this House. These were some of the exploits of the Conservative party, and I accept the invitation of the ex-Minister of Finance to the young men to read the political history of their country in the light of the record of the leaders of the great Conservative party, and copy their examples.

Now, take another case. When the leader of the opposition came out to this country in the fall of 1891, he travelled from east to west and declared that he had got his instructions, that Canada had received an invitation from the United States, to go to Washington and discuss a reciprocity treaty. He said that the United States had approached Canada, and he told the electors: If you want reciprocity with the United States, now is the time, vote for the government, and you are going to get reciprocity. He said: We do not want to send a delegation to Washington, unless we have a mandate from the people, and if we get that mandate we are going to Washington, and secure for you the treaty that the United States has invited us to discuss. Now, Sir, during that election campaign in Canada, an election was also going on in one of the border states, and a man named Baker, one of the candidates, wrote to Washington asking the president whether it was true that the United States government had sent an invitation to Canada to discuss that problem. The President replied by saying that no invitation had been sent to Canada to discuss a reciprocity treaty; but that Canada had urged upon the government of the United States to grant Canada permission to go down there and present the question, and the Washington government had granted that request, but no invitation had been extended. Now, what is the proof? After the election was over, Sir Charles Tupper, knowing that the people were anxious for reciprocity, went down to Washington, and he stopped only a few hours. But the first thing Sir Charles Tupper did, was to get down on his marrow bones and confess that his statement that the President of the United States had invited Canada to send a delegation to Washington to discuss reciprocity was virtually a misstatement, that his government had virtually lied to the electors of this country, when they told them that they had an invitation to go down to Washington. This is their record, and I say to the young men: Read the political history of your country in the light of the record of the leaders of the great Conservative party, admire their statesmanship and copy their example.

Then, what have we further? I have already mentioned the harbour improvements at Montreal and Quebec, and the graving dock on the Pacific coast. It was proved that those works had cost Canada over $3,000,000, and it was proved beyond all doubt that $964,000 of the people's money had been absolutely stolen under the eye and under the management of hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir, have they ever unearthed any transaction of that kind under the present government? Not one. Neither will they ever be able to find any such transactions committed by the present government so long as the present Prime Minister of Canada, remains at its head.

Then take the Printing Bureau. Sir, I say we are justified in referring to these things. Hon. gentlemen opposite are continually charging the government with wrong-doing. We want to show the people what their history is, more particularly since the ex-Minister of Finance asked the young men of the city of Toronto to admire the statesmanship of these great men from whom the country has withdrawn its confidence. Now, what is the fact with regard to the Printing Bureau? We proved before a committee of this House that no less a sum than $50,000 of the people's money was absolutely stolen, paid out by commissions, by cheques, that were procured for orders given for the machinery that is in that building to-day. This money was stolen, misappropriated. The reports are on record and they can be consulted.

The construction of the Langevin Block is also a case in point. That block cost this country $740,000, and the estimated cost was $300,000. Sir Hector Langevin, was then Minister of Public Works, he was member of the cabinet, he was a close chum of hon. gentlemen opposite; he was admired, he was worshipped. Sir John A. Macdonald said of him, that he was one of the ablest Ministers of Public Works, that Canada had ever had. What took place in connection with the Langevin Block? Why, from the day that they resolved to construct it to the time that it was finished, there was not a change made, there was not an alteration in the plans, there was not an alteration in the contract, but that was made for the purpose of increasing the extras and putting money into the pockets of the contractors. Mr. Charlebois, was the contractor for the stone work. When he got the building up to the height where they were to put on the first tier of iron girders the man who had the contract for doing that work came along ready to perform his part of the contract. Did Mr. Charlebois allow him to do it? No. He asked him what his contract was. He said his contract price for putting on iron girders was $32,000. You will have to pay me 25 per cent of that contract, said Mr. Charlebois, or you cannot come on here, I have absolute possession, and I am going to hold it. The contractor went back to Sir Hector Langevin, and told him the reply that he got from Mr. Charlebois. Sir Hector Langevin, turned up the contract, and after perusing it, said to him : It does appear that Mr. Charlebois has got absolute control of that entire ground and the only thing that you can do is to go back and comply with what he says, give him the $8,000 and we will increase your contract from $32,000 to $40,000. That was done in regard to the hoists and in connection with every single thing that was put into that building right up to the copper roof that covers it to-day. Every single contractor had to pay Mr. Charlebois 25 per cent on his contract for the privilege of doing his work, and the 25 per cent was added to the contract of every contractor. That is the Langevin Block; that is the money that was sacrificed under the Tory rule of hon. gentlemen opposite. Young men, read the political history of your country in the light of the record of the leaders of the great Conservative party and copy their example ! Then take the Curran Bridge. There was a transaction that was entered into by the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart). Right under his eye, and under the supervision of his men that bridge was built ; it was to cost $200,000, but it cost over $400,000, or $450,000, and a very large amount of money was stolen. With an office full of officials, with the chief engineer, with any number of men to send there to guard the public interest, $200,000 of the people's money was stolen and pocketed by men who took away material, who put men on the pay-roll as having been employed upon the work who did no work at all, and who charged double rates for derricks working on Sunday, with the result that a very large amount of money was sacrificed. This is the history that the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) invites the young men of this country to read. He says : Turn it up and read it for yourselves. I am trying to point out what they will find when they do read it. I am trying to tell them what they will hunt up. If they could ever challenge the present government with being guilty of any of these things I would be ashamed to get up on a platform in the city of Toronto and say : Young men, read the political history of your country in the light of the record of the leaders of the great Conservative party to which I belong. Then again, in the session of 1896, when we were all summoned here to do the country's business, every member in his place, the Speaker in the Chair, the Governor General came down to the Senate and delivered his address and we, upon being invited to go there as obedient representatives, went and listened to the address which he delivered to us. And what happened ? Next day, or the day following, the announcement was made that seven ministers were on strike. Day after day parliament met, and day after day the same announcement was made to carry us over to the following day. At last, owing to the treachery of the seven ministers, then out of the cabinet, the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) was brought in. What did he do ? He formed a cabinet, and whom did he take into it ? The seven political cut-throats, and he turned out the man that was the leader of the government. He took into his cabinet the men who had done that which should have relegated them to political retirement, the men who had treated their leader most discourteously, most unfairly and most treacherously. That is what they did upon this occasion, and that is what the hon. leader of the opposition was guilty of when he formed his cabinet. Young men, read the political history of your country in the light of the record of the leaders of the great Conservative party and copy their example !

Mr. McMULLEN.

We had an address the other night from the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). He gave us quite a lengthy address. He said that the present government had reaped where they had not sown. It is very true that they did reap where they did not sow. They found a nest that was fouled when they came to examine it ; they found a condition of things that was unsavory and that was nothing to the credit of the men who had occupied it before. Even in the reading room there were accounts running for ten years or more, and not paid. Every item that could be hid away, in any way, shape or form, was hidden away so as to conceal it from the public gaze until the elections were over. As has been shown by the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), the government had to undertake to provide for $1,500,000 of old debts left by their predecessors, and which had to be settled. That was the condition of things when this government came into power. I say they reaped, unquestionably, where they had not sown in that regard. Then, my hon. friend made some references to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher). He said that he was not a horny-handed son of toil. Perhaps not, but the hon. member for Haldimand was the Minister of Agriculture for some short time before, and I think the training the present hon. Minister of Agriculture got was certainly as good, if not better, than any training that the hon. member for Haldimand ever received. We know that for some time, in the Niagara district, he taught school. That did not add very much to his agricultural experience. We have reason to believe, that, while he taught school during the week, he went across to the other side of the river and preached on Sunday. I do not know, but, I fancy, if his Satanic Majesty wears clothes he would have laughed the buttons off if he saw the hon. member for Hamilton in the pulpit. There was an expenditure, from 1886 to 1891 on a bridge in his riding, to secure his seat, amounting to $26,327.95. That bridge was put up, presumably, for the purpose of accommodating the Indians. There is an Indian reserve in that section, and the happy thought struck the government that they could, out of Indian funds, erect that bridge in Haldimand. It was put up for the purpose of securing his election upon two occasions. After that they gerrymandered the riding, and the result was that they wiped out the old constituency of Monck and divided it between the hon. member for Haldimand and another hon. gentleman on that side of the House in order to make their seats sure.

There was a point to which the hon. ex-Minister of Agriculture referred, and I will not allow it to pass without referring to it. That was in regard to the embargo that was placed on our cattle in England. I must say that I earnestly hope that the present government will make a determined effort to have that embargo in England removed. I believe if they do so, and establish a thorough quarantine between Canada and the United States an advantage can be secured to Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible to the farmers of this country for that embargo being placed on our cattle in the first instance. There is no question about that. They conducted the quarantine business so loosely that England got to know that it was a mere mockery, and as a result of that, the embargo was placed on our cattle. Why, Sir, it was proved before a committee of this House, that the Conservative government appointed a man to inspect these cattle who was not a veterinary surgeon at all, but was a man who had followed the business of shoe-making. The result was that no proper inspection was made; this man simply went along the cars and pronounced them fit to go through Canada, and the result was that when the English government got to know of this loose system, they quarantined our cattle, and the embargo has been there to the present day. The Conservative government are to-day responsible to the farmers of Canada for the unfortunate embargo on our cattle, and I hope the present government will leave no effort untried to bring about a better condition of things in that respect. There is another matter I wish to refer to and I have done. There is an old adage which says that straws show which way the wind blows. When I was in opposition I criticised many things which the Conservative government did and one was the extravagance of the ministers in cab-hire. I am happy to say that there has been a great improvement in that respect since the Liberals came into power. Before my esteemed friend, the Prime Minister, came into office, the cab-hire, for ten years previously, for the First Minister, and belonging to the Privy Council, amounted to $17,827.52, or $1,782.75 per year. I thought that was extravagant and that it should not be tolerated. Let me point out that the Prime Minister has spent in cab-hire, last year, only $102.50, as compared with the $1,782.75 spent by his predecessors. In the four years Sir Wilfrid Laurier has been in office, he has spent, on an average of only $144 per year for cab-hire. A little thing like this shows the way the affairs of this country are handled; and it demonstrates pretty clearly that the present government are endeavouring to do what is right. They are not going to allow extravagant expenditure of public money, so that their followers would be ashamed to stand up and vote for them. We are not asked to swallow anything that is unreasonable or unfair. I am proud to say that during the four years the Liberals have been in office, I believe, a more honest government never occupied the Treasury benches of Canada. Before I close I wish to make a reference to the Mail and Empire newspaper of Toronto. I made a statement in this House some time ago, that if there was any place in Canada where His Satanic Majesty was domiciled, it was in the Mail and Empire office. I do not think there is any political editor on this continent—I will not except the most untruthful one in the United States—who can match the political editor of the Mail and Empire in bare-faced straight fibbing. You have another paper in the province of Quebec that comes pretty close behind, and that is the Montreal Star. When the Star gets stuck, and has nothing of its own to produce, it publishes something that appeared in the Mail and Empire a day or two before. Here is one item to show the kind of stuff the Mail and Empire publishes:

By placing corn on the free list, Mr. Fielding presented the farmers of the western states with a fine market for that cereal, drove our own farmers out of the business of growing it, depressed the value of our other coarse grains, and lowered the average quality of our bacon.

Here is another:

By giving the Standard Oil Company control of this market, he enabled that trust to take the farmers by the throat and force the payment of a greatly increased price for oil.

Here is another sample:

By placing binder twine on the free list, and thus bringing the American monopoly into this country, and by selling the prison output to parties associated with the American agents in a Canadian combine, he caused the prices of binder twine to double.

Here is another:

By placing barbed wire on the free list he closed up our factories and gave the wire trade to the giant corporation, the American Steel and Wire Company.

There are four little nut shells, four straight bare-faced lies. They are put before the farmer in the hope that their continuous reiteration will deceive some one. I have to say, Mr. Speaker, that the people of my province, at all events, know the Mail and Empire, and I know that there are Conservatives who will not believe it or allow it to influence them. All its political issues from the beginning of January to the end of the year, are filled with items of that kind in which there is no truth at all. I pity hon. gentlemen opposite that they have to be led by an organ of the character and standing of the Mail and Empire. If they think that the people of Canada are going to be carried off their feet by deliberate and persistent lying on the part of a newspaper like the Mail and Empire, they are much mistaken. We have an intelligent people, we have a reading people, we have a people that are not going to be caught by any such chaff as the readers of the Mail and Empire are treated to every day in the year.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. McMullen), has treated the House to a very amusing, if not a very entertaining or enlightening speech. He has used up two hours of the time of this House in endeavouring not to defend the conduct of the government who are under consideration of the House and the country, but in raking up ancient history, dealing with transactions many of which are twenty years old, and which took place under men who have long since gone to their last home. These are the subjects which the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) has dealt with. I thought that the hon. gentleman would at least have devoted a share of his time to defending his friends in power, because the present government are on their trial. There is no doubt that the country to-day is taking stock of their stewardship, whether the result of that may be for their weal or their woe in time to come, when they appeal to the electors. I expected that the hon. gentleman would have dealt with their management of public affairs, in their legislative acts and their administrative acts. Instead of that, he occupied his time in dealing with past questions, such as the Montreal harbour, the Short Line Railway, the New Glasgow Branch Railway, the Chignecto Ship Canal, the Kingston Graving Dock, the Curran Bridge, the Esquimalt Graving Dock, the Printing Bureau and the Langevin Block. What was that done for? Was it done for the purpose of enlightening his young friends behind him, to whom he frequently turned round and appealed in a patronizing way to read the history of their country? I wonder if he meant to appeal to the young member from Kingston (Mr. Britton) as one not knowing the history of the past. For what purpose was this appeal made? I presume it was to draw their attention away from the present. We are dealing with the active, living present—with men charged for the time being with the responsibilities of government; and we are criticising their conduct of public affairs. The hon. gentleman's object was to draw a red herring across the trail, so as to direct public attention from the administration of the affairs of the country by the present government during the past three or four years. The hon. gentleman said there were certain changes made in the tariff in the interest of the farmers. He said: Look at binder twine and barbed wire and corn put on the free list, and he might have fairly added, mushroom spawn—and for these changes in the tariff he would ask the farmers of the country to rest and be thankful. He said that the tariff was reformed by the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) in 1894 in the interest of the manufacturers only. Does he remember how many articles were put on the free list at that time? If he does not, I can tell him: there were 179, not saying anything about the number on which the duties were reduced. Were these changes made in the interest of the manufacturers? When the government that day reduced the duties on farming machinery and on many other manufactured goods, was that in the interest of the manufacturers? No one at that time recognized more than the hon. gentleman that these reductions were made in the interest of the farmers. His only complaint was that they did not go far enough. But, to-day he says they were made in the interest of the manufacturers. This is quite in keeping with the usual line of argument which the hon. gentleman adopts. From my knowledge of the way in which he handles public questions, I would not expect any better argument from him. It all depends on what side of the House he is speaking for. If he is speaking in defence of his friends in the government, he can see nothing wrong in their conduct; but when he was in opposition he could see nothing good in the late government.

Now, we are here to deal with the financial statement of the Minister of Finance with regard to the affairs of the country. We were told by the hon. Minister of Finance and by every one of his friends who spoke after him, that that financial statement was a magnificent one—that it showed the country to be in a healthy, growing and prosperous condition. We have not denied that; but, the pertinent question which we on this side of the House ask, and a question which the hon. gentleman will be obliged to answer, is, how far are hon. gentlemen opposite, who are for the time being controlling the destinies of this country, responsible for the condition of the country? Is it due to any particular management of theirs that times are so good as they are at present? Is it due to anything they have done in the way of legislation, administration or otherwise? Not by any means. It is due to the good crops which we have had in the country during the last two years. Before that time we had very poor crops for two years. It is due to the good prices obtained for the products of our country as for the products of other countries. It is due to the large exports and large imports and exports, which brought about the buoyancy of the revenue. The Finance Minister boasted that we had a buoyant revenue. He said:

The revenue is $6,186,000 over what it was in the previous year; or, in other words, we have this year $46,741,000 of revenue.

Following the reasoning of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), it might be quite in order for me to ask, what does this mean? The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, when sitting on this side of the House, used to tell the people that they were being bled white, because the government were taking more money out of them than they were able to pay or than was actually required at the time for the government of the country. Is it a fact that this government have taken more money out of the people than they require for the purposes of the government? Look at the surpluses obtained from taxation for the last three years. We are told that in 1897-8, the government had a surplus of $1,732,000, in 1898, a surplus of $4,837,000, and that in 1899-1900, they expect a surplus of $7,500,000. In other words, in these three years, they will have taken in over-taxation out of the people, $14,000,000 in round numbers. What does that mean? It means an average of $4,500,000 a year taken out of the people more than was taken by the predecessors of the present government. Let me illustrate that by reference to our municipal affairs. In the province of Ontario we have a municipal council elected every year to look after the affairs of the municipality. They strike the rate of taxation on the assessment of the municipality for the purpose of raising sufficient money to carry on its affairs. If a municipal council were to raise $4,000 a year more than it required for the administration of the municipality, how long would the people keep these councillors in office? Not any longer than the next election on the first Monday in January. The people would say: If those men cannot strike closer a rate that will take no more than is required out of our pockets to run the municipality, they are not business men and we will replace them by others who can make a closer calculation. The same fate will meet hon. gentlemen opposite. They have shown their utter want of business capacity and knowledge by levying a tariff, which they declared was only a revenue tariff, but which raised $14,000,000 more revenue in the past three years than was actually required to meet our expenditure, or about four and a half million dollars a year more taken out of the pockets of the people than should have been taken.

What has this government done to bring about the present condition of prosperity? If they say that this prosperity is due to their administration, they ought to be able to show something that they have done to account for it, but that they have failed to do. There has been no material change in the tariff except the British preference, and no one has the hardihood to claim that any great amount of prosperity has been caused by the preference we are giving England. Neither have this government undertaken any great public works which, by causing a large expenditure, would help to bring wealth to the working people for the time being. They have not undertaken anything in the shape of public works of any importance, nor have they incurred any heavy expenditure of an unusual character that might account for the prosperity that we are now enjoying. Have they opened up any new markets in which our people receive an enhanced value for their products? Not one new market has been thrown open to the people, during the time this government has been in office. How then, are we to account for the good times we are enjoying? Well, Mr. Speaker, we have had two successive good crops, and we have had steady employment of labour, owing to the reaction consequent upon the reduced output of our factories for some years previous to the accession of this administration to office. Owing to this reduced production, consumption overtook supply, and a demand sprung up for more manufactured goods. Then prices rose, both of cereals and manufactured goods, labour got increased employment, and the usual good times followed upon the cycle of hard times through which we had just passed. For the last two years we had the best crops we have had for many years, we have had fairly good prices, and ample employment for labour. None of these things can be attributed in any degree to the policy of the government.

Can we point to any particular class which has benefited by the government policy? Has it benefited the farmer? Since it has opened no new market for our farm products, I do not see how it could possibly have benefited him. But the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), told us that the relaxation of the quarantine regulations with the United States, which was obtained by this government, has enabled us to send our young cattle, to that country, and he said that in Ontario we sold and killed last year, 555,000 head of cattle, and that the price was increased $5 per head by virtue of the market we obtained in the United States through the abolition of the quarantine regulations. Let us analyse that statement. At the beginning of his speech the hon. gentleman said:

It seems to me that the duty of every Canadian should be to see that every statement he makes is true, and if there are two sides to the shield, to show both, and let the people judge for themselves.

The hon gentleman followed that up by saying that in 1898 we only exported from 98,000 head of cattle to the old country, and that in 1899 we exported 211,000 head, a very large increase, showing the benefit of the arrangement for the removal of the quarantine between the two countries. He further said:

Ninety-three thousand head went to the United States, and we were benefited also in the province of Ontario, because 555,000 head of cattle were slaughtered or sold in that province, and the farmers benefited $5 per head, as shown by the statement of the ex-Finance Minister.

I thought I would look it up and see what became of those cattle that went to the United States. The hon. member for Huron says we sent 98,000 head there. In 1896 we sent to the United States 1,589 head of cattle valued at $6,241. These were one year old and under. Over one year old, we sent to the old country, 102,862 head, making that year an exportation of cattle of 104,451 head, and we got in return $7,382,000. But the quarantine regulations with the United States were removed by the action of the present Minister of Agriculture, and in 1899 the hon. member for Huron, tells us the farmers of Canada benefited to the extent of an increase in value of $5 per head on 555,000 head of cattle. That was due to our sending cattle to the United States, 24,396 head, one year old and under. How much did we get for them? We got $250,000 or $10.10 a head. Will any intelligent farmer tell me that it is for the benefit of our farmers to ship cattle one year old to the United States, and sell them for $10.10 per head. Why, I heard the hon. member, when advocating the wisdom of bringing corn into Canada free, argue that we required this corn to feed the cattle of our country so that they might be raised and fattened and exported to England, where they come into competition with the cattle of the United States, because we required that these cattle should be fattened here. At that time there was a great argument going on as to whether it was wise in the interest of Canada that we should send our lean cattle to England and have them finished there; and the hon. member for South Huron claimed that it was not in the interests of Canada that it should be done, but that we should allow corn to come into Canada free, send them to England finished; because instead of getting a few dollars a head for them he would get $50 to $60 a head for them. Has that been brought about by the repeal of the duty on corn? No. We find that that is not the case. There were 24,396 head of one year old and under, sent out, for which we got $10.10 a head. We shipped 187,000 head over one year, or a total of 211,000 head, for which we got $8,522,000. But in 1896, before the quarantine regulations between us and the United States were changed, and before we had free corn, we sent out 104,000 head and got about $7,000,000. That is we got only about a million and a half less than we got in 1899, though in that year we shipped less than half the number. And remember, every head of cattle we shipped to the United States by virtue of doing away with these quarantine regulations young and old brought us only about $15.30. The hon. member for South Huron told the farmers of this country that it would be to their benefit to ship these cattle into the United States, because by so doing they would enhance the value of the 555,000 head of cattle in Ontario to the extent of $5 a head. Let us follow the reasoning out a little further. The hon. gentleman says that we have increased the value of all the cattle in Canada $5 per head. How much would that be? It would be $2,700,000. But we only got a little over a million dollars for those we sold to the United States, and now, if his argument was sound, what would happen? If we take that 93,000 that we shipped to the United States and shoot every one of them, we would still have $700,000 to the good. That is the fallacy and the absurdity of his argument. But I ask the farmers of Canada if they think they were enriched by sending out the 93,000 head to the United States at $15 per head? Were they enriched by sending out 24,000 head, one year old and under, for $10.10 a head. I do not think they will come to that conclusion. My hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) reminds me that one of the strong arguments that the hon. member for South Huron advanced in favour of feeding cattle here was that it was necessary to enrich the soil we were cultivating, and I quite agreed with him on that point. But the hon. member (Mr. McMillan) told us that we required free corn to feed these cattle in Canada. Well, before we had free corn here, how many finished cattle did we ship to England? We shipped 119,998 head, in 1897, and realized $53 a head, and the year before that, $73 a head. The duty on corn was repealed, and how many head of cattle did we ship last year when we had the glorious advantage of bringing in free corn and reducing the value of the coarse grains of the people of Canada? If the hon. gentleman's argument was worth anything, it would have increased the number very largely. But instead of increasing the number, the number fell off to 115,000. In other words, there was a reduction of over 4,000 head in the number we shipped to the old country after free corn was granted. Will the hon. gentleman tell me that free corn was an advantage there? The hon. gentleman's argument is entirely fallacious and is not borne out by experience. He cannot convince the people that they secure an advantage by shipping 24,000 head and receiving $10.10 a head or in sending the cattle over one year old to the United States to the number of 68,000 head and getting $15.33 a head. In spite of free corn, we are sending the unfinished cattle out of the country. Yet, we are told, the farmers should be thankful for what the government has done for them. I think they will come to the conclusion that the government has not done anything for them. But we are told that the government gave them the boon of cold storage. We have heard it again and again that this government is to be credited with establishing the system of cold storage. The hon. member for South Huron has told us that any one addressing this House should give the absolute facts of the case. But the hon. gentleman himself said very frequently that the government had given the farmers the cold storage system. I have here a question which was put in this House, and the answer given to it by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher):

Mr. SPROULE.

What amount of money was spent by the Dominion government in each of the following years, viz.: 1894-5, 1895-6, 1896-7, 1897-8, 1898-9, in the development of a cold storage system in Canada in connection with both the Canadian railways and Atlantic steamships?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The following are the sums which were paid to railway companies for cold storage service in the various years mentioned:

1895.....	$2,807 45
1896.....	2,526 37
1897.....	4,189 49
1898.....	3,734 17
1899.....	3,275 52

(The Canadian Pacific Railway account will be about $700 more.)

The following are the sums which were paid to steamship companies for cold storage service in the various years mentioned:

1895.....	$10,294 38
1896.....	7,718 09
1897.....	26,000 00
1898.....	33,090 78
1899.....	38,695 61

In 1895, when the system of cold storage was inaugurated by the Conservative party, they spent for the purpose of introducing and starting that system among the railways of the country, $2,807. In 1896, they spent $2,526. The present government, in 1897, spent $4,000; in 1898, $3,721; in 1899, $3,275. The Canadian Pacific Railway account will be about $700 more. The Minister of Agriculture stated that the following sums were paid to steamship companies for cold storage service in the various years mentioned: In 1895, under Conservative government, $10,294, that was the year they commenced it. In 1896 they spent $7, 718. In 1897 the present government increased the amount to $26,000; in 1898, to $33,000, and in 1899 to $38,695. Now, what do these figures show? They show that the scheme was devised by the Conservative party, that it was started by the Conservative party, and developed by the Conservative party as rapidly as circumstances would permit. When the Liberals came into power they only took up the same system and followed it out on the same lines, but spent a little more money. I am not grumbling about the expenditure. If they had spent as much more I would say it is all right. I say, as the hon. member for Huron said the other day, let justice be done, and if there are two sides to the shield show them both to the people so they can apportion their thanks to either party where they are properly due. Then, I say this government is not entitled to the credit of inaugurating a system of cold storage; they are only entitled to the credit in so far as they have perfected the system, and I am willing to give them credit for that. But I say it was the genius of the Conservative party that began the system, and they are entitled to the chief credit, whereas the present government is only entitled to the credit of having continued the system.

But we are told that the farmers are entitled to be grateful to the present government because they got new markets for them. I have told you what new markets they got. They got no new market in England, no new market with the people to the south of us, though they were always telling the farmers before 1896: If you bring us to power we can get you reciprocity. They tried to get it and made a complete failure. The farmers have derived no great benefit from anything they did. Did the farmers receive a benefit from a reduction in the cost of agricultural machinery? Not at all, because this government has not reduced the duty in any way, therefore, they did not reduce the cost of agricultural machinery to the farmer. But they say the farmers should be thankful to them because they got free corn. I have given you what, in my judgment, the result of free corn has been. Instead of being a benefit to the farmer, I say it has been the very reverse. But we are told we ought to be thankful because we have got free binder twine. Have they reduced the cost of binder twine? Why, Sir, it has gone up from the day they took the duty off until this hour. I do not say that it was in consequence of taking that duty off, but because it enabled the parties in Canada who handle binder twine, after the duty was taken off, to work in co-operation with the combine in the United States, and the result was a very high price to the farmer. Then they are told to be thankful because the government reduced the duty on coal oil. Why, as a result of the manner in which they have dealt with the coal oil business, there has been taken out of the people of Canada 5 cents a gallon on every gallon they consumed last year. They have deliberately played into the hands of the gigantic monopoly that control the coal oil interest of Canada at the present time. The result is that on the 20,000,000 gallons of coal oil consumed in Canada the farmers pay 5 cents a gallon more for it on account of the changes that the present government made in the regulations for bringing in coal oil. Then, we are told that they made barbed wire free, and that the farmers are entitled to be grateful for that. Yes, they did. And the first effect was to throw 300 men out of employment in Montreal who were making barbed wire. But did barbed wire come down in price? Why, it is near double what it was before they took off the duty. Then are the farmers entitled to be thankful on account of anything that this government has done to make barbed wire cheaper by taking the duty off? I say that the labouring men in this country were entitled to expect that the manufacturer of barbed wire would be kept for them, since they were residents and taxpayers of this country. But the government threw these men out of employment and left them in a state of starvation by compelling the manufacturers to close up their barbed wire factories. The result is, to-day, that barbed wire comes in free under the magnificent combine and monopoly of the United States, and the farmers are paying heavily for it on that account.

But we are told that they have cheapened the cost of transportation. How? Was it by giving us the fast Atlantic service in the interest of the farmers? They found a contract already made when they came into power, and the first thing they did was to cancel it. They said: We are going to make a new contract and save $750,000 a year, and we are going to give you a new class of bottle-necked ships. Where are they to-day? Why, they have been bottled up in their own scheme, and this fast Atlantic service is a thing of the past, producing no benefit in the way of transportation. We have the old transportation facilities, and must have them for years on account of the folly and unbusinesslike management of affairs by the present government. Now, we are told that we cannot hope to get a fast Atlantic service for years to come because material has all gone up in price, labour has gone up, and we must wait for hard times to come again before we can get the benefit of a fast Atlantic service. So I say that they have bungled that business from beginning to end, and we have got no benefit from it. Did they benefit the manufacturers of this country? Some say they did. Well, now, they tell us that we have given Great Britain a preference. For what lines? If an additional quantity of goods comes in under that British preference, you reduce the profit of the labourers of Canada to that extent. To that extent you cut into the product of the manufacturers, and by so doing you throw that many labourers out of employment. That is one way the British preference helps the manufacturers of Canada. The British preferential tariff cannot possibly help manufacturers, but on the contrary it injures them, it injures the labouring men, and it does not benefit any class. But they say they help the labouring class of the country. If so, how? Is anything the labourer buys to-day cheaper by anything the present government has done? Are woollen goods cheaper? Why, they are about 45 per cent dearer. Are cotton goods cheaper? Not by any means; they are higher to-day than they were three years ago. Is anything the labourer uses cheaper to-day as a result of the tariff of the hon. gentlemen? Not at all. In every single line the labourer consumes the price has gone up, while the price of labour stands very much the same as it did a few years ago. An hon. gentleman opposite said the other night: Oh, but the labourers of Canada are receiving better wages. Well, ask the men who are employed in the tannery at Acton if they are receiving better wages, men who are working in slush and filth for $1 a day, or $1.10 a day. Are they receiving better wages in consequence of the action of the present government? If so, why are they compelled to strike to get more wages? Why did their employers tell them that rather than increase their wages by one cent they would close up the factory? Ask these men if they are better off to-day by virtue of the preferential tariff that has been introduced by the present government. These are the labourers of the country, and I say that the price of not a single article which the present tariff touches is reduced in value, while their labour has not increased in value, but, on the contrary, has rather decreased, and they are out of employment to-day. But, they did do something with their preferential tariff. They helped somebody. Was it the labourer? Not by any means. They helped the rich people of the country, the people who can afford to pay for the luxuries of life. They helped these people to wear silks, and the manufactures of silks. They brought in $1,000,000 worth of silks under the preferential tariff. How much does the poor labouring man benefit by that? They helped those who wear flowers, the rich. They brought in $75,000 worth of flowers. They helped those who wear fancy feathers, the rich. A hundred thousand dollars' worth of fancy feathers were brought in under the preferential tariff at reduced rates. They helped those who wear fancy ostrich feathers, as $25,000 worth of these were brought in, and they came in at lower rates under the preferential tariff. Of laces and silks, worn by the rich, $340,000 worth were brought in under the terms of the preferential tariff, but the poor man was not able to share in the reduction in price. Jewellery to the extent of $30,000 was brought in, and those who wear jewellery, not the poor man, were benefited to some extent. Manufactures of wool of the higher grade were brought in to the extent of $1,300,000, and the labour of the men who are engaged in the woollen mills of the country was reduced by the importation of $1,300,000 worth of these lines. I have gone over the whole list, and I find that over $4,000,000 worth of these goods were brought in, and they are a class of goods worn by the rich people of the country and not by the poor. They come in under the preferential tariff, but the poor man had no share in the benefit. The labouring man has to labour on for a dollar a day, at the same wages as before the preferential tariff went into effect. We have heard that hon. gentlemen helped the miner of the country. Have they helped the miner? No; the royalty that was paid on the output of the miner was raised to 10 per cent, but when they came to deal with capitalists like Mann & Mackenzie, they gave them a contract under which they were going to charge them 1 per cent of a royalty on their output. They charge the poor miner that goes in and prospects, who takes his pack on his back and his pick and shovel in his hand, 10 per cent if he finds a mine, but the large capitalist only has to pay 1 per cent. Is the miner, or the labouring man, entitled to be thankful for that? I do not think so, and I am quite sure that he will not think so either. We were told the other night by the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Burnett) that the government had brought immigrants in to settle up the country. He says that we brought in these immigrants by our immigration system. The hon. gentleman informed us that the government brought 9,000 immigrants from the United States in 1898, and 11,945 in 1899, and he adds that such a movement was never seen in the time of their predecessors. He says: We have no record of that whatever. I would like to ask him, in the first place: To what extent can you rely upon these figures? We know that, in the Agriculture Committee, we have endeavoured to ascertain if the figures concerning these immigrants coming from the United States are reliable, and the conclusion come to by both sides was that the figures are not reliable. But, if they did bring 11,000 immigrants from the United States, by what means did they bring them in? They brought them in by a very heavy expenditure for that one service. Last year, we had, in the United States, 275 immigration agents, acting either as commission immigration agents or agents receiving a direct salary and expenses. This country is paying to the tune of 275 immigration agents, and if 11,000 came from the United States, it was due to this large expenditure. Yet, the hon. gentleman says that we ought to be thankful, because we are having this country settled up by the large number of immigrants coming to it. If, as the hon. gentleman says, we brought in 11,945 immigrants from the United States, they were brought here in consequence of our paying 275 agents for the purpose of scouring the United States and bringing these immigrants into the country. It is amusing to look at the return and see what it is. It is a very interesting one at the present time. Let me give a few of the agents who are employed in the various states: Michigan, 87; Minnesota, 57; Wisconsin, 58; Ohio, 25; Dakota, 12; Iowa, 10; Kansas, 15; Missouri, 6; Nebraska, 4; Pennsylvania, 3; New York, 3; Illinois, 3; Indiana, 3; Texas, 2; California, 2; Idaho, 1, and Wyoming, 1. We are paying to-day for 275 immigration agents to try and settle up this country, and we are told that we ought to be thankful for it. We complain, and justly complain, because the hon. member for South Ontario was able to quote these figures. From what source did he get these figures? Not from the government return, because that return has not been presented to the House. We are denied the right of analysing these figures the same as this hon. member has done, because the government have not brought down this return, although we have been here for nearly three months, and although we are called upon to deal with this important question. We cannot deal with it intelligently because the return is not before the House, and we are obliged to go it in the dark and deal with the question when the return which should be before us is not before us. Well, this is the way that immigrants are brought into Canada. I have not said anything about the employment of immigration agents in Ireland, Scotland, England, France, or other countries. I have said nothing about the number of inspectors they have, the number of agents they have, the number of superintendents they have, the number of men they send out of the country when they expect that there may be election trials going on and from whom certain evidence might be brought out. We were told that hon. gentlemen opposite were to reduce the taxation of the people of the country. Did they reduce taxation? Not by any means. I have given the House the record of that. Instead of reducing taxation they increased it by $6,000,000 a year. They promised to reduce the taxes, but they did not do it. Did they reduce the expenditure? Not at all, but on the contrary, they increased it enormously. I find from the official returns that the year before the Liberals came into power, the expenditure by the Conservative government of Canada was $40,000,000 in round numbers, but last year, under Liberal rule, it was $48,000,000, or nearly $8,000,000 a year more than the Conservative government took to manage our affairs. In 1897, the Liberals increased the expenditure from $40,000,000 in 1896, to $41,000,000; in 1898, they increased it to $42,000,000, and in 1899, they increased it to $48,000,000. It is, therefore, plain, that the Liberals have not carried out their promise to reduce the expenditure. Before the Liberals came into power, they promised the people on every platform that they would reduce the public debt. Let us see how they carried out that promise. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), told us that the present government had only increased the debt a little over $6,000,000 in three years, while the Conservative government had increased the debt $10,000,000 a year in the three last years they were in power. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMillan), prefaced this remark by the statement that public men should always be very careful to see that their statements are absolutely correct. Let us see how correct his statement was. In 1896, the public debt was (in round numbers) $258,000,000, and in 1899, it was $266,000,000, so that the Liberals increased it in three years by $7,500,000, and not by $6,000,000, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMillan) said. Again, it is a fact that cannot be denied, that during the last three years the Conservatives were in power, the public debt was increased by $5,000,000 a year, not $10,000,000, so that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMillan) was $5,000,000 astray on that score. What becomes of his theory that a public man should be very careful as to the accuracy of any statement he may make. In the years 1893, 1894, 1895 and 1896, the Liberals told the people of Canada, that one of the curses of the country was protection. The hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Burnett) told us the other night that since the Liberals have come to power, they reformed the tariff, and that every farmer in the country was satisfied. He told us, a few minutes before, however, that the farmers of the country were groaning under the burden of taxation, imposed on them by a protective tariff, and he nods his head in assent to that. He tells us that the farmers of the country are perfectly satisfied to-day, because we have a revenue tariff, and that they were dissatisfied before because we had a protective tariff. I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Burnett), as a farmer, how much more duty did he pay for his reaper or his binder under a protective tariff, than he pays, now under what he calls a revenue tariff? Under that protective tariff of former days, the farmers paid 20 per cent duty on agricultural machinery, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Burnett) says they were groaning under the burden, but does he not know, that under this revenue tariff of his Liberal friends, the duty is exactly 20 per cent on the same agricultural implements. How could the farmers be discontented under a protective tariff which charged them 20 per cent duty, and be perfectly satisfied under a revenue tariff, which also charges them 20 per cent duty?

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. BURNETT. That is right.

Mr. SPROULE. You say the farmers are happy to-day?

Mr. BURNETT. Certainly.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman must have arrived at that conclusion by a process of reasoning, which is peculiar to his own brain. I submit that no intelligent farmer will believe that he is more happy under a revenue tariff of 20 per cent, than he was under a protective tariff of 20 per cent. You may call the tariff by any name you like, but the duty remains the same. There is no farmer in South Ontario who is stupid enough, or ignorant enough, to believe that he is any better off to-day under a revenue tariff, that charges him 20 per cent on his agricultural implements, than he was under a protective tariff which charges him exactly the same duty. Here is a sample of one way in which the Liberals reformed the tariff. They put 21 articles on the free list, and gentlemen opposite tell us that the farmers and the labouring men, and the mechanics should be thankful for that. But let me point out that the Conservative government put 179 articles on the free list in 1894, and yet these gentlemen say that the Conservatives are only entitled to the opprobrium of the people. Because the Liberals put 21 articles on the free list, the consumers of Canada are to be grateful, but because the Conservatives put 179 articles on the free list, they are entitled to no thanks from the people. Where is the logic in that? We are told also that we should be thankful because the Liberals gave us free binder twine, free barbed wire, reduced the duty on coal oil, admitted corn free—and put mushroom spawn on the free list. Well, Sir, the farmers of the country will know how to appreciate all that in its proper light. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) told us that the Liberals had reformed the superannuation law. His argument in that respect was amusing, if not enlightening. It will hardly be believed that he told the House that the Liberal government would have abolished the superannuation law, were it not for the opposition. Who is running the country anyway, and who has the majority in this House? Who forced through the Yukon Railway deal, although it was opposed by the opposition? Who forced through the Franchise Bill and the Redistribution Bill, although they were opposed by the opposition? Was it not the liberal government, with its servile majority at its back, and if their majority enabled them to carry these obnoxious measures, why did not the same majority enable them to abolish the Superannuation Act? The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen), ought to be ashamed of himself to use such an argument in this House, and I am sure that his constituents are too intelligent to take any stock in it. Let us look how the Liberals reformed the superannuation law. I find that from 1890 to 1896, the highest number of superannuations in any one year, under the Conservative government, was 106, in the year 1895. The Liberals promised the people in their speeches, and in their platform, that they would do away with the superannuation law, but instead of that, the very first year they came into power, the superannuation of 167 civil servants, against 106, which was the highest number superannuated in any one year by their predecessors. The Liberals by doing this added to the burdens of the taxpayers of this country, $64,239 annually, to pay superannuation allowances to men, many of whom are as able to work to-day as they ever were at any time in their lives. And yet, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) justifies such conduct as that on the part of the Liberal government. Last year the Liberals superannuated 47 more officials, at an annual cost of $11,417, to the taxpayers of this country, or, in these two years they superannuated 214 officials, at an annual cost to the people of over $75,000, and that is a pretty good record for the men and the party who promised that immediately they attained office they would abolish the superannuation law. Is that keeping their word? Is that doing what they told the people of Canada they would do? I say it is the very reverse. Did they destroy the combines and monopolies, as they told the people of Canada they would? Did they destroy the combine handling the coal oil of the country? Has that gigantic octopus which has come from the United States been interfered with in any way by the present government? No; but they have played into the hands of that combine and have allowed it to take out of the consumers of Canada last year 5 cents a gallon on 20,000,000 gallons of coal oil? Did they do away with the combine in barbed wire? No, but they shut up every barbed wire factory in Canada, and the farmers of Canada are to-day paying nearly double the price for their barbed wire because of the way this government have played into the hands of the combine. There is a gigantic leather trust to-day, and the government have been appealed to, to do away with it. Have they attempted to do so? They have practically done nothing. I have here an epitome of the operations of a gigantic combine, or trust, or monopoly—I do not know which to call it. It is an arrangement between nine manufacturers of certain kinds of leather in Canada, who in 1895-6, issued a circular to the consumers of leather in Canada, stating that the sole leather business in this country was overdone, because there were a lot of small sole leather tanners in the country who had no right to be in the business; but that if the users of leather would enter into an agreement to deal exclusively with these nine firms, they would then be able to run full time and to give a rebate of 5 per cent to their customers, subject to the fulfilment of a certain agreement which was drawn up between them. Let us look at that agreement. It provides that if the users of leather will deal exclusively with these nine firms, they will supply them, on condition that they buy from them every kind of leather they want. These nine firms turn out two kinds of leather which are used largely in Canada. There is what is called the slaughter sole leather, made by the small tanners of the country, and there is the Spanish sole leather made only by these nine firms. Every one who uses Spanish leather must deal with these nine firms exclusively; and to get the rebate they offer, the leather users must buy all their other leather from them except oak tanned leather, which is not tanned in Canada. Here is a affidavit which the users of leather must take in order to get the rebate from these firms:

I, _____ of _____ in the county of _____ to wit, do solemnly declare:

1. That I am a member of the firm of _____ carrying on business of _____ in the _____ of _____ and as such have a full and intimate knowledge of all transactions of my said firm or business, and know that the statements herein contained are absolutely true.

2. That since the _____ day of _____ up to the time of the making of this declaration, I have neither purchased nor used in any way whatsoever, nor contracted to buy directly or indirectly, nor contracted for the production or manufacture of any sole leather of any kind or description whatsoever (except the Oak sole leather), save from the following firms: Shaw, Cassils & Co., Beardmore & Co.—

This is the firm whose men are now on strike to get an increase in their wages from $1.20 to $1.25 per day, and who cannot get it because Mr. Beardmore says that the profit of his business will not enable him to give it.

—Breithaupt Leather Co. (Limited), Logan Tanning Co. (Limited), C. S. Hyman & Co., Bowman & Zinman, Dowker, McIntosh & Co., Marlatt & Armstrong, Muskoka Leather Co. (Limited), Acton Tanning Co. (Limited), Magnetawan Tanning and Electric Company (Limited), Wingham Tanning Co., S. Arcott & Co., Benton, N.B., Warren, Tobey & Co.

3. That my firm has not, neither has any partner of mine, nor has any one acting as my agent, nor has any one acting as the agent of my firm, nor has any one acting as the agent of any partner of mine, nor has any one acting as the agent of the business described above, nor has any one employed by me or by any partner of mine, or employed in connection with the business described above, nor has any one connected with me or with any partner of mine, in any way whatsoever in the business referred to above, nor has any one connected with my firm or with the business described above, either purchased or used in any way whatsoever, or contracted to buy directly or indirectly, or received for sale or sold on commission, or dealt in any way with, or contracted for the production or manufacture of any sole leather of any kind or description whatsoever (except Oak sole leather), save from the above-mentioned firms.

4. That I and all who are in any way connected with the business described above, have done no act that would disentitle the said business to the said rebate offered upon certain conditions by the firms mentioned above, in two circulars dated December 31, 1895, and January 31, 1896, but on the contrary, we have faithfully fulfilled, both in letter and spirit, all conditions contained in said two circulars.

5. That the statement marked Exhibit 'A,' to this declaration, is a true and complete account of the sole leather purchased or contracted for by any one connected with the business described above from the above-mentioned firms.

And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

That is the combine which exists to-day in connection with the leather trade, and you can see how tightly it binds up every consumer in the country. He cannot buy a pound of slaughter sole leather from the small firms, otherwise he will not get the rebate of 5 per cent from the firms in the combine. The government put a provision in their Tariff Act of 1897, that when they found that by virtue of any combine or trust or understanding the output of any article manufactured in the country was decreased, or the price enhanced in value, or the trade in it hampered in any way, they would immediately appoint a commission to inquire into it, and if they found that to be the case, they would take the duty off that article. The tanners affected by this combine appealed to the government in the belief that they would faithfully carry out that promise; and this is a copy of the petition which was sent to the Minister of Finance:

To the Hon. W. S. Fielding, Minister of Finance of the Dominion of Canada.

The petition of the undersigned tanners in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec humbly sheweth:

That your petitioners, some of whom are engaged in the business of tanning slaughter sole leather in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, in which most of us have invested all our capital, and others of your petitioners are users and consumers of such leather in our factories.

That certain of the larger tanners in the Dominion have entered into an unlawful and injurious combine, which acts very much to our prejudice in our said business, inasmuch as by reason of the said combine we find our opportunities to do business curtailed and hampered, and in some instances practically destroyed.

The said combine is specially directed to what is known as the production of Spanish sole leather, but it affects injuriously the whole leather production and trade of the Dominion, as will be apparent from the following statements of facts.

The following are, your petitioners believe, members of the said combine, viz.: Beardmore

Mr. SPROULE.

& Co., Breithaupt Leather Co., Marlatt & Armstrong, Bowman & Zinkan, Shaw & Cassils, Warren & Tobey, Logan Tanning Co., C. S. Hyman, and Dawker, McIntosh & Co., and these are the largest, or among the largest, producers of sole leather in the Dominion.

They have arranged with the consumers of sole leather in Canada to allow a rebate of 5 per cent on all purchases, which rebate is kept back for a period of six months, when, upon making oath or solemn declaration in the nature of an oath, that the purchaser has not purchased sole leather from any tanner or dealer not a member of the combine, the 5 per cent is refunded.

Some of the said members of the combine also produce light leathers, and by reason of the said combine are enabled to obtain and keep from your petitioners even the trade in such last mentioned kinds of leather.

By reason of the said combine, and as its prime object, the prices of sole leather are kept up above their real value and all competition is prevented by reason of the bait of the said 5 per cent rebate, which attracts the customer, and thus retains the trade in the hands of the said members of the said combine.

Spanish sole leather is not of general production; its production is practically in the hands of the said combine. The customer must have it for his business, and in order to get it he must buy from the combine, and so buying Spanish sole, he is compelled to buy his other sole leather, such as your petitioners produce, from them in order to get the 5 per cent rebate.

Your petitioners believe that the true situation is fairly and truthfully set forth in the printed document hereto annexed, which is a true copy of a letter published in the Toronto 'Globe' some time ago, shortly after the said combine was formed.

Your petitioners have every reason to believe and have had many assurances to this effect, that the said combine is very much disliked even by the consumers who receive the said rebate, but who would much rather buy in the ordinary way in an open and free market.

Your petitioners believe and most respectfully urge upon you and the government of which you are a member, that the said combine is an unlawful combination, and that the proper remedy, unless it disbands, is to abrogate the duty on Spanish sole leather entering Canada.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

J. Hallam, leather dealer, Toronto, Ont.

J. D. King & Co., shoe manufacturers, Toronto, Ont.

W. B. Hamilton, Son & Co., shoe manufacturers, Toronto, Ont.

F. J. Weston & Sons, shoe manufacturers, Toronto, Ont.

J. McPherson Co. (Limited), shoe manufacturers, Hamilton, Ont.

Geo. Winn & Co., shoe manufacturers, Milton, Ont.

G. V. Oberholtzer, shoe manufacturer, Berlin and Port Elgin, Ont.

C. A. Ahrens & Co., shoe manufacturers, Berlin, Ont.

Ph. Jacobi & Co., leather dealers, Toronto, Ont.

Stewart & Co., shoe manufacturers, Toronto, Ont.

C. Tilley, shoe manufacturer, Toronto Ont.

H. B. Dowker & Co., leather dealers, Toronto, Ont.

Joseph King, sole leather tanner, Toronto, Ont.

W. F. & A. Smith, sole leather tanners, Goderich, Ont.

O. S. Doan & Son, sole leather tanners, Clinton, Ont.

A. Smith & Son, sole leather tanners, Stratford, Ont.

S. Arscott & Son, sole leather tanners, Walkerton, Ont.

J. Arscott, sole leather tanner, Walkerton, Ont.

T. Pellow, sole leather tanner, Walkerton, Ont.

B. P. Flanagan, sole leather tanner, Hanover, Ont.

F. W. Graff, sole leather tanner, Clifford, Ont.

J. McDonald, sole leather tanner, Tiverton, Ont.

G. Aikens, sole leather tanner, Orangeville, Ont.

Bell & Co., sole leather tanners, Tilsonburg, Ont.

W. G. Smith, sole leather tanner, Goderich, Ont.

F. G. Lynde, sole leather tanner, Madoc, Ont.

G. V. Oberholtzer, sole leather tanner, Port Elgin, Ont.

Rochette Allaire, shoe manufacturer, Quebec, Q.

Jobin & Rochette, shoe manufacturer, Quebec, Q.

W. H. Polley, shoe manufacturer, Quebec, Q.

J. N. O. Pierri, shoe manufacturer, Quebec, Q.

E. Bresse, shoe manufacturer, Quebec, Q.

O. Bresse, shoe manufacturer, Quebec, Q.

J. S. Langlois & Co., shoe manufacturers, Quebec, Q.

A. Migner & Boucher (per A. Migner), shoe manufacturers, Quebec, Q.

J. B. Drolet, shoe manufacturer, Lorette, Q.

P. Borsseneault & Fils, shoe manufacturers, Quebec, Q.

Porier & Co., shoe manufacturers, Quebec, Q.

Budden & Perry, shoe manufacturers, Quebec, Q.

F. Gourdean & Frère, shoe manufacturers, Quebec, Q.

Gasp. Rochette, shoe manufacturer, Quebec, Q.

Demers & Cie, shoe manufacturers, Quebec, Q.

Whitely Bros., shoe manufacturers, Montreal, Q.

Fred. Whitely, shoe manufacturer, Montreal, Q.

Edmund Varens, shoe manufacturer, Terrebonne, Q.

Alex. Eath, shoe manufacturer, Montreal, Q.

Hackborn & Bisson, leather dealers, Montreal, Q.

Duclose & Payon, sole leather tanners, Montreal, Q.

F. G. Lynde, sole leather tanner, Madoc, Ont.

Piers, Locke & Co., leather dealers, Montreal, Q.

These men, living all over the country signed this petition, and handed it in to the Finance Minister, in the hope that he would keep the promise he made to the people that whenever it was apparent that any line of goods in Canada was controlled by a combine or trust in such a way as to unfairly hamper the trade, and oppress the consumer, or producers he would appoint a commission to look into the matter, and reduce the duty if the complaints made were proven. Not getting any satisfactory reply from the Minister of Finance, the signers of this petition got Mr. Garrow to write to the hon. Minister of Justice, with regard to the matter. Mr. Garrow, in his letter said:—

All the producers in Canada of Spanish are members of this combine. No Spanish, therefore, can be obtained except in one of two ways: one, by purchasing from the combine; the other, by importation.

Then he goes on to say that the pretension that there is competition amongst those composing the combine is purely fictitious. There is no competition. There cannot be competition, when the number in the combine is so small, only nine, and controls the whole trade, so that the trade must buy from these nine firms, and cannot buy from any others. Mr. Garrow proceeds to say: Sales are made by or through a central office, which fixes the price so that control is thus kept over the quantity as well as the price. Five per cent rebate is kept by the secretary in his hands for six months, and then handed over to the purchaser on a solemn declaration by him of a cast iron character.

Sales are either made by or through a central office, which fixes the price, so that control is thus kept over the quantity sold and the price. Five per cent rebate is retained in the secretary's hands for six months and then paid over to the purchaser on a solemn declaration of the most exhaustive and cast-iron character (see copy attached to the inclosed petition), in which he declares that he has not, nor has any one for him, purchased or used from the day of the sale to the making of the declaration, any sole leather of any kind or description whatsoever (except Oak sole leather) from any one not a member of the combine, and that he has faithfully fulfilled all the conditions, in letter and in spirit, mentioned in the combine's circulars, dated December 31, 1895, and January 31, 1896, entitling him to such rebate.

It must be apparent, it appears to me, that this practically ties up the customer. He can only get Spanish, practically, through its producers, the combine. In order to get the rebate on Spanish, he must, practically, swear that he has not purchased either Spanish or slaughter from anybody outside the combine. The bait is 5 per cent, and this is sufficient to keep the customer from his common right of buying where he pleases. The withholding for six months is shrewdly arranged. No one, I suppose, buys a stock six months ahead, so once in you must remain in or forfeit your rebate.

The effect upon the smaller manufacturers of leather, the rank and file, counting many more heads, but with much smaller capital, of course, is easily seen, and, indeed, can need no elaboration. They are simply at the mercy of the combine, picking up such crumbs in the way of shady customers or small concerns, too small for the larger and more profitable game of the combine, as may be left over, and they are, one by one, being pushed to the wall.

The effect upon the consumer is no less beyond question, although not, perhaps, quite so visible or easily demonstrated.

In the first place, a healthy competition is prevented. The purchaser must buy from the combine at the combine price to get the 5 per cent rebate.

They do not, whatever they pretend, really compete in price with each other. They regulate and fix the price to suit themselves. It would be contrary to all experience if the result to the consumer could or would be, under these circumstances, as advantageous as if he were free to buy as and where he likes, in an open market. The consumers themselves complain of the present conditions. Some of them, among the largest users of leather we have, have signed the inclosed petition. Many more, it is believed, would also sign if free from the trammels of the combine.

The transactions and mode of business of the combine are, of course, kept secret or as secret as possible. One is driven, to some extent at least, to surmise, but it is submitted to you very confidently that the facts before alleged ought to be sufficient to create a prima facie right to the inquiry called for by the Customs Act.

That is the provision of the Customs Act to the effect that in case of a combine, the government will appoint a commission to make inquiry, and this they ask the government to do.

If, after the production of books and papers, and of sworn testimony, it is found that the combine is really the innocent, harmless, beneficial thing it professes to be, the inquiry cannot hurt, but must help them; on the contrary, if, as those I act for, the smaller tanners whose all is at stake, allege, it shall appear that the combine in question is based, as other combines are, upon pure selfishness, a desire to collar the market at their own prices, then the arm of the law ought to be long enough to reach them.

Perhaps I ought to notice some of the arguments put forward by the combine to justify its existence.

It is stated that there is an American leather trust or combine, which threatened the market in Canada by proposing to undersell the tanners here. That might not be comfortable for the Canadian tanner, but it could not, certainly, hurt the consumer; on the contrary, it would be to his advantage.

But our tanners export large quantities of sole leather, thus competing with these same American tanners in foreign markets. Why, if they can and do so compete there, can they not do the same here?

Indeed, I am told that there is no similar combine in the United States, and no real combine at all embracing all the manufacturers of a special class of leather, such as we have in Canada.

Then it is said that the small tanners have unbusiness-like methods, that some of them sell at or below cost, thereby preventing others, as well as themselves, from making a legitimate profit. This is denied by the smaller tanners, but even if true, how are matters for the consumer improved by the combine? Is it part of the duty of the combine to educate those outside in proper business methods, or is it not rather to choke off and destroy them absolutely, thus cutting off all competition from that side?

The letter goes on to ask the government to inquire into the matter. And what is the answer that he gets? He is told that the government cannot inquire into this because the object is to lower prices instead of increasing them. After they had failed with the Minister of Finance and failed with the Minister of Justice, they applied to the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). They thought, no doubt, that as he was an Ontario man, he would surely do something for them, particularly as he had been so strongly opposed to combines when in opposition, and so strongly opposed to the Conservative policy on the ground that a protective policy tended to foster combines. This is the letter, he wrote them in reply :—

Ottawa, April 28, 1899.

My dear Sir,—I have a letter from my colleague, the Minister of Justice, informing me that the action of the Tanners' Association, about which you complained, does not come within the provisions of the law, inasmuch as any combination that may exist amongst them is, in his opinion, a combination to put down the price, not to raise it.

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) W. MULOCK.

W. G. Smith, Esq., Tanner,
Goderich, Ont.

This was a combination, according to the hon. gentleman, to put down prices, and not to raise them. But it was a combination to shut off 36 firms, and put the business into the hands of nine. A combination to reduce prices! Did any one ever hear of such folly? I have here the letter sent by Mr. Smith, of Goderich, who has been taking an active interest in this matter, and he asks what the Postmaster General meant. Was he consistent when he said that combines were a curse, and that if his party were returned to power they would bring in legislation opposed to them. The customs law that they introduced provided the means of inquiry in the case a combine is alleged to exist. We appeal to them to act upon that law, and up to the present time, they refuse to give the power asked for. That combine has gone on, and is going on at the present time, and the people have had no redress, notwithstanding the fact that they had appealed to the Minister of Finance and to the Postmaster General, and to the Minister of Justice, as the parties who ought to do away with the combine. I have in my possession the contract that was entered into. I cannot lay my hand on it at the moment, but it is practically to the effect that parties agree only to deal with them.

Now, I wish to deal with another combine, and to ask how far the present government has tried to interfere to help the people as against these combines. There is a very injurious combine in hardware that is taxing the consumers of that class of goods to an extent unheard of in the history of the country. But have the government stepped in to inquire into the actions of that combine? No. Let me give you a little idea of the operations of that combine. This combination is among the hardware men in this country who turn out axes, scythes and snaths, &c. For several years efforts were made to effect this combine and they have at last succeeded. And now they have sent out to the hardware trade an agreement for them to sign. If they sign this agreement, and come under the combine they get a rebate of 17½ per cent on the axes and scythes, &c.. they buy, if not, they do not get the rebate. What is that agreement. Here is a copy :

Ottawa, Ont., January 4, 1900.

Messrs. the Canada Axe and Harvest Tool Manufacturing Co., St. Paul, Que.

Gentlemen,—We, the undersigned wholesale hardware merchants, agree during the season of 1900, that is, from January 1, 1900, to January 1, 1901, to purchase our total requirements of axes from one or other of the manufacturers mentioned below; manufacturers, on their part, agree to adhere to the prices and terms as agreed upon. The manufacturers' names are as follows:

- The Welland Vale Manufacturing Co.
- The Canada Axe and Harvest Tool Manufacturing Co.
- The O. S. Rixford Manufacturing Co.
- M. Walters & Sons.
- James Warnock & Co.
- The Bedford Manufacturing Co.
- The A. S. Whiting Manufacturing Co.

There were two concerns outside this combine until lately. James Warnock and Co., and others. But they have come into the combine within the last month or two, and all have agreed that they will sell at one price, and the hardware men can only buy at that price by coming under this combine. What are the prices they compel the hardware men to accept? Here is the circular:—

We herewith inclose you our price list of haying tools for the season of 1899 and 1900. The discount (until further notice) on all goods where prices are listed (except snaths) will be 15, 10 and 5 per cent.

All scythes are sold at net prices, viz.:

	Per doz.
Clipper.....	$ 9 25
Climax.....	10 00
Excelsior.....	10 50
Cast Steel grain.....	12 50
Silver “.....	13 50
Harvest King grain.....	14 50
Cast steel.....	8 50
Single beaded.....	9 50
Concave.....	10 50
Double beaded.....	10 50
Tip top.....	9 50
Bush.....	9 00

Terms on above are four months from May 1, or 3 per cent if paid in thirty days. All goods shipped after January 1 to be dated from May 1. We expect you will sell all your customers at not better than the above prices named herein. Provided you comply with the above we will give you a rebate of 17½ per cent on all goods purchased from us. Your early reply with specification for your season's requirements will oblige.

Yours truly,

The Canada Axe and Harvest Tool Manufacturing Co. (Limited),

(Sgd.) W. J. CHAPLIN,
Mgr., Sec. and Treas.

Now, this is what they have got to sign, and these are the prices that they have to pay or them. Now let us compare these prices with the prices they bought the same goods at last year. Take scythes for instance. Clipper scythes were bought last year $4.75 per dozen, at the present time he has to pay $9.25 a dozen, nearly double what they were last year. Steel has gone up very little, but as soon as this combine is effected, scythes are increased about 100 per cent. Cast steel scythes last year were $3.75 per dozen; this year they are $8.50, after the combine has been effected. Harvesters, $5.50 last year, this year $14.50, after the combine is effected. Cast steel crown, $5.50 per dozen last year, this year $12.50. Three-pronged hay forks, last year $2.38, this year $3.58. Last year the wholesale man was allowed to sell these forks at any profit he saw fit, and he sold them at a profit of 34 cents a dozen to the retailer, while this year he must sell them at a profit of 71 cents a dozen.

The combine not only compels them to buy at increased prices but compels them to sell to the retailer at prices which they choose to fix themselves. I have a copy of these prices here. Take axes. Last year the Michigan Champion and similar grades, were sold at $4.80 a dozen; this year they are sold at $5.75, and they compel the wholesale man to sell them for $6.75 a dozen, or $1 a dozen higher than the wholesaler paid for them. The wholesaler would be satisfied to sell them at a profit of 50 cents a dozen. Then take the Black Prince axe, it is sold to the wholesale now at $6.25; last year it was sold for $5. The combine compels the wholesale man to sell to the retail man for $7.52 tools which they paid $6.25 for. Princess Louise axe, sold last year for $5.25 to the wholesaler, this year it is $6.50 per dozen, and the wholesaler is compelled to sell at $7.75. The Model Alligator forged bevel axe, sold last year at $6.50 per dozen, is sold this year at $7 per dozen, and the wholesaler is compelled to sell at $8.25. Garrett's Black Diamond clipper, sold last year at $6.75 per dozen, sold this year at $7.50, and they compel the wholesaler to sell it at $9 per dozen. The Canadian up to four pounds sold last year at $5 per dozen, sold this year at $6.50, and they compel the wholesaler to sell to the retailer at $7.50. I need not go over all these; I have given enough to show the injurious effects of that combine. They have first raised these tools over 100 per cent in one year as soon as the combine was effected. In almost every case they have raised them 25 to 50 per cent, and have compelled the wholesale man to wholesale his goods to the retailer away above what he was in the habit of selling them to the retailer before, and unless he agrees to sell them at this higher figure he cannot get the rebate of 17½ per cent. A rebate of 17½ per cent is a big profit, and in order to get it he has to comply with all these conditions of the combine. The government pretend to say that they are in favour of destroying combines. Let them attack this combine. Will they invoke the law which is upon the statute-book to-day and impose a penalty upon this combine or those who are engaged in it? I say if they do not they are doing less than their duty towards the people of this country, and less than the people expect of them. Every wholesale hardware man in this country is obliged to come under that combine to-day in order to get this 17½ per cent rebate. Now, look at the effect of the combine in leather, look at it in nails, in barbed wire, in almost every article of hardware. I want the farmers to know these things, I want them to know that they are in the power of that combine by virtue of the inactivity of the present government who are making no effort to interfere with the operations of that combine in this country.

Now, this government came to power to do certain things. They said if the people elected them to power they would settle the disputes between Canada and the United States. Have they settled those disputes? They made several efforts, they sent a commission down to Washington that cost $34,000. They had a good time drinking wine and champagne at the people's expense, but they neither settled the disputes or got a reciprocity treaty. They promised the people that they would get a reciprocity treaty, but it is as far off now as ever. Have they proved themselves to be capable business men in the management of the affairs of the country? They declared if they were entrusted with power the Premier would surround himself by a class of intelligent, honest, capable business men. Has he done so? Have they proved themselves to be intelligent, honest and capable business men? I say most emphatically no. Why do I say so? Look at the first act of the Postmaster General. When he attempted to reduce the postage he did not know that there was such a thing as a postal union, and he issued a proclamation under his own authority, believing himself all powerful to reduce the cost of postage. He found out afterwards that he could not act of his own mere motion, that there was a postal law made by the postal union at Berne some years ago, of which he knew nothing, and he was obliged to revoke his proclamation and trust to the chances of getting the aid of England to make a reduction in the postage. Was that evidence of capable and intelligent business statesmanship? Then, look at the preferential tariff. When they introduced their preferential tariff it was to apply to every country in the world. When they were told that they could not apply it to every country in the world without getting into trouble with Germany, Belgium and every other country that came in under a favoured-nation clause, they showed that they did not know anything about favoured-nation clauses, but, they were obliged to change their tariff before that session of parliament was over. Then, look at the Yukon Railway deal. What were they proposing to do in that matter? They proposed to give away 3,700,000 acres of land, and if we value that at the same price as it is sold to the ordinary miner, $10 an acre, it amounts to $37,500,000 for building a narrow gauge railway 152 miles long. A gentleman who sat beside me in the Brunswick Hotel, and who had been a miner for 25 years, when this deal was going on, said: I will take that contract from Mann & Mackenzie, I will go to England and I will bring back $40,000,000 if they will give me all I can make over that.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. BRITTON. Is the offer still open?

Mr. SPROULE. The offer is still open. If the Senate had not managed to burk that deal, the fruition of it would have been realized long ago by Mann & Mackenzie; they would have been richer to that extent, and the country would have been poorer to that extent. That is a transaction negotiated by these capable, intelligent business men by whom the right hon. Prime Minister has surrounded himself. Did the first Drummond County Railway deal show that they were capable, intelligent business men? The Senate refused to sanction that deal. What did the next deal show? They made a deal two years afterwards, and they saved to the country over $1,000,000 by the second deal. To whom does the credit of that saving belong? It must belong to the Senate, which burked the first deal. Yet, these hon. gentlemen are described as honest, capable and intelligent business men. When the Crow's Nest Pass Railway deal was put through the government paid for it about $2,000,000 more than the road would have been built for by their predecessors. They gave away a large amount of valuable coal lands in British Columbia, so valuable that the Hon. Joseph Martin said, a few days ago, that if the coal was put at one cent a ton there is coal enough in these mines that have been given away to pay all the cost of government in British Columbia and to subsidize every railway that requires to be built in that country for the next fifty years to come. Yet, all this was given away by the intelligent and able business men by whom the Prime Minister has surrounded himself.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Did you not vote for the Crow's Nest Pass Railway?

Mr. SPROULE. No, I did not.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, I think you did.

Mr. SPROULE. No, I did not.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Did you vote against it?

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Oh.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to look at the record he will see that I both spoke and voted against it. Have the government kept their promises?

Mr. COCHRANE. Not much.

Mr. SPROULE. They said that they would keep free from scandals. How have they kept free from scandals? By denying committees the right to inquire into scandals, by denying our requests to bring these men here to appear before the Privileges and Elections Committee and prove these scandals. Hon. gentlemen, by their servile majority, keep free from scandals by voting down every motion made in this House aiming at bringing to light their scandals. Is there not a scandal in the Crow's Nest Pass Railway deal? I say that there is a scandal in it. Is there not a scandal in the Yukon mismanagement? If we had got the commission appointed that we asked for, we would have shown a scandal of the most gigantic character which has been hidden away by the vote of the servile majority which voted down the resolution. In the Drummond County Railway deal I say there is a scandal, that there was a large amount of money given for election purposes.

An hon. MEMBER. None.

Mr. SPROULE. An hon. member says 'none.' He must know very little about it, or else he does not know anything about it. If he does not know anything about it he is living in a paradise of ignorance that it is well for him to enjoy. An inquiry would have shown that there is a most gigantic scandal in connection with that deal, that a large rake-off of that money went into the hands of Mr. Greenshields and his confrères. I say it openly and above-board, and I believe it is susceptible of proof if an exhaustive inquiry of the right kind had taken place. Is there not a scandal in connection with the corruption in elections that have taken place in West Huron, in Brockville and in North Grey? How are they hidden away from the public, by the servile majority of the government, which has voted down investigation? The records of this House will show. They have kept these scandals from the Privileges and Elections Committee; they are now hidden away by the vote of the majority that hon. gentlemen have at their back and which prevents a full inquiry being made. Look into any one of these and you cannot either congratulate the government or say that they have done what they should have done, or that they have left undone that which they should have left undone in the interest of the country. We are told that, in a short time, this government will go to the people, and that they expect the farmers, the labourers and the miners to stand by them, because they have done so much for them. But, I say that the course which the government have pursued justifies these classes which I have named in opposing the government, and I believe that they will do that when the day of retribution comes. I say that we are criticising the conduct of the government fairly. We are not going back to ancient history like the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who, unable to say anything in defence of his friends, tried to draw a red herring across the trail by going back twenty-five years and distracting public attention from the conduct of the government. But, when the people come to poll their votes, when the election is brought on, as far as my judgment goes, they will be prepared to mete out retribution to hon. gentlemen opposite. Let them bring on that election early or late; come when it will, I feel as satisfied as I do that I am standing here to-night that that sun of the government has set. There is no doubt of that whatever. They may hang on to the last hour, or they may appeal to the electorate during the summer, but, as soon as they do, on that day they will go out of power and a class of men will be put into power who are possessed of the genius of government, who have in their ranks capable and honest men to govern the country, and who will govern the country in a way entirely different from that which the people have been accustomed to during the last four years under the party at present in power.

Mr. ROBERT HOLMES (West Huron). Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that the members of the opposition should make desperate efforts to try and square themselves in view of the wonderful record of the present administration. When we bear in mind the nature of their ante-election addresses, the prophecy that if the Liberals came into power, ruin, desolation and decay would be the outcome thereof, and when we compare these with the wonderful trade returns that have been presented by the present administration, which show that, during the last three years the volume of trade has increased more than it did during the whole of the eighteen years that the Conservatives were in office, I am not surprised that they have to resort to desperate methods in order to meet the arguments that we have to face them with. It is also amusing to me to hear gentlemen like the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) attribute the prosperity to other causes than those which they claimed when in power were the contributing causes to prosperity under the old regime. Hon. gentlemen who are familiar with political history will remember that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule), as well as others of his party, claimed that Providence, and the good times in other lands, had nothing whatever to do with prosperity in Canada, but that it was the national policy pure and simple. Why, one Conservative member even claimed that the hens laid larger eggs under the inspiration of the national policy. When we consider, Mr. Speaker, the strong financial showing that the Liberal government is able to present, it seems to me that the opposition are fighting against the logic of irrefutable facts. I shall not answer the arguments of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) in any detail, because they have all been answered before, but I want to call his attention to one thing, and I am sorry he has left the House. I agree with him in his desire to see the leather combine destroyed, or to see its power weakened. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) blamed the present government for the existence of the leather combine, but he did not tell the House that the leather combine was formed under the old administration, and if the present government is responsible for its continuance, the Conservative government is responsible for its birth.

Mr. WALLACE. When was it formed?

Mr. HOLMES. The hon. member for East Grey stated that it was formed in 1895. Let me allude for a moment to another matter. The Conservative party in their organs and in this House, state that their defeat in 1896 was due to the Manitoba school question. I agree that that was one factor among others, and it may have been a factor more or less important, but I believe that the Conservative party was defeated because there was dry rot and moral decay within its ranks. To show that I am not alone in that opinion I will quote from an organ which gentlemen on the other side will agree with me is in their confidence; and I am sorry that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) is not in his place to hear the utterances of his own pen. On June 24, 1896, the Toronto World wrote:

The people determined to punish the government for its many and serious shortcomings. The internal cabinet dissensions that all but wrecked the party and the government some months ago were of a most disgraceful character. The people felt that the honour of the country was involved in the public squabbling of the ministers of the Crown. Several notorious jobs, in which the efficiency and honesty of the government was concerned, still further soured the public on the ministry. The Tay Canal, the Curran Bridge, and other similar scandals have added to the general disrepute in which the government has fallen.

We advocated before, and we still advocate, the reorganization of the Conservative party. More than one member of the ministry was a disgrace to any party, and the sooner the party is rid of such men the better for the party.

A more intelligent opinion than that could not have been given by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson), who has shown himself independent occasionally. The most rabid Liberal journal could not pronounce more emphatically on the decay and ruin of the Conservative party.

Mr. HOLMES.

I wish to point out, Sir, that the Liberal government now in power has shown its sincerity in carrying out to a very large extent its ante-election promises, notwithstanding what the opposition have asserted—and it is simply a matter of assertion on their part. I shall not dwell on the reforms inaugurated by the Liberal government at any length, but I may point out that this government has shown its good faith in legislating in the interest of the masses in the case of the very important reduction they have made on the rate of postage. The Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) is entitled, and he receives, the thanks of the people of the country because of that reduction. I was amused at the course of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) on this matter. It amounted to this, that if the Conservatives were returned to power—I do not believe that day will come for a number of years at all events—they would restore the postage rate to three cents.

Mr. HENDERSON. Nobody ever said that.

Mr. HOLMES. I know very well that nobody ever said it, but if there is any logical deduction from the remarks of gentlemen opposite, it is that they would increase the postage rate if they came into power. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) said that the reduction in postage was a great advantage to him as an individual, but that the poor farmer did not get any benefit from it. Let him tell that to an audience of intelligent farmers and he will see what they will say to him. If it is a benefit to him as an individual it is a benefit to the farmer also as an individual, because no individual can enjoy any benefit of that kind that does not react upon the community at large. I am satisfied that the farmers, the artisans, and all classes from one end of the Dominion to the other, even though they only post a small number of letters, agree with the policy of the Postmaster General in reducing the postage. There is also to the credit of the Liberal government, the reduction of the tariff; the preferential tariff; the removal of quarantine restrictions; cold storage, free corn, and a number of other evidences of good faith on their part. Let me make a brief reference to the preferential tariff. It is my opinion that the arguments of gentlemen opposite on this question are entirely misleading. They speak of the preferential tariff as if we were giving something to Great Britain. I take issue with them on that. I believe the truth is we are giving something to our own people, but I do not believe we are giving anything in the strict sense of the term, to Great Britain. The people of Great Britain do not care a great deal whether we buy their manufactures or not. As a matter of business they may appreciate the fact that we purchase from them, but they are able to sell their products in the markets of the world, and therefore, as to giving Great Britain everything in this matter as the opposition say, I do not agree with that contention for one moment. I believe that the government of this country is conferring an inestimable benefit upon the people of Canada by the preferential tariff. It has reduced the price of goods to the people of Canada and the opposition may argue—to use a common expression—until they are black in the face, but they can never convince the people of Canada that they are not deriving decided benefits from the preferential tariff. Let me speak for a moment as to what we may term the present policy of the Conservative party. In brief, that policy is spoken of as interprovincial preferential trade between Canada and the motherland, carrying with it the imposition of a duty, large or small, upon products going from this country into the old land. I cannot convince myself that the hon. leader of the opposition is sincere in his advocacy of that measure. I cannot conceive that the members of the Conservative party, if they gave any thought to the matter or exercised their intelligence and reasoning power on it, can come to any other conclusion than that the policy they are propounding is a misleading policy, and parliamentary usage would not permit of my describing it in any stronger language than that. The action of the Liberal party since they came into power has been in the direction of forward movements, but the policy that is proposed now by the Conservative party is a retrograde movement. The Hon. Joseph Chamberlain has been repeatedly quoted by hon. gentlemen opposite as having leaned towards a policy of this kind; but we find Mr. Chamberlain, in a speech a few days ago, expressing himself in these words:

We are not going to interfere in the domestic affairs of the colonies, nor are they going to interfere in ours.

What does that mean? It means that Great Britain is not going to allow Canada to dictate her policy. It would be preposterous for this country to suppose that we could go to Great Britain and ask her to put a tax, great or small, on the products of foreign countries coming into competition with ours. I have followed carefully the utterances of English statesmen, and also the utterances of the English press on this subject, and I have failed to find, as yet, a single expression in favour of the proposition of the hon. leader of the opposition. Allow me to quote to you from a speech delivered some time ago by Lord Playfair, to show the absurdity of supposing that Great Britain is going to accede to a demand of that kind:

If this country were to tax foreign food, can any one believe that foreign nations would sit down tamely and would not retaliate on our exports of manufactured goods? Is it not obvious that if we shut our door, in whole or in part, against foreign nations, they will shut their doors, in whole or in part, against England? The colonies would be the first to feel this retaliation, because the value of raw materials actually worked up in the English exports of manufactured goods amounts to 60 millions sterling, largely supplied by the colonies. To this extent the retaliatory tax must recoil upon them, and be extracted from the colonial pocket, so that every advantage the colonies got in one direction would vanish in another. A little reflection would show Canada in how many ways the United States would retaliate if Canadian wheat entered Great Britain free of duty, while that from the neighbouring republic was taxed. Under such a system of preferential duties, the United States would be justified in refusing to Canada her present privilege of passing her traffic through New England in bond. This would be a serious blow, as our colony has no direct outlet for her commerce in winter, and no very cheap railway outlet even in summer. Retaliation would inflict more injury on Canada than any benefit that she could receive from a differential duty in her favour.

Let me also quote from Lord Kimberley:

I should like to say a word upon that which is an interesting topic, namely, this astounding proposal of a customs union with our colonies. Don't let us hide from ourselves what lies at the bottom of this proposal. To be fair to our opponents, we should consider this. What they have in view is the closest possible connection between this country and the colonies abroad, and they think they see in a proposal of this kind a closer connection. Let me point out what it means. If it means anything, it means that our colonies should be in relation to this country in the same position as the States of America to one another in the United States. It means that we should have free trade with our colonies, and it would follow, of course, that revenue duties should be imposed, and that we should have one government for fiscal purposes. That scheme, you would see, is utterly impracticable. I cannot see the possibility of such a system being worked.

Again, he says:

You have heard Lord Playfair say what the result would have been for us, and I am confident there is never likely to be a government in this country which will dare to propose a protective system. The government of this country is not based upon a democratic system. Every man practically has a vote, and the advantage of cheap food and other cheap articles necessary for life has deeply sunk into the minds of the working classes of this country.

I have another authority in the old land to quote from, one which I presume members on the opposite side are willing to accept. The London Canadian Gazette, speaking of the action of the Montreal Board of Trade on this subject, said:

But though this was the official decision of the board itself, it is evident that many members are under no misconception of the fate that must attend such proposals even should they be adopted by the Congress next June. It was recognized that such a duty would involve a complete departure from the free trade policy upon which the British Empire has been built up, and without which historians tell us it could never have escaped destruction at the hands of its innumerable rivals. . . . It is clear, from the comments in the English press this week, that even in those quarters where protectionist views are least heterodox, there is little or no belief in the acceptance of any such proposal in this country. The hopes of most Englishmen point, as the 'Times' says, toward a solution of the problem of an Imperial Zollverein based upon the common acceptance of a policy of free exchange rather than upon a return to the policy of protective duties and protective tariffs, which England deliberately rejected half a century ago.

I have failed to find in any of my reading or observations, any English authority who has expressed himself as favourable to the proposition of the hon. leader of the opposition. What, in brief, does that proposition mean? It means that Canada would be bound with Great Britain to maintain certain rates of duty against foreign countries. It means that Canada must admit British goods on fixed terms. It means that no rearrangement of our tariff could take place without the consent of Great Britain. This is one point which, it seems to me, has been entirely overlooked in connection with the absurd proposal made by the hon. leader of the opposition. If it were found, in the course of the changing events of this country, that the development and progress of the country rendered it advisable in our interests to make a change in our tariff, or in our tariff regulations, we could not do so without the consent of Great Britain; and the position in which Canada would be placed under those circumstances must present itself to any one who gives the subject a moment's thought. It means that the hon. leader of the opposition, and his party are willing to sign away our trade independence. At the present time we control our own tariff policy, and legislate just as we like. If the people of this country demand an increased protective tariff, beyond what they have at the present time, they are able to elect a parliament which will grant them what they want. If the people of Canada desire lower rates of duty, the parliament of Canada can grant them. But once we were tied up with Great Britain, in such an arrangement, it would be utterly impossible for Canada to make any change in its tariff. I admit, without any argument, that if we could obtain a preference in the British market, it would be an advantage to the people of this country in one direction; but there are disadvantages and drawbacks which, I think, would offset the advantages.

Mr. WALLACE. In what way?

Mr. HOLMES. Time will not allow me to enumerate them at present. I do not wish to take up too much time, because I am not a believer in long speeches, and I wish to get through with my argument without going into so many details as are customary in this House. Even if it were possible for us to obtain from the motherland a preference, which I do not, for one moment think it is possible for us to obtain, I believe the people of this country are too high-minded, independent and fair to expect the labouring classes of the old country to tax themselves for the small possible benefit that would accrue to the people of this country. We are better able to make our own living in this country than the people in the old land. We know that the labouring classes in the old country have all they can do to make both ends meet. With them life is a constant struggle, day in and day out; it is almost impossible for them to make any headway or to lay by anything for a rainy day; and it is preposterous for a leader of a party in this country to propose a system of taxation which the good sense and honesty and fairness of the masses of the people of this country would not tolerate for one moment. More than that, I do not believe, though I hesitate to say it, that the rank and file of his party are sincere in their advocacy of that nonsensical and absurd platform. It is one that appeals to the selfishness of mankind, but I do not believe they are sincere in it. The Hamilton Spectator, one of the recognized organs of the Conservative party, refers to it in these words:

Mr. HOLMES.

Whether Britain would ever accept such a proposition is another thing. That is Britain's affair.

That is equivalent to an expression used by another organ of the Conservative party on a former occasion, when, alluding to the enforcement of the national policy, so far as British trade was concerned, it made use of that historical phrase, 'so much the worse for British connection.' Further, let me say, that I do not think that the party opposite is a unit upon its own platform. It is, on the contrary, at sixes and sevens upon the various issues before the people. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), conveyed the idea—by implication) at any rate, if not directly, that the duties on certain articles ought to be lowered, and that, because the government had not lowered these duties, it had not carried out its pledges. If his argument meant anything, it meant that the government ought to reduce the duties. That was the implied sequence to his logic. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), however, takes exactly the opposite view. He takes the view that the government ought to increase the duties. Why, when he was in my riding, an interview was published in which the hon. gentleman was quoted as having said to a certain manufacturer in the town of Goderich, that if the Conservative party came into power, there would be no free binder twine, no free corn, no free barbed wire, and the duty on agricultural implements would be increased to 45 per cent. When the hon. gentleman got back to Toronto, three days after the publication of that interview, he took occasion to deny it, but that interview was used in the West Huron campaign, while the hon. gentleman and the hon. member for Kent were taking part in it. It was used at a number of meetings which I know of, and was never repudiated until the hon. member was 150 miles away from the scene of the interview, and then only repudiated in part. While I accept his repudiation or qualification—because he said that in the interview only half truths were published—I must say that the gentleman with whom the interview was said to have taken place—a prominent business man in the town of Goderich—said to me, on more than one occasion, that the report was substantially correct. Therefore, I am justified in saying that these hon. gentlemen opposite are not a unit on their own platform.

I may add that those who read the newspapers will notice that the leader of the Opposition allows himself to be interviewed once in a while. In the city of Quebec, and in one or two other places, when asked what were the prospects of the Conservative party, he has always expressed himself as satisfied that he would be returned by a large majority. But, the hon. gentleman has been somewhat unfortunate in his prediction. On the 22nd of June, 1896, just before the general elections, he was interviewed by the Toronto World, and made this prediction:—'I am sure of a majority in every province of the Dominion.' Well, he did not get a majority in any province, and I am satisfied that the people, when next appealed to, will be content to allow the hon. gentleman to remain where he is, in the belief that in his present capacity he can do better service to the country than he possibly could as head of an administration. That hon. gentlemen opposite have no chance of being elected to office, while under their present leader, is an opinion which I am not alone in entertaining. Let me quote from an authority which I think the hon. gentlemen opposite will accept. I am not going to quote from a Liberal journal, or even from a journal that makes any pretense to independence. I am not about to quote, for instance, from a newspaper such as the Toronto Telegram, which might lay a claim to some little shadow to independence, though the shadow is so faint that it is hardly worth while making any allusion to it. But, I will give the House a citation from the Toronto World, an organ that aspires to be the leading exponent in the press of the Conservative party, an organ which would be very happy indeed to be recognized to-day as the leading organ of the party opposite, and I am free to say, that in some respects it is superior to the acknowledged organ of that party. The Toronto World, on June 27, 1896, immediately after the elections, had the following article:—

The government was handicapped by having among its members individuals who disgrace the party in everything they touch. The rank and file of the party was ashamed of these men whenever they came in contact with them. In the coming reorganization this rotten timber will be removed from the platform upon which the Conservative party is to stand. From the hour of Sir John Macdonald's death till the present time the party has made no progress. It has simply marked time. One of the principal causes of paralysis that prevented the party from advancing was the fact that none of its leaders had been endorsed by the people. Sir John Abbott, Sir John Thompson, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Sir Charles Tupper, were each placed at the head of affairs by the politicians. There is a huge difference in the power that is conferred upon the Premier by his ministerial colleagues and that conferred upon him by the people. Mr. Laurier knows exactly where he stands. None of our last four Premiers were sure of the ground upon which they stood. They had no mandamus from the people to give them the assurance and authority that is necessary both for the control of their subordinates and for carrying out of a vigorous policy. The next Conservative leader will be a man of strength. The party will not make the blunder of bringing forward a weakling to face the people.

That is a nice sentiment for the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), to express concerning the hon. leader of the Opposition. The Conservative party appealed to the country, under the leadership of its present leader, and the Toronto World said:

The next Conservative leader will be a man of strength.

Who could the World have had in view? Probably the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). It may be that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), was the gentleman the World had in view when publishing these lines.

Mr. WALLACE. It had the hon. member for East York in its eye.

Mr. HOLMES. Well, there may be a little understanding between the hon. member for East York, and the hon. member for West York. Some people say there is. I have heard it said that the issue in the municipal elections in Toronto was distinctly understood between the two.

Mr. WALLACE. Permit me to say that there is not a word of truth in that statement.

Mr. HOLMES. It was unnecessary entirely for the hon. member for West York to make that statement. I did not say there was any understanding and did not intend saying so. What I said was that it was generally understood that there was. I simply wish to say that the language used by the Toronto World, which I have quoted, is strong language. It would be considered exceedingly strong if used by a Liberal paper; and if it had been used by a newspaper supporting this side, hon. members opposite might take exception to it, and doubt its authenticity. But coming from a paper occupying the position of the Toronto World, it is important and very suggestive language. When the Toronto World says that the next Conservative leader will be a man of strength, we must take it for granted that the Conservative leader at that time, who is still the leader of hon. gentlemen opposite, was not considered a man of strength by the party as a whole. And when the Toronto World immediately after the last general election said:

The party will not make the blunder of bringing forward a weakling to face the people.

What are we to think of the chances of that party which keeps at its head the hon. gentleman whom the Toronto World thus described?

I think that it was the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) who alluded to the attitude of the Mail and the character of its utterances. Let me just say—and I can give my authority, if asked for it—that a former manager of the Toronto Mail gave expression to this statement—and I can prove it—that in a certain line of policy they lied right straight through. It is within the recollection of hon. gentlemen that the Toronto Mail at one time ceased to be the organ of the Conservative party, and delighted in running its editorial knife into the leaders and supporters of that party. It had a perfect right to do that, I suppose, while it occupied an independent position, but what better evidence can we have of the insincerity of that paper, which is now the organ of the opposition, than the fact that the very men who are editing it to-day, who are responsible for its utterances and attitude, are the men who were editing it when it was an independent journal. If it was sincere at that time, how can it be sincere now? What reliance can be placed upon its utterances? It is discredited out of its own mouth.

I have nothing further to say except this—that when the time shall come, be it soon or be it late, when it is necessary for this government to appeal to the people to condemn or to endorse their action, I have no doubt what the verdict of the people will be. Whatever the government may not have accomplished, however far they may have failed in carrying out as fully as they had intended their platform and their policy, I believe that the reforms they have introduced, the measures passed for the benefit of the people are such as will receive the cordial endorsement and support of the electors when the time comes to ask for that support.

Mr. J. W. BELL (Addington). It is getting late, and I would prefer to move the adjournment of the debate, unless the First Minister requests me to go on.

Mr. HOLMES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It is a rather early hour for adjournment, especially at this period of the session. But my hon. friend (Mr. Bell, Addington), does not often address the House. So we will give him plenty of time, hearing him to-morrow.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Wednesday.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, April 25, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST CANADA IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. KAULBACH asked:

Is the government aware that a discriminating duty is exacted on fish and other products of Canada, exported to Porto Rico from Canada, as compared with articles of a similar character exported to that island from the United States?

And, has the government of Canada, considering this unjust condition of affairs—the United States having expressed, when interfering in the contention between Cuba and Porto Rico with Spain, that her only inducement was a feeling of humanity and to merely give these islands their independence—made any overtures to the United States whereby this unjust discrimination can be removed?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). With regard to the first question, the answer is, that the legislation at Washington appears to be intended to establish a discrimination between the duties on goods imported from the United States and those imported from other countries.

With regard to the other question, this is altogether a domestic affair concerning the United States, as to which we do not consider that any representation ought to be made.

MILITIA CAPTAINS AND LIEUTENANTS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. ELLIS asked:

1. How many captains and lieutenants are there in each branch of the active militia of Canada?

2. How many resigned their commissions and accepted service as privates in the Canadian contingents now in South Africa?

3. What are their names, and the name of the province from which each man hails?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). In reply, I beg to submit the following list:—1. Captains:

Cavalry, 37; field artillery, 17; garrison artillery, 30; engineers, 4; infantry and rifles, 604; medical staff, 22. Lieutenants and 2nd Lieutenants: Cavalry, 124; field artillery, 51; garrison artillery, 68; engineers, 12; infantry and rifles, 1,209; medical staff, 25. 2. Thirty-seven. 3. Ontario: Capt. Ross, 30th Batt.; Capt. Wall, 16th Batt.; Capt. Gorman, 27th Batt.; Capt. Wallace, 36th Batt.; Capt. Garnett, 26th Batt.; Lieut. Southey, 46th Batt.; Lieut. McCosh, 35th Batt.; Lieut. Rorke, 31st Batt.; Lieut. Warren, G.G.B.G.; Lieut. Hayward, 3rd Dragoons; Lieut. Hope, 20th Batt.; Lieut. Read, 46th Batt.; Lieut. Cosby, 48th Batt.; Lieut. Fraser, 40th Batt.; 2nd Lieut. Leach, 46th Batt.; 2nd Lieut. Campbell, 30th Batt.; 2nd Lieut. Hulme, 15th Batt. Nova Scotia: Capt. Ward, 68th Batt.; Capt. Oxley, 93rd Batt.; 2nd Lieut. Ferguson, 93rd Batt. New Brunswick: Capt. Armstrong, 3rd Regt. C.A.; Lieut. Arnold, 8th Hussars; Lieut. Parks, 8th Hussars; Lieut. Onslow, 12th Field Battery; 2nd Lieut. Wright, 71st Batt.; 2nd Lieut. Markham, 8th Hussars; 2nd Lieut. Metzler, 74th Batt.; 2nd Lieut. Moorehouse, 74th Batt. Quebec: Lieut. La Rue, 87th Batt.; 2nd Lieut. O'Meara, 86th Batt. British Columbia: 2nd Lieut. McHarg, R.M.C., Manitoba: Capt. Whimster, Man. Dragoons; 2nd Lieut. Cowan, Man. Dragoons; 2nd Lieut. Irvine, 90th Batt. Prince Edward Island: Lieut. Stewart, 82nd Batt.; Lieut. Mellish, 82nd Batt.; 2nd Lieut. Rodd, 82nd Batt.

PAY OF MEN AT WORK POINT BARRACKS, B.C.

Mr. PRIOR asked:

1. What is the rate of pay per diem allowed by the Imperial authorities to the officers, non-commissioned officers and men quartered at Work Point Barracks, in British Columbia, giving same for each separate rank?

2. What is the rate of pay per diem allowed to the same officers and men by the Dominion government in addition to the pay they receive from the Imperial government?

3. What is the rate of pay per diem allowed to the Canadian officers and men now doing garrison duty at Victoria, B.C., as Canadian troops?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: 1. The rates of pay for the Arm concerned. As regards details of these rates, they are to be found in the Royal Warrant for pay. The answer would be too long to give. 2. None. 3. The rates of pay for the active militia of Canada.

Mr. PRIOR. Does not Canada give something extra?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am informed not.

Mr. PRIOR. They used to.

SONGHEES INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. PRIOR asked:

1. Are the government aware that as yet no settlement has been arrived at with the provincial government of British Columbia for the removal of the Indians from the Songhees Indian reserve?

2. Are they aware that the citizens of Victoria are unanimous in wishing this removal to be carried out without delay?

3. Are they aware that a most brutal murder of a white woman occurred on this reserve some few months ago, and that until this land ceases to be an Indian reserve the city cannot police it effectually?

4. Will the government again take this matter up with the provincial government, at once, and earnestly attempt to come to a settlement so that the Indians may be removed from the reserve?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I beg to reply: 1. Yes. 2. The government has been for some time aware of the desire of the citizens of Victoria to have the Indians removed, and it, therefore, made, as is shown by the papers which were laid on the Table of the House, an early and earnest endeavour to arrange with the provincial authorities for their removal and the disposal of the land comprised in the reserve. The claim made by the province in respect to the land in the reserve made joint action necessary. As the hon. gentleman knows, the failure to effect the removal of the Indians does not lie with the Dominion. 3. The government is not aware that a murder has been committed on the reserve. The government does not know of anything which would stand in the way of the reserve being patrolled by the police of the city, did the civic authorities so desire. 4. As the provincial authorities are aware of the readiness of this government to act in accordance with its proposal, as shown in the papers which were laid on the Table, there does not appear to be occasion for further action on its part at present.

EXPORT OF CATTLE TO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HEYD asked:

1. How many cattle and their value one year old and less, were exported to the United States yearly from 1890 to latest return?

2. How many and value over one year for the same time?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). In reply to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Heyd), I would say that previous to 1894, the returns did not distinguish cattle one year old or less, from cattle over one year old, so that, for four years, from 1890 to 1894, I will have to give the hon. gentleman the total, without distinguishing between the classes. The following is a statement showing the number and value of cattle exported to the United States from Canada, during the undermentioned fiscal years:

	Canadian.		Foreign.		Total.
	No.	Value.	No.	Value.	No.	Value.
		$		$		$
1890.....	7,840	104,623	24	2,768	7,864	107,391
1891.....	2,763	26,975	4	2,270	2,767	29,245
1892.....	551	21,327	1	45	552	21,777
1893.....	402	11,032	1	20	403	11,052

CATTLE ONE YEAR OLD OR LESS.

1894.....	37	632	2	33	39	665
1895.....	536	1,410			536	1,410
1896.....	1,423	3,614			1,423	3,614
1897.....	4,688	29,613	2	11	4,690	29,624
1898.....	12,231	108,001			12,231	108,001
1899.....	24,010	242,947			24,010	242,947
Six months ended December, 1899.....	11,978	152,018			11,978	152,018

CATTLE OVER ONE YEAR OLD.

1894.....	219	3,139	1	87	223	3,226
1895.....	346	17,806	4	325	350	18,131
1896.....	223	5,256	284	4,200	507	9,536
1897.....	31,310	479,525	6	200	31,316	479,725
1898.....	75,674	1,131,447	21	6,300	75,695	1,137,747
1899.....	68,824	1,055,223	30	15,370	68,854	1,070,593
Six months ended December, 1899.....	28,784	545,432	50	9,700	28,834	555,132

LOBSTER FISHING REGULATIONS.

Mr. MILLS asked :

1. What is the regulation as to size of lobsters caught in Digby and Annapolis counties, Nova Scotia?

2. What is the time limit for catching lobsters in said counties?

3. Are these regulations of the government being carried out by the fishery overseers?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Legal size limit, 10½ inches. 2. Season opens 15th January, and ends midnight, 29th June. 3. A short time ago, the department being informed that the regulations were being violated, called upon the overseer for a report. He reported 19th April, that the reports were much exaggerated, and in a great many cases totally unfounded; and that he was satisfied everything was going on as well as it possibly could under the new regulations.

Mr. DRYSDALE, M.L.A., HANTS, N.S.

Mr. MILLS asked :

Was Mr. Drysdale, M.L.A. for Hants County, N.S., employed by the government in any capacity in connection with the contracts for the supplying of, or fitting up of, the steamships at Halifax for the conveyance of the contingents or Strathcona Horse to South Africa, or in any other capacity?

If so employed, what were his duties?

How long was he employed and what his remuneration?

Mr. PATERSON.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Mr. Drysdale, M.L.A. for Hants County, N.S., has not been employed in any capacity whatever by the Department of Militia, or by the government in connection with the contracts for the supplying of, or fitting up of, the steamships at Halifax for the conveyance of the Canadian contingents, or of Strathcona's Horse, to South Africa. I am including Strathcona's Horse. To my own knowledge he was not employed by the government. The government had nothing whatever to do with Strathcona's Horse, except to lend the machinery of the department to assist Lord Strathcona in despatching his Horse.

Mr. WICKWIRE, M.L.A., NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. MILLS asked :

Was Mr. Wickwire, M.L.A. for Nova Scotia, employed by the government in any capacity in connection with the contracts for the supplying of, or the fitting up of, the steamships at Halifax for the conveyance of the contingents or Strathcona Horse to South Africa, or in any other capacity?

If so employed, what were his duties?

How long was he employed and what his remuneration?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The same answer applies exactly to this question. Mr. Wickwire was not employed in any capacity whatever.

CLERK OF WORKS, POST OFFICE BUILDING, KENTVILLE, N.S.

Mr. MILLS asked :

Who is the local government inspector or clerk of works on the new post office building in course of erection in Kentville, N.S.?

Is he paid by the day, or how, and how much?

How many days has he been employed up to the end of March? What amount has been paid him? What is or has been the usual business of this government official?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. C. L. Dodge. 2. Is paid $75 a month. 3. Employed 226 days, and has been paid $540. 4. The department has no official information as to the usual business of this gentleman, but it is understood that he is a contractor and trader.

SUPPLIES FOR THE CANADIAN CONTINGENT.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

1. Were the supplies of meat and hay required for the uses of the men and horses of the Canadian contingent that left Halifax for South Africa purchased by public tender; and if so, from whom, and at what prices?

2. How many pounds of meat, both fresh and preserved, were put on board each of the four transports that left Halifax for South Africa with the Canadian contingents?

3. How much per pound was paid for fresh meat and how much for preserved meat?

4. What was the total amount paid for the meat purchased, and what quantity of fresh and preserved meats respectively was purchased?

5. How many pounds each of hay, oats and bran were purchased, and at what price for each article?

6. How many men and how many horses were transported in the four contingents to South Africa?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The only supplies purchased by the government, were hay and feed for the horses, all the other supplies were furnished by the owners of the transport ships. The price was ascertained by correspondence with several prominent dealers in hay, oats, &c. The purchases of hay were made from W. C. Hamilton, at $12.50 per ton; of oats, from Horace Hazard, at 37 cents per bushel; of bran, from J. L. Dodge and Co., at $18 per ton. I am not at present able to give the hon. gentleman the number of pounds of meat, as the statement has not yet been made up. In answer to the last question, the number of officers was 154, of non-commissioned officers and men, 2,708; of horses, 1,783. This includes three officers and 51 men of the Strathcona Horse, but does not include three officers and 101 men sent to fill up the vacancies in the first contingent, and 1 officer and 51 men about being sent at the request of Lord Strathcona.

THE MONTREAL HARBOUR AND THE CONNERS SYNDICATE.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask a question of the hon. the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), who, I understand, is acting Minister of Public Works. It is stated in the newspapers that the arrangements between the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, and the Connors Syndicate have come to an end on account of the syndicate not having fulfilled the conditions. If the hon. gentlemen is aware of it, will he be kind enough to tell me, whether the government has taken any action in the matter, or intend to do so.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I must say in answer to the hon. gentleman, that I have never heard anything about the matter he mentions, I am not aware whether such arrangements have come to an end. If the hon. gentleman desires, I will make inquiry on the subject, and, perhaps, be in a position to-morrow to give him an answer.

REPORT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). I desire to ask the acting Minister of Public Works, when the report of that department is likely to be brought down.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am sorry to say that the report of the Department of Public Works has had a very unfortunate career. It was placed in the hands of an officer to prepare, and I asked the deputy of the department, why it was not forthcoming, and he told me that the officer in charge had the bad taste to die. I asked him if there was no survivor; he said yes, and that he had placed it in the hands of a survivor who had had the bad taste to be taken sick. All these things delayed the preparation of the report, and I find that only to-day has it gone to the printers.

Mr. McNEILL. That seems to be a very dangerous document, and I hope it will not be as dangerous to the government as it is to the staff who are handling it. I did not quite catch what the hon. gentleman said about its going to the printers.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I inquired of the chief engineer, who has largely to do with it, and he told me that beyond all question it would be placed in the hands of the printers to-day.

MAIL BAGS AND BICYCLES OBSTRUCTING MAIN ENTRANCE.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). I would like to draw the attention of the acting Minister of Public Works, to the disgraceful state in which the entrance to the Parliament Buildings is at present. Why, Sir, I think any stranger coming into this building would almost be afraid of stumbling over that enormous pile of mail bags which have accumulated there. The sight is exactly one of a collection of old bags mixed up with a few bicycles, which certainly seem to me to be altogether out of place in this building. At first, there were only a few, but they have now accumulated to such an extent that I am afraid we will have to come in by some side door. The main entrance is likely to become so obstructed that it will be impossible for members of parliament to get through. The government should immediately give its attention to this matter. At a time when the scientific world is so busy with investigating microbes, I fear there must be danger to health in this accumulation of old bags, and that fear is strengthened by what the Postmaster General has just told us of the illness among the officers in his department. I hope the government will take steps to remove these obstructions and eyesores from the portals of this building.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). In reply to the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), as to the condition of the entrance hall in the Parliament Buildings, I think the obstruction or eyesores are occasioned not only by outsiders, but by hon. members on both sides of this House. If it is the desire of the House that no bicycles or mail bags should not remain in the entrance hall, I will give orders at once to the caretaker not to allow—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not bicycles surely?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Not bicycles? Where, then, am I to—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), will have something to say about that.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Well, perhaps the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), could arrange to learn and communicate to me the views of his friends about him, and I will do the same with hon. gentlemen on this side, and we can then reach a modus vivendi.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock), being acting Minister of Public Works should know exactly in what way the parliament bags should be kept. It is not often that the hon. gentleman consults the wishes of members on this side of the House. I am quite certain that it is not from the fact that these wishes have not been already expressed that the hon. gentleman has permitted these eyesores to remain in this public building. But, I think, and I repeat, that it is a disgrace to see the entrance to the Parliament Buildings in such a state. It seems to me there might be some shed or some room down stairs where these mail bags could be collected without interfering with the beauty of that hall.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron), refers to my having permitted this. I desire to correct the hon. gentleman, and to say, that I have never given permission. But, as he has spoken so strongly, I will give orders to the caretaker to allow no such eyesores in the future, no matter who may seek to continue them.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to say, with regard to bicycles, that I think it would be a matter of very small expense to have a rack for bicycles either inside or outside the building. All large commercial establishments have such racks for bicycles used by their employees. A great many of the civil servants who are employed in this building and a good many members of this House use bicycles, and the only way of disposing of them at present is to stand them up in the entrance. But, I would suggest to the Postmaster General that he should provide a bicycle rack either inside or outside the building—it does not make such difference where. It would be as convenient to have a room down stairs as any place else.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—PAYMENT OF INSURANCE CLAIMS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the government to a matter that is very interesting to a number of people. I have been trying to obtain from the Department of Militia an official statement from the War Office of the deaths of men of the first contingent who fell in battle. On the 15th day of March, I wrote a letter to the Minister of Militia and Defence, stating that the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, who were carrying insurance to the extent of $1,000,000, on the lives of the men of the first contingent, were desirous of obtaining an official list of those who had lost their lives on the field of battle. From that day to this I have been trying in vain to get this information, information that ought to be obtained in an hour. There are thousands of dollars ready to be paid over by this corporation to the heirs of those who have fallen on the field of battle, but down to this moment I have not been able to get that information for the company. I now appeal to the right hon. gentleman, the leader of the government, to ascertain if he can get the Governor General to send a cable to Lord Lansdowne for a statement of the facts, and of the information that is absolutely necessary in order that justice may be done to the heirs of those whose lives were insured.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). After receiving the letter which the hon. leader of the opposition has mentioned, a letter was sent to the War Office asking for the details. Later on a cablegram was sent, and up to the present moment we have not received the official statement over the handwriting of the proper officer in the War Office for the use of the government. I regret that, but it was no fault of mine. The moment the paper comes to hand, I will send it forward to the office, as I told the hon. gentleman I would, and will send him a copy. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, another word in this connection. I am informed that the other insurance companies who had insured lives of men who have died in South Africa, have paid the risks at once upon the information which we were able to furnish, and which I think ought to be satisfactory to any company, information which has come to the militia office through the official channel, direct from the Commander-in-chief in South Africa, and through the War Office.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, King's) allow me to say that information has been received from the Militia Department of the death of persons who have not died, while persons have been reported as wounded who had been killed. Therefore, the point is taken by this company that there had been these mistakes and misapprehensions through the department here, so, they require a statement from the War Office. That statement can be obtained without the least difficulty, and I am sure my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will take means to get it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I shall speak with His Excellency the Governor General on the subject. The precaution is not unjustifiable on the part of the company. They naturally require absolute proof that the party is dead. But there is no blame to be attached to the Minister of Militia, as my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) will see.

PRINTING OF VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). The Prime Minister promised us some time ago to let us have definite knowledge with regard to the printing of the voters' lists, the months are passing by, and we have as yet got no information as to the condition of the lists or when they are to be printed.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) had been here yesterday he would know that the energies of the Printing Bureau are devoted to the printing of the reports of the departments, and these must be disposed of before the lists are taken up.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In what order will the lists be printed; in the order in which they come into the Bureau?

The PRIME MINISTER. They have all been printed in the order in which they came to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And that will be continued?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, certainly.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—NEWS AS TO MISSING MEN.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to mention to the Minister of Militia a matter which I have already orally communicated to him—that some of the members of the first Canadian contingent from my province have been reported as missing, and since that report, there has been no mention in the newspapers of their whereabouts, and so their parents and relatives are in a state of considerable anxiety with regard to them. One man to whom I would particularly refer is Private Munnis, who is the son of a respectable citizen in my own constituency. Private Munnis was reported as missing about four weeks ago, and since that time his father has had no information whether he is living or dead, whether he is in prison or free. I venture to inquire whether the Department of Militia could not take some steps to ascertain—by telegraphing to Col. Otter, I suppose—whether or not these soldiers are prisoners, whether they are still missing, or what is known with regard to them. It seems to me that as these young men have volunteered and as the country have sent them forward, their parents are entitled to this information from the government, and I would respectfully say that the Department of Militia would not be going outside of its duty if it should take some such course as I have suggested in this matter.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). There were, I think, fifteen men reported as missing. Col. Otter was asked for a report. The report came the other day with regard to these men. Their names are not given, but simply the fact that there were fifteen men reported as missing, men who had committed some impropriety in Cape Town, had gone off without leave of absence, but they had all reported and were then with him. To-morrow, I will make further inquiries and I shall be glad to give the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) any further information I may have.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The young man to whom I refer was not one of the fifteen spoken of by the minister. He fell out on the march to Belmont owing to the heat and to fatigue and was reported missing. Since that time, four weeks ago, his parents have been unable to obtain a single word about him, and they are naturally anxious to know at least whether he is living or dead.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. If the hon. gentleman will send me the name, I will make inquiry.

Mr. M. J. F. QUINN (St. Ann's, Montreal). In connection with that matter, I would mention to the hon. member the case of Private Frank Irwin, who was reported ill in Wynburg hospital on the 9th of March last, since which time nothing has been heard from him. His parents have tried in every way to get information, but have not succeeded. I would ask the hon. minister to get what information he can about him also.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) has spoken to me about this soldier several times. I feel sure that the fact that we have not had information indicates that the young man is improved. If there had been anything of a serious character we should have heard.

WELLAND CANAL—DYNAMITE EXPLOSION.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Before we pass to the Orders of the Day, Mr. Speaker, I desire to refer for a moment to a question that was brought up yesterday by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary), with reference to the alleged fact that when the company or battalion of militia was called out recently, they had no ammunition. I can only say with reference to that, that if there was no ammunition under the control of the commanding officer of that battalion, that commanding officer is entirely to blame for the want himself, as I will show you and the House. By a general order issued in February, 1898, the following, among other things, is provided :

Officers commanding districts and officers commanding units of the permanent corps respectively will take steps to insure a supply of small arm ammunition being at all times in possession of the permanent and city corps and of the rural corps whose arms are kept at regimental headquarters, in the following proportion:

Units of the permanent corps, mounted or dismounted,—

100 rounds per carbine or rifle on their establishment.

City or rural corps—

Which applies to this regiment—

—as above, mounted or dismounted,—

50 rounds per carbine or rifle on their establishment.

This ammunition must at all times be retained in the stores or armouries of the corps as a reserve for service in aid of the civil power or for active service.

A record of this ammunition must be entered on the regimental or company store ledgers, and produced at the half-yearly or yearly inspection of corps in quarters.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it will be quite clear to the House and the country, that so far as the department itself and the headquarters are concerned, we are not in any way responsible. The commanding officer of this battalion is entirely responsible for the fact that he did not furnish himself with ammunition as he was bound to do under the regulations controlling this matter.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Mr. WM. McCLEARY (Welland). I wish to say in answer to the minister, that not being a military man, I know nothing whatever about the military regulations myself, but the fact remains the same anyway, that there was no ammunition; not a single round for the volunteers of the 19th Battalion that were called out on Sunday last. I do not know who is the commanding officer of the regiment. I am satisfied that the 19th Battalion which have recently been reorganized is a first-class up-to-date battalion, and it appears to me that the commanding officer would certainly have had the ammunition in store if that is the militia order, and the ammunition could be got at. That is my opinion about it. I heard the statement yesterday on pretty good authority, as I thought, that there was no ammunition in Toronto, Hamilton, or the city of London, for an emergency.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Well, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCleary) does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. McCLEARY. Possibly I may not, but there are certain gentlemen who hold pretty high positions in the government who very frequently do not know what they are talking about.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no motion before the House.

Mr. McCLEARY. I do not want to rest on my own opinion, and I shall read what appears in the press.

Mr. SPEAKER. We are not discussing the question at large.

Mr. McCLEARY. I will conclude with a motion, Mr. Speaker. There are three papers in the city of St. Catharines, and two of them have commented on this very matter, I shall read the comment of one.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What paper is it?

Mr. McCLEARY. It is the Evening Star, published in the city of St. Catharines. I will not read the whole article, but the conclusion is this :

Quartermaster Groves was approached with regard to this serious state of affairs this morning, and while one could see he was willing to tell the facts, the absence of his usual frank, outspoken manner indicated that he knew a good deal more than he cared to disclose. However, the 'Star' challenges contradiction of the statement that the militia and artillery at London, Toronto, Hamilton and St. Catharines could not be turned out this week with one round of ammunition per man.

Mr. GIBSON. Read it all.

Mr. McCLEARY. It may be that the gentleman who wrote that article is as devoid of common sense and knowledge as has been imputed to me by the minister. However, the item stands for itself, and the fact remains that they have not ammunition in the armouries in St. Catharines, so that, Mr. Speaker, it is hardly necessary for the minister (Mr. Borden), to say that we know nothing about it, or to use the language he did.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The hon. gentleman stated that he would move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He withdraws.

The PRIME MINISTER. He cannot withdraw.

Mr. McCLEARY. Very well, I will move the adjournment of the House.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCleary) seems to take exception to the statement I made across the floor as to his not being well informed in reference to this matter. I can assure my hon. friend that I made no insinuation against the well-known fact that he is generally well informed. But, on this particular matter, I venture to say that he does not know the facts, and that is evidenced by the statement he has made. I am a little surprised that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCleary) should be so willing—I will not say anxious—to cast discredit upon the defences of this country, by rushing into the House to repeat gossip and to read unconfirmed newspaper extracts. If the hon. gentleman had been consulting the best interests of his own country, and its defences which I am sure he takes an interest in, if he did not care to come to me he would have gone to some officer in the Militia Department to get the best information he could; and if he could not get satisfactory information there, then he might have brought the question up in parliament. The hon. gentleman seems to have his doubts. There was a doubt implied in the language he used as to whether the general order which I read was really a militia general order.

Mr. McCLEARY. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The hon. gentleman should know that that order was published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He did not say anything about that.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I heard him distinctly say 'if' there was such an order, and I say he cast a doubt upon the statement which I made as to there being that order.

Mr. McCLEARY. I rise to a personal explanation. The hon. minister is putting words into my mouth which I never used. I said I was not a militia man, and that I knew nothing about the regulations.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am bound to accept the statement of the hon. gentleman. I certainly understood him to say 'if there be such an order'; but we will let that pass. There is such an order, and it has been published in the official Gazette, and is in the hands of the officer who commands the regiment in question, and to-day I can tell the House and the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCleary) that that officer sent forward to Ottawa a requisition for the ammunition which he should have had in store constantly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is there no one who inspects the supplies and the armouries?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The minister surely would have a report from that officer.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The ammunition may have been there six months ago and have been used since. We have no means of knowing that. It is the duty of the commanding officer, as clearly indicated in that general order, to see that he has on hand that supply of fifty rounds for each man in the battalion, and I shall take pains to ascertain why this commanding officer has not attended to this part of his duty. It would be very much more to his credit to attend to his duty than to be supplying my hon. friend opposite with information on which he might attack the government. Now, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the supply of ammunition, it is not perhaps in the highest degree desirable, as any military man here will understand, that we should advertise to the world just exactly where our ammunition is stored. But let me say this, in order that my hon. friend opposite will feel more assured, that there is an ample supply of ammunition, that there is an ample supply of ammunition in London, an ample supply in Toronto, and a supply in Hamilton. I may say further, with reference to the artillery ammunition, that some years ago, when General Herbert was here, he insisted that this ammunition, which is of an explosive and dangerous character, should be kept at the two central points, where there is good magazine accommodation, of which I regret to say, we have not enough in Canada, namely, at Kingston and at Quebec. There is an ample supply of artillery ammunition at both of these points, and there is a certain amount at other points in the west, which I need not mention. The ammunition for the batteries, is issued annually in camp for practice, and the different batteries are not allowed to take the ammunition home with them, because of its dangerous character.

This has special reference to the twelve-pounder ammunition, which is cordite, which any one familiar with its qualities knows is exceedingly dangerous. I think I have shown pretty conclusively that the department is not blamable for the fact that there was no ammunition there, and further that there is plenty of ammunition within easy reach of all the battalions in the province of Ontario, and throughout the Dominion, and that, so far as the artillery is concerned, there is also ample ammunition within easy reach.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I understand that the hon. gentleman who brought this question up, bases his statement on an article which he read in the Evening Star.

Mr. McCLEARY. I beg pardon. I had not seen that article till yesterday.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman, however, to-day quoted this article in support of his statement, and seemed to place a good deal of confidence in this newspaper. I regret that the hon. gentleman has that confidence in this newspaper, because in the article in question, there are expressions which I hope the hon. gentleman will disapprove of, and denounce in his own county as being of a most malignant character, and calculated to stir up racial feelings in this country. I will just point out to the House the kind of statements which this newspaper, which the hon. gentleman quotes, and apparently endorses, puts before the public. This article is headed 'A Case in Point,' and in the first paragraph it says:

The 'Star' earnestly hopes that, in calling attention to Saturday night's attempt to disable the Welland Canal, and subsequent events, it will not be charged with an attempt to 'stir up racial feeling' by pointing out one or two important things.

That is the heading, and that is the intention; but I will point out the way in which this newspaper tries to avoid stirring up racial feeling. After the portion of the article which the hon. gentleman quoted, and which I will not repeat, it goes on:

No doubt, the display would frighten the intruders, but it would be perfectly harmless otherwise, as there is no ammunition for rifles or guns in Ontario. The Frenchmen at Quebec have it all in their keeping.

This is the way in which the Ontario journal, which, I believe, supports the hon. gentleman and the party with which he is connected, tries to avoid stirring up racial feeling amongst its readers. I would like to know how the hon. gentleman or his friends or the editor of this paper justifies a statement of this kind, which has no connection whatever with the affair in question, and which can have no possible raison d'être, except for the express purpose of stirring up racial feeling at a time when all the members of the militia of this country, to whatever race they belong, or whatever language they speak, or whatever religion they profess, have been ready to show their patriotism and loyalty to Canada, and to the empire. This paper tries to separate the militia of this country into two opposite camps—the one, the French of Quebec, and the other, the English-speaking people of Ontario. I regret that an hon. member of this House should quote an article of this kind, reading portions of it which happen to suit his purpose, and leaving out these dangerous and malignant parts, which I think he ought to have taken the opportunity of exposing and denouncing.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). Mr. Speaker, I really cannot find out how the hon. gentleman, who brought up this important question has attempted to stir up any racial cries. The hon. gentleman put a question to the Minister of Militia. He wanted to ascertain, as it was his right and his duty to do, whether the militia force of the district in which the outrage took place, had the necessary ammunition. My hon. friend, the Minister of Militia, has properly laid down the regulations respecting the ammunition, but he has not gone far enough. It is the duty of the department to ascertain whether this ammunition has been applied for, and is to be found where it should be. Would it be an answer, in case of an attack, for the hon. Minister of Militia to say, we could not defend ourselves, forsooth, because we fancied there was ammunition there, and we found that the commanding officer had forgotten to claim the ammunition to which he was entitled, and hence we were defeated? The Minister of Agriculture has tried to make a point against my hon. friend for quoting a newspaper, merely to show that the ammunition had not been provided as it should have been. The hon. minister says that paper has raised the cry that all the ammunition is in Quebec. Well, Sir, we Frenchmen are really not very selfish, and are not disposed to keep all the ammunition down in the province of Quebec. We are ready to divide it between Ontario, Quebec and the other provinces, and to use it with the other provinces, in defending ourselves against attack from any foe. We want nothing more, and I do not believe the people of Quebec will be at all annoyed at the paragraph which appears in that paper, suggesting that all the ammunition is to be found in the province of Quebec. But I would suggest that the hon. Minister of Militia should draw upon that ammunition and send some of it to the Welland Canal, in case of another attack being directed against those very important public works. It is no answer to say that all the ammunition and gunpowder is to be found in one place. It is the duty of the Department of Militia, to distribute it in such a way that it will be useful to the whole Dominion, and not to one section or another alone.

Mr. BORDEN (King's, N.S.)

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). Mr. Speaker, I think because of the anger which he sometimes, at very little provocation, displays, the Minister of Militia made a statement which is absolutely unfair to the officer in command of the 19th Battalion. The hon. Minister of Militia said that the colonel would have done better to have kept the supply of ammunition good than carry information to the hon. member for Welland. Well, the hon. member for Welland did not tell this House that the colonel had given him any information. He gave the source of his information, and that source was the public press. But, so far as the colonel of the battalion was concerned, the hon. member for Welland did not know who he was, he did not even know his name, until it was given to him last night by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt). In view of these facts, the hon. Minister of Militia should withdraw his innuendo, that tales were being carried by the colonel of the battalion. I am sure that the hon. gentleman regrets having cast such an unfair aspersion on that officer.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I have no desire to impute any motive to any officer of the militia, but if this particular officer did furnish information to anybody, I think he might have been better engaged. I would simply say this, that there will be an investigation which will not only include this officer, but the officer at the head of the particular district in which the battalion is stationed.

Mr. McCLEARY. I want to say a word in defence of my position. I am glad to find the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) in his place, because we are not often favoured with his presence here.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must confine himself to a personal explanation.

Mr. McCLEARY. In reference to the item read from the Evening Star, it just shows what the size of the hon. gentleman is when he himself, in cold blood, endeavoured to raise in this House a racial question that I never thought of. He charged me with leaving out part of the article because that part would not suit my purpose. Well, the paragraph I read was one that alluded solely to the matter which I was bringing to the attention of the government. Let me repeat that I did not know who the commanding officer of that battalion was until I was told by the hon. member for South Simcoe after I sat down. I never had a word of communication with him, good, bad or indifferent, about this matter, nor with any other officer in that battalion. My information was entirely from a private source regarding the state of affairs on Sunday, when the guard was called out.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). As we are on a subject connected with our war department, might I ask the right hon. gentleman whether we are to have a commanding officer to replace General Hutton, and if so, when? Otherwise, it will not be necessary for us to vote the money to pay him.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend must admit that the question he has put is far removed from the subject we are discussing. He has introduced a subject which has no relevance to the one we are discussing.

Mr. BERGERON. It is very pertinent.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is not pertinent at all. At the proper time, when we are asking an appropriation for the General, the government will be happy to give all the information my hon. friend requires.

Motion (Mr. McCleary) to adjourn, negatived.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

Mr. A. MARTIN (East Queen's). I notice that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is in his place, and before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to put to him a question. About a month ago I asked him whether or not all the provinces of Canada were to be represented at the Paris Exhibition, and he led me to understand that they were. I asked him who was to represent Prince Edward Island, and he told me that he would give me the information in a few days. I would like to know now whether anybody has been appointed to represent the province of Prince Edward Island, and if so, who?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). So far, there is nobody to represent Prince Edward Island, but, I am waiting for a report from the commissioners in Paris as to what further assistance they require.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has the appointment been offered to any one?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty; and the motion of Sir Charles Tupper in amendment thereto.

Mr. JOHN W. BELL (Addington). In rising, Mr. Speaker, to take my part in the budget debate, I will make my best endeavour to be neither tedious nor disagreeable. I would not have attempted to take up the time of the House in my present state of health, did I not feel bound to discharge a duty which I owe to myself and my constituents. I join my congratulations to those of the government on the prosperity now existing throughout the Dominion. I am glad when we are in a prosperous condition; I rejoice when our trade and commerce are flourishing as they are to-day. I go further, and give the government considerable credit for the prosperity we are now enjoying. I think that prosperity is largely due to the fact that the government have not carried out the policy on which they appealed to the country. Had they brought down a tariff for revenue only, or a tariff based on free trade as they have it in England, we would not be in the position in which we now find ourselves. Governments may come and governments may go, but, so long as protection is the basis of our trade and fiscal policy, the prosperity of Canada is assured.

Sir, I suppose it is my duty to make some reference to the hon. gentleman who preceded me in discussing the budget last night—the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes). I would like to congratulate the hon. gentleman, for I like to say pleasant things, I like to say sweet things; but, if I should undertake to congratulate the hon. gentleman, I do not think I could congratulate him upon his modesty. If I understood him correctly, he referred to the Conservative party as being in a condition of decay and dry-rot—moribund. I do not think that such an expression came with very good grace from the hon. gentleman. He should have considered his surroundings and the means used to gain him a seat in this House. I think he would have acted more wisely if he had been a little more modest. There was one thing with regard to which I agreed with the hon. gentleman. He stated in his address, regarding the preferential tariff, that it had done no good to England and very little good to Canada. That is my opinion. And, having found a point on which I can agree with the hon. gentleman, I will say no more.

Now, I wish to say a word with regard to one particular point in the speech of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), an hon. gentleman for whom I have the highest regard, a gentleman whose views as expressed in this House impressed me very strongly, a gentleman with whose view on one particular point I agreed—superannuation. I remember well how he laboured in this House. I remember that he was instant in season and out of season denouncing inconsistency and corruption in connection with this superannuation system. I did expect that he would continue his labours, and that when his party came into power that great reformation would take place which he had so often pictured. I will not detain the House, nor will I trouble you by quoting figures at length.

Mr. BELL (Addington).

But, regarding superannuation, I have a few figures here. The average amount paid in 1897, 1898 and 1899, was $324,512; the average in 1894, 1895 and 1896, was $279,639. The average yearly increase was $44,873. Has not the hon. gentleman succeeded marvellously in bringing about a better state of things in regard to superannuation? But then, he said, he would have succeeded in having the whole thing abolished and wiped out if it had not been for the opposition. What a weak government, Mr. Speaker—a government that could carry through a Drummond County deal, that could carry through a Redistribution Bill, and yet could not carry through what that hon. gentleman so long advocated, the doing away with the corruption and extravagance which he said characterized the Conservative government's management of the superannuation system, and not only that but spent on the average $44,873 more every year. I was a little amused at that hon. gentleman. He finished up with a sort of Shakesperian play, leading us through quite a few acts, showing the corruption of the Conservative party. He referred to the Curran Bridge and many other things, and said to the young men of Canada: Young men, read, mark, learn the history of your country. I should say to the young men: Read and mark well the course of the hon. member for North Wellington regarding superannuation; but if you expect to reach the heights of fame, I would advise you not to follow in his footsteps.

Sir, I have been pleased with the debate, to which I have listened attentively. I wish to deal with the question before us as a fair-minded man. I was very much pleased with the speech of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), which was delivered in a dispassionate, candid, and deliberate manner, not as a partisan politician, but dealing with the questions upon their merits, and proving his position step by step, making a case so strong that the hon. member for North Wellington dare not attack it in any way. Now, it seems to me—and I hope I am not partial, I think I can claim at least a certain amount of independence, and that I can deal with these questions fairly and judge them without being partisan—it does seem to me that the speeches on this side of the House are more like the speeches of business men dealing with the business of the country than those of hon. gentlemen opposite. Listening to the hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Campbell) and others on that side who have spoken, it seems to me that their whole effort is to make excuses, to offer apologies and to varnish over what the government has done. They speak from a political standpoint altogether. My attention was drawn particularly to the speech made by the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Pater-son). I remember the evening when he addressed this House with loud intonation and vociferous acclamation, pounding his arguments in by striking his desk. I was perfectly astounded, carried away, mesmerized, for my respect for the hon. gentleman is such that I accepted his statements as being founded upon fact. Listening to his arguments, I thought that the Conservative party were done for. If the government had saved so many millions of dollars to the people of this country, there was no use in the Conservative party undertaking to compete with such a government. He set forth the reductions that had been made in the tariff, and, by the way, I do not think that he did it with very much respect for the party on this side of the House; for he placed two tariffs side by side, calling one 'our tariff' and the other 'the old Tory tariff.' I do think that we should try to elevate the tone of debate in this House, and when we refer to the party opposed to us, it should be done with that degree of respect which becomes discussion in the House of parliament. But I find that nearly all the reductions referred to in the hon. gentleman's statement had been made by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) in 1894, and that the present government had placed on the free list only twenty-one articles altogether, against hundreds placed on the free list by the Conservative party. Among these twenty-one articles are four different kinds of steel, which really are only one article. Counting them as such, we have eighteen articles only placed upon the free list by hon. gentlemen opposite. I do think that when hon. gentlemen address this House they ought to observe the principle of honesty and fair-play in presenting their arguments.

Now, Sir, I wish to say a few words about the principles of the great Liberal party in the Dominion of Canada. I have observed that when we touch upon that subject—what some hon. gentlemen call broken pledges, but what I will call the principles of the Liberal party—hon. gentlemen opposite become perplexed and worried. Why? Have we not a right to speak about those pledges? Have we not a right to make some reference to them? When were those pledges made? They were made when the Liberal party were appealing to the country to be returned to power. They made certain promises to the electors in order to obtain power, and we have a right to know what those promises were, and to hold them firmly to the promises and the pledges they made. Did they say that the Conservative party was corrupt and extravagant? Well, Sir, have they been anything else since they obtained power? Did they say the Conservative party had increased the public debt, had increased the expenditure? Have they lessened the public debt and the public expenditure? Here are a few of the principles of the great Liberal party: Free trade, reduced expenditure, reduced public debt, purity in elections, independence of parliament, superannuation and prohibition. Now, how many of these pledges have they carried out? Have they given us free trade as a fiscal policy? No, Mr. Speaker, and I congratulate them for not having done so. Have they reduced the expenditure? By no means, they have increased it by millions. Have they reduced the public debt? By no means, they have increased the public debt. Now, Sir, what shall I say about purity of elections?

An hon. MEMBER. Impurity of elections.

Mr. BELL (Addington). No, I do not want to call it impurity of elections; but I do say that there is no man in this House feels more keenly than I do the disgrace that has been brought upon this fair Dominion of ours by the corrupt practices they have introduced in elections.

Sir, another promise given by the Liberal party was to procure reciprocity with the United States. We were told that the markets of 70,000,000 people were our natural markets, that it was in our interest we should have reciprocal trade with the United States. Some hon. gentlemen deny that, I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) has denied it. But we have on record statements made by the Premier himself and by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and others. I will not repeat these statements, but I will quote a statement made by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce before he became a member of the government. He made a speech in my county during the campaign, where the hon. gentleman frowned severely on the corruption of the Conservative party, and he frowned on protection. You know, that when that hon. gentleman smiles he smiles most serenely, but when he frowns, Mr. Speaker, I will not undertake to describe it. I have here a report made by a reporter of the speech delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the village of Harrowsmith, in the county of Addington, and I know that it is correct. He said:

The national policy had ruined the country, real estate in consequence not worth one-half what it was previous to 1878; nothing would save Canada from utter financial ruin but unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, with sixty-six millions at our door; absurd to think we could build up a profitable trade with Great Britain, 3,000 miles away. And, oh, the robbery of that horrible national policy, robbing the poor, not for the benefit of the whole, but solely for the benefit of those cormorants, the voracious manufacturers. He dwelt on cotton, sugar, coal oil, the millions taken from the poor on such articles. Coal oil, something awful; the poor, down-trodden workingman—

How sympathetic he was.

—paying 14 cents a gallon. If it were not for that abominable national policy, we could buy the best for 8 cents—'just think of the sin of it.'

These cormorants would sell cotton cheaper to the Chinamen than to the people of Addington. Away with protection; cotton would be 3 or 4 cents cheaper next day. Just figure on the cotton used in Canada, and realize the saving, if you can. The same thing as to sugar.

Oh, yes! then there was the extravagance of the ministers; their private cars and cabs; letting contracts without tenders; their corruption in elections; members sitting with pledges of office in their pockets. Should such incompetent men be intrusted to govern this country?

This was the language that he used to the electors of Addington when the Liberal party were seeking the suffrages of the people. Now, I wish to be fair, I wish to give the government all the credit that is due them. I am ready at all times to support wholesome legislation introduced by this government that is in the interests of the Dominion of Canada. The government did make an effort to secure reciprocity with the United States. They went down to Washington and approached the government of the United States, saying they were anxious to have a treaty of reciprocal trade with them. I will not undertake to go over all that was done there, we have heard it already in this House. I merely want to say, that if they had followed the advice given them on this side of the House they might have saved themselves the journey to Washington, and saved all the money that they expended on that trip. We told them before they went to Washington that the people of Canada were not anxious for unrestricted reciprocity, or commercial union, or any closer trade relations with the United States. We told them that what the people of Canada wanted was closer trade relations with Great Britain. What did their trip cost his country? The International Commission cost the country $34,600. The sums that the ministers drew for expenses were as follows:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier.....	$3,821
Sir Richard Cartwright.....	3,361
Sir Louis Davies.....	3,636
Mr. Fielding	200

Then, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), drew the nice little sum of $2,200 as secretary, and $1,637 was expended in excursions and dinners. These hon. gentlemen came back with what information? All they have told this House is simply that they found out that Canada was not very anxious for any closer trade relations with the American people. If they had taken our word they would have saved their trip, and it would not have cost this country a dollar. Now, these hon. gentlemen have broken their pledges. It is treated as a joke sometimes by the press of the country, and very little is made out of it. But, now and again they become serious, and they almost make sworn declarations that we have misrepresented the position of the Liberals. This will deceive no one, and I can tell hon. gentlemen opposite that, in this country, we have an intelligent class of men, men who think, men who read, men who remember, men whose memories are longer than a tide-swept beach. The Liberals have retained a species of protection which I congratulate them upon, but that is not what they promised. They promised to do away with protection, to cut its head off, to wipe out every vestige of protection, but, they have not done it, and for what reason, I feel not like saying very many hard things about the government. They have not got reciprocity with the United States, and we do not want it. Have they appointed any Liberal members of parliament to offices within the gift of the government? When we ask them that question, they say that the Conservatives did so too. They promised the electors before they came into office that they were not going to introduce the spoils system. There is one thing they have done, that they did not promise. They have increased the expenditure. Surely no hon. gentleman can justify an increase in the expenditure. I tell hon. gentlemen that it would become this government to move more cautiously, more carefully, to husband the resources of the country while we have prosperity and then, in the time of depression, with a carefully managed expenditure, we will be able to pass through such a crisis as we passed through in 1894, 1895 and 1896.

Now, I wish to say a few words regarding the tariff, and I want to say them, not as a party man. I want to say them as a man who is interested in the future of Canada, my home, my country. I wish to draw the attention of the right hon. leader of the government, and of the hon. Minister of Customs to this one important fact. I do not think it should be the chief policy of a government to study how they can best raise a revenue, to so adjust the tariff as to have a large increase in the revenue, but, I do think it should be the principal object of a government to so arrange the tariff that they will build up the trade and commerce of our country. I am going to speak for a few moments as a farmer, and I am proud of my occupation. I am going to speak about agricultural implements, which I know something about. I can run a binder, a mower, a horserake, or any of the agricultural implements that every farmer uses. I will not trouble the House by quoting very many figures, but, I have taken a number of agricultural implements, to illustrate my point, among them binding attachments, seed grain drills, forks, pronged, harrows, harvesters, hay-tedders, hoes, horserakes, hay and straw knives, lawn mowers, manure spreaders, mowing machines, ploughs, post-hole diggers, and a few others. I find that from 1896 to 1899, the increased importation in these agricultural implements has amounted to $1,589,564. Now, Mr. Speaker, my view of that question is that it was a mistake, and I thought so at the time, of the Conservative government to reduce the duty on agricultural implements, but, the opposition was clamouring for it, and the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories were clamouring for free agricultural implements. Yet, I thought it was a mistake, and I think so still. I will ask the government, for the sake of the trade and commerce of our country, that they will look into this question, regardless of any political capital that may be made out of it. I am not desiring to make any political capital out of it. What benefit has this reduction been to the farmers? Have we had any better implements? I say, no. I say that there is no better binder made to-day, in the known world, than the Massey-Harris binder, and I say that the Smith's Falls manufacturing establishment makes nearly as good a binder, and some farmers like it better than any other, while some farmers like the Massey-Harris binder better. But, we have the very best binders that are made in the world, manufactured in the Dominion of Canada. Have we not proof of it? Do not the Massey-Harris Company send their binders to the continent of Europe where they compete with the world, and sell them in competition with every other firm? Have we got them any cheaper in Canada? We have not got them any cheaper, but we pay more for them to-day than we did five years ago. What is the result? Go through the province of Ontario, on any line of railway, or drive through the country with a horse and rig, and at every village, every town, every station, you come to, you will see, in beautiful letters, painted brilliantly so that everybody can see, the Deering Manufacturing Company, the McCormick Manufacturing Company. I was told by a gentleman in Prescott, that, last year, there were 120 of the Deering and McCormick binders put into the section of the country north of Prescott. If we are not benefiting the farmer, if the farmer is not getting any cheaper machines, if we are not getting them for any less money, I say, put on the tariff and prevent them from being imported. Would it not be a pleasant sight to see the Frost & Wood Company of Smith's Falls, extend their manufacturing establishment so as to cover half the village, employ more men, and make more machines, because they turn out as good a machine as can be made anywhere? I know what I am talking about. I have run a mowing machine made in Smith's Falls, by the Frost & Wood Company, a five-foot cut tubular frame mower. I have run that mower for four years, and I have never had to tighten a nut, it is made so perfectly and carefully with roller bearings. I have a pair of nice carriage horses, weighing less than 1,100 pounds, and I would like to make a wager that with that machine, I can cut ten acres every day of the stoutest hay that grows anywhere in Canada. Having a machine made in our own country, that will accomplish the work and do it perfectly, I say let us make these machines in our country, give employment to the artisans and workmen of our own country, build up the trade and commerce of our own country, by having the money paid for our machine kept in Canada, and while these men are manufacturing these machines, we farmers can raise the pork, potatoes and beans to feed them. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think some hon. gentlemen opposite are misleading themselves, or trying to mislead themselves, when they rise in this House to make arguments to show how the taxation has been reduced. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), in his budget speech calculated the reduction in taxation at 2.02 per cent, and the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd), thought the Minister did not calculate fairly when he spread the taxation all over the free corn which passes through Canada in transit. There is one way that we farmers can judge whether we are paying increased taxation or not, and it is the true test. There is no man in this country so ignorant that he does not know that what he is called upon to contribute to the revenues of the country, is to be found in what he pays for the articles he consumes. There are none so acute as the farmers on that score. The farmers' wives, the ladies know whether they are paying more for their cotton and woollen goods and for their sugar and tea. The farmers know whether they are paying more or less for agricultural implements than they paid before. You may talk about your reduced taxation as much as you like, but when you appeal to the people you will have to show them that they are paying less for the articles they use before you can satisfy them, that there is a reduction in taxation. I submit sir, that this government cannot show the farmers any such thing. The government did make a little reduction in coal oil, but can they make the people believe that they are getting coal oil cheaper, when as a fact they are paying more for it than they paid when the Conservatives were in power. Sir Richard Cartwright claimed the support of the people for the Liberals, on the ground that if they were returned to power, coal oil would be 8 cents a gallon. That is not so. This government put binder twine on the free list, and that was a mistake. It would have been better had they doubled the duty on binder twine and preserve our own manufactures of twine, and if they had done that, then to-day, our binder twine would be cheaper than it is.

There are some other matters I wish to refer to, but I must hasten on. I suppose I must say something about preferential trade. I agree with the hon. gentleman from West Huron (Mr. Holmes), in the opinion that the preferential tariff does neither good nor harm. I am not very much opposed to it. I think it is like patent medicine, vermifuge and Pink Pills, you may take one pill or swallow the whole box and they will neither do you much good nor harm. That is my opinion of the preferential tariff from a farmer's standpoint. You can make it 12½ per cent, or 25 per cent, or 33 per cent, or 100 per cent if you like, and I do not think it will make very much difference. The government may have found it convenient to establish this preferential tariff. But what benefit has it been to Great Britain. Has it increased our imports from Great Britain? I will not trouble the House with figures of the amount of importations, but I will only give the percentage to show the effect that the preferential tariff has had on Great Britain. The increase of total imports to Canada for home consumption, from Great Britain, during the three years from 1896 to 1899, is 12½ per cent, the increase from the United States, is 50 per cent, from France, 28 per cent, from Germany, 24 per cent, from Spain, 48 per cent, from Portugal, 30 per cent, from Italy, 52 per cent, from Holland, 67 per cent, from Belgium, 151 per cent, and from South America, 107 per cent. So that in all these countries the increased imports to Canada have been very much greater—doubled in many instances and in some instances ten-fold greater—than in the case of Great Britain. Has the preference increased our importations from Great Britain? It has not. Our importations from Great Britain have not increased in proportion to the increase from other countries with reference to which there was no preference, and consequently it has not benefited the people of Great Britain. And how has the preferential tariff benefited Canada? I put the question to some hon. gentlemen who may speak after me. If the preferential tariff of 1897 and 1899 was the great success that the Liberals claimed for it, I would like to ask the government why they found it necessary to increase that preference from 25 to 33½ per cent? Have they been obliged to do it in order to carry out the threat made by some gentlemen in the cabinet—I charge this not on the Premier, but more particularly on the Minister of Trade and Commerce, (Sir Richard Cartwright)—have they increased the preference for the purpose of carrying out his threats that the Liberals would destroy the industries of Canada? There is another feature of this, which I do not think is at all fair. The Liberals assured the manufacturers that when the 25 per cent preference came into force, that would be the limit of it. But, they have increased the preference still further, and let me ask what is to be the finality? What are the manufacturers of Canada to understand? Now, Sir, as regards preferential trade itself, I am strongly in favour of Canada having preferential trade with Great Britain, and I believe that nothing would confer greater benefit on Canada to-day than would be a wise and prudent system of preferential trade between the two countries. We cannot complain that we are paying too much for what we are buying, but our great need is to find a market for our products, and that can only be found in a country where they are greater consumers than they are producers. What we want is a market for our natural products, and when we get that to the full extent we will add largely to the prosperity of Canada.

I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), is not present, because I wish to speak of a matter personal to him. I approach this subject with a feeling of timidity and with the greatest caution. I wish not to say a word that could be construed in any way as if I were endeavouring to introduce into this House what has been called a race or a religious cry. Permit me to say, Sir, that there is no man in this parliament who holds broader and wider views than I do, on the great questions that are agitating this country amongst Christian denominations. No man dare charge me, that I have not the same respect for the right hon. gentleman who leads this government because he is a Frenchman and a Catholic, as I would have did he belong to another race and another religion. It is something that never crosses my mind. I care not how he worships or what particular church he goes to on Sunday, when he is ready to join me on Monday morning with the right hand of fellowship extended, working shoulder to shoulder with me with the same aspirations to advance the interests of this grand Dominion of ours, and to make here happy homes for ourselves, our wives and our children. There seems to be some peculiarity about the talk of raising race and religious cries in this parliament. If gentlemen on the other side of the House introduce race and religious cry, and we on this side refer to it ever so cautiously, or make any defence whatever, then we are charged with raising these unfortunate issues. I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to refer to an attack that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), made upon the Orange order, of which I am a humble member. The hon. gentleman without any provocation went out of his way to make an accusation which might better never have been made on the floor of this House. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), in his speech on the budget, said:

I remember when an Orange demonstration was engineered in the city of Montreal for the express purpose of setting religion against religion and race against race if it were to the detriment of the Liberal party. What did these men care then, or what do they care now if the streets of Montreal were to run red provided always that they scored a point against a Liberal administration.

What does that mean, Mr. Speaker? That we Orangemen would be guilty of murder or massacre, of dipping our hands in innocent blood, for party purposes. I say that a more slanderous, false accusation was never uttered by mortal man in this House.

or out of it. It is a shame for a minister of the Crown to utter such a false statement against a body of the most honourable and loyal men in this Dominion of Canada. I make the statement not insisting to recall events of the past that there was no occasion that the Orangemen provoked in any way hostilities of any kind. Deplorable events occurred to which he may have referred, but history records undoubtedly that they were not provoked by any member of the Orange association. Sir, I wish the hon. gentleman were in his seat, for I fling that statement back in his face with utter scorn and contempt. Then, the same hon. gentleman made another statement which seems to me to be of a very humorous character. He said :

The old flag at long last cleansed and purified, has been rescued in fair fight from the hands of the miscreants who traded on it, and degraded it, and the old flag now waves better and purer and loftier than ever.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it comes with ill grace from the hon. gentleman to style the Conservative party miscreants who degraded the old flag. No man in this House stands on more slippery ground in that respect than the hon. gentleman himself—not even the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). For an hon. gentleman who advocated commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and openly and avowedly refused to grant the same terms to Great Britain, but was willing to discriminate against her, to say that the Conservative party, so far as the British flag is concerned, are miscreants, and that the flag had been rescued from their hands, and had been purified, and now waves better and loftier than ever, strikes me as very humorous. The hon. gentleman was very much mistaken; and I think the Premier himself was a little mistaken in his reference to the Orange Society, though his expression was a more reverent one. If my memory serves me, the Premier said on one occasion that he thanked God that there were no Orangemen in the Liberal party; but I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there are Orangemen in the Liberal party. The Orange Society is not a political society.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BELL (Addington). I repeat it, the Orange Society is not a political society, and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to cite an instance in which it has traded in politics. I can tell them that there are Orange Liberals who would do as much credit to this House as any of the hon. members on the other side.

Mr. WOOD. Ninety-nine out of a hundred of them are Conservatives.

Mr. BELL (Addington). Further than that, there are Orangemen in the employ of the government. One of the organizers employed by hon. gentlemen opposite is an Orangeman, and he is the man who furnished the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) with information when he attacked the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney). So hon. gentlemen opposite should be guarded when they speak disrespectfully of the Orangemen of this country, for they might be speaking of their own friends.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few general remarks. When the present government came into power in 1896, what Canada needed was a clear-sighted, honest strong-minded government, capable of grappling with Imperial problems. When this government came into power, we were face to face with vital questions affecting the future of Canada. There were three great questions in particular: First, the Pacific cable; second, the fast Atlantic line; third, better trade relations with the mother country. On these great questions the Conservative party had a policy, and there was every reason to believe that they would have achieved success in them in the near future. What has this government done to bring about a successful determination of these issues? What has been done about the Pacific cable? A few days ago there was a probability of a rival line taking the place of the government Pacific cable. What have they done regarding the fast Atlantic service? It would have been a great achievement for this Dominion to establish that line to carry the products of this country to the markets of Great Britain; but, so far as I know, nothing has been accomplished by this government to secure that great want, which the Conservative party nearly accomplished, a contract having been entered into and being ready for signature before they left office. I understand that this matter was left in the hands of the minister without portfolio, (Mr. Dobell). This is the hon. gentleman who has had new light, who stated that once he was blind, but now he could see. Probably he will be able to tell us when we may expect the first fast Atlantic steamer to set out laden with the products of Canada for the old country market. Following that came the discovery of the gold fields of the Yukon. What an opportunity was here afforded to add to the wealth of the Dominion, had we had a government strong-minded and honest, and capable of grasping these great questions. The gold fields were ready, but the government has nothing to show but an absurd tramway scheme, a crop of scandals, and a royalty policy calculated to starve out the best part of the mining interest. I would like to be in a position to congratulate the country on having had a clear-witted, strong-minded, honest government, equal to the occasion, but instead I have to confess that Canada has been obliged to pay a large price for the mismanagement of the Yukon country by the government.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to another matter—the subject of prohibition. Prohibition is not, by any means, a dead issue. The temperance people of the Dominion are sincere; and however fast and loose the Liberal party or the Conservative party may play with this question, it is bound to continue a live issue. I am not going to make any argument against the Liberal party. I would not be prepared to vote want of confidence in the government for not having introduced a prohibitory measure, but I would be prepared to vote want of confidence in them for the manner in which they have fooled the temperance people by giving these people to understand that if they would support the Liberal party, that party, when in office, would carry out the voice of the people. Instead, however, of carrying out that mandate, they now tell the temperance people of the Dominion that they may go to—Halifax. I have but one remark to make on this point. If the government will themselves introduce a measure and not have a measure introduced by some supporter of theirs on a back seat, or a motion on which a Bill may be framed, and then have another gentleman get up and move an amendment, and then have a third hon. gentleman supporting the government move an amendment to the amendment—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is out of order in discussing prohibition now, for two reasons. First, because that subject is on the Order paper, and in the second place, he is referring to a previous debate.

Mr. BELL (Addington). There is no one who will so willingly and readily bow to the decision of the Chair—

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). The question of prohibition has been constantly referred to throughout this budget debate.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is quite different now because the question is on the Order paper.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Since how long?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Since the day before yesterday.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It has been on the Order paper for a month, perhaps two months, and yet the subject has been constantly referred to throughout this debate, because it is a part of the general policy of the government. It is generally understood that in the budget debate all matters concerning the general policy of the government are open to discussion; and this question of prohibition has been referred to in every speech made up to the present during this discussion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question before the Chair, is the question of preferential trade, and in that connection the tariff question has been also discussed, but as to the question of prohibition that is not in order.

Mr. BELL (Addington).

Mr. MONTAGUE. This is not a question of preferential trade at all, but the budget. Do I understand you to rule, Sir, that we are limited to the question of preferential trade, and that we cannot discuss the question of prohibition which has been discussed up to the present moment in every speech made on the budget.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The amendment before the House is one dealing with preferential trade, but Mr. Speaker has allowed the discussion to be made on the whole budget. My hon. friend from Addington (Mr. Bell), however, is referring to an amendment and a sub-amendment which were moved and discussed a few days ago.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The right hon. gentleman knows that it has always been our practice to discuss the general policy of the government in the budget debate.

The PRIME MINISTER. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The right hon. gentleman will agree with me that the subject of prohibition has been constantly referred to in all the speeches throughout this debate.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Let me call the attention of the hon. member to page 549 of Sir John Bourinot's work, 2nd edition:

When an amendment has been moved to the question for the Speaker to leave the Chair, discussions should be properly confined to its subject matter.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That has never been carried out in this House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is no doubt about that, but I am calling the attention of the hon. member for Addington to the fact that he was referring to a previous debate and to amendments which were discussed the other day, and such reference is certainly out of order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. May I ask, Sir, whether your ruling is that the debate is henceforth to be strictly confined within the rule you have quoted and that we are not to discuss the general policy of the government?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. With the permission of the House, other subjects have been discussed on this amendment, but I now call the attention of the hon. member for Addington to the fact that he was referring distinctly to a debate which occurred some days ago and was certainly out of order.

Mr. BELL (Addington). I readily bow to your decision, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I would ask your permission to conclude the brief explanation I was about to make.

If the government should at any time feel like introducing a prohibitory measure, it will have my hearty support, and it will also have my hearty support in opposing any motion of want of confidence that might be brought on account of such measure. There is another subject to which I shall briefly refer, and that is the sending of the contingent to South Africa. A great deal has been said about this on the floor of this House, and a great deal that I regret. As an individual humble member of this House, I would have preferred that that motion had gone through without a word of debate, and that we would have shown that we were all united in the strong British sentiment to assist the mother country in her hour of trial. We did expect our First Minister to be the first in the ranks when the call was sounded; we did expect that the government would have shown no hesitancy; we did expect that there would have been no watching or waiting or weighing by the government when the leader of the opposition, and every member on this side, gave the right hon. gentleman their full assurance that they were ready at all times to support any measure which his government would propose for the sending out of any number of contingents, and the mobilizing of thousands more and having them in readiness to be sent out. There was no limitation put on this side to the action of the government in this respect. But I would like to ask one question. I would like to ask this House through you, Mr. Speaker, what would have been the position of the Liberal party if the Conservative party had been in power when the question of sending out the contingent to South Africa came up. I leave that question in this House to seek its own answer; but having had the assurance of the First Minister and hon. gentlemen on that side that they are loyal, we accept their professions of loyalty. But I do think that if the leader of this government is as loyal as his most beautiful patriotic speech would portray, he should put his heel on the neck of the Minister of Public Works. I am not going to charge any man with disloyalty or say a word that will grate harshly on the ears of hon. gentlemen, but I say that the Minister of Public Works, in my humble opinion, should be called down for his treasonable utterances.

Now, I have just another point upon which I wish to say a few words in conclusion—the old subject of loyalty. We have one reason for being glad that the Liberal party came into power. Since coming into power, they have announced their warm affection for Britain and their warm and loyal attachment to the Queen. It will not now be considered a crime for a Conservative to be loyal. During my campaign it was natural for me to close my speech with a few words of praise for Her Majesty. I remember that exception was taken to that, and I was called almost a criminal for being loyal. Now, since both parties are loyal, it will not be a crime for any Conservative, or Reformer either, to declare his loyalty. No matter what little differences we may have about sending out contingents; no matter what differences we may have regarding the trade policy of the government; no matter what differences we may have on any of the great questions in public affairs, let us be loyal, let us be true to ourselves and to each other. In this connection let me say that I think our constitution is much better than that of the United States. In their political discussions throughout the country and on the floor of Congress, they have the two great parties dividing them, the Democratic and the Republican. But, in the Dominion of Canada, while we have the two great parties, while each, in campaign meetings, can cheer for his own side, we can unite in cheering for Her Majesty. We may differ as Liberal-Conservatives and Liberals, but we can join heartily in singing the grand old national anthem, 'God Save the Queen.' And so I say, be we French Canadians, be we Scotch Canadians, Irish Canadians, Dutch Canadians—let us respect our nationality, the nationality of our forefathers, who gave us birth and inspiration, but let us feel that we are one Canadian people, let us teach our children to be loyal, true to each other as British Canadians, and let us unite to build up Canada as an integral part of the British Empire. Let us always prove ourselves worthy of the protection of the strong arm of Great Britain, let us cherish the Union Jack as the emblem of the connection of Great Britain and her colonies, believing that

The flag that's waved a thousand years,
Is good enough for me.

May that grand old flag float over every citadel and on every flagstaff from Cape Breton to Victoria, from Cape Town to Pretoria, untarnished and unstained, without a spot or a blemish, without a star or a stripe, from generation to generation, till time shall be no more.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). I am not sure that I shall be able to proceed, so deeply am I affected by the closing of the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Bell). It being really the case, as he has conclusively shown, that the Liberals having attained power all parties in Canada are loyal, I submit that there will hereafter be not so much need for such utterance as that with which the hon. gentleman closed his address. I feel sure that the hon. gentleman would not admit that it was necessary to make such remarks to members of the Conservative party, and now that we are, as he said, all the same with respect to loyalty, there are none who need to be urged to drink in the noble principles of which he spoke. The hon. gentleman did not charge disloyalty against the Liberals, but, back of all that he said was an indication that he would like to say that the Liberals had not been loyal once upon a time, but they had become loyal. He said that he was almost going to be killed because he was loyal. That could not have been attempted except by disloyal men, and I am sure he would say that none of his political friends are disloyal. There is more than one way of hinting at a thing that an hon. member does not want to state openly.

There are just one or two points in the hon. member's address to which I wish to call attention. I may have misunderstood him, and if so, I wish to be corrected. I understood him to say that it was a mistake to lower the duty on agricultural implements; that we could get better and cheaper implements if the duty had not been reduced. I also understood him to say that the amount of the preferential tariff made no difference, and if the whole of it was taken off it would be all the same. Now, let us see where we stand. First, as to the agricultural implements. If they can be got cheaper and better with a duty of 35 per cent than with a duty of 20 per cent, I would like the hon. gentleman to show where the 15 per cent reduction would go.

Mr. WILSON. Oh.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). If the hon. member for Lennox (Mr. Wilson) has an explanation, I would like to hear him give it.

Mr. WILSON. Frost can explain it.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). And that is the proof. All the eulogy pronounced on the hon. gentleman (Mr. Frost) is pronounced on a man who says that 20 per cent is enough.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, he does not.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). He does say so; and, more than that, he says that his factory never was so busy as it is now—that they cannot fill their orders. Now, if taking off 15 per cent from the duty has had the effect of bringing worse implements here, what does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) say to the fact that, with that reduction, this great factory cannot overtake its orders? I come to the second point—I am glad I did not misunderstand him—that the preferential duty made no difference if the whole of it was off. What does that mean? That is to say, that if our average duty of 18 per cent against Great Britain were wholly taken off, it would make no difference, it would not help us any, there is no good in it. Now, I suppose we could follow that with every country in the world, because if it makes no difference with our trade relations with Great Britain it cannot with the United States. I am glad I have got a convert at last to my radical views; for here is a gentleman who says: If you take the whole of it off it won't make any difference, we will be better off. The member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) and myself have a splendid accession this afternoon to our radical views. With his free trade notions, and with his loyalty, he will make a follower of which any leader in Canada might well be proud. It just shows the nonsense that is being spoken. Now, we are agreed upon that, that is to say that in the trade of a country 10 per cent of a reduction in the tariff paid by the people makes no difference. Follow it up in any business you like. Is there an hon. gentleman in this House or out of it, or anywhere outside of the insane asylum, who will say that a reduction of 10 per cent in his expenditure makes no difference? For, after all, governments do not differ from individuals. The government who saves 10 per cent from the tariff it imposes is exactly in the same position as an individual that saves 10 per cent on what he purchases; and when hon. gentlemen opposite say that it makes no difference, why, they are treating not only their own friends but all the people as if they did not really understand that two and two make four. It may not be enough, Mr. Speaker; the reduction of 10 per cent may not be as large as it ought to be; but in the name of common sense let us say it is 10 per cent when we are all agreed upon it, and then let us go on to discuss it. The calculation is as plain as day, any school boy can make it, that a reduction of 10 per cent on the tariff imposed now as compared with the tariff that was in force in 1896, amounts to $3,000,000 a year more. Does any hon. gentleman say that that is no reduction? Now, you see we may be floating on oceans of words without coming down to a given principle.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough).

I said a few moments ago that it is a legitimate argument for every member in this House to make whether 10 per cent is enough. I have no hesitation in saying that I would be ready for a greater reduction. I believe that we should go further. But very pertinently I ask this question of my Conservative friends: Are they ready to go further? Is there a man among them who will say we have not gone far enough in the interests of the people? He dare not do it. Now, we have cleared the ground away so far as that is concerned. First of all, the present tariff differs by 10 per cent from the old tariff, and let us discuss it from that ground. There may be a difference of opinion whether that 10 per cent, in its relation to the trade of the country, and when taken by individual items, is as beneficial to the people of this country as it ought to be. That is a matter we may fairly discuss. So we have the first standing ground as between the two parties. The party opposite by their tariff would put on 10 per cent more, and we have reduced it by 10 per cent. Secondly, we have the further position that the party opposite would not dare to go any further. Now, let every man in Canada that wants to pay as small a rate of taxation as possible never forget that he has to deal with a party that has made a reduction of 10 per cent on one side, and with another party that says that is wrong. If they are honest they will say that, and certainly they will give no pledge that they would not go back to where they stood in 1896. There is one point on which we are all agreed. These preliminaries are helpful in clearing away the deck preparatory to joining issue. The second point in which we are all agreed is that no one on the opposite side, except in a faint breath, by a kind of innuendo, will state that the country is not marvellously prosperous. Here are two things in regard to which we stand on common ground. There are only two or three hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side who hint that we are not as well off as we might be, they hint it but no more. I would like any hon. gentleman opposite to go before the farmer, the manufacturers, the lumbermen, or for that matter any class of wage-earners in Canada, and tell them that we are not as well off as we were. They cannot do it. They try to make it appear it would be otherwise, if it were otherwise; they try to make it appear that if they were in power it would be so and so, but now that they are not in, it is so and so, and they try to confuse the people in that matter:

A Tory politician asked a farmer if he knew where was the vile Grit evidence to prove good times is true.

The germs of disputative art had never reached his ear;

He tightly clasped his well-filled pipe, and proudly answered, Here.

That argument is worth all the speeches that ever were delivered in the House of Commons or outside. You may carry under one arm one set of speeches that have been made in this House, and under the other arm another set of speeches, you may read them from beginning to end to any one who will listen to you, and still he will say: I feel it about me, I am better off, I know I am. He will just put his hand in his pocket, and where he used to have to borrow he now says, I can pay as I go.

Let no one think that I am claiming credit to the government for all our prosperity, by no means. I am not going to make a statement that the government is entitled to all the credit. If I belonged to the Conservative party and my party were in, I would do it. Why, Sir, if the Conservative party were in power in Canada you would hear every hon. gentleman who got up to speak claiming for the government the whole credit for the condition of things that exists to-day. Dear me, how I have been wearied ad nauseam listening to hon. gentlemen opposite who said: We did it, we did it. Why there was not an hon. gentleman opposite but on every occasion insisted that what brought about good crops, what looked like a busy hive of industry, was the work of the government. If the price of an article was raised 5 cents they claimed it was due to the national policy. Now, we know just where we stand. The Liberals have reduced the tariff 10 per cent, and we have the most prosperous times we ever had in Canada. We now can very easily approach the discussion as it ought to be approached, namely, within the last four years, what have the Liberal party done to gain, and secure and keep the confidence of the people of Canada, and as against that, who have the people of Canada that they can call upon to conduct the affairs of the country? The whole thing comes down to that. I am not careful whether we imported so many dollars worth of a particular article or not. I am not going to anxiously inquire whether we sold, this year, so many steers more than in another year. Why? Because the sum total is what proves it. You may prove that the country is in a splendid state of prosperity, by naming certain articles that we exported a much larger quantity of; and you may prove from the same returns that business is depressed, and that the country is going to the dogs—because we have not done as much business in another particular line. That is nothing at all. It is the sum total that we have to deal with, for, Mr. Speaker, the business of two countries does not differ in one iota from the business of two individuals in any one country. Therefore, we are in a position, simply, of being able to say, that, so far as Canada is concerned, it is prosperous. I leave the matter altogether as to how this prosperity was produced, to the common sense principle, that honest, economical, vigorous government, dealing with the forces of nature that seem never to have been put forth when the Conservatives were in power has produced this result.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was referring to some remarks made by the hon. member for Addington. It will be noticed that whatever was said by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) was not answered on the other side. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), gave one answer to it, that he thought sufficient, and that answer was that the hon. member for North Wellington was raking up old things done by men, some of whom were dead. Well, I have yet to learn that you can disassociate acts of the past from the present, either of an individual or of a party, so as to make them such as ought not to be referred to. Most of us would like that rule applied to our individual selves, the adoption of a statute of limitations by which you could only refer to matters that had taken place in the later present. Our conduct will be regulated in that way, and we would appear to be exceedingly decent as matters go, without respect to the past. The Liberal party must bear with the mistakes of their past, as the Conservative party must bear with theirs, and any issue raised between the two parties that can be said to indicate the character of both parties seeking the suffrages of the country for its government, must, of necessity, be raised in order that you can intelligently form your opinion, from the past, as well as the present, as to the ability of either party. But, the hon. member for Addington had another answer to it, and he said that the fact that the hon. member for North Wellington had not done all that he spoke about in connection with superannuation, was an answer. I was rather surprised that the hon. member for Addington forgot the Act that was passed in 1898, relating to superannuation. That very Act has changed the whole character of superannuation in this country. Previously superannuation was given by the country, a small amount being taken off each party. Now, the superannuation is of such a character that all those who come under it, and that will be all, who are hereafter appointed, as well as a large number who have taken advantage of it in preference to the old system, will pay into the public treasury, every dollar they receive, so that, when the present beneficiaries under the old order of things have all died, this country will have an excellent system by which it will not need to pay one dollar to the parties who receive the money, who in the place of receiving a gratuity until they die, will have the sum total of the amount they paid in, with interest added, and they will receive this for the benefit of themselves and their families. The old order of things only looked upon superannuation as something to keep a man alive after he left office. The new order of things, looks to the man as a living being with his wife and family. The amount that the hon. member referred to as being paid in excess of that which was paid previously, is too large. It is less than he stated it to be. The hon. gentleman must have forgotten the facts, or he ought not to have forgotten the facts, because he posed as one of the fairest men I have ever heard. A better character for fairness he could not have given himself, but it was only sustained by his own evidence. He should have mentioned that the added amount which was paid, was counterbalanced five times over by the lesser number of people employed by this new superannuation system. I think the Act that has been passed, will eventually be one of the best Acts passed by the present government, and will lessen the payment that the people of this Dominion have to make to their public servants. The hon. gentleman was not fair in saying, that the policy of the Liberal party, as laid down in the Ottawa platform in 1898, was a policy of free trade. It was not a policy of free trade. Our Conservative friends everywhere state that the Liberals are in favour of free trade. Personally, I am in favour of free trade, but the resolution adopted at the Ottawa conference did not say anything about free trade. Let us hear what it said :

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service. . . . That to this end the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government.

That was not a pronouncement for free trade, but it was a pronouncement for a freer trade than existed before. Let the hon. gentlemen opposite criticise that if they like, but, for goodness sake, let their criticisms be confined to the actual facts. Here is what the Premier said at the Ottawa conference :

I say that the policy should be a policy such as they have in England. But I am sorry to say that the circumstances of the country cannot admit at present of that policy in its entirety.

That was the policy of the Premier laid down.

But I propose to you from this day henceforward, it shall be the goal to which we aspire. I propose to you from this day, although we cannot adopt the policy itself, to adopt the principles which regulate it.

How can any sensible man say that this language means free trade? It was a pronouncement in favour of eliminating from our fiscal policy as quickly as possible the elements of protection to be found in it; nothing more or nothing less. In view of that, it is right that gentlemen opposite should say in this House and in the country that the Liberals, in their Ottawa platform, declared for free trade. Let us have the facts, and I ask for nothing more. I was amazed at a statement made by gentlemen opposite, to the effect that an article that was made free of duty became dearer in price than it was when it bore a duty. Do they honestly think that an article would be cheaper if there was a duty on it, than it would be if it was free of duty? Neither this government nor any government in the world can regulate the price of an article. For example, oranges are dearer in England than in the United States, but England has free trade and the United States has protection. These oranges are grown in the United States, and the freight and other charges is saved on them. But, would it be fair to say that because they are cheaper in the United States than in England that, therefore, protection is better than free trade? No gentleman on the other side would argue that, although they are practically arguing the very same thing every day in this House.

Now, Sir, when the Liberal government came into power in 1896, they found they had to meet three annual deficits of the Conservative government, in the three preceding years. They succeeded an administration that had been in open, shameful and avowed rebellion; an administration that cared so little for their duties as statesmen as to subject themselves to the laughter of their opponents, while they caused pain and heartburnings to their supporters. When the Liberals came into power, they found want of confidence everywhere; they found depression in trade and they found a state of disorder in race and religious circles such as never existed in this country before, in reference to the education question. That was the legacy left by the Conservatives to the Liberal government, and the Liberals became the residuary legatees of all that. It devolved upon the Liberals to meet the condition of affairs manfully, and how well they succeeded, all who are not politically prejudiced, recognized. I do not say that the Conservative government should be held responsible for their deficits, or for the depression in trade, but I merely point out now that such was the condition of things when the Liberals attained power. For four years the Liberals have carried on the affairs of this country, during which it has prospered, and as an excuse for this prosperity, the Conservatives tell us that it is because we have continued the same old policy. If we have continued the same policy as the Conservatives had, it is rather peculiar that we are not receiving their support. If it is the same policy, the protest made by the manufacturers the other day is a very strange thing. If it is the same policy, it is a remarkable thing that our trade is so much greater than it was when the Conservatives had that policy. Surely like should produce like. Let me ask gentlemen opposite this: If it is the same policy, will any one of these gentlemen say that should such an unlikely thing as a change of government occur, that they will retain the existing tariff in its entirety. There is nothing like testing people. If it is the same policy, why do the Conservatives tell the manufacturers that they are in danger? I was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman from Addington (Mr. Bell) say that when the preferential tariff was made 25 per cent, the manufacturers were told that no further reduction would be made. He must have forgotten the statement made by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), when he told the manufacturers that that was not the end of it, and that they had better prepare for further reductions. The statement was never made that there would be no further preference granted, nor is the statement made now that this is going to be the end of the reduction. I am within the judgment of the House when I say that gentlemen opposite told us when they were in power that the following were sure signs of the prosperous state of the country. The deposits in the savings banks—how we used to hear about these! The deposits in the chartered banks, the advance in life insurance, the public credit of England—I will not weary the House by giving the statistics; but in all these there has been a larger increase in the last four years than there ever was before in the history of this country. When the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) rose in his place and said it was unfair to contrast the last three years of Conservative rule with the three years under the present government, because times with them were hard, I was reminded of what a distinguished French statesman once said—not as a question of morals, but in view of what always happened—that a lie was always a blunder. Was it true? Why, I have here under my hand the precious literature that was sent out to the country in tons during the last elections. For example, here is an open letter which the Conservatives used all over the Dominion; and you will be surprised to learn that in 1896, eighteen years after the time the Mackenzie government went out of power, the fearful spectre of the bad times under Mackenzie was held up as a warning to the people not to allow the Liberals to come in. Listen to the reasons given as a sort of apology for the Conservative party voting as they did upon the Manitoba school question:

As good Conservatives we could not take the tremendous responsibility in reference to the business interests of Canada. Had we defeated the government, who would have succeeded to power? We remembered what happened in 1874-79—how trade diminished, how the revenues went down and the taxes went up, how the debt rolled up to the figure of $8,000,000 annually, and deficits were the order of each year; how a hundred thousand farmers petitioned for protection, the artisans walked the streets looking for work, and general depression existed in all branches of business.

Eighteen years afterwards the people of this country were called upon to look back to a similar state of things. Never mind what the Conservatives had done; never mind if they voted for the Remedial Bill against their will. The fearful terror was that the Liberals would get into power and bring back the condition of things that existed in 1878. Is it well for the ex-Minister of Finance to say now, it was mean to make the comparison? The Conservative party after eighteen years could take advantage of what was not true, that the Mackenzie government and the Liberal party were responsible for the depression that then existed. I am not using the argument; I am simply pointing out their position when any man uses their own pet argument against themselves. I remember that in the mining towns of Pictou from 1878 downwards, there was not an election held in which those poor miners were not told: 'If you vote for the Liberals, you will have the same dark days that existed at the time Mackenzie was in power'; and those poor fellows, believing that those men were speaking the truth, felt that their bread and butter were at stake ; yet what happened ? In the county of Pictou there has been more trade in the last four years than ever existed there in any four years previous. I am not going to say that that is a legitimate argument now because it was used then ; but I say that it is hardly fair for the Conservatives, after they lived and moved and had their being on the dark days of the Mackenzie government, now to squirm and squeal because the same argument is applied to themselves. For example, take my own province which I know most about, and I make the statement here and now that never in the history of Nova Scotia was agriculture carried on so largely, so intelligently and so successfully as it has been during the last three years. I say the trade in lumber has never been more successful in the province of Nova Scotia. I say the fisheries have been fair, though they are outside of government action altogether. I say that the coal business has been in a splendid condition. Let us see what they said about coal. No. 5 begins in this way :

Consumption of coal an evidence of Canadian progress. Coal furnishes the great motive power for the trade, commerce and manufactures of the country. The increased consumption of this commodity furnishes convincing testimony of Canada's great progress under Liberal-Conservative administration since 1878.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And the coal duty.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Not at all. The duty is not exactly what it was ; it is a little better. But all I have to say is that if it is the same, the trade in coal in the province of Nova Scotia has been greater by 20 per cent than it ever was previously. If in 1896 the fact that the consumption of coal had increased was a convincing argument that the Conservative policy was the right one, the argument that it is now at least 20 per cent more used is a great deal better argument. Then, we were told that if the Liberals got into power the manufacturers of Nova Scotia would all end their days. The iron business in the county of Pictou was, I am bound to say, more heavily struck at than any other industry. The legislation with regard to iron was a very important matter, and I remember that we were told there : ' If you allow the Liberals to come in, these works will close.' In 1896 the change came, and what happened ? The tariff was brought down. Of course, the windows were not closed just then, but what happened ? At once, when the tariff was brought down, they said to the men : ' We cannot go on,' and a man who had got $1.10 a day had a reduction of 10 cents at once. They said : ' You must suffer, because the Liberals have come in.' Now, what has happened since ? Within the last eighteen months not only has the 10 cents which was taken away been restored, but 10 cents more has been added to the pay of the men ; that is to say, a man who during the splendid days of the Conservative policy received $1.10 per day, now gets $1.20. But that is not all ; there is more money being invested now in the iron business in Nova Scotia, fifteen or twenty times more, than was ever in the business before. In Cape Breton they are investing from fifteen to twenty million dollars.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough).

Mr. WALLACE. Is that on account of free trade or protection ?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). All I say is that the duties on iron were largely struck, and still the industry is going on.

Mr. WALLACE. And the bounty substituted.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The bounty was in existence before, and given by the late government.

Mr. WALLACE. It is increased.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). It is less, because there is a sliding scale by which it will ultimately disappear altogether, whereas there was no sliding scale before.

Mr. WALLACE. Under the Conservative-rule it was only for a term of years.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Under the Liberal rule it is for the same term by a sliding scale until at last there will be nothing left.

Mr. WALLACE. For the first five years there was no sliding scale.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Decidedly, and they changed it afterwards, but what I am answering is the charge made before the last election, and I am showing that the Conservative party are not to be trusted, because they were either too ignorant to understand us or too dishonest when they said that if the Liberals came into power these things should happen. Let hon. gentlemen opposite take either horn of the dilemma they choose, the people will hold them responsible.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I will have to speak for a moment about the leader of the opposition in his absence, but I know very well that he will understand that I only do so because the necessities of the case make it absolutely necessary that I should. I have a charge to make against him, which I make here on my responsibility as a member of parliament, and that is that he is guilty of two acts which, in a court of law, would be considered murder. That is a pretty hard statement to make.

Mr. TAYLOR. That will not hurt him much.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). No, because he is not amenable to the courts. In the first place, I charge him with having murdered Imperial federation. That scheme lies dead—killed in the House of its own friends. Where is the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), the father of that noble bantling? Where is the father who nursed it so kindly, who sung sweet lullabys as it rested in his arms? Where is he now? Deprived of his beloved one, killed by his leader, like Rachel he mourneth and will not be comforted. I did think that if there was one thing in the world which the Conservative party held dear it was their shibboleth that when they gave their adhesion to anything at all they would stand by it. Sometimes I used to feel like exclaiming. How well these people stick together! But here we have the death of Imperial federation at the hands of Sir Charles Tupper.

The people are asking: Who killed Imperial federation? And they hear the reply: I, said Sir Charles. Who saw him die? And we hear the mournful response: The people of Quebec. A very clever move it was on the part of the hon. the leader of the opposition to announce the death of this infant in the city of Quebec. As he stood upon the ramparts of the ancient capital, I can hear him say: French rule, my compatriots of the French race, was at one time dominant here, but the English prevailed. I, however, am going to recompense you for the defeat of your forefathers, for I am going to kill Imperial federation here in the province of Quebec; and if that will not make up the loss you have suffered by being separated from your motherland, I know of nothing else that will. Of course the chief mourner is the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). But there are several others, and they all felt a painful sensation when they heard the bell toll over the loss of the dearest object of their life's devotion. I would suggest that this epitaph should be written, and, as my genial friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) would say, embalmed upon Hansard:

Interred beneath this common stone doth lie
Imperial federation, born to die,
To show the good for which it was designed;
It died to save Sir Charles and all his kind.

But that is not all. The second act of murder committed by the hon. the leader of the opposition was the killing of the Manitoba school question: I shall never forget the pride I felt when my distinguished countrymen rose in this House, full of years, but full as well of manly vigour, full of that fight which has characterized him all his days, and, pleading for the rights of the minority, declared that he was ready, not merely to sacrifice his time and means and all the energy of his great intellect in the cause, but was ready to die in order that justice might be done the minority in Manitoba. But what was my disappointment to find after the election of 1896, that not another word was said in its favour by the hon. gentleman in this House, and not one man among his following has been bold enough to rise and demand here that justice be done. Is not that extraordinary? When one reads, for example, of the great contests in the British House of Parliament, one finds that men, filled with the idea that right ought to be done at any cost, rose in their places year after year and pleaded for what they considered right. In the case of slavery, for twenty successive years resolutions were moved, until at last it was abolished, and truth vindicated. Is truth different here? Is that eternal truth for which a man is ready to die of such a character in this country that the one who is ready to die for it only speaks in its favour when he wants votes, and has not a word to say when he finds that speaking in its favour does not bring him votes? The hon. gentleman pledged himself at the last election to strike a blow, year after year, for the oppressed minority until justice was done them. But when one sees the inertness of the hon. gentleman and his supporters to-day, can one help thinking that after all the Manitoba school question was simply taken up by them in order to gain votes, that it was the last resource of a bankrupt party on which to maintain themselves in office. The people of this country decided against the late government upon that and other questions. On the other questions, these hon. gentlemen have insisted on their views and policy again and again, but on the Manitoba school question they are dumb as oysters. One of two things must be true. Either the question is settled, and there is no need of touching it again, or these men are afraid to touch it. If the hon. the leader of the opposition or any of his followers were manly enough to rise in parliament and say that there was no need to agitate any longer on this matter because it has settled itself, then I could understand their silence. But they have done nothing of the kind. The other day one of them put a question on the Order paper to show that the Manitoba school question was not settled. But if it is not settled, has it not got a friend in this House? Is there no man in this House brave enough to stand up and see that the minority get justice? We do not require to do this on this side, because we were opposed to agitation on that question. We believe that it has been settled. But where is the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron)? Does he not owe a duty to his constituents and race? Where is the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), who fights so bravely on other subjects. Not a word do we hear from him on this question. Was he right in voting as he did before, and was the Manitoba school question the eternal principle his hon. leader said it was? He at least can disassociate himself from his party and see that right is done. Following the noble instincts of a generous and truthful disposition, can he not stand up and vindicate his leader and plead for justice?

Is there none so poor among hon. gentlemen opposite as to do the Manitoba school question reverence? Never was such a fraud perpetrated upon honest people who believed in it, fought for it and felt that they were fighting for that which they ought to have. But what will these people say to the party who went to the country declaring that they were ready to die for it, and when they have left it so? Recalling the declaration of my good friend—and being a Nova Scotian, I can stand by him even when nobody else in the Liberal party can, for I admire him more than a little—I feel that there is the same vein and spirit in him now as there was when he said he was ready to die for the school question. The government made a mistake. Instead of sending two or three thousand men to South Africa, to put down the uprising in the Orange Free State and the Transvaal, they should have induced the leader of the opposition to go and engage in mortal combat with Oom Paul, and the thing would have been settled in five minutes; for the man who was ready to die for the school question, would readily enough give his life for the salvation of the empire. But the question is dead; only its history and its connection with that party will remain.

I notice that a new phrase has been coined by members of the opposition. They speak now, not of protection, but of 'fitting protection.' It used to be 'protection,' pure and simple; it used to be the national policy, 'national,' as showing that it was intended to extend over the whole of Canada. Now, it is 'fitting protection.' At first, I did not understand what that meant. A fitting suit for a gentleman means, one that is appropriate, not only in the style of cut, but in the colour, so that he who wears it presents a fitting appearance, because the suit fits him. I can understand things like that. But 'fitting protection,' I did not understand. So I went to the source of information. We all have to gather our information by finding out what the learned have to say. I first consulted Johnson. We have had a good many dictionaries since Johnson published his, but I do not know that, for the size of it, it has ever been very much improved upon. He gives three separate and distinct meanings to 'fitting.' The first is 'to accommodate to anything.' So, 'fitting protection,' means to accommodate protection to anything. That is to say, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) may say: We want everything done in Canada, but when I want a hand-bill, it is fitting protection that I should be allowed to get it outside. Or, an hon. member may want to get a certain article cheap, while he wants to sell the articles that he produces dear. Now, the protection that makes the article he makes dear, on account of the advance of duty, lessens the protection of the man who makes an article that he wishes to get cheap. is 'fitting protection,' because it accommodates itself to anything. Another meaning, is 'to suit one thing to another.' It is extraordinary, how appropriate that definition is. That is to say, for example, if you can suit a certain amount of money to our campaign needs, we will make a tariff that will suit you—that is suiting one thing to another. Nothing could be more appropriate. The man who invented that phrase 'fitting protection,' understood the eternal fitness of things.

Mr. McMULLEN. A genius.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). More than a genius, because he suits all sorts of people. The late President Lincoln, after he had listened for some time to a man who was explaining the beauties of a certain article, said that for people that liked that kind of thing, that was just the kind of thing. Another meaning is not only to suit one thing to another, but to suit a person with anything. It does not make any difference what you want, 'fitting protection' will suit you. It depends on the power you have, but according to that power, you will be suited with what you want. A person says: I can command so many votes. Very well, replies the Conservative party, we will suit you. Then I turned to Webster. I wished to be cosmopolitan, so I took an American as well as an English dictionary. Webster goes further back and says that the old English word from which 'fitting' is derived, originally meant a song. That is just the thing. How many airs have been used in singing of the N. P. since 1878. The N. P. was the only song. It was sung to the manufacturers, sung to the farmers, sung to the lumbermen, sung to everybody. Of course the instrument had to be changed. One man sung it to a flute, another to a jewsharp, another to a banjo, and another to a fiddle; and the wives and daughters of loyal Conservatives sat at their pianos and sang it. It was the old song of the N. P.—the N. P. has made you rich, the N. P. has made us great, the N. P. has extended our trade, the N. P. is the life of Canada. But Webster goes further. He says that 'fitting' means 'convenient,' 'meet.' It is very convenient about election times, about times when you want to get votes. It is fair that I should explain that the other word is m-e-e-t, though it was also m-e-a-t to that party. Then I went to the Imperial dictionary, and what did I find? I find that 'fitting' means 'in a state of preparedness.' That, I think, is as appropriate as the other. The other meanings are, 'to accommodate any person,' 'to prepare,' 'to put in order for,' 'to furnish things proper or necessary.' It seems to me that this last meaning in the Imperial dictionary surpasses them all. It accommodates a person with anything, it prepares him and puts him in order, and furnishes him with things proper and necessary. Did you ever know a more comprehensive meaning than that? Hon. gentlemen can well understand why the distinguished leader of the opposition wished to get a term that could be understood by the beneficiaries of protection, and in choosing 'fitting protection,' he has a phrase which can be made to suit all. It has not become so popular as I might expect, because I have only heard it twice in this House. But you know it takes people time to become acquainted with a new song. The old song was the N. P., and the words 'fitting protection' does not come in as nicely, and the letters F. P. will not, in their affection, take the place of N. P.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough).

So, the first plank in the new policy is, fitting protection. The second plank in their policy is race hatred. I am not going to dwell long upon that, perhaps enough has been said about it. But, I am bound to say that every effort—I am not going to say of the leader of the opposition or of his immediate friends—but, every effort that could be made was put forward to cause the people of Canada outside of Quebec to understand that the people in Quebec were disloyal. I admit that the people of Quebec need no apologist, but I am going to be one. All I will say is that he cannot be as good a citizen as he ought to be who will not rejoice more in the efforts to please any race in Canada than, scavenger like, to try to find out whether there is not something wrong with them. There can be only one reason for it. I speak for myself when I interpret the speech lately made by the distinguished leader of the opposition in Quebec, as necessitated by the work done previously to try to make our French fellow-citizens appear disloyal. I have no doubt he found it necessary, and his friends instructed him that he must go down and do something in the province of Quebec to counteract the bad influences of the position taken and the words spoken. I have no doubt that this is the counter-irritant to make the people of Quebec believe that he was their friend, and that he would preserve them from the millions that were going to be imposed on them through taxation by the Liberals, both in war and in peace, as part of the British Empire. This was said to frighten them in their pockets, and make them believe that they would be better off with the leader of the opposition than with the Liberals. I notice that hon. gentlemen opposite sing much more chirpy now than they did about that question. The member for Addington mentioned it to-day, of course he was instructed to do it, but he was wise enough not to follow it. Six or eight weeks ago any man that would mention that in this House would go on for an hour to prove the statement he made was correct. Have they discovered that, after all, there is intelligence in Quebec? I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the people of this country, whether Protestant or Catholic, whether English or French, are too intelligent to be misled by anything like that. Our growth has not been any more than good citizens would hope for, but sure am I that the growth of Canada since confederation has been sufficient to make the people understand the relations in which the people stand to each other in any part of this country. I believe there is a feeling in the hearts of the people that it does not make to the betterment of Canada or to the building up of the highest kind of citizenship to attempt in any way to belittle, or to give a false impression of any section of the people of this country.

The third plank in the platform, in this threefold platform, is that we must have our pound of flesh from Great Britain. We cannot give Britain anything unless we get something. We owe her nothing. We will not give them a preference for a single dime in Canada unless they give us a preference in Great Britain. The hon. member who just spoke before me spoke about our being able to supply Great Britain with food. Did he ever apply himself to study the statistics of Great Britain? Does the hon. gentleman know that it requires over 300,000,000 bushels annually to feed the people of Great Britain? Does he know that last year they only raised between 60,000,000 and 70,000,000 bushels, and that 230,000,000 or 240,000,000 bushels must be got from the outside world to support the people of Great Britain for one year? While last year we exported the largest amount of any year in the history of Canada, we sent less than 25,000,000 bushels to Great Britain. Now, the bargain that is to be made with Great Britain in making this preferential tariff is practically this: Although, in the meantime, you pay a duty upon the food you have to get from the outside world, you have a prospect before you that, whereas last year we only sent you 20,000,000 bushels, yet, some day we will send 30,000,000, and some day afterwards 40,000,000, and so on, until some day we will go up to 100,000,000 bushels. But, Great Britain all the time has to increase the price of her food supply to her artisans and workmen in order that Canada may get an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. I would think that the very mention of these statistics ought to make these people think a little about it. In all the years I have been in parliament, Mr. Speaker, I have felt that letters patent had been issued in perpetuity under the great seal to hon. gentlemen opposite to talk about Great Britain. She was under the shadow of their wings, and nobody else had any right to talk about her. They were ready by day to fight, and lie down upon the cold earth by night without food, and rise in the morning and fight again for Great Britain. No sacrifice was too great for them, they were the people. Did it ever occur to these gentlemen what we owe to Great Britain? Did it ever occur to these gentlemen that we were never taxed anything by Great Britain? Did it ever occur to them that while she spends millions upon millions on her army and navy she asks nothing from us? Did it ever occur to these gentlemen that the security granted to a Canadian was as great as if he were born within the shadow of Balmoral or Windsor Castle? And if, perchance, in any country in the world he suffered an affront or was badly used, he had, as a free-born Britisher, the protection of every man in the army and every gun in the navy as much as if he were a king on the throne in Great Britain? Do we not owe something to Great Britain? But there was more than that. By the preferential tariff we were not helping Great Britain, we were helping ourselves. Is it not worth something to have a third of the duty upon an article removed. This is the first time in my life I have heard the opposite doctrine preached. Fancy the hon. member for Addington going into a store to buy an article. He is a prosperous farmer, and he knows the value of money. There is an article in the store that last year he paid $1 for, and he goes in now and the merchant hands him the article, and he hands the merchant his dollar, and he thinks it is all right. But the merchant gives him ten cents back.

Mr. WALLACE. He charges him $1.50.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I do not need to answer. I just stood for a moment in pity. The hon. member for Addington gets the 10 cents back. I ask him: Would he fling it in the face of the man from whom he got the article and would he pay a dollar for it? Of course he would not. Now, the trade with Great Britain stands exactly like that in so far as the duty is concerned. Here is another thing. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to make any distinction between the sum total of the price that it cost to produce the article plus the duty in one year, or another. Now, they state that we pay more for some articles. Naturally we have to because there is more competition and more demand, but, let me repeat what I said before, and it is that there is no man in reason who would say, that, if there is a reduction in duty, we do not get the article that much cheaper, or who would say that it costs more because we pay less duty. Did anybody ever hear of such folly as that? Of course, articles are dearer. Take iron, for instance. I have said that the works of New Glasgow are experiencing a marvellous change for the better. Iron went up in price, and the industries have increased everywhere. Why is it that the farmers are so prosperous? In the first place they produce more, and in the second place they get a larger price, and they are, consequently, able to pay more for the articles they consume. Would hon. gentlemen opposite want to have it so that an article produced by the farmer should sell at a high price and that the article produced by the artisan should remain at the same price that it was before? Do not hon. gentlemen opposite understand that when times are good and when the price of one article goes up the price of another article also goes up in order that the labourer who produces that article shall receive more for producing it. Of necessity with such a state of things up go the wages of the artisan. I was up, the other day, in the Niagara peninsula and you cannot get a man to work there for less than $1.50 a day. I am not claiming that the good crops are due to the act of the government, but, if hon. gentlemen opposite had had the chance how much would we have heard in that line? Suppose, in 1896, the Liberals had been defeated, that we had had three deficits and bad times, and that the Tories had come in! Suppose we rose in our places and said that all the prosperity you have is because the farmers have had good crops, and by the way, is it not an extraordinary thing that good crops for the farmers make good times everywhere? We always maintained that. Hon. gentlemen opposite said: No, we will make the country rich by making it a manufacturing country. While there were only about 15 per cent engaged in manufacturing industries, there were 65 or 70 per cent of the people engaged in farming, and they were to go on feeding the 10 or 15 per cent of the people. I think the government have acted wisely in adopting the tariff that we now have, because they have considered both the manufacturers and farmers, and have not gone upon the principle of considering only one class. Every man has a right to be considered. Suppose, as I said before, that we had not succeeded in 1896, and that the Conservatives had been returned to power! What would the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) have said? I think I hear him speaking with that vigour that characterizes him, and something like this would be the result: In 1896 the country was almost in a state of bankruptcy, every industry was paralyzed, men were out of employment, three deficits was the record of the Liberal party, the farmers were in a state, almost, of poverty, they could not pay their bills, but at the general elections, what happened? Why, a change came over the country. The sun, that before refused to give its full heat to the earth, gave out in plenty. Rain fell in plentiful showers, and kindly mother earth opened her bosom because she was now ruled over by the Conservative party, while she had refused to give forth her abundance when the Liberal party was in power. Words like these, repeated in various forms, by hon. gentlemen opposite would be the result. In so far as the crops have been better, that is a good result, and we must look elsewhere for the cause. But, in so far as the present government gave an impetus to trade by lessening the duties, by giving confidence everywhere that did not exist before, they are entitled to the credit of having done something for the people of Canada. You may talk, as I said a little while ago, as much as you like to the farmers to try to induce them to believe that times have not improved. You may try to explain to them, by methods only known to your own ingenuity, that matters are not at all as they are, but, the fact remains. And, Mr. Speaker, I join heartily with the hon. member for Addington that there is one thing that we ought to do. I concede that the government is not constituted for the purpose mentioned by the hon. member. My idea of the functions of government are fourfold. Legislation respecting morals and all such questions comes before this parliament as a parliament, but there are four principal ways in which a government is expected and ought to be expected to regulate the affairs of this country. The people demand of the government four things. They demand, in the first place, the smallest possible taxation, in the second place, a solvent revenue, in the third place honest expenditure, and in the fourth place, able administration. I rather like that way of putting it under heads. That is the way that I was taught when I was young. Scotchmen brought up under the direction of a great national overruling church believed in that. We have decreased taxation to the amount of 10 per cent, and we have a largely solvent revenue, a revenue such as was never seen in this country before. For myself, I am bound to say that I do not want to see very much of a surplus in any country. I believe thoroughly that the people can look after their money better than the government, but, I want to point out the fact that no man dreamed in this House that we were going to have such a revenue. Did any hon. gentleman opposite, when the tariff was changed, get up and say that this tariff will be such that you will have an immense revenue, that you will have a surplus of $7,500,000 in 1899? On the contrary, they said that the country would be ruined. But, this wonderful thing happened that the revenue that was only considered sufficient, when collected, to meet the ordinary outlay, as proposed by the government, gives us, this year $7,500,000 of a surplus. How did this come about? Trade has expanded to an extent that no one ever thought of. I am in the presence of the ministers here tonight, and I venture to say that they never dreamed when the tariff was introduced that there would be such a result. No man ever dreamed of such a trade or that confidence would be restored to such an extent that the revenue would yield such an enormous increase. Then we wanted honest expenditure in this country, and the Liberal government has given it to us. I admit that two or three things were brought up in the Public Accounts Committee this year that I would rather had not occurred; and as a strong supporter of the government I have rather a grudge against the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), because he did show that a year or two ago, a barrel of flour in the city of St. John cost us $7—

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough).

Mr. TAYLOR. And ninety cents.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Well, that makes it worse against me, but I want to be honest. He did show that a box of condensed milk cost more in Nova Scotia than in British Columbia, and he said he would produce a witness to prove it, but I notice he did not do so.

Mr. TAYLOR. The witness is here now and will answer the questions for himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Now the third thing came up in the Public Accounts Committee to-day—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that no report has been made yet from the Public Accounts Committee, and this reference to it is, therefore, out of order.

Mr. McCLEARY. And he the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I was making a verbal report of the proceedings of the committee. I will say, Sir, that it has been stated to me on good authority that it was proved to-day before the Public Accounts Committee that a bill for $1.20 was discovered for washing collars and other things during a trip of the Minister of Public Works. Notwithstanding that, I do say that we have had an honest expenditure of public money under this government. My hon. friend from Addington (Mr. Bell) spoke about the Drummond County Railway, but does any man in his sane senses think there was anything wrong about that, especially in view of the fact that the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) declared in this House that neither he nor anybody else ever stated that there was anything wrong about the transaction. If there is anything wrong about the Drummond County Railway transaction, why do not these gentlemen opposite show it up. We showed them up when we were in opposition, and if they want a committee to inquire into it, we will give them a committee to probe the whole thing from beginning to the end.

Mr. SPROULE. Why do you not give us an inquiry before the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The hon. gentleman would be better employed in the interests of the country in probing into the Drummond County transaction, if he thinks there is anything wrong in it, than he is in doing what he is doing now. I tell him that I will not support the government any longer unless they give him a committee, if he makes any sensible charge about the Drummond County Railway.

Mr. SPROULE. I am asking about the Committee on Privileges and Elections which we had appointed last session, and which the government will not allow us to appoint now.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I am talking about the Drummond County Railway, and if you think there is anything wrong in the transaction why are you idling away your time.

Mr. SPROULE. When we got the committee we could not get our work before them.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). That is a reflection on the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden). We sat in that committee from day to day and when the present Judge Lister, who was chairman, asked if the Conservatives had any more evidence, the answer was, 'No.' The ex-Minister of Railways who, to speak even modestly of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) is as able a man as he is, said in that committee: We have nothing to produce, and we never said there was anything wrong.

Now, Sir, I have given the record of the Liberal party, and the country has to decide between the two parties. What is the record of the Conservative party? Under its rule we had higher taxation; we had three deficits; a bankrupt exchequer, a dishonest expenditure, as shown again and again, and which, by the way, the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) wants to have forgotten because some of the parties engaged in it are dead; and lastly, we had a shady and quarrelsome administration. We saw one of its members compelled to resign from the government and he has never since returned to this House. That is the record of gentlemen opposite when we appeal to the country. Under Liberal rule new life and new hopes have been infused into Canada. Labour can everywhere find employment, and every man who is willing to work can get a fair day's pay. Sir, no political party, not even the Conservative party, could spoil a country in which every man can find work. I visited most of the Dominion last year from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and everywhere I found the farmers, the artisans, the lumbering men and the miners busy making money. In the North-west I saw large tracts of land, value for $6,000, paid for in two years. In my own province, the people were never so busy in any period of our history. We all can at least be thankful for that. We on this side of the House, can point to this happy state of affairs, in reply to the taunts of gentlemen opposite, who hold that they are the only divinely created rulers and that the Plebeians among the Liberals could never rule this country with decency or success. I invite hon. gentlemen opposite, many of whom are my friends, to be thankful for our present prosperous condition. Although, perhaps, some of them may think that our affairs are not as well conducted as the Conservatives would conduct them, yet as true Canadians they should rejoice that Canada is happy, and prosperous, and that when they had to get out of power, they were succeeded by men under whose rule such a desirable condition of things obtains. I hear a great deal said by gentlemen opposite as to the result of the elections about to take place. I make no forecast, but I tell these hon. gentlemen opposite that no amount of blatant boasting in this House is going to win the elections for them. I tell the hon. gentlemen that they have got to go before the people and show them that the best interests of all concerned in Canada would be better served and conserved if they went into power. It is easy to say, we are going to win. When the hon. leader of the opposition was in his place in parliament in 1896, I remember hearing him make this statement: 'I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I make the statement here and now, and I want to be judged for all future time by it, and never believed again unless it turns out to be true, that the great Liberal-Conservative party will be returned triumphantly, with a greater majority than they have now.' I take the hon. gentleman at his word; he made his own condition, and I accept it; and I do not believe him now. Prophecy is a dangerous experiment, and I want to point out modestly to hon. gentlemen opposite that too much shouting about what is going to happen is not convenient, and the result may not be what they anticipate. All I know is that we have to present to the people of this country a claim that we need not be ashamed of, and if their claim is better in the interests of the people, they have a right to show that; but they will not win by stating that they are going to.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough).

One word more, and I am done. I refer to a personal remark affecting myself made by the hon. member for Western Assinibola (Mr. Davin). That hon. gentleman referred to a statement which I made in the North-west. It is not a correct statement, but I will take it just as he read it. Addressing the people of the North-west, I said that we ought to judge governments as we judged our friends, our neighbours, our fathers, our mothers, our wives, and our families. I made the statement, and I repeat it now, that if in any of those cases they failed to come up to all that was expected of them, we were not going to throw them aside if their virtues were greater than the virtues of those we were asked to take in their place. He said :

To such a Liberal who said that the government did not keep its pledges, he would say, look at home. Have you kept the pledges made to your wife before you married her? But what would you think if your wife left you and went off with another man, and that man an unsanctified tram. That woman would be just as vile as the Liberal who turned Tory.

I accept that statement, and I refuse to read into it the innuendo put upon it by the hon. member for Western Assiniboia. All I have to say, Mr. Speaker, is this, that the man that will put a vile construction upon it is a man without modesty or virtue. There is only one man in this House that would do it; thank God, there is no man outside of this House that would do it. We can, at least, discuss political matters as we ought to; we can differ with each other; but when we are vile enough to insinuate things that the words do not bear, we forget for the time being that we are members of parliament, or even decent citizens, and revel in the filth of our own vile imagination. Yes, Mr. Speaker, we shall go to the country; we shall meet hon. gentlemen opposite and they shall meet us. We shall meet as good-naturedly as we do now, and I trust, without reference to personal matters. What any man in this House says or does is not the question at issue. The issue is the record of the respective parties, and their ability to carry on the affairs of the country. I join with the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Bell) in saying that we need not be continually shouting our loyalty; but, whether Liberal or Tory, we can join in the common bonds that make us part of the greatest nation in the world, and work out our destiny. The Conservatives have done much for this country during the eighteen years they were in power. I would be wrong, it would be ignorance on my part, to talk in any other way. There is no man wholly bad, and there is no party wholly bad. You cannot truly speak of one party as perfectly good and the other as perfectly bad. The whole question before intelligent men in Canada is this: Which of the two parties claiming your suffrages should you return in your best interests? Let us, then, discuss the public questions at issue. I have no fear for the result. I will not prophesy, but I will make this one statement, that I shall be quite willing, after the general election, to count heads, and it may be discovered, when the counting is done, that, after all, the prophecies so fondly indulged in by hon. gentlemen opposite will be no more effective to bring about the result as those of the leader of the opposition. I thank hon. gentlemen for the kind attention they have given to me. I hope this long debate may soon come to an end, so that we may turn our attention to other matters. I have taken up about an hour and a half. I did not intend to take up so much time, but two or three things occurred that made me do so. I know that in the discussion to follow, we shall continue in the same good-natured style, and shall, when we get down to real work, reach results that will be conducive to the best interests of the country.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, before resuming his seat the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) stated that he would not indulge in any prophecies as to the result of the next general election. Well, Sir, I must congratulate the hon. gentleman on one thing, that with increasing years he increases in wisdom; for, if I recollect aright, my heart rather sank when I read an interview in the Toronto Globe last December, in which it was stated that Mr. Fraser, the talented and versatile member for Guysborough, N.S., had just returned from Manitoba, where he had taken the stump on behalf of Mr. Greenway, and that the signs were that Mr. Greenway would sweep the country.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Will the hon. gentleman pardon me? I never attended a meeting for Mr. Greenway, and never took part in the local elections.

Mr BENNETT. The hon. member for Guysborough is a good deal like the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). Seeing himself associated with the downfall of Mr. Greenway, he wishes to repudiate all connection with him. It is a notorious fact, however, that the hon. gentleman, with the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), and other gentlemen, attended meetings from one end of Manitoba to the other, and that their defence of this administration for its sins and iniquities was what in the main brought about the downfall of the Greenway administration. And I can understand what brought about that result. Fancy a man appearing on a public platform and addressing intelligent farmers such as there are in Manitoba and indulging in a lot of buncombe such as we have listened to for the last hour and a half; and then imagine the electors going and voting for the party which he represented, more especially in view of the fact that this same hon. gentleman, associated with others, had been through that country about three years before. He was then denouncing the Conservative administration and the policy of protection, and along with the Premier and other gentlemen, was making all sorts of pledges and promises to the farmers of Manitoba. The hon. gentleman will not say that he was not there a year or two before the general election; and was it to be expected that the result would be different when men who made all kinds of promises from one end of Manitoba to the other, came back a few years afterwards with the black record which they have presented, and endeavoured to laugh it off as he has done to-night?

I am not going to indulge in any prophecy but I will tell the hon. member for Guysborough, that if his friends would allow him to go through Ontario, and make speeches of the kind he has made here to-night, I would have no doubt of the result in that province even with the machine thrown into the bargain.

Here is a government that, hampered by pledges and tied down by promises, is, with unblushing effrontery, shifting its position from year to year. The first session these hon. gentlemen asked for time in order that they might make changes in the tariff. The next session we found them promising to make changes, and now we find them attempting to minimize their pledges and laugh off their failures by speeches such as the one we have just heard. But the people of the country are intelligent and are going to hold these men to their word. They are going to ask the hon. member for Guysborough and his associates, if they were telling the truth, when they made the solemn pledge that, if returned to power, one of the first and greatest principles they would stand by would be that not one of their supporters in the House should obtain a position until he had ceased to be a member of parliament for two years. No wonder such deals as the Yukon and the Inter-colonial Railway could be put through this House by a government, supported, as this government is, by men who had the promises of positions. And some, as in the case of Mr. Langelier, were not willing to take the word of a minister, but insisted that the promise should be in black and white before they would cast their vote on a division.

I do not intend to be personal, but there is not an hon. member of this House who could not point his finger to desk after desk, at which sit members who are to be given public positions as soon as this parliament closes. Look at the noble army of martyrs who have already sacrificed themselves:

1. Chas. Devlin, member for Wright, Immigration Agent	$3,000
2. Dr. Rinfret, member for Lotbinière, Inland Revenue Inspector.....	2,400
3. F. Langelier, member for Quebec Centre, Judge	5,000
4. — Fiset, member for Rimouski, Senatorship	1,000
5. F. Béchard, member for St. John, Senatorship	1,000
6. F. Choquette, member for Montmagny, Judge	4,000
7. C. Beausoleil, member for Berthier, Postmaster, Montreal	4,000
8. M. C. Cameron, member for West Huron, Lieut.-Governorship	7,000
9. James Lister, member for West Lambton, Judge.....	6,000
10. F. Forbes, member for Queen's, Judge.	2,800

Mr. BENNETT.

11. Geo. King, member for Sunbury, Senator	$1,000
12. John Yeo, P. E. I., Senator.....	1,000
13. L. Lavergne, member for Arthabaska, Judge	4,000
14. — McInnes, Senator, Lieut.-Governor British Columbia	9,000
15. Sir O. Mowat, Senator, Lieut.-Governor of Ontario	10,000

These were the very men who, year in and year out, were denouncing the principle of appointing members of parliament to office. If I wished to be personal to-night, I could call out the names of a dozen men who sit opposite, and whose friends openly associate their names with the positions they are to receive. But there is one thing about these hon. gentlemen, they are not selfish. Those of them who are not perhaps ready to take positions themselves, because they cannot get the ones they want, are looking after their friends. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), has half a dozen of his relatives in lucrative posts under the government. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), has a brother in the Immigration Department. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Beith), has a brother appointed collector at Bowmanville. And here are a few more appointments of relations of members supporting the government:

James Lister, son, Lieutenant Permanent Force.
Hon. F. W. Borden, cousin, accountant Militia Department.
Robert Holmes, brother, immigrant agent.
Geo. Landerkin, son, government offices, Dawson, clerk; son, clerk Toronto post office.
R. Lemieux, father, inspector, customs.
P. Macdonald, son, physician on Hudson Bay expedition; son-in-law, escort for Li Hung, $3,000.

Last, but not least, we have that martyr at the public crib, the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who has a brother-in-law at a clerkship in the Kingston penitentiary at $700 per year, and the genial whip of the party opposite (Mr. Gibson), who has a brother-in-law at a government clerkship at $900 per year.

Is it not humiliating that men who had gone all over the country denouncing the appointment to government positions of members of the House, or relatives of members, should take the first opportunity to descend upon these positions like a lot of hungry vultures, and grab them for themselves and relatives; and the meanest part of it all is that they do not allow their friends and supporters to get the positions, but grab them for their own dear blood relations.

What are the farmers going to do with these gentlemen? These gentlemen went about the country telling the farmers that they were being bled white by the agricultural implement men, and that if only a change of government were brought about, the farmers would breathe easier. Well, what have these gentlemen done for the farmers? We can believe that when the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), made what he thought was a triumphal tour, but which turned out for Mr. Greenway a funeral march, he steered clear of these questions which years ago he was ready to discuss. Let us see what is the record of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to agricultural implements. Everybody knows that they pledged themselves, time and again, that if elected to power they would bring about a vast reduction in the duties on agricultural implements. But what do we find? We find that last year the farmers paid duties as follows:

Binding attachments	$ 6,551 27
Cultivators	3,590 80
Drills	12,936 60
Forks	2,746 95
Harrows	10,594 10
Reapers and binders.....	132,920 50
Horse rakes	13,808 60
Moving machines	37,976 00
Ploughs	32,296 00
Reapers	5,013 20
Scythes	7,331 13
Weeders	11,372 75

So I might go on through the whole list and show that instead of making the promised reduction in favour of the farmers, the farmers are still paying thousands of dollars of duties.

What are they doing for the farmers in any other things they require? Last year the farmers paid:

	Duty.
On farm wagons from the United States.	$19,615
On wagons and drays for freight.....	6,550
Carriages and buggies	12,650
Carts	2,156
Parts of buggies.....	9,460
Wheelbarrows and trucks.....	7,614

The facts showed that these gentlemen are not at all the friends of the farmers they profess themselves to be, but the friends of the manufacturers. But when the farmers complain, they turn around and say: Oh, but look at the free list. Well, I admit that there are certain articles on the free list, and lest any of the farmers should think that this is not a farmer's government, I will read some of the items that to-day are on the free list, which these gentlemen boast so much about. For the benefit of the farmer, the following articles are placed on the free list:

Vaccine points, paintings in oil of the old masters, ice, collections of old coins, collections of postage stamps, bird skins, veneers of ivory, anchors, lime juice, tartar emetic, attar of roses, dragon's blood, cat-gut, chronometers, bone-pitch, mushroom spawn, egg-yolk, bees.

Let there never be complaint by the farmers that this government is not solicitous for their welfare. Should they ever complain of the duty on agricultural implements, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the Minister of Customs

(Mr. Paterson), will tell them: Never mind the paltry duty on agricultural implements—look at the fact that you have attar of roses and bone-pitch, and bees free of duty. From one end of the country to the other, these gentlemen disported themselves. They were going to make a tariff for the farmer, even if it should cut the manufacturer in two. And, what have they done? They have kept up the duty on the things that the farmer required to use, and they allow to come in free the things that he has to sell. They permit the importation free of about eight millions of bushels of corn. And the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has stated in his place, that if this government had not been so idiotic as to make this concession, they might have got something in return for it, perhaps the free admission of our barley into the United States. But the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

When we admitted corn free of duty, we conferred a great boon upon the great mass of the agriculturists of Canada.

I would invite any of the ministers to come up to the riding of East Simcoe, and tell the farmers there that in allowing the importation of eight million bushels of corn into Canada free of duty, and placing it in competition with their coarse grains, they have conferred a boon upon the farmers. If they do so, I think the farmers will very quickly repudiate them. The hon. Minister of Customs—I refer to him, because he is about the only minister in the House, begging the pardon of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) who is deeply engrossed in the debate—does not want the farmer even to have any solace in his trouble. He denies him the right even to have a smoke, without being taxed extra for it. The government have raised the duty on tobacco 11 cents a pound; taking out of the pockets of the people, who use tobacco, last year over $1,150,000. What have they done for the farmers, so far as the admission of their articles into the United States is concerned? They have gained no concessions at all. They have taxed the farmer at every turn, and even when he comes into the house he is debarred from smoking, on account of the prices of tobacco. And to help him to bear his burdens, they have raised the duty on sugar 33½ per cent, taking out of the pockets of the people last year, more than they did before, no less than $400,000. I do not wonder that the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), did not talk politics in the North-west, but indulged in buncombe, similar to what he indulged in to-night. These are matters that the farmers wish to have dealt with. There was one great promise that they held up to the farmers. They told them, particularly the farmers of Ontario, that their market was in the United States, and if they could gain access to that market, success would be assured to them. The Premier himself, in speaking on that subject, said :

Our duty is to Canada and not to England. Just as the British government teaches this government that the first duty of the British government is to England and not to Canada so I insist that in all these matters, it is for any self-governing colony to look to its own interests first, last and always.

And, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), said :

It is quite clear to any one who will carefully study those trade returns and will study the figures which I submitted before recess, that the United States market, if it were only made free, is worth more than twice over to Canada that of all the rest of the world put together. It is perfectly clear that it is the only market open to us for a great amount of our productions.

These are the statements with which these hon. gentlemen went about the country. They endeavoured to secure the votes of the farmers on the ground that the Conservative administration had told them time and again that no trade relations could be gained with the United States, that would be beneficial to the country, except at a sacrifice of manufacturing industries, which the Conservatives were not prepared to be responsible for. These hon. gentlemen went east and west and north and south and held out this line of policy to the farmers. Either they knew nothing of what they were talking about, or else they were talking dishonestly, for the Premier last year—although he had made the strong statement, that there was no market in the world so valuable as that of the United States, speaking on the 21st of March—he said :

There was a time when Canadians, beginning with the hon. gentleman himself, would have given many things to obtain the American market; there was a time not long ago when the market of the great cities of the union was the only market we had for any of our products. But, thank heaven! those days are past and over now.

It cannot be that in three years, the whole face of trade has been so completely changed. It simply meant that these hon. gentlemen when they went about the country in 1892, were not conversant with the trade matters of the country, when they made their pledges to the agricultural class, that if they came into power they would go in for a policy of reciprocity. Now, this statement of the Premier was made in 1899, the time when he, himself, stated that he did not believe there was anything to be gained by a reciprocity treaty. When did the change come over his mind? If he was honest in that opinion, then the country could well ask the hon. gentlemen why they went through the farce of the Washington conference and entail on the country an expenditure of $35,000 for nothing. It will be a matter of interest to the farmers of this country, from whom these large duties on tobacco and sugar are being taken, to pay the swelling expenditures of this country, to know where some of that money has gone. It may be well that our farmers could know something of this matter, and I propose that the farmers of East Simcoe, at any rate, shall have the facts placed before them. Of the $35,000 spent on this Washington conference, the Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), drew $3,821, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), drew $3,361, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), drew $2,630, Mr. Charlton, $1,766, and Mr. Bourassa, secretary, $2,200. It will be seen that Mr. Charlton, who was admitted to be the business man of the combination, was more intent on looking after the business than on high living, because his expenses are very much less than those of any of the others. It is scandalous that men should go on a trip of this kind and spend money as they did. Look at some of the items: Banquet at the Shoreham, $600; floral wreath for Lord Herschell, $40. One would have thought that they would have paid for their colleagues floral wreath. They paid $52 for photographs. I suppose they were photographs of the quartette. Entertainment, $1,637; tips to servants, $407. Why, it is stated in Washington to-day, that as soon as a Canadian touches the city, the coloured waiters gather around him thinking he is an ambassador from Canada, and is prepared to turn out tips amounting to hundreds of dollars. I am surprised that these hon. gentlemen have the face to place in the public reports, the fact that paltry tips for servants at the table, are paid out of the public till. Cabs cost $219. It is evident that they did not walk all the time. One grief-stricken minister went down to New York to attend Lord Herschell's funeral, and he carefully charged $128 for his expenses. Well, Sir, these are facts for the farmers to study over, as to how this economical government dissipates the money of the people. Look at it all through. The humbugged farmer, humbugged on the matter of agricultural implements, humbugged by having free corn brought into the country, humbugged on the reciprocity deal, humbugged in every direction, looks about him for sympathy, and the first man he meets is the humbugged temperance man, and the humbugged temperance man is very much in evidence in this country at the present time; he is endeavouring to deal a blow at these gentlemen similar to what the temperance people in Manitoba dealt to the late Premier, Mr. Greenway. Now, where do we find this government on the question of prohibition? It will be within the recollection of the temperance people of the country that a few years ago a large deputation waited on the late Sir John Thompson, and he announced then that the policy of the Conservative party was not to introduce a prohibition measure owing to the fact that he did not believe such a measure could be carried out successfully unless there was a large preponderating vote in its favour. These hon. gentlemen, time servers as they always have been, at once set their sails for the temperance vote. The general election was approaching, and a little time afterwards the present Premier started out on a tour of the province of Ontario, prepared at all hazards to catch votes, regardless of whether he would be able to keep his pledges afterwards. In 1895, the year preceding the general elections, the present Premier held a large meeting at Carleton Place, and there he announced the policy of his party on the temperance question. He said:

Mr. BENNETT.

The Liberal party has pledged itself in convention at Ottawa that whenever in power they would take a plebiscite on the question as to whether the people want a prohibitory liquor law or not. The answer is not in my hands, it is in the hands of the people, and according to their answer such legislation they will have at the hands of the government.

What was the result? A reverend gentleman of the Methodist Church, Mr. Huxtable, a prominent man, I understand, in that denomination, at once congratulated the Premier, and said: My interest and the interest of all my friends will support your party, because the Conservative party have denied to us the prohibition pledge that you are pledged to give. Why, Sir, the Premier caught the fanning breeze as he went further west. After this statement no wonder the temperance people were delighted to meet him. As he went further west he got stronger in his declarations, and to the thousands of temperance people crowded around him at Winnipeg, he said:

He pledged his honour that as soon as the Liberals came into power they would take a plebiscite of the Dominion by which the party would stand, and the will of the people would be carried out even were it to cost power for ever to the Liberal party.

Little wonder is it, after these pledges and statements made on the honour of the Premier, that Mr. Huxtable and other eminent divines, who took part in that campaign, have said that when the next general election comes on all the interest they can command will be thrown against this administration. Well, what happened? The Liberal government submitted the vote. That was an excellent means of scattering a lot of money among the faithful. In my own riding the ravenous Liberals were very anxious to gain some of the lucre, and it was distributed there pretty freely:

Geo. D. Grant	$353 28
'Times'	27 50
'News-Letter'	4 25
Voters' lists	71 50
Deputies and clerks.....	441 00
Booths and constables.....	260 50

$1,158 03

And for what? Simply to dissipate money among the faithful in order that they might be square when the necessity arose.

What happened next? The vote was taken. The temperance people had the pledge of the Premier, on his word of honour, that if they got a majority they should have prohibition. The prohibitionists, men and women, turned in and worked with a will. From one end of the country to the other they sacrificed their time and money, they toiled and they worked. These gentlemen saw that there was going to be a large vote in favour of prohibition, and at once all the machinery of the government was set at work to defeat the will of the people. The Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), the late Mr. Geoffrion, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), in fact the whole party in the province of Quebec, was cut loose to assure the people that if this measure was carried by a majority there would be a heavy imposition of taxes, and moreover it would cost the government power.

Now, where was the temperance element? The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), the hon. gentleman who prides himself that he is a temperance man if he is nothing else, met the Women's Christian Temperance Union in the Queen's Hotel in the city of Toronto, and these guileless women said: Mr. Sifton, we know you have full control of this Yukon region, we know there is only one means of access into that country, and we ask you to stop intoxicating liquors from going in there. The Minister of the Interior pledged his honour, whatever that goes for, that liquor would be prohibited from going into that country, while at the same time the minister knew that he was granting permits for thousands and thousands of gallons of liquor to go into that country. Why, there was a statement made in the Senate the other day by Senator Kirchhoffer; that there were men in Brandon, in the minister's own constituency, who had taken thousands and thousands of gallons of liquor into the Yukon district, and these men had made untold money out of it. Yet the Minister of the Interior stands up before these women and assures them that this government was taking every step in its power to prevent liquor going into that country. No wonder the temperance people feel humbugged on this question just as badly as the farmers.

But what else is there? Not only were these made by ministers, but the charge has been made, and made above board, and made by responsible gentlemen in the city of Montreal connected with temperance organizations, that there was preconcerted action to defeat the will of the electors in the province of Quebec on that question, by stuffing the ballot boxes. Sir, there is to-day in the Senate Debates a statement lately made indicating the places where these wrongs were perpetrated, and in some cases actually associating names of members of parliament on the Liberal side with these frauds. Has this government done anything to inquire into these frauds? This government did spend $20,000 to inquire into frauds in Manitoba with which they had no concern at all, and which were the business of the local government; but this government is powerless to inquire into the colossal frauds perpetrated in the province of Quebec against the prohibition party. The figures themselves are conclusive proofs of the frauds perpetrated in that province. Now, I am going to read some figures of the votes that were polled in some places against prohibition:

Poll.	Polled.	On list.
No. 23, Quebec Centre.....	105	101
No. 20, " "	121	133
No. 1, " West	114	115
No. 2, " "	111	114
St. Philemon, Bellechasse.....	112	149
Verchères, No. 26.....	134	142
No. 24, Chicoutimi.....	107	140
No. 13, Lachine, Jacques Cartier...	108	111
No. 24, Lévis	122	176
No. 17, L'Islet	117	150
No. 35, Maisonneuve.....	133	141
No. 40, "	113	134
No. 20, St. James, Montreal.....	137	146
No. 1, Richelieu	151	160
No. 10, Temiscouata	103	132

Why, Sir, any sane man who looks at these figures showing that more votes were polled than were actually on the list, knows that frauds were committed, and knows this is the way in which the large majority was rolled up in the province of Quebec against prohibition. Now, I propose to take some figures in my own riding where there was great activity on the part, not only of the prohibitionists, but on the part of the liquor men as well. What was the result? It was this:

Polling Subdivision.	Names on list.	Votes polled.
Gravenhurst, North Ward.....	203	93
Matchedash	138	49
No. 7, Medonte	158	55
Midland East	176	85
Ward North, Orillia	359	193
" West	395	215
No. 7, Orillia Township.....	175	73
Town Hall, Oro.....	192	82
No. 2, Penetang.....	297	139
Tay, Victoria Harbour	318	162
" Fesserton	177	80
No. 6, Tiny.....	225	67
No. 1, "	210	102
No. 17, Toronto East.....	223	107
No. 39, " West.....	210	102

What is the result of looking over these figures? It convinces every man as it has convinced dozens and dozens of good Liberals in my riding, that this government condoned and aided and abetted gigantic frauds in the province of Quebec with the view of defeating public sentiment in this country. They found that they were in a hole. The right hon. leader of the government had given his pledge and the result was that something had to be done, and this enormous majority of 94,344 was rolled up against prohibition in the province of Quebec while the other provinces gave a majority of 108,011 in favour of it. The temperance people were not satisfied. On the one hand they had a majority, while on the other hand, they had the pledge of the Premier that their majority would give them prohibition. The right hon. gentleman came down to the House and said: It is true that we gave a pledge for a plebiscite, but, it is equally true that there was an understanding between the members of the Liberal party at the convention that unless there were more than half of the votes polled in favour of prohibition there should be no prohibitory liquor law. What does the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) say to that? He is the embodiment of temperance in this House and in the cabinet. He obtains a standing in the cabinet as a temperance man. Did the hon. Minister of Agriculture, knowing of this agreement, knowing that such an agreement did exist, tell the temperance people that unless there was a large majority, or a majority of half the people in favour of prohibition, there would be no prohibitory enactment? His lips were closed, and he was deliberately misleading the temperance people of the country by not telling the whole truth to them. The House and the country was startled the other day when the hon. Minister of Agriculture stood up in his place and made the statement that there was no such bargain at all ever made and gave a direct denial to the Prime Minister's statement made a little over a year ago. All I have to say is, that it should be the duty of a strong leader to drive a minister out of his cabinet who flatly contradicts him, or it should be the duty of the minister to step down and out of a cabinet when he has his place in it under false representations. There are two masses of people in the country that these hon. gentlemen have to meet. They must meet the humbugged farmer, and they must meet the humbugged temperance man. Some of these hon. gentlemen have referred to the enormous saving that they are going to make under the Dominion Franchise Act. Where is that saving going to come in? First and foremost, under the old system, copies of the Dominion franchise list were sent to the Printing Bureau at Ottawa and were consequently printed in the Printing Bureau. These lists are printed at the Bureau to-day and the cost is exactly the same as it was under the old Franchise Act. The adoption of the local voters' lists in the province of Ontario dispenses with the revision of the so-called Dominion list, and as a result, every year, in the municipalities where these lists are revised a large cost is incurred by the municipalities. It is within my own knowledge that, in East Simcoe, townships have had to pay as much as $100 in a year for the revision of the voters' lists in order that they may be made use of by the Dominion government in its elections. It is a matter on the part of the townships that they are, for the first time, having forced upon them the cost of the revision of the lists for the Dominion House which was formerly paid for by the Dominion House itself. In addition, the judge who is engaged to revise these lists is paid by the local government, so that the only difference in the matter is that the cost is simply shifted from the Dominion government to the local municipalities. I challenge hon. gentlemen to say that it is not a matter of demurrer on the part of the municipalities that they should be borne down with this expense. They say, that before, the revision was done by partisan judges. The answer to that is, that the partisan revising barristers before were country court judges and the revising barristers to-day are county court judges. The whole difference is that these hon. gentlemen have taken the burden of expense off the Dominion government and placed it on the municipalities. The result is that we have a Dominion voters' list that is totally different in every province of this Dominion. You may reside in the county of Glengarry, adjoining the province of Quebec, you may be a large property owner in that county, you may happen to live in the adjoining riding of Stormont, you may be a large property owner in the adjoining riding, you may be a property owner in three different ridings in the province of Ontario and have the right to vote once in the federal elections. But, if you live in the province of Quebec and you happen to have property in four different wards in the city of Montreal, you have four votes. Why should the people of the province of Ontario suffer this disadvantage? I ask the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) why he, as an Ontario minister, says that every man who may own property in three or four divisions in the city of Montreal, should have three or four votes and that a man who may be a large property owner in the province of Ontario should only have one vote. The principle is unfair and unjust. These hon. gentlemen found that there are a large number of men in the country employed in what is known as the Permanent Force, in other words, the paid soldiers of the country, men who are entitled to have a vote, men, who, when called to duty, have to do the fighting. These hon. gentlemen are, to-day, by a Bill before the House, going to debar these men from having the right to vote, while a Chinaman in British Columbia has the right, under the provincial franchise, to vote. Is it not a beautiful thing to say that every intelligent man in the province of Ontario who has taken up the business of a soldier on behalf of his country, has no right to vote, but that a Chinaman in British Columbia has the right to vote? All that hon. gentlemen can make out of the Franchise Act in Ontario they are quite welcome to, because the people see very clearly that the whole starting point was in favour of hon. gentlemen themselves, and nothing else. There was one thing that the farmer was to have done for him. Hon. gentlemen were going to decrease duties, and, as a result, they would decrease the revenue of the country. The reason why there was to be a decrease in the revenue of the country was that there would be less duties drawn out of the pockets of the people, and they would have less money to pay out in that way. What have these hon. gentlemen done in that regard? These hon. gentlemen, who were pledged to reduce the number of cabinet ministers, added two to the number, these hon. gentlemen frittered away $200,000 for the plebiscite, these hon. gentlemen frittered away $35,000 on their reciprocity trip to Washington, these hon. gentlemen frittered away $10,000 upon an inquiry into Manitoba elections which was no duty, or business, of this parliament, and they have increased the expenditure of this country from $38,000,000 to $51,000,000. That is about the gauge of what they have done, and you cannot go into a constituency of this country but you will find that there are party friends who are being benefited at the public cost. The Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) went to Orillia in East Simcoe, and he found a most capable officer there as inspector of weights and measures. This official was a man in the prime of life, but the minister (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), in order to give a place to a party friend, superannuated this official, Mr. Bolster, at $360 a year, and appointed a gentleman named Smith to the position at $600. I am surprised that the minister permitted himself to be prevailed upon by his party friends to do such a thing as that, and to place this extra charge on the taxpayers of the country without any reason in the world. It is that way all along the line. The Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) found Col. White, one of the most capable deputy ministers in the service, in his department. He superannuated Col. White, at a cost to the country of $2,240 a year, while at the same time there is another gentleman named Griffin drawing $2,053 a year as a superannuated Deputy Postmaster General. The Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) did that because, in his riding there was Dr. Coulter, who was an aspirant for the nomination against him, and so he got rid of Dr. Coulter by making him his deputy. This same Postmaster General thought the postmaster in the city of Kingston was too old, and so he superannuated him at $700 a year and appointed a man to office who was several years older than the former postmaster. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) found in his department a gentleman named Hayter

Reed, who was altogether too smart for the minister, and the minister knew it, and so he superannuated Mr. Reed at $1,024 a year and put Mr. Smart, who was the minister's rival at Brandon, in the position. Go around the streets of Ottawa, and you find men in the prime of life put on the superannuation list by this government; men like Mr. Balderson, superannuated by the Liberals at $682 a year; men like Mr. Allan Jones, superannuated at $1,120; men like Mr. McGirr, superannuated at $546, and men like Mr. Smith, of Winnipeg, superannuated at $1,600 a year. This is all done in order that these Liberal ministers may find places for hangers-on who are looking for positions. Here is some more evidence of the economical administration of the Liberal government. In the small county of Lambton, with two judges, this government superannuated Judge Robinson, at a cost to the country of $1,733 a year, and they appointed Mr. MacWatt, from the town of Barrie, a personal friend of mine, and I am glad that when some one had to get the position, he got it. There is a junior judge in that county, and there were three county court cases tried last year, and so they appointed another judge to help the junior judge. There was a junior judge, and they appointed a senior judge with a salary of $2,600 to assist in the trial of three cases that might come up the succeeding year. There is a gentleman named O'Reilly, who lived in Prescott, who was found on every platform in my riding from one end of it to the other. Mr. O'Reilly has been appointed by this government, judge of the united counties of Cornwall, Stormont and Dundas, and Judge Pringle is superannuated at $1,733 a year. They found there, Judge Carman, a capable junior judge, but, instead of promoting him or leaving him as the sole county judge—and although there were only three cases to try in that county court the year before—they have appointed Judge O'Reilly to discharge the duties, and Judge Carman, having got another position, the whole town of Cornwall is anxious to know who the government will appoint as his successor. There was a gentleman named McCallum, from Bruce, who made the welkin ring where a Gaelic audience could be found in Ontario. As a politician he was noted; as a lawyer I never heard of him. He has been sent to Manitoulin as county judge at a salary of $2,900, and there was one case in Manitoulin Island the year before, which was disposed of by one of the judges from Sault Ste. Marie. Now, there was no necessity for a judge at Manitoulin Island at all, because there was only one case the previous year, which was disposed of by one of the Sault Ste. Marie judges, but, nevertheless, Mr. McCallum is translated into the job. There is a gentleman named Chapple, a defeated candidate in North Ontario, who had to be provided for. The judges from Algoma disposed of all the court business in and about Rat Portage which amounted to four cases the previous year. But Mr. Chapple had to be provided for, and so he was appointed a judge. Last, but not least, there is Mr. Neil McCrimmon, who has been heard on pretty nearly every platform in Ontario. There had not been a single case tried in the county court of the county of Ontario the year before, and they had already a junior judge there, but this government appointed Mr. McCrimmon, at a salary of $2,600 a year, to help the junior judge to administer law in a county where there was but little law to administer. Is it not a farce that the government and its supporters should talk about economy in view of all these things. Why, they appointed every party hack they could find in the country. Some of them, irrespective of fitness—I regret to say, for the sake of the bench—were placed in positions they never should have occupied. That is the kind of thing that goes to swallow up the millions and millions of extra expenditure which this government has been guilty of. And, Sir, while this extravagant expenditure is going on, let the overburdened taxpayer be thankful because the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) is doing something wonderful. The Postmaster General found that a man in East Simcoe was carrying the mails thirty-two miles a day for $1.41 per day. He thought it was an outrage that this man should be paid so much to carry the mails from Coulson, Marchmont and Orillia. He found that this man had obtained the work by tender three years before, and that there had been a renewal of the contract, and so, the Postmaster General put the job up to tender again. A party friend got the job at $1.08 a day, and ever since then he has been endeavouring to discover a process by which he can get it raised. If he cannot succeed, he does not want any renewal, for he is quite willing to give up the contract. The Postmaster General found another man carrying the mails twelve miles a day for 72 cents per trip. He thought that was outrageous, and he got a man to take it by contract for 51 cents a day; and I am assured by that man that he is quite willing to give it up, because, owing to the fact that there are two large local government institutions in the neighbourhood, and knowing how they are administered, he thought all that was necessary was to put in his tender at a low figure and afterwards have it raised. So, Sir, the farmers in the riding of East Simcoe are assured that while millions and millions are being squandered by the government in big jobs, the Postmaster General is doing yeoman service in cutting down the wages of the unfortunate mail carriers. But, while this is going on, and while the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) palms off alleged jokes in this House, the farmer wants to know: What about coal oil? They want to know if the gentlemen in power now are the same gentlemen who went about the country a few years ago telling the people that they would reduce the duty on agricultural implements, and put coal oil on the free list. Well, they are the very same gentlemen. It is true they do not ride in an ordinary railway car to-day, but have private palace cars at their disposal whenever they want to indulge in a railway jaunt. True, they are not clothed as they were before; they are a little more gorgeous now. But after all, the farmer brushes off the veneer, and he finds that it is the same gentleman, and he puts the same question. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), was up in my riding, and I hope he will come again, because in the town of Gravenhurst where he spoke, the majority against me was afterwards smaller than it had been before. I would like him to come up and talk to the people about coal oil, because they will hear the other side of the story—how this government is in the grip of the Standard Oil Company, how they have the influence of the Standard Oil Company behind them. Everybody knows that the Standard Oil Company have this government in the hollow of their hand. They have already shown some signs of their strength. Judge Lister, who was a strong candidate in West Lambton—with all respect for the present member, I think equally strong with him—had a majority of 86 in the town of Sarnia, which I find on looking at the returns is a large majority; but since the government made the deal with the Standard Oil Company, that company showed its strength by increasing that majority in the by-election in Sarnia, to 474. The policy of the Liberal-Conservative administration with regard to coal oil was to protect the native industry, thereby bringing about a fair competition, so that fair prices and only fair prices should be paid by the consumer. But as soon as these gentlemen came into power they found the old applicants knocking at their doors, who had knocked at the doors of the Liberal-Conservative government in vain, namely, the Standard Oil Company. Every time that great monopoly applied to the Liberal-Conservative government for privileges, they were denied; but at their first knock, this government were prepared to accede to their wishes; and what happened? A gentleman who was head and shoulders above many members of this administration, but who was not taken into the cabinet—I refer to Judge Lister—after begging and entreating these hon. gentlemen not to make the concession to the Standard Oil Company, allowing them to bring in oil in ships. When he saw that all chance of an effective appeal was gone, stood up in this Chamber on the 19th of June, 1897, and said:

Mr. BENNETT.

The difficulty is this that these tank ships are in the hands of one vast corporation, who will use them to compel the railway companies to carry their oil at a lower rate than they gave to the other oil refiners of the country, and in that way secure an advantage over the trade which I venture to predict will compel the trade to yield to that corporation, so that the oil interests of this country will be in the hands of one great monopoly in a short time.

These were words of wisdom from Judge Lister. He knew the situation. He was simply demanding fair-play on the part of the people of the country as a whole. The Standard Oil Company, was a great, greedy corporation, with their hands at the throat of this government. Judge Lister was not as strong as the Standard Oil Company, and the government came down and gave them that concession. What has happened? Everything that Mr. Lister said has proved true. To-day, the country is under the ban of this monopoly. The farmer and the artisan who have not the competition of the electric light and gas are forced to pay prices for their coal oil almost 50 per cent higher than they paid a few years ago. And where does this government stand? This government, who have on the statute-book a law providing that any monopoly or trust shall be dealt with, do not dare to touch the Standard Oil Company, because that company is their master; and the proof exists to-day, in the fact that the Standard Oil Company are exacting from the people of Canada 25 and 30 cents a gallon for coal oil when it is selling in the United States for 9 and 10 cents a gallon. If there was fair competition in this country, there would be a reduction in the prices. There are other American companies besides the Standard Oil Company. On their bended knees these companies have come to this government and have asked them to remove the duty on coal oil. To-day the whole coal oil interest of Canada is in the hands of the Standard Oil Company, and the government are not protecting Canadians by keeping up the duty, but they are protecting this gigantic American monopoly; and these companies have asked the government to throw the field open and let all companies compete in a fair field with no favours. That was not done. The representatives of the Standard Oil Company were here when the last budget speech was delivered. Every one knows them by the size of their diamonds. They left the city after the government had announced that there would be no changes in the tariff; and the next day a cent a gallon was placed on coal oil, the result of which was that the Standard Oil Company made $200,000 out of the people of Canada. A little time ago, in the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, a court of the country, the rival oil companies came and proved not only that the Standard Oil Company were holding this government by the throat, but that they also held up the railways. It was proved in evidence that under the old coal oil tariff, before October, 1898, the rate on coal oil from Buffalo to Montreal was 23 cents per hundred pounds, and from Sarnia to Montreal 25 cents per hundred pounds. The Canadian oil producer had to pay 25 cents per hundred pounds from Sarnia to Montreal, while the Standard Oil Company had to pay only 23 cents per hundred pounds from Buffalo to Montreal, and it will be noted that Sarnia was 80 miles further from Montreal than Buffalo. As soon as the government had made the concession to the Standard Oil Company, allowing them to bring in their oil in ship tanks, they were in this shape. They went to the railway companies, and they said: If you will not carry our coal oil at the rate we set and carry the coal oil of rival companies at the rates we dictate, we will bring it in tank ships, which our good friends of the Dominion government have allowed us, to all points on the lakes and rivers. For example, we can bring a tank ship to Toronto, pump the oil out there, and distribute it all through the city, and be entirely independent of the railway companies. We can bring a tank vessel to the town of Windsor, take out so many gallons, and distribute that in wagons throughout the country, and be independent of the railways. What did the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway say? They said: We admit the truth of this. If you persist in doing this, and the government have allowed you the privilege, you will be able to deal altogether independently of the railway companies. The evidence given before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council proved that Mr. Laird, the freight agent, said the lower rates were made to compete with vessels, and made in December, 1898, and the proposition then was received from the Standard Oil Company. Speaking on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway, Judge Clark said:

The Canadian Pacific Railway agreed with the Standard Oil Company to raise the rate from Buffalo and lower the rate from Sarnia to different points conditional on their not using the tank steamers.

What was the position? The Standard Oil Company, thanks to the favour of this government, obtained the privilege of bringing in their oil in tank ships. They had the railways by the throat, and said to them: 'We have control of all the oil interests at Sarnia. You are charging us to-day from Sarnia to Montreal, 25 cents per 100 pounds, and you are charging the rival companies from Buffalo to Montreal, 23 cents per 100 pounds. What we want you to do is this: We want you to charge us from Sarnia to Montreal only 20 cents per 100 pounds instead of 25 cents, and we want you to charge the rival companies who are doing business in Canada, 35 cents, instead of 25 cents, from Buffalo to Montreal.' That is the bargain which to-day exists between the railway companies and the Standard Oil Company. The rival companies bring their oil to Buffalo. If they want to take it to Montreal, they have to pay 35 cents per 100 pounds, while all the Standard Oil Company has to pay is 20 cents from Sarnia to Montreal. And here is this government aiding and abetting the Standard Oil monopoly, in keeping up this infamous trust to the detriment and cost of the consumer. What is the government to do? Judge Lister told them. He said, abolish the tank system. What do these other oil companies tell them to do? They say, take the duty off coal oil. These rival companies have what are known as pipes from the oil wells, to a point on Lake Erie. They can take advantage of these pipes to tranship into tanks, but as soon as they touch the Canadian frontier with their tanks, they cannot do any business with the railway companies because the railways are under the control of the Standard Oil Company. What then is the course to be pursued? Let this government take the duty off coal oil, and the opposition companies can bring their oil in, whether in tanks or cars. Then, let this government have the strength to grapple with the railways, and forbid the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway discriminating by charging 35 cents to the opposition companies, and only 20 cents to the Standard Oil Company. But this government is not strong enough to do that, and are allowing the farmers and consumers of coal oil to be bled white by the Standard Company, rather than incur the hostility and ill-will of that company, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Grand Trunk Railway.

We have in the part of the country from which I come, a matter that is exciting a great deal of interest, and it is this: We have had, thanks to the local government of the province of Ontario, according to the view of the opposition, a great revival in the industry of manufacturing lumber. There was a time when the local government of Ontario permitted pine timber to go out of the country in logs to be manufactured in the United States. Under the stress of public opinion, however, the Ontario government changed the law. But this government does not wish to keep in the country the logs cut in Canada, but prefers that they shall go out to be manufactured in the United States; and to-day, under licenses to cut timber, on what is known as Indian lands, millions of feet of timber are being exported from Canada to the United States. This government is afraid of the American lumbermen, just as it is afraid of the Standard Oil Company. If it had the strength which the Ontario government has had, it would compel the manufacture in the province of Ontario of the millions of feet of lumber that are going out in logs to the United States. But worse than that, while this government permits the logs of this country to be exported to the United States for manufacture, and while the United States charges a heavy duty on the sawn lumber of this country, this government allows American lumber to be imported into this country free of duty. Last year there was brought into this country from the United States, over $2,000,000 of wood imports, consisting of sawn boards, staves, posts, laths, and other descriptions of sawn lumber. Here is a government which is supposed to be legislating for the Dominion, allowing the Americans to send into Canada, to compete with our manufactures, over $2,000,000 of wood products, free of duty, and yet will not take measures to prevent the export of Canadian logs to the United States. What is the reason? It is simply this, that these gentlemen are altogether oblivious of the interests of what they consider a small part of the province of Ontario, namely, the counties that border to the Georgian Bay, and which are interested in this business. But in this connection the government will find to their sorrow, that the lumber interests of that section—as shown last year by an immense deputation—are hostile to the government on account of the unfair proposition that they have placed in the fiscal policy of this country. They will also find that the employees of the mills in this country, are strongly against the government, by reason of the fact, that although the government talk of an alien labour law, to prevent Americans working in Canadian mills, while Canadians are debarred from working in American mills—

Mr. COWAN. Where?

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman has been dining, and has forgotten.

Mr. COWAN. Not at all. The hon. gentleman is making a statement on a subject he knows nothing about, and which is entirely apart from the fact.

Mr. BENNETT. I have heard many arguments from that source, and they are always about as conclusive as the present one. These hon. gentlemen find themselves, after four years of pure humbugging, in rather a tight place. The farmers have been humbugged just as have been the prohibitionists, and these hon. gentlemen are looking in every direction to find a prop that will support them. They have seen the fall of the Greenway government; they see the wreck of the Ross government in Ontario; they see the means by which the local government in Prince Edward Island is endeavouring to hang on to power; they see their humiliation in Hamilton, when they had to take a senatorship from that town and give it to Brockville, because they were afraid to open a riding in Hamilton. Either that or we must conclude that there was not a Liberal in that city qualified for a senatorship, and I should be sorry to say that that was the case. What then is the result? Finding that they have humbugged the people in every direction, they are starting out on a new track. They are starting out on the loyalty cry. They are shouting loyalty from the house-tops. But that cry comes ill from them, considering where they have been years before. They know that every statement which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) is making throughout the country, must have attached to it a considerable amount of weight. They know that in the province of Ontario, which is heart in hand with Britain in this great contest, and that in the province of Quebec, many of whose people are equally patriotic and earnest in their devotion to the mother country, the statements which the Minister of Public Works is making, are condemning this government in the opinion of the people. Take the statement made by the Minister of Public Works in Paris the other day:

It is very possible that in their own minds 99 per cent of the French Canadians disapprove of the South African war, and are of opinion that the money spent by Canada in this connection might have been spent with more practical results elsewhere.

And he further says:

The French Canadians do not desire that the sending of a contingent to South Africa without the previous assent of parliament should in any case be considered a precedent.

They feel that, owing to these statements by prominent members of the administration, they are losing ground in the province of Ontario, and in every English-speaking province; and they know that by reason of their past utterances on trade questions, they are losing ground also. And so these hon. gentlemen are vying with one another now, in raising the cry of loyalty. They start out with the preference to Great Britain. I for one am willing that every possible means should be taken to strengthen, if necessary, the bonds between ourselves and the mother country; but I do not think that the people or the statesmen of Great Britain wish to see the industrial and manufacturing interests of this country injured for the purpose of bringing British goods into this country. But hon. gentlemen opposite seek to bolster themselves up by making a great cry about their preferential tariff. But how does that preference work? We know that we do not today, and never will, import from Great Britain agricultural implements or wagons. We do not import from Great Britain the necessaries generally used by the farmers of our country. These, so far as they are imported, are drawn from the United States. And when these hon. gentlemen go about the country and tell the farmers that they are conferring upon them great benefits by allowing the importation of goods from Great Britain, the farmers and artisans are intelligent enough to know that what we are bringing in from Great Britain are not the necessaries they use, but the luxuries of the rich people. Every one knows, by consulting the Trade and Navigation Returns, that our imports from Great Britain are silks, high-priced clothing, woollen goods of a superior class, and not such goods as are used by the masses in this country. Great Britain has never evinced through her statesmen, any expectation that such a policy should be carried out. It will be remembered that when the Premier was treating with Mr. Chamberlain and others a year or two ago, the Premier himself—I give the gist of what he said—declared that we did not ask any benefits from Great Britain, but only wanted to give Great Britain the preference in our markets. Intimation must have been made that the British government were prepared to make concessions, otherwise there would be no sequence in what was said by the Premier and Mr. Chamberlain. To my mind, the people of this country want to make an arrangement with Great Britain, if they can, by which the exports from our firms will be placed on the British market on a preferential basis. That may be done by placing a duty on grain and other produce going from the United States and other countries into Britain, while permitting what may come from Canada to enter there free of duty. If such a thing can be brought about, it is the thing to be desired by all Canadians, because it would mean the enrichment of the Canadian farmer. But the preference that exists to-day does not mean to the masses of the people of Canada any advantage or any benefit. And it must be borne in mind that while we are importing and have imported large quantities of high class goods from Great Britain, those goods are not the manufacture of Great Britain at all. Any gentlemen who have seen the ordinary samples displayed in wholesale houses or by commercial travellers, will have had this pointed out, that a large percentage of the woollen goods imported are not made in England at all, but are made in Belgium, Germany and other countries where there is cheap labour. That was strongly brought before the House and the country when these hon. gentlemen brought down their preferential tariff. It was pointed out to them then, that there would be imported from Great Britain goods that were not made in Great Britain. The government said: We do not intend to allow continental goods to come in under the reduction, but only such as have been to a substantial extent produced by British labour. They were asked for a definition of the word 'substantial,' and they simply replied by saying that it was a substantial amount. The result was that the appraisers in the different custom-houses, as was to have been expected, could not agree as to what was a substantial proportion of work in the manufacture of these goods by the application of British labour. Last year the government provided that if 25 per cent of the work in any given article was British, it should be admitted under the preference. The consequence of this is that the preference which exists nominally in favour of Great Britain, is far more a preference in favour of German and Belgium goods upon which the trifling change of 25 per cent has been made in Great Britain. Now, I have detained the House at greater length than I intended, and I shall resume my seat. While hon. gentlemen opposite have discussed the budget at great length, they have done nothing but try to excuse and extenuate what the government have done for the last four years. I am not going to prophesy what will be the result of the general elections when they come on. But I point to the signs of the times. The province of Manitoba has spoken, and spoken unmistakably. In the province of British Columbia, the present Premier feels so afraid of having it supposed that this government is assisting him, that he is publishing everywhere with pride the announcement that this government will not assist him at all. He feels that the endorsement of this government means certain defeat, as it meant for Mr. Greenway. The Conservatives stand shoulder to shoulder. It is a matter of great gratification to the Conservative party that, while, in the past, they may have been rent asunder, while they may have had fightings within and fears without in former days, to-day they present a united and solid front. It is not necessary that every hon. gentleman on this side who rises to address the House should, as hon. gentlemen opposite seem to deem necessary, deal in great adulation and praise of their leader. All I can say is that our leader stands without praise; if their leader must be bolstered up with praise, I say, in the name of goodness let them bolster him up. The people of Canada are an intelligent and thinking people. They will judge the government by their past. They will consider them as they appeared in their convention in Ottawa in 1893; they will compare their promises with their platform when it comes to the vote; and they will judge them on their record. But here are some of the things that these hon. gentlemen will be compelled to face: While in other years they told the people that thirty-eight millions was an outrageous expenditure, they will have to seek excuses for an expenditure of over fifty-two millions; while they told the people that the whole aim and desire of Canada should be to have a reciprocity treaty with the people of the United States, they will be forced to explain the words of the Premier recorded in last year's Hansard, that the trade of the United States is not a trade that this country particularly desires after all. They will be forced to meet their friends to whom they have made pledges of economy, and pledges all along the line of moral reform, and the result will be that they will meet that punishment at the hands of the electorate that they richly deserve. But there is one class of the community who to-day are anxious to pass their sentence upon this government, and that is the great moral class of this country, the men who believe that whether or not these 14 or 15 gentlemen should receive their $7,000 or $8,000 a year, they do believe that the rising generation of this country should be taught that the men who make pledges in public life should respect them as much as if they were made in private life. They believe that the men who carry on their election contests on the principle that might should prevail and not right, are not the men who can be held up as models for the younger part of this community. When the blackened record of these men is looked over, when the infamies they have perpetrated in every riding in the province of Ontario are considered, when they have seen, as they have seen in my own riding, a minister of the Crown side by side and face to face with a confirmed scoundrel, they will think either that the minister is low down or that the scoundrel is away up. There has not been a constituency that these hon. gentlemen have gone into, whether it was West Huron, or Cornwall, or East Simcoe, where they dare go back and repeat their notorious practices, and there is not a constituency in the whole province of Ontario where honest Liberals do not blush to-day for the infamies that have been perpetrated by these men to endeavour to keep themselves in power, and trying to stem the tide of popular disapproval that is fast setting in against them.

Mr. BENNETT.

Mr. VALENTINE RATZ (North Middlesex). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great attention to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and I must say that I think he has adopted the very wise course of refraining to place himself on record as a prophet, or the son of a prophet, in regard to the results of the general elections. I think every member on this side of the House and every member of the Liberal party outside of it is quite willing to abide by the result of the next election, and quite confident of what that result will be. Now, the hon. gentleman has found some fault with the ministers who were sent by this government to Washington to discuss trade questions with the United States government, and he has found some fault with their bill for cab-hire. I am not going to say whether that expenditure was proper or not, but it seems to have been only an ordinary item of expenditure that has been incurred by members of both governments when they were in power. I will just remind the hon. gentleman of a similar expenditure which occurred in June, 1896, when the leader of the opposition, with one of his colleagues, the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), not only rode in a private car when they came to the town of Exeter, in North Middlesex, but they did not find that private car sufficiently spacious, and so they engaged a special train in which they steamed up to Exeter. There they delivered their orations, and after they got through they steamed to the town of Strathroy, and after they got through there they returned to the city of London. Now, I would ask any member of this House, or any elector of this country, whether they deem that a proper expenditure for the country to pay. I do not object to an expenditure for cab-hire or for a private car by members of the government when they are on an official trip; but I am opposed to either ministers or servants travelling in private cars unless they travel in their official capacity.

The hon. member who has just spoken, referred to the action of the Postmaster General cutting down the wages of the mail carriers. He stated that some of the mail carriers were paid the meagre salary of $1.08 or $1.10 for carrying the mail 32 miles. That may be a very small amount for the work done, but I can only say that these contracts were let by public tender. If the Postmaster General had gone to work and granted twice that sum, what would hon. gentlemen opposite have said? We know that they are always claiming that all these public works should be let by tender. That has been done, and the lowest tender has been accepted. Now, I think the hon. gentleman should not find fault with the departments in that respect. We all know that the late government let mail contracts that ran from year to year. Some time ago letters were read in this House relating to contracts in the constituency of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRiviere), where tenders had been invited. After the tenders had been sent in, the previous contractor went to the member of that constituency and asked him to write to the Postmaster General to have his contract renewed. The hon. member wrote a letter to the Post Office Department and the contract was renewed, without the tenders having been opened. After the change of government and the present Postmaster General took hold of the department, the tenders were opened up, and what was the result? It was found that tenders had been sent in that were actually $100 lower than the sum at which the contract was renewed. That letter was read while the hon. member for Provencher was in his seat, and he could not deny a single word of it.

Now, hon. gentlemen opposite have had a good deal to say in condemnation of the financial policy of this government, but I have not so far heard a single word or argument from them that in any way controverted the masterly statement made by the Minister of Finance. We know that not very long ago the leader of the opposition made a statement from his seat in this House that not a single thing had been done by his government that was in the interest of this country. Well, we know that as soon as a change of government took place the Minister of Agriculture immediately gave his attention to the quarantine regulations that existed between Canada and the United States, and secured their abolition. What was the result? Previous to the abolition of the quarantine regulations cattle exported from Canada to the United States had to be quarantined at the boundary for 90 days. This practically meant the prohibition of the exportation of cattle to the United States. We know that if they had to be fed and cared for at the boundary for ninety days the expense would all have to come out of the price of the cattle, and, therefore, it was almost a prohibition of the exportation of cattle to the United States. But, after these regulations were abolished we found that the farmers of Canada were able to sell cattle to the United States at prices previously unknown. During the four and a half years that the quarantine regulations were in force 3,762 animals were exported at a value of $52,000. In the two and a half years since the quarantine was removed, 213,000 head of cattle were exported to the United States, valued at over $3,000,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask any sane man if that action was not of the greatest benefit to the farmers of this country. Any new market that is found for our surplus goods, that will bring millions of money back to this country, must surely be a benefit to this country. The cold storage system which was introduced by this government, which enabled the farmers to place on the British market their perishable products in a fresh condition, and created a new market for the Canadian people, was also the means of bringing more money into Canada. Was that not also a great benefit to the Canadian people? Now, I have here a list of the shipments of products that were exported from Canada to Great Britain in the years 1893, 1894, 1895, 1896, and on to 1899. It is as follows:

Year.	Quantity.	Value.
Butter—
1893	7,036,013	$ 1,296,814
1894	5,534,621	1,095,588
1895	3,650,258	697,476
1896	5,899,241	1,052,089
		$ 4,141,967
1897	11,453,351	2,089,173
1898	11,253,787	2,046,686
1899	20,139,195	3,700,873
Six months to Dec. 31, 1899.	22,965,987	4,675,807
		12,512,539
Increase		$ 8,370,572

The cold storage system was properly introduced in 1899. There is not a sane man but who would attribute the increase in butter exportation to the cold storage system which has been introduced by this government.

Mr. RATZ.

Year.	Quantity.	Value.
Cheese—
1893	133,946,365	$13,407,470
1894	154,977,480	15,488,191
1895	146,004,650	14,253,002
1896	164,689,123	13,956,571
		$57,105,234
1897	164,220,699	14,676,239
1898	196,703,323	17,573,763
1899	189,827,839	16,776,765
Six months to Dec. 31, 1899.	137,228,887	14,407,951
		63,433,718
Increase		$ 5,328,484
Eggs—
1893	6,805,432	$ 868,007
1894	5,141,586	714,054
1895	6,500,817	807,990
1896	6,520,678	807,086
		$ 3,197,137
1897	7,476,636	978,479
1898	10,369,996	1,255,304
1899	9,652,512	1,267,063
Six months to Dec. 31, 1899.	8,964,356	1,169,710
		4,670,550
Increase		$ 1,473,413
Bacon—
1893	17,288,311	$ 1,830,368
1894	26,826,840	2,754,479
1895	37,526,058	3,546,107
1896	47,057,642	3,802,135
		$11,833,089
1897	59,546,050	5,060,393
1898	76,844,948	7,291,285
1899	111,868,938	9,953,582
Six months to Dec. 31, 1899.	68,160,142	6,217,787
		28,523,047
Increase		$16,689,958
Recapitulation of Increases.
Bacon		16,689,958
Cheese		5,328,484
Eggs		1,473,413
Bacon.....		16,689,958

Increases during Liberal period..... $31,826,427
I claim, Mr. Speaker, that a great many of these increases are due to the introduction of the cold storage system by this government.

Mr. TAYLOR. It was introduced by the late government and continued by this government.

Mr. RATZ. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), has told us time and again that the late government had been talking about introducing the cold storage system, and that they had formulated their plans, but the whole thing ended in talk until this government came into power. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that the present government have adopted their policy, stolen their clothes, followed their footsteps. Hon. gentlemen claim that their policy was the best policy that could be promulgated for Canada, they say that we have adopted it, yet they find fault with what this government has done, and criticise us severely. If their contention is correct, if the present government is carrying out the best policy for Canada, why should these hon. gentlemen find fault? If the prosperity that Canada is enjoying at the present time is due to the old national policy as claimed by hon. gentlemen opposite, why did it not bring prosperity to Canada under the reign of hon. gentlemen while they held the reigns of power? If it is the Conservative policy, then the government in power is to be congratulated for carrying it into effect, because hon. gentlemen failed to enforce it in such a way as to bring prosperity to Canada.

When the Fielding tariff was introduced in 1897, hon. gentlemen declared in this House that the Liberal policy would mean ruin and wreck to the manufacturing industries of Canada. It was not the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite then, but it was found to work successfully, when it infused new life into the business enterprise of Canada, stimulated agricultural interests, turned a time of depression into a time of prosperity and has been a success in every respect. Now hon. gentlemen opposite lay claim to this policy and ask it to be christened a child of the old father, of the national policy. In comparing the tariff of the present government, or the Fielding tariff, with the Foster tariff, you will find that great reductions were made, and thereby millions of dollars were saved to the taxpayers of Canada. Figures are very dry and uninteresting to listen to, but in order to show some of the savings to the people of Canada between the present tariff and the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite for last year, I will be compelled to use a few figures as follows:

Comparative reductions between the tariff of the late government and the tariff of the present government.

Article.	Present tariff.	Old tariff.
Indian corn	Nil.	$549,977
Binder twine.....	Nil.	102,300
Barbed fencing wire.....	Nil.	126,885
Galvanized iron or steel wire, Nos. 9, 12 and 13 gauge.....	Nil.	42,980
Cream separators	Nil.	45,000
Seed beans from Britain.....	Nil.	15
Rape seed, sowing.....	Nil.

Agricultural Implements.

Article.	Present tariff.	Old tariff.
Farm, road or field rollers.....	$ 40	$ 56
Forks, pronged	2,753	3,858
Hay tedders	1,163	1,628
Hoes	772	1,093
Knives of hay or straw.....	26	36
Manure spreaders	140	175
Post-hole diggers	48	68
Potato diggers	73	107
Rakes, n.e.s.	1,226	1,716
Scythes and snaths, sickles or reaping hooks	8,258	11,994

Article.	Present tariff.	Old tariff.
	$	$
Spades and shovels, and spade and shovel blanks, and iron or steel cut to shape for same....	8,865	10,851
All other agricultural implements, n.e.s.	5,409	7,616
Wind-mills	3,926	4,711
Threshers and separators.....	17,934	21,521
All other portable machines....	11,367	15,974

Iron and Steel Manufactures.

Wire fencing, woven, and wire fencing of iron and steel, n.e.s.	3,395	6,524
Stoves	31,693	34,915
Axes	10,353	14,494
Saws	23,146	25,288
Files and rasps, n.e.s.	22,224	26,876
Tools, hand or machine, of all kinds, n.o.p.	142,966	171,746
Table cutlery, n.o.p.	47,212	64,616
Nails and spikes, cut.....	4,554	6,942
Nails, wire, of all kinds, n.o.p...	2,330	3,884
Butts and hinges.....	5,104	5,565
Sleighs	1,487	1,785
Cart or wagon skeins or boxes..	239	321

Miscellaneous Articles.

Coal oil	$424,888	$509,866
Collars of all kinds.....	18,268	33,346

Woollen Manufactures.

Blankets	$ 11,582	$ 15,906
Cassimeres	35,284	42,786
Cloths	388,156	467,565
Coatings	144,961	182,747
Overcoatings	2,452	3,006
Tweeds	141,936	171,324
Flannels	18,337	21,501
Knitted goods, including knitted underwear	65,456	74,230
Shawls	18,737	19,682
Shirts	10,689	12,349
Socks and stockings	177,722	265,762
Undershirts and drawers.....	22,563	25,411
All fabrics and manufactures, n.e.s.	971,037	1,022,005
Clothing, ready-made, and wearing apparel	313,052	351,491
Hosiery	5,714	7,233
Carpet, tapestry	127,451	143,130
Carpet, 2-ply and 3-ply.....	6,280	7,856

Cotton Manufactures.

White or bleached fabrics.....	$105,735	$122,217
Fabrics, printed, dyed or coloured	901,035	940,266
Handkerchiefs	44,093	48,147
Shirts, other	8,679	10,945
Sewing thread on spools.....	59,395	71,004
Clothing	105,996	109,235
Socks and stockings	25,362	34,417
Towels	7,777	8,303
Velvets, velveteens and plush fabrics	53,036	66,987

Flax, Hemp and Jute Manufactures.

Carpeting, rugs, matting and mats of hemp or jute.....	$ 30,496	$ 38,459
Damask of linen	86,850	93,068
Handkerchiefs	35,425	38,941
Linen, brown or bleached.....	10,509	17,296
Linen thread.....	22,136	22,775
Shirts of linen	1,606	1,989

On bituminous coal there has been a saving of $157,000; on coal oil, $85,000; on Indian corn, $550,000; on iron and steel manufactures, $850,000; on binder twine, $102,000; on barbed wire, $126,000; on galvanized fencing wire, $43,000; on cream separators, $45,000; on books and printed matter, $69,000; on cotton goods from Great Britain under the preferential tariff, $163,000. In woollens from England, under the preferential tariff there was a saving of $451,000. Now, woollens are as much an absolute necessity in every household as coal oil or many other articles. In hats, caps and bonnets there was a saving of $52,000; in fancy goods, $32,000; flax, hemp and jute, $35,000; earthenware and china, $41,000; drugs, dyes and chemicals, $21,000. These reductions I have mentioned on woollens, cottons, silks, hats, caps, and bonnets, flax, hemp and jute, earthenware and china, and drugs, dyes, and chemicals, are reductions on importations under the preferential tariff. Other reductions could be shown, Mr. Speaker, but these, perhaps, are the chief ones, and if you total them up you will find that they amount to $2,885,000. And who says that is not a material reduction in the rate of duty that the people of this country have to pay?

This should convince any person who wishes to take an honest view of the question that there have been enormous reductions made in the rate of taxation to the Canadian people. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to take great pride in the fact that a great many articles have advanced in price, but I am sure that they will not undertake to blame this government for raising the price of articles in all the markets of the world. We know that some years ago if a farmer had a horse to sell he would get $50 or $100 for it according to the class of animal it was, but if he had the same horse to sell to-day he would get double the price he could get some years ago. In the same way wheat, pork, butter, cheese, and other articles have advanced in price in the markets of the world, and no government either in this or any other country, can regulate prices throughout the world. I can only say that if hon. gentlemen opposite were ruling the country to-day, there is no doubt the markets of the world would be the same. What would they say then? Would they say that their policy was the means of increasing those articles in price? I maintain that a reduction in the tariff has a tendency to cheapen the goods imported into the country. If the duty had not been taken off binder twine, the farmers would have to pay 12½ per cent more for it at present than they do. The other day the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) delivered a masterly speech from his standpoint; but he found a great deal of fault with the tariff changes as made by this government. He took the farmers under his fatherly care, and told this House and the country that the government were the cause of raising the price of binder twine. He told us that the government were holding their twine at 14 cents per pound, and by so doing enabled other manufacturers to hold their twine at high figures also. Why, Sir, by placing binder twine on the free list, the government placed all the Canadian factories in competition with each other and with the world. So, if the government hold their twine too high, competing manufacturers are ready to undersell them. When this government came into power in 1896, they did not put their twine on the market. It was lying at Kingston, and it did not go into competition with the binder twine of other Canadian factories. I suppose they thought that if they entered into competition they would reduce the profits of the other manufacturers. This is a matter of business, and twine manufacturers are as anxious to do business as any other class of business men. The manufacturers all come into competition with each other, and the business regulates itself the same as any other business, and prices are cut to the lowest possible profit.

Mr. RATZ.

The hon. member had also something to say about post-hole diggers. He admitted that the reduction of duty on these had benefited the farmers; but it was only to a very meagre degree, as the importation was not large, and only some $20 or $30 was saved to the Canadian people on post-hole diggers. But the hon. gentleman must remember that nearly all the post-hole diggers that are used in Canada are manufactured in Canada, and on those the price was reduced to the extent of the reduction of the tariff, and has, therefore, been a saving of more than ten times as much to the farmers of Canada as the hon. gentleman has tried to have them believe. While the hon. gentleman had so much to say about the meagre sum saved to the farmers on post-hole diggers, he forgot, or, for some reason, omitted to tell this House that the government had saved to the farmers of Canada $170,000 by the reduction of duty on fence wire, and by placing fence wire on the free list. I suppose it did not suit his case, yet he tells the people that the tariff changes are of no benefit to the Canadian farmers.

The hon. gentleman also told us a great deal about the cotton duties. We were told in 1897, at the time of the tariff changes, that wreck, ruin and destruction would be the lot of the business industries in Canada through the Liberal policy which was then introduced. But, Sir, for the past two years, hon. gentlemen opposite have all agreed with us that Canada had never before been in as prosperous a condition as it is to-day.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman the other day again placed himself on record as a prophet. He told this House that as soon as the orders that were booked with the English cotton companies were filled, then cottons would be dumped on the Canadian market at such a low price that Canadian mills could not compete against them, and it would be the means of closing our mills.

Mr. HENDERSON. I did not say that.

Mr. RATZ. And again. Idle men are supposed to walk the streets, tall chimneys are expected to tumble down, the cotton mills would close their doors, and so on. So, the hon. member for Halton predicts. Why or for what reason is all this to happen? There must be a cause for it. The hon. member himself has given a very effective answer. He says that the preferential tariff granted in favour of Great Britain will be the means of reducing the prices of cotton to the Canadian people. It will make cheap cottons to the farmer, to the labouring man, to the artisan. The hon. member now sympathizes with the cotton manufacturers. His fatherly care for the farmer has ceased for the present moment. He allows the farmer to content himself with the reduction of duty on post-hole diggers.

The hon. gentleman knows and he admits that the preferential clause means a reduction of taxation, that it makes cheap cottons, he tells us that, and every consumer of cotton knows that a reduction in duties means cheaper goods. He was very much alarmed the other day about the closing of the cotton mills, but I noticed in the newspaper the other night that some of the eastern cotton mills are nearly doubling their capacity. I notice that some of them are adding 3,000 horse power to their motive power. These gentlemen understand the preferential clause just as well as any one, and if they thought that their business was going to be injured by it, they would not go on increasing their plant.

The hon. member told this House that he was perfectly satisfied himself with the reduction of postage, and that it was a great boon to the business man; but here again the poor farmer suffers very heavily, because he does not write as many letters as the business man writes. I would like to ask the hon. member in what respect the farmer or anybody else was injured? We remember quite well that under the rule of hon. gentlemen opposite there was a deficit in the Post Office Department of $781,000. At that time repeated demands were made by the people of Canada for a reduction in the postal rate; but, Sir, we were always told that it was impossible. We were told that the department was managed with the greatest care, and that the greatest economy was practised, and that with a deficit of over three-quarters of a million dollars, the request could never be granted. But, Sir, when a change had taken place, when this government came into power, when the pruning knife had been applied, when the useless hangers-on had been cleared away, and mail contracts let by public tender, and the department placed under proper business management, then, Sir, a rapid change soon took place.

In two short years the Post Office Department was placed on an equilibrium, a reduction in the management of the department of three-quarters of a million dollars was made in that short time, the mail-carrying mileage was increased by hundreds of miles per day, hundreds of new post offices were opened up all over the country, and a mail service established into the far-off Yukon district, and yet the hon. the Postmaster General was able to grant a penny postage rate, which is a great boon to all classes of the Canadian people.

And, Sir, what is the result? Is it a deficit of $781,000, such as existed under hon. gentlemen opposite? Not at all. Is it a deficit of a million dollars, as predicted by the hon. leader of the opposition? Not so, Sir. A deficit of $388,071, with a 2 cent rate, or less than half of what it was under hon. gentlemen opposite, with a 3 cent rate and a 5 cent rate to Great Britain. Does the hon. member for Halton think that such a record would incense the farmers of Canada very much? Does he think they are dissatisfied when they get cheaper letter rates, and the country a better and cheaper mail service?

The hon. member spoke at considerable length of the leather and glove industries, stating that in his opinion they were ill-treated, and very badly used, and that serious crippling of that business would follow. And for why? Because of the preferential tariff which has made a great reduction in prices of leather goods. The hon. gentleman has a very sweet faculty of changing his attitude. A short time ago he was spreading his tender wings over the farmers and consumers of Canada, claiming that they were not well enough treated by the government, because the reductions of the tariff did not go far enough to benefit the farmers. But, Sir, now the leather men are suffering, and the glove men are suffering, and the farmers, and consumers of those goods, are profiting too much by the tariff reductions. I may say to my hon. friend that where it suits him to soothe the farmer he has a happy faculty of doing so, and where he considers it convenient to nurse the manufacturer, he also extends him a helping hand.

Mr. Speaker, under the policy of the present government the affairs of the country were well and economically managed, new life was inflated into the business industries of Canada, raw material was made cheaper, so that the manufacturer to-day is able to compete with his manufactured goods in the markets of the world.

The farmer was placed in a better position, taxation upon his articles of consumption was reduced, better markets for his products were secured, and he is in a more prosperous condition, under the policy of the present government, than he ever was heretofore. The artisan, the labouring man, are in a far better position under the policy of the present government than ever they were before. Factories are filled with orders, shops are working overtime, work is more plentiful, wages have increased, and the demands for labour are increasing everywhere. Such are the conditions of things under an honest and economical management of the best government that Canada has ever had.

Mr. CRAIG moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, April 26, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE FIRE IN HULL AND OTTAWA.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, we meet to-day under very sad circumstances. The terrible fire which is now raging, has already destroyed part of the city of Hull and part of the city of Ottawa, and at this moment, millions of dollars' worth of property have gone up in smoke. Amongst other calamities, I understand, the electric light works and all other light works have been destroyed, which will make it impossible for this House to sit. Therefore, I see no option for us but to adjourn for some days. Therefore, with the concurrence of the House, I move, seconded by the hon. senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), that when this House adjourns, it stand adjourned until Tuesday next. In the meantime, I may say, my colleague, the acting Minister of Public Works (Mr. Mulock), has done what he could, to assist in preventing the spread of this terrible calamity. This forenoon, when it became evident that the fire was dangerous, the following telegram was sent to the mayors of Montreal, Peterborough and Brockville:

Please send to Ottawa by special train, at government expense, whatever fire appliances and other assistance you can spare to help in fighting disastrous conflagration here. Most urgent. Fire spreading with dangerous rapidity.

Mr. RATZ.

(Signed) WILLIAM MULOCK,
Acting M. P. W.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). The calamity which has befallen the sister city, and which is threatening Ottawa, is of such a nature that, in my opinion, the government are quite right in moving the adjournment of the House. It seems to me, as it does to the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), that it is impossible that we should meet, from the fact that all the power houses are destroyed. I would like to make one suggestion—though, probably, the matter has been attended to. I would ask the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), if he would not consider that it would be right and proper to call out the volunteers.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron), will be glad to know that that was done about four hours ago.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am glad of it, but thought I would suggest it in case it had not been done.

Motion agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, May 1, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PORTAGE DU FORT AND FRENCH RIVER RAILWAY.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved that the fees paid on Bill (No. 97) to incorporate the Portage du Fort and French River Railway Company be refunded, less cost of printing and translation, according to the recommendation contained in the eleventh report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Annual report of the Department of Militia and Defence.—(Mr. Borden.)

Report of the Department of the Interior for the year 1899.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

Report of the Minister of Justice.—Penitentiaries.—(Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

THE GENERAL INSPECTION ACT.

The Order being called,

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia) moved that the Order for the introduction of a Bill standing in his name, to amend the General Inspection Act, be discharged. He said: The Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), having brought down a Bill dealing with the same subject, and as I shall have an opportunity in committee of bringing forward the views embodied in this Bill, I move that this Order be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 141) to regulate and supervise the grain trade in the inspection district of Manitoba.—(Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière.)

Bill (No. 142) respecting the inspection of foreign grain.—(Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière.)

SEED GRAIN INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 143) to amend the Act respecting securities for seed grain indebtedness.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the hon. gentleman state what it is?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is to relieve from all liability any of the sureties, or endorsers, or bondsmen who became security for those who got seed grain in the west.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

OCEAN STEAMSHIP SUBSIDIES.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved that to-morrow the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Act 52 Victoria, chap. 2, intituled: 'An Act relating to Ocean Steamship Subsidies,' so as to provide for a continuance of the authority given under the said Act to the Governor in Council to grant a subsidy for steamship service between British Columbia and China and Japan for such period or periods of time as may be deemed expedient, not, however, to exceed in the aggregate ten years and to pay therefor a subsidy or subsidies, as the case may be, of not exceeding the sum of fifteen thousand pounds (£15,000) sterling per annum for a monthly service, or not exceeding the sum of twenty-five thousand pounds (£25,000) sterling per annum for a fortnightly service.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to ask the indulgence of the House for a single moment to draw the attention of the hon. member for North Middlesex (Mr. Ratz) to a statement he made in my absence in regard to a matter which is of a personal character, and which, I am sure, hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House would give me an opportunity of explaining. The hon. gentleman, in his speech on the budget a few evenings ago, said:

I am not going to say whether that expenditure—

Referring to an expenditure by the government.

—was proper or not, but it seems to have been only an ordinary item of expenditure that has been incurred by members of both governments when they were in power. But I will just remind the hon. gentleman of a similar expenditure which occurred in June, 1896, when the leader of the opposition, with one of his colleagues, the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), not only rode in a private car when they came to the town of Exeter, in North Middlesex, but they did not find that private car sufficiently spacious, and so they engaged a special train with which they steamed up to Exeter. There they delivered their orations, and after they got through they steamed to the town of Strathroy and after they got through there they returned back to the city of London. Now, I would ask any member of this House, or any elector of this country, whether they deem that a proper expenditure for the country to pay.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that at that time I had the honour of holding the position of leader of the government. I may further say, that I think the hon. member for North Middlesex ought not to have made such a statement as that without having some foundation for it. Had he taken the trouble to refer to the Department of Railways and Canals he would have learned that not a farthing of expenditure connected with my progress to the province of Ontario at a general election, either for provisioning the private car or for any other railway charges, was borne by the government or by the people of this country. The account was rendered to myself by the representative of the manager of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and was discharged personally, not a farthing being charged to the country.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—MR. BOURASSA.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise to a question of personal explanation. A rumour has been going through the newspapers that I had refused to appear before the Public Accounts Committee to give explanation as to expenditures in connection with my secretaryship on the Joint High Commission. I did not mind much these rumours. I always remember the words that I heard upon one occasion used by Lord Herschell, that even if he were accused by the newspapers of having murdered his father, hanged his mother, poisoned his children and drowned his wife, he would not take the trouble to correct the report. However, some of my friends told me that I had better give some explanation of the circumstances.

The facts are very simple, and they are these. Not being a member of the Public Accounts Committee, I was not present at the meeting at which the matter was brought up; but, in the evening papers I read that some member of the committee, I believe the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), proposed that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who was one of the commissioners, and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who was one of the joint secretaries, should appear before the committee. The hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) said that it would be proper to call the hon. member for Labelle, and not the hon. member for North Norfolk—at least, it is what I read in the newspapers. Of course, I was a little surprised at that, especially as the commissioners are accountable to the government of this country and to parliament for their expenditure, whilst I am not, not on account of my position in itself, but on account of the dispositions that were adopted at that time by the commission itself. But, I do not mind that. I received, in the evening, a very courteous letter from the president of the committee asking me to appear at the next meeting, Monday, the 9th of April. As I was called out of Ottawa upon special business on that day, I replied in what I thought to be a courteous letter to the president of the committee, not refusing to appear, but simply explaining the facts that I am going to put before the House now.

When it was decided that a commission would be organized between representatives of the British government and representatives of the American government in May, 1898, it was decided that each government should defray the expenses of its own commissioners, and that any joint expenses incurred by order of the Joint High Commission, and so certified, should be paid in equal moieties by the two governments, British and American. At the first sitting of the commission in Quebec, on the 27th of August, Mr. Chandler Anderson, on the part of the United States, Mr. W. C. Cartwright, and myself, on the part of Great Britain, were named as joint secretaries of the Joint High Commission. Therefore, the expenditures of the joint secretaries who were appointed by the same nomination and under the same authority, came under the disposition of the expenses to be incurred by the commission itself, and to be divided up into equal moieties between the two governments. During the whole time that I occupied the position of joint secretary under the same nomination and under the same conditions as the other British secretary and the American secretary, I never thought, for a moment, that I had anything to do with the government or with the parliament of Canada as far as my expenses were concerned. Advances were made to me by the treasurer, for the time being, of the Canadian government, Mr. Joseph Pope, and of course, I kept an account. I kept, at least, an account of my expenses, but I did not keep any special account, or any details or vouchers. I kept also an account of the amounts I received. Some time this winter I met the Auditor General, Mr. McDougall, who asked me if I had any details. I said no, I had no details, that I always expected that the commission would settle that itself, and that I would be in the same position as the other joint secretaries. However, I sent to the Auditor General a certificate of the money that I had expended and I returned $1.10 that was left over of the money that I had received.

After I had seen a statement of what had taken place in the committee in the newspapers, and after I had received the letter from Mr. Fraser, I sent him a letter explaining these facts, not stating that I refused to appear before the committee, but simply stating the facts as to my position and as to the position of the members of the commission. On Monday following, the 9th, I was absent, and I understand that the president of the committee was absent also, and that there was a good deal of talk to the effect that I had refused to appear before the committee, which was not the case. Another meeting of the committee was called. I was still absent, and as the president of the committee did not have my letter to read before the committee, some members of the committee concluded that I had refused to appear and was defying the committee. On Friday, the 20th of April, I received notice to attend the committee ten minutes before the opening of the meeting. As I had received no answer to my previous letter, I was very much surprised, thinking, as I still think, that the committee was composed of gentlemen. For that day I did not go to the committee because I thought I was entitled to an answer to my letter. Upon meeting the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) he explained to me that he was absent himself at the second meeting, and that at the third meeting he had not my letter. I therefore told Mr. Fraser that I would be present at the next meeting of the committee, and give there and then the explanations which I am giving now. So that the whole story which went through the press is absolutely without foundation.

HULL AND OTTAWA FIRE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned on Thursday last, it was under circumstances of a very distressing character. A large part of the city of Hull and a larger part of the city of Ottawa were at that moment the prey of a most disastrous fire, which continued for the greater part of the night, and when the sun rose upon the following morning, it was upon a scene of desolation and ruin, where, the day before, had been thousands of happy homes and prosperous industries which were the pride of Ottawa. The details which we had on that morning were of such a character that we came to the conclusion that the destruction which had been caused by this most calamitous fire was beyond the reach of private charity, though private charity was abundant, early and speedy. We had a report which has been since confirmed by the investigations that we have had into the subject, that over 2,000 families have been made homeless by fire. Under such circumstances the Privy Council met and came to the conclusion that, as in our judgment, private charity, abundant as it was, was not able to cope with the needs created by this calamity, parliament and the country would sustain us, if the government also came to the aid of the sufferers, and we determined that very day to ask parliament, at its next meeting, for an appropriation of $100,000. We instructed the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Courtney, whose discretion and judgment are well known, to immediately make an appropriation and place at the disposal of the relief committee the sum of $10,000, part of the grant which we propose to ask parliament to make. On the afternoon of the same day I thought it my duty to acquaint my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), of our intention. I wrote accordingly, telling him what we had done, and the amount which we proposed to ask parliament to vote, and I have this reply from him:

Ottawa, April 27, 1900.

Dear Sir Wilfrid Laurier,—I am very glad to learn by your letter of to-day, that you propose asking parliament for an appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars, to assist those who are suffering from the terrible calamity of yesterday, and that in the meantime you have authorized the Deputy Minister of Finance to use at once ten thousand dollars to meet the immediate necessities of the helpless. I need not tell you how glad I will be to heartily support the measures the government have taken, and propose to take in the present emergency.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES TUPPER.

The Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier,
Prime Minister, Ottawa.

The government are prepared to ask this appropriation from parliament, and my hon. friend has a message from His Excellency the Governor General.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I have the honour to present a message from His Excellency the Governor General, as follows:

MINTO.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, supplementary estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending June 30, 1900, and in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, the Governor General recommends these estimates to the House of Commons.

Government House, May 1, 1900.

I move that the said message of His Excellency, together with the estimates, be referred to the Committee of Supply forthwith.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). The terrible disaster which has overtaken the city of Hull, adjoining Ottawa, is almost unexampled in the history of Canada. I had the greatest possible pleasure in assuring my right hon. friend how heartily I would support the measure which the government propose to take, of asking $100,000 to meet this emergency. No doubt very serious fires have occurred in some sections of Canada before, but the great extent of this disaster, its terrible consequences to a large number of people who are being rendered houseless and stripped of all their property, has made this a very exceptional case. It must not be forgotten also, that this fire has occurred at the seat of government, which, of course, makes the claim stronger from many points of view, than a similar disaster would present in almost any other section of the country. I am quite certain that the government have not only correctly interpreted the opinions of hon. members on both sides, but have anticipated the feeling that pervades all classes of the people of this country, in proposing this appropriation at once, and also in having taken power to deal with the unforeseen contingency, by anticipating a vote of the House. The proposal commends itself to the hearty approval of the House, and, I believe, will be thoroughly acceptable to the entire people of Canada.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply. He said: I desire, in addition to what has been mentioned by the right hon. the First Minister, to say that besides the work of immediate relief, for which the appropriation of $100,000 is asked, there is a further obligation incumbent on the government, and that is the reconstruction of the Dominion public works which have been destroyed by the fire. We propose, therefore, in estimates we have submitted to the House and which I ask the House to deal with this afternoon, an appropriation of $20,000 to rebuild the Hull post office, and $21,000 to restore the Dominion bridges at the Chaudière, so that the total appropriation you are now asked to consider in supply, amounts to $141,000. My hon. friend, the acting Minister of Public Works, will give any additional information the House may require in committee.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

The PRIME MINISTER. With regard to the appropriation of $100,000, I beg to say that it is proposed to pay that money into the hands of the committee which has been appointed for the purpose of coming to the relief of the sufferers. The mayor of the city called a public meeting, and a committee was appointed, of which the following constitute the executive:

George H. Perley, chairman; J. C. Browne, treasurer; H. K. Egan, Sheriff Sweetland, Fred. Cook, Denis Murphy, Ald. James Davidson, Ald. Enright, Ald. Valiquette, Dr. Ouimet, Major R. A. Helmer, Ald. Foster, Mayor Payment, and Ottawa's representatives in parliament.

Besides this, there is an advisory committee composed of Rev. Mr. Scanlon, Rev. Father Jacques, Rev. Dr. Campbell, Rev. Dean Lauder, Rev. Father Whelan, and Rev. Father Valiquette, of Hull. After giving the matter our best consideration, we thought that the best thing we could do was to hand over the money to this relief committee, to be applied as in their judgment will be best suited to the occasion.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) I would like to ask the government whether it is proposed to accompany this appropriation by any condition at all, either absolute or advisory. No one who watched the progress of that fire last week could help seeing how almost perfectly prepared that portion of the city was for a conflagration of this kind. It is quite true that the day was exceptional in some respects, on account of the high wind, but I suppose a larger part of that wind was, in the latter part of the day, caused by the fire itself. If in malice prepense, an attempt had been made months before to set a train which would completely surround that part of the city, and cause a conflagration to spread from one locality to another, I do not think it could have been more effectually done than was practically worked out under the condition of things that existed. This is a serious matter. The government is but voicing the opinion of the country, when it gives its quota, as it is doing, to the relief of the victims, but I think that some conditions of prudence and foresight ought to find expression as well. I know how difficult it is for a government to put these conditions absolutely. I think they have done a wise thing in giving the money into the hands of the relief committee, but there ought to be some means devised between the city authorities and the relief committee and the government—the municipal authorities, of course, having the larger powers—by which these tinder boxes and gunpowder trains, so to speak, should not be allowed to be set here in the city. I do not know quite what measures should be taken, but there is one power the government certainly has. The government has considerable control over the water power along the Chaudière, but any suggested improvement has always been met with the cry of vested interests, with the plea that these large establishments were already built, and that the cost and difficulty of change was very great. But now there is a clear piece of ground to work upon. All buildings have been swept away. Is it not a good time for this government to rise to the occasion and by some wise procedure make it impossible that so great a conflagration can take place again? Having been close to the scene, I know the tremendous intensity of the fire in these immense lumber piles, and I know that not all the fire fighting appliances in the Dominion could have withstood that conflagration. There is now, so to speak, a virgin soil there, and now is the proper time for the government to take hold of the water power along the Chaudière, and by some wise provisions at least lessen the contingency which will always be there if this piling of lumber is allowed. In the city of Ottawa itself the city council seems to allow these lumber piles to be set up in almost every quarter of the city, and in the heat of summer they become almost like tinder and are a menace to human life and property. In some way or other the government should take advantage of the existing conditions and by some wise suggestion, if not pressure, endeavour to lessen the dangers which threaten the city of Ottawa from the cause I have referred to. If the government take action in this matter, I am sure they will be backed up by public sentiment throughout the country.

Mr. WM. GIBSON (Lincoln and Niagara). The first thing which strikes a stranger who comes to Ottawa or Hull is the great danger to which life and property are exposed by reason of these immense lumber piles being allowed in almost every quarter of the city. I sympathize with the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), who has suffered severely from the recent fire, and I would join him in suggesting to the government that in future no piling ground should be allowed within the precincts of the city of Ottawa. If the lumber were taken down the river a few miles in barges, it would only be a question of handling it once more, and it would not be left in the city as it is often for months and years at the disposal of those who buy it for the English market. Of course the longer the lumber is allowed to remain there, the drier it gets and the more danger there is from it. I would suggest to the government that the attention of those who are getting this money should be drawn to the matter, and that pressure be brought to bear on the city authorities to pass a by-law preventing any lumber being stored within the city limits.

Mr. FIELDING.

Mr. GEORGE E. CASEY (West Elgin). As one who has for long known the condition of affairs in this city, I cannot help adding a word to what has been already said with regard to the danger arising from the presence of saw-mills and lumber piles here. I have seen Hull burned out twice; fourteen years ago and twenty years ago, and on those occasions it was predicted that there would be a great conflagration if the wind blew in the direction in which it blew last Thursday. No one, however, realized to the full extent the destruction that would be caused if a high wind blowing in a certain direction coincided with the existence of a fire among the lumber. As has been pointed out, the government is giving this money practically for relief purposes, and they cannot directly interfere, but I am sure that a suggestion from the government to the city authorities of Ottawa and Hull would have the greatest possible weight. Indeed the government itself has power to regulate what shall be done at and about the Chaudière, the water powers of which are held under leases from the government. Not only should no lumber piling be allowed on any grounds over which the government has control, but, in view of the electrical transmission of power it is not necessary to have these mills at the exact point where the water-power exists. It is quite possible for the power to be generated at the Chaudière Falls and used economically at a spot a few miles away, where the lumber could be piled with less danger, and to which the logs could be brought on the river. I have no doubt that the government have taken this into consideration, but I think it is essential that something should be actually done. There is no hope of establishing a permanent city where Ottawa now stands so long as the lumber industry is permitted to pervade the whole city, as it does at present. I hope something will be done to remedy the existing condition of things.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). The presence of lumber piles within the limits of the city is, of course, a menace to the existence of property; but if the government were to adopt measures to prevent the recurrence of such a calamity as has befallen the sister cities of Ottawa and Hull, it would be necessary to make provision with regard to the character of the buildings that shall be erected. Nothing is more inflammable than such wooden buildings as existed in Hull prior to this fire. It must be remembered that the fire did not originate in the lumber piles nor upon the premises of the mill-owners of this city. The fire originated in a section of the city of Hull where the houses were small and built of pine, and were, so to speak, simply tinder boxes. The fire originated in a section of the city where it had a long sweep, and as it acquired great force from the high wind, it became entirely unmanageable before it reached the lumber district or the mills. If the government, or if the city authorities desire to adopt measures to prevent the recurrence of such a calamity, it will be necessary to see that only fire proof buildings are erected. So long as we have a city like Hull, consisting almost exclusively of pine board buildings, there will always be danger of a conflagration. The lumbermen of this city have taken all precautions to protect their business from fire. I may be mistaken, but I think you cannot point to a single instance where a fire has originated in the lumber district or where the fact that lumber is piled in the city of Ottawa was responsible for the origin of the fire. Of course, when the fire got beyond control and reached the lumber district, it was bound to sweep everything before it; and had the wind on Thursday last been from the westward, no human power (in the face of a gale blowing at fifty miles an hour) could have saved the greater portion of the city of Ottawa from destruction. It is not right that we should place the responsibility for this calamity on one industry, when, in reality, that industry has simply been called upon to suffer in common with others, and has made provision to the utmost of its ability to prevent such disaster. The lumbermen of Ottawa have always maintained a separate fire organization of their own, and they have always been equipped with fire appliances for coping with any fire in the most efficient manner. I think myself it would be better to have the lumber removed from the city limits as far as possible; but still we must bear in mind that it is impossible to remove entirely the danger that exists, if we are to prosecute the lumber industry in this city. If we are to have mills for converting logs into lumber with the water power of the Chaudière, we must afford those mills such facilities as are indispensable to the prosecution of their business. We might impose upon them conditions which are onerous and, in fact, unnecessary, and I would simply counsel in this matter the consideration of all the circumstances attending this fire, and a recognition of the fact that the fire did not originate in the lumber district, that the lumber interests were in no wise responsible for it, that it originated in a town of board houses and shanties and had made the progress of over a mile before it reached a single lumber establishment. The primary cause of the difficulty is the character of the buildings erected, and if we are to have adequate protection against fire, we need regulation of building.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). It seems to have come to a question whether the parliament of Canada shall have its seat here or whether this city shall be the seat of a great lumber industry. This parliament House and the departmental buildings have been jeopardized several times by these fires. I cordially agree with what has been said by previous speakers as to the necessity of the twin cities changing their by-laws with regard to the character of buildings to be constructed. If a change is not made, if these lumber piles are restored and these small pine houses rebuilt, this capital is liable almost any time to a disaster similar to that which has occurred. I think it is the duty of parliament, and I think it is well within our power, to intimate to these cities that they must adopt building laws such as prevail in the other cities of Canada. And, as to the leases in connection with the water privileges, a clause could well be inserted, that there must be no piling grounds within the city. While it is true that the power must be generated at the river side, the saw-mills and piling grounds might as well be several miles away. In that way we should, probably, be saved a repetition of this disaster. I hope that the House will see to it that Hull and Ottawa shall adopt such a system as is in use in other cities.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend from York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) has brought to the attention of the House a subject which may well engage its attention, and in the remarks he has made has strongly voiced the thought which must have occurred to every man resident in the city of Ottawa. I am sorry to say, however, that, in my judgment, we have not all the powers that my hon. friend seems to think we have. But, in the first place, even if we had these powers, the object of the vote we are asking parliament now to make is to afford immediate relief to the sufferers. That is the point to be attended to. There are men, women and children to be fed and clothed, and this ought to be done without any condition whatever. But, when we have done so, it will be only proper that we should call the attention of the municipal authorities to what comes within their domain rather than ours. With regard to the character of the houses built in the cities of Hull and Ottawa, my hon. friend knows that we have no power over this subject, it is altogether in the power of the municipalities. We can make remonstrances, we can call the attention of the municipal authorities to the fact that they should take extra precautions in this city. We can do this, because we, representing the capital of the nation, have the right to speak not only for the citizens of Ottawa, but for the citizens of Canada, and to ask that extra precautions be taken in order to preserve the cities from a repetition of the calamities to which they have been subjected in the past, an example of which we have just had, and from the danger of which we are not altogether free. I do not think that we have the power which my hon. friend from York seemed to think resided in the government with regard to the leases. If we have any leases to make, we can impose such conditions as we choose: but, with regard to the existing leases, they are not put an end to by the calamity which has taken place, or by the fact that the buildings which were constructed to carry into effect the powers given by the leases have been destroyed. The owners can build again and build under the same conditions under which the leases were granted. In that case also, we can only make remonstrances. But, I believe my hon. friend from York has voiced the sentiment of the people of Ottawa and of the nation at large, that we ought to make the use of these fine water powers as free from danger as possible. I agree in this respect with every word he has spoken. These lumber piles must, of necessity, be a source of continual danger to the city, and if it be possible to induce the lumbermen, who are just as much interested as we are, to remove their lumber piles to a distance from the city, I think we shall have done a good act. This great calamity will have one redeeming feature if our people learn from it the lesson of protecting the city against the danger which has threatened us in the past. But, so far as my information goes, we have only the power to remonstrate, we cannot demand; but we shall not fail to call the attention of all parties interested to this important subject.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. MACLEAN. If the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will pardon me, he may go a great deal further. He can intimate that this House of parliament will not be justified in expending further sums for public buildings here unless there are reasonable laws regulating building within the city limits. An intimation of that kind given to the city of Ottawa would bear good fruit.

Public buildings, Quebec—Hull P.O. to be rebuilt $20,000

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), or the acting Minister of Public Works (Mr. Mulock), if any conclusion has been come to as to whether this shall be done by contract or days' work?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). No conclusion has been arrived at, but, in conversation with the chief architect, the view expressed was that the work should be done by contract, and I hope it will be possible to carry out that idea. I may make an exception of some little work that is now going on. I was informed that part of the walls that are standing were a source of danger to the people, and I gave immediate instructions to have all the dangerous part of the walls removed at once. I suppose that work is going on now. That, of course, is being done by day labour, but I will endeavour to have the rebuilding done by contract.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not speak in any captious spirit, but I would suggest that in this case, where a great calamity has befallen Tories and Grits impartially, if any portion is to be done by days' work, it should be done with the idea of giving deserving men employment and helping them in that way to earn something for their families. I would suggest very strongly that no attempt should be made to establish any party limit on the employment of men under these circumstances, however strongly such an idea might appeal to a government under other circumstances.

Mr. BOURASSA. I think that this is a case in which the government would be justified in exercising its power to do this rebuilding altogether by day labour, because of the great number of workmen who have been deprived not only of their homes but of work. I am sure that no political capital would be made against the government if the whole work were done by day labour.

Roads and bridges—Dominion bridge,
Chaudière, restoration $21,000

Mr. FOSTER. Will that complete the restoration, is it supposed?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The first estimate I received was that $21,000 would complete it, and on that information the vote was prepared. But more accurate figures subsequently, indicate that it will take some $28,000, and that, no doubt, will be all that is required for the next two months. We will know better after a little while what shortage there is.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose in about two months, the government will be thinking about getting their supplementary estimates down?

The PRIME MINISTER. I think my hon. friend will be going home about that time.

Resolutions reported.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty; and the motion of Sir Charles Tupper in amendment thereto.

Mr. T. D. CRAIG (East Durham). In resuming the debate on the budget, and on the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition, I have no idea that I shall convert any of the members of the Liberal party to the views which I may express; and I do not suppose that I shall succeed in persuading the government that it is their duty to resign on account of their broken pledges and their lack of competence in conducting the business of the country. But I have a little hope that I shall be able to persuade some people in this country, that this government are not the best government for the country, and that it would be in the interests of the country, at the next general election to turn them out and put more competent men in power. I think, Mr. Speaker, that any unprejudiced observer who has watched the proceedings of the Liberal government since they came into power, must ask himself this question: Have the Liberal party any fixed principle? I do not suppose, Mr. Speaker, that I shall be called an unprejudiced onlooker. We have an onlooker in this House who has been regarding the conduct of the government, and I am afraid he is not unprejudiced either. But, although, I do not claim to be unprejudiced, still I do claim that I look at these matters with as little prejudice as most people, and I have been constrained to ask myself, on more than one occasion, what fixed principle the government of this country has? Have we a right to hold the government to the principles announced in the speeches of the leaders of the party, when in opposition? Now, the Minister of Customs says we have not: he says we have no right to hold the Liberal party to the speeches made by their leaders when in opposition; he says we must take the platform as laid down in the convention by the Liberal party. Well, Sir, I suppose it would be a very hard thing if we were to try to hold the Liberal party responsible for all the views announced by their speakers when in opposition, because the views announced by the different speakers would not agree at all, and no party could carry out all they said in opposition.

Now, in addressing myself to this subject to-day, I do not intend to say anything about the lesser lights of the Liberal party, or the minor leaders of the Liberal party, but I intend to confine my observations entirely to a speaker, whose views we are bound to receive, and to regard as the views of the Liberal party, I refer to the right hon. the leader of the government, and the leader of the Liberal party. I intend to address my remarks almost entirely, this afternoon, to the question of preferential trade, which is properly before this House on the amendment of the leader of the opposition. But before doing so, I wish to direct attention to one principle of the Liberal party, and to show how they contravene that principle since they have got into power, and, I think, that may be taken as a sample of a great many others. I propose to deal with the question of surpluses. Now, what is the attitude of the Liberal party to-day, as regards surpluses? We know that the Finance Minister, in making his budget speech, gloried in a surplus. He said: We have a surplus this year, and we will have a greater surplus next year, and what a grand thing it is for the country, and what a grand financier I am, that I can show a surplus as the result of the operations of the year, and what a grand government we are altogether, because we have a surplus, when the party on the other side used to have deficits. Well, that sounds all very well, and I notice that the Liberal organs throughout the country are taking up this cry of a surplus. They say: Why do you criticise the government? They have a surplus, they have no deficits to show. Now, Sir, that is the attitude of the party to-day. What was their attitude when in opposition? To find this out, I have only to turn to the Hansard of 1894, vol. 1, pages 1225 and 1226. We find that the present leader of the government then made these remarks about surpluses, and I ask the careful attention of every member of this House, to the statements then made by him:

Why, Sir, you heard the hon. gentleman—
That was the present ex-Finance Minister.

—driven to the expedient of giving it as an evidence of prosperity, that during the last fifteen years that the country has been under a protective regime, the finances of the country balanced year after year by surpluses which now aggregate the enormous sum of $20,000,000. This fact, which I do not hesitate to say to the hon. gentleman, is nothing short of a disgrace and a shame for the administration, was treated by him as a boast. I assert that such a condition of things is a shame and a disgrace to any government.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is rather strong language for the right hon. gentleman the leader of the government to use in 1894, when we think of the way the Liberal party is talking to-day, and boasting about the surpluses they have. He said at that time that this condition of things was a shame and disgrace to any government. To-day they look on it, not as a shame or a disgrace, but as something to be proud of, and to boast of. But he goes on to say further:

What is the truth about these surpluses?

Now it is a good thing to know what the Liberal party thinks about these matters.

Twenty millions of dollars, says the Finance Minister. The truth is that these surpluses represent $20,000,000, of unjust taxation, which have been wrung by the government from the consumers of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we need talk any more about surpluses, I do not think we need try to answer anything said by the Finance Minister, because after all he was trying to show that the government was conducting the affairs of the country right at the present time, and to prove it he said they had a surplus this year, and would have a larger one next year. I think if the right hon. leader of the government was sincere in the views he expressed at that time he ought to call upon the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to resign, and he should place in office a Finance Minister who would not have a surplus, who would be able to make his calculations so that his finances would come out even and who would not wring from the people this unjust taxation. But, I intend, principally, to talk about preferential trade, and I have merely given this one item as a sample of the views held by the Liberal party when in opposition as compared with the views they hold while in power. I think I am not over-stating the case when I say that the views held by the Liberal party when in opposition were entirely different from the views held by them while they are in power. I think I am justified in saying that I cannot find a single fixed principle that they hold, and which they are prepared to hold under all circumstances.

I propose to discuss the attitude taken by the present Prime Minister when leader of the opposition on the trade relations of Canada with Great Britain and with the United States of America. This is a question that is brought directly to our notice by the amendment that has been moved, and I will show unmistakably, without fear of successful contradiction, that he looked towards Washington and away from Great Britain. That may seem to be rather a strong statement, but I intend to prove it, as I intend to prove every statement I make to-day. I repeat, that, instead of backing up the Conservative party in their efforts to develop trade between Canada and Great Britain, he discouraged it. That is rather a strong statement to make about the Prime Minister of to-day, who, to-day, poses as a great loyalist, who professes to be in favour of trade with Great Britain, and who is offering a preference to Great Britain. This is a strong statement to make, but I again say, that, instead of backing up the Conservative party in their efforts to develop trade with Great Britain, he discouraged it on that occasion. I shall prove this by reading from a debate that took place in 1890, (Hansard, volume I., page 19). Alluding to a motion made in 1888 by Mr. Marshall, of East Middlesex, in favour of mutual preferential trade which, I see, was supported by the late Mr. Dalton

McCarthy, the present Prime Minister said :

Now, Mr. Speaker, while I agree with those hon. gentlemen in their opinions respecting the evil, I say there is a remedy to be sought for in our condition. . . . The policy we support asks that some reform should be made in the condition of our country. I wish, for my part, that I could agree with hon. gentlemen opposite in the remedy they have suggested; I wish, for my part—

Mr. Speaker, I would call especial attention to these words :

I wish for my part, I could believe that we could find for our surplus agricultural products a market in Great Britain.

The hon. gentleman could not make himself believe that there was a market in Great Britain for our surplus agricultural products. The Conservative party said so. They turned their eyes to Great Britain, and they said : We will find a market there for the surplus agricultural products that we produce. But, the hon. gentleman could not make himself believe that at all, and he did not try to make his party believe it, but, instead of his party turning their attention to the development of the trade with Great Britain, they sought the development of trade with the United States.

But certainly—

He says :

—I cannot agree in the policy which has been suggested to us, for that policy, to say the least of it, is a singularly foolish one.

That was the policy of mutual preferential trade, and in 1890, the present Prime Minister took the ground that such a policy, advocated at that time, in a very forcible speech, in one of the strongest speeches that I have had the pleasure of reading, by the late Mr. Dalton McCarthy, that he could not agree with such a policy, and he said that it was a foolish policy. Then, in 1890, (Hansard, volume I., page 20) the right hon. gentleman goes on to argue, that the British workingmen will never agree to any such policy, and then there is a reference to free trade. The hon. gentleman was very much enamoured of free trade. He pointed to England and showed how they had prospered by free trade, and he seems to have looked forward to the time when Canada and the United States would have free trade. He says :

It is true that Canada and the United States are to-day far from this position, but the time may come, and it may not be distant, when Canada and the United States will adopt a policy which we on this side of the House have advocated—

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish the House to mark these words :

—a policy not to seek a market on the other side of the ocean, but to seek a market on the other side of the line.

I think that I have proved conclusively that the hon. gentleman, instead of assisting the Conservative party to develop trade relations with Great Britain, was opposed to and discouraged every attempt to develop this trade. The Conservative party were putting forth every effort, they were spending money and were bringing their arguments before the farmers of the country to induce them to turn their eyes towards Great Britain. They pointed out to them that Great Britain offered the best market. They said that the United States were the producers of the same articles that we produced, that they were our competitors in these articles, and that we should seek to develop a market in Great Britain rather than in the United States. The hon. gentleman, instead of assisting the Conservative party, says that he looked forward to the time when Canada should adopt a policy :

Not to seek a market on the other side of the ocean, but to seek a market on the other side of the line.

That was in 1890. Well, in 1891, he made unrestricted reciprocity his election cry, involving discrimination against Great Britain. I ask this question in all seriousness. Leaving politics out of the question, if we can for a little while, I ask, in view of the attitude of the right hon. gentleman to-day, if he had carried the country with unrestricted reciprocity, what would have resulted? What position would we be in to-day? Where would this country be? Would we, the Conservative party, have been in the position to ask for a mutual preference? Would we be seeking to trade with Great Britain to-day? I hold that we would be merely a dependency of the United States if that policy had prevailed. Our tariff would be framed for us, and we would be a dependency of theirs, instead of being, as we are to-day, as is claimed by the right hon. gentleman, a young nation. No doubt we are a young nation, a growing, vigorous nation, a nation which is developing year by year. In 1891 the hon. gentleman went to the country with that cry, and the country was almost carried by it. The attractions of this trade near at hand were such, and they were presented in such a way by the right hon. gentleman and his friends all over the country, that it was with great difficulty that their views were opposed, and it was with great difficulty that the late Sir John Macdonald carried the country. If the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, advocated by the right hon. gentleman and his friends at that time, did not prevail, it was not the fault of the right hon. gentleman. He did everything he could to carry that policy into effect. Sir John Macdonald was the man who opposed him at that time, and it was through his efforts that that policy was defeated. Sir John Macdonald gave utterance to a feeling which was rife in the country at that time :

A British subject I was born,
A British subject I will die.

He saw, and Mr. Blake saw, that this policy of unrestricted reciprocity would not only make us a dependency, commercially, of the United States, but that, in the long run, it would lead to annexation. Mr. Blake saw that and said so in his famous letter. There was another man to whom great credit is due for opposing and resisting that cry of unrestricted reciprocity, and that is the present hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper). I think I am only fair when I say that it is possible that even Sir John Macdonald might have failed at that time if it had not been for the almost superhuman efforts put forth by the present hon. leader of the opposition. He went all over the country assisting Sir John Macdonald and opposing this cry which was so taking with a great many people who had been carried away with it, and his efforts on that occasion will not be forgotten by the Conservative party or by the people of this country. Not only was this effort of hon. gentlemen opposite defeated by Sir John Macdonald and by the present leader of the opposition, but this effort, Mr. Speaker, was defeated as well by the loyal Canadian people of this country. When I say that, I do not claim a superabundance of loyalty for the Conservative party; but I do say that at that period a great many of the Liberal party were looking constantly to the United States. That was the goal they were striving for. They thought the British market was too far away and they were fascinated by the attractions of the United States of America. It seemed to cast a glamour over them, and they were prepared for any consequences that might result from their policy of unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. CLARKE. They were hypnotized.

Mr. CRAIG. Now, the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) tells us that he has a great respect for public opinion; but let us see if after the elections in 1891 he bowed to public opinion. He was defeated on the question of unrestricted reciprocity; fortunately for this country and fortunately for himself. I am satisfied that the right hon. gentleman realizes to-day that it would have been a most unfortunate thing for himself and for his party, and for this country, if he had been returned to power in 1891. Here is the language used by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in the debate on the address in the session of 1891, after the election. I quote from Hansard, 1891, volume I., page 27:

Sir, we must have a change, and it must be in the direction of greater freedom of trade. This is admitted on all sides by all parties, and it is admitted even by the staunchest of all Tories—the Imperial federationists.

I direct special attention to these words.

While they commit the mistake of basing their trade policy upon uniformity of allegiance and a mere sentiment, we of the Liberal party maintain that the policy of this country must be based, not upon sentiment, but upon business principles; and fresh as we come from the people, I say that the only policy which will benefit this country is unrestricted reciprocity and continental freedom of trade.

Mr. CRAIG.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, he did not learn a lesson by his defeat, and he was still wedded to unrestricted reciprocity and continental freedom of trade. In the same speech (Hansard, volume I., page 29), speaking on unrestricted reciprocity, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

The right hon. gentleman said that this policy was hostile to Great Britain. Again, I deny it; but, Sir, I am free to admit that I, for one, when I made up my mind in favour of this policy, looked first and last to the interest of Canada and not to the interest of England. I am a British subject, and I never forgot it yet; but while I am a British subject, I remember that I am also a Canadian, and I sit in the Canadian parliament. Let the British subject who sits in the British parliament look after the interests of England.

I shall make some comments on these remarks in a few moments, but in the meantime I shall read these extracts from the speeches of the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), in order that they may be placed together. Discussing the motion of Mr. Desjardins of L'Islet, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said (Hansard, 1891, volume II., page 3333):

Sir, I do not believe we can fail, because justice and truth must prevail in the end, and this policy is founded on justice and truth, and we shall not fail.

I wonder what he thinks to-day about that:

But, after all, supposing for an instant that the United States were not disposed to meet us like men, supposing they were disposed to be overbearing and to exact sacrifices from us which we could not make, what would we do in that case? Sir, we would then turn over a new leaf in our book, and I say this to the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), and to those who believe with him, that I would be prepared then, speaking for myself alone, to look into the very scheme which he has proposed, the United Empire Trade League. I do not believe in the principles of the United Empire Trade League, for the reason that that scheme limits trade to allegiance, it proposes to make allegiance the basis of trade, whereas we desire to make trade interests alone the basis of trade.

In the session of 1892, speaking on the debate on the address, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, (Hansard, volume I., page 26, 1892):

We are in favour of unrestricted reciprocity on this side of the House.

I quote that to show that the Liberals still clung to unrestricted reciprocity. The right hon. gentleman did not speak for himself then, but he distinctly says that the Liberal party is in favour of unrestricted reciprocity. I wish the House to note particularly what the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says about 'mere sentiment.' He stated that the Imperial federationists proposed trade on sentiment, but the Liberal party did not take any stock in sentiment at all; they were looking at the matter entirely from the standpoint of business principles. Would it be believed that a few days ago I saw a very strong criticism in a Liberal journal on the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), because he stated in this House that the Conservative party wished to have preferential trade on business principles, and wished to get something for something. So it comes to pass that the hon. member (Mr. Montague) is ridiculed now by the Liberal organs for talking about business principles and using the very words used by the Prime Minister when he was in opposition. When we on this side of the House talk about conducting business on business principles, these gentlemen opposite tell us that we are not loyal. I do not think any language could be stronger on that point than when Sir Wilfrid Laurier said: Let the British subject in the British parliament look after British interests, and we will look after Canadian interests here. To-day the Conservative party say that they are sent to this parliament to look after the interests of Canadians, and that it is wrong for this nation to give away a privilege without getting a privilege in return. The Conservative party believe, Sir, that it is possible to get something in return if it is gone about in the right way; and they believe that the reason we did not get anything in return, is because the whole thing was bungled.

Now, Sir, one of the greatest questions that has ever been considered in this country is the question of mutual preferential trade. That policy has been for years advocated by the Conservative party in Canada. What did Sir Wilfrid Laurier say before the elections of 1896 on this question? It has been quoted more than once in this House, but I shall quote it again, because I want to have it alongside the other remarks made by him. Speaking at London, Ont., in 1896, before the elections, the right hon. gentleman said, as reported in the Globe:

But I want to point out to you, my fellow-countrymen, upon this occasion, that, in addition to the many reasons which we had up to the present time, there is now another reason which must strongly appeal to the sense of the Canadian people at large—preferential trade. That is a new idea of having within the British Empire preferential trade with all parts of that empire. Goods of English make would be admitted free to this country, and our goods would be admitted free to England, as they are now, but in addition to that we would have for our goods a preference which would not be given to the goods of another nation.

Now, the statesmen of Great Britain have thought that the governments of the colonies have come to a time when a new step can be taken in their development. What is that? That there shall be a commercial agreement between England and the colonies. That practical statesman, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, has come to the conclusion that the time has come when it is possible to have within the bounds of the empire a new step taken, which will give to the colonies in England a preference for their products over the products of other nations. What would be the possibilities of such a step if it was taken? We sell our goods in England. We send our wheat, our butter, our cheese, all our natural products, but there we have to compete with similar products from the United States, from Russia, and from other nations. Just see what a great advantage it would be to Canada if the wheat, cheese and butter which we would send to England should be met in England with a preference over similar products of other nations. The possibilities are immense.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the new and progressive secretary of the Colonies, has declared that the time has come when it is possible to discuss that question. But, Sir, if England is going to give us that preference, England would expect something from us in return. But the right hon. gentleman has taken away from England any incentive to give us anything.

England would expect that we would come as closely to her own system of free trade as it is possible for us to come. England does not expect that we should take her own system of free trade, such as she has it; but I lay it before you, that the thing the English people would expect in return is that, instead of a principle of protection, we should adopt the revenue form of tariff, pure and simple. These are the conditions on which we can have that boon.

Now I come to a far more important declaration made by the right hon. gentleman on another occasion:

I would be in a far better position to obtain this boon for Canada than Sir Charles Tupper, because his is a protective tariff, whereas mine is a revenue tariff, pure and simple, and Mr. Chamberlain says that is all that is necessary in order to obtain it.

The right hon. gentleman did not then say it was impossible. He did not say it was impudent to ask for it, as the hon. member for North Norfolk says.

Mr. CHARLTON. He tells us we cannot have it without a zollverein.

Mr. CRAIG. He did not say it was impudent for us to ask for it or impossible to obtain it, but he said to the people of this country: I can get it for you far better than Sir Charles Tupper can. If you want this mutual preferential arrangement, vote for me. Well, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that that was obtaining votes on false pretenses. If the right hon. gentleman held then the views which he holds to-day, I do not see how he could have made a speech of the kind. What he should have said was that, although Mr. Chamberlain thought the scheme feasible, he had no faith in it.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is my hon. friend prepared to grant England free trade and free admission into our markets in return for a preference in hers?

Mr. CRAIG. I will read the citation again for the benefit of my hon. friend from North Norfolk.

Mr. CHARLTON. Read Mr. Chamberlain's latest utterance, please.

Mr. CRAIG. I am going to read what the right hon. the First Minister said. He said, in 1896, before the elections, in the city of London, Ont. :

England does not expect that we should take her own system of free trade, such as she has it; but I lay it before you, that the thing the English people would expect in return is that, instead of a principle of protection, we should adopt the revenue form of tariff, pure and simple.

And he went on to say : That is our policy to-day, and if we get into power we will not require to change our policy. If you want this preference in the English market, return us to power, but do not return Sir Charles Tupper, because he cannot get it.

I am not discussing Mr. Chamberlain, but the right hon. the First Minister, and I want to show where he stood in the matter. Mr. Chamberlain is responsible to the parliament and people of Great Britain, but the Premier of this country is responsible to the people of this country, and if he misled the people and obtained their votes by saying he was in favour of this preference and would get it and could get it better than Sir Charles Tupper could, the people of this country ought to know it, and I intend that they shall.

What did the right hon. gentleman say in 1890, when in opposition, on this question ? I find in Hansard, vol. I, page 19, of that year, that he spoke as follows :

Will the British working classes adopt such a policy ? It is preposterous to assume it.

Again, he said :

It is almost impossible to conceive that the British people would adopt a policy so absolutely delusive.

And yet, in 1896, he said to the people of this country : If you want this preference, put me in power. And at the very time he was holding out this bait to the people, he had no faith in that policy at all. If that is not obtaining votes under false pretenses I do not know what is. I want to say a word or two on the attitude which the right hon. gentleman took at the Jubilee celebration in England in 1897. I happened to come across yesterday a quotation in the Mail of November, 1897, which is very apposite to my remarks. It gives the remarks of Mr. Asquith on this question of mutual preferential trade. Mr. Chamberlain had talked about a Zollverein and a customs tariff for all the empire, but Mr. Asquith, who is a very pronounced Liberal and free trader, said he was very glad that that idea had died still-born, and that it had been killed by the colonial Premiers. What did Mr. Asquith say about the attitude of the leader of this House ? He said :

Mr. CRAIG.

Canada is moving in the direction of free trade in the reciprocal provision of her tariff. Sir Wilfrid Laurier very truly, very candidly, said, being, as he is, a free trader by conviction,—

It is refreshing to learn that the right hon. the First Minister is a free trader by conviction.

—who would not be a free trader by conviction who had constantly before his eyes and on the other side of an almost imperceptible boundary line the enormous and incalculable evils which are inflicted on the United States by the pursuit of the doctrine of protection ?—being, as I say he is, a free trader by conviction, he has adopted this plan as the first step in the direction of a policy of complete free trade. That is the idea by which we ought to secure the end. To attempt to accelerate the better treatment of our trade by our colonies by the establishment of preferential duties in their favour, thereby dislocating the whole of our trade with foreign countries and thereby tempting our colonies, which is the inevitable result of protection, to devote their resources to the production of things for which they do not enjoy the greatest natural advantage—that is a policy which flies in the face of experience.

Those are the remarks that were made by Mr. Asquith, a member of a former Liberal government in England, and I have read them to show what impression he had formed of our First Minister, judging by what the First Minister said at the Jubilee. I notice, however, that Mr. Asquith is not very well informed. I do not think that he could get the hon. member for North Norfolk to agree with him in what he said about the evils of protection in the United States. Those evils are certainly not apparent there to-day, for instead of everything going to ruin, everything is highly prosperous, no doubt owing to protection. What are the United States doing ? Instead of their industries being ruined, they are invading the English market and competing there with the manufacturers of England. Into England, where free trade prevails, all the foreign manufacturers are pouring their goods, and the British manufacturers are feeling keenly the competition from the United States, which, Mr. Asquith says, is being ruined by the policy of protection. And then Mr. Asquith is very much afraid of tempting the colonies to engage in the production of things for which they do not enjoy the greater natural advantages. He wants them to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for the workers of Great Britain. He wants them to pay attention to farming, and not to engage in manufacturing. Canada, he would say, cannot do that sort of thing at all. But Canada is proving that she can do that sort of thing. She is sending furniture and leather also, and competing in the English market with the furniture makers and tanners of Great Britain, and she is making similar advances in other lines as well. All this just shows how, when men are blinded by a theory, especially this theory of free trade, they are not willing to see things which are clear to the eyes of every unprejudiced man. But what I wished to say was that the Premier of this country gave Mr. Asquith the impression that he was entirely opposed to this mutually preferential trade, because it had in it the element of protection. There is no doubt that these are the facts. I fancy that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), did not communicate to Mr. Asquith the fact that he had been in favour of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, that he had been in favour of amalgamating our tariff with that of the highly protective tariff of the United States. He did not tell Mr. Asquith that he had been telling the Canadian people for years that the United States was the country we ought to imitate, that that was the great market for our goods, and that, while the Conservative party were in favour of a reciprocity treaty in natural products, he was in favour of an unrestricted reciprocity which would open up our markets to the manufacturers of the United States on condition that we should have their markets in return. Had all this been made known to Mr. Asquith, Mr. Asquith would not have talked of the right hon. gentleman as he did. He talked of him as the apostle of free trade, as the pronounced opponent of protection in any shape or form, while, at the same time, the right hon. gentleman had been anxious to unite the fortunes of this country with those of the most highly protected country in the world.

There is another important question in connection with this subject of mutually preferential trade, and that is the question of representation in the Imperial parliament. The Premier to-day says that he is in favour of that policy. In his speeches to-day, his face is turned toward Great Britain, he is looking for a grand British federation with Imperial representation of the colonies. But, I wish to call attention to what he said in 1892. Speaking on a motion made by Mr. McCarthy respecting the appointment of a Canadian representative at Washington, he said, as reported in Hansard of 1892, volume II, page 2468 :

The motion is proposed by an hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) whose views as to the future of Canada, are well known to be in favour of a closer relation with Great Britain than we now have. The motion is supported by myself, and it is known that I do not believe that the present condition of things will endure for ever. The present relations between us and Great Britain must become either closer or looser. My opinion is that in the course of time the relations of Canada with Great Britain must cease, as the relations of colonies with the mother country do cease, by independence, just as a child becomes a man. These are the views I hold, not in regard to the present or actual policy, but as to the future of the country.

Again he says :

The fact remains, so long as we remain a colony, the position, though advantageous in some respects, is disadvantageous in other respects. We have the advantages of our connection with Great Britain, which no one can value more than I do, but in regard to our relations with the country to the south of us, our dependent relation to Great Britain makes our position extremely awkward.

Now, looking at the speeches I have quoted, and considering what the hon. gentleman has recently said, the question naturally arises : What are the real sentiments of the right hon. gentleman on this subject ? For myself, I do not pretend to know whether the view he holds is that at some future time not too far distant, I suppose, or it would not be worth while talking about it—the present relations of Canada with Great Britain must become looser and must cease by independence. I know that these are the views of some of his followers, for we have heard these views expressed in this House, and, no doubt, these views were learned from speeches of this kind made by the right hon. gentleman. As I say, I do not know whether these are his real sentiments or whether he holds that we should be connected more closely with Great Britain and have representation in the Imperial parliament. I ask myself what are his real views or whether he has made up his mind on this question and whether he has any real convictions upon it at all. It is almost impossible to think that he has any real convictions, when we place his speeches side by side. But, on one subject he has real and positive convictions—he is utterly opposed to mutually preferential trade. I think we may gather that from all his speeches except the one made in London, Ontario, which, however, was an ante-election appeal to the people to gain votes. He thinks that mutually preferential trade is absurd and that it is impossible to obtain it. Now, with regard to that idea of impossibility, there is one thought that occurs to me. The Liberal party has always been the party of despair. There has never been anything proposed in the highest interests of the country, but they thought was impossible of attainment. The building of the Canadian Pacific Railway they thought was impossible for a country situated as Canada then was, and, had it not been for the indomitable courage of the present leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), it is probable that the Canadian Pacific Railway might have failed of completion. These hon. gentlemen tell us now that mutually preferential trade is impossible. But they go further and say that it is absurd. They say they would not ask for it. I think a clear line is drawn between the two parties on this question. The Conservative party firmly believe in this policy, believing not only that it is a good thing for Canada, but that it is possible of attainment. And here I just wish to read a very few quotations from the prize essay of Mr. Colmer, published as a supplement to the Statist, May 2, 1896 :

Since 1860 the colonies have had the same treatment as foreign countries in connection with their exports to Great Britain. Preferential treatment between foreign parent states and their colonies, such as France and Spain and Portugal, still prevails. They all admit the products of their several colonies on better fiscal terms to the home markets than those of foreign countries. The rule also obtains in the case of the union between Norway and Sweden, each country extending to the other preferential treatment in the matter of import duties.

Then I wish to read also a resolution passed in this parliament in 1892 :

If and when the parliament of Great Britain and Ireland admits Canadian products to the markets of the United Kingdom on more favourable terms than it accords to the products of foreign countries, the parliament of Canada will be prepared to grant corresponding advantages by a substantial reduction in the duties it imposes upon British manufactured goods.

I read this to show that the Conservative party has always been in favour of this policy, and thought it a feasible one. In the proceedings of the Ottawa conference of Conservative colonial representatives, we find this resolution :

That this conference records its belief in the advisability of a customs arrangement between Great Britain and her colonies, by which trade within the empire may be placed on a more favourable footing than that which is carried on with foreign countries.

This resolution was carried by this very important conference and the men who took part in that conference had no doubt that an arrangement of this kind would be in the interests of the empire, and I think they had no doubt that it was quite possible to obtain it. Then, I will read a short selection from the London Times of January 15, 1891 :

When, however, we come to deal with a commercial union, we tread upon ground that has to be traversed with caution—

They were discussing this question :

Sir Gordon Sprigg tells us that free trade is not a fetish in the colonies, and that the theories of the text-books are not allowed to stand in the way of any fiscal measure that seems advantageous. As to the text-books, they are getting somewhat outworn even here—

That is in England :

Our modern economists have so many qualifications to make in the fine, square-cut doctrines of the older schools, that the science is rapidly becoming unrecognizable. There is still a considerable amount of fetish worship, but the ideas upon which any commercial union must rest will not in future incur the furious and unreasoning hostility that would have greeted them twenty years ago.

It is getting to be understood that free trade is made for man, not man for free trade, and any changes that may be proposed will have a better chance of being discussed upon their merits, rather than in the light of high and dry theory, backed by outcries about the thin end of the wedge. The British Empire is so large and so completely self-supporting that it could very well afford, for the sake of a serious political gain, to surround itself with a moderate fence.

What stronger language could be used? We have heard hon. gentlemen in this House on the other side quote the London Times. Well, I am quoting the London Times, and I do not think any stronger language could be used by gentlemen on this side of the House. The London Times at that time thought it was possible, and that it might be advisable. The last quotation from this essay is a letter of Sir John A. Macdonald, dated 8th of April, 1891, to the Right Hon. W. H. Smith, in which he says :

Manufacturers and their working people must, or rather should, be taught that they can find friendly and expanding markets in the colonies, if they are treated in the same spirit. Now, Canada has undertaken the development of her resources on so large a scale that she must have revenue, and, from various causes, can only look to customs and excise for it. While, therefore, she cannot promise a reduction of her customs duties, she will be quite ready to give British goods a preference of five or even ten per cent in our markets if our products receive a corresponding preference in England. The United States are the chief rivals of manufactures with us at present. With such a differential scale of duties as I suggest, all that we do not make ourselves would be supplied by the mother country. I see that Mr. Cecil Rhodes is in favour of such a policy, and I have little doubt that Australasia will adopt it. The Americans boast that such is the extent and diversity of their soil and climate that they are independent of the rest of the world. But they cannot compare with the British Empire in those respects. It is a world in itself, but I must not weary you with my speculations.

Mr. Speaker, I have read these selections from this essay to show that the writer was impressed with the importance of this question. He did not think that he was writing on something that was utterly impossible, or he would not have written on it as he did. He wished to show from the quotation he made from the London Times that that journal, the most influential journal in England, did not think the matter was utterly impossible, and that occasion might arise when it would be not only possible but advisable for England to surround herself and her colonies with a moderate fence. I have read the letter from the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald to the Hon. W. H. Smith to show what his views were at that time, and how sound those views were, and to show that the views held to-day by the Conservative party are the views held at that time by their late distinguished leader. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservative party, when a matter is presented to them which is in the interests of Canada, do not say it is impossible, but they say it is possible, and they will work for it on every occasion. The Conservative party worked for this thing in office, and they have continued to work for it when out of office, they have continued to work for this mutual preferential trade. My conclusion is that if Canadians really desire this most desirable thing they must put the Conservative party in power. I think that is the only conclusion to be reached, because we find that the Liberal party look on this idea as absurd, they look on it as impossible, they say they will not ask for it, and I believe if it was offered them they would not take it, because they say they do not believe in the principle of protection at all.

Mr. Speaker, I have presented the views of the leader of the government. If I quoted the views of some other members of the government it might be said they were not binding on the party. But I think it will be admitted that the views expressed by the leader of the government when in opposition are binding on the Liberal party, and that the views he expresses to-day are binding on the Liberal party. They cannot say that he does not express the views of the party, I think he does express the views of the party. If these views on this question are not the views of the party, then the only thing for the members of the party to do who do not agree with them is to leave a party that looks on this great thing as impossible of attainment, and join a party which thinks it is possible, and which is determined to do all in its power to obtain it, and which looks forward to the next general elections with hope that the country will put them in power, and install a government which will work for the best interests of the country, untrammelled by any theories and looking only to the interests of Canada.

Mr. PETER MACDONALD (East Huron). We have heard these tales so frequently that really I am getting tired. The statements made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat have been so frequently made that I think they should by this time have something else to tell us. He still insists that the Liberal party are inconsistent, that they have no fixed principles. Now, I think it is Emerson who says, in one of his essays on self-reliance, that consistency is the hobgoblin of weak-minded people and weak statesmen. He says that great men and great statesmen pay no attention to consistency, because on one day they speak out boldly their opinions and principles upon the conditions which prevail on that day, and on the following day they speak out just as boldly their opinions and their principles upon the condition of things that prevails on that day; and therefore, although the opinions may be different on both days, they are not inconsistent, because the conditions have wholly changed in the interval. Now, Sir, that is exactly the case in which the Liberal party of the country is to-day. Eight or ten years ago the conditions were such that we, in our wisdom, believed that wider and freer trade relations between this country and the United States would result in great advantages to both countries. We expressed our opinions at that time in view of the conditions which prevailed at that time. But the conditions have largely changed, and consequently our opinions have largely changed. If we expressed the opinions which we hold to-day as applying to the conditions which prevailed eight or nine years ago, we would be inconsistent.

Now, Mr. Spaker, I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman through his meanderings in regard to our so-called inconsistency upon the trade question; but I will only say that the conditions which prevailed eight or ten years ago do not at all prevail at the present time. Eight or ten years ago our principal market was in the United States of America. The Americans were unkind enough to pass almost a prohibitory law against the introduction of Canadian products. First, there was the McKinley Bill, and afterwards the Dingley Bill, imposing heavy duties upon barley, upon cattle, upon eggs and upon many other articles which I might mention. We told the Americans that if they did not give us reasonable conditions for reciprocity we could live without them. Then we turned our attention to establishing markets for Canadian products in Great Britain, and we have succeeded in doing so in a large measure. Canadian farmers who found themselves shut out of the American market for their barley, had gone very largely out of the growing of barley in the province of Ontario, and forced the American brewers to adopt other articles for the manufacture of pale beer, which they had formerly manufactured from Canadian barley. At present the better class of our cattle go much more largely to Great Britain than they did at that time. Therefore, the conditions have changed in these ways, so that a reciprocity treaty would not be so advantageous to Canada now as it would have been eight or ten years ago. At that time we sent nearly all our eggs to the United States, but since then we have succeeded, through arrangements made by the government, in sending our eggs in cold storage, and in placing them on the British market in prime condition. We have established that market, and, therefore, we do not require the American market to the same extent as we did eight or ten years ago. These are some of the conditions which have come up. Would it be reasonable that we, with these changed conditions, should hold the same opinions exactly as we did on the reciprocity question eight or ten years ago? But, I intend to speak to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House, upon a question which I deem of very great importance. Some few weeks ago I dealt with a question of national importance, namely, the transportation question. I am going to speak to-day of another question, a question that has a strong bearing on the question of transportation, namely, the question of immigration. I propose to examine what have been the results of the efforts made by the present government in the direction of finding producers, those who can produce commodities that may be transported from the farms and factories to the eastern markets. We have a very large area of fertile soil, and an immense and rich heritage belonging to Canada, and it behooves the government, as far as it possibly can, to get this vast heritage of vacant lands filled up as rapidly as possible, so that our country will be peopled and will be benefited to the very largest and fullest extent. In Manitoba, the North-west Territories and Athabaska, we have no less than 300,000,000 acres of land fit for either ranching or agricultural purposes. This immense area will give a home to millions of people who will make a competence out of it, as well as derive happiness for themselves, and I may say that this large area of our country will accommodate no less than 25,000,000 people. Efforts have been made, Mr. Speaker, for the last twenty-five years, to fill up that large extent of country, but, until recently, the attempts made have not been so successful as we have ardently desired. The present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), when he assumed office, applied himself to the subject with a will and with a purpose, and he succeeded in establishing a vigorous and well-devised immigration policy, which brings to him, in my opinion, great credit for his wisdom, his tact and administrative ability. He appears, indeed, to have grasped the whole situation, to have appreciated the wants and needs of the country in that respect, and he has conceived and carried out an immigration policy with a degree of ability that redounds very much to his credit. He employed immigration agents possessing a knowledge of the wants and needs of the country. He chose them from among the very best men we have, men of large personal knowledge of the resources and needs of the country. These men were sent to the different parts of the world for the purpose of bringing Canada as prominently as possible before the communities of these various countries. This country was brought before these communities in the form of lectures in regard to its climate, soil, products and markets. Rural scenes were brought before their eyes by magic lantern views, not views of ice castles, of grizzly bears, of war-painted Indians, not views of Miss Canada dressed in her toboggan suit or snowshoes, not her eternal snow-clad mountains of the west, but views of her orchards, her fields of growing grain, and of garnered crops, of thousands of horses and cattle grazing on her ranches, of homes as they were and homes as they are, showing by contrast the improvement and progress made by the people who have come into the country. These were the scenes that roused in the breasts of those who heard these lectures a desire to come to Canada and share the blessings that Providence has so bountifully bestowed upon us. These were the scenes which were presented, and not scenes of snow and ice, high mountains, and wild animals, which appeared in the pamphlets sent out by the Conservative party, and which were described so enthusiastically by the emigration agents sent out by them. Only about thirty years have elapsed since the first survey was made in Manitoba, and since the first immigrants commenced to go in there. I believe that the province has not filled up as rapidly as it should have filled up; still, I have pleasure in stating that we have no less than 30,000 farmers in the province of Manitoba, occupying about one-third of the soil, but still leaving room for 60,000 more. The saleable products of the province of Manitoba, in 1889, amounted, in value, to no less than $23,000,000. If the progress of the past even continues for the next ten years, we will have a production in the province of Manitoba the extent of which it is not safe to predict. Take the improvement in Manitoba in one year. In 1899, there were 1,011,355 acres prepared for the crops of that year. The amount prepared for the crops of this year, 1900, is 1,492,085, or in other words, an increase over last year of 480,630 acres, or an increase of 32 per cent in one year. If the saleable products be as bountiful this year as they were last year, we may expect them to be nothing short of $30,000,000, an increase that is greater than any one year in the history of that province. When I state this fact the House will see what the government has been doing for that country. No less than 10,000 farmers went into Manitoba and the North-west Territories during last year. The wise and vigorous policy of the Minister of the Interior has been crowned with abundant success, and has produced fruits of which we are all proud, irrespective of the party that we belong to. But, I have said already that there is ample room in that vast country for 25,000,000 people. That fact will give an idea of the great work which the political parties of this country will have to do in the near future, namely, to people that country with thrifty and industrious settlers. The task will take time to accomplish, but we must put forth all the energy we possibly can to assist the hon. Minister of the Interior in the efforts which he is making to bring people into the country. I may say that the hon. Minister of the Interior is on the highway to accomplishing a great deal; in fact, he has accomplished a great deal already. We would all rejoice to see that country occupied by our own people, by people from the old country, Anglo-Saxon and Celtic, but, we cannot expect that to a very great degree. While we seek to get immigrants from other countries, we shall not forget, for one moment, our own people, and we shall try, as far as we possibly can, to obtain as many people as possible from the mother country. When we consider that 30,000 farmers in Manitoba, in 1899, produced $750 of an average for each, the importance of the rapid settlement of that country must be evident to everybody without distinction of party, and parliament, in my opinion, should vote a much larger sum, so as to enable the government to carry out even a more vigorous immigration policy than up to the present it has been able to do. It would be a grand investment in the interests of the entire country; an investment which would bring back a large dividend to the whole nation, because, as we strengthen that portion of the country, we strengthen the contiguous portions as well. The great addition to the general wealth of the country secured from the soil now lying idle would in a few years be enormous, even at the present progress of immigration. The moneys paid by the incomers for material for building their houses, barns and sheds; the money paid for implements to operate their farms, and for furniture and for clothing and for the hundred and one things they require, as well also as the wages which they would pay to men working on the farms, the taxes they would pay to improve the country, and their contribution to the general revenue of the nation; all that would tend to improve, enlarge, develop and enrich the country. I am pleased to know the principles of the policy of the government upon this question. They are as follows: First, the object of the government is to place settlers upon the vacant lands as rapidly as possible. Second, to offer reasonable and liberal inducements to immigrants from Great Britain, from the United States and from European countries. Third, to give a free homestead of 160 acres of land to each settler over eighteen years of age. Fourth, to avoid the immigration of the pauper class. Towards this end the government has taken the wise precaution that every head of a family must be possessed of a hundred dollars, in addition to the cost of his transportation from the country of his origin to the part of Canada he intends to settle in. The fifth principle of the immigration policy of the government is that the immigrants encouraged to come to this country must be farmers, and must be steady, thrifty, industrious, honest and willing to work. No encouragement is given to any other class but those described, and who are particularly adapted for the necessities of this country. In order to enable the government to get this class of immigrants in reasonable numbers, they must be permitted to draw from countries outside of Great Britain, and the countries to which we must look are those which possess the largest proportion of agriculturists to the entire population.

The following figures will show what these countries are:

	Total Population.	Population engaged in Agriculture.
England and Wales....	30,000,000	1,070,000
Germany	50,000,000	21,000,000
Sweden	4,300,000	1,000,000
Russia (including Finland, Poland and the Caucasus)	108,000,000	48,000,000
France	38,000,000	18,000,000
Belgium	6,300,000	3,000,000
Austria (including Galicia and Hungary)....	43,000,000	24,000,000

In England and Wales but 3½ per cent of the total inhabitants are engaged in agriculture; in Germany, 42 per cent; in Sweden, 23 per cent; in Russia, 44 per cent; in France, 47 per cent; in Belgium, 49 per cent; and in Austria, 56 per cent of the total population follow the plough. It will be noticed that England does not constitute a wide field from which to draw agricultural immigrants. We must remember also that there are about 20,000,000 acres of untilled land in Great Britain awaiting the energy of the tiller of the soil. In other words, these lands are starving for want of labour, and therefore in the future when this land is under cultivation, we cannot expect to draw from Great Britain even as large a number as we are drawing at the present day. Therefore, we must devote our energies to countries from which we can get a large number of suitable settlers for our country. Forty-two per cent of the Germans are agriculturists, and as we all know, they are a fine, substantial people. They are everywhere noted for their industry, probity and economy; but the laws of Germany are opposed to foreign countries sending emigrant agents to Germany for the purpose of inducing her people to settle in other countries, and therefore, though we receive a number of immigrants from Germany every year, they come largely of their own accord. In the future we may hope for a larger number of settlers from Germany than we have had in the past. Now, there are 48,000,000 agriculturists in Russia, (including Finland, Poland and the Caucasus), so that Russia presents a wide field for us to draw immigration from. But the question comes up here, and a very important question it is: Do these people constitute a proper class to induce to come to this country? I heard a member of the opposition say some time ago that the government was unwise in their day and generation in encouraging the people of Russia to settle here. Fifteen or twenty years ago the Mennonites came from Russia, and that immigration was opposed by a considerable number of the people of this country. One objection to them was that their religious creed deterred them from taking up arms in case of war. In my opinion that was a very feeble objection. That does not arise from any cowardice on their part, but they believe that all international questions can be settled without recourse to arms, a belief in which we agree to a very great extent. However, the Mennonites settled in southern Manitoba, and although their habits and peculiarities were repulsive to a number of our people, yet those who supported them pleaded that they should have a chance to improve, and to-day we find the Mennonites among the most prosperous farmers of Manitoba. Their old habits and customs and peculiarities have passed away, and they have largely assimilated Canadian customs and Canadian modes of life. Formerly, they used to live in villages, but now they are scattering themselves, as the Canadians do, over the farms they cultivate. The young men and the young maidens who have grown up in these Mennonite settlements are Canadians in every sense of the word. As it was with them, so I expect it will be with others who come from Russia. But, what about the Doukhobors? During the session an hon. gentleman on the other side spent quite a number of minutes condemning the government for encouraging the immigration of the Doukhobors to Canada. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), spent a few minutes in denouncing the government for encouraging this class of immigrants, no less than 7,400 of whom have come to this country and been stationed in colonies in the North-west. Although some people object to them on the same grounds that they object to the Mennonites, namely, on account of their refusal to take up arms and their peculiar customs, dress and manners, the same causes, I believe, will operate on them as have operated on the Mennonites, and by the strong forces of assimilation, in less than a generation, they will have acquired the habits and customs and ideas of Canadians, and will be as good Canadians as if they had come from Ontario. The question to consider is not whether their habits or customs are repulsive, but whether they are honest and industrious; and if they possess these qualifications, we are safe in giving them homesteads in our country.

In searching out the evidence both for and against them—for I was not looking for the one more than the other—I came across reports given of these people by men who have personal knowledge of their character. The first is the evidence of Mr. Stevens, the British consul at Batoun. Writing to the Home Office, London, on May 27, 1898, he said:

The Doukhobors belong to a community known to be the best farmers in Russia. They are thrifty, steady, and law-abiding, and have by good behaviour, diligence, sobriety and hard working qualities, brought nothing but prosperity to the barren localities of Russia in which they are originally settled.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

No higher recommendation than this could be given of any people. If this be true—and we have no reason to believe it is not—these people will be of great advantage to our country. But I have further testimony, which I think will be satisfactory to all who are willing to judge by the evidence and are not governed by prejudice. In a letter dated Moscow, August 20, 1898, addressed to Professor Mavor, of the city of Toronto, one of the professors in the provincial University, by Count Leo Tolstoi, I find the following:

The Doukhobors are the best farmers in Russia. They would use land and seeds given to them in the best way. They live the most chaste family life. They would adapt themselves to any climate. They would send their children to the public school, if their children were not obliged to receive religious instruction.

From an analysis of that letter of Count Leo Tolstoi, I gather that these people are skilled in agriculture, that they are honest and industrious, that they are chaste in their social life, that they are liberal and broad-minded in educational and religious matters, and adaptable to our climate and conditions. We could not have any higher recommendation of any class of people. But I have still further testimony. From a letter of October 17, 1898, addressed to the superintendent of immigration, by Mr. J. G. Colmer, secretary to Lord Strathcona, the High Commissioner of Canada, I quote these words:

From all the High Commissioner can ascertain he believes the Doukhobors consist largely of agriculturists, and that they are a thrifty, steady, and law-abiding people. They appear to be somewhat similar in many ways to the Mennonites, and if they go to Canada in many numbers it is hoped they will prove to be successful settlers.

Again, in a letter addressed to the Minister of the Interior, dated October 20, 1898, by Lord Strathcona himself, I find the following:

From all I can learn, these Doukhobors are steady, hard-working and thrifty, and are likely to be an acquisition to the country.

These two last quotations are from Lord Strathcona, who represents Canada in England, and who has always taken a very deep interest in the welfare of Canada, which he so ably represents, and who must be in possession of reliable information, or he would not have written about these people as he has done. That testimony is very important. It must be borne in mind—and I mention this, because there is a false impression that the government assist these people very largely, and are doing more for them than they would do for our own people—that the government do not assist these people to come to this country and have not paid a cent to bring them across. But what the government has done, is this: It has been customary for both governments, Liberal and Conservative, to pay to the steamboat booking agents, one pound sterling for each immigrant brought across in the steamers; but instead of doing that in the case of the Doukhobors, the government paid the one pound per head into the hands of a committee at Winnipeg, and in consideration of that payment, the committee has to see that they are provided for after landing and are placed on their homesteads in the North-west. That is all the government have paid.

I think I can dismiss from my consideration the Doukhobors, but there is another class of people, for the bringing whom into the country we have been strongly blamed. These are the Galicians. The Galicians are Austrians, as Galicia is a province of Austria, and the immigration from Galicia has been going on for many years. It did not begin under the present government. In a correspondence which took place between our former High Commissioner in London, the hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition, and the late government, the hon. gentleman agreed that the immigration of such a class would be valuable to this country, and he highly recommended them. We have now in this country about 16,400 Galicians, against whom strong objection has been made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor). Against their opinions, let me place the testimony of people who speak from personal knowledge, and whose testimony is thus more reliable than that of these hon. gentlemen, who only speak from hearsay. In looking up the evidence for and against the Galician immigration, I find the following in a report issued by the general colonization agent of the government, wherein he makes reference to this class of people:

Proceeding to inspect the Galician colony of Fish Creek, I found these people had made as much progress as any nationality could be expected to do in the same time. I found also that the Galician girls gave entire satisfaction to their employers. The people are industrious and frugal; they are acceptable to other nationalities, they having made their homes comfortable, and I found it generally conceded that they will make good citizens. Their industry, frugality and thrift have removed the opposition that many had against them at the time of their advent to the country.

This evidence is worthy of the greatest credence, as it comes from a gentleman who was in a position to speak from personal knowledge and, therefore, with authority. Now, let me give you another evidence. In 1893, Sir Charles Tupper, the hon. baronet who now leads the opposition, was the High Commissioner in London. He issued a report, and, under the heading 'Continental Immigration,' I find this statement made:

There is no doubt, however, that the settlements of Germans, Scandinavians, Austrians and Galicians in the different parts of the Dominion are increasing, and that class of immigration is of the most satisfactory character.

The evidence I have given you upon the Galicians is drawn from men whose ability to testify cannot be challenged. It shows the wisdom of the Minister of the Interior in urgently soliciting these people to come to our country.

Now, having said so much with regard to the class of people our government have been inviting to come to this country and, to some extent, encouraging to come, I want to draw some comparisons between the result of the immigration policy of the Liberal-Conservative party and the result of the immigration policy of the Liberal party. It is sometimes said that comparisons are odious. I do not make these comparisons with that intention, but to show the results that will arise from a better policy as compared with those which can be expected to rise from an inferior policy. In the years 1881 to 1890, inclusive, the large sum of $3,075,000, or an average of $307,500 a year was expended by the Liberal-Conservative government in promoting immigration. The official return shows that, during these ten years there came into this country not less than 886,177 immigrants. I have here the report of the Department of Agriculture for the year 1891, and I will read you the footings of a table, which I give under its own head:

The number of immigrants who arrived during the ten years between 1881 and 1890, inclusive, and who were reported by the agents of the department as having stated their intention to settle in Canada, were as follows:

1881.....	47,991
1882.....	112,458
1883.....	133,624
1884.....	103,824
1885.....	79,169
1886.....	69,152
1887.....	84,526
1888.....	88,766
1889.....	91,600
1890.....	75,067

Total in ten years..... 886,177

Estimated natural increase, based upon the natural increase in United States, 1.4 p.c.. 605,000

Total increase..... 1,491,177

Mr. TAYLOR. That is ancient history.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). It is true that this is ancient history, but it teaches a very modern lesson. As I shall give you reason for believing, these tables must have been falsely made up, though put before this country as truthful official statements, or, these people who were alleged to have come in must have left the country again. Hon. gentlemen opposite may take either horn of the dilemma they please. These figures show a total immigration of 886,177. There must have been some natural increase of Canada's population in these ten years. I think I shall be justified in placing that natural increase at the same rate as that of the United States in the same ten years, as we all know that the natural increase is larger in Canada than it is in the United States. But in order to make the comparison on a safe basis, I will assume a natural increase equal to that of the United States, which was 1·4 a year. Canada's population in 1881 was 4,325,000. The natural increase, at the rate I have stated, would give in ten years an additional population of 605,500. These added to the immigrants, who, according to the official return, have entered Canada, would represent an increase of population of 1,491,677. Thus we should have had in Canada a population of 5,816,677, but, instead of that, the census returns of 1891 showed only 4,805,000, or 1,011,000 unaccounted for. Where did the immigrants go? Did these people ever come in? It must be remembered that this was a period under the national policy, a period during which the Conservatives tell us, this country was very prosperous and when there was a great demand for labour in all the industries of this country.

That took place during a period which, I must say, was a prosperous period in the history of Canada, which prosperity, of course, the Conservatives attributed to the operation and to the influence of the national policy. If there was a time in our country when these people should remain with us; it was certainly the years from 1880 to 1890, because, as these gentlemen said, they were furnishing labour to so many thousand individuals. I believe myself that not half of this number came it at all, and, moreover, that a very large number left. One of the strongest Conservative papers in the Northwest Territories made this remark in its editorial columns:

The trails from Manitoba to the States were worn bare and barren by the footprints of the departing settlers.

Now, all this is changed under the new order of things. A new era has dawned under the wise administration of the Liberal government. Settlers who come now come to remain with us, come to add to our strength, come to help us develop the country, come to help pay taxes, come to assume the responsibilities of Canadian citizens, come to remain permanently amongst us and be Canadians—that is the difference. Why, Sir, the Mail and Empire a few months ago, in its editorial columns, made use of these words:

There is now a change, not only has the exodus stopped, but the Dominion, more particularly Manitoba and the North-west, is being filled with a most desirable class of settlers, particularly from Great Britain and the United States, whose people are very closely in harmony with the conditions that prevail in all phases of Canadian life.

Sir, the evidence must have been very clear, yes, as clear as a sunbeam, to lead the Mail and Empire to give such a valuable testimony in favour of the immigration policy of the Liberal government. The success of the immigration policy rests upon these conditions: First, the Minister of Interior amended the land regulations to such an extent as to make them much more favourable to immigrants. He appointed intelligent and vigorous immigration agents, he went to work and formulated and carried out a policy on lines based on good judgment and wisdom, and in this way he has accomplished the great ends which I have pointed out. Now, what have we done last year? These are interesting figures, and any person who takes any interest in immigration—

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Mr. CLARKE: Where are those figures to be obtained?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). They are to be obtained from original documents, and I have much pleasure in placing them before the hon. gentleman, in order that he may study them. Now let the hon. gentleman listen. The arrivals of immigrants in 1899 from the United States were 11,945.

Mr. CLARKE: Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him where he obtained those figures?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I obtained them, as I generally obtain my figures, by hard work; and if others worked as hard as I do to obtain correct figures, there would not be so many blunders made in giving figures picked up from newspapers and other sources.

Mr. DAVIN. What is the hon. gentleman's authority?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Never mind my authority, it is a good one. I have been long enough in the House to be known as an authority upon figures. I have never used figures yet that have been contradicted, I never used figures that I do not know to be correct. It does not matter to the hon. gentlemen whether they are official or not, so long as they are correct, and if they think they are not correct, it is their duty to correct them. With that explanation, I will proceed to give you the figures, so take out your pencils and put them down. We obtained from the United States, in 1899, 11,945 immigrants; from England, Wales, Scotland and Ireland, we obtained 10,660; Doukhobors, 7,350; Galicians, 6,700; Germans, 780; Scandinavians, 1,526; France and Belgium, 413; miscellaneous nationalities, 5,169, or a total for the year 1899 of 44,543, as compared with 31,900 in 1898, or an increase last year of 12,643, or 40 per cent. Now Sir, is not that a great change? Did we use to get immigrants from the United States? The immigrants now coming from that country come to people our country, expressing their intention to remain with us and to be Canadians. Many people who formerly went to the American States, now, under the vigorous immigration policy that we have established, knowing that the Liberals are in power and that they will be justly treated in the North-west, are selling their farms, selling their cattle, and selling whatever they cannot bring with them, and coming into our country to settle permanently and live under the good old flag.

Mr. DAVIN. They came in three years before 1896, in consequence of the Conservative policy.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). You had better not express an opinion until I am done giving figures, and then you will see what they did during the last three years before 1896. I am going to give you the results of the immigration policy of the Liberal government during the last three years of their regime, so please sit quietly and patiently.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—INQUIRY FOR REPORT.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.). Before you leave the Chair, I wish to ask the government if the Minister of Militia has had any report to-day from Col. Otter, and if so, whether he will bring it down this evening and give it to the House?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I hardly think that is the case, but I will mention the matter to the Minister of Militia and Defence.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I had finished giving a statement of the arrival of immigrants in Canada during the year 1899, which showed that a great many more immigrants arrived during that year than for many years past. I was asked some time previously to make a comparison between the results of the Conservative immigration policy during the last three years of their regime with the results of our policy for the last three years. I think that request was made by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). As I do not see him in his seat now, I will make the comparison for his benefit, so that if he has time at his disposal he may read it. In 1896-7, the immigrants that came into Canada numbered 20,016. That was the first year, as the House will remember, of the regime of the Liberal party. In the first year we were not in a position to put our new policy into operation, and, therefore, the results of that new policy could not be well seen until the following year, when it was put into vigorous operation by the hon. Minister of the Interior. We may say, therefore, that the immigrants that came in during the first year of the regime of this party really came in under the old policy, and as I say, they numbered 20,016. In 1897-8, the first year, I may say, of the operation of our policy, there came in 31,900 immigrants, or 55 per cent more than those that came in during 1896-7. In 1898-9, the next year of our policy, there came in 44,543, or 40 per cent more than came in during the preceding year, making 96,459 that came in during the three years, counting the number that came in during 1896-7, under, you may say, the regime of the Conservative party. That was an average of 32,153 per year. Now comes the comparison. In the last three years of the Conservative rule, the immigrants numbered 56,130, or an average in each year, during these three years, of 18,710, as compared with an average in our three years of 32,153, or, in other words, during the three years we brought in 40,329 immigrants more than were brought in during the years 1894, 1895 and 1896, or an increase, during these three years, of 72 per cent. Now, I think that comparison should be satisfactory to the hon. member for South Leeds when he reads it. I have here the following facts in regard to homestead entries made in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and it will be interesting to all parties to see that while there is a largely increasing number taking advantage of the liberal land laws and homesteading freely, there is also a greater percentage of the land being occupied by Canadians. These figures will be interesting to the House. In 1896 the total number of homestead entries was 1,857. In 1897 the homestead entries numbered 2,406, in 1898, 4,848, and in 1899, 6,689, a large increase each year. Now, notice the homestead entries by Canadians. In 1896 the homestead entries by Canadians numbered 570 only; in 1897, 703 homesteads were entered by Canadians; in 1898, 1,534 homesteads were entered by Canadians, and in 1899, 2,154. Now, notice the entries by persons having made previous entries. In 1896 there were 385; in 1897, 396; in 1898, 620, and in 1899, 720. Now, notice the entries made by people coming into Canada from foreign countries. In 1896 there were 902; in 1897, 1,307; in 1898, 2,694, and in 1899, 3,835. That table is of very great interest to all parties, because it shows the continual and increasing income into this country, under the regime of the party that has taken hold of the immigration question lately with such vigour, energy and wisdom. Let me give you another comparison, and I shall ask the House if it is not convincing. I shall give now a comparison of the net homestead entries during the last three years of Conservative rule and three years of Liberal rule. You will understand, Mr. Speaker, what I mean by net entries. There are a certain number of cancellations going on, and the term net entries refers to those that are left after the cancellations are made. In 1894 there were 2,044 net entries; in 1895, 1,504, and in 1896, 1,426, making a total, in three years, under Conservative rule, of 4,974. Now, notice the other side of the shield, under the administration of the present government. In 1897 there were 1,930 net entries; in 1898, 4,220, and in 1899, 6,476, or, during three years, 12,626 net entries, or an increase of net entries between the last three years of Conservative rule and the first three years of Liberal rule of 154 per cent. This shows the vigour and wisdom that must have been brought to bear upon the question of filling up the North-west Territories. There is one point I wish the House to bear in mind, and it is that this does not include the entries made by the Doukhobors, to the number of 2,000, which, in all probability, will appear in future figures. But, I wish to make another comparison between the results of the immigration policy of the Conservative party and the results of the immigration policy of the Liberal party. I think it would be fair to compare the land sales of the different land-owning companies in the North-west during the last three years of the Conservative rule and the first three years of Liberal rule—the Hudson Bay Company, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company, the Regina and Long Lake Railway Company and the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company. The sales made during the years named by these companies are as follows: 1894, 207,856 acres; 1895, 222,499 acres; 1896, 361,338 acres, or a total, during three years, of 719,683 acres. Now, look on the other side of the shield under the progressive government we have in power. In 1897 the sales by the same companies amounted to 719,016, or as much in one year as during the three years that have already been mentioned. In 1898 there were sold by these companies 1,431,774 acres; in 1899, 1,871,224 acres, or a total, for these three years, of 4,022,004. In other words, for every one acre sold by these companies in the years 1894, 1895, 1896, there were six acres sold by these companies during the last three years that the Liberal government was in power. When we consider these comparisons we are led to the conclusion that there must be something more than chance in this and that some of it must be attributed to the wisdom of the policy which this government has so successfully carried out. Let me now compare the homestead entries made during the regime of the Conservative party with the homestead entries made since this government came into power. This comparison will give a fair estimate of the success of the respective policy of each government. To enable me to make this comparison I present a table of considerable value showing the cost of immigration for each year from 1885 to 1899, the number of homestead entries for each year, the number of cancellations, and the net number of homestead entries remaining:

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

	Cost	Total entries	Entries cancelled.	Net entries.
1885	$ 425,860	1,858	620	1,238
1886	257,354	2,657	855	1,802
1887	341,236	2,036	485	1,551
1888	244,789	2,655	735	1,920
1889	202,499	4,416	1,896	2,520
1890	110,091	2,955	926	2,029
1891	181,045	3,523	1,206	2,317
1892	177,604	4,840	1,860	2,980
1893	180,677	4,067	1,464	2,603
1894	202,235	3,209	1,176	2,031
1895	195,652	2,394	890	1,504
1896	120,199	1,857	426	1,429
Total cost	$2,639,241	36,269	12,563	23,926
1897	127,438	2,364	454	1,930
1898	261,194	4,848	624	4,220
1899	255,878	6,689	213	6,476
Total cost	$ 644,510	13,921	1,291	12,626

You will notice that the Conservative government ended in 1896 and in 1897 entered upon the first year of the government of the Liberal party. That table brings out very many items, and I shall analyse it and show the particular results which this table proves. The cost of immigration for the twelve years from 1885 to 1896, under the Conservatives, was $2,639,242, giving a yearly average of $219,770; the total homestead entries for the twelve years was 36,269, the cancellations numbered 12,563, or one cancellation for every three entries made. That proves that during that time a large number of people who went into that country with the object of becoming permanent settlers were compelled by the land regulations and other avoidable causes to leave the North-west and to seek a living in another country. On no other grounds can you explain such a large number of cancellations during the Conservative government. We are told by gentlemen opposite that the Liberals are not nearly so economical in this, as well as in other matters, as were the Conservatives. As I have said, the total expenditure on immigration during the Conservative regime was $2,639,242, and the net homestead entries were 23,706, giving an average cost to the government of this country of $110 for every net homestead entry made during the 12 years of the Conservative government. Look at the other side of the shield and see the results of the immigration policy of the Liberal government. The cost for the three years was $644,500, or a yearly average of $214,830, or some $5,000 less than the yearly average during the Conservative regime. The total homestead entries made during these three years of Liberal rule, 1897-8-9, were 13,921, and the total cancellations during the three years, 1,291, or one cancellation to every eleven homestead entries, as compared with one cancellation to every three entries during the Conservative regime. The net homestead entries under the Liberal government numbered 12,626, and the cost for each net homestead entry was only $52, as compared with the cost of $110 for each net homestead entry under the Conservatives. There you have double the work done for less than half the price. I challenge any gentleman on the opposite side to make any other deduction than that I have made from the official figures that I have given to you.

Mr. TAYLOR. Where did you get them; the report is not down yet?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I got them by my own hard work, and had you not left the committee in bad temper the other day you might have had the information which I am giving you now.

Mr. TAYLOR. You examined the witness before you called him.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). People who go to committees for political purposes and try to break them up in order to accomplish their own ends, and then because they cannot have their own way, get mad and take his own friends and himself out of the committee, certainly lose a good deal of information that they would otherwise have received. It appears to me that these hon. gentlemen do not want to get information, because the other day we brought a party to give information, and they refused to accept of it. Consequently, they are now in darkness, while others are in light, and they wonder where we get the information when they close their eyes to the source from which it comes.

Mr. TAYLOR. We have been waiting for three months to get the report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). And you may have to wait longer. Now, the average yearly net entries under Conservative rule were 1,975, and under Liberal rule 4,050. The average yearly cancellations under Liberal rule were 430, and under Conservative rule 1,047. The total average homestead entries yearly under Conservative rule were 3,022, and under Liberal rule 4,480. If these figures are not conclusive, no figures in the universe would be.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to draw my remarks to a close; and I may say that the efforts of the Liberal party to people our vast domain have been rewarded with great success, as I have shown. It cannot be said that this success was due to chance or accident, and was independent of wise legislation. It cannot be said that it was owing to the expenditure of vast sums of money, for a great deal less has been expended in comparison with the work done. There is great credit due to the government for this success, particularly to the able Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who formulated, inaugurated and administered the policy under which such abundant fruits were realized and our country enriched. It is one more evidence, Mr. Speaker, to show that it is the Liberal party and not the Conservative party that possesses the 'genius of government.'

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Macdonald, East Huron), would hardly expect me to follow him in a discussion that has little or nothing to do with the question now before the House. The hon. gentleman made a very interesting discussion. He proved to his own satisfaction, and no doubt to the satisfaction of a number of his friends, that his deductions were well founded, particularly when we have the announcement that his figures are in no sense to be questioned.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this debate has proceeded at very considerable length; but I am bound to say that I do not think that the debate, even at this late stage, is without considerable interest and profit to the country. I listened at the outset with a great deal of interest to the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance, as I was anxious to know what he would present as the strong reasons for the claim of the Liberal party to the support of the people of this country; and I was not at all disappointed at the ground he took. In the first place, he told us that we had in this country an immense increase of trade, an increase of the bank discounts and deposits, an increase of railway traffic, an increase in the sale of lands, an increase of immigration, a great growth in the iron industry, and a surplus at the end of last year of $4,000,000 odd, with a promise next year of a surplus of something like $7,500,000. All the hon. gentleman need have done was merely to state that there was expansion, and all these things would follow, quite independently of the action of hon. gentlemen opposite. Therefore, it was very difficult to discover why these hon. gentlemen should claim credit. The main point now under discussion is that hon. gentlemen opposite are now and have been for the last three years on trial for their fiscal policy. If there is any rule of more importance than all others, which overshadows all others, by which a party that comes into power should be judged, it is the fiscal policy which that party has put before the country. Now, what was the fiscal policy of hon. gentlemen opposite? I am not going into the question of broken promises, because my hon. friend who has just taken his seat says we are not to count on broken promises. He has laid down an excellent rule for the Liberal party. He has told us that we are not to confront them with having been inconsistent. He tells us blandly that all the Liberal party have to do is to hold one set of principles to-day and abandon them to-morrow. Why abandon them?

He says the conditions have changed. I am not going to say that a man should never change his mind; but I say that the party leaders, and hon. gentlemen who follow them so tamely, ought always to bear in mind that if there is a change it ought to be sanctioned by decency, reason and consistency; but that is not the case of hon. gentlemen opposite. They change only when they are defeated in their aims. The conditions that have changed are simply the fortunes of hon. gentlemen opposite, and not such as should govern the people of this country in giving their votes. I intend to delay the House only for as short a time as I can; but I intend to call attention to the rule laid down by the Minister of Finance, when he made his first financial statement in the House, and it was this. He took some trouble to read that portion of the Liberal platform adopted at the convention held in the city of Ottawa in 1893, which gave the keynote of the fiscal policy of hon. gentlemen opposite in attempting to deal with the tariff for the first time. It was this:

That the tariff should be so adjusted as to make free or bear as lightly as possible upon the necessaries of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, and particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

Now, what was the first rule the hon. gentleman laid down? He proposed to have two tariffs; in fact, a sort of twin tariff. One was, to use the hon. gentleman's own expression, a general tariff, and the other was to be a reciprocal tariff to apply to the whole world; and I wish hon. gentlemen to bear in mind the distinction between the reciprocal tariff as laid down in 1897 and the preferential tariff as we have it to-day. What were to be the virtues of the reciprocal tariff? It was to cure all the evils that had beset the tariff under the national policy. Let me read to the House what the hon. gentleman said with regard to the cardinal principles laid down in both of these tariffs. He said:

We propose to adopt a general tariff, and then we propose to adopt a special tariff having reference to the countries which are desirous of trading with us; and, as a matter of course, not by the express words of the resolution, but by the condition of affairs which exists, that preferential tariff gives preference, above all others, to the products of Great Britain.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having thus stated the guiding principles in the matter, I propose to invite your attention to the general tariff; and in doing so, I wish it to be distinctly understood that, as I have already explained, the duties are considerably higher than we intend they shall be, as applied to countries which are willing to trade with us. And, if as I read the items, hon. gentlemen think that the rate upon any of them is too high, I beg them to believe that before I close I shall have something to say which will show that in respect of our relations with Great Britain and in respect of our relations with any other country that is willing to meet us on equal terms, we shall be prepared to offer a measure of tariff reform of the most substantial character, which is not contained in this tariff which I am going to read.

Mr. CLANCY.

The hon. gentleman explains by saying that there are things that come from foreign countries and which we desire to obtain on fair and reasonable terms, and that desire is paramount to every other consideration in dealing with the tariff. So that the hon. gentleman lays down a general tariff in which there is to be little change, if any, and then he lays down a special tariff in which there is to be considerable change. To make myself clear, he says that in any changes which may be made in the general tariff, they are made only for the purpose of reaching such articles as we must have in this country, and that consideration is paramount to every other. But that, except as regards the articles to which he intended to refer as he proceeded, it is not the intention of the government to make any considerable reduction in the general tariff as applied to countries which do not extend any consideration to us. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to show any proposition on their part to make any reductions in the general tariff as a whole. That was to go without any reduction, and any reductions that might afterwards be made were to be made entirely as the result of the application of a special tariff. To use the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, these hon. gentlemen made the first flank movement by which we were to have a reciprocal tariff that would apply to the whole world, and then a second flank movement which was a preferential tariff with Great Britain. Their first flank movement was defeated, and they had to fall back on the second, and the preferential tariff with Great Britain was to be the means of correcting all that they had complained of in the tariff of the Liberal-Conservative party. These hon. gentlemen proposed to put an end to combines. By what means? By what was then called a reciprocal tariff. They proposed to put a stop to the robbery of the public treasury; they proposed to kill protection; they proposed to make a revenue tariff; they proposed to equalize taxation; they proposed to tax the luxuries and make the necessaries of life free. That was a big contract, and when I call the attention of the House to what these gentlemen, when in opposition, complained of in this House and the country, it will be seen that very drastic remedies were required to enable them to carry out their programme.

I am sorry the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) is not in his place, for I want to read to the House what he had to say with regard to what this government was bound to do when it came into power:

He said it was a shame and a scandal that from one end of Canada to the other the man who is most heavily taxed is the poor man. Taxation should be so arranged that the poor man should either not be taxed at all or as lightly as possible, while the rich man should be taxed in proportion to his wealth. In England the poor man is almost entirely free from taxes.

Now comes the promise :

If the Liberal party were returned they would readjust the tariff so that the burden would rest more lightly on the poor and more heavily on the rich and bring about more markets in which the Canadians could sell their produce.

That was one of the evils to be cured, but here is another wail from another Liberal, the Minister of Justice (Senator Mills). Speaking at a public meeting in the town of Bothwell in 1895, that hon. gentleman said :

Out of the $40,000,000 imposed, only one-half goes into the treasury. What benefit is it to 90 per cent of the people to pay tribute to the remaining 10 per cent. The fact that the government are to-day defending protection shows that it is in the hands of the classes, and that they must defend the national policy.

We see that the flank movement had nothing to do with putting an end to what these hon. gentlemen called public robbery, for the condition of things remained just as it was before.

Then we have the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) telling us what evils must be remedied :

There was the sugar duties, which taxes the people year after year to the extent of $3,300,000, of which only $1,500,000 went into the public treasury, leaving $1,800,000 to the sugar manufacturers. There are the cotton duties which tax the people $2,700,000, of which the government got but $139,000, and there were the starch duties, costing $100,000, of which only $14,000 went into the treasury.

The House will be surprised when I call attention to the fact that not one particle of change was made by way of reduction in these duties. The sugar duties were temporarily reduced, but they are now higher than in 1896. Was there a reduction of the cotton duties? No. A higher rate is levied upon cottons than before. Then, as regards the starch duties, what happened? The duty on starch stands just as it did before, without the slightest change, notwithstanding the wails and promises made by these hon. gentlemen opposite to the people. After declaring that there was not an interest in Canada that was not injured and withered as the result of the national policy, what do the hon. gentlemen propose to do? There is not an evil that ever was known or could be invented that was not ascribed to the operation of the national policy. But what do they say now? They say: We could not think of taking any rash step, or applying any effective means to change that policy. Though it robbed the people of sixty million dollars a year, though it fostered combines, though it decreased the value of farm property and in every way impeded the progress of the country; we must put it down by degrees. Could there be greater folly than for hon. gentlemen to take a position of that kind? You might as well talk of pulling a drowning man out of water by degrees. If it were so bad as hon. gentlemen made it out to be, they could not abolish that policy, and introduce a new one too soon. They say that manufacturers prospered very much better under the old tariff that was in existence before the national policy. I am not advocating it, but if they believe so, why do they not apply the old tariff. The fact is, this whole plea is a mere refuge for men wanting in moral courage. It is a refuge for hon. gentlemen opposite who know that they had made a pledge to the people that they dare not fulfil. The Finance Minister is not wanting in astuteness, and he knew very well, that if they carried out this pledge, then the prediction of the Conservatives would be fulfilled and this country would be ruined. The hon. gentleman knew that as well as the Conservative party did. But he makes a feint of showing great reductions in the tariff for the benefit of the farmers. We have a dismal list of some insignificant articles upon which some reductions were made. The hon. gentleman is answerable for a good deal, in view of the fact that this list has been read over and over again, by his friends in this House. Here is the list as it has been given :

Farm rollers, manure spreaders, hay tedders, fanning mills, grain crushers, potato diggers, post-hole diggers, forks (pronged), hoes, rakes, n.e.s.

There is one heading in the Trade and Navigation Returns which has always been there, but which will not be there much longer if the hon. gentleman makes another raid. That heading is 'all other agricultural implements.' The hon. gentleman went into that item and fished out the post-hole diggers, the scythes and snaths, and sickles, and spread them out as evidence that this government had done something for the farmers. I challenge the hon. gentleman to say that he did not go there and fish them out. And, after all, what is the reduction? Give the Minister of Customs his own way, and take the case as he presents it to us, and what does the reduction amount to. He mentions portable engines. How many of these are used by the farmers? Then there are threshers and separators. These are not owned by the farmers as a mass; they are in the hands of a few persons. But, taking the increase to the farmers, how much did he save in giving to the whole farming community of half a million men and their families? He saved $19,304. I am not trying to reduce that by a single cent, but taking the figures of the minister himself. The hon. gentleman might easily have found articles in far more general use, instead of going to this obscure list. Take farm rollers, hay tedders, fanning-mills, post-hole diggers, and so on, and what do the whole importations amount to? Only to $26,535. This was the whole importation. I would ask the Minister of Finance what difference it made to the people of this country, that he reduced the duty on these articles, and what difference it would have made if he had even doubled the duties? It would not have been a drop in the bucket; it would not have been one grain in a sand hill. I will take the same number of articles that the hon. gentleman gives, just to show some of the things that he might have mentioned. From every platform in the country in 1895-6, it was declared by Liberal politicians that the farmers were bled white by the manufacturers, that they were the slaves of the manufacturers. These are the articles I will choose:

Cultivators, grain drills, harrows, binders, horse rakes, mowing machines, ploughs, reapers, farm wagons, freight wagons.

Did the hon. gentleman reduce these? No. And why? Because $1,540,000 worth of them came in, as against the enormous sum of $26,535 of the others. Evidently this is a mere pretense of a deduction in duty. In my opinion these questions should be discussed fairly. If the government of the day have made substantial concessions by way of reductions, if their pledges have been fairly fulfilled, no one should be so unreasonable as to make a demand that they should be fulfilled in every detail. But the hon. gentleman, when he made this change, made one that had no substance in it. It was merely an attempt to show the farmers that the government had protected their interests.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The farmers think so.

Mr. CLANCY. I am afraid my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell), entirely underestimates the intelligence of the farmers. I have no doubt, in spite of the facts, my hon. friend would go upon the platform and endeavour to make the farmers believe that their interests have been protected. I have no doubt as to the hon. gentleman's courage, and, I was going to say, his desire to persuade them.

Now, let us see what is the result of the operation of the hon. gentleman's tariff. He took off and he put on. We are told there has been a reduction. I propose to deal now with what is called the general tariff, and to deal with what is now the preferential tariff, but which, formerly, as laid down by the hon. gentlemen themselves was a reciprocal tariff. Under our system, if we take off the tax in one place, we do not thereby relieve the people to that extent, but we simply shift the burden. What is the rule followed out by the hon. gentlemen themselves? When you take off the tax in one quarter you must put it on in another, for the simple reason that, to use the words of the Finance Minister, you must have revenue. Now, what were the principal items the hon. gentleman dealt with? First of all, he took off $549,977 from Indian corn; he took off $102,300 from binder twine; he took off $126,885 from barbed wire fencing; he took off $85,000 from coal oil, and from iron manufactures of all descriptions, $405,098; making in all, $1,126,260. But, let us see whether the hon. gentleman put any on. Why, Sir, he put on rice $17,322, that is a necessary of life. He put on sugar $393,203, also a necessary of life; he put on tobacco, $1,051,466; he put on cotton goods, $169,958; on woollen goods, $236,860, or $742,529 more than he took off. Now, let me call his attention to the fact that under the general tariff his words are entirely fulfilled when he said there would be no reduction in the general tariff. This does not cover all the reductions, nor does it cover all the increases. I have stated the large items that are affected by the tariff as set forth by the hon. gentlemen themselves by way of reduction and by way of increases. The result was, taking both sides of the ledger, applying the rate of 1896 to the year 1899, that when the hon. gentleman had completed his tariff, the general tariff stood, independently of any manner in which it might be affected by the special tariff, $500,000 higher than he found it. I will show my hon. friend how it affected the poor people. The first thing the hon. gentleman did was to take $15 off seed beans, and put $17,322 on uncleaned rice; the next thing the hon. gentleman did was to take $19,304 off farming tools and put $169,958 on cottons; next he took $42,980 off iron and steel wire, and put $236,060 on woollen goods; next he took $126,885 off barbed wire fencing and put $393,203 on sugar. I wish to call attention to the fact that on sugar there is no reduction under the preference. Then, the hon. gentleman took $102,300 off binder twine, and he put on the poor man's tobacco $1,051,446. That is the way this is distributed. But, the hon. gentleman went further. He took $405,080 off iron goods, most of which was in the interest of the manufacturers, those people who were over-protected, who were bleeding the people white, and the hon. gentleman made them a present of this sum. I am not complaining of a reduction in duties that goes to help any interest in this country. I think it has been the policy of the Conservative party in the past, and I hope it will always be the policy of any party having the conduct of the affairs of this country, to make every article free that can be made so in the interest of the whole people and not of a section. But the hon. gentleman took $549,977 off Indian corn, and he made a present of that to the Americans.

Mr. CLANCY.

Then, he took $85,000 off coal oil and handed it over to the oil combine. I now challenge my hon. friend to point out any compensating advantages we have in the matter of coal oil. When we ask them if coal oil has been made cheaper they do not pretend to answer that question at all. Hon. gentlemen charge us with saying that as a result of reducing the duties, goods have become higher. Nobody has ever made such a contention, it would be silly and unworthy of any hon. gentleman to say that as a result of the reduction in duties on any article it has advanced in price. But, what we do say is that hon. gentlemen have taken the duty off, and taken it off in vain. They made a reduction in coal oil duties, and the next moment they turned around and gave the Standard Oil Company, that immense combine that menaces every interest in Canada, tanking advantages that more than overcome it, and the price of oil is to-day to be put up or down as may suit the interests of the great oil combine in Canada. Hon. gentlemen used to talk about the national policy being a means of fostering every combine, but the hon. gentlemen, by lowering the tariff, show that the change had no effect upon the combine. The hon. gentleman, not unwittingly but of design, and knowing what the outcome would be—because the late member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) pointed out to him what it would be—went ahead and made the change. I tell him now that while there is a reduction of $85,000 upon coal oil, the people of this country have not the slightest advantage, and the only consolation they have now is to put their hand into the other pocket and make up some other way this $85,000 that has gone to the oil combine.

Now, let us see what compensation there is with regard to the reduction in binder twine. Faithless in this case as the hon. gentlemen have been in every other case, what have they done? They took the duty off binder twine, and I warn my hon. friends opposite not to make the retort, that because the duty has been reduced that we make the contention that the cost of binder twine has been advanced. Binder twine did not advance for any substantial reason. It has been pointed out in this House that while it was heralded that the raw material had advanced, it had not, during the whole three years, advanced one-third of one cent per pound. But, hon. gentlemen had in their own hands a lever that they might have used with good effect. This country is not so poor that they were driven to take that course they did. The hon. gentlemen, while they had it in their hands to level the price, took the duty off binder twine, and they joined the combination in the United States, and assisted them by every means. I say they assisted them because they failed to prevent them; and one who fails to raise his finger in defence of the country is as culpable as one who does it a direct injury.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Would you be in favour of putting back the duty on binder twine?

Mr. CLANCY. What does my hon. friend (Mr. Campbell), say? Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire, as an outcome of the changes that have been made, the loading and unloading that has taken place from the rich to the poor, to call attention, for just a moment, to the rate of taxation that has been the subject of some discussion in the House during the last few weeks. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), in his budget speech, made the statement that the rate of taxation under Conservative rule, deducting coin and bullion, and making some deductions that I think the hon. gentleman was entitled to make, on his own side, was 19.19 per cent under Conservative rule, and under Liberal rule 17.17 per cent. The hon. gentleman fell into an error that I think he would not have fallen into had he known; the hon. gentleman fell into the error of counting in, for the purpose of showing a low rate of taxation, the Indian corn that was imported into this country and re-exported. I do not believe that the hon. Minister of Finance would have made that statement if he had known at the time. I think he was deceived by the bad book-keeping of the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), and I hope that when the hon. gentleman deals with the question again he will eliminate that, as he should have eliminated it, and that the calculation will be made on the same grounds and upon the same articles and under the same conditions as were applicable to the Conservative party. The hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), pointed out here, with what seemed to me very great clearness, that there had been a period of very low taxation from 1892 to 1896. There was a five years period of low taxation, the average for the five years being 17.47 per cent. Now, when we take the average rate of taxation imposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, for 1897, 1898 and 1899 we find, if we exclude Indian corn, which ought to be excluded, which hon. gentlemen will not contend should be included, that the taxation of hon. gentlemen for these three years was higher than it was for the five years I have referred to of the Conservative party. Instead of being 17.47 per cent, it was 17.59 per cent. But, hon. gentlemen will say: The preferential tariff did not come into operation during the first year. Ten months of the first year passed before the preferential tariff came into operation. Only one-eighth of it came in at that time and if you wish to deal with us fairly, and if we are to have credit for having made a reduction in taxation by means of our preferential tariff you must not take three years because the preferential tariff was not in force during that time. Well, then, I will take two years for the purpose of my comparison, comparing 1895 and 1896 as against 1898 and 1899. The rate of taxation for the last two years of Conservative rule was 17.65 per cent, and for the last two years under hon. gentlemen opposite it was 17.47 per cent. But, if we take the average per year for the five years from 1892 to 1896 we find that the average rate was 17.47 per cent, as against the rate of taxation under hon. gentlemen opposite during the last two years which I have given. This was during the time that hon. gentlemen were declaring from one end of the country to the other that the people were overtaxed. During these five years, from the time these hon. gentlemen left this House, until they came back to it the sun never rose that they did not complain that the taxation was too high, and yet taking these five years—and I desire to call special attention to this—the average taxation was precisely what it has been for the last two years under hon. gentlemen opposite and under the operation of their preferential tariff. Now, I am sorry that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), is not in his place because he—

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, never mind.

Mr. CLANCY. I do not know whether my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell) is jeering or not. His jeers are not always of the highest order. They do not stand upon a pedestal that many people will look up to, and if he wants to make himself appear a sensible and wise man the less he says the better for himself. We had the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, in dealing with the question of the admission of Indian corn into Canada, making this statement. Referring to the speech of the hon. ex-Minister of Finance, this is what the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce had to say in regard to the question:

That is redolent of the narrowest and most hidebound protection I ever heard advocated. I would like to have my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) let loose; I would like to have my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) let loose, to answer the hon. gentleman, and to inform him that when we admitted Indian corn free we conferred a great boon on the great mass of agriculturists in Canada.

I am sorry to say that I do not see either of these hon. gentlemen here. I do not see the hon. gentleman who made that statement here. The hon. Minister of Agricultural (Mr. Fisher), so far, has not been let loose, but the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), was unchained, he is loose now, he made a statement, and if he did not convince his own friends, I want to ask the farmers of this country what they think of an intelligent man in this House giving the reason that the hon. gentleman gave for the admission of corn free of duty. He said that if we did not meet this corn in this country we must meet it in Great Britain. Whoever heard of a defence of that kind put up? Who ever heard of an hon. gentleman declaring that we must admit the grain of a foreign country, the products of the farms of a country that pays no taxes in this country and has no interest in our affairs because we have to meet them upon fighting grounds in a foreign country? Could anything be more absurd? There was another proposition the hon. gentleman made. It was that if it did not lower the price of coarse grains in the United States how could it lower the price of coarse grains in Canada. I do not think we are at all concerned as to the view that the people of the United States may take in regard to its lowering the price of coarse grains in their own country. It is not a question of lowering the price of coarse grains in the country in which it is produced, but of lowering the price of coarse grains in the country into which it is imported, and the people of the United States will take good care that Canadian corn will not be in a position to lower the price of coarse grains in that country. But, we are told that Indian corn is brought in to serve the great mass of armers, and it is said to be a great boon, and why? Because it is a grain that is cheaper than our own grain. We bring it in to feed stock for export. If we had nothing to feed stock with in this country there might be some reason and argument in that contention. But, when we are exporting from this country, barley, buckwheat, oats, pease and rye that should be fed to our own stock in this country which is displaced, and when we are forced to send it to a foreign country, instead of bringing in Indian corn let us feed the 14,000,000 bushels of our own grain to our own stock, and let us export our own stock. Could there be a more false position taken than to argue that we should admit foreign grain to displace our own grain? The fact is that the farmer who feeds Yankee corn has to send his wheat, oats and barley to Great Britain not to where he will get the highest price because the local price is always higher than the export price. I appeal to my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell) to deny the statement if he is not compelled as a rule, year after year, to pay a higher price for wheat for milling purposes than is paid as the export price. I challenge my hon. friend to deny that statement.

Mr. CLANCY.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What statement?

Mr. CLANCY. The statement that as a rule the export price for grain is lower than the price paid for grain for milling purposes in Canada.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is the reason we export then?

Mr. CLANCY. Simply because we have more than we want; and when the wants of the hon. gentleman and others in the trade are satisfied, we export the balance. It is a fact that we sell oats, pease, barley and all other grains for a less price in England than we can sell them for at home.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have been getting more for the flour I export than I get at home.

Mr. CLANCY. That may be, but I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell), told us a rather funny story to the effect that since Sir Wilfrid Laurier had given the English people a preference for nothing, the English people were begging for his flour. The hon. gentleman said he had a letter to that effect, but he never read it, and it occurred to me that sometimes people write letters to themselves. The fact remains that the Canadian producer sells his grain of all kinds at a lower price for export than he would get for it at home. If the argument of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) has anything in it, it is that they want Yankee corn to feed their cattle, and they do not use the grain grown in Canada, and so our farmers have to take whatever price they can get for it. According to the logic of gentlemen opposite the object of lowering the duty on an article is to lower the price. Then if that be so, when corn was admitted free, the price of Canadian grain was lower. There never was a more unwise policy, and one less in the best interests of the farming community, than to allow corn in free. True there may be a few benefited by it who are engaged in what might be called manufacturing, and the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) is one of these. They buy cattle when they are cheap, but they do not buy Canadian grain to feed them. No, they buy Yankee corn to the exclusion of Canadian grown grain. I challenge the fact that there is not more than one farmer in fifty who buys American corn, and if only one farmer in fifty uses American corn for feeding purposes, then the admission of corn free of duty simply benefits one farmer to the detriment of the other forty-nine. There never was a greater blunder than this policy of the government corn, in view of the fact that we have to send our own grain products out of the country to find a market for them in foreign lands. Common sense and experience show the folly of the government in this. I see the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMillan) is now in his place, and I will point out to him the fallacy of his argument about free corn. The principal argument in its favour advanced by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMillan) was that we would have to meet that corn in Great Britain any way, and we might as well meet it at home. Does the hon. gentleman adhere to that statement yet? Has he the hardihood to hold himself up as an exponent of the farmers of this country and to use such an argument as that. I leave that argument of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMillan), to the intelligent people of this country to pronounce upon it. The hon.

gentleman told us also that we imported something like seven million bushels of corn, and that if we sold pease to the same extent, we would make $1,000,000 profit. But the hon. gentleman did not know, or he did not take the trouble to inform himself, that we do not export much more than one-third of that quantity of pease, and so the argument of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMillan) and his $1,000,000 profit disappear at the same time. I say, Sir, that it was a stupid policy of this government to admit American corn free of duty into this country.

The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) stated that the farmers of this country were prosperous, because since the Liberal party came into power they sold their products at a higher price than before, and bought their goods cheaper. I do not think that any well informed man who has any reputation at stake will seriously assert that the farmers buy their goods cheaper now than they did before. I deny that there has been a general period of prosperity so far as it affects the farmers of Canada. We have had without doubt a wonderful expansion, but we have had no corresponding period of prosperity amongst the farmers. There may be great expansion of trade in a country, but it does not always follow that there is going to be corresponding advantages to every class in the community. Let us see how far the statement of the Minister of Customs is borne out by the facts. I will take the export prices of the principal articles which the farmers have to sell. I will take these prices for the last three years which the Liberals have been in power, and compare them with the average prices for the eighteen years previously when the Conservatives were in power. Here is the result:

AVERAGE EXPORT PRICES.

	3 years, 1897-9.	3 years, 1894-6.	10 years, 1887-96.	18 years, 1879-96.
Horses	$90 71	$98 00	$112 90	$112 74
Cattle	41 84	73 08	68 45	62 51
Swine	5 48	7 63	6 06	5 35
Sheep	3 54	4 21	3 89	3 90
Butter	0 18.1	0 18.9	0 18.1	0 18.3
Cheese	0 08.8	0 09.4	0 09.7	0 09.9
Eggs	0 12.7	0 12.8	0 13.7	0 14
Bacon	0 08.9	0 09.2	0 09.1	0 08.8
Beef	0 05.7	0 06.4	0 05.7	0 05.9
Hams	0 08.8	0 09.8	0 09.8	0 09.4
Pork	0 03.1	0 05.3	0 06.1	0 06.3
Wool	0 17	0 20	0 21	0 22
Bran	0 68	0 75	0 77	0 75
Barley	0 38	0 41	0 51	0 60
Beans	0 75	1 14	1 31	1 29
Oats	0 29	0 34	0 36	0 32
Pease	0 60	0 74	0 72	0 76
Wheat	0 79	0 61	0 77	0 89
Rye	0 52	0 55	0 61	0 65
Flour	3 98	3 85	4 36	4 64
Apples, green..	2 30	2 51	2 38	2 42
Hay	8 34	8 78	9 28	9 26

Mr. CAMPBELL. Where are these prices?

Mr. CLANCY. They are for all Canada, not for any local market. The only way to arrive at a fair conclusion is to take the average export prices, which I am doing. I have not entered into the trick of selecting a place where the prices might be low or high at the moment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Where do you take the export prices from?

Mr. CLANCY. My hon friend will get them in the Trade and Navigation Report. These are the average prices that the farmers of Canada receive for all these classes of goods exported to foreign countries.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Beans are $1.50 a bushel now.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman and his friends are on trial not for a month or two, but for the last three years, during which they declare the farmers have been better off and have been getting better prices; and I am able to point out that with the exception of wheat and flour, and that only for one year, for the three years preceding the advent of hon. gentlemen to power the farmers got better prices for every article except two, while for the whole eighteen years of Conservative rule, during which the farmers were said to be ground down under a vicious fiscal policy, they got a higher price for every article on the list than they have got during the last three years.

Mr. CAMPBELL. How do you account for the general prosperity among the farmers?

Mr. CLANCY. I will account for it first by saying that the hon. gentleman and his friends had nothing to do with it. There was an expansion in the country which the Liberal party and leaders, with all their evil genius, could not prevent—an expansion which marks the world from one end to the other. The hon. gentleman could not locate it in Canada alone, but he repeated what was said by every hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, that the Liberal party do not claim it all, but they claim a large share of it. I will ask the hon. gentleman to tell me what part of it they bore a share in, and I will sit down to let him tell me. The only part they contributed to was where they betrayed their promises to the people. Where they declared they would carry out a certain policy and did not—that is their contribution to the prosperity of this country. It is not what hon. gentlemen opposite did, but what they did not dare do, that accounts for the prosperity of this country. Let me call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the prices that are ruling under the regime of these hon. gentlemen, and I will prove to you beyond doubt that the years of low prices for the farmers are those in which the Liberal party have held office.

Mr. CLANCY.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is the time prosperity seems to have reigned supreme.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend declares that prosperity reigns supreme when the prices are low. That is his idea of prosperity. No doubt when the farmer tells him that he has got less for his barley, the hon. gentleman will reply: Yes, but this is a year of great prosperity. If the farmer replies, I am getting less for my pease than before, the hon. gentleman will retort: That makes no difference, this is a prosperous year. He will declare, with all the energy and zeal of a man who believes he is right, that when the farmer is getting less for what he sells and paying more for what he buys, he is still more prosperous than ever he was before. I am prepared to prove that the regime of the Liberal party is the worst that the farmer has ever seen, as regards prices compared with the eighteen years in which the Conservatives were in power. That is a broad statement to make, but it is backed by the facts. The lowest prices paid for horses in eighteen years were paid in 1899. The lowest prices for cattle were paid in 1899, and for sheep in 1897.

Mr. COWAN. Do you think that to compare the prices of 1899 with the prices of cattle prior to 1896 is a fair comparison?

Mr. CLANCY. Why not? My hon. friend suggests that that is not a fair argument. I am very sorry that the hon. Minister whom my hon. friend worships, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), is not here, because that hon. minister could repeat to my hon. friend his boast that by his policy, in a few weeks after he acquired office, he removed the quarantine, and all our calves went over to the other side, and we got very little for them, and that was a great boon to the farmers of this country. But my hon. friend declares it is not fair to make an argument of that kind. The lowest year for beef was in 1897, and for pork in 1899. The lowest year for wool in eighteen years, was in 1899, and for barley in 1897. The following were the lowest years out of eighteen in prices for the following articles:

Beans, 1898.
Oats, 1897.
Pease, 1898.
Rye, 1897.
Flour, 1897.
Apples, 1897.
Hay, 1899.

I think I have made it perfectly clear that in the last eighteen or twenty years, there were none in which the prices of farm products were so low as during those in which hon. gentlemen opposite have held office.

What, then, are the facts as regards the prices which our farmers have to pay for what they consume? It would be interesting to learn whether there have been any counterbalancing influences to compensate our farmers for the lower prices they got for their products. I would begin with horse rakes, which were selling at $23 in 1896, and cost $24 now. Ploughs cost $14 in 1896, and $16 now. I am now speaking in the presence of a manufacturer (Mr. Frost), and am about to give the prices of the goods he makes.

Mr. FROST. You have made a mistake in your prices of ploughs.

Mr. CLANCY. No, I have not. The prices I have given are authentic, and not on hearsay. They are as authentic as if I had gone to the hon. gentleman's shop, and got them from himself. Bob-sleighs, which sold for $25 in 1896, cannot be had under $27 now. Harrows were sold at $22 in 1896, and are selling as $25 now. Farm carts $35 in 1896 and $38 now. Farm wagons $45 in 1896, $50 now. Mowers, $45 in 1896, $50 now. I wonder if my hon. friend will correct me in that. Cultivators, $28 in 1896, $36 now. Seed drills $60 in 1896, and $65 now. Binders, of which the hon. gentleman is a large manufacturer, were selling for $110 in 1896, on the best terms, that is when payment was made in October, and they cannot be had under $120 now.

During the campaign in 1896, the hon. gentleman made a speech in which he declared that the lowering of the duties on iron would have the effect of giving the farmer just as good implements and at cheaper rates. What has become of that pledge? I challenge my hon. friend to cite a single case in which he can say that the statement I have made is not absolutely correct. He knows perfectly well that binders have advanced $10 in price, and he knows that his party had pledged themselves to make them cheaper. That is the way by which these hon. gentlemen have enriched the farmers. For every article the farmer has to sell since these hon. gentlemen came into power, he is getting less than he did at any time in the preceding twenty years, and on the other hand, he is paying more for every article he has to buy. Even post-hole diggers, one of the list they selected for reduction are higher than they were before under the general tariff, and they do not come in to any extent under the preferential tariff. There is not an article, from a pound of nails to the harvest implement, to which 10 per cent, and in some cases more than 20 per cent has not been added to the price since these hon. gentlemen's advent to office. That means that the purchasing power of the dollar of every farmer and labourer has been reduced to 75 cents. When the farmer sells his products at lower prices than he did before, he has to add to the loss the discount that must come afterwards in the purchasing power of every dollar he received. Instead of this being a period of prosperity for the farmers, there never was a period when they were less prosperous, notwithstanding the fact that there has been a great expansion in trade throughout the country. I am sorry that I have to make some remarks with regard to pledges made by some hon. gentlemen opposite who are not present. I would shrink from talking in this House about a man's private business. My hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) smiles at that, but I mean what I say. I do not think it generous to open such discussions. But when an hon. gentleman invites it by his public speeches, when he makes certain declarations upon such a subject and then fails to live up to them when he becomes a minister, he invites a discussion of these matters. The Minister of Customs in a speech he made a few days ago, declared that the Liberal party had made certain pledges, that they had laid down their platform in 1893 and were bound to carry out these pledges. Now, here is what the hon. gentleman said in Harriston, according to the Globe of the 14th of February, 1896 :

I do not say and I do not claim that in all cases the amount of the duty is added to the article by the manufacturer who manufactures that article in the country, but it would be more than folly for any man to say that under a system of protection the man who purchases home-made goods does not pay more than he would have to pay if there was free competition. What is protection put on for? It seems to me that it is a waste of time to talk about it in any other respect than that.

Again, speaking at Massey Hall, Toronto, the hon. gentleman said, according to the Globe of the 6th of February, 1895 :

What I want you to consider when you go home is whether the law passed by the Tory government and placed on the statute-book that made Paterson rich, has made you not rich, or some of you even poorer than you were before. Whether this is a just law or not, and one that should be continued.

And he made the case still stronger when he spoke at Brantford, according to the Globe of the 23rd of March, 1895 :

Had the national policy acted fairly and justly upon all classes and upon all kinds of manufacturer? If it had not, then it had been an unjust law. If it had not imposed equally upon all alike, Dr. Montague had said that the national policy had made him (Mr. Paterson) rich. Was it a matter of reproach for him to try and do away with the policy that had made him rich at the cost of the great mass of the people of Canada.

That was not a reproach, but the reproach comes when the hon. gentleman takes his position as a minister and continues a tariff which, according to his own statement, has made him rich while injuring others. Now, I will turn to the articles that the hon. gentleman got rich on. Confectionery, under the national policy that, according to the hon. gentleman, made everybody poorer, and Paterson rich, was, in 1896, 35 per cent, or $\frac{1}{2}$ cent a pound. How much was it altered when the hon. gentleman became a minister? None at all. On biscuits, sweetened, the tariff in 1896 was 27½ per cent. Was that altered? No. Biscuits, unsweetened, were dutiable at 25 per cent in 1896. Was that altered? No. Jams and jellies, 3½ cents a pound, equal to about 35½ per cent. Was that altered? No. All the duties that made Paterson rich, and to which he referred in his speech, remained just the same. He asked if he were open to reproach when he proposed to remove a policy that had made everybody poorer, but had made him rich. No; he was not deserving reproach in that. But he is deserving of all the reproach that an indignant electorate can impose for not reducing duties that made him rich after having denounced them throughout the length and breadth of Canada. If he was robbing the people before, he is robbing them still.

I intend to deal very shortly, with another subject, that is the subject of a preference. I believe with one hon. gentleman who has spoken on this subject, that we should remove this matter as far as possible from sentiment. The question is sufficiently important to be dealt with on its merits. If the preference given by hon. gentlemen opposite has any merits, the people of Canada can well afford to acknowledge them and to give the government credit, but if it is not in the interest of the country, the government must expect to receive the criticisms they deserve. I shall endeavour to show in a few minutes that the policy was the most mistaken of any ever adopted in Canada. The first reason is, because hon. gentlemen opposite entered upon what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) called a flank movement. They entered on a different policy in 1898 from that which they had previously proposed. The Prime Minister had made a pledge to the people of Canada when he spoke in the city of London, in 1896. Dealing with the question of preferential trade, he declared that it was of paramount importance and, not only that, but attempted to show that the only chance the people had of getting it was to place his party in power. He went further and discussed the grounds on which we would expect to negotiate a policy of that kind. He said that England would not expect a system of free trade to be adopted, but that a revenue tariff would be made the ground of negotiation. He then pointed out the great advantage that would accrue from that. But when these hon. gentlemen came into power, the first thing they attempted to frame was the tariff of 1897, having two features, one a special tariff, and the other a reciprocal tariff. I wish to point out that to have taken that course made a preference with England absolutely impossible. How was it possible to have a preference with England when you proposed a reciprocal tariff with every country in the world? I say to hon. gentlemen opposite, and to ministers in particular, that when they adopted the reciprocal tariff in 1897, they abandoned every notion of a preferential tariff with Great Britain. By the mere adoption of it, they precluded the possibility of a preferential tariff. England, it is true, came in, but on the same terms that every country in the world came in; therefore, it was to be a reciprocal tariff with the whole world, and no preference to England. There was no idea of negotiating for advantages to Canada by differential duties upon the products of other countries; that was laid aside by the very principle involved in a reciprocal tariff.

Mr. CLANCY.

Now, what followed? When the hon. gentlemen passed that tariff, attention was called in this House by the leader of the opposition to the fact that a tariff of that kind conflicted with the Belgian and German treaties. It was denied by the hon. gentlemen. Even the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), made a very able speech, as he always does, declaring that it did not interfere with those treaties. The hon. gentleman will not deny that; he declared explicitly that the tariff would escape those treaties. The hon. gentleman went to England to argue it before the law officers of the Crown, still maintaining, not a preferential policy, but a reciprocal policy, for the whole country. The object of the hon. gentleman, therefore, was to uphold a policy, not of a preference, but of reciprocity, with the whole world. Well, I believe they did the hon. gentleman the courtesy to listen to his argument, but they gave judgment long before they heard the argument. They told the hon. gentleman that two courses were open to him and to the government: Either to go back to Canada and repeal the whole reciprocal tariff, or to give England the whole preference as a condition of denouncing the treaty. I challenge the hon. gentleman to say that that was not the prime object, I challenge him to say that England would ever have denounced those treaties, if this government had not formally handed over the special preference to Great Britain and received nothing in return.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). There was never any such suggestion, never the faintest hint.

Mr. CLANCY. Well, I tell my hon. friend that it does not inure much to the credit of the astute gentlemen who were in charge of affairs there, and who wanted to get the treaty denounced. Without a suggestion from Great Britain as my hon. friend says, and of their own free will, they had the treaties denounced without a preference in return. According to what the hon. gentleman says he offered, as a condition of England, denouncing those treaties, to give a preference in Canada without asking for anything. Why, it is worse than I was disposed to put it. So they had the alternative of coming home and meeting the people, and declaring they had framed a policy that must be repealed, or on the other hand, they must give an exclusive preference to England, without anything in return. I say the people will deal with those gentlemen later.

But there was a change of front, the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House entered upon a new policy, and that policy was to declare that we were not entitled to ask for anything. Let us see what hon. gentlemen have said on that side of the House with regard to this question. The hon. the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), is rather a cautious man. He is very careful of what he says. If he could keep a string on his friends, perhaps he would have less difficulty. Well, this is what the hon. gentleman said in his last speech :

The Conservatives insist that England must first give us a quid pro quo. Well, Sir, I am not one of those who will go so far as to say that England will never impose a preferential tariff for the advantage of her colonies. I have said before, and I will repeat it now, that while that is not a very likely thing to happen, it is within the bounds of possibility, even of probability.

Now, we will take the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He says :

Canada has nothing to offer England in exchange, and it is impudent to ask for a preference. . . . We have not earned a preference, and it would be to cripple England to get it. . . . It is not in our interest to get a preference.

The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd), has gone so far even, as to warn the people in England. He was not content to warn the taxpayers, but he waved the flag in distress to the 1,100,000 paupers in that country. The hon. gentleman says, that 'a preference is not in the interests of Canada,' 'it would be disastrous to both countries;' 'none but madmen would think of a preference.' The hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Bell), declares that 'Canada should be ashamed to ask for a preference;' that 'it is neither in the interests of Great Britain, nor of Canada, that we should have a preference such as the Conservatives propose.' The hon. member for North Norfolk declares that it is disloyal. Then the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Burnett), whom I do not see here to-night, made the utterance of a statesman. I commend it to the intelligent electors of his riding, and if they take kindly to it, I think they do not deserve very much sympathy from intelligent people. This is what he says :

Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about a superabundance of loyalty, while on the other hand they are glorifying themselves because they think they now have an opportunity to take advantage of Great Britain's troubles in the Transvaal to get better terms; in other words, they think that, by reason of the war she is engaged in, we can get out of Great Britain what we could not otherwise get, and can make our own terms. What do you think, Mr. Speaker, of an hon. gentleman, who declares that when England's hands are tied, we can get certain terms that we could not get otherwise? But what does the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), say :

Nobody ever questioned the desirability of such an arrangement if it could be obtained. To use the strong language of the right hon. gentleman who leads the government, a Canadian who would refuse such a proposition would be an idiot.

Now, Sir, we have the Minister of Finance declaring that he has never gone so far as to say it was not possible, or even probable; and we have nearly every hon. gentleman opposite declaring that it is nothing short of insanity, that it would ruin Great Britain and ruin Canada to have a preference. I am going to ask the hon. gentleman, if the possibility ever arises, what the people of Canada have to look forward to now. Hon. gentlemen opposite, one after another, have risen in this House and have declared that such a policy is against both Great Britain and Canada. There is not a single argument that can be used by the most sturdy opponent, in England, or in any other country, that hon. gentlemen opposite have not used against Canada. I would ask if any person can ever hope, under the leadership of the Liberal party, with these declarations on record, for better trade relations with Great Britain. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely impossible, when we see hon. gentlemen in this House declaring in the most explicit terms that it would be madness itself to enter upon a policy of that kind, and then to tell us, as the hon. Minister of Finance has told us, that he has never said that it could never be had. He was very cautious. He says that it does not appear likely now, but, if it does not appear likely now, it is due to the attitude of the Liberal party, because hon. gentlemen opposite have done everything in their power to prevent the likelihood of it. It is because there is no effort could be more effective than the position which hon. gentlemen have taken to belittle Canada in every sense, or to put her in the light that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) seeks to put her in, when he declares that Canada has nothing to offer, that Canada's trade is only about 5 per cent of the total trade of Great Britain. Yet, we are told that as a result of this policy the heart of the English people has been touched. We are told that they buy our products more readily, and that if we have not a legal market, we have, in fact, a substantial market. I have always thought, and I am not going to change my opinion about that, that when Canadians sold their goods in Great Britain, or elsewhere, it was because they produced a first-class article, and because they were ready to go in and compete for that market, and if ever they abandon a position of that kind their market will go. There is nothing that will so belittle the Canadian people as the position hon. gentlemen have taken in declaring that the sympathy of the English people has been such as to find a market for the people of Canada when in fact this was the result of their own enterprise, energy and skill, and of that element which is seldom found in any country, and which is especially found in the people of Canada, their adaptability to conditions, and their readiness to take advantage of the opportunities that present themselves. To belittle them in the sense in which they have been belittled does not become any party in this country, especially when the statements that they make are unfounded in fact and unfounded in experience. The hon. Minister of Customs made a speech as to the effect of this policy, and I hope the House will bear with me while I read a portion of it, because it is a very important utterance, as are the utterances of every minister in this House. It has a special weight and a special significance. I, therefore, with the permission of the House, will read what the hon. Minister of Customs had to say of the preference that was so willingly granted, the preference for which we got nothing in return. He is showing the advantages that will arise from it, on grounds of sentiment and in his speech he says :

And what has been the result? Why, Sir, I venture to say that nothing has ever transpired in the history of Canada that has touched the English heart so much as this resolution, which is denounced by the hon. gentleman. . . . But I venture to say that by this act the heart of the English people has been touched, their sympathy has been enlisted, and I make bold to say that to-day any statesman from Canada—

Any statesman from Canada, mark you, Mr. Speaker.

—going over there would be able to reach the ready ear of the Englishman with the arguments that can be advanced on our side of any question and that they might yield concessions to this country in matters of trade because of the effect which has been produced by this resolution. Who can say if the Minister of Agriculture were to go over there and speak to the statesmen of that country with reference to the legislation placing an embargo upon Canadian cattle he would not be in a stronger position, that he would not be more readily listened to than he would have been before this resolution was introduced?

Well, now, this statesman is not in his place to-night to answer for the speech and the pledge of the hon. Minister of Customs, and I would like to ask that statesman, and to ask hon. gentlemen opposite, how far that touching resolution that has reached the English heart has inured to the benefit of the people of Canada? Has that statesman gone over and demanded as a quid pro quo—not as a quid pro quo, but as the justice due to Canada, and which has never been given—the removal of the embargo? The people of England declare that they have no protection, but they found a system of the strongest protection that one could possibly think of inventing under the pretense that Canadian herds were diseased, and that, therefore, they would not let them in. They were forced, as the hon. leader of the opposition stated more than once in the House, and as the hon. Minister of Agriculture was forced to admit himself, that there was no disease in Canadian herds. What was the position that was taken? Notwithstanding that it was put beyond the possibility of doubt that Canadian herds were not diseased, that they might have been permitted to be brought into England with safety, they still kept up their embargo, notwithstanding that the Scotch farmers were urging that they should be allowed in. They would not let Canadian cattle come into England, not because they were diseased, but simply because it was impossible to get the farmers of Great Britain to allow them to come in, and this was the means of keeping them out. What has the hon. Minister of Agriculture done in reference to the English heart being touched? Has he gone over and asked for the removal of this restriction? Is there any member of the government who is prepared to answer that? Perhaps I may ask the hon. Minister of Finance, who is always ready to answer reasonable questions, and I think this is a reasonable question. I am going to ask the hon. Minister of Finance if any effort has ever been made, since the passing of that resolution, since the introduction of the tariff giving the preference entirely to Great Britain, to get the embargo removed from Canadian cattle. Can my hon. friend inform me?

Mr. CLANCY.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I hope my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) is not asking for an answer. Dozens of times this evening he has put his arguments into the form of a question and asked for an answer when I did not think it was expected. I would prefer that he would ask the question when the hon. Minister of Agriculture is in his place.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. Minister of Agriculture is never here.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, more frequently than the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has been here.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, I have been here for the last week.

Mr. CLANCY. I can tell my hon. friend that I do not think he is quite fair.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think so.

Mr. CLANCY. Is it possible that upon a question of such great magnitude, a question that affects such a large class of the people, a question that was agitated so much by hon. gentlemen opposite, who charged the Conservative party with a failure to find a solution of it, no proposition was ever made by a member of the government to remove that embargo? The hon. Minister of Finance tells me that I must go to the hon. Minister of Agriculture for an answer to that question. I am willing that the farmers of Canada should accept his answer, and that they should ask the Minister of Agriculture. I can tell the hon. Minister of Agriculture that all the sentiment he has spoken of in this House has counted for nothing. If he made an effort and failed, or if he failed to make an effort to remove the restriction, I tell him that in either case he has sinned and in both cases he has failed. If giving a special preference to England has failed to induce them to extend bare justice to Canada, then hon. gentlemen opposite had better think again, where is our preference in England? What has happened recently? Canadian cattle were allowed twenty days in the English market before being slaughtered, but recently owing to disease being found among Argentine cattle the order has gone forth that Canadian cattle as well as all foreign cattle must be slaughtered five days after arrival in England. Surely this is a suitable time for that statesman to go over to England to try and get the ear of the British government and to have this injustice to Canada stopped. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) seems to know nothing about it; the matter is so unimportant that he has passed it over with a light heart, and he appears to have handed it over to the charge of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. COCHRANE. Tarte is in London.

Mr. CLANCY. Yes, but that is not the kind of business the Minister of Public Works attends to. He is engaged in something more sensational just now. There is just another point, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to refer to. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) and other gentlemen opposite taking the cue from their leaders have repeated over and over again, that as a result of their preference the price of goods coming from England would be reduced; the price of goods coming from foreign countries would be correspondingly reduced to the consumer, and all manufactured goods of the same kind produced in Canada would as a result be reduced in price.

Mr. COCHRANE. A long bow.

Mr. CLANCY. It is a pretty long bow, but it was none too long for gentlemen opposite to draw. On the face of it that statement has a sort of gloss that might make it commendable to the people of the country, but let us see how it works out. The hon. gentleman gave a list of articles that would be affected in this way, among others, cuffs, collars, blueing, soap, Paris green, carpets, jams and jellies, mustard ground, pickles, starch, cotton white or bleached and prints. Now, let us take the prices of these articles. Collars and cuffs sold for 85 cents a dozen when they came from England and 97 cents when they came from the United States. Blueing 9·8 from England and 21·7 from the United States; soap, 5·2 from England, and 4·00 from the United States; Paris green, 11·6 from Great Britain, and 26·6 from the United States; carpets, 64 cents per yard from Great Britain, and 51 cents per yard from the United States; jams and jellies, 7·2 from Great Britain, and 12·8 from the United States; mustard, ground, 21 cents from Great Britain, and 3·2 from the United States; pickles, $1.09 a gallon from Great Britain, and 79 cents from the United States; starch, 5·8 from Great Britain, and 5·3 from the United States; cottons, white or bleached, 7·6 from Great Britain, and 6·5 from the United States; printed cottons, 8·3 cents from Great Britain, and 6·4 cents from the United States. This proves that the argument of the hon. gentleman has no application whatever. It proves that the class of goods coming in were of a different kind, and did not come in contact with each other so far as prices were concerned, and therefore the preferential tariff had no bearing upon them. We were told by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) that the general tariff would have no substantial reductions. I wish to keep that statement before the eye of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). He told us in explicit terms that the general tariff would have no substantial reductions, that if any reductions were to follow, or if there were to be any modifications of the evils of the national policy it was to be all embodied in what is now called the preferential tariff. Let me point out to the Minister of Finance that last year we imported $98,000,000 worth of dutiable goods, and of that, just $26,000,000 or less than 30 per cent came in under the preferential tariff. I point out to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that although the preferential tariff was to correct everything that was wrong in the general tariff, yet as a matter of fact only 30 per cent of the dutiable goods imported into Canada came under the preferential tariff, while more than 70 per cent came under the general tariff which the Finance Minister declared was not altered.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Surely the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) is not quoting me as stating that there were no reductions in the general tariff.

Mr. CLANCY. The minister (Mr. Fielding) stated that there were no substantial reductions in the general tariff.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I said there were scores of reductions in the general tariff and the records will show it.

Mr. CLANCY. I did not intend to read the hon. gentleman's speech, but now that he has raised the question, I will read the statement he made to the House, that there would be no substantial reductions in the general tariff.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman will find he is mistaken. I placed before the House a list of items numbering scores in which the general tariff was reduced.

Mr. WALLACE. And scores of items in which it was increased.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is not the question. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) is also in error there, but that is not the point.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the Minister of Finance state that if he unloads on one class of goods and increases the tariff on another class, that that is a general reduction? I tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) that when he completed the general tariff leaving it entirely to the operation of the preferential tariff he left the general tariff infinitely higher than he found it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The records will show that there were reductions on a great many articles in the general tariff. As to the effect of lowering the duty on one and increasing it on another that is a fair matter for debate, but I said the general tariff was reduced on scores of items, and any argument based on the assertion that the only reductions were to be found in the preferential tariff is certainly a mistake.

Mr. CLANCY. I tell the hon. gentleman that he is on record in the most unmistakable form, because he is always clear in his utterances; and I will read what the hon. gentleman said on that occasion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The tariff speaks for itself.

Mr. CLANCY. But did not the hon. gentleman speak for his party? Are his declarations to be taken for nothing? On that subject the hon. gentleman said:

Now, Mr. Speaker, having thus stated the guiding principles in the matter, I propose to invite your attention to the general tariff, and in doing so I wish to be distinctly understood that, as I have already explained, the duties are considerably higher than we intend they should be as applied to countries which are willing to trade with us. And if, as I read the items, hon. gentlemen think that the rate upon any of them is too high, I beg them to believe that before I close I shall have something to say which will show that in respect of our relations with Great Britain and in respect of our relations with any other country that is willing to meet us on equal terms we shall be prepared to offer a measure of tariff reform of the most substantial character, which is not contained in the tariff which I am now going to read.

Is that plain enough?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend asks a question; does he wish the answer?

Mr. CLANCY.

Mr. CLANCY. I do.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is reading from a speech of mine which I have not at hand, but of the substance of which I have a general recollection. I said that in addition to what reductions there might be in the general tariff, although some of the items in it might be high, the preferential tariff to which I would call attention later on would give a very substantial measure of tariff reform. The hon. gentleman attempted to show that in fact no reductions were made in the general tariff. I did not say that, and if I had said so, it would have been absolutely untrue.

Mr. CLANCY. I am not charging the hon. gentleman with having said that there were absolutely no reductions. What I am pointing out is that the hon. gentleman went into a system of changes, and that the whole tariff when he left it was higher than when he took it up. I do not say that there was no reduction in anything; but I say that if there was a reduction in one quarter, there was an increase in another, and the tariff was higher as he left it than it was before. Later on the hon. gentleman said:

But with the exception of those articles to which I shall refer as I proceed I have to tell the House that it is not the intention of the government, speaking of the question generally, and not with reference to any particular article, to propose any great reduction in the tariff as applied to those countries which are not disposed to trade with us.

What did that mean? That meant that 70 per cent of the goods coming into Canada were not to be the subject of any reduction, because there was to be no reduction in the general tariff; but all the reductions were to come through the preferential tariff, which does not apply to the 70 per cent mentioned. Therefore, I say that 70 per cent of the goods imported into Canada come under a tariff infinitely higher than existed before hon. gentlemen opposite came into power. The hon. gentleman was going to give to the people of Canada the boon of a lower tariff, and he said, If you have objections, I have the remedy later on. Where is the remedy? The question is whether this preferential tariff has been a benefit to Canada? I am persuaded that it is not a benefit, that it has not cured or lessened the evils which the hon. gentleman complained of, but that it has intensified the burdens of the people, especially of the poor, because it makes a straight horizontal cut of the duties on both the luxuries of life and the necessaries of life. Was that the fulfilment of the pledge which the hon. gentleman read to this House before he announced his tariff changes, namely, that the tariff should be so adjusted as to make the necessaries of life free or nearly free, and that luxuries should be taxed? That was the announcement which the hon. gentleman made; but this tariff makes a horizontal cut on the luxuries of life as well as the necessaries, and the poor man has to pay for them. The hon. Minister of Customs and one or two others have attempted to meet that, by declaring that the necessaries of life compared with the luxuries were after all not so disproportionate. The hon. gentleman wishes me to draw the line between the necessaries of life and the luxuries. I decline to discuss that question. All I point out is that both luxuries and necessaries are treated alike, and I leave hon. gentlemen opposite to explain to the people what are luxuries and what are not. I say this is one of the vices of the present tariff. The other is that since we have a cut of 33½ per cent we shall have between two and three million dollars less revenue, which the people of this country will have to put their hands into their pockets to make up. Under our system we cannot unload at one point without putting on at another. Just as in the case of corn, the farmers of this country have to put their hands in their pockets and make up for the loss of revenue on corn that is admitted free, so to the extent to which we give other countries concessions without obtaining compensating advantages, to that extent we tax our own people, because we must make the two sides of the ledger balance. But when that is said, what compensation have we now? The compensation which the Conservative party ask is a reasonable one. If we give to the people of England an advantage to the extent of $2,000,000 or $3,000,000, we must eventually tax our people to that extent, and we are quite willing to do that on receiving equivalent advantages in the British markets. The hon. Minister of Finance declared that we were now in the high tide of prosperity and that this was a time above all others, particularly favourable to the Liberal party, but that some day the pendulum was sure to swing the other way. Take the year 1895, when there was the lowest taxation per head by the way of customs tariff, and the lowest revenue we have had in Canada for years, and the lowest expenditure, what followed? Why, we had a deficit that year of something like $4,000,000. Well, Mr. Speaker, what would be the case now if the pendulum were to swing the other way? It would follow that by reason of the preference we have given to England or to any other country, the $3,000,000 thus taken from our revenue would have to be added to our ordinary deficit. There are just two ways of overcoming a deficit. There is one which the government cannot control, and that is the expansion of trade, in which case our revenue is increased by the fact that we are importing and consuming more goods, which is after all one of the means by which our taxation is increased. But, if, instead of expansion we have a diminution of trade, as we will have when the pendulum swings the other way, then we will have to make up for our reduced revenue by additional taxation, and what we propose is that in the general tariff; but all the reductions Great Britain should, in return for the concessions we give her, give us an advantage in their markets which would compensate for the increased taxation, to meet any reduction of revenue caused by diminution of trade. We are not proposing to ask for any favours, but only that we should be given something in return for what we grant, and we ask this because, whatever we do concede must necessarily come out of the pockets of our people. But hon. gentlemen opposite say that England will never make us any concession, because any concession she would make to us would have to come out of the pockets of her own people by an increase of the costs of their breadstuffs. But how does that square with the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite who declare that American goods coming into this country must be lowered in price in order to compete with English goods which are coming in under the special preference we give to England. These hon. gentlemen declare that the Americans will have to take less. But would not the same argument apply to American goods exported to England, should England give us a preference? Would it not follow that the prices of these goods for the use of the English consumer would have to be lowered in order to meet the competition which our goods could offer under the more favourable tariff to us or under the higher rate imposed by England on their American imports as compared with ours. I contend that the English consumer would not, if such preference were given to us, pay a farthing more for the goods that he would bring in from the United States, because the Americans would have to lower their prices to meet our level. Otherwise the argument of hon. gentlemen has, as applied to American goods coming into this country, no foundation whatever. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), has told us that the danger to England to-day is that she is threatened with the commercial hostility of every other country in the world, and that she would intensify that hostility by imposing a tariff against them in our favour, and only the hostility, because they know they would have to compete with Canadian products that come in on better terms. But if their tariff were thus raised, these countries would still have to sell to Great Britain, and would have to take less in the English market for the goods they send there, and the English consumer would, therefore, not pay a cent more for them. Nothing could be further from the mark than to say that it is against the interests of England to give concessions to her colonies. But these hon. gentlemen are so solicitous lest the hostility of foreign countries should be increased, that they are willing that we should give a preference to England without getting anything in return. Then not only does the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite not prove of any advantage to Canada, but it also prevents their ever obtaining any reciprocity with the United States, which at one time they were so anxious to obtain. The fact that they have given a preference to England, at first of one-eighth, and then of one-quarter, and now of one-third of the duties imposed on the goods of foreign countries will effectually prevent any chance of their obtaining reciprocity with our neighbours to the south.

These hon. gentlemen have violated the pledge they made to the people of Canada in the speech of the Prime Minister at London, England. Their tariff, as applied to the whole world, was a failure, and then when they came down with their subsequent tariff, giving a preference to England, that preference did not touch a fringe of the evils of taxation which they said were oppressing the people of Canada. In fact there is not one redeeming feature in their tariff, and its only effect is to delay, so long as it continues in force, what would have taken place long ago, if these hon. gentlemen have followed out the course we advocated. It has the effect of delaying a preference which the mother country would otherwise inevitably give us.

I do not propose to detain the House longer. I say that Canada's interests are inseparably linked with those of the mother country, but Canada has also a destiny in the future of her own. While she has no interests hostile to those of Great Britain she has still conditions of her own which must not be lost sight of. We must have a fiscal policy of our own which must not be hampered by any restrictive conditions, and the greatest gift we can give Canada and at the same time bestow upon Great Britain, in the interests of the enlargement of the British Empire, is to make Canada great and prosperous.

Mr. M. K. COWAN (Essex). At this hour, Mr. Speaker, and at this stage of the debate, it is not my intention for one moment to follow the various arguments which have been advanced by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), who has just spoken. But there are one or two statements he made, to which I propose devoting some small attention before branching into the two points on which I purpose dwelling before I resume my seat. The hon. member for Bothwell laboured for one solid hour to show—and apparently he argued it satisfactorily to his own mind—that farm produce in Canada to-day was cheaper than it was prior to 1896. He then went on to show that the articles which the farmer had to buy were dearer to-day than they were prior to 1896, and then he made the startling admission that the farmer was prosperous to-day, and that the whole country was prosperous.

Mr. CLANCY. I tell my hon. friend (Mr. Cowan) that I made the very opposite statement.

Mr. CLANCY.

Mr. COWAN. The hon. gentleman's words are not yet cold, and I venture to say that there was not a man who listened to him who will not remember that he quoted the list of cattle, hogs and other articles that are the produce of the farm to show that they were cheaper than they were prior to 1896. I rose in my place and asked him if he thought it was fair to compare the prices of cattle in 1899 with the prices prior to 1896, and he said it was. In reply to an hon. member on this side, I think the hon. gentleman from Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost), as to the prices of certain agricultural implements the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) went on to show that the articles which the farmer had to buy had increased in price as compared with 1896, and he wound up with the startling admission that this country was in a state of prosperity. The whole result of the hon. gentleman's argument was what the farmer had to sell was cheaper, and what he had to buy was dearer, and then—and I see that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) nods in assent—he declared that the country was prosperous. If he has argued that satisfactorily to his own mind, he is very far from having argued it to the satisfaction of any other hon. gentleman who heard it. Fortunately, we do not have to take the statement of the hon. gentleman in that regard. I listened, and listened with interest, to the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), and if the hon. member for Bothwell will turn to Hansard of March 27, page 2699, he will find that the hon. member for York makes this statement:

Suppose we apply that rule to 1895, and then compare with 1899. In 1899 the prices were 17 per cent higher, according to the index, than in 1895, so that if you would make a fair comparison, you would have to add 17 per cent to the trade figures of 1895, which would give an addition of $34,700,000.

There is the admission of the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). If the hon. member for Bothwell had figured it out, he would have found that in animals and their products alone, the farmer in 1899 received $1,173,000 more than they would have received for the same sales in 1895. And yet, at this stage of the debate, an hon. gentleman occupying the position that the hon. member for Bothwell occupies or pretends to occupy in this House, makes such a statement as that to which we have just listened. Living near a border county, the hon. gentleman knows—no one knows better—that there never was a more unfair comparison attempted than that which he attempted in the prices of cattle in 1899 and 1896. The hon. gentleman was careful to take the export price. The hon. gentleman knows that in 1899 we exported from Canada, cattle that we could not have exported in 1896 at all.

Mr. CLANCY. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan) permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan) will remember that I stated that for the three years 1894, 1895 and 1896, prices were, on the average, higher than they were for 1897, 1898 and 1899, and the hon. gentleman need not hinge his argument on a single year.

Mr. COWAN. That makes it all the worse for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy), and all the worse for his argument. Every man in this House, and every man, woman and child outside of it, knows that if ever there were hard times in Canada, they were in the years the hon. gentleman first mentioned. And, if the prices were good and still the times were hard, I would like to know where the argument leads the hon. gentleman. In 1899, as the hon. gentleman knows, there were hundreds and hundreds of cattle throughout the western peninsula of Ontario purchased and shipped to the United States that could not possibly have been exported at all in 1896, on account of the quarantine regulations. And I am within the judgment of the House and of every man who raises and sells a bullock in Canada, that the lower grade of cattle are worth $5 per bullock more than they were prior to 1896, by reason of the abolition of the quarantine regulations permitting the Canadian bullock to go to the nearest market, that of the United States. This has not affected animals actually exported to the United States alone, but it means that every bullock slaughtered in Canada is worth $5 more.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan) knows that the average price was only $13, and yet he adds $5.

Mr. COWAN. I say that the average steer that would have sold for $30 in 1899, could have been purchased for less than $25 in 1896.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that the average price was $13, and yet he talks of steers being worth $30.

Mr. COWAN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) poses as a farmer. If he does not raise a steer worth $30 I am sorry for him as an agricultural authority. Now, Mr. Speaker, I did not rise for the purpose of going into a general discussion of the tariff. If there has been anything discussed in this House ad nauseam, it is the British preference and the general tariff. Every hon. gentleman who has spoken on that side has delivered himself of the argument that the exports of Canada to the British market should have a preference in that market. Though those exports represent less than 5 per cent of the import trade of Great Britain, the people of the mother country, it is said, should tax themselves on the 95 per cent from other countries for the benefit of the 5 per cent that comes from Canada. It seems to me that that is an argument that needs no answer. It is an argument no hon. gentleman in this House in his serious moments would dare to make, but for the purpose of attempting to make some political party capital by impressing the people of Canada with the idea that there is a possibility of a British preference. Were it not for this, the time of this House would not be taken up with this discussion. Sir, that brings me to consider a statement that was made by the hon. member for York, the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), as found in Hansard at page 2800 :

These gentlemen allow the alien labour law of Canada to remain a blank on the statute-book, while the alien labour law of the United States is rigidly enforced against every labouring man and woman who enters the United States. We are opposed, as a party, to that kind of preference.

That brings me back, Mr. Speaker, to consider the whole history of alien labour legislation in Canada, and the attitude of the Conservative party with reference to it. I want to find out just what kind of an alien labour preference the ex-Finance Minister and his associates were in favour of. It is well-known to every member of this House that the newspapers at the time were teeming with accounts of those who had been turned back from the American border, during the years from 1887 down to 1896. The records of parliament, and the pages of Hansard show that at different times this matter was brought to the attention of the ex-Minister of Finance, and his colleagues in the government, and we learn from the records the course which they took in reference to alien labour legislation. Now, I find that in 1890, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), introduced an Alien Labour Bill. Sir John Thompson, then leader of the government, on February 27, 1890, said, as recorded in Hansard, at page 1335 :

Two members of his government had interviewed the Secretary-Treasurer of the United States on alien labour.

In 1890, mark you, Mr. Speaker, matters had come to such a pass in Canada, that two members of the Conservative government felt constrained, without anything having been said on the floor of parliament, to interview the United States government, and the answer which they received was, that :

Congress had deliberately adopted legislation of that kind with the view of enforcing a policy which was thought necessary in the interests of the people of the United States.

At page 1238, Sir John Thompson says :

It would be unwise for parliament to pass an Act extending to the whole of Canada such a measure, because these grievances have arisen in certain localities.

So that although in 1890, the matter was brought up in parliament, while from 1887, outrages of the grossest kind had been perpetrated against Canadian citizens, who endeavoured to find employment in the industries of the United States, although the matter had become so pressing that, unasked by parliament, without it having even been mentioned in the House, two members of the government had gone to Washington for the purpose of interviewing the government about it, and after they had been informed that the Washington government had passed that Act for their own protection, and that it would have to apply against Canada, as well as all other countries, the leader of the Conservative government rose and said that he would not support a policy which would apply to the whole of Canada, when the grievances existed only in certain localities. When the member for South Leeds introduced his Bill in 1890, the matter was, for the first time, brought to the attention of the ex-Finance Minister, and a committee was appointed. On April 15, 1890, they recommended :

That negotiations be had with the United States, and unless they ceased enforcing the Alien labour law against Canada, Canada should enact at its next session similar laws against the United States.

You will find exactly what the committee stated upon that point, at page 295, of the Hansard, of 1892 as follows :

Your committee find, on examination, that the Bill is similar in all respects to a Bill passed by the Congress of the United States in 1885 and amended by that body in 1886.

Your committee have had before them witnesses from different points along the frontier, and find from their evidence, a copy of which is hereto annexed, that the American alien labour law has been enforced in such a way as to compel many of our people to relinquish their employment in the United States, or to remove with their families and reside their permanently, while citizens of the United States are permitted to work in Canada every day, and to return to their homes on the American side every night, without interference of the Canadian authorities.

Your committee recommend that the attention of the authorities at Washington be directed to the oppressive application to Canadians of the American alien labour law, and to allow of such representation being made, and to afford time for its due consideration, recommend that the further consideration of this Bill be postponed until next session; and if some suitable measure for granting relief to Canadians from the grievance complained of be not passed in the interval by the American authorities, that your committee recommend that a Bill dealing with this question be introduced next session and taken into consideration.

That report was made on April 15, 1890. I find that on May 5, 1891, Hansard, page 106, the hon. member for South Leeds again introduced his Bill. On May 12, it went to the second reading, and at the request of Sir John Thompson, he withdrew it. I find that on March 3, 1892, for the third time the matter was drawn to the attention of the government, Hansard, page 295. The report of the committee I have just read, was read in the House, and on May 11, page 2457, Sir John Thompson moved the six months' hoist of that Bill, and the ex-Minister of Finance and his colleagues agreed to it. Although the report of that committee had been made two years previously, drawing attention to the necessity of similar legislation in Canada, although during that time, the alien labour law of the United States was being rigorously enforced against Canadian citizens, still we find the Premier moving the six months' hoist of the Bill, and the ex-Minister of Finance agreeing to it. Nothing was done in 1893. For the fourth time, the matter was brought up on June 14, 1894, page 4307, Mr. Lowell, the member for Welland, asked if the government had entered into negotiations with the United States concerning the alien labour law, and Sir John Thompson, the Premier answered No. Although that committee had reported four years previously, although several hundred dollars had been spent in taking evidence upon the point, which evidence had been submitted to parliament, although that committee had recommended that negotiations should be entered into with the United States, still the leader of the Conservative party, and of the government rose in his place, and made the admission that no effort had been made and the report of the committee disregarded. In 1895, Mr. McLennan, the member for Glengarry, introduced a Bill to prevent aliens from becoming interested in public works contracts, as will be found in Hansard for that year, page 2520. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), in support of his Bill, pointed out that a law existed that practically prohibited Canadians from engaging on public works in the United States, and he went one step farther and pointed out that there were many states that passed laws prohibiting the employment of aliens on such works, and that this prohibition even extended down to municipal institutions. The hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) spoke against the Bill. A colleague of the hon. member for Haldimand, who shouted so loud and long in this House about a present grievance existing concerning alien labour, the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) said at page 2538, that he was glad to see foreigners spending their capital here, and on the next page, he used the words that he would be sorry to see this proposal become law. The debate was adjourned and the Bill died. That was act No. 5 in connection with alien labour, and it is the history of hon. gentlemen opposite. On the 24th of April, 1895, the hon. member for South Leeds introduced his Bill. That was brought up for the sixth time. It was apparently seconded by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), because the hon. member for West Assiniboia, although parliament had sat for three solid months after the Bill had been introduced, on the day that parliament prorogued said that he was going to second the Bill if it had come up, but we must press it next year. Then in 1895, on 10th of June, it was brought to the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite for the eighth time. Mr. Lowell, then member for Welland, at page 2405, moved for all petitions, letters, reports, etc., asking for legislation to prevent alien labour being employed in Canada. That was five years after the committee had made its report. Again, for the ninth time, on January 29, 1896, the hon. member for South Leeds, introduced his Bill. It was read the first time. The House sat for four months until April 23, and no more was heard of it. On February 3, of that same year, for the tenth and last time, it was brought to the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) who, asked what negotiations had taken place with the United States concerning the Alien Labour Law and the answer of one of the associates of the hon. ex-Minister of Finance was 'none.' So that, although five long years have elapsed, although hundreds and hundreds of dollars of the public money of Canada had been spent in collecting information, although witnesses had been subpoenaed from the Detroit River on the west to Cape Breton on the east to give evidence before a committee of this House, although that committee, a majority of whom were followers of hon. gentlemen opposite, had recommended that legislation be enacted, it was opposed by the Premier of that day, and by every cabinet minister who sat behind him. The hon. member for Haldimand who spoke so eloquently the other day was as dumb as an oyster and the hon. ex-Minister of Finance was as silent as a clam in his shell while these matters were being brought to their attention in this way, and yet, in this year of grace 1900 they stand up and shout with all the gusto of men who intend to be honest, that is not the kind of preference that we are in favour of. Now, Sir, the hon. ex-Minister of Finance went one step farther. The hon. ex-Minister of Finance said that men and women were being turned back from the United States every day. A statement farther from the facts was never uttered in this House. I defy the hon. member for Bothwell who prompted the hon. member for Haldimand, to put his finger on any man, woman or child that has been turned back either on the Detroit or the St. Clair River from Lambton down to Windsor during the last two years, because that individual had a contract to work in the United States. The hon. ex-Minister of Finance knows that the newspapers were full of the details of the outrages that were committed, that alien labour officers beset every train that crossed the international boundary line, that men and women were held up, that they were quizzed as to their destination, that their private correspondence was even ransacked for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there was anything in it by which they could infer that they were going to the United States under contract. For seven long years that state of affairs existed under the regime of the hon. gentlemen opposite, until practically every labour organization in Canada and the labouring classes in Canada, from one end of the country to the other, clamoured at the door of parliament for redress from the grievances and ills under which they were suffering, and for seven long years these hon. gentlemen sat down and did nothing, silent as men in the grave, as a chicken in its shell, and then, ten years afterwards an hon. gentleman gets up and says: Our policy is not that kind of preference. I would like to ask these hon. gentlemen, I would like to have a statement from the hon. member for Bothwell, who gave misleading information when the hon. member for Haldimand so badly put his foot in the matter a few days ago; what kind of a labour preference are they in favour of. Sir John Thompson said it would be foolish to pass such a law, or, at all events, that it would not be right to pass a law extending to the whole of Canada, because the grievance existed in certain localities. He never carried out that principle, and no man sitting behind him was ever anxious to carry it out or was possessed of sufficient shrewdness to devise means by which a law could be enacted which would apply to particular localities where such a law was enforced against Canada. The labouring classes of Canada were compelled to wait until these hon. gentlemen went out, until they went into political oblivion and their successors took the matter in hand and placed upon the statute-book of Canada a law which rectified their grievances laid down by Sir John Thompson himself. I am free to confess that, in 1896, I was a little doubtful as to what the working out of the Alien Labor law such as was enacted would be. However, I met at the introduction of it with some strong opposition from some gentlemen on this side of the House. I was asked to accept it as it was, to give it a trial, and if it did not work out well, then, we could come back next year and place a law on the statute-book that would. Living, as I do, in the city of Windsor, I am bound to say that where formerly every day's paper chronicled the turning back of a Canadian citizen, from the time that law has gone into force there has not been one single contract labourer turned back. Up to the time that law came into force the hospitals of Duluth and elsewhere in the United States were ransacked for Canadian nurses, and they were told to get out and go back to Canada. Hon. gentlemen are unable to place their finger on a recurrence of the events which existed for the last seven years in which they were in power. So much for the question of alien labour.

There is another matter to which I intend to refer at some little length. I was extremely sorry and extremely surprised to hear come from the lips of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) certain erroneous statements about the tobacco duties. I tell the hon. gentleman, that if he circulates that speech of his throughout the county of Bothwell, and if they take no more stock in the whole speech than they will in his statement about tobacco, then the speech will find a repository in the backyard before they get beyond that one single assertion. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) said that this government had put over \$1,000,000 duty on the poor man's tobacco, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) now nods his head in assent. I had hoped that by this time he would have recanted, and would have been sorry for making a statement which is so absolutely far from the facts. No one knows better than the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy), because he grows tobacco himself, that you can go into the market of the town of Wallaceburg, or the village of Dresden, where he lives, and you can buy for 66 $\frac{2}{3}$ cents to-day the same amount of tobacco that you would have to pay \$1 for before 1897. No one knows better than the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) that Havana cigars and fancy Virginia smoking tobacco have increased in price—that is, cigars costing from eight to twelve cents, or that you buy over the counter at two for a quarter of a dollar. Fancy Virginia smoking tobacco, costing from \$1.50 to \$2 per pound, and cigarettes, have increased in price, I will admit. But, Sir, when it comes down to the tobacco that is consumed by a large number of the members of this House, when it comes down to the tobacco that is consumed by the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbiniere), when it comes down to the tobacco which is consumed by the masses of Canada to-day, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) knows full well that the price of that tobacco has been reduced by 50 per cent. Before I take my seat I shall prove to the satisfaction of the hon. gentleman that such is the case. I do not want to be misunderstood on this point. I say that tobacco manufactured from foreign leaf is dearer to-day than it was prior to the tariff of 1897.

Mr. CLANCY. Hear, hear.

Mr. COWAN. I am glad the hon. member for Bothwell agrees with me in that, and I hope he will go further and agree with me in my next proposition. While fancy foreign tobacco has increased in price, I say that the duties imposed by this government have brought into existence in Canada a tobacco the equal in every way of tobacco which is manufactured from foreign leaf, and to-day you can buy one pound and a half of that tobacco for the same price that you paid for one pound prior to 1897. I shall prove that assertion to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy), so that when he again makes a speech on tobacco he will not fall into the error he has fallen into to-night. Prior to the tariff of 1897, there were twelve plugs to the pound, costing five cents a plug, or sixty cents a pound. You can now buy Canadian tobacco, either smoking or chewing, equal in quality to that for five cents a plug, eight plugs to the pound, or forty cents a pound. You can to-day buy a pound and a half for the same amount of money that you paid for a pound prior to 1897. That means that the quantity of tobacco that cost five cents prior to 1897 can now be bought for three and a half cents, or one and a half cents per plug or fig, cheaper than before the duties were arranged by the Liberal government. I have no desire to give an object lesson in the House, but if any one denies that statement I will refer him to the standard makes of tobacco. I have in my hand—and I will go into the quality later on—'Consols' smoking tobacco, manufactured by Wm. McDonald, of Montreal, probably the best known man in the tobacco trade in Canada. Here is 'Consols' smoking, weight one-fifth of a pound, worth twenty cents a plug at the retail store—and I am dealing with the retailer now, and not with the wholesale man, because after all, it is with the retailer that the workingman deals. We have here five plugs to the pound, at twenty cents a plug, or $1 a pound. I have another sample, one of the best known brands of tobacco manufactured from foreign leaf, 'T. & B.' made by Tuckett & Billings, of Hamilton. The weight of this is one-quarter of a pound, and some retailers sell it for twenty cents, and some for twenty-five cents, so that its cost is from eighty cents to $1 a pound. I now hold in my hand the product of the Empire Tobacco Company, of Granby, Que., a plug made out of tobacco grown in Bothwell, Kent and Essex counties, purchased there and shipped to Granby, Quebec, where it is manufactured. This sells at ten cents a plug, four and a half plugs to the pound, being forty-five cents a pound. Here is McDonald's Consols, $1 per pound, T. & B., eighty cents to $1 a pound, and the Empire Tobacco Company's tobacco, forty-five cents per pound, or 50 per cent cheaper than the foreign article. So much for that line of smoking tobacco. I produce here McDonald's 'Briar,' eight plugs to the pound, retailed in every store at ten cents a plug, and I have here again the Empire Canadian leaf, nine plugs to the pound, worth five cents a plug. One eighty cents a pound, and the other, made by the Empire Company, worth forty-five cents a pound, and yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) stands up in his place in this House and states that the poor man is taxed $1,150,000 a year on his tobacco, and the funny part of it is that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) still nods his head in confirmation of the erroneous assertions he made to the House. I am not through with the hon. gentleman yet. We will now take chewing tobacco. I hold in my hand the 'Prince of Wales,' manufactured by McDonald, sixteen plugs to the pound, at five cents a plug, or eighty cents a pound. I hold here the Empire Tobacco Company's 'Currency,' one-tenth of a pound, costing five cents, or fifty cents per pound. So that, you can buy more than one and one-half pounds for the same price that you pay for a pound of the other. I have here the Empire Tobacco Company's chewing tobacco, ten plugs to the pound, or fifty cents per pound. While McDonald's tobacco cost eighty cents a pound, the Canadian tobacco costs fifty cents a pound, and I ask the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) if the cheaper kind of tobacco I have produced here is not the kind of tobacco—chewing and smoking—that is used by the labouring men and masses of Canada?

Mr. COWAN.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman asks me a very fair question, and I am going to answer it. He has made a correct statement as to the present; but he should have stated to the House that he is quoting the price of a tobacco that forms less than one-tenth of all the tobacco used in Canada. The hon. gentleman knows that. I stated that there is $1,050,000 on tobacco over 1896, and I appeal to the Finance Minister whether that is not correct.

Mr. COWAN. As usual, when the hon. member for Bothwell opens his mouth, he puts his foot in it; and I will show the hon. gentleman how deep down it has sunk. The hon. gentleman has made the statement that Canadian tobacco forms less than one-tenth of the tobacco consumed in Canada. Well, fortunately we are able to get at the exact amount of Canadian leaf that has been consumed in Canada, and although it is a little out of the line of the argument I intended to pursue, I am going to deal with this at once. The Canadian tobacco produced in the year ending the 30th of June, 1896, according to the Inland Revenue Returns, was 474,205 pounds; in the year ending June, 30, 1898, it was 1,989,429 pounds; and in the year ending June 30, 1899, it had increased to 2,575,955 pounds. Taking the last year of the old regulations, ending June 30, 1896, and comparing that with the year ending June 30 last, there is an increase of 540 per cent, or there is 5½ pounds consumed now to what was consumed prior to the tariff changes. I will go further, and figure it more closely for the hon. gentleman. In the year 1894-5, the percentage of Canadian leaf compared with the total product was only 5·8 per cent, whereas in 1898-9 it increased to 26·2 per cent. For the six months ending the 31st December, 1899, it had further increased to 36·2 per cent, and for the month of January last it had increased to 45·2 per cent. And yet the hon. member for Bothwell knows so little of the staple product which he himself produces, and which is produced in his own constituency, that he makes the lamentable exhibition and the erroneous statement that less than one-tenth of the tobacco used in Canada is of Canadian growth. Surely, if we can produce tobacco of as good a quality made from Canadian leaf, and it can be purchased in Canada to-day at less than two-thirds of the price of tobacco made from foreign leaf prior to the tariff of 1897, it does not operate as an additional tax on the masses, but as an absolute saving to the people of Canada by giving them 50 per cent more tobacco than they could formerly obtain for the same money. I think that is a proposition that even the hon. member for Bothwell with his fertile imagination and lack of information will hardly contradict. Now, it was stated by the ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace), who had apparently as little knowledge of the matter as the hon. member for Bothwell, that there had been a falling off in the consumption of tobacco in Canada, and that the cause of this was that we had raised prices and caused increased smuggling into Canada; and, strange though it may seem, that hon. gentleman holding a responsible position in this House, and an ex-minister of the Crown, carried the matter one step further and said that we had imposed those tobacco duties in order that increased smuggling would take place along the borders of Canada, for the sole purpose of giving jobs to our political friends as preventive officers. Now, I want to take this matter up, and while I do so I want the attention of the hon. member for Bothwell, because there is no man who demands the attention of every minister of the Crown when he speaks so much as that hon. member. I have noted it since I came into the House in 1896. If a minister of the Crown attempts to engage in conversation with his neighbour while the hon. member for Bothwell is speaking, that hon. gentleman stops and says, 'When the minister of so-and-so gets through, I will proceed.' Surely, if the hon. member for Bothwell is entitled to ask ministers of the Crown to give their undivided attention to him when he is speaking, the hon. member, a private member, should at all events give me his attention when I am discussing an article grown in his own constituency. I will go back ten years. On June 30, 1889, the consumption of tobacco in Canada was 2·153 pounds per head. On June 30, 1896, twenty-three days before the hon. gentlemen were defeated, it had shrunk to 2·129 pounds per head, or, 0·024 pounds per head less under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite. Then, if the statement is correct that greater smuggling went on, would it not follow as a natural sequence that the consumption would have fallen to a still lower point? But I turn to the population of Canada, as figured out by the statistician, Mr. Johnson, and I find that on June 30, 1899, the consumption of tobacco had risen to 2·174 pounds per head, or an increase under the regime of gentlemen on this side of the House, of ·045 pounds per head, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite try to base an argument on the erroneous statement that smuggling has gone on in Canada.

An hon. gentleman opposite and the press of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies), stated that no cultivation, no care, no expenditure of capital, no skill, no manufacture, would enable a class of tobacco to be grown in Canada, equal to the foreign leaf imported into Canada. But when an hon. gentleman on that side makes a statement of that description, he shelters himself behind the bald, bare statement, as these hon. gentlemen generally do, without one single fact or authority to support it.

When the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), said that the labouring classes of Canada, had been taxed $1,150,000 on tobacco alone, I thought he would have gone on to show why we did not produce that tobacco in Canada, or, if we did produce it, why it was not consumed by the Canadian people; but like the rest of these hon. gentlemen, who have taken every opportunity in their power to throw a stone at Canada's tobacco industry, they have not produced a single line of authority to show that Canadian tobacco is not in every way the equal of the foreign article. I am not foolish enough to stand up in this House, for an instant, and say that we can produce Havana fillings for cigars, but neither can they do it in the United States. I am not going to say that we can produce tobacco of the fancy types for cigars, or the finest Virginia leaf, but three-quarters of the tobacco consumed in the United States, and nine-tenths of the tobacco brought into the Dominion from the United States, can be produced to an equal, if not greater state of perfection in Canada than it can be in the United States, and I purpose backing that statement up, not by my own bald assertion, but by the best authorities—not one or two authorities, but half a dozen of the best authorities—that can be got in the tobacco world, not only on the continent of America, but the continent of Europe. Let me give you first a Canadian authority, Mr. D. H. Ferguson, of Montreal, a man of wide experience both in foreign and Canadian leaf tobacco, and, I think, I am quite within the mark, when I say that there is no manufacturer in Canada, who has a wider and longer experience, or is more versed in every department of the tobacco business, both as regards the growing of tobacco and its cure and manufacture, in this Dominion. Mr. Ferguson says:

Taking into consideration the short period that the cultivation of tobacco in Canada (particularly in Western Canada) has been in vogue the farmers are to be congratulated on their success in producing a tobacco which in point of quality closely approaches their prototypes in the United States. I refer more particularly to the type known as 'Burley' which is now so largely used in the United States and Canada for sweet chewing tobacco.

Mr. COWAN.

I have seen and purchased this type of leaf in both the counties of Essex and Kent and can state that they approach very closely in merit the best grade grown in Kentucky and Ohio. The colour and texture of the domestic article when grown under proper conditions leaves nothing to be desired from a manufacturer's standpoint.

I would like to tell my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), that I have listened to his voice for two mortal hours, and would ask him to listen to mine, for he is the one gentleman on that side to whom I am talking to-night.

Due allowance should however be made for the want of experience in handling and curing as compared to the long experience and the high state of cultivation which the farmers in the United States have with years of experience brought to a state of perfection. That our farmers can and do now produce a very fair grade of leaf suitable for chewing tobacco and which will improve as their experience develops goes without saying. We now manufacture in Canada plug chewing made from domestic raw leaf which is of very fair quality and compares favourably with that made from good American leaf.

Mr. Ferguson was speaking only of the crop of 1898, and I have just a word to say with regard to that crop. In 1897, the duties upon tobacco gave such a stimulus to the industry, that every kind and grade of tobacco in Canada was gobbled up at enormous prices. The hon. member for Bothwell knows that the manufacturers were paying actually 12 cents and 14 cents and 15 cents a pound for the second growth of tobacco, that would not be cut in the county of Essex to-day. A gentleman residing in Leamington took advantage of the situation to hold meetings through the counties of Essex and Kent in the winter of 1897, and point out to the farmers the enormous advantage which they could gain by abandoning practically everything else and going largely into tobacco raising. He told them that he would buy every pound they grew, at 10 cents per pound and better; and in that prolific district, where they grew a ton of tobacco to the acre, any person can figure up what an enormous profit that would give. That so stimulated the farmers and others in that locality, that many people went into the growing of the plant, who had not the proper means for curing it, and the result was, that some was hung up on the fences, some under shade trees, and a large amount in stables, etc., until fully 50 per cent of the crop went back to the manure heap. These people did not have the facilities for curing it in 1898, yet the best of it was culled out, and that was the tobacco that went on the market in 1899; and so bitter was the lesson which the producing classes of that community were taught by virtue of the bad advice given them by this gentleman in the interests of the tobacco combine, that they have profited by that bitter lesson, and last year those who went into the industry, were men capable of caring for the plant, and the crop to-day produced in the county of Essex, is as fine as can be found anywhere in Ohio, Illinois, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, York State or Kentucky.

Now, I come to my next authority, Mr. Thomas Semple, of Setric, Kentucky, the purchaser for the firm of Alexander McEwan, of Glasgow, Scotland, one of the largest importers of tobacco in the United Kingdom. In reply to a letter sent to him, Mr. Thomas Semple wrote as follows, to W. O. McNutt, secretary Tobacco Growers' Association of Essex and Kent:

Mr. McDonald, a large manufacturer in Montreal, Canada, buys quite freely this same grade of Burley on the Louisville market.

Burley is the variety of tobacco purchased by this Scotch firm, and samples of that variety grown in Essex were forwarded to Mr. Semple, of Kentucky, on which he gave this opinion:

You should get a purchaser at home in Mr. McDonald, who purchases freely of this same grade of Burley in the Louisville market.

One of the best experts, one who has spent a long time in the tobacco industry, the purchaser for the large importing house of Alexander McEwan, of Glasgow, Scotland, unbound and untrammelled, with no interest in the tobacco markets of Canada, gives the statement I have just read. Then, I come to W. T. Gregory, who is a native of a tobacco district, who was brought up in the leaf tobacco trade, and has been for years expert tobacco buyer for the largest factories in the United States. For two years he has been buying in Essex. When the attack was made on Canadian tobacco by the hon. member for Richmond, N. S., (Mr. Gillies), expecting to follow that hon. gentleman, I telegraphed to Mr. Gregory asking him to wire reply as there was no time to communicate by mail. I have here Mr. Gregory's telegram in answer:

March 10, 1900.

To M. K. Cowan.

In reply to your inquiry, would say that the class of Canadian-grown leaf that enters into the manufacture of tobacco is of the same type and equal in quality to the foreign leaf used by manufacturers in this country.

I subsequently wrote to Mr. Gregory, asking him three questions. First, what his experience had been; second, the names of the firms for whom he had purchased in the United States, and third, their financial standing. I will give you his reply:

In reply to question No. 1, regarding my experience in tobacco, will state that have been in business thirteen years, and during that time have bought 15,000,000 pounds of tobacco. Bought two years for J. D. Cooper, exporter and speculator; bought four years for Allen & Ginter, one of the largest firms in United States, and was for seven years buyer for the American Tobacco Company.

Any man who knows anything about the tobacco trade of the United States knows that the American Tobacco Company is literally the trust of the tobacco industries of the United States, and that Allen & Ginter are one of the largest, if not the largest, firm in the United States in the production of fancy types and cigarettes:

I was raised on a tobacco farm, and have seen the tobacco business in all its forms, from the field to manufactured product. The firms named are of national reputation, as you asked me to state size and standing of firms that the writer represented.

In regard to the amount of Burley used—I would ask you to notice this point particularly, and I wish to diverge again to say that nearly nine-tenths of the tobacco consumed in Canada outside of fancy Virginia grades, cigarettes and Havana cigars, is made from the Burley type:

In reply to question No. 2, in regard to amount of Burley used in manufacture of black chewing tobacco in Canada, will say that the Burley type is used almost exclusively. In regard to 'smoking,' will state that it is not used to the extent as for chewing, but the writer has seen a remarkable, yes, phenomenal, increase in the sale of Burley smoking in the past twelve months. The State of Kentucky (which produces Burley exclusively) is by far the largest tobacco-producing state in America, and a very large majority of all tobaccos are made from the Burley type, Virginia and Carolina tobaccos being used almost exclusively for cigarette and light smoking. Canada is capable of producing a type of tobacco that in flavour, texture and general character will compare most favourably with the Kentucky product. In fact, there is in the tobacco warehouse in Leamington now that is equal in every respect to the foreign leaf. Our growers are just beginning to reach that stage where they can grow it to perfection, having passed the experimental stage.

That is the opinion of one of the best tobacco experts on the continent. But I would like the hon. member for Bothwell to listen to the opinion of Mr. Alex. Harthill, of Louisville, Kentucky, one of the largest, if not the largest, leaf tobacco buyers in the world, and a world-famous authority on all that pertains to leaf tobacco, who paid a special visit to Canada last year for the purpose of investigating our leaf. After a thorough inspection of our crop he returned home, and in an interview with the representatives of the trade press, stated that he had seen tobacco grown by our farmers that was fully equal in quality to that grown in Kentucky.

Now, I hold in my hand the Western Tobacco Journal, published in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio. This is a copy of the issue of May 22, 1899, containing about nine columns of a description of the Canadian tobacco fields and Canadian tobacco as written by this same Alexander Harthill, of Kentucky. I do not wish to weary the House, but I will read one or two short extracts :

I saw little of Canadian cigar tobacco. One specimen of Zimmer's Spanish was a beautiful, silky leaf, but very light in colour; while another was a desirable brown colour, with fine texture. I gave to a friend a cigar made of Canadian cigar leaf of the 1897 crop with Sumatra wrapper, and he pronounced it a good, full-bodied smoke.

Now, if the western district is capable of producing a cigar tobacco—and we all know that Zimmer's Spanish is a cigar tobacco of rich brown colour—acceptable to an expert like Harthill, and yielding, as his friend declared, a large full bodied smoke, then, the western district of Canada is capable of producing a tobacco equal in quality to that which we at present import from the United States. Now, one word more. Hon. gentlemen opposite, the opponents of Canadian tobacco have a tendency rather to hold up the Macdonald tobacco, the Prince of Wales chewing and the pipe tobacco, as manufactured by Macdonald, at Montreal, as the standard, and to say that the Canadian tobacco is not equal to that which he manufactures from the foreign leaf, the imported article far excelling the domestic. This Mr. Harthill, speaking of Macdonald, says :

His using Canadian-grown Burley would be no greater change, if as great, as his changing Kentucky chewing fillers some years ago from Green River (a much stronger tobacco) to Burley entirely, which he uses now.

'To Burley entirely which he uses now.' If that is to be the standard, it seems to me that all that remains to be proved is that the Dominion of Canada is capable of producing Burley varieties equal to those produced in the United States, because of the Canadian, we receive 1½ pounds for the same price we paid for a pound prior to the days of 1897. In the fertile imagination of the hon. member for Bothwell, if you give a man a pound and a half of tobacco for the same price that he paid for a pound before, the member for Bothwell argues that the people of Canada are having taxes wrung from them on that article. Mr. Harthill goes one step further, and in the same article, he says :

Meantime the new Dominion is on the road to making the great staple one of her important industries, and to grow at home, in future, what she has spent millions for abroad in the past.

This is not the statement of any man interested in Canadian tobacco, this is not the statement of any Canadian manufacturer, this is not the statement of any man who would make a single dollar by virtue of the tobacco duties of 1897. There is an authority quite above the interest that radiates from the breeches pocket; it is an authority sent here for the purpose of investigating the tobacco fields of Canada, and he says that we can produce as good a tobacco of the same grades and the same varieties as we are now importing from the United States.

Mr. COWAN.

The most convincing and irrefutable evidence that can possibly be cited as to the quality and merits of our Canadian tobacco is found in the columns of the Canadian Cigar and Tobacco Journal. This publication is the recognized organ of all branches of the trade, an admitted authority on all matters pertaining to the great tobacco industry, and having the same relationship to tobacco affairs that the Iron Age does to iron, the Canadian Lumberman to lumber, or The Monetary Times to matters of finance. Looking over its columns for the past three years I find that when the tariff commissions were touring the country, and when the subject of encouraging the Canadian tobacco industry by a revision of the tariff and excise regulations was first mooted, this tobacco journal was most vehement in its denunciation of such a measure. It stated Canada could never grow tobacco suitable for general consumption, and to attempt such an experiment was utterly ridiculous, so firm was it in its conviction on this point that it culminated in its issue of May, 1897, immediately after the budget came down with the statement that the new tobacco tariff was 'a monument of absurdity.'

We will turn to subsequent issues and see how the wonderful improvement in the quality of leaf now grown and its success with the public has brought about an evolution in the opinions of this undoubted authority. In January, 1899, in a leading editorial, they say :

Few of our readers have more than a vague understanding of the rapid advancement of Canadian tobacco as an article of consumption. Within the past year Canadian plug and cut is now selling on its intrinsic merits and increasing in demand to such an extent that it is quite within the probabilities that the close of the current year will see it constitute fully one-fourth of the total consumption of Canada.

Now, let me for a moment diverge to show why this paper should be taken as an authority. Recognizing the changes that have taken place, recognizing the capabilities of Canada in the production of tobacco, realizing that former utterances had been wrong, and yet wanting to be well within the mark, when it stated it would constitute 25 per cent. in point of fact it constituted 26 per cent and a fraction. It says further:

Canadian tobacco, once under the ban of public prejudice, is now selling on its own merits, and what is more important, is giving excellent satisfaction to the consumers. The result has brought about the development of a heretofore languishing industry, and to such an extent that it now bids fair to eventually change the whole complexion of our trade.

In January, 1900, after another year of experience with both the grower and the consumer, it comes out with an editorial article, saying :

The stability of the industry, in so far as the pipe and chewing tobacco branches are concerned, has now been established beyond all doubt, and with the constantly improving methods of culture and manufacture, there is no doubt that this tobacco is destined to eventually absorb at least 75 per cent of the total consumption of what is the largest tobacco-consuming and revenue-producing branches of the trade.

Turn now to almost its last issue, March, 1900, less than two months ago, and we find an editorial under the heading of 'The Tobacco Tariff.'

A rather uncalled for attack on the tobacco tariff was made in the House a few days ago by Mr. Gillies, member for Richmond, N.S., but as his arguments as to the results of the present tariff and his abuse of Canadian Tobacco were plainly founded on a misunderstanding of the results attained, it will hardly have any effect on the situation. Notwithstanding the abuse which this journal, and with it nine-tenths of the trade, heaped on the tobacco tariff when revised by the present administration, in 1897, and the statements then made that it was absurd to presume that Canadian tobacco could ever become a factor in the trade, the situation to-day is such that we are compelled in simple justice and by force of facts, to admit the wisdom of the administration in the measure then adopted. Not only have our farmers grown tobacco quite the equal of that used for plug smoking and chewing by the foreign leaf factories; not only was upwards of $600,000 left in the hands of Canadian farmers last year that once went to American leaf markets, but the great masses of the people have been given just 50 per cent more tobacco of equal quality for the same money than under the old tariff. Beyond this, a practically new industry has sprung into life; twenty-five new factories are now turning out Canadian tobacco products, and this influx of capital is ample evidence of the importance and wisdom of the measure. The tax, it is true, did for a time operate as a direct burden—

And therefore the hon. member for Bothwell went to sleep when it did operate as a direct burden.

—on the trade and public, but the evolution of a domestic tobacco has changed this, and it is now a tax on the classes that is handed over to the masses. The million dollars gained from the tax on foreign leaf now little more than offsets the loss of revenue involved in the low tax of only five cents per pound on Canadian tobacco.

There is the evidence of a high authority of the position in which the Canadian tobacco producer and the Canadian tobacco grower stands to-day. The industry is not in the position that its merits must be sounded by its friends. To-day it comes into the camp of the enemy; and after fighting for three long years in the face of opposition, nine-tenths of the trade comes out to-day and says: 'We were wrong and the government of Canada were right.' They are paying the farmers of Canada to-day $600,000 that formerly went into the brèche's pockets of the tobacco producing classes of the United States of America.

And yet these hon. gentlemen who have stood up in this House time and again, and made the rafters ring in pointing out the glorious future of Canada, in supporting the hothouse and spoon fed industries that never could and never will support themselves, are standing up in Canada to-day trying to blacken the character of a great Canadian industry. The hon. member for Bothwell endeavours to ruin a staple of his own country in order to secure a point against his political opponents. Now, I am not standing here as a protectionist. I have never stood as a protectionist, but I want to tell hon. gentlemen opposite after we have had eighteen long years of protection from them, that, at any time, any man who is an admirer of the principle of protection will point out that the results can be attained for any industry in Canada that have been attained for the tobacco industry of this country, I want it to go on record that so far as that industry is concerned, I am one of the strongest protectionists that could advocate its cause. What are the results? I find that the factories using Canadian tobacco exclusive of cigars for the year ending June 30, 1896, numbered ten and that the factories using foreign tobacco numbered 27. I find that to-day there are twenty-five Canadians and seventeen foreign. The factories using Canadian tobacco in three years increased 250 per cent, while the factories manufacturing foreign tobacco decreased from twenty-seven to seventeen. The cigar factories using Canadian tobacco in 1896 were two in number, to-day they are twelve in number, or an increase of 600 per cent, or, in other words, twenty-five new factories have been started and stimulated by this government. We who come from the west know well that the clarion-toned and trumpet-tongued member for Bothwell goes up and down the counties of Essex, Kent, Bothwell and Elgin saying: Look at the tall chimneys that the national policy, the protective policy, has stimulated and brought into life. And yet, the hon. member for Bothwell cannot rise in his place and show where the protective policy, in eighteen long years, ever stimulated twenty-five factories in all other lines of trades or industry in the four western counties. We can point to twenty-five new factories existing in Canada in the short space of three years in tobacco alone, and to the fact that the greater portion of the benefits resulting from these industries goes to the masses, to the farmers who produce the tobacco, to the labouring men who earn their money by the sweat of their brow in the Canadian tobacco fields and the tobacco factories of Canada, and that the money goes into the pockets of the consumers of the common grades of tobacco. In the face of this the hon. gentleman rises in his place and says that $1,151,000 was taken out of the poorer people of Canada in taxes. Then, when asked to state why and how he said because one-tenth of the tobacco consumed in Canada is made from Canadian leaf, while in point of fact, over 45 per cent was manufactured from it in January last. The hon. gentleman actually did not know the difference, although he spoke with all the assurance of a man who could leak wisdom on the subject. Earlier in this debate, and earlier in the night I gave the hon. member for Bothwell the figures of the consumption of Canadian tobacco in Canada from 1896 down. I also gave him the percentage that Canadian tobacco bore to the total consumption, and therefore I need not now weary the House by going into that any farther. But, I want to tell the hon. gentleman that the Empire Tobacco Company distributed $300,000 last year in wages to their workmen, that they spent $150,000 in increasing their plant, to say nothing about the twenty-four other factories. Does any hon. gentleman think that these gentlemen, tobacco experts, would invest such large sums of money in the industries for the manufacture of Canadian tobacco were they not thoroughly satisfied that it was a product that would strike the palate of the Canadian consumer, and that it was equal in texture, aroma, flavour and general character to the foreign article. Now, the crop of 1898 was put on the market in 1899. I have already referred to the fact that the growers lacked the facilities for curing it, but they went to work in 1898, and got the facilities, and the result is that the tobacco crop grown last year is only being purchased now, and will not go to the consumer until next year. When it does go to the consumer it will be found that the crop is 50 per cent finer than that grown in 1898. As has been stated by Mr. Gregory, these men have come to a point in Canada that it took the United States years and years to reach. Some hon. gentlemen may ask in view of the fact that under the excise regulations which imposed twenty-five cents per pound excise on foreign leaf and five cents per pound excise on Canadian leaf, giving a protection of twenty cents a pound upon the home grown article, or an advantage of twenty cents per pound, under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, how it was that Canadian tobacco only amounted to a little over 5 per cent of the total consumption. Hon. gentlemen opposite sat on the treasury benches for eighteen long years, they saw the tobacco industry, which, at one time, was an industry in this country, but which, by the absolute stupidity of hon. gentlemen opposite languished from year to year, decline by different steps and grades until it got down simply to an infinitesimal part of the tobacco consumed in Canada. At one time they made a man take out a license to grow it. Then there was practically only one man who could buy it and you may depend upon it that the buyer was not Grit. Where there were acres of tobacco in Essex and

Mr. COWAN.

Kent years ago, it got down to practically none, until the business management of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and his colleagues took hold of it, and placed it upon its feet. I will tell you what the explanation is. Prior to 1897 you could not mix Canadian and foreign tobacco in Canada. I could go to Turkey and get the Turkish or Egyptian tobacco; I could go to Cuba and get the Cuban tobacco; I could go to Virginia and buy the lemon wrapper produced in that state; I could go to Kentucky and buy the Burley tobacco, and I could bring them to Canada and mix them and blend them to suit myself, and put any wrapper on them I saw fit; but if I were a producer or a manufacturer of Canadian tobacco, the government of which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) was a bright and shining light—in supporting them, in the back concessions in the western counties—that government said: You can put a lemon Virginia wrapper around Kentucky Burley, but you cannot cover up Canadian Burley with it. Let me tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) that every one of those plugs of smoking tobacco I have produced has a wrapper grown in the State of Virginia, and which cannot be grown in any other State of the American Union. That lemon-coloured wrapper is not grown elsewhere. The result of the policy of the Conservative government was, that the Canadian manufacturer producing Canadian Burley tobacco had to put a Burley wrapper around it. What was the result? We have not yet succeeded in growing a decent wrapper in Canada, but we can grow as good a wrapper as they grow in New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania or Kentucky. But, in the United States they do not have to put an Ohio wrapper around Ohio tobacco. The result of the policy of the Conservative government was that we had to put our tobacco on the market just as it was, and its appearance damned it in the sight of every man. This government had business ability enough to grapple with the situation, and when the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) goes back to his county, and asks in the different school-houses what this Liberal government has done, let him put his hands in his pants pocket, produce his tobacco, and every plug of Canadian Burley he finds there with a Virginia wrapper around it will demonstrate to him something done by this government, and something which has meant thousands and thousands of dollars to the people of this country. In 1897, when these tobacco duties were imposed, this Liberal government passed a regulation stating that any factory could take out a license, to blend tobacco. They could have it all Canadian, if they wanted to; they could have it all foreign tobacco, if they wanted to; or they could mix it, and this government showed its wisdom by going a step further and providing as a safeguard, until such time as the tobacco industry got upon its feet, that the manufacturer should not put a lemon wrapper around any tobacco that did not contain at least 25 per cent of foreign leaf. The government provided that we could take the Canadian tobacco and experiment with it up to 75 per cent, but the manufacturer could not put a lemon wrapper around any tobacco that did not contain at least 25 per cent of foreign leaf. That insured that the industry would not be killed in its infancy by unscrupulous manufacturers who might cover up a shoddy article with a bright-coloured wrapper. That regulation continued in force in 1897, and part of 1898. In 1898, the Tobacco Growers' Association of the western counties met at the village of Kingsville and passed a resolution asking the government to reduce the amount of foreign tobacco necessary to be used in mixing down to 10 per cent, which practically covers the wrapper only. That resolution was presented to the government and was agreed to. By reason of that one regulation concerning mixed tobacco factories, enabled us to put a tobacco upon the market presentable in appearance, and the inside spoke for itself. I need only point this House once more to the expert opinions on our tobacco, and to the largely increased amount of Canadian tobacco consumed in Canada to prove the success of the Liberal policy in that regard. When the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), and when the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson)—I had nearly forgotten him—stated in this House that this government has increased taxation on the labouring men by reason of the tobacco duties, they are making statements which they have not tried to verify, or else they are making unfounded statements for the purpose of getting party capital and caring not what damage these statements might do to the Canadian growers and the Canadian manufacturers of tobacco. I am advised by the wholesale men that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) could have gone to Georgetown, or Oakville, or Acton, in his own constituency, and at least in four places in any one of these towns and villages, he could have bought the Canadian tobacco for forty cents a pound where he would pay eighty cents for the foreign tobacco now, and sixty cents prior to these duties of 1897.

I have one more point, Mr. Speaker, before closing. The hon. member for Richmond, N.S., asked the other day of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac), the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), and other members representing the maritime provinces: How could they explain to their constituents the imposition of an extra duty on the tobacco of the fishermen of the lower provinces. Well, these gentlemen can take up these figures which I have given from the blue-books of parliament, and from the Inland Revenue Returns, or they can hold up the product of the Empire Tobacco Company to prove the wisdom of the policy adopted by this government. I said then as I say now that I am prepared to go to the country on this issue. I did intend speaking of cigars, but I shall not detain the House at this late hour further than to say that cigars retailing at five cents in Canada and manufactured from foreign leaf are made very largely from tobacco grown in Wisconsin State. I would like to see the Canadian representative in this House who would dare to stand on his feet and say that the state of Wisconsin can produce anything that South-western Ontario cannot produce. In speaking on this question in 1898, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram), and the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), on different occasions, stated that there was a large amount of tobacco smuggled into the western counties of Ontario along the international boundary line. Where the two countries are separated by water, there is no point at which the communication is so easy and so cheap as at the city where I live, there is no place along the international boundary line where, with three immense railways crossing and with the ferry system, the facilities for smuggling are so great as at Windsor. Yet, that there is no smuggling, but that the people of the county of Essex prefer to use the Essex tobacco, as I prefer to use it, as against that manufactured from the foreign product, is proved by this, that the Leamington Tobacco Company started with a small factory employing twelve or fifteen hands in 1899; yet in less than three months the output of that factory was trebled, and in less than six months it was increased sevenfold, and had increased the number of its employees about fourfold, and enlarged its premises threefold. In conversation with Mr. Fenton, the manager of the works, I asked him why he did not get his product down into the maritime provinces, and he answered: "Notwithstanding the increase of our output, the number of hands employed and the factory space, we have never yet been able to get outside of the territory in which we first sold our product. Although the product had increased sevenfold, it was consumed in the counties of Essex, Kent, Elgin, and a portion of Middlesex. He told me that he had never been able to get further east than the city of London, because he could not get out sufficient tobacco to fill the orders west of the city of London. If these hon. gentlemen could obtain any evidence of smuggling, they should obtain it in those counties; but there is no tobacco smuggled into the country there for the simple reason that the article grown at home is equal to the foreign article. Now, there are several members of this House who smoke the Empire tobacco, which is purely a Canadian tobacco. I know a tobacconist who told me that he had a caddie of tobacco made from foreign leaf, but that since he had got the product of the Leamington factory he had sold five caddies of that and had not yet finished the one made of foreign leaf, which is sufficient evidence in itself of the high quality of the Canadian article.

Just one word on climate and soil, and I shall close. Any man who knows anything about tobacco, any man who knows a cigar from a piece of cane-stalk, knows that I am quite within the mark when I say that the further north you can ripen a fruit or bring a plant to maturity, the finer will be its quality and texture and the greater its perfection. So the further north you can grow tobacco and succeed in ripening it perfectly, the finer will be the grade of that particular tobacco. Hon. gentlemen opposite might just as well stand up and say that because we cannot grow figs, bananas and oranges, therefore we cannot grow fruit; yet anybody who has been through the counties of Lincoln, Essex and Kent knows that we can produce in those counties a finer peach than can be grown in Southern California, Georgia, Louisiana, Florida or any other part of the United States. The hon. gentlemen might just as well say that because they cannot grow figs and lemons in Nova Scotia, they cannot produce apples of a high grade in the Annapolis Valley. So, because we cannot grow the Havana filler or the Sumatra wrapper, these hon. gentlemen might just as well say that we cannot grow tobacco at all. The hon. member for Richmond, N.S., (Mr. Gillies) said that the flavours of the black tobaccos of the state of Kentucky were the finest in the world. If the hon. gentleman had taken the trouble, as I did, to look up the meteorological reports of the state of Kentucky and of Western Ontario, he would have found that we have as many sunny days during the tobacco growing season as they have in the state of Kentucky. Some years ago the Ontario government, copying an article written of the south-western district, published it for circulation in the old land, and there are one or two extracts in it which I propose reading:

Pelee Island, only sixteen miles from the main shore, is in latitude 41 degrees, 36 minutes. A line east and west through Pelee Island passes through Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and California; through northern Portugal and southern Turkey in Europe. One-third of Spain, three-fourths of Italy, and almost the entire Adriatic Sea lie north of Pelee. Fishing Point is fifty miles nearer the equator than the southernmost verge of France.

Due east of the vineyards of Pelee are the vineyards of Old Castle, of the Apulian Valley, in southern Italy, and the orange grove of Barcelona.

Mr. COWAN.

The Island of Pelee, as has been intimated, is famous for its vineyards, and for the wines which these produce. The best variety of grapes can be grown abundantly and of magnificent size. The failure of the grape crop is almost unknown on the island, whereas in eastern France, famous in Europe for its grapes and wines, there is a failure about once in three years, while in only one year of the three does the crop reach perfection. Vineyards of from twenty to thirty acres everywhere dot the island, yielding from four to five tons of fruit to the acre.

Fig and almond trees, with a little winter protection, bear abundantly. Cotton-seed has been ripened. Maize, sugar cane, pea-nuts, sweet potatoes, the pawpaw, white mulberry peach, apricots, nectarine and quince will flourish and bear abundantly.

And what is true of the climate and products of Pelee Island is, in the main, true of the county of Essex, its nearest neighbour on the mainland.

In conclusion, let me say, that if the hon. member for Bothwell—a constituency which lies not 30 miles further to the north—would stand up in this House and say a word or two in favour of the climate and soil, and the inhabitants that he represents, instead of rising here and endeavouring to propagate, through the medium of the public press, the fallacy that the tariff changes of 1897, have resulted in an increase in the price of tobacco—if he had stated what is the fact, that it had resulted in a decrease in the price, instead of an increase, and that you could purchase one and a half times as much tobacco now, for the same amount of money, that it cost prior to 1897—if, in other words, he had told the plain truth, it would have been better for himself, better for his constituency, better for an industry which stands, by virtue of the tariff changes, without a parallel in the history of Canada as regards its growth—if he had stated that the output had increased by 700 per cent, that the manufacture of cigars had increased 600 per cent, and that of leaf tobacco 250 per cent, while at the same time, the article has been cheapened to the people of Canada between 30 and 50 per cent, he would have performed his duty more faithfully and creditably to his country, his constituency and himself.

Mr. ALEX. McNEILL (North Bruce). I am not a tobacco expert, Mr. Speaker, I do not smoke, and do not intend to enter into a discussion of the question which has just been so fully discussed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan), who has just taken his seat. I will leave that to my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), who will, no doubt, have some further opportunity to settle the controversy between himself and the hon. gentleman. I shall limit myself to saying, that I hope what my hon. friend has said with regard to the tobacco industry, is quite correct, and that it has actually increased in the proportion he has stated, and will continue to increase at the rate he expects. It was very interesting to me to hear the hon. gentleman endeavour to demonstrate that under a high duty it was possible to create a new industry in the country, and at the same time lessen the price of the commodity manufactured. That was a proposition which we, on this side used to maintain, but which the hon. gentleman and his friends, always contended to be absolutely opposed to every principle of political economy and, therefore, utterly absurd. However, I leave the hon. gentleman to settle that point with his own friends, and experience is a good teacher. What I rose to do, was to move the adjournment of the debate.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I hope the hon. gentleman will not persist in his motion. Of course it is no pleasure to stay here so late, and I am anxious that we should not sit any longer than necessary, but I am informed that a very large number of gentlemen have handed in their names, as desirous of speaking; and as we are anxious to close the debate, if not to-morrow, at least the following night, I would urge my hon. friend to go on with his speech, because otherwise we cannot possibly hope to get through within that delay.

Mr. D. TISDALE (South Norfolk). How late do you want to sit?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. At least for another speech. We have had a long recess, and if we intend getting through the debate within a reasonable time, I must, very reluctantly, ask my hon. friend not to press his motion.

Mr. TISDALE. I understood some time ago that we were to adjourn at one o'clock, and it is now five minutes to one. I agreed to stay here until one o'clock, but I understood that we were then to adjourn.

Mr. McNEILL. I think it is really an unreasonable proposal to ask any one to address this House on a question of such magnitude at one o'clock in the morning.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Some of our friends on the other side are prepared to go on, and if we do not sit longer, we will never get through.

Mr. McNEILL. I would not think of discussing a question of this kind at this hour, and if my hon. friend desires the debate to go on, we can talk about something. I have never yet seen an attempt to force a discussion at this hour, result in facilitating business, but have always found it had the very opposite result. I move that the debate do now adjourn.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Sixteen names have been handed in of gentlemen who intend to speak on this debate; and if my hon. friend is not prepared to go on, there are others to whom he should make way. It is not reasonable that this debate should be prolonged any longer. It is not attracting a great deal of attention, although if all hon. gentlemen could invest the subject with as much interest as the hon. gentleman who last spoke has done, it would be infinitely more interesting. We cannot hope to adjourn before one o'clock every evening. The complaints are loud by the opposition leaders, that the government are not pushing on business, but when we try to force it on, we are met by hon. gentlemen opposite, objecting to the lateness of the hour. Of course the hour is late, and I would not like myself to have to address the House at this hour; but under the circumstances, I do not think we ought to adjourn just yet. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Ganong), rose to speak when the hon. member for Bruce got up, and if my hon. friend from Bruce is not ready to speak, perhaps the hon. member for Charlotte is. Let us try and get through with some of the list. There are sixteen gentlemen to address the House.

Mr. CLANCY. How are they divided?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Eight on each side.

Mr. TISDALE. This sudden desire to lay on the shoulders of the opposition, that we are prolonging this debate unduly, and forcing us to speak at one o'clock, will only have the result the hon. member for North Bruce has stated. Attempting to force members to speak at one o'clock in the morning in a debate of this sort is not the way to expedite business. If the hon. gentleman proposes to take a night to close the debate, and say we will sit all night, if necessary, that would be much more reasonable than to force us to continue the debate at this hour. I understood that we were to adjourn at one o'clock.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not hear anything of the kind.

Mr. TISDALE. I thought there was some understanding to that effect arrived at between the whips.

Mr. Wm. GIBSON (Lincoln). There was no understanding as to the hour when the debate would be closed, but I understood that the leaders of both sides had a conference this afternoon and agreed that the debate would close to-morrow night. We compared our lists, and there are eight on each side to speak, but it is quite possible that some of them may not speak. There are at least eight Conservatives and seven Liberals yet to speak.

Mr. TISDALE. The understanding of the leaders had better be left alone, and the debate not forced on now.

Mr. McNEILL. I have waited until this hour expecting that after the speech we have just heard the debate would be adjourned, and the understanding on this side was that I was to move the adjournment. If my hon. friend insists on going on with a discussion of this magnitude at this hour, I do not think that will expedite matters. My hon. friend's new-born zeal is not taking very practical form.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This is not the first time I have tried to prolong the debate so as to get through, but I have tried it several times.

Mr. McNEILL. I must say that I think the hon. gentleman is very unreasonable. If the determination is to finish to-morrow night, I suppose the debate can be finished then if hon. members desire to sit here late enough. I think the hon. gentleman should accept my suggestion and allow the debate to adjourn.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will not press the matter, but I must say that when the first part of the afternoon is taken up with all kinds of motions to adjourn, and we do not enter on the debate until late, and have only four speeches per day, I do not see when it is to end. However, the hon. gentleman presses very strongly for it, so I will not insist on keeping the House any longer. But I have to say that the country will be without the benefit of the matured thoughts of some hon. members, if the whole sixteen are to speak to-morrow.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1.05 a.m. (Wednesday.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, May 2, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Mr. FLINT moved :

That that portion of the 49th rule which limits the time for receiving petitions for private Bills be suspended in reference to the petitions of the Salisbury and Harvey Railway Company and the South Shore Line Railway Company, presented this day, and that the said petitions be read and received forthwith, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the 14th report of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Mr. TISDALE.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I would like to remind the House that the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), in an earlier part of the session, gave notice to the House that the abuses which existed in former sessions would not continue during the present session, and to say that there must be a limit to the time for the introduction of these private Bills and the reception of petitions. The time has been extended, notwithstanding that notification, on several occasions, and there seems to be no limit to it as long as the House is in session. I think the House should come to some understanding, that on some certain dates it stops, because the country cannot have reasonable notice of these things, and the effect is to keep the House in session much longer than it ought to be.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I rather agree with the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), in general terms, but I am sure that the committee would not make a recommendation of this kind unless there were circumstances to warrant it.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That the name of Mr. McClure be substituted for that of the late Mr. Haley on the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of the House during the present session.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Annual report of the Department of Railways and Canals.—(Mr. Blair.)

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I may say that a limited number of copies of the report will be ready for general distribution among the members this evening.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 145) to incorporate the Toronto and Georgian Bay Short Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Britton.)

Bill (No. 146) to enable the city of Winnipeg to utilize the Assiniboine River water power.—(Mr. Puttee.)

JUDGES IN MONTREAL AND QUEBEC.

Mr. BERGERON (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

1. Who are the judges who have sat in the Court of Appeal for the province of Quebec since 1880?

2. Who is the judge who has presided in the Criminal Court in Montreal and Quebec since 1880?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I have here the information necessary to enable me to answer this question ; but the statistics which I have been furnished with are somewhat lengthy, and, I think, uninteresting to the House, and I might simply hand them into Hansard, if my hon. friend will agree.

Mr. FOSTER. It cannot be done.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (reading) :

List of the judges who have sat in the Court of Appeals for the province of Quebec since 1880, at Montreal and Quebec :

Hon. Chief Justice Sir A. A. Dorion, C.Q.B. ; Hon. Chief Justice Sir Alexandre Lacoste, C.Q.B. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Monk, C.Q.B. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Ramsay, C.Q.B. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Tessier, C.Q.B. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Cross, C.Q.B. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Baby, C.Q.B. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Church, C.Q.B. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Bossé, C.Q.B. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Blanchet, C.Q.B. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Hall, C.Q.B. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Wurtele, C.Q.B. ; Hon. Mr. Justice J. Ald. Ouimet, C.Q.B. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Caron, S.C. ad. hoc. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Routhier, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice McCord, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Chagnon, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice M. Doherty, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Plamondon, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice L. A. Jetté, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice H. T. Taschereau, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Gill, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Mathieu, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Tait, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Bourgeois, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice L. O. Loranger, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Pelletier, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Cimon, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Teller, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice J. Alp. Ouimet, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Pagnuelo, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Larue, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Charland, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice DeLormier, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Davidson, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice C. J. Doherty, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Archibald, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Curran, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Lemieux, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Langelier, S.C. ; Hon. Mr. Justice Lavergne, S.C.

List of the judges who have presided, the Court of Queen's Bench, Crown side, from the year 1880, up to date, at Montreal :

The Hon. Chief Justice Sir Antoine Aimé Dorion ; Hon. Justice Ramsay ; Hon. Justice Baby ; Hon. Justice Monk ; Hon. Justice Cross ; Hon. Justice Church ; Hon. Chief Justice Sir Alex. Lacoste ; Hon. Justice Wurtele ; Hon. Justice Henri Taschereau ; Hon. Justice Hall ; Hon. Justice J. Ald. Ouimet.

Names of judges who have sat in the Criminal Court at Quebec, since 1880 :

April, 1880—Tessier, Cross. October, 1880—Johnson, J.C.S., Cross. April, 1881—Cross. October, 1881—Tessier, Cross. April, 1882—Monk, Tessier. October, 1882—Tessier, Cross. April, 1883—Tessier, Cross. October, 1883—Ramsay, Tessier. April, 1884—Monk, Tessier. October, 1884—Ramsay, Tessier, Cross. April, 1885—Tessier, Cross. October, 1885—Cross. April, 1886—Monk, Tessier. October, 1886—Tessier, Cross. April, 1887—Dorion, Tessier. October, 1887—Cross, Johnson, J.C.S.. April, 1888—Tessier, Cross. October, 1888—Cross, Bossé. April, 1889—Tessier, Bossé. October, 1889—Tessier, Bossé. April, 1890—Tessier, Bossé. October, 1890—Bossé. April, 1891—Bossé. October, 1891—Bossé. Blanchet. April, 1892—Bossé. October, 1892—Bossé, Blanchet, Wurtele. April, 1893—Bossé. October, 1893—Bossé, Blanchet. April, 1894—Bossé, Blanchet. October, 1894—Blanchet. April, 1895—Bossé. October, 1895—Blanchet. April, 1896—Bossé. April, 1897—Bossé. February, 1898—Blanchet. October, 1898—Langelier, J.C.S., and supplementary judge C.B.R. April, 1899—Bossé. October, 1899—Blanchet.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—EXPENSES OF CANADIAN TROOPS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What part of the expense incurred in the enrolment, equipment, transport and pay of Canadian troops sent to South Africa is included in the item $898,172.30 under capital expenditure in 'Canada Gazette,' April 14, 1900, and how much under each of the above heads?

Is any part of the expense included under expenditures on Consolidated Fund account, and if so, what part distributed under the four heads above mentioned?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The expenditure may be divided as follows: Enrolment, including pay up to concentration, and expenses for feeding troops and horses, up to date of sailing, $34,540.69; transport, $358,571.64; equipment, including horses, $382,667.20; pay, including advances to officer commanding, for pay of troops to date of arrival in South Africa, which advances have not yet been all accounted for, $122,392.77. Total, $898,172.30. No part of the expenditure is included under consolidated fund.

ELKHORN GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS.

Mr. ROCHE asked :

1. Did the government own the buildings on the old Indian Home site at Elkhorn, removed to the new site?
2. If not, what disposal was made of the building not removed?
3. Is the present post office building one of those structures formerly owned by the government?
4. If so, how much was received for it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. The buildings erected with public money on the old site which were not destroyed by fire, were taken down, and the material of which they were constructed, used in connection with the buildings on the new site 2. The buildings not removed from the old site, were not owned by the government, but had been rented for the purposes of the school when it existed there. 3 and 4. The answers to the first and second questions, leave nothing to be said in reply to the third and fourth questions.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—PURCHASE OF HORSES.

Mr. OLIVER (by Mr. Flint) asked :

1. How many horses were purchased west of Lake Superior for the second contingent of Canadian volunteers serving in South Africa?

2. What was the average height, weight and price paid for such horses?

3. How many horses accompanied the second contingent to South Africa?

4. How many of these horses died on the voyage out?

5. How many of those which died were purchased west of Lake Superior?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. 455. 2. Average height 15.1; average weight, not obtainable; average price, $93; 3. 1,206. 4. 63. 5. 9.

PORT GEORGE POST OFFICE.

Mr. MILLS asked :

1. Is Port George, Annapolis County, N.S., a place where money orders are issued and paid?

2. If not, when did Port George cease to be a money order office? And why was this public convenience withdrawn?

3. Was it withdrawn in consequence of continued irregularities in the management of the office by the postmistress or assistants?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. No. 2. On August 1, 1899. 3. Yes, by an assistant. The question of re-establishing the money order business is now engaging the attention of the department.

LAND GRANTS TO RAILWAYS.

Mr. PETTET asked :

1. Have any land grants been made by the present government in subsidizing railways? If so, to which railways?

2. Was it the policy of the late government to make these land grants, and did they do so to a very large extent?

3. What is the policy of the present government in subsidizing railways?

4. Does this policy tend to have a restraining influence in preventing exorbitant rates of transportation?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In reply, I beg to say: 1. No. 2. Railway land subsidies to the extent of 7,437,992 acres were granted by the late government, and a reserve of some 8,000,000 of acres was set apart for the purpose of the selection therefrom of the land subsidy provided for the Canadian Northern Railway, now in course of construction. 3. The policy of the government on this question can best be determined by the resolutions and legislation introduced by them. 4. In the opinion of the government, its general policy does tend to have a restraining influence in preventing exorbitant rates of transportation.

FISHING SEASON ON LAKES WINNIPEGOSIS AND MANITOBA.

Mr. ROCHE asked :

Is it the intention of the government to enforce the law in reference to summer fishing on Lakes Winnipegosis and Manitoba this season, or do they intend suspending their enforcement for another year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). In reply, I beg to say: There is no law specially referring to summer fishing; the existing regulations permit of fishing under 'domestic' licenses and there is no intention to interfere with them. The use of tugs in netting operations is prohibited on Lakes Winnipegosis and Manitoba by order in council.

MR. M. A. KENDALL, M.L.A.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) asked :

1. What amount has been paid to A. Kendall, M.L.A., Nova Scotia, since January 1, 1897, to date for services rendered by him to the government or any department thereof?

2. Has said A. Kendall, M.L.A., Nova Scotia, any commission to England during a part of the time mentioned regarding the exportation of live lobsters, and if so, has he made a report, and what was he paid for the same?

3. Has he any outstanding claim for wages or salary against the government, and if so, what is the amount?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). In reply, I beg to say: 1. Marine and Fisheries Department, $550. 2. He had no commission, but in connection with the experiment of transporting lobsters in cold storage to Great Britain the department aided his experiment to the extent of $195 of the expenses. He has made a report, for which he was paid nothing. 3. He probably has, but he has not rendered any account.

PRINTING OF DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

At what dates were the MSS. of the following departmental reports for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, sent to the Queen's Printer, namely:

Postmaster General,
Railways and Canals,
Militia and Defence,

Mr. ROCHE.

Agriculture,
 Secretary of State,
 Life Insurance,
 Printing and Stationery,
 Chartered Banks,
 Geological Survey,
 Experimental Farm,
 Interior Department,
 Justice,
 Public Works,
 Archives,
 Bank Balances,
 North-west Mounted Police,
 Penitentiaries,
 Insurance.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In so far as the North-west Mounted Police Department is concerned, for which I am responsible, the report is made up for the calendar, and not for the fiscal year. The material necessary to complete the report for 1899 was complete on the 22nd January, but by arrangement with the Printing Bureau the report was not sent to be printed until the 24th March. This was simply a matter of convenience. We retained the manuscript in the department for purposes of reference until the Printing Bureau got through the heavier work on its hands and was ready to take in hand the report of the Police Department.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I beg to reply to that part of the question which relates to life insurance, chartered banks, bank balances, and insurance, relates to the Department of Finance. So far as these reports are concerned, I have to say that they are not reports covering the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1899, but they cover the calendar year ending 31st December, 1899. All the reports from the Finance Department which cover the fiscal year 1898-9, were sent to the printers in good time, and were laid on the Table of the House early in the session. With reference to the reports named in the hon. member's question: 1. Life insurance and insurance. The returns from the insurance companies covering the calendar year are not required to be made by the companies until the 1st March. The last return this year was not received until the 6th March, and the complete manuscript for 1899 of the abstract of the returns, which is laid before parliament, was placed in the hands of the printers on the 13th March, and the abstract was presented to the House on the 23rd April. The reports as to life insurance companies and to all other insurance companies are included in the abstract. 2. Chartered banks and bank balances. The banks have until the 20th January to make these returns, and this year the complete manuscript for both blue-books was placed in the printer's hands on the 22nd January, or within two days after the date allowed for their reception at the department.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). As regards that part of the question which relates to the Department of Railways and Canals, I beg to say that all the material—statistical and other matters of that description, outside of the report of the deputy minister—was forwarded to the Printing Bureau on the 31st January last. The messenger who brought the manuscript was instructed at the Bureau to return with it to the department, as the Bureau had not yet got through with the report of the Auditor General, and it would be useless to take up this other matter until that report was printed. The deputy minister sent the report back to the Printing Bureau on the 1st February with instructions to print it at the first opportunity. On the 21st February the deputy minister sent down to inquire what progress had been made, and the reply was that the report had not been touched, but that the Bureau hoped to commence work on the following day. It was not completed until the 11th April, when the first full proofs were received. There was, therefore, no delay on the part of the Railway Department at all. On receipt of the full proofs, the report of the deputy minister was immediately prepared, which did not take over seven days. It was handed to the Printing Bureau on the 18th April, and was put through by the Bureau, I presume, with all possible expedition.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). As regards the inquiry respecting the Department of the Post Office, I would like that portion of the question to stand.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). As regards the inquiry concerning the Department of Agriculture, I beg to say: The MSS. of Archives report for the year 1899, was sent to the Queen's Printer on 25th October, 1899. The MSS. of Experimental Farm Report for the year ended 30th November, 1899, was sent to the Queen's Printer on 23rd January, 1900. The MSS. of the Departmental Report for the year ended 31st October, 1899, was sent to the Queen's Printer on 12th March, 1900.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As to the Interior Department Report, the first instalment of copy was sent to the Printing Bureau on the 18th December last. Further instalments were sent on the 23rd of that month, on the 4th, 11th, 16th, 22nd and 24th of January, the 2nd February, and the 5th and 14th of March. The final instalment was sent on the 21st March. On further investigation at the Printing Bureau, I find that they say that the report was ready on the 23rd March, even to the index, and might have been presented to the House in two days, but a copy of the report on European immigration had to be included and between Professor Mayor and the officials of the department there was some fourteen days delay, which caused most of the delay in the preparation of this report and its submission to the House.

P.E.I. TELEGRAPH SERVICE.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Has the government come to any arrangement with the Anglo-American Telegraph Company for reducing rates and otherwise improving the telegraph service between the province of Prince Edward Island and the rest of Canada?

If so, what are the changes proposed to be made?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). No. Correspondence is still pending with the Anglo-American Company on the subject of the telegraph service.

P.E.I. RAILWAY—CURVES AT NORTH WILTSHIRE.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Has the work of straightening the curve at North Wiltshire, on the Prince Edward Island Railway, been completed?

If so, what is the total cost?

If not, what is the total cost to date?

What is the grade after work is completed?

What was the grade before work began?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). In reply, I beg to say: 1. The work of straightening the curve at North Wiltshire on the Prince Edward Island Railway has been completed. 2 and 3. The total cost is $24,996.31. 4. The maximum grade is precisely the same as it was last year when I answered this question, viz. : 66 feet to the mile. 5. Before work began, the maximum grade was 17-10 of a foot less, per mile.

MR. T. C. PATTESON, TORONTO POSTMASTER.

Mr. FEATHERSTON asked :

1. Is T. C. Patteson still postmaster at Toronto?

2. If so, does the government allow him to leave his office in connection with the purchase of horses for the British militia?

3. If not, why should he neglect his duties and go to New York to meet Mr. Dent, the purchasing agent for the British government, who has come out here for the purchase of horses?

4. Is it also true that the said T. C. Patteson forced his acquaintance on Mr. Dent at New York, with the assurance that Lord Strathcona had arranged or should have arranged for his association with him for the purpose of purchasing those horses?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Mr. Patteson is still postmaster at Toronto. He applied for and obtained leave of absence to go to New York. I think he was only absent from his office one day, Saturday, the day happening to intervene between Good Friday and Easter Monday.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). In addition to what my hon. colleague has said, I beg to say that I am not in a position to give any information as to Mr. Patteson's acquaintance with Major Dent, but Major Dent had no instructions to advise with Mr. T. C. Patteson in regard to his purchase of horses in Canada.

Mr. SUTHERLAND.

Mr. FOSTER. Is he in any way an official or under the instructions of the Dominion government?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, he is not.

Mr. FOSTER. He has the right to consult with anybody he likes?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Certainly.

STAFF OF HOUSE OF COMMONS POST OFFICE.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

1. How many clerks are now on the staff of the House of Commons post office, including the postmaster?

2. How many clerks were so employed there when the late postmaster, Mr. Stansfield, was on active duty and previous to 1896?

3. What are the duties of the postmaster? Did he have any experience in the postal matters or post office work previous to his appointment?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would observe to my hon. friend that this is not a matter which concerns the government; I have, however, got the information for the hon. gentleman. 1. Ten: Mr. Mills, postmaster, $1,150; Mr. Lemieux, assistant postmaster, $1,000; 8 sessional clerks at $4 per diem. 2. Ten; Mr. Stansfield, postmaster, $1,800; Mr. Lemieux, assistant postmaster, $1,000; 8 sessional clerks at $4 per diem. The salaries of the permanent clerks being $650 less than in the year 1896, and $1,350 less than in 1893, when the postmaster had two permanent assistants. 3. General supervision of the office and employees. The present postmaster is a barrister by profession; was appointed on 1st of July, 1897, at $1,100, and has since his appointment performed his duties in an efficient and satisfactory manner in the opinion of the Speakers and the clerk.

PATRICK DALY, KINGSTON.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

Has Mr. Patrick Daly, of Kingston, printer or publisher, been appointed assistant superintendent of the Rideau Canal? If not, is it the intention of the government to appoint him to this position? If so, what will be the nature of the duties or services required of him? What salary will he receive?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Mr. Daly has not been appointed assistant superintendent of the canal, no appointment has been made as yet. It is, however, the intention of the government to make provision for a general inspector upon the system, and Mr. Daly will be appointed to that place. The salary which will be allowed him will be $1,000 per year, or at that rate.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. DUGAS (by Mr. Marcotte), asked :

1. Whether, in his reply given before this House on 23rd April, 1900, the Prime Minister of the Dominion relies solely upon the declaration of a layman, Mr. Carroll, in asserting that the schools question has been so settled as to render to the Catholics all possible justice, or whether he has in his possession communications from any person authorized by the Catholic minority, which enable him to assert that the latter have accepted the proposed settlement as a satisfactory solution of the school difficulty ?

2. In the latter case, who is his informant ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Prime Minister was asked if he had taken cognizance of a certain report published in the Winnipeg Free Press and republished by La Presse, of Montreal, and if he still persisted in saying that he had settled the Manitoba school question as to do full and complete justice to the Catholics of that province.

The Prime Minister replied that he had taken cognizance of the said report, which was the report of a meeting between Roman Catholic ratepayers and the chairman and members of the Winnipeg Public School Board, where the said Roman Catholic ratepayers petitioned to have their schools taken over by the Public School Board ; the said Roman Catholic ratepayers representing that there was now a school law that could be fairly taken advantage of and that by having a good, friendly feeling, they could overcome some of the difficulties before them, and that the proposition, though coming from the laity, would be accepted by the clergy on the lines proposed. The Prime Minister further replied that, in view of this statement, he was more than ever convinced that the Manitoba school question had been settled in a manner to do the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba the fullest and most complete justice that was possible under existing circumstances. He did not go out of the question to give the answer.

PUBLIC WORKS AT SUMAS BAR, B.C.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. How much has been paid to Mr. George Marshall, carriage painter, for acting as overseer of the work done by the Public Works Department on Sumas Bar, Fraser River ?

2. How much has been paid to Mr. W. A. Rose, dry goods merchant, for groceries supplied to the government employees' camp at Sumas Bar ?

3. On what date did the dredge 'Mud Lark' leave the coast, and when did she arrive at Sumas Bar last year ?

4. What was the expense incurred taking her up there ?

5. How much gravel did this dredge excavate at Sumas Bar ?

6. Has the work done this bar stood the freshets, and is it considered satisfactory ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. For salary, $238 ; for disbursements, $128.85. 2. Nothing paid by department. 3. She left the coast about the 16th of April, 1898, not last year, and arrived the 19th of April at Sumas. 4. About $295. 5. None, as water had raised and no work could be done. The channel had already been opened through the bar at low water by scrapers. The dredge was not taken to Fraser River specially to work on the Sumas Bar, but as she was at the time in the vicinity, the resident engineer thought advisable to use her to improve this channel. 6. Yes.

NUMBER AND SALARIES OF CLERKS IN DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. WILSON asked :

What are the respective numbers of permanent clerks and of temporary clerks employed in the Department of the Interior, the Public Works Department, the Post Office Department, and the Department of Agriculture, for the years 1896 and 1899 ?

What are the total salaries paid to the temporary clerks employed in these departments for the same years ?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The answer, in so far as the Department of the Interior is concerned, is : 1. The total number of permanent clerks employed in the Interior Department during the fiscal year ended 30th of June, 1896, was 80. 2. The total number of temporary clerks employed in the Interior Department during the fiscal year ended 30th of June, 1896, was 38. 3. The total number of permanent clerks employed in the Interior Department during the fiscal year ended 30th of June, 1899, was 76. 4. The total number of temporary clerks employed in the Interior Department during the fiscal year ended 30th of June, 1899, was 52. 5. The total amount of salaries paid to temporary clerks employed in the Interior Department during the fiscal year ended 30th of June, 1896, was $24,555.76. 6. The total amount of salaries paid to temporary clerks employed in the Interior Department during the fiscal year ended 30th of June, 1899, was $29,595.20.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). To that portion of the question having reference to the Department of Public Works, the answer is as follows : 1895-6, permanent clerks, 31 ; temporary clerks, 53 ; salaries of temporary, $38,484.48. 1898-9, permanent clerks, 25 ; temporary clerks, 46 ; salaries of temporaries, $31,370.66.

As regards the Post Office Department, the answer is as follows :

be asked why I bring this matter before the House at the present moment. A petition has been forwarded to me by some of my constituents asking me to bring this matter before the government. The petition is as follows :

Sir,—The undersigned voters of the village of Lancaster humbly request that you will ask for information, in the House of Commons, concerning the case of a Canadian private soldier at Bloemfontein, named Belyea, who is said to have been condemned to fifty-six days' punishment for killing a hen. We think that the cabinet or some member of it, should obtain for the House a report of the trial, and the sentence, and the names of the officers who passed the sentence. We are of opinion that as the Canadians did not enlist personally in British regiments, but were handed over in a body by the Dominion government to the British government, they still occupy the status of Canadians, and it is the duty of the people of Canada, and of the Dominion government, to inquire into anything which concerns the welfare of the men of the Canadian contingents.

The petition is signed by Duncan Fraser, J.P., and fifty others, all leading men of that place. Mr. Fraser's own son, who was a prosperous business man, a jeweller there, went to Montreal, enlisted, came back, sold out his goods at auction in two or three days and went off with the contingent. His father and the people generally are very anxious to know if such punishments as this are inflicted upon our Canadian volunteers who have gone to South Africa and who have distinguished themselves as they have done. I am sure there must be some mistake about it. I looked over the Militia Act of 1881, and there is no such punishment as has been mentioned. I trust it cannot possibly be true, and in the interest of our soldiers who have distinguished themselves in that country, who have brought Canada to the front, who have done themselves so much credit, and in fairness to the country and to the friends of those brave volunteers I think the government should inquire into this matter, and ascertain what truth there is in the report. It would only be just to the British officers who are concerned in the case. I hope there is no British officer who would do what has been represented in the papers of this country, and for the sake of the British officers themselves, our own officers and militia of this country, I think the government should inquire into it, and I am sure they will. Now, I am only going to detain the House for a minute or two. I find in the press the following :

The Queen's Message to Canadians.

The following was received by His Excellency the Governor General from Mr. Chamberlain this afternoon:

'Her Majesty the Queen desires you to express to people of Dominion her admiration of gallant conduct of her Canadian troops in late engagement and her sorrow at loss of so many brave men.

(Sgd.) CHAMBERLAIN.'

Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise cabled His Excellency as follows:

'Desire to express, in connection with Cronje's surrender, effected by gallant Canadian aid, my congratulations to the Canadians, and my sympathy for their losses. I am proud to have lived among them.

(Sgd.) LOUISE.'

There are many other congratulatory messages and complimentary cablegrams that I might read. Such a punishment should not be inflicted for such a frivolous offence. If we were to put ourselves in the same position as these soldiers who were tramping and marching in the boiling sun and sand of South Africa, probably without a bite to eat for days. I am doubtful if there are many in this House who would not do the same thing that that private soldier did in this case, and he ought not to receive such a punishment and torture. I know that there have been severe tortures in the old days. I have a book here setting forth the criminal law of Great Britain, where they punished people so severely and tortured them to such an extent that I refrain from reading it because it is so extreme and so unreasonable that I do not wish to apply it to this case. I would ask the government to kindly look into the matter in order to satisfy the people of this country. I am glad the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden) are here, and I am sure they will look into the matter and satisfy the people that the reports that have come to this country are not true, and that the case is not as bad as it is reported to be.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). It is difficult for me to see exactly what good purpose my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan) expects to serve by bringing this matter up in this way.

Mr. McLENNAN. I have a petition from my constituents.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. If he had notified me beforehand, I might have been able to give him some information, if there is any information in the department in reference to the matter. My hon. friend himself states that, from his knowledge of British officers, the thing to which he has referred as having appeared in the newspapers is an impossibility and that it could not have happened. If the hon. gentleman feels that way why should he have considered it necessary to give publicity to it by bringing it forward in the House of Commons, at least, until he had taken measures to ascertain whether there was any truth in the story or not. There is just one single sentence in the petition read by the hon. gentleman which I may refer to. That petition states that the volunteers who have gone out to South Africa volunteered as Canadians, and as members of the Canadian militia, and that, as I understand the petition, they were handed over and it might be implied that they were handed over against their will to the Imperial authorities for service in South Africa.

No one knows better than my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan), that the General Orders published the exact terms of enlistment under which our volunteers are now serving in South Africa. Just one word more. This is a question of discipline in the Imperial army, and I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan) would not, unless there was a very serious reason, ask this government to interfere in the slightest respect in a question of discipline within the British army.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Although the petition reads so, I did not say they were handed over to the British army. I have not the slightest interest in finding fault with the government. I believe the government is anxious to do what is right in the matter, and my object was only to make inquiry.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). Before you dispose of this question, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make one or two observations.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Order.

Mr. WALLACE. If it is necessary I shall move the adjournment of the House, but I am quite within my right in making a few remarks.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. I have told the Chair that if necessary I shall move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace), but I shall draw the attention of the House to the fact that we have been drifting away from the rules lately to some extent. Perhaps, I am to blame for allowing it to go on. There has been a tendency when a question is raised like the one now before the House, and when an answer is given across the floor, to prolong the discussion to an extent not consistent with the rules of the House. Of course we know that the adjournment of the House under such circumstances must be moved, but I would ask hon. members, unless there is some very strong reason, to confine themselves to the rules.

Mr. WALLACE. It is because there was no answer given to the question that I wish to refer to it still further. The Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), told us that he should have been given notice of this question, so that he might be prepared with an answer. Mr. Speaker, he has the report of Col. Otter on this very subject, and why has he not brought it before the House. I saw a portion of that report in the public press, but I want to know what that whole report is, and the minister should be ready to lay it on the Table of the House in view of all the circumstances. To my mind, Col. Otter should have made a very full report on such a matter as this. It seems to me an extraordinary thing that for such an offence there was a punishment of fifty-six days meted out to this volunteer. It is stated in the correspondence of the London Telegraph, that the punishment was of the character described in the petition presented here by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan). If such be the case, it is the duty of the government to make full and proper inquiry into the matter. The government cannot say: Oh, these are officers of the British army now, and they are totally out of our jurisdiction and control. The British government has never taken that position in respect to them, but has always been willing to do everything—more than our own government has been willing to do—in regard to these matters. We are entitled to have from the Minister of Militia the fullest report on this subject and it is a matter which should have at once engaged his attention, but which apparently has not, as many other things have not that he should attend to. We should know in this House whether the facts as stated by the hon. member (Mr. McLennan) are true, and if they are not true—and I hope they are not—what portion of them is true. The idea of such a punishment and such indignity being inflicted on men who were placed on half rations or no rations at all for ten and twelve days and who were simply starving! There is no crime in men taking these articles for the preservation of their lives, and I have no doubt they were ready to pay for them, and pay for them at once if they got their pay from the Canadian government as they ought to have got it as they went along. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). I wish to say one word in reference to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace). The punishment meted out to this man may be exaggerated or it may not. I do not express an opinion upon it—but it will be universally admitted that one of the greatest crimes known to military discipline is the crime of looting. If it is permitted to loot a chicken it will be next to impossible to prevent any other looting. I am not in a position to say that this punishment has been imposed, yet if it was imposed it was because of local conditions which required an example to be made, not so much to punish one individual as to have the discipline and the traditions of the British army respected by the whole corps. I do not see how any portion of the British army, whether they come from Canada or anywhere else, can be excluded from the law laid down in the Queen's regulation which universally applies to the whole army.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Notwithstanding what has been said by my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron), it was, I think, a most proper thing to bring this matter before parliament.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not deny it.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not mean to put this adversely to what fell from the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Tisdale). But, Mr. Speaker, with the history of the British army and the history of the British navy before us, nothing could be more fit than that my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) should do what he has done today. We know well that up to a recent period the punishments in the navy were so severe that nowadays it is a disgrace to humanity to look back upon them. Sir, the way these punishments were mitigated was by discussion in parliament. The consequence of the mitigation of these punishments was the humanizing of the discipline on board our battleships, and the result has been that efficient as our British navy has always been it has grown more and more in efficiency since humanity took her place side by side with discipline. So with the British army. In regard to our gallant Canadians who have gone to South Africa, and won for themselves undying renown by unparalleled valour, is it to be supposed for one minute that when such punishment is imposed upon one who is presumably a hero as well as any of the rest; is it to be supposed that it is not a fit thing to call attention to it in this parliament, and to inquire in its regard of the government? I must say here that the answer made by the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden) was most unsatisfactory. It did not satisfy the natural anxiety of the signers of that petition brought before the House by my hon. and gallant friend from Glengarry. It did not satisfy the House, and it will not satisfy the country. If, as my hon. friend from West York says, there is a report in the department from Col. Otter bearing on this very case now before the House, how are we to characterize the evasive, if I may use that expression, the unsatisfactory reply which came from the Minister of Militia?

Mr. RICHARD TYRWHITT (South Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, while I quite agree with the hon. member for West York that this House is entitled to all the information from the hon. Minister of Militia, I am not one of those who feel that civilians, in dealing with military discipline, should always be listened to. There are a number of things to be considered. We all know that officers holding high positions in the British army are humane men, and this punishment would not have been inflicted were it not merited. I have had some experience in dealing with men, and we must not rush away with the idea that every man in the Canadian contingents is a hero. There are, no doubt, among the men sent from Canada some who are troublesome and who have to be dealt with. In inflicting punishment, a man's previous character must be considered, and it may have been that the man in question was an incorrigible, who would not obey orders, and gave any amount of trouble. I have met with men in my experience who cared absolutely nothing for punishment, who would not obey the law, and who refused to be dealt with in any way. Had the law permitted me to flog them, I certainly would have done so. I think, perhaps, it is as well for us—for we are all humane, and all feel for this man's punishment—to hear the other side; and, for my part, I think that possibly the officers who have inflicted punishment have not erred on the side of mercy.

Motion (Mr. Wallace) to adjourn, negatived.

REPORTS.

Annual report of the Secretary of State.—(Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

Annual report of the Board of Civil Service Examiners.—(Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

OUTBREAK OF SMALL-POX IN WINNIPEG.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the government, and especially the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), whose department has charge of the quarantine, to an account in the Winnipeg Free Press of Saturday, April 28, of a very serious outbreak of small-pox in that city. I do not wish to be an alarmist, but as this matter has been very largely dealt with in the press, I think there is nothing that will allay the natural anxiety of the people of the country, caused by the reading of these reports, so much as a short statement from the minister as to the methods by which the department deals with such a case. I will, with the permission of the House, read what the Winnipeg Free Press says:

At a special meeting of the city council yesterday afternoon the question of small-pox quarantine was considered. At the quarantine hospital they had accommodation for only five to seven patients, while there are now fifteen cases in town.

Dr. Inglis told the story of the outbreak. On April 13, Mr. Hector Finlayson was brought to the city with what has now proved to have been a malignant type of small-pox. The physicians in attendance saw nothing to indicate the nature of the case. Some of the staff of the hospital thought the case answered to the description of a certain type of small-pox, but their ideas were laughed at. The man died on April 15, and was placed in the morgue. The small-pox incubation period is twelve to sixteen days. Twelve days afterwards, two of the nurses were taken down with a rash, and on Thursday the advice of the health department was asked. They went up and took charge of the whole hospital at once. Coming from the west on the train, a number of people had been in conversation with Mr. Finlayson and exposed to the contagion; and many of them had also developed the disease. One of these was a train boy who was selling newspapers, &c. Another was a travelling piano dealer; and another rode from Portage la Prairie in the seat opposite the sick man. These cases of infection occurred in various parts of the city, and the exposure had been absolutely unlimited. Up to the present time he had taken charge of fifteen patients, six from the hospital and nine from outside. Regarding the steps taken to stamp out the disease, it was a little too soon yet to do very much. The first thing was to try to find out the people who had been most thoroughly exposed, vaccinate and disinfect premises. They had isolated all houses where cases had occurred, had removed the patients to the pest-house, and had given instructions to prepare accommodation for twenty more cases. It looked as if the city were in for a first-class epidemic. He was afraid the exposure had been so great that the disease had got absolutely beyond control, like the Hull fire. He could not impress it too definitely on the council that they were face to face with a very serious situation. He knew of no epidemic, except that of Montreal in 1885, which had presented so serious an aspect as this on account of the exposure, and the absolute liberty with which the persons exposed had mixed with the public. A wire was received by Mr. Wood from Secretary Fagan, of the British Columbia board, yesterday afternoon to the effect that Finlayson arrived on the 'Empress of Japan' on April 5. He came from New Zealand, via Hong Kong, and was going east to consult a specialist about a kidney complaint from which he was suffering. He was fourteen days on the 'Empress' on the passage across, and three days in Vancouver. The man showed no symptoms of small-pox at the time. Finlayson's case is said to be a remarkable one, as he had no exterior eruption, but was taken with a hemorrhage before his death.

From the length of time which the original case, that of Finlayson, was exposed, and the number of people who came in contact with him, both during the trip from the coast and his confinement, there are naturally a large number of suspects, and two new cases of well known gentlemen were reported.

The first is that of Mr. O. H. Hatcher, general agent of the Deering Harvesting Company, who Thursday was taken into quarantine. Mr. Hatcher boarded the Canadian Pacific Railway eastbound express at Regina on the 11th inst., and travelled in the same sleeper with Finlayson as far as Brandon. He remained off one day at that point and came into the city on the 12th and has since that time attended to the duties of his office and made several business trips to the country. The day before yesterday he felt ill, and Dr. Hutchinson was summoned Friday. That gentleman at once recognized the disease, and Mr. Hatcher was removed to the quarantine.

Mr. Chas. H. Forrester, of the Henderson Piano Company, met Finlayson on board the train under circumstances similar to those of Mr. Hatcher, and was taken to quarantine.

A man whose name cannot be ascertained was taken off car No. 60 of the street railway yesterday, and the company at once took that car to the shops and are having it thoroughly disinfected.

Some ninety patients were discharged from the general hospital between the 12th and 26th of this month, and these have scattered to all parts of the province and the Territories, and some even into Ontario. Mr. E. M. Woods, of the provincial board of health, was busily engaged in wiring the local authorities at the different points at which the discharged patients are located that they—the patients—were exposed to infection by small-pox before being discharged from the hospital, and that they should be quarantined together with all persons in their present households.

The sleeping car on which the man Finlayson came through from the coast is the 'Tokio.' The provincial authorities have wired the British Columbia board of health informing them that the car is now at Vancouver, and asking them to detain it there until after it has been thoroughly cleansed and fumigated.

The Brandon case is now pronounced to be small-pox unmistakably, and quite secure at that. A telegram was received at the provincial office yesterday morning asking whether permission would be granted to send the patient there to the Winnipeg isolated hospital for treatment. Mr. Wood replied that this could not be done, and that Brandon would have to take care of its own cases.

The small-pox now prevalent is described by physicians as of a most infectious, malignant type of the Asiatic variety.

As I said before, I do not wish to be an alarmist, but, evidently, if this newspaper report can be relied on, there is serious danger, owing to the number of people who came in contact with this man, of the disease being distributed all over the country. Not being a medical man myself, I fail to understand how it was this man did not show the disease on arrival in British Columbia, after having been twelve or fourteen days on the steamer, and three days in Vancouver, as we are told the period of incubation is twelve or fifteen days. I am aware that we have a first-rate quarantine officer, as superintendent of quarantine, in this country, thoroughly qualified to look after such cases as we are now dealing with, and I do not rise for the purpose of making any reflections or casting any blame. But, I would ask the hon. minister to inform the House what he intends doing to ascertain exactly how the matter stands and to prevent our people being exposed to this fearful disease. I hear that in the mining camp of 'Republic,' just across the British Columbia boundary, there is a great deal of this disease, and that it has now also got into Rossland.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). In reply to my hon. friend, I would beg to say that I am aware that there is a good deal of small-pox in the adjoining camp of the republic, south of British Columbia, and I have issued instructions to our physicians to examine people coming across the frontier at different points. This, I hope, will be effective in preventing the spread of the disease. There is a good deal of the mild type of small-pox, known as ambulatory small-pox, in various parts of the United States, but the chief quarantine officer of the department, fully appreciating the nature of this disease, which is of a very mild type, hardly thought it necessary to take extreme precautions against it. To allay any public fear, however, that might prevail, the necessary precautions have been taken to watch persons coming across the border into British Columbia and Manitoba. As regards the particular case which was discovered in Winnipeg, the quarantine authorities cannot be held responsible in any way whatever. The case passed through quarantine in Victoria in the ordinary course, and the man appears to have remained in Vancouver for three days after he left the steamer, during which he showed no symptoms of the disease. He took the train eastward, and on arrival at Winnipeg was found so ill that he was taken to the hospital. The doctors there did not know that it was a case of small-pox. In fact, it was not, I think, until the man's death that they actually decided that it was a case of that disease. So little did they appreciate that the man was suffering from small-pox that they put him into the general hospital, and they allowed patients to be discharged who had been in contact with him, in the same ward, as is stated in the newspaper report which the hon. gentleman read. These patients were allowed to be scattered throughout Manitoba and into Ontario by the health officers of the city of Winnipeg. Under the circumstances, it would be entirely wrong to attribute any blame or responsibility to the quarantine officers at the port of Victoria. In the interior of this country, the provincial health boards, acting under provincial laws and appointed by the provincial authorities, have the entire control and management of the public health, and it is only in connection with the international boundary or the sea-coast that my department has any control. That control we try to exercise with the utmost vigilance, under the management of Dr. Montizambert, our chief quarantine officer, whom my hon. friend has rightly described as a most efficient officer. He has had now some thirty-five years' experience, and is one of the acknowledged authorities on quarantine laws and management on the continent of America. Under the circumstances, there is no blame to be attached to the department, and there is really nothing we can do in the matter.

As to the period of incubation of the disease, it is undoubtedly most extraordinary that a man should have been fourteen days on board the steamer and three days in Vancouver, and that some four or five days afterwards the doctors in Winnipeg, who examined him, could not tell that the disease from which he was suffering was small-pox. It seems one of those exceptions required to prove the rule that the period of incubation is sixteen days. There have been other cases in the experience of the medical fraternity in which all the rules with regard to the period of incubation were set at defiance and the disease appeared entirely out of the usual course. I cannot say anything further, except that my officer at Victoria has made me no report, because he did not find any disease at the time this man passed through his hands.

HULL AND OTTAWA FIRE.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the following resolutions adopted yesterday in Committee of the Whole be read the second time, and concurred in :

1. Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $100,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada to provide for a grant towards relief of distress caused by the recent fire in Hull and Ottawa.
2. Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $25,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada towards the rebuilding of the post office at Hull.

Motion agreed to.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 147) to grant to Her Majesty certain sums of money required to defray certain expenses for the public service for the year ending 30th June, 1900.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first and second times, and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). I would like the time of the House for a moment in order that I may direct attention to a matter which came up in a conversation with a leading banker in the town, and there are, it seems to me, some excellent points about it which I desire to lay before the government as a suggestion upon which something may be based to bring about what we talked of yesterday, an amelioration in the condition of the district which has been burned over and which will be probably rebuilt. One thing we so much deplored yesterday was the character of the buildings which stood on this district, which were built entirely without regulation, which were not fire-proof, and indeed rather invited a conflagration. I think the whole House will agree that if in some way the buildings were brought somewhere near fireproof, such a conflagration in the future would be rendered less possible, and the object entertained by the large and generous donors of money which is being sent to this city for the re-relief of the distress, would be in the best way gained. The suggestion was something like this. Suppose the large donors were to indicate a certain direction in which they would like their gifts to be expended. The large donors giving an intimation of that kind, would catch the attention of the authorities who have the disposition of the money. A large amount of money will come in, thanks to the generosity of the public all over the world, and probably a good deal more than is needed for permanent relief in respect to food and clothing, and a residue would have to be expended in some other way. The suggestion is that a trust be formed which should have placed at its disposal $200,000 we will suppose which would provide interest on a loan, that trust to borrow a million dollars, which can be borrowed at 4 per cent easily under these conditions. The purpose of the trust will be to take persons who have been householders and who propose to remain here as householders, who have lost their property, who have had no insurance, who are reputable and of good character, and to such a person as that who will put a house worth at least a certain amount of money and under conditions which should be imposed, to loan to the extent of two-thirds of the cost. Suppose a house cost $2,000, or nearly that, then you would make him a loan of two-thirds upon that. Allow that loan to go without interest for the first five years, let the trust take a mortgage upon the property, let it be a condition of that loan that the amount should be paid back in ten different instalments extending over ten years. After the first five years have passed without interest, then for the remaining five years let the person pay on the money loaned, or what remains of it, at the same rate as the trust borrowed, say at 4 per cent. These are the general outlines of the plan. If that could be done then with that million dollars you would secure without any cost outside the cost of administration, at least one thousand homes in the district which has been burned out, where the buildings would be put up according to regulations and under fireproof conditions. One thousand homes made certain in that way to deserving persons, and to those who are or who intend to be residents, would work a revolution in that district. One of the first results would be that the city would feel obliged by the very force of this arrangement to insist also that conditions approaching fireproof should hold over the district which is built up, at least over a certain prescribed area of that district. Now, so far as this government is concerned, I believe the government could not devote the amount of money it has donated to the fund in any better way, and considering that the seat of government is in this city where these insecure conditions have prevailed in the past, it is not an unreasonable thing for the government to insist upon its donation being applied in that way. Nothing could be better for the city of Ottawa than to divert its donation in the same way. It would be for the permanence of the city, and for the best service of those who have suffered. I am certain some of the large banks who have been donors would indicate that they would like their subscriptions to be applied in the same way. It would not be difficult to make a condition that the $200,000 given by this government and the city should be used in the line that I have suggested. There may be points about this which could be criticised; still I think the suggestion might lay the foundation of a plan which would bring about a condition of permanence. People have given heartily at this time, but you may take it as certain that the fountains of generosity will not be aided if their generosity is distributed and the same old conditions are allowed to remain. You cannot repeat that unless you take care to guard against a like conflagration in the future. This suggestion is not original with me, it is the suggestion of a banker and business man residing in this city, and I lay it before the House for its consideration.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). One point occurs to me which I would like to draw to the attention of the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) to that is a question as to how we could obviate a certain difficulty that would be found to confront those who attempted to put into operation the regulations that he proposes. I understand that the houses in the city of Hull, are built largely upon leased ground, and that this fact accounts for the flimsy and inflammable character of the buildings that were constructed and that fell a prey to the flames. I would ask the hon. gentleman how he would obviate that difficulty. In this case it strikes me that it would be rather impracticable to attempt to secure the erection, upon that territory, held under that tenure, fire-proof buildings of a costly character, such buildings would hardly be erected for the use of common labourers. Under the system of industry that prevails in Ottawa, with large industrial establishments, and with thousands of people employed in these establishments, who are receiving moderate wages and who must necessarily live in humble and cheap homes, it is a question as to whether the proposition put forth by the hon. gentleman, though so meritorious in itself and so desirable, is in any degree a practicable one. I would like his opinion as to the point I raised in regard to the difficulty that exists in the matter of the tenure by which the land is held in Hull. Parties cannot obtain the fee simple, and they would be little disposed to the erection of good buildings on land where the title is of the character that I have referred to.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not prepared to discuss the details at this moment. No plan can be suggested at all which will not be surrounded by difficulties. But, is there not in that the basis of a plan which may be practically worked out where the land is not leased land. Maybe in placing the figure at $2,000 I placed it at too large a sum for that class of house. But, the figure can be made a more reasonable one, which would take in that large class of people who are deserving and to whom this relief may very properly be directed. The object is to work out some system and to give a proportionate loan under it. It may be possible that the leased lands are in the hands of public-spirited citizens who are in accord with a plan like this instead of putting difficulties in its way, and, therefore, a good deal of trouble may be avoided.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it would be utterly impracticable to work out any scheme under the authority of this House. The first need is food and clothing, which must be attended to at once, and those wants will be supplied out of the fund that comes from every portion of the country, as well as the fund supplied by this House. I do not think it would be in consonance with the wish and desire of the people in all parts of the country who have contributed that you should set apart any portion of the fund for any specific purpose beyond that of supplying food and raiment to the people. Then, it would be bringing the action of this House into conflict with the local authorities, because this is a matter of municipal authority under the control of the municipality. It is true that we might give this money under certain conditions, and say that if it is not applied in that way we will not give the money, but, it would be inhuman to do such a thing. I think that the suggestions which are thrown out by this parliament may be, and ought to be, taken up by the municipal governments of the municipalities of Ottawa and Hull. In that way I have no doubt the proposed principle would be carried out to a very large extent. But, I do not think it would be possible to surround the gift of this parliament with a condition that would be onerous to carry out. I do not think it would be satisfactory if the committee who are entrusted with the distribution of this fund were to say: We will arbitrarily set apart a portion of the fund for any other purpose than supplying food, raiment and shelter to those who want them so much at the present time.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). Mr. Speaker, I think the suggestion thrown out by the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) is one that we should consider. It seems to me that this is the right time and place to throw out such suggestions. We cannot go into the details now, but, really, it seems that some means should be taken to get the concrete sanity of the community at work in the rebuilding of this district. It is not only Hull and Ottawa that are concerned, because, after all, this is federal Ottawa, and Canada is concerned in this matter. If anything can be done, it seems to me that now is the right time to see whether we cannot have federal government around this city. The parliament buildings are a large stake; every citizen of Canada looks with great pride to Ottawa, we are building up a large country, and it seems to me that this is the right time to give attention to the building up of Ottawa. It strikes me as being extraordinary, that with all the wealth and prosperity displayed in the industries carried on around those falls, the workmen who are employed in them should live in little hutches on both the sides of the river. I think that something should be done to obviate this in future. As far as the suggestion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is concerned, that the government or a committee, or somebody shall raise a million dollars and let it out, and have no interest paid, is a feasible one, and it is one which could very well be adopted, not only in the case of fires and calamities, but at all times. I think the government should take some action to see that the people are properly housed.

Mr. E. B. OSLER (West Toronto). Mr. Speaker, the suggestion thrown out by the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) contains many difficulties, but it is one well worthy of the attention of this House. If some such scheme is not adopted there is no doubt that the city of Hull will be rebuilt in exactly the same manner as it was before the fire, and another fire will be a mere matter of time. It is a difficult scheme, but it is one very well worth the attention of the government and of this House, and I believe that if the government would name a committee to inquire into it and to see if there are not some means of carrying out a plan something in the shape of a trust, good would be done. I think my hon. friend's figures as to the cost of a house, $2,000, is far too high—for a house that should be taken hold of by such a trust as this. I think if a trust were created there would be no practical difficulty in carrying out the scheme if it were placed in the hands of men earnestly interested in carrying it out, and I think $1,000,000 would be very well and very safely expended, and Hull would be made a city that would be worthy of being a suburb of Ottawa. If this is not done, and this money is expended by haphazard, Hull will simply be rebuilt, to a great extent, with wooden houses, and it will only be a matter of time before it will be burned down again. Fire-proof houses can be built for workmen for under $1,000 now, and if they are properly directed, the workingmen of Hull can rebuild their houses, and Hull will be practically fire-proof.

Mr. N. A. BELCOURT (Ottawa). This is a subject in which I naturally take a very deep interest. The suggestion that has been made by the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) has, no doubt, some very good elements in it. The difficulties, as pointed out by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), are not so serious as one would think at first sight. I am familiar with the land tenure in Hull, and I know that only a certain limited number of lands are held in the way which has been indicated by the hon. gentleman. The leases spoken of are for long terms. A great many of these leases are for ninety-nine years, and they are practically perpetual. Some are perpetual, and some are for ninety-nine years, so that the difficulty which has been pointed out by the hon. member for North Norfolk is not really a serious one. Again, I say that the suggestion made by the hon. ex-Minister of Finance is a very good one. But, I cannot agree with the limitation which my hon. friend wishes to add to the fund coming from the government. This parliament has contributed $100,000, the city of Ottawa has contributed $100,000, the Ontario government $25,000, the Quebec government will probably contribute $25,000, the city of Toronto has contributed $25,000, and subscriptions are coming in from all over. I do not think we could very well impose a condition that other donors are not imposing. I think this parliament ought to be satisfied with the composition of the committee of citizens which has this matter in hand. I know from personal experience and knowledge that every man on that committee is very deeply impressed with the views of the hon. ex-Minister of Finance. I know they are very anxious that means should be devised to provide for the better safety of the city; for its reconstruction on a more permanent basis and with fire-proof buildings. I have every reason to believe that these matters will be very seriously considered by that committee, and the suggestions thrown out will no doubt receive their early and serious consideration. For my part, I think the matter might well be left in the hands of that committee, and if the committee deems it advisable it may constitute itself into a trust as suggested, and if necessary apply these funds, or a portion of these funds, in the building of homes for the people. It seems to me that it would be unwise for parliament to attach any limitation to the grant in question, but that they should leave it to the influential and respectable body of gentlemen who form that committee to deal entirely with the matter. This committee is composed not only of gentlemen from Ottawa, but of gentlemen from Hull as well. I repeat that the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from York, N. B., (Mr. Foster) will no doubt receive from that committee the most earnest attention.

Mr. OSLER.

Mr. FOSTER. I would not like the idea to go out that I was interfering with the work of the committee, which, so far as I know, is a very excellent one. I would not like any impression to be created that I had any feeling that the committee were not quite able to do their work. My suggestion was on the idea of making this a permanent help. Suppose that scheme were adopted by the committee, then the committee would have to put itself into a permanent position to carry it out. I do not mean that parliament should take charge of that at all, but in order to carry out that trust extending over ten years or may be longer, the committee would have to form itself into a corporation for that purpose. My idea was not to take it out of the hands of the very excellent committee which has been appointed. With regard to the other objection, that this is all for food or clothing; why, it is absolutely impossible to use the money for these purposes. Unless you are going to store up food and clothes for years to come, thanks to the generosity of the public, there is plenty for immediate necessities, and a large residue will be left for permanent help in some form or other.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BELCOURT. The committee is well impressed with that idea. After proper food and shelter have been provided, they are impressed with the necessity of applying the balance in some permanent way.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). I wish to make one observation, and I make it with very great diffidence, in regard to this matter. While all of us believe that a most admirable committee is in existence, and that they will do their duty thoroughly according to their lights in the matter, I do think—speaking with the greatest possible confidence and in the presence of lawyers—that this parliament is the custodian of the national welfare. I do think that this parliament is the custodian here of our national treasures, and this parliament has surely the right to see to the protection of these national treasures. It seems to me that this is not a local question but a question which affects the whole Dominion. The library here is a Dominion treasure under the guardianship of this parliament, and I think that we as a parliament have the right to bring some pressure to bear upon the authorities so as to ensure that these our national treasures are not in any way endangered.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am far from saying that there is not merit in the suggestion which has been made by my hon. friend from York, N.B., (Mr. Foster). On the contrary, there is a good deal to be said in favour of the view he has taken, but in so far as this parliament in concerned we discharge our full duty when we place the bounty of the country in the hands of the committee appointed to look after the interests of the sufferers. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has placed before the House a very valuable suggestion, and I may say that I have received several other suggestions, some in this direction and some in other directions, all having merit in them. However, after considering the matter thoroughly, we thought, as far as the government was concerned, the best thing we could do would be simply to place the money in the hands of the committee to do what they think best with it. It may be that the committee will be influenced by the views of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) as to how the money should be appropriated. My hon. friend is quite right that there is more money than is necessary to supply the immediate wants of the people. Whether the money should be given as a gift, or whether it should be loaned, is a matter upon which I have no opinion at this moment. In the city of Quebec there was a trust appointed after a similar disaster to this, but I do not know that the experience there was such as to commend it for repetition. I believe I voice the sentiment of hon. gentlemen in saying, that it is well that the matter should be discussed here and discussed in the press, so that no hasty judgment should be formed. The committee have ample time to consider the matter, and I have no doubt that they will arrive at the best conclusion that can be arrived at in the circumstances. If the committee find it in their way to provide for buildings of a permanent character it would be all the better, but I would point out that this question as regards Hull, or indeed, as regards Ottawa, is not free from difficulties. The city of Hull was built largely of wood, but we all know that houses built of stone are little less free from destruction. The stone in this vicinity is a limestone and is hardly more resisting to the action of heat than is wood. I know the house of a friend of mine in Hull, which was a stone building, and had all the appearance of being fire-proof—

Mr. BELCOURT. And the court-house.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, the court-house crumbled to dust.

Mr. FOSTER. Intense heat will do that.

The PRIME MINISTER. I merely point out that the matter is not free from difficulty, and at the present time all that we can do is to vote the money to be entrusted to the committee.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). I understand this is a Supply Bill and that the money goes to the government to be used in part if necessary for the help of these sufferers by the fire. In common with all others I have every confidence in the committee, but I do see a great deal of force in the suggestion made by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster). It seems to me that there is ample money at present to provide for the urgent and immediate needs of the people; and that when that is done, for the present it is all the government is required to do. When some scheme is thought out in reference to the disposition of the larger part of this money it will be time enough for us to consider that question. If permanent good is to be accomplished, a corporation must be created to administer the trust and when that trust is appointed it will be quite time for the government to act in regard to the protection that is to be given to the public, and in regard to what class of buildings shall be erected. I assume that fire limits will be established in Hull, as has been done in Ottawa and that only the prescribed class of buildings shall be erected within these fire limits. All this is for the future, and while we are voting this money I think we all believe it would be wiser on the part of the government not to hand over the entire of the $100,000 to the committee, until the suggestions which have been made are more fully considered as to the future application of this grant.

Bill reported.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. J. V. ELLIS (St. John). As I was in the Chair of the committee, I would like to make one observation. With regard to the expenditure of the relief fund, I think it would be wise for the gentlemen who have it in charge to apply it immediately as far as possible for the purpose for which it is intended. In the city of St. John, we have now a relief organization which has been in existence twenty-three years. I am a member of the organization, though I take no part in its administration. My judgment is—and I think it is the judgment of a large number of the citizens—that it would have been better to have disposed of the whole fund as at as early a day as possible—not in an absolute hurry, but not to continue the management and control of such a fund for a long period of time. In the first place, it excites jealousies and cupidity, and gives an opportunity for the exercise of some of the less noble qualities in the human mind. Then, the main object of the giver is at the earliest possible moment to replace what has been lost; and so long as that can be done in a reasonable and fair way, it is better than to have people depending for a great many years on the committee for sustenance and support. I am not speaking to the House so much as to the country, and especially to the gentlemen who have the management of this fund. Of course, we must all desire that better buildings shall take the place of those that have been destroyed. This is a matter for arrangement between the committee and the municipalities. But, I do trust that those who have the funds in charge will not continue their organization for a long period.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). If the suggestions which have emanated from the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), could be crystallized into some definite form, I think they would accomplish what the hon. gentleman desires. There are valuable germs in those suggestions, and the presentation of them does not of necessity involve any lack of confidence in the philanthropy or the business ability of the committee appointed to take charge of this fund. It seems to me that the opportunity should be taken advantage of, as he has suggested, to distribute, either as a gift or at a low rate of interest for a number of years, a small percentage of the cost of reconstructing the buildings of the operatives who have been deprived of their homes. I think no better way could be found of applying the money. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat that this money should be distributed as expeditiously as it can be wisely distributed, and that the relief committee should not continue to exist for ten or twenty years; for no matter how carefully its business may be carried on, abuses are likely to creep in.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty, and the motion of Sir Charles Tupper in amendment thereto.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, I presume that it is not likely that anything very new can be said in reference to the budget, which has been discussed now at considerable length and from almost every conceivable standpoint. Even those who have had the pleasure and advantage of being present in parliament have perhaps failed to arrive at any very decided opinion as to the result of the debate, and I presume that even worse is the case of the citizens of Canada who are deriving such information as they can from the reports of the speeches of the several members who have addressed themselves to the consideration of the subject. I must confess that so far as I am myself concerned, I would feel somewhat at a loss to know exactly what conclusion to arrive at, if I had not made an independent study of the question, so contradictory and so opposite have been the statements made by members of the government and hon. gentlemen supporting them and members on this side of the House.

Mr. ELJIS.

One remark made about the budget speech of the Finance Minister, by the Minister of Customs, struck me as somewhat remarkable. I am, of course, well aware of the merits and ability of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), having known him in public life a long time, and I am naturally gratified, as a fellow-citizen of his in the province of Nova Scotia, to find that his abilities are appreciated. I, therefore, can relish the very high compliment paid to him by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, when he said that the budget speech was the best he had ever heard in the course of his parliamentary experience of twenty-seven years; but when I heard that remark, I could not help recalling the circumstance that my hon. friend, the Minister of Customs, has had the opportunity of hearing in this House nearly all the great financiers who have presided over the Department of Finance of Canada, since confederation, and consequently must have heard the budget speeches which were delivered, during the administration of the late Mr. Mackenzie, by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who at one time was looked upon as the most likely candidate for the position of Finance Minister in this administration. And when my hon. friend, the Minister of Customs, in the plenitude of his parliamentary experience, assured this House that the budget speech delivered by our present Finance Minister was not only an able speech, but the best he had heard in twenty-seven years, I felt that this government had not made a mistake in passing over the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), in favour of the minister who now controls our finances. But, when I returned to the speech of the Finance Minister, and read it, as it appeared in cold print, with my appetite stimulated by that very strong expression of praise from the Minister of Customs, I was somewhat disappointed. It was, no doubt, an excellent delivery, but that it was a model budget speech, and still more, that it was the ablest statement ever made by any Canadian Finance Minister, on the financial position of Canada, and the course and development of our trade, I am not at all prepared to admit. Despite the very flattering eulogium of the Minister of Customs, I find some things lacking in that speech. I find that it is open to the criticism of being unfair, if not an absolutely dishonest exposure of the financial condition of Canada to-day, as compared with that condition during the period when the Liberal-Conservative administration was in power. In the portion of his speech in which the Minister of Finance contrasts the position of Canada to-day with its position in 1896, which was the last year of the late Liberal-Conservative administration, I think his conclusions were not at all warranted by the facts. Of course the figures he gave are very startling. There can be no question whatever that there has been an enormous expansion in the trade of Canada. Undoubtedly the total trade of the country in 1899, and the trade predicted in 1900, as contrasted with our total trade in 1896, show an enormous increase, and in that increase and expansion we rejoice. On this side, we enjoy this great advantage that we do not at all feel under the obligation of decrying or endeavouring to belittle our country. There was a time when the opposition seemed to feel that it was their bounden duty to minimize, as much as they could, every statement made concerning the prosperity of the country from the government benches. Some of their ablest authorities, such as the Hon. Mr. Blake, and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, wasted all their ability, eloquence and skill in endeavouring to minimize the statements made from the government side, and to show that these statements regarding the prosperity of our country were absolutely fallacious. That was the role which these gentlemen assumed, and that is a role which we, who have succeeded them in opposition, do not feel the slightest inclination to take up. We are to-day as highly pleased with the position in which Canada stands financially, as any member upon the government side can possibly be, but we contend that the credit is not due to the present administration, but to the fact that during that long period of constructive statesmanship, which extended from 1867 to 1896, with the sole exception of the years from 1873 to 1879, the destinies of Canada were in the hands of a party which gave to the administration of this country men who were capable of conducting its business in such a manner as to lay the foundation of permanent prosperity. They set the tide of prosperity flowing broad and deep, so that no temporary obstruction, caused by the change of office to another set of men, could possibly interfere with the flow of that current. We do not agree with the Minister of Finance and his supporters in attributing the great prosperity which prevails to-day, to the accession of these gentlemen to office. We attribute that prosperity to the fact that Canada has been on the whole well governed from the hour it took its place among the nations of the world as a new Dominion, down to the present. We attribute it to the fact that that policy, which was inaugurated in 1879, by the Liberal-Conservative party, was a policy calculated to set this country firmly upon its feet, and that that policy has been continued down to the present. To-day we are reaping the benefit of that policy. To-day we have arrived at that period of expansion, which, in the fullness of time, it was bound to produce, and which has realized that enormous increase in the business of the country which it is the good fortune of the present government to have occur during their regime. I go further. I say that this prosperity is due, not to anything the present government has done, but to the things it has left undone. It is due to the fact that these hon. gentlemen have wisely made up their minds not to be bound by their utterances when in opposition, not to be bound by the platform which they made public in their convention at Ottawa, but on the contrary, to profit by the lessons taught them by the representatives of our industries who came before them when they held that commission of inquiry, after they came into power, and decided to let matters stand as they were. It is due to their decision, wisely taken, not to interfere with the protective policy inaugurated by their predecessors, but to go on administering our affairs after the example set for them by the various Conservative administrations which held office during the many years when these gentlemen were in opposition. Therefore to that extent, to the extent that they are not positively hurtful to the country, I think they are entitled to a certain amount of credit. They might have done a great deal of harm. All that was necessary that they should have done enormous harm was that they should have been consistent, that they should have honestly endeavoured to put in force when they had the opportunity, those things that they taught, those things that they professed as their belief. I say they deserve a great deal of credit for the fact that they preferred to assume the odium and to a certain extent to sink under the reputation of being men who are insincere, who were willing to make any kind of plea, who were willing to make any kind of pledge, to hold out any kind of promise to the discontented and the dissatisfied of the country. I say the fact that they are willing to rest under the onus, under the odium of being men who are prepared to swallow their statements, to falsify their statements—which is certainly better for the country—shows that they were prepared to assume that position rather than to make their words good, and in which case I think there can be no question they would have hurt Canada. The proof of that is evident.

There can be no doubt at all that to-day we are prosperous, that our country is enjoying extraordinary prosperity, which is the greatest in some respects that we have ever seen. Still, it is a prosperity that has come to us just in the regular course of affairs, without an interruption in the policy of the country. Following naturally upon a period of depression, we have this period of expansion; and as the government has done nothing at all to change or to interfere with the policy of the late administration, therefore, it seems to me perfectly plain that this state of affairs that has come about is the natural result of the fact that these gentlemen have not interfered, have not changed anything. Now, can we believe for a moment that if the opposite were true, if these gentlemen had changed the policy of Canada, had adopted any one of the doctrines they promulgated when they were in opposition, we would not have had an entirely different condition of affairs from that in which we stand to-day? It is rational to suppose that if the country is moving along satisfactorily and securely under the same policy that has prevailed since 1879, and if the opposite were the case, and if that system were overthrown, we would not to-day be realizing to the same extent that great condition of prosperity in which it is my pleasure and my pride to know that Canada to-day is placed.

Now, there are a great many hazardous statements made in the course of speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite. An enormous amount of time and labour has been expended by the various speakers in collecting figures, in calculating averages; but the result of the whole thing is to show that practically no change has been made in the fiscal system of Canada. That is the result of all the study that is bestowed upon that question. The average rate of duty collected, the average rate of taxation, the average rate of duty paid, whether it be upon the total imports of Canada to-day or upon the dutiable imports of Canada to-day, shows that practically no change has occurred. I do not think it is wise to deal too much with these complicated figures, because I believe that they are perplexing not only to the House but to the country; it is to place upon the pages of Hansard a great many things which will not be read. But take the fact that the percentage of duties on British goods collected to-day is 30 per cent inclusive of the preference—it is about that. I am not giving the exact percentage, but we will say it is 30 per cent inclusive of the preference—how much does that differ from the percentage that obtained when the Conservatives were in power? Scarcely any at all. Practically the tariff of to-day is the tariff of 1894. Some small changes have been made, on some items the rates have been raised and on some others the rates have been lowered, but leaving out of sight the preferential, or reciprocal tariff as it was called in the early days, I say that the tariff of to-day is the same as the tariff of 1894.

Now, perhaps some of those gentlemen opposite who try to a certain extent to maintain some kind of claim to sincerity in the utterances they gave vent to so freely when they were in opposition, will endeavour to say that this is not the case. I have been amused to hear in this House assertions made from time to time, and they are occasionally made in high quarters, that this government is to-day moving towards a revenue tariff. That assertion has been made, I think, by no less a person than the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). Now, what is there in all the course of the present government to justify the statement that this government is moving towards a revenue tariff? Nothing at all that I know of. When the question was explicitly asked across the House as to where any great change in the tariff had been made the answer given by the Minister of Finance, himself no mean authority on this matter, the highest authority in the House, was that it was found in the preferential tariff to England. That was the only point to which he could refer. He specified that, he laid stress upon that as a proof of the fact that they were travelling towards a revenue tariff.

Now, Sir, I hold, and I think I can maintain successfully, that the very existence of that preference clause is a proof that this country is not moving towards a revenue tariff. Just as I maintain that no country can satisfactorily make reciprocal arrangements with another country or have a reciprocity treaty with another country, unless it has a tariff which permits of some concession being made, unless it has to some extent a protective system, so I maintain that, far from this later concession by the preference being a proof that this country is moving towards a revenue tariff, or is departing from a policy of protection, I maintain that very circumstance, the fact that this government does extend to England a reduction of one-fourth or one-third of the duties, is a proof that they are maintaining a protective tariff. Otherwise what concession have they to make to England or to any other country? These tariffs when maintained, as Lord Salisbury said in the course of one of his speeches, are the basis upon which we can carry on negotiations with other countries, they furnish us with matters upon which we can make concessions when the time comes; we can concede a certain portion of those duties, and in return for them we can obtain concessions from the other party. But if we abandon these duties we have nothing to concede. Therefore, I maintain that the very fact that this government made such a concession, and laid stress upon it, and took great credit to itself for making this concession to the mother country, shows to my mind in the most conclusive manner that this government is not at all disposed to move towards a revenue tariff, and is entirely averse to any system of free trade. While the government would naturally, under these circumstances, endeavour to satisfy some of its supporters, still to make the assertion that they are a free trade party, that they are a revenue tariff party, that they are not a protectionist party, is something that passes my understanding. I maintain that so far as their acts are concerned, so far as their legislation is concerned, so far as the whole tendency of their conduct is concerned, they are now a protectionist party.

Now, I do not think it is right for this government to make the concession that is made to-day to the people of England in the matter of increasing the preferential tariff. I think it is an objectionable thing in a great many ways. In the first place, I am not at all in favour of a preference being given to England, even to the extent of 12½ per cent. I do not think it is a proper course for the government to pursue. It would be entirely proper, I think, for this government, maintaining as it does a protective system, maintaining a fair tariff, calculated to protect the interests of Canada, to make such concessions to any country from which they could receive concessions in return. I think that it is their duty to use the position they hold in order to purchase concessions in return. To make concessions for which no concessions are received is, to my mind, on the part of the government that is protecting the interests of Canada as is has protected the interests of Canada for the most part, with certain exceptions, an unfair thing and one that will bring condemnation upon them. It strikes me that the lesson that the government learned through their tariff commission, appointed previous to the session of 1897, was that the great mass of the people were in favour of protection, and that no government could stand securely in Canada that is not in favour of protection, that is not prepared to carry out that policy of protection which was carried out by the Conservative party. By increasing the preference which has been extended to England without any return whatever the government is guilty of a breach of faith with the manufacturing interests of Canada that will bring condemnation upon them. There is, to my mind, a certain amount of unfairness in its course. It must be remembered, that not only has this government adopted a tariff which is practically a protectionist tariff, but assurances have been given to the people of Canada and the manufacturers of Canada that that system would be maintained. We can all remember the speech delivered by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), whose death I regret very much, in which he declared, speaking apparently with considerable authority, that a tariff adopted by the government was adopted with the view not of injuring any Canadian interest, but of protecting it, and he gave the assurance from his place in the House to the members of the House and to the people of Canada that that system would not be interfered with. I think, if I am not mistaken, that he said that the tariff would stand practically unchanged as it was then for ten years. The session before last the hon. gentleman occupying the still higher position of Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton).

speaking, if I am not mistaken at the town of Perth, Ontario, made the statement explicitly that this issue was now a dead issue. He said that all parties were agreed that protection was no longer an issue between the parties, that the government and the opposition were agreed to look upon the system of protection as it had been established in Canada as one not to be disturbed. That being the case it seems to me that nothing could be plainer than the fact, that, in this extraordinary concession which the government has made to some interests, or some fancied sentiment by extending this preference from 25 per cent to 33½ per cent, they are guilty of a breach of faith, and they are guilty of an act of wrong doing. There is only one view in which, to my mind, that preference can be at all condoned. I will not say justified—but condoned, and it is in the view that up to this time it has been practically inoperative. It must be borne in mind that there are always a great many articles in regard to which the British producer would have an advantage in Canada. There has been great activity in the markets of the world, particularly during the last few years. There has been a great increase of business, and it is well known that the manufacturers are oppressed with orders. In probably every department of activity it is well known that there is a tremendous demand for the products of manufacturers, that manufacturers are oppressed with orders, and therefore, it may be well understood that any evil effects that this preference may have, so far as the Canadian manufacturer is concerned, will correspond with any good effects that the British manufacturer may derive from it, which will not be realized during such a period as I have described. But, we are coming to a time, and we are not far from it—the signs are in the air—in which we are going to have a period of depression. We are coming to a period when the purchasing power of the people will be reduced. This will reduce production, and the manufacturers, instead of being oppressed with orders, will be looking for orders and will not succeed in getting them. We are coming to a period of depression in the business world in which the Canadian manufacturer will require all the advantage which the protective system of Canada can give to him to enable him to compete against the enormous organized interests and the enormous money power of a country where interest is not more than half what it is in Canada. The time is coming when the Canadian manufacturer will really feel where the British preference is going to hurt him. I have no question in my mind that it is going to hurt him. I think it is an impossibility that a system that was established, not by haphazard, but which was carefully entered into in 1879, which was adjusted year after year, and always with the view of assisting the consumer, because we never had a high protectionist tariff in Canada excepting in one or two items, can be disturbed without injury to our manufacturers. Throughout all the period of the national policy there was a strong sentiment in Canada, strongly voiced in the House of Commons by the opposition of that day, in favour of the consumer and the protection in Canada was pared down year after year and session after session to the quick, to the bare living point. We have never had an extreme protectionist system in Canada. We had a bare living system, and I maintain that the time is not far distant when we will have a period of depression. I am sorry to say it, but we must look at it as we look at the changes of the season. Just as sure as winter follows summer so sure will we have the period of depression which will change the conditions under which we are now living. That being the case what reason was there why the government should give this preference to Great Britain? I think, perhaps, if sentiment were to rule in these matters, we might all be more or less disposed to say: Let us show our good-will to the mother country. But, I think if we were all asked in what way we would show our good-will, I think that not one in a hundred, if left to himself, would have suggested the idea of showing our good-will by such an act as giving a preference under our tariff. It is not an act of kindness extended to the whole people of Great Britain. It is, on the other hand, an act of favour extended to one particular class of the British people which has not been favourable to us. It is a favour extended to the Little Englander, to the man who thinks that England is all and all and that the colonies are merely encumbrances on the empire. Why would it not have been just as easy, more kindly, more beneficial and more in consonance with the wishes of the people of Great Britain, instead of giving this concession away, to maintain our tariff for the protection of our own manufacturers, and to have given bounties on breadstuffs, animals and other agricultural products exported to England by the farmers of Canada, thereby helping our own farmers and bringing the effect of Canada's beneficence to the door of every man in the mother country? You can conceive the enormous advantage that would have resulted, and as my hon. friend from Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), says, it would have built up the North-west Territories. You can conceive of numerous ways in which this government might have shown its kindness, attachment and affection to the mother country much more deeply and in a much less objectionable manner than the one adopted by the government. I maintain that we may assume fairly in the future that of the different questions that are, to a certain extent at issue between the two parties, this is the particular issue upon which the government has chosen to fight its battle at the next general election with the opposition. I think this is not an unfair assumption. The only way at all in which the tariff brought down by hon. gentlemen opposite in 1897 gave any pretense to have any features of originality differing from the tariff of their predecessors was in regard to this preferential clause.

Mr. BELL (Pictou).

Mr. MONTAGUE. There were two.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Yes, but the only Liberal ear-mark on the tariff of 1897 was this preference. It struck the House when the Finance Minister was dealing with the general tariff, that his tariff was practically the old Tory tariff, and that the few changes made, some in the direction of increasing, and some in the direction of lowering duties, were not in point of fact, changing the tariff at all. When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), was speaking, the suggestion was made to us on this side of the House: Wait a moment; there is something coming that will change the appearance of this tariff, and eventually it came, and when it did come, we found it was this particular preference to Great Britain. At that stage, however, it was not a preference particular to Great Britain. I believe it was intended that it should be, because I remember that the Minister of Finance declared, with fine eloquence and uplifting of spirit, that in the morning, after he made his speech, every custom-house in Canada would be opened to the goods of Great Britain on more favourable terms than to the goods of any other country. However, in that, as in many other things, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), was making a very great mistake. The result proved that, the mature wisdom which guides the gentleman who leads the opposition, pointed out the true state of the case. It was seen in the sober and statesmanlike view of the case taken by Sir Charles Tupper, that this was but a pretended preference to Great Britain, and he did not hesitate to point that out to the Minister of Finance. The mature wisdom of that statesman (Sir Charles Tupper) of whom Canada is so proud, recognized that this promise of the Finance Minister, was as illusory as it possibly could be. The respected leader of the opposition there and then predicted that it would fail to carry out the promise which the Finance Minister made for it, but would, on the other hand, involve this country into admitting free of duty the products of several other countries that were maintaining high protective tariffs against Canada. The result justified to the letter the assertion made from this side of the House, by the leader of the opposition, and in the end, the reciprocal tariff of 1897, became the preference tariff of 1898.

Mr. WALLACE. There was no preference tariff in 1898.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) My hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace), objects that there was no preference tariff in 1898. I am perfectly prepared to admit that the results show that this preference is to a certain extent as illusory as was the preference of 1897, because what had been expected to be realized from the operation of this tariff has not been realized. Our trade from Great Britain has increased, it is true, but not in proportion to that of other countries. Perhaps the best thing about the preference tariff is that it has not had the effect that was anticipated for it by the members of the government. For that we on this side of the House have reason to be thankful. If it had had all the effects promised for it by gentlemen opposite, then, I believe, we would be suffering to-day in Canada from the operation of that tariff. It is a fact that the trade of Belgium, the trade of France, the trade of Germany, and the trade of other countries at which this particular tariff was apparently aimed; it is a fact that our trade with these countries has increased much more largely than has the trade of Great Britain; the very country for whose benefit it was avowedly established and is now maintained. That, of course, is, I presume, a source of deep regret to the hon. gentlemen who originated this tariff, because, I think, we are fair in admitting that when they did introduce this departure in tariff-making—and it is a departure and a novel idea—they did expect it to have some effect. I have heard it said that the birth of this tariff scheme might be dated so far back as some time previous to the year 1873 or 1874. I have heard it said that it had its birth in the brain of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and that if he had not been disappointed in introducing to the House the protectionist tariff which he had ready at his desk, Canada might, so early as 1873 or 1874, have had that preference tariff. However, that is merely a matter of speculation. It is one of these interesting things that will come to light when the historian writes in full detail, and with the maturity of knowledge which is only acquired by the lapse of time, the history of our Canadian governments and of our great men during the latter part of the nineteenth century. We may assume that it must have been expected by the government that some result would flow from this preferential tariff. The fact remains that as the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), has said, that there is no sign of a preference to be found in our trade returns. Sir, this fact removes from the government, and takes out of the mouth of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), that answer which the other day he gave to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace), when he pointed to this preferential tariff as a step in the direction of revenue tariff and of free trade. That argument of the government being removed, what is there left? The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing left, and to-day, we see that the government are obliged to fall back on the statement of policy announced by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), when he said in Perth, that the tariff was not an issue, that both parties were agreed on it, and that the policy of the government of Canada was the policy of protection to native industries. Therefore, what this government should have done now—because their hour of grace is fast passing away—what the government should have done was to have remedied the mischief that is possible under that preference. They should have abolished it in the year 1900 instead of increasing it. That they have increased it shows apparently that they are going to the country on that issue. It is hard to conceive that so able and intelligent a gentleman as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), should have been set up at an inopportune moment in the most extraordinary manner to raise this issue in the House, to provoke a vote upon it, to set the two parties in array on one side and the other, it is improbable that that should have taken place if it was not the deliberate design that the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), as spokesman for the government, was deliberately laying down the lines upon which the battle at the next general election should be fought, and that the government were staking their existence on this particular feature of the tariff, which, as I have said, is the only distinctive thing about it. Sir, I hope that we may have no better battle ground than that on which to go to the country at the next elections. The motto of the Conservative party is: Protection for our native industries; no sentiment in the matter; love to the mother country, sacrifice of every man and every dollar, if the time comes when the empire is in danger; but, that in the conduct of our affairs, we should follow the example of the mother country, and show that we regard the interests of Canada as paramount, and not to be safely interfered with. The motto of the Conservative party, Sir, is to put Canada first of all, in order that Canada may be a great, strong power, that can stand worthily beside the mother country in the next world-war, in which Great Britain may be engaged.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 54) respecting the Ontario Mutual Life Assurance Company, and to change its name to 'The Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada.'—(Mr. Britton.)

Bill (No. 92) to incorporate the Royal Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. Penny.)

Bill (No. 98) respecting the Yarmouth Steamship Company (Limited).—(Mr. Penny.)

Bill (No. 130) respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.—(Mr. Edwards.)

Bill (No. 136) respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company.—(Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (No. 75) to incorporate the Quebec Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Bernier.)

Bill (No. 71) respecting the Dominion Cotton Mills Company.—(Mr. Quinn.)

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 116) to incorporate the Acadia Mortgage Company.—(Mr. Russell.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). At six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was referring to some features of the tariff as they are affected by the preferential clause. There are some things in the budget speech which require more particular attention. Perhaps the point on which the government seems to lay the most stress as establishing its claim to credit for bringing the affairs of Canada into a good condition, is based upon the trade returns.

Now, it seems to me the manner in which that has been presented to the House by the Minister of Finance is not altogether fair. It is not entirely satisfactory, to my mind, that he should take the years he has selected for comparison. He selects, in the first place, the period from 1869 to 1879, then from 1879 to 1896, and from 1896 to the present time. The result, as shown by him is that in the last period which falls altogether within the period of this government, there is an immense increase in the business of the country. That increase is calculated by the hon. gentleman and reduced to percentages. He shows how much the increase is in every year, and what the percentage of increase is. Then taking the long period that existed from 1879 to 1896, a period of some 18 years, he shows that the percentage of increase during that time was very much less. The hon. gentleman no doubt intended by this comparison to make the country believe there was something in his argument, that it was a fair presentation of the question. I think it will not be hard to show that it was an utterly unfair presentation of the question, one that, if it were done designedly for the purpose of producing a mistaken impression on the public mind, is unbecoming in a gentleman holding the position of Minister of Finance. Even if you look at the matter in its most favourable aspect, if you take the trade returns and give to the present government credit for the greatest possible advance, if you not only allow them for the great increase that has actually taken place in the commerce of the country in the last year, but also allow them to use their own calculation as to the total trade of 1900, allowing that the trade may be as much as they anticipate it will be, I say that even then a fair consideration of the trade returns of the country during the period the Liberal-Conservatives were in power, will show that, even selecting that period which seems most favourable to the hon. gentleman's administration; during the time the Liberal-Conservatives were in power, there were periods of equal prosperity for the country, as great or even greater than this amazing prosperity that we enjoy today. For instance, if we allow that 1900 will show a total trade of $360,000,000, it will surpass 1895 by $136,000,000. Now, 1895 is not the last year of the Conservative government, but it was the worst year. In 1896 there was recovery to a certain extent from the depression; but, even selecting 1895 as the worst year in the depression during which the Liberal-Conservatives were in power, then the trade of 1900 will surpass that of 1895 by $136,000,000, or by 56 per cent. an immense increase, an increase for which the country ought to be thankful, and which is very gratifying to every one on this side of the House.

Mr. BELL (Pictou).

But I would like to call attention to the fact that in 1873, when the Conservatives were in power, the trade surpassed the trade of 1869, another year under the Liberal-Conservative regime, by $87,000,000, or by 66 per cent. a larger percentage than that by which this chosen period, this growing period, surpassed the poorest year of the Liberal-Conservative administration. It is perfectly true that the increase is greater in the last period and why? Because the country is greater, its trade is greater, its resources are greater, the volume of its trade, both of exports and imports, is greater, because the country is greater, its business is wider, its population has increased. So I say, though the volume of increase is greater in the last period, the percentage of increase is not so great. The trade of 1900 will surpass that of 1895 by 56 per cent; but during the time the Conservatives were in power there was a period to which they could have pointed as showing greater prosperity than the present. In 1873 the trade surpassed that of 1869 by 66 per cent. Then again, coming further down, in 1883 we have another maximum year that surpassed the poor year of 1879 by $77,000,000, or 50 per cent. In 1893 the trade of the country surpassed what it had been in 1889 by $47,000,000, or 23 per cent.

Now we come to make a much more useful comparison by taking the periods of years before, during and after the country had touched the bottom point of the depression. If you take such years as they include the last year before the depression, the year of the deepest depression, and the year following the depression, you have a very fair presentation of the trade. Take the period of depression and contrast that with the three following years, the three growing years, three such years as those during which this government have been in power—and it must always be remembered that they have seen no bad years as yet, and I believe they are not likely to see any bad years. I think they will be preserved by a kind Providence from any such affliction, for they will be removed to—should I say a higher sphere? Now, during the period of 1868, 1869, and 1870, when the trade of the country was at its lowest point, it was $410,000,000, and at its highest point it was $582,000,000. The three best years surpassed the three lean years by $172,000,000, an average of $57,500,000 per year. Coming on further to 1878, 1879 and 1880, those three years were low years, they had a trade of $500,000,000. In the following good years, the fat years, namely, 1881, 1882 and 1883, there was a trade of $656,000,000; during those three years the increase was $156,000,000, an average of $52,000,000 a year. Again, take the years 1885, 1886 and 1887, the total trade was $590,000,000; in 1892, 1893 and 1894, three good years, the trade was $730,000,000. There was an increase of $140,000,000, or $47,000,000 per year. In 1894, 1895, and 1896, the three last years of the Liberal-Conservative administration, which happened to be the years preceding the lowest point of depression and comprising the first year of recovery, the trade of the country was $704,000,000. In 1897, 1898 and 1899, under the hon. gentlemen opposite, the trade was $883,000,000. The recovery amounted to $179,000,000, or $60,000,000 per year, as against $47,000,000 per year in the last period before that, $52,000,000 in the year preceding that, and $57,330,000 in the year preceding that. Now, these years, from 1868 to 1873, all fell within the term of the Conservative administration; so did all the rest, excepting a portion of the years of 1877, 1878 and 1879, during the Mackenzie administration. Now, how unfair and how deceiving would it be to the country if the Conservative government had taken these figures in those few years and had said to the country: See what an enormous increase has occurred. Still, they could show just as good results, indeed. I have proved they could show better results, if you consider the matter from the percentage point of view, than can the present government under the peculiarly favourable circumstances in which they stand. They came into power in the fat years of the increase, in the years of the expansion, and they deliberately contrast these years of expansion with the years of depression: with the last years of their predecessors, and they ask the country to look upon that as an example of the great, the good, the powerful and the successful government, because they say: Look at the increase of trade. To make the matter worse, the hon. Minister of Finance figures out the percentage of trade increase during these good years after three bad years, and asks the people to believe, because that is the result of what he asks them to believe, that this is a normal state of affairs under Liberal administration, that this large percentage, some 35 per cent, is to continue. I think he must know, because every one knows, that just as surely as the bad year 1895 was succeeded by the good years 1897, 1898 and 1899, will these fat years, these years of expansion, be succeeded by a period of depression. There can be no question about it. As I have already said, it is as sure as that one season follows another. Therefore, I maintain, whether it was done intentionally or not, that when the hon. Minister of Finance undertook to present to the country the argument that he based on these trade returns showing that during his occupancy of the office of Minister of Finance there was a large increase of trade as against the last years of the government that preceded him, if he did it knowingly, there was an attempt to deceive the people, and to put forward arguments which were perfectly misleading, perfectly deceitful and unworthy of the administration that pursued such tactics. There are some things in the hon. gentleman's speech that are useful, and there are things that are not in his speech. I will refer to some things that I think are of value to us as being in that speech. I suppose that, if there is one thing more than another upon which the members of the present government based their appeal to the people and which was the subject of constant attack upon the Conservative administration under its various leaders, it was the rate at which it maintained the expenditure of the country. That was a constant, unflinching source of attack upon the former government. In 1893 the expenditure was attacked more explicitly throughout the country than at any other time as being not only too high, but the present members of the government, then composing the opposition, undertook to tell us how much it was too high. There was a great deal of variety in their figures. Some of them said that the expenditure could be reduced by $2,000,000, some said that it could be reduced by $3,000,000, some by $4,000,000, and some by $5,000,000. I think they were not at all particular as to the number of millions of dollars they mentioned. It is perfectly evident from what has followed since that they never intended to attempt to materialize any one of the promises that they made. Therefore, I presume that the gentleman was most successful in the country who threw his millions about most lavishly or took his millions off the expenditure most liberally. We may take the average. Suppose we take the statement made by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the government. He estimated that the government of the country could be carried on for $3,000,000 less than what it was being carried on for. Now, in 1893, the expenditure on consolidated revenue account amounted to $36,814,000, and if the government could be carried on for $3,000,000 less, it follows that the expenditure in that year should have been, under an economical and honest administration, $33,814,052.90, because, I presume, that they would require the odd dollars and cents if they were compelled to take off $3,000,000. In 1900, the expenditure, as we have it, upon the authority of the hon. Minister of Finance, and this is one of the valuable things in the hon. Finance Minister's speech—it furnished us with figures that I think will scarcely be gainsaid on the opposite side of the House—is going to be $43,175,000. If the expenditure that was suggested by these hon. gentlemen, when they were in opposition to the late administration, was a proper one, if the administration had taken them seriously to heart, or had found it possible, in the honest discharge of their duty, to meet their views, they would have reduced the expenditure to $33,814,000. The population at that date was estimated at 4,215,000, and the expenditure would have been $6.74 per head of the population, instead of being $7.45 per head, as it was, if I am not mistaken. If you are going to take these hon. gentlemen at their own statements, if you are going to make them apply what they said would be a proper amount under which the government of Canada could be carried on, if you are going to restrict these gentlemen to the $6.74 per head, the amount which they said was a proper amount, the sum to which they pledged their standing as a party, their character as public men, their judgment, their intelligence, what position are they in to-day? These hon. gentlemen pledged themselves, in the face of the people of Canada, to the statement that Canada could be governed for $6.74 per head. If these gentlemen were honest then, and if they are prepared to stand up manfully now and admit that they knew nothing about what the governing of a country should cost, they might, perhaps, be forgiven for the manner in which they have lapsed, and for their departure from the rule they laid down. But, if they are to be held to this expenditure of $6.74, their expenditure should be $36,169,000, giving them exactly what they said was enough, no more, no less. They should govern Canada for $36,000,000, and what are they governing Canada for? These hon. gentlemen, who have said so often and so loudly that Canada could be, should be and would be governed for that sum if they were returned to power, and have often said, let us be banished from power if we fail to keep the expenditure within this sum, and taking them at their word, they deserve to be condemned and turned out of power, because, not only have they not governed Canada for $36,000,000, but they have required $43,000,000, or $7,000,000 more in this year. We had the assurance from the hon. Minister of Finance that they are going to tax the people, and that they are going to expend in Canada $7,000,000 more than they protested everywhere and at all times was a proper amount to be expended.

Mr. BELL (Pictou).

Mr. CLANCY. Is that all on consolidated fund account?

Mr. BELL (Pictou). All on consolidated fund account, and not including capital expenditure. Instead of having the expenditure reduced to $6.74 a head, as these hon. gentlemen said they would reduce it, it will be $8.05 per head next year, an increase of $1.31 per head of the people of the country, and serves them right for believing the men who went before them and based their whole scheme for being returned to power on a system of reasonless, unreasoning, unjust fault-finding with the party in power, and who promulgated no reasonable policy. However, I may exonerate the people of the country; they did not return them to power because of any faith they had that they would carry out their promises. Their coming into power was due to a painful and unfortunate circumstance in the country in which we live. Now, there are some things in the budget speech that are useful to us, this notice for one thing. We have the statement of the hon. Minister of Finance, which is beyond doubt or dispute, as to the expenditure which is to be made in Canada this year, showing that hon. gentlemen have wantonly departed from the expenditure set up by them for their opponents in office. There are some other things in the budget speech that should not be there. Although my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) has told us that it is the greatest budget speech that was ever delivered in his experience of twenty-seven years; although we are led to believe that in his opinion it was the greatest budget speech that was ever delivered since Joseph was Prime Minister of Egypt, still there are some things in that speech which should not be there, and these are one or two things which were calculated to gain a little passing credit of a very evanescent character for the administration. One of these was the manner in which the government claimed credit for having succeeded in placing the funds of Canada upon the list of trust funds in England. We have discovered since the delivery of the budget speech that that statement was not warranted, the fact being that while it may become true it has not yet been accomplished.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Will the hon. gentleman quote the words of my speech on that subject before he criticises them?

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I simply refer to the statement of the Minister of Finance who congratulated the country upon the fact. I have not the budget speech at hand, and I did not suppose that this would be disputed.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am disputing my hon. friend's interpretation of my remarks.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). In what respect?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) says that I made some statement which is not correct. I now ask him what was that statement.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I did not look at the exact words, because I did not think this would be questioned, but the object of the speech was to proclaim that the government should be congratulated upon the fact that Canadian securities were placed upon the trust funds list in England.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That statement was not made in the budget speech. The statement that was made in the budget speech was correct.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Well, I shall be glad to be corrected if I am wrong.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Then I trust the hon. gentleman will pardon me for interrupting him. He said I made the statement that Canadian securities were now on the trust funds list. I did not make such a statement. I stated there were negotiations with the Imperial government which had agreed to introduce legislation for that purpose, and that when such legislation was carried in the British parliament and corresponding legislation was passed in this parliament, the matter would be completed. That is the statement in the budget speech, and the hon. gentleman has only to turn to Hansard to see it.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The amount of trouble required from the hon. gentleman to explain that he did not say it, shows that the impression in this House and in the country as well was that he claimed the government were entitled to credit for that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I still say that the government are entitled to credit for having made the arrangement. I did not say then nor do I say now that it had been consummated, nor can it be consummated until legislation is carried through both parliaments.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Having so largely discounted the matter, I presume the Finance Minister will be satisfied to leave it at that point. He says he did not state the arrangement had been consummated, but that the government deserves credit for having initiated the proceedings.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not say that either. I said the government deserved credit for having made the arrangement with the Imperial government.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Then I understand that the Finance Minister has proved to his own satisfaction as well as to mine that the government does not deserve any credit in the matter.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The Minister of Finance also spoke of the treaty with Trinidad in the budget speech, and I do not know how far he took credit for that treaty.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman had better find out before he criticises it.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). He gave the idea that an arrangement had been concluded with Trinidad.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is no such statement in the budget speech. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) is setting up a man of straw for the privilege of knocking it down.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I believe the Finance Minister is perfectly right in calling it a man of straw.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Let my hon. friend (Mr. Bell) quote what I said, and I shall not dispute it.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The Minister of Finance should at least have been as careful as he requires me to be before he mentioned the treaty with Trinidad in the budget speech, because I find there was very little warrant for his speaking of a treaty with Trinidad at all.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Let my hon. friend point out what was wrong in my statement.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I find that on the 29th January the delegates from Trinidad were here, and they had an informal or perhaps a formal discussion with the government, and they gave the government to understand that no matter how willing the government of Canada might be to make any arrangements with Trinidad, they did not think it likely that any satisfactory arrangements could be made, giving as their reason the fact that while Canada consumes 130,000 tons of sugar per year, the West Indies produced 230,000 tons a year, and therefore they did not think it likely that Canada would conclude a treaty with one of the islands, leaving the others out, as the supply of sugar in the British West Indies was very much larger than that required to meet the consumption in Canada. Furthermore, they referred to the fact that the United States were offering them particularly good terms ; not only a low rate of duty upon their sugar, but as the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech the other day, they were placing upon bounty-fed sugar, countervailing duties which were much to the advantage of the products of the West Indies. Then I find that on the 27th February the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) made an offer to the government of Trinidad, and on March 24, a month later, he consented to have that offer which was made in confidence (and had been made known to the home authorities) communicated to some members of the Board of Trade in Trinidad. A little later in the correspondence on the subject comes the message from this government indicted by the Minister of Finance himself, acknowledging the receipt of a communication from the Governor of Trinidad, in which he informs him that the whole arrangement was entirely off, and that an arrangement had been concluded with the United States on the 13th February—a fortnight before he made this communication to the government of Trinidad, and six weeks before he gave authority to treat it as anything but a confidential communication. Therefore, practically the Minister of Finance may be accused of having introduced this matter into the budget speech, knowing that there was no possibility of a treaty with Trinidad, and knowing that a treaty with the United States had been arrived at by the government of Trinidad. But, Sir, the coincidence of these dates is rather remarkable, because on the 23rd of March, the day after Sir Richard Cartwright gave his consent to communicate the contents of his message to the board of trade of that island, the Minister of Finance made his budget speech in this House. Now, I leave to the House and to the country how much warrant there was for the Minister of Finance making any mention of a treaty with Trinidad. It strikes me that it was almost an unwarranted introduction of such a subject, and I shall not characterize it further. Here is what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) said in his budget speech :

Up to the present the Trinidad authorities have made no final statement, but they have declared themselves anxious to develop trade with Canada, and there is every likelihood of a satisfactory arrangement being concluded.

That was the language used by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) six weeks after the reciprocity treaty with the United States had been concluded, and which in the opinion of the Governor of Trinidad made it impossible to conclude an arrangement with Canada.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) must be aware that when he is speaking of a reciprocity treaty being concluded, that what took place at

Mr. BELL (Pictou).

Washington was a confidential matter, and that we could know nothing about it. It was not until that arrangement was concluded by the legislature of Trinidad that there was any indication that they were not free to deal with us. Up to that moment there was no intimation that they were not free to deal with Canada.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I am sorry to say the hon. gentleman has been unfortunate in being rather ill-informed as to the progress of these negotiations.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, I had all the information that anybody else had.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). On March 23, six weeks after the government of Trinidad had signed the bond with the government of the United States, he still informs the people of Canada that there is every likelihood of a satisfactory arrangement being made. If in nothing else, I think the hon. gentleman will permit me to say that in matters of trade and commerce, and the negotiation of treaties, the House ought to receive his assurance of the great probabilities of satisfactory arrangements being made, with a good deal of reservation.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We had not information of the confidential communications between the government of Trinidad and the government of the United States, and, therefore, I could not make any comment upon them. We could not know of them ; we had no right to know of them.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Here is what the hon. gentleman says as to the position of our funds :

The hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), when he filled the important position of High Commissioner, gave a great deal of attention to the subject, and I know from my inquiry at the time, and from information I have since obtained, that my hon. friend laboured hard to accomplish that great boon for Canada, the admission of our securities to the trustee list. But my hon. friend failed, as all others had. Many things, however, which were impossible for Canada a few years ago, have become possible under the better conditions that have arisen.

The change of government, I presume.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Largely.

Mr. BELL (Pictou)—(reading) :

A year ago, realizing as fully as my hon. friend did the desirability of obtaining admission to the trustee list, I went into the subject very carefully, and prepared a full report upon it, urging, as no doubt my hon. friend did in his day, that Canada ought to have her securities recognized as among the best on the English market. Negotiations were carried on for some time through the intervention of our present High Commissioner, who has laboured hard, and has done great service to Canada in that, as in every other respect, and I have now the satisfaction of announcing that the difficulties have been overcome, and that by arrangement between Her Majesty's government and the Canadian government, legislation will be introduced in the Imperial parliament this session, when I shall have the honour of submitting a Bill to this House also, dealing with the subject, and when these two Bills, purely formal in their character, are adopted, the securities of Canada will be admitted to the trustee list from which they have hitherto been excluded. My hon. friends, the leader of the opposition and the ex-Minister of Finance, both of whom are thoroughly familiar with this question, will realize, I am sure, the great importance of this concession which we have obtained from Great Britain.

While possibly my hon. friend was right technically in correcting my statement, I think he will admit that that was a somewhat explicit assurance of a state of affairs that had not yet come to pass.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It was a statement correct in letter and in spirit.

Mr. FOSTER. Better say spirits.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Nearly the whole interest of this debate has hinged, first of all, on the point with which I have dealt, the increase of the total trade in the years during which hon. gentlemen opposite have been in power; and, secondly, upon a presumed reduction in the customs duties which we have been led to believe, has been of great advantage to the consumers of Canada. On that matter, there is a wide discrepancy of opinion between hon. gentlemen opposite and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. My hon. friend, the Finance Minister, declares that the present tariff—taking the duties actually collected on the dutiable imports—is 2·2 per cent lower than the tariff of the late administration. My hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), by a process of reasoning, which, to my mind, seems very fair, reduces that to ·92 per cent; and the hon. ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace), reduces it still further to ·27 per cent, or a little over one-fourth of 1 per cent. One thing tends very strongly to confirm the view taken by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, that the reduction has not been very material; that is, that in 1899, the average rate of duty on British goods, giving them all the advantage of the preference, was 29·62 per cent, while in 1896, the average rate of duty was 30·20 per cent, or a difference of only ·58 per cent. These figures taken from the blue-books, show that the actual reduction made in the duties upon British goods, based upon the trade of the country, is something like one-half of 1 per cent. That may be very material, amounting to a considerable sum of money; but in another sense it is very immaterial. It does not go to show that this government have made a substantial reduction in the tariff, whereas, there can be no question of that fact that a government, which was avowedly and continuously protectionist did in 1894, make large reductions in duties upon goods, very much larger than the reductions that have been made by this so-called free trade government. Just as they have failed in keeping the debt within the old limits and in reducing the expenditure, so they have absolutely failed in reducing the tariff so as to be of any benefit to the consumers of this country.

Now, there are some things which I think the hon. Finance Minister might very well have discussed in his budget speech, which have not been mentioned. At a time like this, when the annual stock-taking of the country is being made, the government and its officials, who have access to all the necessary documents, should give the country some idea of the direction in which its trade is tending, and give us some reason why certain fluctuations in our trade have taken place. One of the reasons for the great expansion in trade at the present moment is to be found in a rather abnormal state of affairs which has existed in Canada during the last four years; that is, that whereas during the whole history of Canada our exports have been largely exceeded by our imports—our exports having exceeded our imports in only one year previous, and that by the sum of $1,500,000—during the last four years the opposite has been the case. The great prosperity of the country at the present time may be attributed, not only to the fact that it has been well-governed, that its industries have been well established, and that it has an enormous area of productive land to which its surplus population can flow, but to the fact that there has been an enormous increase of production, coincident with an increase in prices. Whereas during the whole period in which we have been a country, with the exception of one year, we have had a state of trade showing a large excess of imports, amounting to nearly $15,000,000 a year, in the years 1895, 1896, 1897 and 1898, we have seen exactly the opposite condition, although, I believe, it is now rapidly passing away. In 1895 our exports exceeded our imports by over $3,000,000, in 1896 by $3,000,000, in 1897 by $19,000,000, and in 1898, under the influence of good crops and good prices, by $24,000,000. That is a state of affairs which is altogether abnormal. It shows that we are sending out of the country large values, and it tends to account for the enormous increase of imports into Canada at a time when, if you look into the towns, if you look into the homes of the people, you will fail to see that prosperity which you would expect from the state of trade, because in many localities you will find that the people do not recognize any improvement in their condition. Previous to the accession of this government to office, there was only one year in which our exports exceeded our imports, but we have now that abnormal state of affairs that in these last four years there has been an excess of exports over imports of $49,000,000. That, coupled with the fact that between 1896 and 1898, there has been an increase of 5 per cent in values accounts very largely for the extraordinary volume of trade we are now enjoying.

I am perfectly willing to admit almost anything for the sake of argument, but to be called upon to conclude, in the face of this abnormal condition of affairs—a condition in which we see our exports soaring up to these enormous figures, which can only be counter-balanced by an enormous increase in imports—that this condition is due to a change of administration is one of the most absurd contentions we can possibly conceive.

The only matter in respect of which the government deserves any credit is that it has not carried out any of its free ante-election promises and has not interfered with the protection of Canadian manufactures except in so far as the preferential clause of the tariff is concerned. But with that feature I have dealt so fully before, that I do not think it necessary to refer to it again.

In my opinion a government cannot safely ride two horses any more than can an individual; and if the government has such pressure brought upon it by its friends and supporters as to induce it to protect certain interests, then, I say, it is unquestionably committed to the policy of protecting home industries, and that being the case, it seems to me to be an unsound course for any government to pursue, to interfere with the true and natural course of action which it is necessary to take in order to give effect to that policy of protecting our home industries. That policy they unquestionably have adopted. There are certain manufacturing interests that have been and are and will be protected by the present administration. Of that there can be no question. The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), for instance, has had no interference with his particular industry, although his products are the very things that are the food of the people; and if this were a free trade administration, holding the views of free trade administrations elsewhere, it would be in favour of reducing the duties on these very articles. But, instead we see this government maintaining these articles at the point of protection at which they stood before, so that it is perfectly obvious that this government is in favour of protecting such industries. If that be the case, why should it not make its course consistent? Why should it imperil certain interests by an attempt to set up a bastard free trade or a revenue tariff system that is not honest or genuine, or the real thing at all, but entirely deceptive.

Hon. gentlemen on this side see no reason, either in the history of the past, or the conditions of the present or the prospects of the future, to conclude that the late government did not act wisely in the course they followed, and we are pledged to continue that course in the future.

There are some other things referred to in the budget speech that are not of so much importance. One or two of them were put in apparently for the sake of creating a little political capital and exciting some little effect, for example, the reference to the Trinidad Treaty and the trust funds. These hon. gentlemen opposite have again trotted out the exodus question. We are told that the exodus has ceased, that under the policy of this wonderful administration the tide of population is now flowing into Canada instead of out of it. Well, it is scarcely worth while for these hon. gentlemen to do what my hon. friend just now accused me of doing—set up a man of straw for the sake of knocking it down, or worse still, setting up a dead man for the sake of knocking him over. They told us last year that they killed the exodus. One of their great boasts, in the budget speech of last year, was that the exodus had been done away with. Is it possible that it has come to life again during the recess and has to be killed over again? Or is it a hydra-headed monster which is no sooner killed than it springs into renewed life? If these hon. gentlemen require to kill it every year, the condition of affairs cannot be much improved. In my opinion there never was much in that story of the exodus during all the years we were in power, except in the opinion of a few men who thought to make political capital out of it against the Conservative administration. In fact, the movement of population to-day is pretty much what it has always been. You will find, Mr. Speaker, that as many people are going to the United States from eastern Canada to-day as formerly but on the other hand, there is a larger number of people coming into our western country.

There are a good many things in the speech and a good many not in it to which I would like to refer, but there is one point, and one more only, which I will mention, and that is the omission in the budget speech of any intention to reduce the burdens on the working people. There is no mention anywhere in that speech of any intention to reduce the burden of taxation. These hon. gentlemen boast of a surplus last year of $4,500,000, and this year $7,500,000. But what use are they making of these surpluses? Are they using them to reduce taxation, as did the preceding administration? No, they want surpluses, and, if possible, will heap them up higher than ever. But by what means? By maintaining their taxation which is excessive. It is recognized everywhere that good financing means carrying on business on a sound basis and avoiding deficits as much as possible. But to carry on the administration in such a manner as to extract the largest amount of taxation from the people and heap up surpluses, which are to be vaunted in the press of the country as an evidence of good administration, is perfectly unjustifiable. It is worse than a crime, it is a blunder. Our Finance Minister estimates that he will have a surplus next year of $7,500,000, and yet does not propose a single reduction in the taxation of the people. He does not propose to return to the people one cent of the enormous surplus he anticipates. Such administration cannot be looked upon as that of a good financier. Good management means close and careful management and the carrying on of the government of the country with as little expense to the people as possible. But to take from the people money by millions in excess of what is required cannot be called scientific or masterly management or financing. There are some matters in respect of which the people has a right to expect reduction. When there is a deficit, taxation has to be increased, because we must take from the pockets of the people sufficient money to carry on the affairs of the country. If trade is bad, if the revenue diminishes, if the country cannot pay its way and a deficit is facing it, the people recognize the fact and consent to the Minister of Finance increasing the taxes, and they will by this increase of taxation lift the administration out of a hole. On the other hand, they have the absolute right to require of the administration, when its revenue is overflowing, that these excessive burdens that have been laid upon them temporarily should be removed.

It is unfair to the working people of Canada to maintain upon them the excessive burdens that are involved in the duties upon sugar, coal oil, and particularly upon tobacco. That is one point upon which I feel that a great wrong is being done. Possibly some Reformers may maintain that tobacco should not be used at all, and that therefore every imposition of taxation upon tobacco is an effort towards restraining an evil, of preventing what they maintain to be a bad habit. But that is not the view the people of Canada take of the subject. Tobacco is in almost every part of Canada a necessary of life, at any rate it is a luxury which has become to many men almost a necessity; it is perhaps the only luxury they enjoy. Now, under this administration the tobacco user is compelled, either to pay an exorbitant price for the tobacco he uses, or to use an inferior article that he does not like. The increase of the burden placed upon tobacco consumers in Canada is utterly out of proportion to their numbers. It amounts to 87 cents per head of the population; or if you take an average family of $5\frac{1}{2}$ persons, then the head of that family, if he is a tobacco user, pays into the revenue of the country \$4.78 per year of taxation. It is an unfair thing. This government could have easily thrown off that taxation of nearly \$1,100,000 which they imposed upon tobacco in 1897, but one result would have been that they would have diminished their anticipated surplus this year by that sum of money, and instead of having \$7,500,000 they would have had \$6,400,000. It would be better, fairer and more satisfactory to the sailors, the farmers, the fishermen, the miners, to whom their chew of tobacco or their smoke is a daily luxury and solace to their toil—I say it would certainly be much more satisfactory to them to have in power a government that would recognize their feelings and was willing to administer the country in such a manner as to increase their enjoyments.

Now, the same is true of a great many other articles. This government, in introducing its tariff in 1897, increased the duty on cottons. Now, cotton is not a luxury, it is one of the articles used by every workman, and by every workman's wife and daughter. Upon that this government increased the duty, and now instead of reducing it they are maintaining it at the point to which they raised it, and they are keeping a burden upon the shoulders of the people that is not warranted from any point of view whatever.

Therefore, it seems clear that whereas this administration does not deserve credit for the surpluses, does not deserve credit for the increase of trade—because that would have come just as surely whether they had been in power or not, does not deserve credit for tinkering with the tariff in the direction of a preference, a false preference extended to Great Britain, does not deserve credit for anything like an attempt to distribute more fairly the burden of taxation, does not deserve credit for any attempt to remit taxes so as to lighten the burden on the workmen of Canada. I think this vaunted budget speech, which we are told is the best delivered in this House during the last twenty-seven years, is very much lacking in some essential particulars, and contains some most objectionable features in others. If it be possible that such a presentation as that budget is going to increase the strength of this administration in Canada, we can only believe it by assuming that the people of Canada who will shortly be allowed to use their ballots, are pleased with this state of affairs, are pleased with seeing promises broken, are pleased with seeing the debt increased, are pleased with seeing an expenditure amounting to $7,500,000 beyond what this administration said it should be, are pleased with such loose financing as takes out of their pocket in one year $7,500,000 that is not needed by the government. I say if the people of Canada can be pleased with such a programme, then we may expect to see them support this administration. But if the country prefer to have in power men who, when they are protectionists, say so, and live up to it men who, when they have to increase the debt of the country and to maintain the expenditure at a reasonable point, do it without any false or hypocritical protestations that they are going to do something else, then I say the people will condemn the present administration and mark their condemnation by sending them back to the shades of opposition in which they so long lingered.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is really no advantage in going over a great multitude of figures, because I do not think I could fairly ask my constituents to read these long lists when I could just as well put the whole gist of the matter in a few words. When you can show them from the returns that even under the preferential tariff there is only a reduction of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent instead of, as the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) said, 50 per cent or something in that neighbourhood; when you can show them, not by cleverly made figures, but by the returns, by the revenue of the country, by the blue-books prepared by the government, that instead of a reduction of anything like a large percentage there is apparently a reduction of only $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent; more particularly when you can show them, as was done by the member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), taking a few articles more commonly in use, that on almost every one of them an advance has taken place, and that to-day in the shops and in the markets, people are paying more for the very articles which they had been led to believe would be reduced in price, than they were paying before, then, Sir, you present them with the final touchstone by which the people can try which administration is carried on in their interest and which is not.

Mr. GEORGE McHUGH (South Victoria, Ont.) I do not hope to be able to add much that is new or original to this debate. A great deal has been said, and as I do not wish to repeat what somebody else has said, and said perhaps better than I can do, my remarks will be somewhat brief. I have listened with a great deal of interest, and I hope with some profit, to what has been said. I listened with great satisfaction to the speech of the Minister of Finance, delivered in this House a few weeks ago, when he showed that there had been such a development of trade in Canada as had never been seen before, that we were enjoying a period of prosperity greater than had ever existed before; and I think that it sent a thrill of keen joy into the hearts of the Canadian people to have heard such a statement from the Minister of Finance of the Dominion of Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to deal with a few of the remarks that have been made, but only in a general way. I am not going into a long array of figures to prove the existence of this prosperity which has been so much spoken of by hon. members on the Liberal side of the House, which some hon. members on the opposite side of the House say does exist, and which other hon. members say has no existence. I heard the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) last night say that there was an expansion of trade in the country. But that the prosperity did not reach the agricultural classes of the community. I think that the prosperity that exists in the country has reached the homes of almost every one of the citizens of Canada irrespective of the calling they are pursuing. I would ask hon. members in this House, and the people in the country, to use the same means to find out whether that prosperity exists now or not that we suggested when the friends of the present opposition went through the length and breadth of the land trying to convince the agriculturists of the country that they were in a prosperous condition during their term of office. We told the farmers then to look and see if there was a reduction in the mortgages upon their chattels, to look and see if there was a reduction in the mortgages upon their homes, to look into the banks and see if the balances were on the right side of the ledger so far as they were concerned, to put their hands into their pockets and see whether the prosperity that we were told existed then was evident there. They found then, that the chattel mortgages and mortgages on their homes were increasing, they found that the mortgages on their lands were on the increase, they found that money was harder to be got, that the value of their stock was decreasing, that the value of their lands was decreasing, and that their bank accounts were on the wrong side of the ledger. To-day, the Liberal party and the government can go to the agricultural classes of the country, to the manufacturers of the country, to the business men of the country, and can ask them to adopt the same means of ascertaining whether they are prosperous or not. If we were to tell them to adopt the same means as we suggested when our opponents were in power, I am sure that we would find, amongst all classes of the community, that they would say that mortgages have been wiped out from their chattels, that land mortgages have been greatly decreased, that money is very much easier to get to pay the interest on the mortgages that do exist, that savings bank accounts are increasing, that government bank deposits that we use to hear so much about are on the increase, and that on every hand there will be found a condition of prosperity that has had no existence in this country for many years. I know that some hon. members on the opposition side of the House have told us that the price of farm stock and of the products of the soil has not increased, and that this prosperity has not reached the farmers. The hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), the other evening, and the hon. member for Bothwell, last evening, told us that none of this prosperity had reached the farmers because the price of farmers' stock had not increased, and they took up the reports of the government to show that the average price of cattle was better in 1893, 1894, 1895 and 1896, than in the last two or three years. Let them go amongst any farming community in this country and tell the farmers that the products of the farm have not increased in value. I would ask no one to give me a better illustration of the condition of the farmers than to ask the farmers themselves what their condition is. I know from practical experience and from going through the country that the prices of farm stock have nearly doubled to the farming community. You can go into a farmer's barnyard to-day and you can find that a yearling beast that you could buy for from $5 to $7 in 1893, 1894 or 1895 could not be got now for less than from $10 to $15. A yearling colt that you would have to sell at from $16 to $25 in 1893, 1894 and 1895, will bring now from $25 to $40. I know whereof I speak. A cow that would sell in these years at from $15 to $25, to-day will bring anywhere from $25 to $45. The best horse that a farmer could put on the market in 1893, 1894 or 1895, would not bring more than from $40 to $75, whereas the same animal will bring, to-day, from $80 to $125. When the hon. member for Bothwell tells the people that he is a farmer and quotes prices like he did last night in order to show the farmers that they are not getting any better prices than in 1893, 1894 and 1895, I would tell him to ask the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), or the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Featherston), or the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Gilmour) who, I think, is as good an authority as he is on the prices of agricultural products at this time, and if he does I do not think he will repeat the statement that he made to the House last evening.

Mr. BELL (Pictou).

We have heard a good deal from the opposition as to the increase in the prices of articles consumed by farmers. Some of them have found fault with the reduction of the duties, while others have found fault because they were not reduced enough. It is pretty hard to get any consistency from these hon. gentlemen along these lines. The duty was taken off Indian corn, and some hon. gentlemen condemned the government for taking that off. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen in whose interest the duty was taken off Indian corn. They have tried to create the inference that it was taken out of disloyalty to Canadians and to do something for the benefit of the Americans, when they know in their heart of hearts that it was taken off solely for the benefit of the farmers of Canada. Who use Indian corn to-day? The farmers of Canada. If it were not to the advantage of the farmers to use Indian corn would they buy it to feed to their stock? It has been said that we have coarse grains enough. The introduction of corn has had no effect on the price of coarse grains. So long as the people of Canada produce coarse grains for export, the export price makes the price for what is consumed at home, and the farmers of Canada, to-day, are exporting largely of their coarse grains. Indian corn coming into competition with these in Canada has not reduced the price of coarse grains one cent. Oats command a better price to-day than they did when Indian corn was on the dutiable list. Pease command a better price to-day than when Indian corn was on the dutiable list. The cheaper grades of barley command a better price to-day than when Indian corn was on the dutiable list. Oats will not make a full ration for a beast, and the result is that the farmers sell a quantity of their oats, barley and pease, and they feed Indian corn instead. They find it to their advantage to do so, and I do not think that any government has a right to step in and say that the farmers should not be allowed to judge for themselves as to what is best for them in their particular line of business. If they did not consider it was best for them they would not buy the Indian corn, and the government was wise to allow them to buy it or leave it alone, just as they thought was to their advantage. Speaking of the prices of articles which the farmers use, nails and scythes and barbed wire and binder twine and coal oil, and things like that, many of the Conservative members of this House have blamed the government for taking the duty off, stating that that was the reason the price of these articles had increased.

Mr. CLANCY. Who made that statement?

Mr. McHUGH. The statement has been made that the reason why barbed wire and coal oil have increased in price is because the government took off the duty. That statement was made by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), and, probably, if I inquired further, I would find it was made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy).

Mr. CLANCY. I see the hon. gentleman is repeating the statement after I warned him that the statement has not been made which he alleges.

Mr. McHUGH. I know that the statement has been made over and over again in this House, and I will repeat it. It is true that wire nails are higher in price, but that is no argument against the government. They are higher in price in all the markets of the world, and the relative cost of these articles in the markets of the world shows whether the consumers in Canada are paying a fair price for them or not. We know that iron and all articles which are made out of iron have gone up in price, but what has the government to do with that? No government could control the price of these things. Some hon. gentlemen opposite find fault with the government because they have lessened the duties on a great many articles, while other gentlemen on the Conservative side of the House say that the government are maintaining the same tariff as they found when they came into office. Well, Sir, there is not much consistency in an argument of that kind. The Liberal party, before they came into power, promised a revenue tariff, and the best evidence that they have redeemed their pledge in that respect is, that they have a tariff which is a revenue tariff; a tariff that is producing more revenue than was ever produced before in this country. Protection begins just where revenue ends, and I say that the Liberal tariff is not a protective tariff, but a revenue tariff. Revenue commences where protection ends, and protection begins where revenue ends, and this is a revenue tariff, and it is producing a better revenue than any other tariff that ever was in existence before in Canada. There has been a good deal said in this debate, Mr. Speaker, as to the preferential tariff given England by this government, and we know that some members on the Conservative side have condemned the government for giving that preference to the motherland. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell, Pictou) who last addressed the House, speaks for his party, then if the Conservatives came into power they would abolish the preferential tariff. Well, Sir, the people of Canada believe that the preferential tariff was passed in their best interests, and they feel it has been a great boon to them. It was not passed in the interests of the people of England, but in the interest of Canadians. It created a kindly feeling for the people of Canada in the British mind, and it has enabled us to increase our trade with England. As the result of it, we have got cheaper manufactured goods from England than we had before. I say, Mr. Speaker, that any political party which goes to the country upon the repeal of that tariff will meet with a cold reception from the Canadian electors. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that we have here in Canada a great country. It is great because it is a colony of the British Empire; it is great because of the union of the provinces, and I know that so long as that union of the provinces is maintained, with harmony and good feeling among our people, then Canada has a great future before her. Our best achievements in the past will be but mere infants compared with what our future possibilities shall be. It would be a sad day for Canada, Sir, should any politician endeavour to raise dissensions between the people of the sister provinces of this Dominion, and I trust that day shall never come. If Canada is governed in the wise and judicious manner in which the present government have managed our affairs, then, Canada will not only be the premier colony of the British Empire, but she will move along in prosperity until she is almost equal to Britain herself. Let me say, Sir, that this government has redeemed its pledge to the people. No one in this House will deny that there has been a reduction in customs duties, and a reduction of these duties means a reduction of taxation. We have heard a great deal in this debate as to the increase of the national debt, but I feel positive that when the next census is taken, it will be found that there has not been an increase per capita in the national debt of Canada, but that, on the contrary, there will be a decrease per capita as compared with what it was when the Conservatives left office in 1896. These, Sir, are evidences of good government which the people of Canada will appreciate when the Liberal party again appeals to them for their support.

Mr. McHUGH.

Mr. GILBERT W. GANONG (Charlotte). Mr. Speaker. The world moves. I would not have you, Sir, for a moment suppose that I claim that as an original expression coined by me, for I am simply repeating the statement made by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) in 1897, when he was delivering his budget speech of additional burdens on the people of this country. I do not think that the expression was even original with the Finance Minister, nor was it well applied by him. If the expression were properly applied, without doubt it would be well demonstrated by every gentleman who occupies the front benches on the government side, as well as by every member who has had the privilege of sitting on that side of the House since the elections of 1896—not only those who have been relegated to fat offices provided for them, but also those who are sitting there in the anticipation of good political jobs to come. We know of a good many of these gentlemen opposite who are simply awaiting translation—the hon. member from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), from whom we hear so very frequently, the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure), the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor), and several others of these gentlemen, who are simply awaiting their turn to get positions that they know are ready for them when the proper time arrives.

Mr. COWAN. You are talking through your hat.

Mr. GANONG. I am not talking gas.

Mr. COWAN. It is a poor quality of gas you are giving us.

Mr. GANONG. I believe that the Postmaster General, who introduced a Bill some years ago to provide for the independence of members of parliament, is equally guilty with the others; for he has not only condoned the appointment of members to other departments, but he has even gone so far as to make one or two good appointments in his own department. If you have any doubt that the world moves, you simply have to ask judges Lister, Lavergne, Langelier, Choquette, and a dozen others who have been removed from the floor of this House, who were presumed to have been elected as independent members to represent the people here, but who had promises, many of them in writing, of appointments, and who sat here and voted like machines before they received those appointments. It would have been very much better indeed if the Finance Minister had said, in that manner which he has, of raising his tone and shouting across this House in order to make what he says more impressive: 'Behold we who sit here on the front benches have all moved since the elections of 1896,' and if he waits for a few weeks or a few months the honest electors of this country will not fail to tell them: 'So say we all of us.' They have moved into power, and have moved away from every principle which they advocated before 1896, and no one knows that better than the Minister of Finance, who a few years ago was the leader of a secession party in the province of Nova Scotia and was advocating the disruption of the Dominion of Canada, the breaking of the bonds that bind these provinces together, which, if carried out in the spirit in which it was advocated, would have finally tended probably to the disruption of the empire. But on the 23rd of March of this year the hon. gentleman was shouting just as lustily for loyalty and for Imperial unity. This same gentleman, in 1891, was one of the strongest advocates of unrestricted reciprocity with discrimination against Great Britain. Why has all this change come about? Why? Does he believe to-day that the preference for Great Britain is the best thing for Canada?

We have a right to doubt these sudden changes, these bursts of loyalty from gentlemen who, only a few years since, favoured the trade policy of unrestricted reciprocity with discrimination against Great Britain. We have a right to doubt them because the Minister of Finance was a secessionist and may be one yet. We have a right to doubt them because every one of them on the public platform nailed that flag of unrestricted reciprocity to the mast, and declared themselves determined to stand by it until they died. What was the answer of the hon. Minister of Finance to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) in regard to this very matter? After he had been shouting for several hours about loyalty to Great Britain and preference to Great Britain and the advantages of it, the hon. member for Haldimand asked him what position the country would have been in had their advocacy of unrestricted reciprocity, in 1891, succeeded, and he stated that he believed that Canada would have been in a better position. So it is quite evident that the hon. gentleman's conversion is not a very deep one. What is the reason of all this stampede of these ministers falling over one another and shouting loyalty at this particular time? Simply for political capital, nothing more or less. But the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) are as true to-day to their old love as they were in 1891. They and their party were then prepared to make a common tariff with the United States against all the world, Great Britain included, and if Great Britain suffered it was no concern of theirs. That was the extent of their loyalty prior to the election of 1896, and it stands on record as the most effective answer to their present pretensions. There are one or two others of these whose conversions may possibly be a little more genuine, and I shall perhaps refer to them a little latter. I think we should particularly give credit to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Chariton), especially as he is now occasionally discoursing on evidences of Christianity.

Now, Sir, as to the question of prosperity and its effects in this country, there are no members on this side of the House who will dispute the fact that the year 1899 was a record-breaker—a record-breaker in taxation, a record-breaker in expenditure, and a heart-breaker to the old-time Liberals who had been expecting that those hon. gentlemen when returned to power would keep at least a few of their election promises. We can all rejoice with the Minister of Finance that the world-wide prosperity has not passed Canada and left her without some advantages in the way of trade. It has given us largely increased exports which made possible largely increased imports, to the undoubted advantage of the revenues of this country.

Sir, the Minister of Finance boasts that we have exported $13,248,164 more in value during the past eight months than during the corresponding period of last year, and we are all proud of it. Does he think than any one is fool enough to suppose that the fiscal policy had anything to do with that? The hon. gentleman knows that it is a beneficent and bountiful Providence, and to that alone, that the good harvest reaped last year is due, and that we owe whatever advantage may be derived from our increased exports. Therefore, if Canada is in a position to hold her own, it is in spite of the hon. gentleman's fiscal policy and in consequence of the blessings which have been showered upon us from on high.

I have no disposition to take credit for that opinion. I would have you understand that it is the opinion of another gentleman—a gentleman who, in 1892, was Mr. Louis Davies, who is to-day Sir Louis Davies. But if this was correct in 1892, how much greater cause have we at this time to be thankful to this all-bountiful Providence for the great crops we harvested in 1896, 1897 and 1898, and marketed in 1897, 1898 and 1899. In 1896 we produced 33,000,000 bushels of wheat, in 1897, 47,000,000 bushels, and in 1898, 57,000,000 bushels. Is it possible that the sun was any more potent during the time of this Grit government, that the soil gave up any more rich fruitage on account of it? Did we receive any advantage from these pets of the Minister of the Interior, the Doukhobors and the Galicians? I think not.

Although the Minister of Finance did not say so in so many words, he challenged the admiration and applause of his followers by intimating in some way or other that the government should receive credit for these large exports.

For my part, I fail to understand why the government should be entitled to any credit whatever. The hon. gentleman, I know, poses as a medicine man, pretending that he can bring about good crops or bad crops, just as he pleases. I rejoice, as well as he does over the magnificent harvest of last year, which was a godsend to Canada from one end to the other. I rejoice that in the province from which I come, we had a magnificent harvest that saved us from a great deal of misery. I rejoice that the harvest of the North-west was one of the best that country ever had, and put a large amount of money into the pockets of the farmers. But everybody knows that the government cannot in any sense be entitled to the least credit for these good crops. The hon. gentleman might beat his political tom-tom over every wheat field in Canada, and he might get his lieutenant, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to curse by all his gods, and the grain would grow just the same as ever, and the fisheries would yield up their fruits, and so would the mines. The hon. gentleman is absolutely powerless in the matter.

That is another gem from a speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries in this House in 1892. Why should not the gentlemen who represent constituencies and sit on this side of the House rejoice that the country is now reaping the fruits of the long years of labour which they put in in the interests of Canada, and in which they were opposed in the most strenuous manner by the gentlemen now occupying the government benches? Why should we on this side not rejoice that the granaries of that great western country which we acquired despite the opposition of the gentlemen now on the Treasury benches, are filled with the best grain raised in any country in the world? Why should we not rejoice also that the Conservative administration, in their wisdom, provided sufficient facilities and railway and canal communication to bring that grain to the seaports where it might be marketed at reasonable prices in competition with the grains of the rest of the world? We have a right to rejoice that we acquired British Columbia, which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) showed his contempt for by calling it a sea of mountains, but which the Minister of Finance this year is very glad to use in order to swell his figures and show that the country is prosperous. The mineral products of that country in 1896 were valued at $22,584,513; in 1899, they reached the value of $46,245,878, or an increase of $23,661,365, which these hon. gentlemen, who formerly decried that province, now view with immeasurable pride and satisfaction. But where do hon. gentlemen opposite come in, in these glorious achievements anyway? They come in simply where they have always been—natural-born kickers. They were kickers out of power against extension and consolidation. They were kickers against even Nova Scotia remaining a portion of the union. They were kickers against railway and canal extension, and now that they are in power they keep up their reputation by being kickers against an adequate fast Atlantic service. They kicked so hard that they kicked it out of sight, when instead they should have kicked the hon. gentlemen out of the cabinet who were responsible for the fiasco. They have kicked themselves out of their old political clothes, and in their new suits they feel so comfortable and look so well that they actually begin to think that they are as honest as the men they are trying to imitate.

Mr. GANONG.

In the public accounts I find some interesting figures, but shall not weary the House with a great many of them. I find that the expenditure on ordinary revenue in 1896 was $36,949,442. According to the estimate of the Minister of Finance in 1900, it will be $43,175,000, being an increase over 1896 of $6,225,858. That is what my hon. friend (Mr. McHugh), down here intimated was making the hearts of the people glad. Then let me take up the increase in expenditure on ordinary revenue and capital, combined, and this increase is in contradistinction to the pledge of these same hon. gentlemen that there would be a reduction of from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000, showing that there is only a difference between their estimates of what the expenditure would be if they came into power and the actual expenditure of some $10,000,000 or $11,000,000. The average combined revenue and capital expenditure from 1892 to 1896, amounts to $42,141,703. In 1899, it amounted to $51,542,656, an increase of $9,480,800. That may make the hearts of some of my hon. friend's constituents glad, but it does not gladden the hearts of the good old-time Liberals in the maritime provinces.

The hon. Minister of Finance cannot tell just how much taxes he will extract from the people in 1900, but he predicts a total revenue of $50,000,000, or $4,000,000 more than last year, and as that $4,000,000 will be so much taxes taken from the people, the total taxes will be that much more in 1899. In other words, this government will take $39,000,000 from the people, showing that the taxes have been augmented in this way :

1896.....	$27,759,285
1897.....	28,648,620
1898.....	29,576,455
1899.....	34,958,569
1900.....	39,000,000

Or, in round figures, $11,000,000 more than the Conservative administration deemed it either just or wise to take from the people. This is a record breaking time—certainly a growing time for taxes. These figures stand out in very bold relief in contradistinction to their pre-election promise of reduced taxation, which these gentlemen pledged themselves to bring about.

I do not purpose taking up any such array of figures as some hon. gentlemen, but there are some to which I will devote a few minutes. Any one who will take the trouble to read the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell last night will be satisfied that the figures are alarming, a great many of them, to the people of this country. A better statement of the facts could not be put before the people, and no such analysis, in my opinion, of the tariff tinkering of these gentlemen has been put before the country before. There are some things that strike an ordinary observer as rather odd. These hon. gentlemen are running wild over their loyalty now and their love for Great Britain, but all the time there is a menacing cloud hanging over them. There is the condition in the order in council that can be seen from one end of Canada to the other. 'No precedent.' That is what is making these hon. gentlemen tremble. That is what is making them tumble over each other, from the front benches to the back seats, in their zeal to shout loyalty.

The hon. Minister of Finance referred to the Liberal tariff as a moderate one. I presume that he would call the tariff of 1896 a highly protective tariff. Is that his understanding? I pause for a reply, but the hon. gentleman does not wish to take any heed to that item taken from his speech.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will be glad to answer any item found in my speech, and the hon. gentleman will find that every one I gave is correct.

Mr. GANONG. I find in the hon. gentleman's budget speech that he said that the Liberal rule was a time of moderate tariff.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If you read that in my budget speech, it is correct.

Mr. GANONG. I presume he means us to infer that the tariff of 1896, was a highly protective tariff.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I believe that the hon. gentleman's friends claim that for it.

Mr. GANONG. Then the hon. gentleman does not think so ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In some things it was.

Mr. GANONG. I am glad to have even that admission. It is very kind for the hon. gentleman even to admit that. The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), I believe, has also that opinion of it, and I regret he is not in his place to-night, because there are some matters in connection with that hon. gentleman to which I wish to refer later. When on this side, the hon. the Minister of Customs pounded his desk even harder than the one behind which he sits at present, but to a different purpose and with a different object. But he is like all the rest, he has found that the world moves, it moved him into office at $5,000, and it moved his salary up to $7,000 ; so he has ample evidence that the world moves in his direction. But there is other evidence. He, like other ministers, has made a great many statements that he wishes could be wiped out. But their statements will appear before them and give them a good many nightmares. In 1890, Mr. Paterson declared :

In 1888 we were taking $6,115,000 more in taxes out of the people than we should, and we spent $7,571,000 more than we should. He declared that an era of economy in expenditure should be at once entered upon.

This hon. gentleman has moved since that time, and he is in new quarters now at $7,000 a year. Instead of reducing the expenditure and taxation, instead of bringing about this era of economy, he is assisting as far as possible in taking millions of dollars in taxation out of the people more than is required. I will not quote any more of the hon. gentleman's figures. I think myself he does not understand half the figures he produced in this House. If he does he must have taken leave of his senses while he was preparing those figures. He puts on the airs of a conscientious man ; but if he is so, he must be seeing visions that would outclass those of Dante's Inferno. However, there is one statement made by the Minister of Customs that I would like to repeat, one that for utter foolishness is beyond anything we can possibly conceive as coming from a gentleman claiming to have the ability to fill the position of Minister of Customs of this country. I will read it :

There is a market right at your very door for forty millions of bushels of wheat. If we have free intercourse, Canada will be the market from which these states would draw the supply of wheat for the ten million barrels of flour they need per annum. They need every product the farmer has to sell. There is your market.

Now, if anything was ever uttered more silly from a business man's standpoint, I would like to have it pointed out. It has only been equalled once, and that was by the First Minister when he woke up after eighteen or twenty years sleep, and said in the city of Paris that Canada had become a nation. Why, this statement of the Minister of Customs is belied by his own tariff. The duty on wheat is 12 cents. What for? Not surely in order to assist in producing a surplus of $6,000,000 or $7,000,000. The duty on flour is 60 cents. What for? Why protect yourself against a country you are going to sell all your goods to? The duty in 1896, I presume, was a highly protective one according to the idea of the Minister of Finance. The duty on wheat, I believe, has been reduced 3 cents a bushel, and on flour 15 cents per barrel. Now, for what purpose is that tariff retained on wheat and flour? It cannot possibly be retained for a revenue. It is simply to carry out the protective features of the old policy. If you do not believe this, ask the member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) why it is on. He knows well enough. If he wants free wheat why not give him what he wants? The Minister of Customs is taking everything he wants that is in sight, and I do not know why the member for Kent should not have free wheat and flour if he desires it.

Now, I said I regretted that the Minister of Customs was not in his place to-night. Some gentlemen on this side of the House have made an occasional reference to the business of the Minister of Customs, and I feel it is only right that he should have justice. I desire to place a few statements before this House so that the minister may not be misrepresented in any degree whatever. I presume it is his own modesty that has kept him from placing himself on record. The figures I shall give may be relied on as they are furnished by the trade returns made up by his own officers; and to save time in quoting them I shall only mention the quantities in pounds. From section 2, pages 28 and 29 of the Trade and Navigation Returns, I glean the following in regard to the biscuit business of Canada:

Class.	Imported from.	1896.	1899.	Increase.	Decrease.	—
		Lbs.	Lbs.	Lbs.	Lbs.
Sweetened biscuits...	Great Britain.....	37,468	38,487	1,019
	United States.. .. .	191,967	96,559	95,408
	Totals.....	229,435	135,046	1,019	94,380	Less than 1896.
	Less Yukon....	9,530	9,530
	Total, less Yukon.....	125,516	84,859	" "
Unsweetened biscuits.	Great Britain.....	21,811	52,947	31,136
	United States.....	339,110	328,727	10,383
	Totals.. .. .	360,921	381,674	20,753	More than 1896.
	Less Yukon.	150,695	150,695
	Total, less Yukon.....	230,979	129,942	Less than 1896.

Decrease of sweetened goods imported in 1899 as compared with 1896..... 84,859 bs.

" unsweetened goods imported in 1899 as compared with 1896.. .. . 129,942 "

Total decrease of sweetened and unsweetened goods imported in 1899 as compared with 1896 (not including Yukon)..... 214,801 "

In regard to this increase of sweetened goods from Great Britain, you will notice that under the preferential tariff there were only 1,019 pounds more imported, or about 3 per cent, and considering all the circumstances it was no credit to the preference, as more than this increase of 1,019 pounds was occasioned by the abnormal trade incident to the Yukon demand. This also applies equally well to the increased imports from Great Britain of unsweetened goods. Now, there are some peculiarities about the biscuit business that I wish you to take note of. The English goods are much better adapted to Yukon trade, being packed in tins and other styles to stand changes of climate. It is interesting to note that in proportion to population, Ontario takes less of imported sweet goods than any other province, British Columbia taking most, Nova Scotia, Quebec, New Brunswick, Manitoba, all coming in order before Ontario. The total of sweet goods going into Ontario under preferential tariff in 1899 was only 5,754 pounds, out of a total of 38,487 pounds imported into Canada from Great Britain. So our friend the Minister of Customs has not much fear of English competition on sweet goods in his own territory in the province of Ontario. The competition he fears is that of United States factories making similar lines to those produced by his firm, on which the duty he has admitted is a highly protective duty—being 27½ per cent. Now as to unsweetened goods. This is really the line on which the hon. gentleman most fears competition. His cream sodas, pilot, &c., which I am pleased to say are good, could not well stand competition of these American manufacturers, so the protective tariff of 1896 of 25 per cent is retained by the hon. gentleman on his own goods.

Briefly stated the facts gleaned are these: The hon. gentleman has no competition from Great Britain on sweet goods as the masses do not take those lines from England, so preference does not injure his trade $1, but on the competition most feared, that of the United States, he has a high protective tariff of 27½. On the unsweetened goods so largely imported from the United States in the past, he also has a high protective duty of 25 per cent. But more surprising than all is the fact that the business of the hon. gentleman, who railed so against protection, but kept the highest protection on his own goods—gives the most ample evidence of the successful working out of the national policy. Nothing could possibly better demonstrate the beneficial effects of that policy. Note the effect—gradually decreasing imports, although if the statements of the hon. minister are correct, the country is consuming largely increased quantities of their products. I have no doubt of it because there are new factories growing up all over the country.

We have this demonstration of the effect of the national policy, that by retaining the duty we have been able to manufacture the goods in our own country instead of importing them from foreign countries. The imports of both classes were, in 1896, 590,356 pounds, while in 1899 they were 516,720 pounds, showing a decrease of 73,636 pounds. But, this is hardly a fair statement. Last year we had an abnormal trade going into the Yukon, which unfortunately, on account of the arrangement made by the government the goods were chiefly shipped via Seattle and San Francisco by American transportation companies. But, deducting this abnormal trade we find that the imports were reduced in 1899 to 356,495 pounds, showing that, not allowing for the increased trade in the country at all, 233,861 pounds more were made in Canada in 1899 than in 1896, which means that Canadian farmers raised the grain and provided the lard, that the Canadian workmen produced the flour and the sugar, that Canadian workmen produced the goods and sold them, and that Canada was just that much richer in labour and its profits by the retention of the national policy and the high duties imposed by the Conservative party and retained by the hon. Minister of Customs on his own goods. This is but a sample truth which equally applies to every industry in Canada, and would be applied no doubt if the manager of each concern could be Minister of Customs. I trust I have been able to do the hon. gentleman justice. If the hon. gentleman will call attention to any points I may have overlooked I will be glad to touch on them.

Perhaps, Sir, I should apologize to the House for taking so much time on this subject, but I felt it was only fair that this evidence of the good results of protection should go on Hansard to show how unselfish is this protectionist minister of the new Liberal school.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish you would stand up some of these truthful men—these Georges of the Washington of the North, these loyal men—the right hon. the First Minister and the Minister of Customs, stand them upon the floor of this House face to face with the hon. members of this House and the country. Let the right hon. First Minister repeat his saying of former years, 'Our policy is the removal of every vestige of protection.' If the hon. Minister of Customs is honest in his reply, it will be: My policy is to retain every possible protection for my own goods. Whatever may have been the purpose of the government in bringing in this fiscal policy that they presented in 1897, whatever may have been the impression in the country as to its effect, both were fully demonstrated by such a close analysis of the trade returns as were made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) last night. The basis of the revision was not love for Great Britain, the basis of the revision was the extortion of the largest possible revenue, the largest amount of taxation from the people and giving the people the least possible advantage from it. But, from the fact that these tariff tinkers did not understand the very principle of protection their cutting and slashing must necessarily injure some lines. It must injure woollen goods, for instance. While their aggregate trade, considering world-wide conditions, will not show any material increase in the imports from Great Britain in many lines when competition gets to work under better conditions, these lines of business must necessarily suffer. It has had the result of increasing the cost very materially of many classes of goods that are used by the working people. Sugar and tobacco are two notable instances, the prices of which have been increased. There is a law of trade known to every successful business man, that price or even quality alone, does not govern demand, and in no country has that been better demonstrated than in Canada, and why? Here we are placed beside a country which has sixty or seventy million people, with a border of 3,000 or 4,000 miles, with climatic conditions, especially in the north, similar to our own, with a people of the same origin, whose habits are very similar to ours, a people whose natural products, to a large extent, are identical with our own, a people speaking the same language as we do, and we are placed here in immediate contact almost with the manufacturing business and social centres of the United States. What results accrue from these conditions? Simply, that the tastes of the two people are bound to run on similar, if not identical lines. The fashions set by the cities of the United States, with whose citizens our people socially come in contact, are bound to be followed by the Canadian people. They will follow them not only in colour, but they will follow in style. Our people do not so largely copy the styles of London as they copy the styles of New York. This is true in relation to millinery goods, fancy dress goods, and more particularly new styles in fancy cotton goods in which the United States now are excelling to a very large degree, and which our people, according to the trade returns, are importing very much more freely and in increasing quantities than similar goods from Great Britain. Boots and shoes are also among those lines in which our people are imitating the people of the United States, rather than the people of Great Britain, as shown by our trade returns. I shall simply refer to one or two articles. In 1899, I believe the hon. Minister of Finance made some little changes in the tariff, some little changes in his fiscal policy. He purposed then, in order to make the government popular, to try and establish some new trade relations by giving a preference to the West India Island and British Guiana. He was very frank in his statement. He said he was going to try and get a preference, it is true, but that he expected that as an incident of the increased import duty on sugar, he would get $500,000 more revenue. When you come to get at the facts of the case, the preference was the incident, and the revenue was the real fact. Without going into a full statement of the returns from this trade, I think you will find on examining the report, that the exports to British Guiana and the West Indies in 1899, over those in 1898, were simply $178,773. That is less than one-fourth of the amount taken out of the labouring classes in 1899 by the extra sugar duties imposed by this government under the guise of stimulating trade between the West Indies and Canada, but which really, according to the historical utterances of the Liberals, was taxation taken out of the people to bleed them white. I believe, Sir, that the labouring classes of this country, the farmers, the fishermen and the artisans, will think that $700,000 is too much of their good money to pay in additional duties to assist in bringing to us the profits of trade of $178,773 to Canada. But, finding that this was not likely to prove a success, why did the government not act honestly with the people. If they had a desire to assist the working people of Canada, it was open to them to do a good thing to benefit these people. When they found that this preference would not give them any trade advantages, why did they not include sugar in the preferential list with Great Britain? Raw sugar is taken to England to be refined and refined sugar is imported into Canada to the extent of 27,000,000 in 1899, only 7,000,000 pounds of which came from England, and it paid the full duty. If the Liberal government wanted to do a service to the workingman, and still keep up the loyalty racket that they have been trying to work off on the people, here was a practical way of doing it. But no, the government would not do this, because that would have thrown almost the whole sugar business into the hands of the English refiners. For my part, I cannot see how it is possible that there is any less loyalty in a one-third preference on sugar, than there is on a one-third preference on boots and shoes and cotton goods. No, Sir, there is no less loyalty, but there would be less taxation, and as that means less revenue, the government do not propose to make any changes that would bring about that. Their whole plan and scheme, in connection with this, has been to give the government a maximum of duties, and the labouring classes a minimum of advantage. Not only that, Sir, but they play into the hands of a class of people who are wealthy enough to wear silks. They will allow silks and the manufacture of silks in at a rebate of one-third of the duty, and we find that from Great Britain last year, we imported $2,000,000 worth of silks. This government is placing in the hands of the wealthy people a preference of one-third off the duty on silks, while the labouring classes must still continue to pay the full duty on the sugar which they import from Great Britain. There is one other article which is used largely by the working classes, and to which I wish to refer, and it tends very largely to do away with the claims they have been attempting to put before the people in regard to the influence of this preferential tariff on our trade. I shall refer to the coloured cotton goods, the prints and gingham imported to Canada. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that the government raised the duty 5 per cent on these goods before they gave Great Britain a preference at all. In 1896, we imported from Great Britain, 24,777,228 yards of coloured cottons, and in 1899, we imported from Great Britain, 24,773,173 yards of coloured cottons, showing under this preference, an actual decline of 4,000 yards of coloured cottons imported from Great Britain. The average cost, however, of the goods imported from Great Britain, in 1899, was 9.21 cents per yard, and the increase in cost in 1899 over the cost in 1896, was actually 1.18 cents per yard. In the meantime, there had been a reduction in 1899 of the duty under the preference, amounting to $193,175, which the government claim they put right into the pockets of the people. I do not think it is possible for the government to prove any such statement. Both gray and white goods imported from Great Britain showed an actual decline in 1899, from prices of 1896, but the coloured cotton goods showed an advance. White cotton goods, which are not imported so largely as coloured, but more largely than gray, show importations from Great Britain in 1896, at an average cost of 8.29 cents per yard, and in 1899, at an average cost of 8.02 cents per yard, showing that there really was no reason for the advance in coloured cotton goods over those of 1896. It shows that the market was fairly even, there being scarcely a quarter of a cent difference in the price. The average price from the United States of coloured cotton goods, was also uniform. In 1896, we imported from the United States, 6,774,492 yards, at an average cost of 7.38 cents per yard, and in 1899, we imported from the United States, 10,511,822 yards, at an average cost of 7.34 cents. So that the price in 1896 and 1899 on cotton goods from the United States, was absolutely uniform. Now, Mr. Speaker, what does that prove beyond any question? It proves, not that the working people of Canada saved the reduction of duty under the preference, viz.: $193,715; but it proves that that astute business man John Bull, said to himself: That cute offspring of mine from over the water, whose manager did not know enough of business to ask a preference in my market, has given me a preference in his, and he has set up the duty 5 per cent against my older son, Samuel, on these goods that are required from me, and I will give them a little lesson in business, and show them that John has still an eye open for that sort of thing. And what did John Bull do? He set up the price fully equal to the reduction in duty by the preference and the additional duties imposed on the United States goods. And what is the result? Of coloured cotton goods, we imported from Great Britain, in 1899, 24,773,173 yards, at an advance of 1.18 cents per yard, by which we paid $292,323 more than we should have paid. But that is not all. The working people of this country also paid 5 per cent advance on all the goods imported from the United States, which on the $894,888 worth imported, was equal to $44,744. That is in all, we actually paid $337,067 more than we would have paid on these goods under the tariff of 1896. But we got a rebate in preference of $193,715, so that the working people have actually paid net, for this farce that the Liberals call a preference with Great Britain, to the tune of $143,352. This statement can be verified, Sir, by any gentleman who takes the trouble to look at the trade returns.

It means that the working people of this country, the poorer classes, who use these goods chiefly, had to pay this additional amount of $142,352, because the business acumen of the British manufacturers and the lack of acumen of the Canadian government made it possible under this preference. If the farmers were getting a preference for their products in exchange for this, there might be some reason for it; but, with this government it is all give and no take. I suppose we should make some exceptions, because we have had some of these tin-pot titles and Cobden medals; and possibly more are to come in the future, as I think some hon. gentlemen opposite are getting their good clothes ready. The claim of hon. gentlemen opposite that this preference reduces the price of goods made in the country as well as of those made in the United States, does not obtain in any particular. I do not say that in some few small lines it may not obtain; but, in the lines of the greatest imports it has not been the case. This same staple in the United States has not varied to any extent. It was virtually the same in the years 1896 and 1899; and still we had a large increase from the United States. The conditions are such between the United States and Canada, as I said before, that our people follow the styles prevailing in the United States; so that, we imported in 1899, 10,511,822 yards as against 6,744,492 yards in 1896, showing that it is not the lower price that governs the demand, but the colour and style of the goods, because the prices were virtually the same. If the statement made years ago by those now on the government benches, and still, I presume, advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite, is correct, that the manufacturers of this country simply add the duty to the cost of the foreign price of the goods coming into this country, they simply made it possible, not that goods should be lowered in price, but that they should be increased in price by the 5 per cent they added at the time they made their revision. These business men in a business cabinet have not yet found one thing—that protection is a relative quantity. They have only two gods left them now to swear by: one is surplus, and the other volume of trade; and they are setting these on high, praying that these may save them from the electorate whom they have deceived and cajoled for many years.

As I have stated, protection is not a fixed, but a relative quantity. While 25 per cent on some lines of goods may be highly protective, it may not be sufficient on other lines. You cannot apply one general rule to all imports. The conditions must be considered. A uniform tariff is utterly impossible in a large producing country, and I am going to take two lines of manufactures to illustrate this. The business of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), for instance, requires three things in order to make it successful. It requires capital, which I am glad to know the hon. gentleman possesses and has accumulated under a protective tariff; it requires machinery, which his capital will also provide; and it requires good management, which I have no doubt he gives it. It is not a business influenced to any extent by the low cost of labour in any country with which he must compete. It is not a business in which the labour must be expert and draw high wages; the workmen engaged in it do not require technical skill. It may be that this business is too highly protected, considering all the conditions, although I am a protectionist myself. But, there are industries in a wholly different condition. For instance, in the county I represent there is a red granite industry, which is the only red granite in Canada, equal to the Scotch granite. It is an industry that requires skilled workmen, who have to put in years of experience in order to do their work in such a way that the granite will compete with the Scotch granite. Nature has given us an abundant store of the raw material, and capital is required to develop it. Machinery plays a very small part in it, but it requires brains and years of experience to work it. Every man, from the quarryman to the man who puts the last tap of the mallet on his chisel, in working the granite, requires to be an expert. It requires a great deal of careful and intelligent handling from start to finish. The Minister of Customs has retained a highly protective tariff on his own business, which requires only capital and machinery, in which skilled labour is not nearly so largely required as in this granite industry; but, what has he done for the several granite firms in the town of St. George? What has he told them in regard to this preference, which means a preference for Scotch labour? He says to them in substance: 'I shall protect my business; I am retaining the highly-protective tariff which the Conservatives put on it in 1894; but, so far as your business is concerned, it is true you have to compete against the low-priced labour of Scotland; but, we cannot consider you in the matter. It is true your business demands a great deal more skilled labour, and consequently provides in wages a great deal more money to be invested in other Canadian manufactures than my business does; but, we cannot consider you, even though your business represents ten times the advantage to this country in labour than mine does. Even though you have to pay greater freights in order to land your goods in the large centres, in Montreal and Toronto and the west, than is paid from Aberdeen to these points, while my trade is within easy reach, still, we cannot consider you. You must remember that some one must be sacrificed, and after considering all these things, the Liberal party have determined that your business must be sacrificed; but, my business must be protected.' So, he simply sacrifices their business to the tune of one-third of the duty. He sees that his business has a protection of 25 and 27½ per cent, though capital and machinery does the work, whereas, where brains and skill are required, and where competition with the low wages of Scotland has to be endured, he says that 23½ per cent is all that this government will allow. That is the way the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs are talking to the skilled labour of this country, not only in the granite industry, but in the woollen and other industries, while the Minister of Customs sits down and piles up his ducats to run another election in Brant. While the first cut was no doubt to overcome that disastrous cry of the party to discriminate against Great Britain, in 1891, that did not suffice, and now they make a second cut of one-third of the duty, and trying to cover up that wonderful phrase, the no-precedent clause in the order in council relating to the first contingent.

Now, Sir, I have a few remarks to make about a few other gentlemen in this cabinet. It would take a month to deal with all the jibes and jeers of the Minister of Trade and Commerce against the protective features of the national policy. You can count all the years from 1878 to 1896, and you will find that they were filled with one continuous round of abuse of the national policy by that hon. gentleman. But, the world moves, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, enjoying the sweets of office and a fairly good salary, and under the hypnotic influence of his good doctor, the Minister of Finance, he now swallows, almost in its entirety, the protective features of that policy against which he railed for so many long years. It would be hard to recognize him as the same hon. gentleman who gave us his most solemn assurance that he would fight protection until he died. Any one who knows him and his record must come to the conclusion at once that he did die in 1896 when he accepted office under this new ministry, and was relegated to a back seat in the cabinet, while his friend who sits at his left (Mr. Fielding) was put in the place that for many long years he fondly hoped to occupy. Protection is still with us. If the hon. gentleman has any doubt, let him ask his hon. colleague, the Minister of Customs, let him ask the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), let him ask the hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost), and a few other gentlemen who are sitting on that side. There is no question about protection being here, and these hon. gentlemen know it. But, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is in a peculiar position. Each successive year, 1897, 1898 and 1899, he has filled the place assigned to him, and each successive year he has tamely approved, ratified and confirmed the protective features of the tariff, and each successive budget speech has been an obituary notice informing the people that, so far as any political influence is concerned or any influence on the trade of this country, the Minister of Trade and Commerce died when he accepted office. But, the good old-time Liberals throughout the country, who were wont to take everything he said almost as the law and the gospel, who pinned their faith to him when he said the Conservative government were bleeding the people white, now that he is taking from their pockets $7,000,000 more than was taken in 1896, will be a little mite surprised. But, they need not be. It is only another evidence that the hon. gentleman has died to all his former professions.

They will also remember other things in connection with the hon. gentleman. They will remember that he once said :

I say it is a disgrace and a shame to the government that has been entrusted with our affairs to come down and ask for an expenditure of $38,000,000 a year for federal purposes. I have said before, and I repeat it, that $38,000,000 is a monstrous sum for this people to be called on to provide for.

But, when his good doctor, the Minister of Finance, brought, in 1897, estimates amounting to $42,972,755, just about $5,000,000 more than the amount which the hon. gentleman had railed against as excessive, he said to him: Be good, Sir Richard, now and take your medicine, for if you will not, I will take you at your word and abolish the office you said should never have been created. And the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce quietly took his medicine.

Then, in 1898, and 1899, and 1900, as each successive budget speech was brought to the hon. gentleman, he swallowed it whole, although each succeeding one contained a little more gall than its predecessor, and the hon. gentleman sits there at times and tries to look pleased, as if he really enjoyed his medicine. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when at Toronto, said he was simply an onlooker. That is quite evident. It is perfectly evident that the hon. gentleman is dead, and that he is simply floating over this country nowadays in the form of a spirit, so far as any influence of his is concerned. He has lost all the influence he ever had on his party, and will find that he has lost all the influence he ever had in the country. He has proved that he has certainly lost all his professions of economy. But, the hon. gentleman is simply like the others—he does not forget. He is still there, willing to occupy the position he holds, willing to draw his salary. But there are some honest Liberals in the party, there are even some on the front benches of the party over there. There is one whom I propose to quote—a gentleman who was wholly ignored when this government came into power, a gentleman who deserved recognition at the hands of the party. But the position he should have occupied was stolen from him and given to a man who dared not even come out and show his colours during the fight in 1896. I propose to quote the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) with regard to some statements of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Shortly after that memorable speech was delivered in Toronto by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, after the Minister of Trade and Commerce had politically died, the hon. member for St. John published in his paper these remarks :

The intelligent observer of public affairs cannot fail to see that the tone of this speech, and its general tenor, are very different from speeches which were delivered by Sir Richard some time ago.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce, before he died, used to rail against that most extreme method of protection, namely, the giving of bounties. He said at one time :

I disapprove of the whole business altogether. For my part, I refuse to be bound by it, and I say, expressly for the benefit of manufacturers, that I for one utterly refuse to be bound by any such proposition. I take the opportunity to protest against it in advance, so that parties hereafter, should there be a change of policy on the part of the people, may not be able to say they never had any warning.

But, what happened? When this government took office and the Minister of Trade and Commerce became responsible, the bounty was increased from $2 to $3 a ton, and was extended to puddled bars and steel ingots, with the provision that it should continue in force until 1907. Truly, the world moves. I have one more reminiscence or two in connection with this hon. gentleman. He said :

Two of the most barbarous taxes even in our present barbarous tariff—I doubt if it is possible to find two more utterly odious and detestable taxes—were the taxes on coal and flour. This tax on coal may be considered as the tax of all others which sets most at defiance every sound principle of political economy and of common sense.

Now, you see where the doctor comes in. The doctor had to protect the coal barons, and so, when the tariff was brought down with the coal duty still on, good Sir Richard had to take this dose and swallow his medicine, and take back his statements of former years :

You cannot conceive of any tax more indefensible, which is more absurd, which is worse in its practical operation than the same duty on coal.

But, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has one consolation. He is not the only one of his party who has received the attention of the doctor. The doctor gave an absent treatment to some of his supporters, particularly to the hon. member for North Norfolk, who years ago discoursed upon the beauty of improved trade relations with the United States, but who, a few weeks ago, was just as loud in discoursing on the beauties of a preference to Great Britain, and shouted loudly loyalty and Imperial unity. He must have ransacked the whole of Webster's dictionary in order to find adjectives enough to express his horror and contempt of the United States for the usage they had dealt out to Canada. But, the great medicine man of the land of Evangeline (Mr. Fielding) quoted this :

'There is that that scattereth and yet increaseth.'

The member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) retorted.

That is quite true. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) is scattering the funds of this country with the hope of increasing his term of office. It is true, these gentlemen who are tumbling over each other in order to show their loyalty, seem to have a community of interest. They are taking millions of money out of the people in the way of taxation, and spending millions more in expenditures than they contracted to spend. But they must have it, their friends demand it, for we remember that the Minister of Public Works said that elections are not won by prayers. And have we not the same sort of evidence from the Minister of Railways and Canals who, of all men in this country, should know something about elections being won by other means than prayers? He has stated his opinion of the uses of the resources of civilization in elections. We had a speech from the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) the other night, and there was one notable thing in it or not in it. He did not repeat his pre-election advice that 'if we did not reduce the expenditure by $3,000,000 in two years, turn us out.' That was one of the things the hon. member forgot to put in. What a nightmare he must have, in view of the increasing taxation, the increasing burdens and expenditure; and worse than that, the horror of impending doom when he returns for re-election. The only time that hon. gentleman has really looked pleasant this session was on that evening when he exhibited that caricature of himself in petticoats, representing a maiden lady of sour mien and uncertain age. The hon. gentlemen, however, is doing work which was done a few years ago by the former member for Lambton, who occupied the same position the member for North Wellington does to-day. When anything abusive was required the member for Lambton was called upon, and he performed the task in good order. Result, a judgeship at $6,000 a year. Well, the member for North Wellington must have taken up the same position. All he needs is a nod from the leader of the House or from one of the ministers, and he is ready to use his powers of abuse. I have no doubt that hon. gentleman will get his reward. These hon. members, you know, when you suggest anything like that across the floor of the House, deny that they are promised anything, they are simply working for love. They are simply doing—I would not like to say the dirty work of the party, but they are doing work that is at least discreditable to them and to the party who asks them to do it. But they disclaim any hope of reward. They remind me very much of a certain gentleman who, in the Southern States a few years ago, was giving an exhibition of the X Rays. Among other things he suggested that if he turned the rays upon a man's stomach he could find out what he had been eating. A darky came up and said: Mr., is that so? Yes, replied the exhibitor. If I have been eating a chicken, can you see that chicken? Yes, sir. Well, the darky thought a little while, and then he said: Mr., there is just one other question I would like to ask you: Could you tell the roost from which that chicken came? Now, these hon. gentlemen disclaim having any offices promised to them, the member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), as well as others. But everybody knows that they are there. The only question is as to whether we can tell just exactly the roost these chickens are going to. Now, the world moves, as is evidenced by the member for North Wellington. It will move him probably into office or out of North Wellington, one thing or the other. But I advise the hon. gentleman, who, I believe, is of a poetical strain, to revise that little couplet of his and make it apply to his own party :

Mr. GANONG.

Joined together heart and hand,
Liberals for protection stand.

I intended to quote a little from the speeches of the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I think his speech in this House removes any doubt as to whether the world moves or not. Had that hon. gentleman started from Tonawanda and tumbled himself all the way west and north around the lakes to Ottawa, he could not have more thoroughly upset himself than he upset every policy he has advocated for the last 15 or 20 years. Just one more such somersault and this hon. gentleman would hate the United States so much that he would not let a log or a stick of Canadian timber go there, and that would be a lamentable thing for him. The country will wonder if this conversion of the member for North Norfolk is real and genuine. We have had three or four gentlemen equally great sinners in their particular lines. The Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Customs and others rose in this House during this debate and confessed their sins, confessed that the things they once loved, unrestricted reciprocity and discrimination against Great Britain, they now hate. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance are again grovelling in the mire. I believe, however, the Minister of Customs is still sticking, in fact there is no gentleman in the House that has so good a reason to stick. He will not advocate a policy of unrestricted reciprocity because it might close up his business. I think the country will look upon these gentlemen with doubt. These death-bed confessions and repentances among politicians are not very satisfactory to the common mind.

Now, one other hon. gentleman I wish to refer to, is the Hon. David Mills, the Minister of Justice. He has also discovered that the world moves. The world moved him out of Bothwell as a representative, and the intelligent electors of that constituency returned a man here who will be true to the principles he advocated before his election in 1896. By the interposition, not of Providence, but of Grit government, Mr. David Mills was moved into the Senate, he was moved from his forced retirement to a seat where he will not be called upon again to meet the electorate that had refused him. What are some of the statements made by this hon. gentleman?

We are asking for a reduction of taxation, we are asking for economy in the management of public affairs.

Mr. Mills also stated that they estimated that the probable saving, if they came into power, would be $4,000,000. Now, in the light of such statements made by Mr. Mills before 1896, what will the present Minister of Justice say? What will he have to say about Mr. David Mills who, in 1893, said there should be a reduction of at least $4,000,000? What will the Minister of Justice say to this hon. member who claimed that this saving should be made, and that economy should reign. He surely cannot condone it. It would be passing strange if he should abet the action of Mr. David Mills, in 1900, after making these statements in 1896. Surely a David must have come to judgment. Will he condemn the David Mills of 1893? Oh, no; he will say: I will have forgiven you for your name's sake. And then beside that, I must help my friends and others who placed me here when I was defeated by my constituents. The world moves in this instance still, and the least the hon. gentleman could do now would be to write a poem describing the difference between promises made, but never kept, and the delectation of taxing the people $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 more than he had stated was necessary, and having a share in this largely increased expenditure of $10,000,000 or $12,000,000. These cold facts sound rather harsh in prose, but if the hon. gentleman would put them into poetry the rough edges might be taken off them. I have had occasion already to quote from the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), who, I regret to see, is not in his place. He claims to represent the garden of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. He said that the Liberal party believed that several millions should be lopped off the public expenditure without injury to the public service. That was while he was Mr. Louis Davies, in 1893, and he spoke for the old Liberal party. Now, what is the difference. He is to-day the leader of the new Liberalism. He says, in substance. What do we democratic knights, made and to be made care for a few millions more or less robbed from the people? It does not mean anything to us. He said:

You have a market to the south of you where everything you can draw out of the sea or delve from the mines or grow from the soil, will find a ready and profitable sale.

What has the hon. gentleman done to open up that market? He has assisted in spending $36,000 of the people's money without gaining any market to the south. The hon. gentleman is absolutely ignorant of the capabilities of his own province. Speaking in this House in 1892, he said:

In the face of the fact that heretofore over 50 per cent of the total exports of all the maritime provinces have been sent to the United States, the hon. gentleman told us that we must change our mode of farming and make cheese and send home fat cattle to England.

Was there ever better advice given to the farming community. The hon. gentleman continues:

The hon. gentleman knows we have tried that time and again. I remember a few years ago when the people of Prince Edward Island invested their capital to the extent of £34,000 sterling or £35,000 sterling in the purchase of a large iron ship which we put on the route between the island and England, in the hope of opening a trade.

This is one of the business men of the cabinet.

We shipped our cattle for one or two years. We tried to ship our sheep and other products, but I am sorry to say, after it had been tried a year or two, it was not found profitable, and the enterprise was entirely given up. It is no use denying the fact that our natural trade and market lies in the United States.

That was Mr. Louis Davies, a gentleman who to-day is shouting for a preference to Great Britain. Now, this hon. gentleman, in a speech as late as last December, makes some remarks in regard to this matter.

On Prince Edward Island—the garden of the Dominion—we were going backward under the old order of things. We are now going forward. Cheese factories, lobster factories and scores of other factories are springing up everywhere, and the exodus has almost ceased.

What are the real facts of the case? In 1892, under Conservative rule there was one cheese factory established. In 1893, there were eleven cheese factories producing 48,000 pounds of cheese, and in 1894, sixteen cheese factories producing 90,000 pounds of cheese. This has been continued as a result of the work of the Conservative government, until last year the record showed 39,000,000 pounds of milk were converted into 3,746,168 pounds of cheese, and that 16,719,338 pounds of milk were converted in 722,614 pounds of butter. He did not know what was going on in his own province, and it is no wonder that in the late local elections they turned him down. We had a visit in my country from two hon. ministers of the Crown, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries accompanied the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. They had been making a tour of the province. The supposition is, and it is very strongly confirmed, that the hon. Minister of Railways had been looking for some place where he might offer his services with safety to the lost cause. Two weeks advertising of this big meeting, the first time that two ministers were ever going to visit the town of St. Andrews, excursions run from the Island, two steamers, the government steamer brought into requisition to bring the people, some gentlemen invited to ride down in the private car of the Minister—they wanted to see how it would feel to be in a private car—and the result of it all was that they had an attendance of 500 or 600 people in a town of 1,200 people. They succeeded in bringing twenty-seven fishermen out of 8,000 who are dependent on the fisheries. They presented an address to the minister which I regret, is so long. It is really worth preserving. Among other things they said to these hon. gentlemen that it was the first time in the history of St. Andrews that its residents had the signal honour of meeting on the public platform two responsible—responsible, mind you—ministers of the Crown. They went on to say:

We recognize in you the representatives of one of the most progressive and patriotic governments that Canada has ever had the good fortune to possess.

Mr. GANONG.

Later on they say that they appreciate the works of the government:

Particularly by the patriotic course of your government in so promptly responding to the appeal for troops to be sent to Africa, and in offering to the Imperial government a second volunteer contingent.

Later on they say:

A breadth of patriotism has been evinced, which we feel sure will redound to the future advantage of Canada as well as to the empire at large.

These are a few of the things that were said in the address presented to the hon. gentlemen before they made their speeches. Now, we had quite a number of good Liberals on the platform, among them Mr. A. H. Gillmor, a gentleman who was honest in his convictions, a gentleman who has not varied very much in the convictions which he expressed in 1896, but to show the House the opinions of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I will read an extract. It is taken from a Liberal paper, so I presume it is gospel. He said that:

He had great pleasure in listening to the ringing notes of Mr. Gillmor. He had been his desk-mate for ten years. He had much confidence in Mr. Gillmor's wisdom. He regretted that he had not been returned at the last election. In parliament there was no man who was listened to with greater pleasure and profit.

Well, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillmor), is now out of trouble. He is where even the Minister of Railways and Canals cannot overlook him. He can do as he chooses, so I wish to put on Hansard, the record and the opinions of this hon. gentleman, that they have recently put in the Senate. In 1897, he visited a fish fair at Campobello, and among other remarks, this Senator Gillmor said. This report is taken from a good Tory paper, and so it must be true. Mr. Gillmor said:

He favoured free trade now as he always did. His friends in power did not differ from their late predecessors as much as he would like them to. If he was in their place he would try to come a little nearer to his promises than the party is doing.

That is the evidence of Mr. Gillmor's wisdom, suggested by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). Lest there might be some possible doubt about that, I hold in my hand a letter signed A. H. Gillmor, in which he compliments the reporter of the Conservative paper, for reporting him so fairly. I would pass the letter over to some hon. gentleman on the other side, but I have some recollection of West Elgin ballots, and I might lose the letter. Again in 1898, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillmor), referred to the jubilee celebration, in which Sir Wilfrid Laurier had taken so prominent a part, and he is reported to have said:

He felt that plain old common sense and plain old honesty should be more prominent in politics and religion than was noticeable at present.

If that is complimentary to hon. gentlemen who are now occupying the Treasury benches, they are welcome to it.

He felt that plain old common sense and plain old honesty should be more prominent in politics and religion than was noticeable at present. He was not responsible just now for anything going on at Ottawa or Fredericton, but he remarked that there might be a little closer adherence to old methods of common sense and honesty than were observable among some of the politicians and some of the churches at the present time.

That is the opinion of this honest old-time Liberal, and I think it should go on record, because there are a few of his sort left in this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), made a pilgrimage to the north, and his friends, three or four weeks before that, had been arranging his meeting, and when he got up there, there was one of those spontaneous outbursts that come from the people in such form, that they presented him with the nomination prepared beforehand. It was all arranged for the show. The minister (Mr. Blair), feels a little doubtful of Queen's and Sunbury. He has been there recently at a municipal election, and his friends were turned down. He is now looking for some other constituency. It is even rumoured that he went to Charlotte to see what shape that county would be in, and he brought with him the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), to appeal to the fishermen there. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair), knows whether that is correct or not. But, at all events, there was no nomination for him in Charlotte. They did not get but 27 fishermen from the islands, and that would have been rather a weak number to sign the nomination paper, even after all the advertising they did. The people of that county had some vivid recollection of Mr. Louis Davies, when he dropped briny tears over what they were suffering from the coal oil duty, and the flour duty, and other duties that, he said, were grinding down the fishermen. And they presumed that Mr. Louis Davies was coming down to say something encouraging. They remembered that he said :

What is the use of pointing the people of New Brunswick to the market of England for their produce, when they send nothing there except, as I said, deals and deal ends. Everything else they have to export goes to the United States; and if you do not enlarge the market there and knock down the barriers which prohibit the people from trading there, commercial atrophy will continue to exist, as I regret to say, it does exist in that province.

They expected to hear the hon. gentleman say, how much return he was bringing them for the $36,000 of their money he expended. Has he knocked down any barriers for these gentlemen in my county? No, Mr. Speaker, not a barrier. They expected this hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies), to show how much he knew of the capabilities of Canada after all his years of experience in political life; after all his years of playing statesman. Now, let me read you one item from the hon. gentleman's budget, to show how much he has learned. Referring to the statement of the Minister of Finance in 1892, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is reported thus :

He was pleased and joyful when he announced that the exports of Canada had increased, but the great pean of congratulation which he offered to his followers was this (that the door was closed hereafter against any trade with the United States, that there was no hope of reciprocity, unrestricted or otherwise) and that hereafter we were to treat with England and England alone.

He was treating at that time, as all the Liberals were, with the United States. The United States was the only hope of the Liberal party at that time, and he acknowledges here that the hope of the Conservative party was as it has always been, the hope of doing trade with England :

It was seen well where the hearts of his followers were.

Sir, the hearts of the Conservative party in this country, are now, and have always been, with the motherland, and we only wish we could say as much of the Liberal leaders of Canada.

It was seen well where the hearts of his followers were. The cheering which greeted his statement with respect to the exports was moderate, but when he announced that hereafter we had better not discuss the question of reciprocity, the enthusiasm of his followers knew no bounds. The Minister of Railways sat behind him smiling and laughing, not ashamed to be proud that the negotiations, whether honest or dishonest, I will not for the moment say, with the United States proved to be absolutely a failure. Hereafter, said the hon. gentleman, our farmers must change their mode of farming, as they must look, not to the markets to the south of us, but across the seas, and hon. gentlemen opposite cheered him to the echo.

Is it any wonder they cheered him? Has not that been the policy of the Conservative party ever since they came into power in 1878. At all events, Mr. Louis Davies, readily showed where his longing eyes were cast. He further said :

Are we to legislate in the interests of Canada or in the interests of the British exporter?

In whose interests is he attempting to legislate to-day? Certainly in the interests of the British exporter. Further he said :

Whose interests are going to be paramount if they clash? For my part, I have long since made up my mind that when they clash my vote will go for Canada.

The world moves, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), is voting to-day in the interests of the British exporter. He said further :

Sir, we do not hold that the door is closed. We have good reason to know better, not only from the official statements made in Congress, not only from the articles in the newspapers, not only from the constant flow of our people back and forth from the United States, but by conversations which we, individually, have had—and I speak for myself, which I individually have had—with a large number of leading statesmen of the United States, all which facts cause me to believe that it is quite possible for an honest man who goes there with a sincere desire to promote a fair treaty, to negotiate one in a very short time. Sir, we will have to give as well as to take; there must be justice done to both sides.

Did the minister from everywhere recite his story of '92 to that meeting at St. Andrew's? Did he say, I Louis Davies, Esq., in '92 said, it is quite possible for an honest man to promote a fair treaty, but when I, Sir Louis Davies, K.C.B., Minister of Marine and Fisheries, went there, they treated me as dishonest. We, the present government, had followed out our ideas of giving; we had given free corn, free binder twine, free barbed wire, and we have since given free coasting on the lakes. I was ready to take, but all the opportunity I had offered, was to take my traps and start for Canada, which I did at your expense. And every man on that commission is ready to sing the old refrain, 'I'll never go back any more.' Did he say, when we went to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States, they took us for a lot of political fakirs, and justly so. Did he say, look at our records and see if they had not good reason to do so. What is that record? Mr. Wilfrid Laurier, Mr. Louis Davies, Mr. John Charlton, swearing to stand by unrestricted reciprocity with discrimination against Great Britain, one day (but that was when we were honest, in '92); but when we went to negotiate a treaty, see us as Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Prime Minister; Sir Louis Davies, Minister of Marine and Fisheries; and Senator John Charlton, of Michigan. We now had increased the tariff against the United States, and were shouting even more loudly for preference for Great Britain than we were for discrimination against Great Britain in 1891 and 1892. He did not tell the people this, but it is a fact just the same.

Mr. Speaker, you will note, this was no ordinary political meeting—the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Minister of Railways both know that it was specially called for special purpose, which however, failed. The Minister of Railways was driven out of York county in the local House. He took good care not to commit himself in the elections of 1896 until his party got into power, and he was sure of his office. Then, Sir, he was in a nice position; he was playing puss in the corner, that good old game. He stood in the centre of the province of New Brunswick, and said, 'Poor pussy wants a corner'; and there was not a corner open. After a while the hon. gentleman waved around a couple of flags, one with the post office of Marsh Hill on it, and the other with a senatorship on it; and then he found the pussy who would take another corner—first in the post office and then in the Senate, and the hon. gentleman found a corner in the county of Sunbury and Queen's. But to-day he is in a worse position than he was in 1896. He stands there, and there is no corner for him. He went up to the county of Restigouche and got a nomination, but it does not look like a safe thing. He came to Charlotte and cried: 'Pussy wants a corner,' but it does not like a sure position. So to-day the hon. gentleman is crying, 'Pussy wants a corner,' in the hope that Providence will show him some safe seat which will return him to this parliament.

I say it was a visit—a first visit of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to a community depending on the fisheries—8,000 of them. It was to be presumed fishing interests were most to be considered. Let me ask this hon. gentleman a few questions. Did he tell the fishermen he had opened any new markets for their products? Did he tell them that instead of the fishing regulations in the United States against Canadian fishermen being relaxed, they were enforced even more stringently than before his government came into power? Did he tell them that the great West Indian markets of Cuba and Porto Rico, that take upwards of $1,000,000 of the products of these toilers of the sea in eastern Canada—shipped either direct or in bond through New York—have gone absolutely under the control of the United States, and that we have no guarantee the markets may not be closed on our fish any day? Did he tell these fishermen that communication by telephone from Deer Island with Eastport, Me., the principal market for their fish, which had been urgently pressed upon the government, has been refused so far, although the annual charge for interest would be less than $100 per year? Did he tell them that their demand voiced through their convention for a standard measure for fish, which had been presented to this House in the form of a Bill and concurred in by the Minister of Inland Revenue, had been thrown out by his opposition? There is another Bill of the same kind coming before the House this session, and if he thinks it best, let him oppose it, and see how much advantage it will be to his party among the fishermen in the county of Charlotte. Did he tell the fishermen that the present regulation would be changed in regard to hours for fishing on Saturdays and Mondays, which, owing to tidal conditions requires weir fishermen to lose Monday fishing, only leaving them five days a week to earn their living where others have six? Did he tell them that his government had increased the price of sugar to the consumers by increased duties of over $700,000 for 1899. It would not do to make that statement, for on the same platform was the only honest free trader in their party, who had shouted free sugar, the Hon. A. H. Gillmor. Did he tell the fishermen the government had increased the duty on tobacco, so it now costs from 25 to 33½ per cent more than in 1896. And just here I want to say, with reference to the remarks of the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) last night, that in the fishing industry native tobacco, whatever its virtues may be, has not been adopted. The fishermen as a rule will not use it. So that the tobacco which formerly cost our fishermen 6 cents is now costing them 8 cents, which shows the great advantage of being under Grit rule. I do not know whether it will ever be possible to get our fishermen to use the native tobacco, as they have tastes which are perhaps peculiar to themselves. They are very large users of tobacco. Of the $1,151,000 of increased duties paid in 1899 on tobacco over 1896, the fishermen paid a very large proportion.

Did the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries tell them what the lobster law was, is, or is to be? No, Sir, he did not even know himself. He changed the law while he was there. Did he do it on the representations of the county convention? No, Sir, he did it on the representations of two or three of his political friends. On their representations, this guardian of the deep shifted the whole lobster law of the Bay of Fundy, and the lobster does not know whether he should shrink a quarter of an inch or stretch a quarter of an inch to protect himself from illegal fishing.

Here is the greatest outrage on the people a minister was ever guilty of. It has been the habit to license weirs to be built along the shores of our country. A man would pay $5 to the fishery guardian and have permission to go on and build his weirs. He had necessarily to cut the brush in the winter before the sap had started out too much. But the government did away with new weir licenses this year, and I know of one gentleman who spent $200 in getting his weir ready only to find out a couple of weeks ago that notices were sent out forbidding the building of any more weirs although it had been an established fact for years that these men had the right to build them. Instead of giving the notices in time, they allowed these men along the shores to expend $100 or $200 each in labour getting their weir material ready, and then told them that they must not build them. Even now it may be too late as all that weir stuff must be put into water before it gets a chance to dry up too much. This is one of the advantages which the hon. gentleman did not tell he had brought about when he addressed the fishermen in our country. If ever there was a moral, if not a legal, liability, this government is morally liable to the fishermen of Charlotte county in many thousands of dollars.

Nor did he tell them about their representatives in Paris, which appointment is one of the most laughable things that ever occurred in this country. I do not say that Major Gordeau is not a good departmental officer, but I have yet to learn what knowledge he has of the habits and conditions of the fish in this country. Did he tell these people down by the sea that the gentlemen he sent to Paris to have control of our fisheries exhibit cannot tell a sprat from a mackerel or a whale from a bottle neck ship. When I made inquiry as to his qualifications in this House, the Minister of Marine did not know enough himself to reply, but he had to relegate that duty to the hon. Minister of Agriculture, and that hon. gentleman said:

I beg to say that the Deputy Minister of the Marine Department has gone to Paris in charge of the fishery exhibit, and that he has a technical and practical and scientific knowledge of the fisheries of Canada.

What a wonderful discovery that was for the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher)!

That he has experience in connection therewith, and it is for that reason he was appointed to do the work.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if the facts were known, he was appointed beyond doubt at the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), who wanted somebody to show him around Paris, and help him to spend the $50,000 granted for the purposes of the exhibition. They sent this gentleman over to do what? To represent an industry which employs 81,500 fishermen, on which 400,000 of the citizens of Canada are dependent, and in which $10,000,000 capital are invested, and in which the gross business represents from $20,000,000 to $22,000,000 annually. Why did they not send a more practical man, who did know something of the fisheries of this country? These men down by the sea expected to hear some encouraging words from the Minister of Marine, something pertinent to their own business, but I do not see what they could expect from a minister who could not reply to the question I put him regarding the qualifications of the representatives he sent over to Paris to take charge of our fishery exhibit, although the question was on the Order paper some two or three weeks. As regards the reply of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, I have only this to say, that if that hon. gentleman knows as much, and no more, of agriculture than he does of the qualifications necessary for one who represents the fishing interests of Canada at Paris, I would advise him to read that classical work, 'Chimmie Fadden' and he will learn what kind of a farmer he is in the opinion of fishermen, and that the sooner he gets a duchess to direct his actions the better for the country.

Well, Mr. Speaker, as these ministers did not talk business to the fishermen as they had expected, it is open to question what they came for. I made an inquiry of a good old time Liberal, as to results of the meeting. His reply was—'I did not go down to hear apologies for increased taxation and increased expenditure, or to hear them spend so much time white-washing Mr. Sifton and Mr. Tarte.' He had supposed before that meeting we had responsible government, but both Sir Louis Davies and Mr. Blair had disabused his mind of that. In his description he said: Mr. Blair put forward a proposition in principle as follows: A man so disposed can organize a band of robbers, sit down at a council board, and discuss their mutual interests, delegate one of the company to rob a bank and return with the spoils to divide, but the company would not be responsible, but only the men who robbed the bank. That was the view of Mr. Blair and Sir Louis Davies, and I do not think we need go very far to prove this, because in the newspaper, which gave a report of the meeting, I find that the very same thing was stated by both these hon. gentlemen. They said that we must not take the opinions of any one man, but must go back to the old platform and make that platform do all that is required. The ministers were not responsible at all. It was nothing but the platform that was responsible, but, as this man said to me; the platform has been out of sight for a long time, and I think the people throughout the country are of that opinion. These hon. gentlemen virtually said that each member of the council was at liberty to do and say what he pleased, and the government could not be held responsible. We had a sample of this in the House the other day, when the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), quoted the speech of the Minister of Public Works in Paris. Some of us supposed that the first minister would repudiate that speech, but he did not. He simply condoned it, although it had been reproduced identically in the paper of the Minister of Public Works in this country. Why did he not repudiate it? Simply because he feared the Minister of Public Works, who is the conductor of the whole show. He, it was, who insisted on the famous 'no precedent' being inserted in the order in council, and who holds the whip over the whole cabinet. I will now take the liberty to quote from the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The Minister of Fisheries said:

It is not by the utterance of any one individual that the party ought to be judged, but by their platform.

And the Minister of Railways said:

Sir Louis Davies has pointed out where are to be found the Liberal pledges. They are to be found, not in the utterances of individual members of the party, but in the resolutions of 1893, passed by the Liberal convention. Beyond these the government is not committed.

Mr. GANONG.

The people of Charlotte county are not all fools. They may possibly have been talking to a few Liberals whom they thought they could hoodwink, but they will find when the elections come that they will want some stronger argument than that. I said the Minister of Public Works was the conductor of the show. He is just as much the conductor of the show as it is possible for any one to be. The position occupied by the First Minister and the Minister of Public Works are about the same as those of the motorman and the conductor in an electric car. The First Minister acts as motorman to turn on and off the power as he is directed. The Minister of Public Works acts as the conductor, he starts the show, he stops it, he side-tracks it, he puts his no-precedent-trail around it, and the First Minister does just as he is told.

At that meeting down in St. Andrews, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries dilated on the excellency of the Minister of the Interior and his marvellous handling of Yukon affairs; but I believe he did not try to rob the Minister of Railways and Canals of all the glories and infamies of the Yukon tramway business. Now, if the Minister of Marine and Fisheries thinks he has successfully defended the Minister of the Interior, I ask him to come down again into that county whence fifteen or twenty good honest men have gone into the Yukon to endeavour to get their share of the gold fields, and who are writing home from day to day of the infamies of the government in control of that country. The Minister of Railways apologized for his friend the Minister of Public Works, who made the first Drummond County Railway deal on which the Conservative party saved the country $500,000.

But, there is one thing that is noticeably absent in this address. You do not hear prohibition or plebiscite mentioned in it at all. They won't talk of prohibition or plebiscite, although that was a county that had given 2,000 majority for the plebiscite. The people voted honestly, believing that the Minister of Agriculture would stand by them, believing that the words of the First Minister could be relied on. It was a strange omission, and one that I feel the next representative of the Liberal party in that county will have to account for. All I have further to say in regard to that meeting down there is this: I would like to have these two hon. gentlemen come back to the county again, I am sure the people would like to hear them. They would like to hear these hon. gentlemen attempt to defend the hon. gentleman who forced the government to put the no-precedent clause in an order in council, trying to prevent loyal Canadians from going to join loyal Australians to help the motherland in upholding the rights of British subjects. Now, Sir, the First Minister is no less a sinner than all the rest of these hon. gentlemen. On this question, he said :

We can reduce the amount two, yes, three millions of dollars per year.

And yet we see the increasing millions of expenditure stand out in bold relief in the speech made by the Minister of Finance. The electors begin to think that the First Minister was talking in that long sleep of his. There was another thing that the First Minister stated in his speech. He blamed the Conservatives for certain law expenses, claiming that they were used for a corrupt purpose. But if the hon. gentleman will look up the records of his party he will find that he is not guiltless, but that $267,650 were spent in the same wasteful and corrupt manner that he undertook to stop.

Now, the shipping policy of the hon. gentleman so far as the preferential trade is concerned, is well known. I would advise the hon. gentleman some time to write a book. He may be more successful in that than in some other things. I would suggest as a title, 'How I obtained the Cobden Medal,' or 'How I sacrificed the interests of my Canadian friends.' The Minister of Public Works might also write a book on 'The true story of the no-precedent contingent,' and I would suggest that on the title page he place the words of the junior member for Halifax :

It was the opportunity and the privilege of the leader of the opposition to initiate a proposal to offer Canadian troops for service in South Africa. It was a proud, an enviable, a distinguished opportunity.

Now, Sir, in connection with this matter of the preference, I propose to quote from a Liberal paper of the city of Quebec :

The mutual preference means dependence, with our commerce tied up or imprisoned by a tyrannical treaty.

The mutual preference leads straight to a customs union or British Zollverein.

It will not stop at a commercial bond.

Little by little, slowly and without effort, in fact, by the force of circumstances, it will finish by absorbing us completely and by extinguishing our liberty and our autonomy.

This is what the mutual preference signifies; it is imperialism disguised.

I do not read that particularly for what there is in it, but to show just where these hon. gentlemen would have stood if they had carried out their policy of 1891, if they had carried out this continental free trade and unrestricted policy business. It will not stop at a mere commercial bond. The Hon. Edward Blake recognized that, and he repudiated the whole thing. He recognized that a preference for the United States and a discrimination against Great Britain would eventually lead to a political as well as a commercial bond. The First Minister, who could not send the first contingent, at last got a move on himself and he sent the second one, principally, however, because he was forced to do so by the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition and by the public demand. I believe he has even allowed a third one to go. But in the meantime what do we find from the papers supporting this hon. gentleman? La Patrie, the organ of the Minister of Public Works, was abusing the Conservatives for urging the government to do this duty. This is what La Patrie says :

Mr. Taillon, Mr. Beaubien and Mr. Bergeron constituted themselves the lay figures of Toryism and of the Orangeism of Ontario, that is to say, of the most fanatical and baneful influences that exist in this country.

We denounce them in the name of sound public opinion. We ask our fellow-citizens to brand them as criminal cowards.

I do not believe that he could place this, no-precedent Premier who made one of the most brilliant speeches on this question that has ever been delivered in this parliament anywhere, except amongst these criminal cowards that are referred to, but I question very much whether the gentleman referred to by La Patrie, will consider that the company would be much improved. If the ideas of the hon. Minister of Public Works, and some of his fellows were carried out, we would have to change the prayer in this House in regard to the Queen, so as to read: That she may vanquish and overcome all her enemies, and add to it: But, good Lord, do not consider this a precedent.

Mr. Speaker, I have not recited one-tenth of the evidence of the great trek of the Liberal leaders from the slough into which their policies was landing them, over into a land of peace and plenty already prepared for them under protective conditions. Others had laboured for years while they sulked and kicked, and these gentlemen came into the fruit of the others' labour. Now, Sir, the time is coming near, when these gentlemen will appeal to the country. Have you heard one of these hon. gentlemen quote their former statements as to taxation or expenditure on the floor of this House. Oh, no? Will the Liberal papers from now until the time of an election, print in parallel columns, their pre-election statements as to taxation and expenditure, and the statement of taxation and expenditure for 1900, by the Minister of Finance?

Oh, no; that is the last thing they wish to place fairly before the electors. All they will shout will be: See our surplus, which actually means increased taxation; see our trade returns. But, Sir, they will find the electors will have something to say. They will say: We are not so ignorant as you seem to think us. We know Providence has given us bountiful harvests, and the condition of the world's requirement is such as to give us a large export, with corresponding agricultural prosperity. We know the Conservatives gave us railway and canal facilities for handling these products in spite of your years of opposition. We know the Conservatives would have given us a fast Atlantic service, which you killed as soon as you came into office. We know the Conservatives gave us cold storage. We know the Conservatives started and stimulated the butter and cheese trade. We know the Conservatives initiated the bounty system on iron, which is now tending to an immense development of the iron and steel industry. We know the immense mineral productions have come without your aid. We know you played us false on the plebiscite. What have you done, anyway?

And, what will the electors hear in reply? Simply the same old cry. See our increasing revenue, our increasing foreign trade, to which the farmers and artisans will answer in the words of Mr. Louis Davies in 1892:

The hon. gentleman is absolutely powerless in these matters of trade. Foreign trade is governed by supply and demand.

What the farmers, fishermen and artisans would like to do, is to stand these seventeen Liberal ministers of this business is business government, up in a row from the First Minister to the raw recruit from Quebec, the Minister of the Exterior. Ask them to put on their sunniest smiles, and speak up sharp. The farmer wants to know: Why has the sale of prison-made binder twine been so manipulated to the advantage of your political friends, as to make it possible for the Brantford Binder Twine factory to rob the farmers of a profit of 100 per cent? Why have you made every effort to kill any possible chance of mutual preferential trade within the empire? The workmen want to know: Why you, under a guise of reciprocity with the British West Indies, increased the duty on sugar, so that you have taken over $700,000 more out of them in taxation than they would have paid under the Conservative tariff of 1896? The workmen want to know: Why you have taken $1,151,000 more from them on their tobaccos—the solace of the workingman, after his day's labour? Why have you left coal oil in the position that you have, so that it is possible for a great monopoly to rob this country to the extent of from $500,000 to $1,000,000 a year? The fishermen want to know: Why you have not obtained the long-promised reciprocity with the United States for their products, which you repeatedly asserted any honest man could obtain? All want to know: Why you did not dare to have a judicial investigation into Yukon affairs? Why you tried to perpetrate the Yukon Railway steal of gold lands for Mackenzie and Mann, and others, whose names did not appear in the contract? Why you made a contract by which you are to pay the Grand Trunk Railway 4 per cent on $3,500,000 in perpetuity, while you asked us to accept 2½ per cent on our hard-earned savings, really giving away $87,500 a year in interest, providing this country can raise the money at the rate the hon. Minister of Finance claims they can? Why did you pay the Drummond County Railway who were your political friends, $500,000 more than the road had been offered for, to others? Why did you think it a crime to collect $20,000,000 in customs taxation, and now esteem it a virtue to bleed us white by taking $27,000,000? Why has economy changed since you took office, to mean extravagance and corruption? Why did you play us false on the plebiscite? Why have you dropped the prohibition question as a party, as stated by your First Minister? Why did you not promptly offer help to Britain in her hour of need? Why did sixteen of you, taken at your own estimate of yourselves, as possessed of all the talents, allow the seventeenth to delay the sending of a contingent, and then bulldoze you into adding a no-precedent clause? These are the things the electorate want settled by you gentlemen on the front benches, before they will again give you their confidence.

Mr. GANONG.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that some provision may be made, by which our sailors and fishermen may enter the service of the empire through the navy. I believe it is the earnest desire all over the country, and what a grand recruiting ground we have for this branch of the service, among these 81,500 sturdy, loyal-hearted Canadians. But, gentlemen of this government, or any other government, these men do not want a no-precedent clause to a first, second or third contingent.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the great body of Liberals in Canada, English and French, are loyal to Canada and the empire. I will not say the leaders are disloyal, but rather, that they are decidedly wanting in evidences of loyalty, that they have been so pronounced in the action of loyalty in the other colonies. The disgrace of delay, and no-precedent incident, has been largely wiped off our country by the gallant Canadians at Belmont, Paardeberg and other points, but the disgrace is still and ever will be on this government. As far as it is possible, it has been blotted out of Canadian history by the blood of those heroes who have given their lives for the empire and the glory of Canada. And in no way can truly loyal Canadians so well show their appreciation of past benefits and those to come through British connection, as by showing by public opinion there is a bond indissoluble between Canada and every part of the empire, and although this bond be unwritten on parchment, it is one even more binding, being written deep in the hearts of all loyal Canadians, and now sealed as no written parchment bond was ever sealed—sealed by the mingled life-blood of our heroic sons, French and English, who have fought and died for the empire, side by side on South African mountains and plains. Mr. Speaker, I shall end as I began—the world moves.

Mr. D. D. ROGERS (Frontenac). Mr. Speaker, at this late hour, and at the conclusion of this debate, I will not follow the bad example of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ganong) who has just spoken, and make a long speech—a speech that I do not think any one will ever attempt to read. I shall condense my few remarks into practical shape, so that they may possibly reach the intelligent people of this country, and especially the farming class which I represent. I shall confine myself to treating of the tariff as it affects the agriculturists of this country, for I know that the manufacturers are pretty well looked after in this House. I should wish, Sir, that the farming community were spoken of in a different way from that in which they are often referred to. Some hon. gentlemen speak of them as if they were a people hardly worth considering.

An hon. MEMBER. That is the Conservatives.

Mr. ROGERS. That has been done by hon. gentlemen opposite unfortunately too often. A great deal has been said by members on both sides of the House in this debate from a party standpoint, and I shall venture to do now, as I have done before, namely, speak from an independent standpoint. I feel that at no time in the history of our country was there more necessity to speak from an independent standpoint than at present. The national policy was introduced in 1878, and I can well remember that the late Sir John Macdonald announced at that time that it was only a means towards an end; that it was only proposed in this country because the Americans threw down the gauntlet to us and put a very high tariff against our Canadian industries, which at that time, both agricultural and mechanical, were at a very low ebb. It was felt by many that our industries required a little pap as it were so that they would be able to hold their own against their rivals on the other side. I, with many others, supported the national policy when it was inaugurated, and I supported it conscientiously, and could give reasons for the faith that was in me, which, I am sorry to say, is more than a great many gentlemen can do. The farmers at that time felt that the national policy would be a burden on them, but the farmers are a loyal and patriotic class of the community, and are willing to bear a burden if they conceive it to be in the interests of the country that they should do so. Well, Sir, the national policy got a fair trial for eighteen long years, and I must say for myself that I felt that fifteen years was long enough. I broke away from the old ranks, and I am proud to say that I had the courage of my convictions, and that I told our representatives in the conventions at that time that the national policy was a failure, and an injury to the farmers of Canada instead of a benefit. When the platform of the Patrons of Industry was established, I heartily endorsed it. One of the main planks in that platform is: Tariff for revenue, and so adjusted as to fall as far as possible upon the luxuries and not upon the necessaries of life. That platform took such a strong hold upon the people of the country that men of both parties, to the number of 175,000, subscribed to it. The Patrons were established in 1891, I believe that the reduction made by the Conservative government in the tariff in 1894 was largely done through the influence of the Patron organization, because the Conservatives felt that they could not appeal to the country with a tax of 35 per cent and 40 per cent on a large number of articles of necessity. They, therefore, put many articles on the free list and reduced the duty in many cases from 35 to 20 per cent. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if the Conservatives had done that in 1891, that the Patron organization would possibly not have started in this country, but the people got tired of the high tariff and would not stand it any longer. Well, Sir, the Patrons were not satisfied, and I can tell you that the farmers of this country as a whole are not yet satisfied with the present reductions in the tariff. Now, speaking my own opinion, and without responsibility for the opinions of others, I feel that the reason the present government have not made further reductions in the tariff is that the national policy which we supported for so many years and which took so many millions of dollars out of the pockets of the farmers through high protective tariff and combines and trusts, has had so many ramifications that we know that money has been wielded to slash at us and to make us feel that we have to submit to the burden as long as the power of money is allowed to influence. The farmer knows very well and the country knows the influence that money has on election day. It may be said that you cannot get an honest government until you get an honest people, and there is some truth in that. When we look at the statistics of our own country and the statistics of the great country to the south of us, we can see what protection has done for the agriculturists. In the province of Ontario, the only province for which we have statistics, in ten years the rural population decreased by 35,000, though the natural increase is about 10 per cent. The national policy did not do much to increase the population of Ontario. The assessed value of our property decreased by $11,000,000, whereas I am sure it ought to have increased three times $11,000,000, if agriculture had had a fair chance in the race with other industries. The census statistics of 1891 in the United States showed that of the 12,000,000 farmers living on farms, over 50 per cent were living on rented farms, and of the remaining 50 per cent, 30 per cent were encumbered, leaving not much more than 20 per cent of the farms of the United States free of encumbrance. That was not a very creditable showing for that country, and I am credibly informed that the coming census of 1901 will make a very much worse showing for the farmers of this country. Therefore, it is no wonder that the farmers of Canada are sick and tired of protection. The principle of protection in the United States may stand through the coming elections; but I feel sure that if we live to see the succeeding election, we shall see it swept off the face of the land; and I hope, though gradually and very slowly, that it is being swept away here. I could not help remarking that when the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), while speaking of the preferential clause in the tariff, was asked if he would repeal it if returned to power, he replied that accomplished facts are accomplished facts. It is hard to sweep away the principle of protection all at once, when it has been so long in existence; but if I had the power, I would sweep it away faster than it is being done now. A good deal has been said about the little reduction that has been made in the interest of the agriculturists. The few articles that have been put on the free list have been treated, I must say, in a very unstatesmanlike manner by the opposition. They claim that the binder twine interest was thrown into the hands of the Americans, and that our own factories were closed when this government took the duty off binder twine. But these gentlemen cannot really feel that way, because when there was a general cry that the duty must be put back again—which showed the greed of the combine—the farmers, fearing that the government might be influenced to do so, signed a petition by thousands warning the government against putting back the duty; and the factories that had been bought up under a protective tariff of 25 per cent. The hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), all said that the reason the binder twine factories were closed was because the duties were taken off, and they could not live.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend could not have been present, for I made no such statement.

Mr. ROGERS. I was reading it ten minutes ago; but I will say that the hon. member for Bothwell did treat the question fairer than other hon. gentlemen.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think that is fair to the other hon. gentlemen.

Mr. ROGERS. I have a copy of the petition here, if the hon. gentleman wishes to know what was said in it. Among other things, it said:

Mr. ROGERS.

That in view of the past history of the Consumers' Cordage Company your petitioners feel assured that the replacing of any duty upon binder twine would simply have the effect of putting the Canadian farmers and consumers at the mercy of this combine, as they have been for years past. Under the former tariff of 25 per cent duty on binder twine, it is a matter of common knowledge that the Consumers' Cordage Company were able to subsidize and purchase the following binder twine industries at that time in existence in Canada:

Bannerman Bros., of Lachute, Que., whose mill has been closed for seven years, during which time they have received the sum of about $8,000 per annum from the Consumers' Cordage Company for keeping the mill idle.

John Brown & Co., of Quebec, whose mill was bought up by the Consumers' Cordage Company for about $140,000, double the actual value, and has been closed ever since the purchase, over six years ago.

Thomas Connor & Sons, of St. John, N.B., whose business was bought up by the same combine about seven years ago, at a very large figure, and has been closed during the whole of that period.

James Lochrie's mill, at Toronto, which has been kept idle for about six years at an expense to the Consumers' Cordage Company of about $6,000 per annum.

Ferguson Bros., of Kingston, whose mill has been closed for about three years, at a compensation of about $1,800 per annum.

A. Main & Son, of Hamilton, who received the sum of about $3,000 per annum from the same combine for keeping their mill idle, while other factories controlled by this combine have been kept idle for long periods during the past few years, that were formerly in full operation.

It was not putting binder twine on the free list that closed all these factories up, for some of them were closed seven years ago. This was in 1896.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What was the price of binder twine then?

Mr. ROGERS. The Consumers' Cordage Company were reported to have made over 150 per cent, yet still these hon. gentlemen had the audacity to ask this government to put the duty back on binder twine, and I am very sorry to see that we have a representative in the other House, one of the wealthiest men in the country, who introduced a deputation to the minister asking him to put the duty back. And these hon. gentlemen opposite will persist in saying that because the binder twine was put on the free list, these factories were closed up.

The scarcity of binder twine that year gave the combine greater facilities in buying up the few factories that remained, which might not have been able to do except for that scarcity.

It has been alleged in this House several times that the Farmers Binder Twine Company made enormous profits, when they sold the twine at 7½ cents per pound, in the season of 1898, before the combine bought up all the twine, and we can well imagine what enormous profits the Consumer's Cordage Company made when they sold the twine at the increased rate of 11 to 13 cents per pound after they had got control of the market. That same spring, before the Cordage Company got the control, I could have got binder twine in the Kingston market at 7½ cents per pound, but after the combine was formed we had to pay 11 to 13 cents per pound for it. Of course it cannot be expected that the Kingston penitentiary, which only produces 500 tons out of the 9,000 to 10,000 annually consumed, can control the price and prevent the combine charging higher rates for the great bulk of the consumption which they produce.

I think the government have adopted this year a wise policy in selling the twine direct to the farmers and regret that they did not adopt this policy last year. But it is very difficult for a government to handle this matter so as to satisfy all parties, and we must not forget that the late government, which distributed their twine among a number of purchasers, failed to collect some $8,000 or $9,000 due them by different parties, and that these arrears were only collected this last month by the present government and the country is out four years interest on the amount.

It has been said time and time again that the government have entered into arrangements to fleece the farmers and have associated themselves with the combine, but I am proud to say that the people have not so low an estimate of our public men as to believe that any government would enter into a combine to fleece the farmers. These hon. gentlemen opposite said that manila only costs six cents and that the government were charging the farmers fourteen cents per pound for the twine. This was stated by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), and the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), and also the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). But it is also contradicted by these hon. gentlemen themselves. I find that the hon. member for Halton, in his speech on the budget, said that the government had bought 62½ tons of manila at five cents per pound, in the year prior to June 30, 1899. But that same hon. gentleman, lower down in his speech, says that on March 1, 1899, manila in New York cost 7½ cents and sisal 6½ cents. That shows what reliance can be placed on the statements of these hon. gentlemen. It is true that the government had bought 62½ tons of manila at 7½ cents, as shown by the Auditor General's report, in 1899, but that was a very small quantity compared with the 500 tons which the penitentiary produces, and for the remainder of the quantity required to produce that output the government had to pay 8½ cents per pound for sisal and 12½ cents to 13 cents per pound for the raw manila. I can tell these hon. gentlemen also that this spring binder twine was selling in the penitentiary at 10½ cents per pound, in ton lots, although sisal and manila cost the figures I have just mentioned. I bought it this spring myself from the penitentiary at 10½ cents per pound.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is very strange that the government will not sell it to anybody else for that.

Mr. ROGERS. The hon. gentleman is badly informed because it was advertised at that price in the newspapers. It was advertised at 10½ cents per pound, if purchased by the ton, and 12½ cents when purchased by the car load, and not only was it advertised at these prices in the newspapers, but those were the prices quoted by the warden of the penitentiary to all those who wrote to him.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. gentleman read us the advertisement.

Mr. ROGERS. I am sure there has been a thousand letters sent out from the Kingston penitentiary:

Fifty ton lots and upwards....	12½c.	9½c.	8½c.
Car-loads	13c.	10c.	9c.
Ton lots	13½c.	10½c.	9c.
Less than ton lots.....	14c.	11c.	10c.

Some of our farmers club together and buy in ton lots.

Mr. HENDERSON. The hon. gentleman means to tell us he did not buy pure manila.

Mr. ROGERS. It is 1½ cents cheaper than the Farmers' Binder Twine Company quoted theirs at. I might say, as regards pure manila, that they could not buy the raw material for less than 14½ cents lately. Nobody can sell pure manila at that price. Nobody can make any capital out of what the government is doing in regard to binder twine this season, because there are thousands of letters all over the country quoting these prices.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When was this to be bought?

Mr. ROGERS. I am told that the time has been extended to June 1.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How much has been sold to the farmers?

Mr. ROGERS. We ordered a ton from our section. We did not know how much we would want; and they were selling it as fast as they could manufacture it. To show you that in the States as well as here the raw material has gone up. I will read an article from the New York Post:

There are 27,000 tons of manila hemp awaiting shipment from Philippine ports which have been closed to trade by the action of the United States military authorities. The value of the hemp there detained is $6,000,000, and as a result of its detention hemp has gone up in the United States from 4½ cents in 1895 to 14½ cents at the end of 1899. Sisal from Mexico, used as a partial substitute for manila, has advanced in sympathy from 3 to 9 and 10 cents. The Republican politicians, fearing the effects of dear binder twine on Republican party prospects next fall, are endeavouring to secure the release of the hemp now in the Philippines, and General Otis has promised to do this as soon as he can send troops to occupy the districts where the hemp is now stored. But the supply of manila hemp will be very uncertain until peace once more reigns in the Philippines.

All this proves that the raw material could not be bought for anything less than that price. It has been said that the Farmers' Binder Twine Company has made enormous profits. It is true, and they frankly admit it. Unfortunately, many other manufacturing concerns will not tell the public how much profit they are making. This company sold every ounce of twine they had in 1898 at 7½ cents. If this company made 60 per cent, what must other companies been making in the past when they got 9 cents and 10 cents all through, in spite of the influence of combines? Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about putting binder twine on the free list as having increased the price. How can they make the farmers believe that? There is no foundation for such a statement.

Now, there is the subject of free corn, upon which a good deal has been said. Last year, for the first time, I heard arguments in this House, that it would be better for the farmers to feed their corn and coarse grains to their cattle instead of selling them. We were told that the farmers are so poor that they could not afford to keep their cattle, they could not afford to put up buildings to house their cattle, they were obliged to sell their coarse grains to pay debts on the farm. That is the argument they made use of last year, and that we were giving away our markets to the Americans for free corn. In 1898 the Americans raised 22,000,000,000 bushels of corn, and they exported over 200,000,000 bushels to European countries, and we took 5,000,000 bushels. Do you think the Americans would make any better bargain with us on account of our taking 5,000,000 bushels? It would have no effect upon them when we were trying to make a bargain with them. The longer I look into this matter the more I feel that free corn has been the greatest boon the farmers ever received. The member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is coming round to the opinion that the farmers would do better to feed their coarse grains instead of selling them. Why is it that Americans come over here and buy 130,000 head of cattle and take them over there and feed them on the very grain that we get from them free of duty? I am glad to see that hon. gentlemen are coming to their senses in this matter. I would like any hon. gentleman in this House to show me where home consumption materially affects the price of an article which we have to sell.

Mr. ROGERS.

The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) says that home consumption does not affect the price of anything that we have to sell. Last year we exported over 12,000,000 bushels of pease and oats to Great Britain. The member for Leeds, who buys grain constantly, knows that the price is regulated according to what he can pay. If he can pay 30 cents, it will follow him out, and vice versa. So, a few bushels of corn coming in here does not affect the price of our coarse grain in the least, and our farmers are not such fools as to believe it. They are the shrewdest business men in the world, otherwise they could not hold their own in this country. No other industry could live with the small profits which the farmers have. I am often amused and astonished to hear the advice given to the farmers by lawyers, doctors and bankers how they should conduct their business. If they had a little practical experience they would not talk so much—I will not say rot—as they do talk sometimes. I will give the House a little illustration of what is taking place in my own county in regard to free corn. There is a Mr. Reid, a farmer, and a cattle dealer who buys and exports thousands of head of cattle every year. He is a very strong supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite and has been all his lifetime. He told me, the year before last, that he raised between 200 and 300 tons of hay himself and that he bought 300 tons more. That was about 600 tons that he fed that year, and he said that he would not have used a pound of that hay if he could not have got corn to feed with it. I was sitting at luncheon at one time with a gentleman who was the local member for our county. He deals in hogs and pork, and he said: You may say that we could not export pork at the price it is if we had not corn to feed. It is not a good thing to feed to much of one thing to any animal. People who speak whereof they know and who really have knowledge of the subject cannot but admit that a mixed ration of corn and other grain makes the best pork. You do not want to feed the hogs when they are too young, but after they are three or four months old, you want to feed them a mixed ration of corn and some other grain. If the farmers find that it is not in their interest to feed corn they will feed something else. I say that instead of feeding 7,000,000 bushels, as they did last year, if they had fed 16,000,000 bushels it would have been more to their interest. I know they will come to it in the future. In my own county, farmers that were much against the thought of free corn, I saw coming in last spring to the mill, and taking away their loads of corn at the price at which it was selling, and they were very glad to get it. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) admitted, himself, that if the farmers get it a little cheaper they will feed it. As soon as it is cheaper there is no doubt that they will buy it.

There is another question that has been troubling the farmers. Reference has been made to the price that they have to pay for barbed wire. It has been said by hon. members opposite: See what the farmers have to pay for barbed wire. I want to ask hon. gentlemen what is the reason that they have to pay more for it than they formerly did. The reason is the curse of a high tariff. The Americans, have under the operation of a high tariff, organized trusts and combines and they have got this article almost into their own hands. Mostly every line of business in this country admits that there is no justifiable reason for the increased cost of the manufactured articles, excepting that business is booming and that they wish to take advantage of it. They take advantage of the opportunity that the principle of protection has put into their hands and they grind the masses. You cannot show, in any instance, that there is a justifiable reason for the prices which prevail, except it be owing to the existence of those combines and trusts, and I say that one of the very live subjects that the farmers have to deal with to-day is that of combines and trusts, because we all know that they could not exist if there were no protection. I am going to give the House a little evidence of that. We know that this is a very live subject with the people to the south of us. About two years ago a commission was appointed to investigate into this matter, and to ascertain the facts, and among those who gave evidence was Mr. H. O. Havemeyer, the father of the great sugar trust, representing a capital of $120,000,000. He says:

The chief owner and promoter of the American Sugar Trust has made statements before an investigation commission to the effect that these combinations could not exist without the aid of the tariff which permits them to plunder the people.

The father of one of these trusts admits that in his own evidence.

Under free trade it would be quite possible for all the sugar refineries in the United States to organize a trust and cut down the cost of management and manufacture by combining their business under a single head. But it would be impossible for them to charge the consumers more than the natural price for their product. The existence of the trust does not depend on the tariff, but its evil effects do. Without the aid of the tariff the trust could cut down expenses, but could not advance prices.

What better evidence could you want than that?

It could not levy a price sufficient to pay dividends on watered stock, for outside competition would make that impossible. In Britain an attempt at the American method of fictitious capitalization has resulted in a failure, because there was no protective tariff to aid in the securing of inordinate profits.

I could quote columns of evidence given before the same commission to the same effect. The man who has made his millions out of this trust is honest enough to make these admissions. The farmers feel that this is the bugbear which they have to fight, and anything that will tend to increase the disability under which they labour will not go down well with them. It is surprising to hear the hon. ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague), a man who is supposed to be the friend of the farmer, saying: Let the government put the duty back to where it was before, and in every instance I will give it my hearty support. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), said the same thing. I will not say that the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who has a farm himself, is considered to be a friend of the farmer, said that; in fact he did not say it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would you advise taking the duty off agricultural products?

Mr. ROGERS. I said I would reduce it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. On pork?

Mr. ROGERS. I might mention pork. At the time that the national policy was introduced there was no such thing as raising pork for cured bacon. The farmers then raised heavy pork. They never thought of killing pigs until they weighed 200 or 300 pounds. During these last few years conditions have changed entirely. It would not affect us a bit if the duty was taken off pork, because what regulates the price of our pork is the English market. A traveller of the Nelson, Morris Co., a friend of my own, came through the country, and was selling heavy pork among the fishermen and lumbermen, he said that he could sell our Canadian cured pork in the eastern cities on account of the quality, it being much superior to western pork. The farmers cannot now make anything out of heavy pork.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What I understand from the hon. gentleman is that he favours the destruction of the protection given to agricultural products.

Mr. ROGERS. As I said last year: If it is going, you bet your life we will have our share.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that protection was a curse, and I thought he did not want his share of it.

Mr. ROGERS. I say give the old farmer fair-play. He asks no favours; he asks no class legislation. But, as regards pork, although the protection was necessary at one time the conditions have changed. The farmers cannot make any money out of heavy pork any more and it is in light pork that they expect to do business. To illustrate how the high tariff is affecting the people of the United States I may mention that the democrats have a plank in their platform against combines and trusts and the Republicans propose to go them one better and to altar the constitution of the United States so as to get at these combines. Governor Pingree, of Michigan, who takes an active part against trusts and combines, shows that there are the following trusts and combines in the United States:

Trust.	Capital.
Oil trust	$150,000,000
Steel and iron.....	347,000,000
Coal combine	161,000,000
Gas trust	432,000,000
Havermeyer sugar trust.....	115,000,000
Telephone trust	56,000,000
Cigars and tobacco	108,000,000
Alcoholic trust	67,000,000
Electrical appliance trust....	139,000,000
Miscellaneous trusts	1,349,000,000
Total.....	$2,717,000,000

The miscellaneous trusts comprised sixty-three, such as leather, tobacco, &c. As I have said one political party—the Republican—have proposed to change the whole constitution of the United States so as to get at these combines. In Canada we are constantly talking about the constitution, but I claim that the people are the bosses and not red tapeism. We have not the laws of the Medes and Persians in this country, if the law is wrong the people have a right to remedy it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But we have a law against trusts in Canada if the government will only enforce it.

Mr. ROGERS. In the United States they have a law against trusts in many of the individual states, but as between state and state, they cannot regulate them, and so they propose to change the constitution to do that. I give this as a lesson to the government to resist the pressure brought on them for protection and high tariff. Protection has been the curse of all countries, and the people are bound to get rid of it. Here is a reference to some of the severe penalties against trusts in some of the states of the union:

The penalties that are visited upon offenders are sometimes severe to the point of harshness. In Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, New Mexico, Oklahoma and Tennessee the courts will not assist the trusts to collect their debts. In Illinois a grain combination was exempted by the courts from accounting to one of its constituent members in the use of the common fund.

Notwithstanding that, the trusts in the United States are so powerful that they manage to evade the law, and therefore severer measures are proposed against them. As an instance of some of the ironical statements made on the floor of this House, I find that the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) is quoted by the Kingston News as speaking as follows:

Mr. ROGERS.

Mr. George Taylor (Leeds) in his speech said that the Minister of Agriculture—

Mr. Taylor referred to the Minister of Agriculture for Ontario, but this paper has it as if he referred to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), and that has gone out to the country as if it were gospel.

Mr. George Taylor (Leeds), in his speech on the budget, said that the Minister of Agriculture and other government supporters were shareholders in the Brantford Binder Twine Company, which paid 100 per cent dividend, and that the price of binder twine made at Kingston penitentiary was kept so that those men could continue to realize large profit.

I can tell the House that the farmers of this country, whether they be Conservatives or Liberals, are too intelligent to believe any such rot and nonsense as that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How many farmers are stockholders in that Binder Twine Company?

Mr. ROGERS. I would not care if I was one of them myself.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is sensible.

Mr. ROGERS. I bought twine from them for three or four years, and I watched them pretty closely, and I believe that were it not for the Farmers' Binder Twine Company, the heartless, soulless, rapacious brutes of the Consumers' Cordage Company would have made 500 per cent out of the farmers. I am sure that the members of that Brantford Company have a little heart in them, although they are not all angels yet.

Mr. CLANCY. They are satisfied with 100 per cent.

Mr. ROGERS. Less would have done them, but when they started that twine company the Consumers Cordage Company had bought out all the other companies.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is there a combine.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I call the attention of the Minister of Customs to that, and I ask him to enforce the law against combines.

Mr. McCARTHY. But the word 'unduly' is in the law.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Do I understand that the Minister of Customs thinks that 500 per cent is undue, and that 100 per cent is not?

Mr. ROGERS. I admit there are too many combines. If I wanted to make an hour's speech, Mr. Speaker, all I would have to do would be to take up the speech of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). I know the farmers he represents in the county of Halton, and I have some of my own relations in his county.

Mr. HENDERSON. They are decent people, too.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know whether they support him or not, but I can assure him that I would not be afraid to take that speech of his and follow him on any platform. The hon. gentleman has asked the farmers to give his party a chance again, but does he think the farmers are devoid of common sense to do that, when he announces that if his party gets into power they will increase the duties. The farmers feel that there is room for a still greater reduction in the duties, and when hon. gentlemen go before their constituents, they will find the farmers demanding a greater reduction. I accept what reduction is given by the government and still hope for more, and will continue to fight for more. The farmers being very British, are pleased with the preferential clause. I said last year that it was the redeeming feature of the whole tariff. I hoped that it would be made 50 per cent, but I am glad that the government have made it this year 33½ per cent. When hon. gentlemen of the opposition say that it has no effect on the people, that it does no good, that the farmers get no benefit from it, I would like to ask them if there is no good from the preference of 33½ per cent on the $7,686,000 worth of woolen goods that come into the country from England. When you tell the farmers that the $3,976,667 worth of cotton goods that come in under the preferential clause do not lower the price of all cotton goods in Canada, do you think they will believe you? When you tell them that $415,000 worth of drugs, dyes and chemicals which come in under the preferential clause do not affect our markets, do you think they will believe you? When you tell them that the imports of flax, hemp and jute manufactures to the value of $1,610,210 from England, will not affect the price in Canada, do you think they will believe you? When you tell them that of glass and manufactures of glass the $289,049 worth that come from England will not affect prices in Canada, do you think they will believe you? When you tell them that of machinery $453,728 worth, and of other iron and steel manufactures $1,865,642 worth come from England, but will have no effect on prices in this country, do you think they will believe you? When you tell them that $2,062,428 worth of silks come in from England, but have no effect on the price of silks from other countries, will they believe you? I suppose you will say the farmers do not require silks; they can wear their old woolen rags. You may talk that way here, but you will not talk that way on the platform.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman should not speak while his friends are cheering.

Mr. ROGERS. They are cheering so much that I would never get done if I did not keep on. $389,065 worth of oil, and $255,967 worth of paints and colours come from England; and if you tell the farmers that these will not affect the prices of the same goods coming from other countries, do you think they will believe you? You may say the farmers do not need any paint, that white-wash will do for them. About $184,000 worth come from the United States, and about an equal amount from Germany. Do you think the amount coming in from England under the preferential rates does not regulate the price of all the others coming in? Of paper and the manufactures of paper, $248,745 worth comes from England. Has that no effect on the market value? Of pickles, sauces and capers, $118,724 come from England. Of carpets, rugs, etc., $121,936 worth come from England. The farmers occasionally require a new carpet, too. Sometimes our politicians and other wise men tell us that if we lived as our forefathers did, we could get along without these comforts; but I am glad to say they are getting afraid to talk that way now. Of collars and cuffs, $44,870 worth come from England. Of china and earthenware, $577,290 worth comes from England, and this must affect the price of all the same class of goods in the country, whether imported or manufactured. Of fancy goods, $892,239 worth come from England, of hats and caps $794,338 worth, and of leather and the manufactures of it $200,794 worth. We heard the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) the other day complaining about the poor tanners in his county, being affected so that they could not pay their wages. Why can they not, when they get their raw material free? He mentioned that in his section 140 or 150 men could not get work. If he went out through the country, he would find that at present any man who wants work can get it. In my section of the country it is almost impossible to get agricultural labour, and such as we can get is in many cases of a very inferior kind. Of course, farmers cannot afford to pay the wages that other people do, and when I hear these manufacturers saying: If you do not give us protection, we cannot pay the wages required, I wonder what they would say if the farmers were to talk that way? The farmers have to compete in foreign markets just as well as the manufacturers, and they do not make the profits that the manufacturers do. We know that this is the age of combines and trusts, and the plea on behalf of these combines is that they can manufacture cheaper than individual firms. But, why should we not form a company of farmers, and take into that company some of the leading men on both sides of this House. We could then go before the government, as the manufacturers do, and ask that the manufacturing interests should be taxed for our benefit in order to enable us to compete against the cheaper labour of foreign countries. And we would have a much better case in our favour than they can possibly have, for they admit that agriculture is the basic structure on which all other interests depend, and that when the farmer is prosperous all the other classes of the community benefit. If each member of the government would take, say, $25,000 worth of stock in this agricultural manufacturing company, and the leaders of the opposition a like amount, that would bring them into closer touch with the farming community, and put them in a better position to deal with the representatives of the manufacturing interests when they urge the government to tax the agricultural community for the purpose of enabling them to compete with the cheap labour of foreign countries. Our farmers have a right to be put on exactly the same footing as the manufacturers; and if they were, we would hear less of this wail on the part of the latter for increased protection. And not only would the government have the support of this powerful agricultural manufacturing company at its back, but it also could plead the interests of the 700,000 or 800,000 individual companies, families consisting of the father and mother and children, down to the seven years old child, who are also engaged in the same field of operations. Those manufacturers complain of the hard stress they are put to in order to make a profit in the face of the keen competition they meet from foreign sources, but let any of them put their money into farming and they will then realize that the difficulties they have to contend against are very slight as compared with those which confront the bone and sinew of our country, who are opening up and developing our waste lands, and on whom more than any other class the prosperity of this country depends. A few instances will show how other industries are prospering:

CENSUS 1890-91.

Statement re Cotton Mills.

Dominion—

Fixed capital invested.....	$9,730,047
Working capital invested.....	3,478,074
$13,208,121 at 6 p.c. interest..	$ 792,487
Total wages paid for the year	2,102,603
Total paid for raw material.	4,208,253
	<hr/>
Total value of articles produced....	7,103,343
Total profit for year (equal to 19 p.c.)	8,451,724
Protected by average duty of 28 p.c., equals	1,348,381
	<hr/>
Total hands employed	2,366,482
Average wages paid per year.....	8,502
	$255

Mr. CLANCY. What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. ROGERS. I am reading from a pamphlet prepared by Mr. A. T. Leach, secretary of the Farmers' Institute of Manitoba. They are not the gentleman's own figures, but taken from the census of 1890.

Mr. ROGERS.

Statement re Furriers and Hatters.

Dominion—

Fixed capital invested	$ 482,155
Working capital invested	1,565,736
$2,047,881 at 6 p.c. interest..	$ 122,872
Total wages paid for the year	724,054
Total paid for raw material.	2,793,179
	<hr/>
Total value of articles produced....	3,640,105
Total profit per year (equal to 67 p.c.)	$4,984,941
Protected to 25 p.c. duty, equals.....	1,344,836
Total hands employed.....	1,246,235
Average wages paid per year.....	2,518
	$288

Statement re Gloves and Mitts.

Dominion—

Fixed capital invested	$ 137,478
Working capital invested	284,540
$422,018 at 6 p.c. interest.....	$ 25,321
Total wages paid for the year.	135,387
Total value of raw material..	391,329
	<hr/>
Total value of articles produced.....	552,037
Total profit for year (equal to 46 p.c.)	747,732
Protected by 35 p.c. duty.....	195,695
Total hands employed.....	261,705
Average wages paid per year.....	440
	$308

Harness and saddlery, protected by duty of 30 per cent; nails and tacks, protected by an average duty of 32½ per cent; salt works, protected by an average of 20 per cent duty. Total profit for the year was equal to 45 per cent. The total profit on saddlery was 42 per cent. Sugar refineries: fixed capital invested, $3,665,700; working capital invested, $2,258,700; total paid for wages in the year, $709,811; total value of articles produced, $17,127,100; total profit for the year equal to 19 per cent.

Woollen mills: fixed capital invested, $5,247,710; total wages paid for the year, $1,884,483; total value of raw material, $4,037,767; protected by an average duty of 29½ per cent.

Oil refineries: fixed capital invested, $901,418; working capital invested, $972,500; total wages paid for the year, $140,370; total profit for the year equal to 21 per cent; now, I believe it is 80 per cent.

Speaking about the oil industry, we have been told that it is a very difficult thing to control. The Americans have found that a hard thing to handle. I was looking over the statistics for Ontario this last year, and I think about 26,000,000 gallons of crude oil were produced in that province alone. The question is often asked: How would you tackle the oil combine? Well, for my part I would take some of that $7,000,000 surplus and would build a government refinery, and then we would never need to fear any combine. I believe the people of this country would consent to be taxed for that purpose. I do not think it is right to have too much of a surplus at the end of the year. When times are prosperous and an enormous amount of money is coming in—and no doubt the Minister of Finance did not expect so great a surplus as we have this year—I would suggest that he make a radical reduction in the tariff to begin with. I would take a couple of millions and put it into the sinking fund to pay off our debt. I am sure that the farmers would not growl about that. I said last year, and I say here again, that the farmers of this country do not like a burden of debt on their backs. They have reduced their bonded indebtedness on municipalities two or three millions the last ten years, notwithstanding the pressure of hard times. I say to-day that they would bear direct taxation, if necessary, in order to reduce the debt which is piling up against us.

In regard to the preferential clause in the tariff, we feel that is a move in the right direction. We will not be satisfied unless the government go further in that direction. I think, when the time comes, the farmers will make their opinions known on this subject to those who meet them on the public platform. Any one who will say to the people that he wishes to put the duties back to where they were before, in every instance, will get very little sympathy from the farmers. I was struck the other day, at hearing the hon. member for South Leeds saying that he feared for the manufacturers and the artisans of this country. I wonder how he, a man representing an agricultural constituency, could talk like that before the farmers. If he had his money invested in a farm of two or three hundred acres, and if he had to toil, as his constituents do, all day long with his family, I wonder whether he would cry out that he fears for the manufacturer and the artisan. I want no better campaign literature than that, to use before any audience of farmers.

Now, I shall not longer detain the House. I have not used up half of my notes, but I will reserve them until I get upon the platform before the farmers when I shall have a more appreciative audience and when I shall be speaking to men of experience and expressing to them the opinions which I hold. I thank hon. members for the very patient hearing which they have given me and for the hearty appluase which I have received from both sides of the House. I will not detain the House any longer as I do not wish to weary hon. members at this hour of the morning. I will leave the remainder of my remarks until another time.

Mr. McDOUGALL, moved the adjournment of the debate.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I am sorry that there is not more disposition on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to proceed with the public business. It is still early and I had hopes that we would make some further progress, but if hon. gentlemen opposite are going to delay the public business, I suppose we will have to yield.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding), moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1.55 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, May 3, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. H. G. CARROLL (Kamouraska). In the absence of Mr. Champagne, chairman of the Debates Committee, I beg to present the fourth report of the committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates of the House during the present session, as follows:

The Committee recommend that Mr. T. J. Grondin who has been employed in the capacity of proof-reader in connection with the French version of the Official Report of the Debates, be paid for his services at the rate of $4.00 per day, such remuneration to date from the 8th March ultimo, to the 8th May, inclusive.

Mr. CARROLL moved that the said report be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BILLS WITHDRAWN.

Bill (No. 114) to incorporate the Canadian Nurses' Association.—(Mr. Carroll.)

Bill (No. 103) to incorporate the Port Arthur Railway and Terminus Company.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 144)—from the Senate—for the relief of Catherine Cecilia Lyons.—(Mr. Mills.)

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—CANADIANS KILLED AND WOUNDED.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden, King's.) Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to read to the House a cablegram received from South Africa, which will be of interest to the members. Since the last meeting of the House, the following sad news has been cabled by Lt.-Col. Buchan, who is commanding the Canadian Regiment, I suppose, during the time that Col. Otter is laid up by his recent wounds. The cablegram contains the following intelligence:

No. 8176, Pte. A. E. Zong, 66th Battalion, died from enteric fever on the 1st instant.

Killed in action on the 30th ultimo or 1st instant:

No. 7468, Pte. H. Cotton, 43rd Ottawa and Carleton Rifles.

Wounded in action (slightly), same dates:

Lieut. J. M. Ross, 22nd Oxford Rifles.

No. 7955, Pte. John Lutz, 74th Battalion.

No. 7952, Pte. J. Letson, 62nd St. John Fusiliers.

No. 7486, Pte. P. R. Foster, the G.G.F.G.

No. 7204, Pte. R. Irvine, 19th St. Catharines Battalion.

I may mention that Private Cotton is the son of the Assistant Adjutant General of Artillery in the Militia Department.

PRINTING OF DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS.

Mr. CLARKE (by Mr. Davin) asked :

At what dates was the MSS. of the following departmental reports for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, sent to the Queen's Printer, namely :

Postmaster General,
Militia and Defence,
Secretary of State,
Printing and Stationery,
Geological Survey,
Justice,
Public Works,
Penitentiaries.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The manuscript of the report of the Secretary of State was sent to the Printing Bureau complete on January 10. The first batch of the manuscript of the report of the Department of Justice and penitentiaries was sent on January 17, but the copy was delayed owing to the illness of Mr. Douglas Stewart, the superintendent of penitentiaries. The manuscript of the report of the Geological Survey was sent to the printer on February 7.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The Militia report has already been laid on the Table of the House. It comes up to December 31, 1899, not to June 30 last, as implied in the question. A part of the manuscript was in the Printing Bureau on December 12 last, and the rest on March 28. The report was laid on the Table two or three days ago

HALIFAX GARRISON—MEAT SUPPLY.

Mr. POWELL asked :

1. Who supplies the meat for the Canadian garrison at Halifax?
2. Is the meat supplied under contract? If so, was the contract price fixed by public tender?
3. What prices are paid for the beef and mutton supplied to the garrison?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The meat is supplied at present by Maling & Co., of Halifax. There is no contract. The price is fixed by that paid to the Imperial contractor. I am not able yet to give the prices, but have sent to Halifax for them, and hope to have them in a day or two.

Mr. DAVIN. In that case the question may stand.

LETTER CARRIER SHRAPNEL.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

- (a) Was W. Shrapnel employed as letter carrier in Vancouver?
 - (b) Is he now so employed? If not, why not?
 - (c) If Mr. Shrapnel is dismissed, did the Postmaster General receive a petition asking for his reinstatement, and if so, what action was taken upon it?
 - (d) Has there been a full hearing of Mr. Shrapnel's case? If not, will the Postmaster General grant him an investigation so that he may,
- Mr. BORDEN (King's).

if possible, show that the facts of his case have been improperly and unfairly represented to the Postmaster General, and that he is entitled, on the merits, to be reinstated in his former position?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Mr. W. Shrapnel was employed as a temporary letter carrier in the Vancouver post office, but is not now so employed, his services having been dispensed with, on account of the unsatisfactory manner in which he discharged his duties, and for absenting himself from duty without leave. The postmaster reported that he had suspended Mr. Shrapnel for absenting himself without leave, that he had been performing his work in a very unsatisfactory manner, and that complaints were numerous of the non-delivery of newspapers on his route. Whilst so suspended, Mr. W. E. Bennett, acting as inspector of city post offices, inspected the Vancouver post office, and the postmaster brought the case of Mr. Shrapnel to the attention of Mr. Bennett, and recommended to him that Mr. Shrapnel's services be dispensed with. Mr. Bennett, after careful inquiry, concurred in the recommendation of the postmaster, and accordingly Mr. Shrapnel's services were dispensed with. The department has no reason to doubt the accuracy of the representations of the postmaster at Vancouver, and, therefore, does not think any further investigation necessary. A petition asking for Mr. Shrapnel's reinstatement was received through Mr. Maxwell, M.P., and dealt with in the manner indicated in the following letter :

Ottawa, March 15, 1900.

My dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 13th inst., inclosing petition asking for the reinstatement of letter carrier Shrapnel, of the Vancouver post office.

On looking into the papers I find that in December last Mr. Shrapnel was suspended by the postmaster at Vancouver, who recommended that in view of the unsatisfactory nature of his services, his services be dispensed with, and instructions have accordingly been given for his removal. I, therefore, regret that it is not possible for me to meet your wishes.

Yours sincerely,

(Sd.) W. MULOCK.

G. R. Maxwell, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons.

SAWDUST IN RIVERS.

Mr. DOMVILLE (by Mr. Frost) asked :

1. In view of the complaints made last fall by the people of Studholm that a certain sawmill was fouling the mill streams with sawdust, and spoiling the run of salmon for spawning purposes, what steps the government have taken to prevent, and if the sawdust will be kept out of the river this spring?
2. The same question in regard to Hammond River?
3. Is the government aware that until the river was blocked with slabs and sawdust, this was a splendid salmon river—even now the salmon lay in pools unable to get up the river?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). On complaint last August that streams in King's County, New Brunswick, were being polluted by saw-mills, the intention of the inspector of fisheries was immediately directed to the alleged practices. On being asked for a report, he states that he instructed the guardian at Studholm to stop sawdust going into the river, who reported he had done so. No recent information has been received about Hammond River, or its pollution by sawdust, but inquiry will be at once made.

CENTRE NEW ANNAN POST OFFICE.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) asked :

1. Who is postmaster at Centre New Annan, Colchester County, N.S.?
2. If the position is vacant, how long has it been so?
3. Is it the intention of the postal authorities to fill the vacancy, if any, and how soon will action be taken?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Mr. Robert Wilson. 2. The position is not vacant.

TATAMAGOUCHE MOUNTAIN POST OFFICE.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) asked :

1. Who is postmaster at Tatamagouche Mountain, Colchester County, N.S.?
2. If the position is vacant, how long has it been so?
3. Is it the intention of the postal authorities to fill the vacancy, if any, and how soon will action be taken?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Mr. Isaac Harris. 2. The position is not vacant.

PREVENTIVE OFFICER AT BRULE, N.S.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) asked :

1. Who is preventive officer at Brule, Colchester County, N.S.?
2. If vacant, how long has the office been vacant?
3. Is it the intention of the Department of Customs to fill vacancy, if any such, and how soon?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. There is no customs preventive officer at Brule, Colchester County, N.S., at present. 2. The office has been vacant since November 16, 1899, when Mr. David Campbell, the late incumbent, died. 3. The question as to whether the vacancy will be filled or not, has not yet been definitely determined by the Department of Customs.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS AND 'SWEATING.'

Mr. CLARKE asked :

1. What contracts have been entered into by the government since June 30, 1899, containing a clause prohibiting 'sweating'?
2. With whom have such contracts, if any, been made, and for what articles, and (3) what is the amount paid to each contractor?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). No contracts have been entered into since June 30, 1899, for the manufacture of mail bags, uniforms, &c., for the Post Office Department.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I wish to add, that in the Militia Department contracts, containing the clause referred to, have been continued, and are in existence with the Sanford Manufacturing Company, for the following articles : Tunics, frocks, trousers, and pantaloons ; also with Mark Workman, for the following articles : Great coats, cloaks, cavalry tunics and artillery pantaloons. To the third part of the question, the answer is : The Sanford Manufacturing Company, for $115,000 ; Mark Workman, for $36,000.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—SUPPLIES FOR CANADIAN CONTINGENT.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

1. Were the supplies of meat required for the use of the men of the Canadian contingent that left Halifax for South Africa, purchased by public tender ; and if so, from whom, and at what prices ?
2. How many pounds of meat, both fresh and preserved, were put on board each of the four transports that left Halifax for South Africa with the Canadian contingents ?
3. How much per pound was paid for fresh meat, and how much for preserved meat ?
4. What was the total amount paid for the meat purchased, and what quantity of fresh and preserved meat respectively was purchased ?
5. How many pounds each, of hay, oats and bran were purchased ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). This question, except paragraph 5, has already been asked by Mr. Clarke, and was answered on the 25th of April last, and I am not at present able to add anything, except as regards paragraph 5, to which I beg to reply : 5. 411 tons of hay ; 11,813 bushels of oats ; 115 tons of bran.

EXCLUSION OF JAPANESE.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Has the Premier's attention been called to the following extract from an article appearing in the Victoria 'Daily Times' of April 19th last : 'Sir Wilfrid Laurier is undoubtedly right in his contention that he has never been made aware of any sentiment in this province in favour of the exclusion of Japs' ?
2. Has the right hon. gentleman ever contended that he was not aware of the existence of such sentiment in British Columbia ? If so, when and where ?
3. Is the Premier aware that many members of parliament, including Mr. Maxwell, Mr. McInnes and Mr. Prior have spoken strongly in this House in favour of restricting the immigration of Japanese ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My attention has not been called to that article.

Mr. PRIOR. Would the hon. gentleman reply to the last part of the question

The PRIME MINISTER. I will have to read the article before I can answer.

PELEE ISLAND LIFE-SAVING STATION.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

Has the life-saving station building at Pelee Island, Ont., been sold ?

If so, to whom and at what price ?

Were tenders called for ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The life-boat house on Pelee Island was not sold, but was given to A. Henning, who had been coxswain of the lifeboat, under the following conditions: The department found it expedient to remove the station from Pelee Island to the mainland. It would have cost more than it was worth to take down the cheap frame boat-house and remove it. The retiring coxswain offered to take the boat-house off the department's hands, and to consider the transfer full compensation for his claims against the department which the department reckoned to be one season's care of the station, $75, and the transfer was accordingly made. The boat-house is 13 years old, and the department thinks it made a very good bargain.

OPENING OF SOULANGES AND BEAUHARNOIS CANALS.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals if the Soulanges Canal is opened to navigation permanently, and if the Beauharnois Canal will also remain open during this season of navigation ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I think that we will not decide to close the Beauharnois Canal this season. We hope that there will be a good deal of traffic, and as the larger vessels will take the Soulanges Canal and the smaller ones the Beauharnois Canal, we do not think it well to close the latter this season.

THE REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF THE YUKON TERRITORY.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Picton). I would like to ask the Acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) if he can give any information as to when we may expect the report of the Commissioner of the Yukon Territory for the past year. On page 19 of his report, which is dated the 28th of February, the Deputy Minister of the Interior says that the report of the Commissioner of the Yukon Territory for the past year has not yet been received, but is likely to be received in time to be published with the general report of the department.

Mr. JAMES SUTHERLAND (North Oxford). As I have several times before explained, the report of the department was held over some considerable time pending the receipt of the report of the Commissioner of the Yukon Territory. But owing to the delay in the receipt of that report, we thought that it might be printed with a supplement. I had instructions telegraphed the other day to have it forwarded, and do not see why it has not been sent in, but am hurrying it up as much as possible.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

OCEAN ACCIDENT AND GUARANTEE INSURANCE CORPORATION—SOUTH AFRICAN CONTINGENT.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Before proceeding to the Orders of the Day, I wish to refer to a matter brought up on the 25th of April by the hon. the leader of the opposition. I would have referred to it the next day but the House did not sit on account of the fire, and yesterday the hon. gentleman was not in his place. I refer to the strictures which the hon. gentleman made on the Department of Militia and Defence with reference to some information which he had asked for and which was required by an accident insurance company before they would pay certain risks taken on members of the contingent who had been killed in South Africa. The hon. gentleman said that the information asked for 'should have been procured within an hour,' and I was not prepared at the moment to reply fully and in detail. But I desire to show now what was done, in justice to the officers of my department and myself. First, let me read the letter written on the 19th of March by the representatives of the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation :

Montreal, March 19, 1900.

L. F. Pinault, Esq., Lieut.-Col.,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—We have your esteemed communication of the 17th instant and beg to state that we will require the death claim papers to be filled in in so far as possible, only excepting as to the relationship and title of the heir at law, which of course will have to be minutely completed, and we will require an official and original information from the English War Office.

We cannot accept telegraphic messages as sufficient in the premises. We understand Sir Charles Tupper has asked Sir Wilfrid Laurier to obtain official confirmation by letter under seal of the English War Office for all claims of first contingent.

Yours truly,

(Signed) ROLLAND, LYMAN & PURNETT.
General Managers.

On the 23rd of March, 1900, the following letter was addressed by the Deputy Minister of Militia to the Governor General's secretary :

Sir,—I am directed by the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence to inclose to you, herewith, the accompanying correspondence relative to the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation and the risks they have taken on the lives of the members of the first contingent sent to South Africa by the Dominion government, with the request that you will be good enough to move His Excellency the Governor General to transmit the same to the Imperial authorities in order to ascertain whether the official certificates applied for by the above named corporation can be procured by them from the War Office.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

L. F. PINAULT, Lieut.-Col.,
Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence.

A little later, the hon. the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), having spoken to me personally about the matter, I caused a cablegram to be sent to the High Commissioner in London to ascertain what was the cause of the delay. The following cablegram was sent on the 11th of April, 1900:

To Dominion, London.

Press War Office official list killed and deceased, South Africa.

PINAULT.

The following answer was received :

London, April 12, 1900.

Militia, Ottawa.

Do not quite understand your message eleventh. Understand complete lists killed, wounded and deaths other caused among Canadian contingents telegraphed you direct from Cape Town. What further is needed.

DOMINION.

In reply, we sent the following cablegram :

Ottawa, April 12, 1900.

Dominion, London, England.

Official list is required by insurance company.

PINAULT.

Now, I think it would appear from that that we in the Department of Militia did the best we could. The hon. gentleman also stated that he objected to the list which we had here in the department, because, as he said :

Will my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, King's) allow me to say that information has been received from the Militia Department of the death of persons who have not died, while persons have been reported as wounded who had been killed.

I was not aware of such being the case, and asked for an explanation from the officers of my department. And this is the explanation given :

Ottawa, April 26, 1900.

The Deputy Minister,
Militia and Defence.

With reference to the statement yesterday in the House of Commons by the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., that 'the department had reported men dead who had not died, and reported men as killed who were wounded,' I have the honour to state, for the information of the hon. the minister that the only instance in which an incorrect announcement respecting the killed or wounded in action in South Africa was made by this office was in the case of the two Smiths of 'B' Company, second (special service) Battalion, Royal Canadian Regiment.

The cable despatches reporting the killed and wounded at Paardeberg on February 18 last included, among others:

Killed, 7236, Smith.

Wounded, 7156, Smith.

This office accordingly announced, having used the official nominal roll as an aid to identification, that No. 7236, Corporal J. Smith, 22nd Oxford Rifles, was killed, and 7156, Private R. Smith, 26th Middlesex Light Infantry, was wounded.

When Lieut.-Col. Otter's lists of killed and wounded were received by mail, they showed that:

No. 7236, Private R. Smith was killed.

No. 7156, Corporal J. Smith was wounded.

While the numbers agreed with the cable report, the initials caused doubts to arise as to whether the identification upon the cable report was correct.

The families of the two men were immediately communicated with to ascertain if they had received any information which would enable it to be determined who was killed and who wounded, and upon receipt of replies that no information was available, Lieut.-Col. Otter was cabled. His reply showed that Corporal J. Smith, of the 22nd Oxford Rifles, announced as killed, was wounded, and Private R. Smith, of the 26th Middlesex Light Infantry, announced as wounded, was killed. The correction was immediately communicated to the families concerned, and announced in Militia Orders.

The unfortunate mistake was caused by the men's regimental numbers being transposed in the nominal roll, which was prepared en voyage to South Africa. There was no mistake in the cable message, or in the action taken thereon by this office.

I have the honour to suggest that, in order that there may be no uneasiness caused to the families of the men who have been killed and wounded fighting for their country, the minister might take an opportunity to give publicity to the facts of this case, which is the only foundation for the statement made by the leader of the opposition in his place in the House of Commons.

Mr. WALLACE. Was there not a mistake in the case of Dr. Johnston's—

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No, there was no mistake in that case. I may say further, that since the occasion on which the hon. leader of the opposition brought this matter up, a report has been received by the Militia Department from His Excellency the Governor General, being a copy of a report from His Excellency, Sir Alfred Milner, Governor of Cape Colony, and High Commissioner of South Africa. And on receipt of that report the following letter was addressed to the hon. leader of the opposition :

Department of Militia and Defence,
Ottawa, May 1, 1900.

Sir,—Referring to your communications with regard to the original confirmation from the English War Office of the deaths of members of the first contingent of Canadian troops in South Africa, I beg to inform you that I have not yet been able to obtain from that office what you require.

This department has received a copy of a report forwarded on March 13 last by Sir Alfred Milner, Governor and High Commissioner of Cape Colony, to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, which is unquestionably authentic, and should satisfy the requirements of insurance companies as thoroughly as other similar documents emanating from the War Office.

The original document is in the hands of His Excellency, and no doubt a certified copy can be obtained, if considered sufficient proof by the insurance companies to pay death claims upon.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd) L. F. PINAULT, Lt.-Col.,

Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence.

The Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, Bart.,

&c., &c., &c.,

House of Commons, Ottawa.

I have only one single word to add, and that is, to point out to the hon. leader of the opposition that this copy of the list which is in the hands of the department must be quite as authentic as anything in the hands of the War Office, because the source of information of the War Office is precisely the same as the source of our information. I presume that His Excellency the Governor and High Commissioner Milner sent precisely the same report to the War Office as he sent here, and I have no doubt at all as to the authenticity of the paper referred to in the letter addressed by my deputy to the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper).

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton).

I may say that I was extremely reluctant to bring this subject under the notice of the House, because I thought it was a matter on which I ought to obtain prompt assistance from the Militia Department. On the 25th of April, I read to the House the letter which I had written to my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) on the 15th March. That letter, as the House will remember, stated that the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation required the official list from the War Office, and I stated to my hon. friend my anxiety to get that at the earliest possible moment. The response to that letter written on the 15th of March, I received on the 3rd of April, having made inquiries, meantime, several times, as to whether an answer was to come. This is the letter I received :

Department of Militia,

Minister's Office,

Ottawa, April 3, 1900.

My dear Sir Charles,—Your letter of the 15th ultimo came to hand while I was in Halifax, and I regret to say has only now been brought to my notice among the large mass of unanswered correspondence which accumulated in my absence. As the matter is somewhat urgent, I venture to say to you, first, that the list of killed which we have here is official, having been received from Sir Alfred Milner; secondly, this list has been accepted by certain insurance companies as satisfactory evidence.

If, however, you desire an official certificate of the War Office, if you will kindly let me know by return post, I will cable for it, and thereby insure as little loss of time as possible.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) F. W. BORDEN.

The Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, Bart.,

House of Commons, Ottawa

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

I accept the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, King's), of the reason of this being overlooked, though I cannot but say that I think his department did not do justice to so important a matter in allowing it to escape his attention from the 15th of March to the 3rd of April. I may say that I have waited for my hon. friend to give me the information from the War Office which he had promised. I informed him that the company required the official information from the War Office because it had been stated that inaccuracies had occurred. The hon. gentleman explains how it arose, that the party who had been wounded, was represented as killed, and the party who was killed had been represented as wounded. I may say that I have never objected to accept any testimony. I am most anxious to accept anything. But it is not for me to say; it is for the insurance company; and, the insurance company having taken the position that they will only pay on receiving official communication from the War Office, of course, I am obliged to ask the aid and assistance of the government—which, I am sure, they ought to be most ready to give me—in obtaining that information. Now, my hon. friend did not ask the Governor General to communicate with the Secretary of State for War, Lord Lansdowne, who would have seen the importance of the matter, but one of his officials sent a communication to Lord Strathcona. But that communication was not understood. If they had been informed that the insurance money could only be paid on obtaining from the War Office a statement of the parties who were killed in battle, I have no doubt the information would have been at once obtained; but the High Commissioner not having received the information that was needed to enable him to secure what was found to be necessary, the matter remains in abeyance, I inclosed the letter of my hon. friend to the company, and I received in reply :

We are in receipt of your esteemed communication of the 3rd instant, and in reply beg to say we require an official list from the War Office, not a copy of the same.

I sent that to my hon. friend in order that he might see the need of complying with the request that was made, and I still hope the government will pursue this matter until we get an official list, which we are entitled to receive, and I am quite sure Lord Lansdowne, if he were informed that an official list from the War Office was required, would at once send it to the Governor General. I may say that before calling the attention of the House to this matter on the 25th of April, which I had pressed upon his attention on the 15th of March, I sent over to my hon. friend the letter received from the father of one of these unfortunate volunteers, who had been killed, wishing to know when the amount of insurance could be recovered. I said to my hon friend: What am I to say in answer to this? I admit he was very much occupied at that time in answering questions, and was not able to return me an answer. As I was obliged to leave the House immediately I went over and asked him, and he said he had not been able to get the information yet. Then it was I felt I must appeal to Lord Lansdowne through His Excellency the Governor General to get this information that was so important to some thirty or forty people.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. It is quite true the hon. gentleman wrote to me on the 15th of March, and that his letter was not acknowledged until early in April. But I have shown by the correspondence that the interests of the insured did not suffer from that fact, because on the 23rd of March—and I think the leader of the opposition perhaps has not heard distinctly the letter which I read, written on the 23rd of March—the very thing was done which he says ought to have been done, that is to say the Governor General was moved, and I have no doubt did, write to the War Office to ask for the following information, and the correspondence was sent. The letter was as follows:—

I am directed by the Minister of Militia and Defence to inclose to you herewith the accompanying correspondence relative to the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, and the risks they have taken on the lives of the members of the first contingent sent to South Africa by the Dominion government, with the request that you will be good enough to move His Excellency the Governor General to transmit the same to the Imperial authorities in order to ascertain whether the official certificate applied for by the above named corporation cannot be procured from the War Office.

That was written on the 23rd day of March.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no information of that. In the letter which the hon. gentleman wrote to me on the 3rd of April, he did not give me that information.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Very well, that is the fact. Now I wish to repeat again what I said with reference to the question. Of course, I know the hon. gentleman is merely acting in the interests of the company, or rather of the insured.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not of the company at all, but of the insured.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Certainly, and we are all equally interested. But let me point out to him for his information that His Excellency the Governor General is now in possession of a complete and authentic list, as complete and as authentic as can be got anywhere, and which emanated from precisely the same source from which the official list in the War Office must emanate. As we have now an official written list, not a cable message at all, coming from His Excellency the Governor General and High Commissioner Milner, it seems to be extraordinary that that list cannot be accepted, and I believe it will be accepted by the insurance company the moment they understand the facts.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should like very much to be placed in possession of that list, and no doubt I will be.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—RECENT CASUALTIES.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). I would ask the Minister of Militia and Defence, if he has a list of casualties of recent date, and would tell us what time that list was received by his department?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I received it at my office this morning. I am not able to give the hour.

Mr. WALLACE. What time did it come to the department?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am not able to say. I will find out and let you know.

RIFLE RANGE AT MONTREAL.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). I would like to ask the Minister of Militia and Defence a question of which I have given him notice, and which interests the military men in the district of Montreal. A day or two ago we saw in the papers that the government had acquired a property for rifle practice known as the Captain Andrews Range, for the price of $65,000. As we have been a long time without a range in the district of Montreal, I would like to ask the minister if that information is correct. Is it also the case that this range is only suitable for short range practice, and not for long range practice with the modern rifles now in use? I would also like to ask the minister how this property was purchased. It is learned that there were many properties offered on the island of Montreal, and that some good friends of the government were anxious to sell their properties, or to place a price upon them. I would like to ask how it is that this bargain has been closed without any occasion having been given for competition, without tenders having been called for. I believe there was one property situated in my own county which was reported upon as being at least as good as the one reported to have been purchased, and the owner was not even asked to place a price upon it. That is my information.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I am happy to give the hon. gentleman all the information at hand. It is a fact that a rifle range has been selected near the city of Montreal, at Pointe aux Trembles, which is known, as the hon. gentleman mentioned, as the Andrews Range. The land, or a portion of it, is owned by a man named Reeves. With regard to the property purchased, I desire to relieve my hon. friend in the House at once from any doubt by saying that it provides for the longest range required by the new Lee-Enfield rifles. This range was selected after a great deal of care and search over the whole ground of Montreal and vicinity, by a board of officers chosen by the General, and it was inspected by General Hutton himself and by other Imperial officers, and officers of the garrison in Montreal especially who were chiefly interested, and who all reported favourably that this range was the best obtainable in the vicinity of Montreal. No price has been settled upon, but I am quite sure the price will be much less than that mentioned by the hon. gentleman. As to my hon. friend's method of selecting a rifle range, I am afraid it is scarcely one to be seriously adopted. The idea of asking for tenders for a rifle range seems to me to be carrying the principle of tender and contract rather far. The course pursued was the only reasonable course that could be pursued. Men who possessed technical and special knowledge in this matter were asked to select the range. Several ranges were pointed out to them. Every single range that was offered, or mentioned, to the Militia Department, was brought to the notice of the officers and of the board: they were asked to inspect the proposed range, and afterwards, having gone carefully over the whole of them, their judgment was given in favour of the range that was selected.

Mr. MONK. What is the length in yards of this range? I may be under a misapprehension.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am not able to give that, except that I may tell the hon. gentleman that a thousand-yard range is provided for and the ground in the rear of the targets extends for a very great distance, something like a mile, I think. If I had known that the hon. gentleman would have brought the question up I could have given him the exact width and the exact length. The range contains about 400 arpents. An arpent, I understand, is a little less than an English acre. I am not able, at the present moment, to give the width of the range, but, when the estimates are under discussion, or, perhaps, earlier, I may give the information.

Mr. MONK. Was I correct in stating that another property had been reported upon as favourably as this one, and that the owner was not asked to put a price upon it.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No.

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty; and the motion of Sir Charles Tupper in amendment thereto.

Mr. HECTOR F. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, when I was requested, at two o'clock this morning, to move the adjournment of the debate, I did not intend to have anything to say on this question. I did so at the request of an hon. gentleman who was unable to be present at the time. But, now, I would like to take advantage of the opportunity to say a few words, and I promise to be very brief. In the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), he modestly, if not delicately, referred to the question of the great industry which is now being established in the county of Cape Breton, which I have the honour to represent, and the part that he played in respect to the establishment of that industry. I find that the remarks of the hon. minister on the question as to the part that he played were very brief. I was curious to know what had been said on that question during the discussion that took place since March 23, when he made his speech. I looked with a good deal of curiosity for some statements from his friends on that side of the House, or for any reference from this side of the House, to the part which the hon. minister played in connection with the establishment of that industry, as to which he made that brief and delicate reference. I propose to take advantage, now, of the present opportunity which is afforded to me to bring the matter to the attention of the hon. minister and to the attention of the House. This great industry is one of very great importance, not only to the people in the county in which it has been established, but it is of importance to the whole of Canada. It is due, however, I think, to those who took part in all movements which tended in the direction of the establishment of that industry that we should be allowed to refer to these movements and to the parties who took part in them. In the year 1878, as hon. gentlemen know, the national policy was unfolded to the people of Canada. The hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) took advantage of the opportunity afforded to him of paying a visit to the island of Cape Breton, and during that visit he addressed a very large assemblage of people, largely miners, workingmen, farmers and fishermen in the county of Cape Breton, at the town of Sydney. On that occasion the hon. leader of the opposition offered to the people engaged in the mining industry the policy of protection to that industry in the way of imposing a duty on the products of similar industries in the United States, which had the effect of injuring the development of that industry in this country. The people were told, on that occasion, that if they supported the Liberal-Conservative party and accepted the promise of such protection, they would have such results as would place that industry in a living condition, a condition in which it was not at that time. That was the inception of the national policy as it was unfolded to the people of the county of Cape Breton. In connection with the establishment of this great iron and steel industry, three very important conditions were brought into play. The first was the development of the coal industry, the protection to that industry and to the iron and steel industry, which was subsequently taken hold of by the Liberal-Conservative party and carried through this parliament. Another condition, and a most important one, was that which that part of the country looked for at that time most anxiously—the building of a railway. Without the development of our coal industry, without what has been done to encourage the iron and steel industry, and without the building of a railway into the island of Cape Breton, we could not have expected to have a steel or an iron industry in the course of construction nor in operation at this day, or even thought of. The Liberal-Conservative party, led by Sir John A. Macdonald, assisted by the present hon. leader of the opposition, undertook to give protection to the coal industry, and undertook it with a great deal of success. That measure from its inception was opposed by the Minister of Finance and by his newspaper organ in Nova Scotia. It is unnecessary for me to quote the utterances of the minister or of his newspaper, for everybody knows them. That then was the first part that the Minister of Finance played in respect to this industry. When the policy was prominently before this House as regards coal, the Minister of Finance and his organ not only refused to give the slightest assistance to that policy, but on the contrary they gave it their most strenuous opposition. When the coal industry was taken hold of by the Conservative party at that date, its condition was so bad that a number of the mines were closed or idle in the county of Cape Breton, and nearly all of the mines were unable to pay to the provincial treasury the royalty due by them. When the mines were about emerging out of their difficulties, and when several of them had the prospect of being able to pay the arrears of wages, and the royalty as well, they expected to be able to take means to make the coal industry self-sustaining as well as profitable to the investors and owners. Under these conditions what did the Minister of Finance do? He went to Cape Breton and exercising the powers that the laws of Nova Scotia gave him, he closed down the Blockhouse coal mine at Cow Bay, the first one of importance ever closed in the county of Cape Breton. He accomplished that by sending the sheriff to take possession of the rolling stock and outfit by which that mine was operated for the arrears of royalty, and he thereby prevented the mine from being further operated and from doing anything towards paying the labourers. Then some years subsequent to that when the mines got into a state of prosperity, the Minister of Finance imposed on the people engaged in that industry an increase of taxation by raising the royalty from 7½ cents a ton to 10 cents a ton, and he accompanied that legislation with a threat that he could raise it to 15 cents a ton if he wanted to, or if they did not behave themselves. These facts are on record, and are within the reach of all, and I need not do more than refer to them in this House. Then, Mr. Speaker, came the time—and that is the time I believe to which the Minister of Finance had reference when he spoke so delicately about what he had done for the coal industry—then came the time when he passed legislation in Nova Scotia which resulted in the consolidation of a number of these coal mines. I need only say that at that time these mines were prosperous and had excellent prospects for the future, such as to induce new capitalists to join and that measure of consolidation was passed through the legislature by the Minister of Finance and his supporters. As a result of it, in a year or two afterwards, some of the most thriving of the collieries that were operating under the protection of the national policy were closed, and a number of the operators who earned their living in these mines and had spent ten, fifteen, or twenty years building homes for themselves, were obliged to abandon these homes without being able to realize a dollar on the value of their property. I am pleased to-day to acknowledge that we have at the present time a number of our mines enjoying the greatest prosperity, but, Mr. Speaker, we had expected, and we had every assurance from our experience up to the time that that legislation was passed, that they could have enjoyed the same prosperity without such legislation. I say, Sir, that that legislation was costly to a number of the people of Cape Breton, and it is costly to-day to the new investors who were compelled to accept that legislation with the additional taxation it imposed, and since forced them to work only the best paying of their mines. I am opposed to taxing any industry unduly, and I am particularly opposed to taxing an industry such as the mining industry that can only be carried on with great danger and risk to the operators and the workmen engaged in it. I say that no greater mistake could be made than to increase the taxes upon the products of the industry of workingmen, and especially workingmen who have to perform such arduous labours as those employed in coal mining. We should remember, that these people have to go hundreds of feet under the ground and work there in dangerous darkness to earn the bread of life, and what a hardship it is to them to find when they mine a ton of coal and come to the surface that that ton of coal has to pay a tax of 12½ cents, to say nothing of the other taxes which the workmen have to meet in their ordinary course of living. I have always been against the imposition of that heavy tax upon coal. I shall now leave that, Mr. Speaker, to the people to consider whether it was an advantage to them or whether it was a disadvantage.

I come now, Sir, to the time when this parliament suggested a bounty to the iron and steel industry. At that period the Minister of Finance then in Nova Scotia used his strongest language both on the platform and in the press he controlled to discredit any such policy, and he denounced the party who enunciated it. That is another measure in which the Finance Minister played an important part. But, Sir, more recently than that, when in 1898 those who after that bounty was offered by this parliament had operated for a number of years and found their operations met with a considerable success; when they wanted to extend their operations and looked around to see where they could with best advantage to themselves extend these operations, they centred on the town of Sydney in Cape Breton. After having spent many thousands of dollars in equipping themselves with the necessary information they came to this parliament; they came to the Minister of Finance, they came to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), but they failed to get what they were seeking, namely, a promise of the continuation of the system of bounty, in order to enable them to secure further means to go on extending their operations. The town of Sydney, represented by its mayor and councillors and its board of trade, brought every possible influence to bear upon the government of the day. The aid and influence of the hon. leader of the opposition was implored by the people who wanted to see that industry started; and through his influence and such other influences as could be brought to bear on the Minister of Finance, he, after over a year's delay, with great reluctance—for the Minister of Trade and Commerce could not stay in this House while such a policy was submitted—agreed to bring in a measure to extend that system of bounty to the iron industry for a short time. These are the circumstances under which the hon. Minister of Finance found himself compelled to ask this House to grant this concession. I imagine now that I see my hon. leader taking the Minister of Finance by the ear, and leading him before you, Mr. Speaker, with that measure in his hand, for it very much resembled that. The hon. leader of the opposition, backed by the influence of people who wanted to see that done, secured that boon for that great industry; and now the Minister of Finance comes before this House and says he played an important part in bringing about the establishment of this industry. It was an important and a serious part for him, for he had to swallow everything he had said on that subject for twenty years, and had to make his peace with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I myself brought the matter before the House near the close of the session of 1898, when I learned that there was nothing to be done in that direction, which I regretted, as did every one else who desired to see that great industry started. I took advantage of the opportunity afforded to me by the introduction of a Bill into the House for making some regulations for the payment of the bounty as the law then existed. I expressed my regret and disappointment at that Bill not going a little further, and giving to the people engaged in that industry some guarantee that their wishes would be complied with. I received a very unfavourable and very cold answer from both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That is briefly the history of the bounty and the circumstances which brought about the present condition of our coal and iron industries.

Mr. McDOUGALL.

Then I come to the question of our railways. I will not detain the House for any length of time on that question. For years before 1882 the people of Cape Breton wanted a railway extended to that island; but they failed to secure the accomplishment of that great work either by the government of Nova Scotia or the government of the Dominion. In 1882, however, the government of Nova Scotia, known as the Holmes-Thompson government, introduced a measure and passed it through the legislature at Halifax, providing for the consolidation of the railways of the province of Nova Scotia, and also for the extension of other lines of railway, one of the principal of which was that running into the Island of Cape Breton. That measure was perfected at the time when the hon. Minister of Finance and his party came into power in the legislature of Nova Scotia; and what did they do? They trampled that measure under foot; they refused to do anything towards carrying it out. Then the people of Cape Breton were compelled to come to this parliament and beg of it to give them an extension of the Intercolonial Railway into the Island of Cape Breton. The first time I had the privilege of speaking in this House was in the session of 1885. On that occasion I took advantage of the opportunity offered to me to lay before the House my views with regard to the industries of the Island of Cape Breton and of my county in particular, and to show to the House how the interests of both the Island of Cape Breton and of the Dominion of Canada would be served by the proposed extension. I am not ashamed to-day of what I predicted on that occasion; I am not ashamed of referring to anything I said. I am pleased to say that very soon after that date this parliament undertook to build that railway, and it was completed about the year 1890. To-day that railway cannot do half the business that is offered. It is operated in the interests of Canada as well as in the interests of Cape Breton. That railway contributed to the bringing about of the present condition of affairs in the island. It enabled the people of Cape Breton to send their coal to New Glasgow to be used in connection with the smelting of iron and steel carried on by the Nova Scotia Steel Works; and that experiment proved so successful that to-day the greatest portion of the coal used in the manufacture of iron and steel in the county of Pictou, one of the greatest coal counties in Canada, comes from the Cape Breton collieries. These are the people who went out and surveyed the land after having tried the Cape Breton coal, and selected Cape Breton as the place for extending that great industry. Hence the great development promised us to-day in Cape Breton by the Dominion Iron and Steel Company and by the Nova Scotia Steel Company, which is about to begin business as a separate concern. The conditions which brought about this great development emanated from the national policy and from those who gave their support to that policy from 1878 down to the present day, for it was the national policy that aided our coal industry, our iron and steel industry, and our railway industry. We could not have a railway to-day were it not for the conditions brought about by the national policy, which enabled the Dominion government to extend the Intercolonial Railway and make it a great factor in the development of trade and traffic of the country. The people to whom the credit is due for the prospect of great future development in the county which I have the honour to represent are the Liberal-Conservative party, the Liberal-Conservative leaders, who enunciated and brought about that policy, and the people who are ready to support those leaders, whether as members in this House or as voters in the country. The humblest citizen in the country who gives his support to that great national policy deserves greater credit for helping to bring about this condition of things than the Finance Minister, who never did anything to support that industry except what he was forced to do. I shall not detain the House any further.

Mr. ALEXANDER McNEILL (North Bruce). I had not intended, Mr. Speaker, to take part in this debate at all. I had so often, I am afraid, wearied this House by remarks in connection with the subject of the amendment now under discussion, that I thought it would be as well were I to remain silent on this occasion. But my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, said that he thought it would perhaps, under all the circumstances, be proper that I should say a word or two in reference on the subject before the House.

I think it will be difficult to find in the annals of parliamentary government a condition of things parallel to that with which we are face to face in Canada to-day. On the all important question of our relations to the empire, we have no less than four of the most prominent members of this government enunciating views deliberately, officially enunciating views, which are absolutely inconsistent with one another. We have the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) repeating this session what he repeated last session, and what he astonished the House by saying, I believe, for the first time in 1888, that this country, owes nothing to the mother country except Christian forgiveness for her mismanagement of our affairs. We have, on the other hand, the Minister of Finance stating that we owe so much to the mother country that in recognition of that debt, he is prepared to make a reduction in our tariff, in her favour, to the extent of 33½ per cent. Then we have the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) declaring that he is a Frenchman first and a British subject afterwards. We have him, through his official, personally inspired organ of the press, stating that we have nothing to do with the war in South Africa. We have the organ which supports him in this city stating that not a man and not a cent should the government of Canada provide for the assistance of the mother country in the struggle which she is waging on behalf of our own fellow-subjects and in defence of our own empire in South Africa. We have that same minister introducing to you, Mr. Speaker, as a member of this House, a supporter of the government who had resigned his seat, as a formal protest against the policy which the government has pursued in this matter, and who since then has been carrying out the propaganda of the minister who so introduced him, if we can believe the reports in the public press, by warning our French Canadian friends in the province of Quebec that they must have a care lest, if those who are in favour of the unity of the empire should have their way, the poor habitant may have his door battered down, his home invaded, and the flower of his family dragged away to fight the battles of the empire, on a barren desert and under some blazing sun in a far off land. Just as if, Mr. Speaker, any Imperialist had ever proposed or suggested or imagined that any single French Canadian should leave this country to fight the empire's battles, except of his own free will. We have indeed thought, we have believed, and we still believe, notwithstanding the sinister statements of the hon. the Minister of Public Works in Paris, that the descendents of French Canadians, who so heroically shed their blood and risked their lives in defence of the empire in the past, would be prepared to-day, if the need arose, to prove again their devotion to that cause. I say we still believe it; we still believe that the compatriots of Major Girouard would be prepared, if the need arose, to defend that flag under which they peacefully enjoy special privileges and rights which they hold very dear. But, Mr. Speaker, the statement that it has ever been proposed or suggested, as I have said, to send any French Canadian by compulsion out of this country to fight the battles of the empire is a statement absolutely without foundation in fact, is viciously untrue, and only surpassed by that other statement, to which I called attention some time ago, and which was published in the official organ of the Minister of Public Works—the statement intimating that the English-speaking people of this country were about to invade the province of Quebec by force of arms, and that this country was within two steps of civil war.

I regret that the hon. gentleman who has been carrying out this propaganda in the province of Quebec (Mr. Bourassa), and who is not, I am sorry to say, in his seat at this moment, had not laid to heart the broad and liberal views expressed by the archbishop of his own church and by other dignitaries of that church in the province of Quebec in reference to the university riots. I regret that he has not shown himself as broad-minded as other members of his church in this House, who, we know, are liberal and broad-minded in regard to these matters. But perhaps it is simply because he is acting under the orders of his master and the master of the administration, and is not really expressing his own sentiments. We know that when a member of this House—a Roman Catholic of Irish descent—a short time ago, made reference to this South African question in terms which I think the House will agree did as much credit to his head as to his heart, the hon. the Minister of Public Works—the master of the administration, and the master of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa)—said that there must be something the matter with his heart when he, an Irishman, ventured to express loyalty towards the empire and towards that august lady who has won to herself the veneration of every good heart in christendom, and whose 'eighty winters' may well be said 'to freeze with one rebuke all great self-seekers trampling on the right.'

Now, Sir, I say that this statement made by the hon. gentleman is absolutely untrue, and absolutely without one shadow of foundation; and I want to tell hon. gentlemen like himself, who make that statement, that the British people have in the past proved themselves well able to maintain their own quarrel in foreign lands without calling in compulsory aid from any quarter whatsoever, and are wholly persuaded that they were never better able to do so than at the present time. Voluntary aid, such as we are receiving from our French Canadian friends in South Africa, will always be received, Sir, with genuine gratitude, as evidence on their part of a kindly appreciation of treatment under this flag, which, I hope, even we may, without impropriety, describe as not illiberal. But, the statement, or rather, I would say the proposal, that any single French Canadian should be compelled to such service contrary to his own will, is a proposal that would not be tolerated for one single moment by the British people in any part of the empire, and of this fact every member of this House must be well aware, or ought to be; and if he is not, he ought to be ashamed of himself. But, Sir, while we have the hon. member for Labelle pursuing this pernicious propaganda in the province of Quebec, and while we find him accompanied in his peregrinations throughout that province by another supporter of the government, who openly advocates the dismemberment of our empire, and while the Minister of Public Works is talking veiled treason in Paris—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McNEILL. Well, perhaps, not much veiled. However, I do not think it could be less—

Mr. COWAN. Take it back.

Mr. McNEILL. No, I cannot take it back. I regard it as such. While the Minister of Public Works is, in my judgment, talking veiled treason in Paris, we have the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) declaiming in terms of burning eloquence in favour of a still closer union of the empire, and declaring to this House that the sending of the contingents, under the circumstances under which they were sent, was justifiable and patriotic and wise. That is a little evidence of the conflict of views which exists among the members of this government. But, that is not all, Sir. We have the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), year by year, coming down and formally stating in his official financial statement that there is one, and only one, way in which we can obtain preferential trade with the mother country, and that is by the operation of a great wave of public sentiment, and not on any business basis whatever. On the other hand, we have the Prime Minister coming down year by year and declaring that there is one, and only one, way in which we can obtain this preferential trade, and that is by approaching the mother country on a purely business basis and saying to her: For such and such concessions in your market, we are prepared to admit your goods into our market free of duty. The Minister of Finance tells us that we shall never obtain it on a business basis, while the Prime Minister tells us that it is only on a business basis it can be obtained. Now, I wish to ask, Mr. Speaker, how is it possible to discuss great public questions with a government whose members express, with regard to those great public questions, views absolutely divergent and contradictory of one another? Who is the representative of the government? Who is the mouthpiece of the government? I suppose we must take, as the statements of greatest authority, the statements of the Prime Minister himself. But, the unfortunate part of the matter is, that when we come to deal with those statements we are no better off; for, just as the members of the government contradict one another, so does the Prime Minister contradict himself. As every one knows, in London he told the people of Canada that preferential trade would be a great boon to the people of this country. He told them a great deal more than that; he told them he would and could obtain preferential trade for them. I am sorry my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is not in his place, as I would like to have called his attention to that aspect of the matter; but, he is not here, and I will pass it by. The Prime Minister told us, in London, that preferential trade would be a great boon. But, in Liverpool he said he did not want it. And, to the Chronicle he carefully explained that this which he had said would be a great boon, would be an injury to Canada. He came back a few weeks afterwards, and, in Toronto, he told the people of Canada that he would be wanting in patriotism and wanting in reason—that he would be an idiot—if he was not in favour of obtaining for Canada this very thing which, a few weeks before, he had declared to the Chronicle would be an injury to Canada. He said in England that he did not want preferential trade, because it savoured too much of protection; he told us in this House that he did not want it because it savoured too much of free trade. Last session, in a carefully-prepared utterance, in reply to a speech of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), he made use of these words in reference to a resolution which had been long before the House:

But I will endeavour, without any circumlocution, to come to the main point at once and to meet the motion of my hon. friend definitely and squarely.

That is a good, straight British statement.

The motion affirms that it is the duty of the government to endeavour to take steps with a view to obtaining for the products of Canada preferential treatment in the markets of Great Britain. To that proposition I have not a word of dissent to offer; on the contrary, I fully concur in it. I say at once it is the duty of the government of Canada, by all means in its power and as soon as it is possible to do so, to get preferential treatment in the markets of Great Britain.

That was the right hon. gentleman's deliberate statement. Forty-eight hours afterwards a resolution was moved to this effect, in his own very words:

That it is the duty of the government of Canada, by all means in its power, and as soon as it is possible to do so, to get preferential treatment in the markets of Great Britain.

And my right hon. friend refused to support the resolution, absolutely declined to support the statement which, forty-eight hours before in a most carefully prepared speech, he had made to this House. He said that it was impossible to condense in the form of a resolution an hour's speech. That was his explanation. But I think if any one will examine the hour's speech, he will find that the hour was taken up by discussing the statements, as to fact, made in the resolution which the right hon. gentleman objected to, and, that there is not a word in his speech which modifies the statement that I have read.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be well for us to inquire what all this means. We have a government prepared to denounce to-day what they supported yesterday, and to advocate to-morrow what they denounce to-day. What does it mean? What does it prove? Well, Sir, I think it proves, and I am sorry to be obliged to say it, that this government as a government is absolutely and utterly devoid of political principle. I can draw no other conclusion. I say that they are absolutely determined not to be guided by principle, but by convenience only, the convenience of the moment. Sir, I do not make that statement without some verbal authority for it; I have a high authority for the statement I make. I find that the right hon. gentleman himself, in Toronto, on the occasion to which I have already referred, made use of these words:

Now I am not above telling you, I can say it without any secret, that I am always ready to put on the clothes of my opponents—

When, do you suppose, Mr. Speaker? When he thinks they are in the right? When he approves of the principle they advocate? Not at all, Sir, but:

—whenever I think it to my convenience.

It matters not at all that the policy he is prepared to adopt is one that he has all along opposed; it matters not at all that the policy is one for opposing which he and his supporters received support at the polls; it matters not at all that they hold their seats by reason of the fact that it was understood by the electorate that they were pledged to oppose that policy; it matters not at all that the right hon. gentleman thinks the policy unwise and mischievous; if only it is to his convenience to adopt it, he is ready to do so. That was the right hon. gentleman's own statement, and I say that a more sinister statement it would be difficult to imagine, made by any man holding the position that right hon. gentleman holds in this country. I say that it is an absolute abandonment of political principle, it is an absolute dismissal of political principle; and it is not surprising that after that statement, publicly made, by the Prime Minister of Canada, we should find the flood-gates of corruption let loose in this country. What was it, if it was not a mandate to his friends in the country, if it was not an advice to them, to follow the policy whatever it might be that was convenient for the moment, if it was not a mandate to the ballot stuffer and the ballot stealer to pursue their course? Why, after this, it is not surprising, if we find that the gentleman who has managed their 'threshing machine' so well, has been rewarded by this government with a most valuable appointment.

Mr. MILLS. They always reward men of that kind, they have done it in my county.

Mr. McNEILL. They have done it in this case, too, without doubt. Now, it is remarkable that while the right hon. gentleman and the members of his government have thus shown their contempt for consistency, while they are absolutely callous as to pledges publicly given, they have by their actions, as I stated last session, proved themselves to be remorsefully consistent in their determination that the people of Canada shall not enjoy any privilege in the markets of the United Kingdom over their rivals in the United States. Now, the government knew, and none better than the right hon. gentleman, that there was one essential step that had to be taken, if we were to have preferential trade in the markets of the mother country. They knew what that step was. They had been warned what that step was, over and over again by Mr. Chamberlain. In his speech, which has been so often referred to, before the Chambers of Commerce, he said:

If the colonies desire, as we desire, and as we believe they do, this closer union; if they are willing to make some sacrifice of their present arrangements and convictions in order to secure it, let them say so; let the offer come voluntarily from them, and I believe it will be considered in this country not in any huckstering spirit.

Nothing could be plainer than that, and at Liverpool, he spoke in exactly the same sense. So the government knew that the first preliminary step was to say that we wanted this thing, and they have deliberately refused to take that first essential, initial step in this matter. Mr. Speaker, they not only refused to take that step, as I have said, but they did more, they compelled their supporters the very next session, after the right hon. gentleman had made his statement in Toronto, that he was in favour of preferential trade, to oppose the resolution of the conference, which declared merely that it was advisable that we should have this preferential trade; and they put up one of their supporters, a gentleman who, I think, is known to you, Sir, to move a resolution in this House in amendment to the resolution to which I have referred. So that by their action on that occasion, the government not only did not tell Mr. Chamberlain that they wanted this preferential trade, but, on the contrary, they gave him to understand in the most explicit manner, that they did not want it. They would not say it was desirable or advisable we should have it. They not only would not say that, but they compelled their supporters to oppose a resolution which did say so. I think that under the circumstances, it is not less than ludicrous for hon. members to rise in their places and endeavour to gammon the people of this country into the belief that we are not obtaining preferential trade because it is useless to ask the authorities of the mother country to give it to us, when they themselves have refused to support a resolution, have defeated a resolution, declaring that it was advisable that we should have it.

Mr. McNEILL.

Now, Sir, in Mr. Chamberlain's speech at the Canada Club, he suggested that there should be a conference or commission of inquiry. What is the history of that matter? Every one knows the right hon. gentleman had declared that he was in favour of such a commission; every one knows that he had pledged himself to support such a commission, and to do his utmost to promote it. Well, he not only did not do so, he not only did not carry out his pledge to the people in that regard, but he did a great deal worse. After having had a most pressing invitation, subsequent to making that pledge, from Mr. Chamberlain to join in such a commission of inquiry, the right hon. gentleman, instead of doing as Mr. Chamberlain suggested, has allowed three years to elapse, and has deliberately held aloof, refusing to have anything to do with the matter. If the right hon. gentleman would like to know, and if the members of the government would like to know how this want of action on their part is regarded in England, I will give them some authority for it. We have heard a great deal about the Duke of Devonshire's views on this question of preferential trade. Whether he is in favour of preferential trade or not we know what his views are in regard to free trade. We have his statement in that regard recorded here. But I would like to call the attention of the House to what the Duke of Devonshire said in reference to the fact that the government here did not respond, not to Mr. Chamberlain's pressing invitation, but to his mere suggestion in his Canada Club speech. The Duke of Devonshire spoke in London on the 3rd of December, 1896. That was at the end of the year, at the beginning of which Mr. Chamberlain had made his suggestion for a commission of inquiry. After the right hon. gentleman had perambulated this country stating that he was in favour of a commission of inquiry, but doing nothing to promote it, the Duke of Devonshire said:

But it must be acknowledged—and here again I come to one of the checks which those who have this cause at heart have sustained—that that suggestion—

That is Mr. Chamberlain's suggestion at the Canada Club.

—has not hitherto met with any such response from the principal colonies as would justify its becoming the subject of discussion at another conference, and probably we must admit that the time is not ripe for discussion, either of the commercial proposals which were made at the conference or of that other proposal which Lord Ripon and Mr. Chamberlain suggested might probably become a subject of discussion between ourselves and the colonies.

There is the view of this most moderate of British statesmen in reference to the want of action on the part of the right hon. gentleman, not in regard to the pressing invitation of Mr. Chamberlain, but in regard to the suggestion that Mr. Chamberlain had merely thrown out in his Canada Club speech. He regards it as a check to the movement. After that statement of his we have the pressing invitation; three years have elapsed and nothing has been done. Yet, hon. gentlemen have the audacity to rise in this House and talk as if the fact that no progress has been made has nothing to do with the want of action on the part of the government. The right hon. gentleman said, in Toronto, that the reason that he had not asked in England for preferential trade was that he was afraid of asking too much. If that is the case, how did it come, that, at the next session after he made that speech, he compelled his friends here to oppose the resolution of the conference declaring that preferential trade is desirable? Now, I come to a point to which I would earnestly invite the attention of the members of this House, and not only the members of this House, but the attention of every man throughout the Dominion of Canada who is interested in this matter. I want to call attention to another statement that the right hon. gentleman made in Toronto. Speaking in Toronto, on his return from England, the right hon. gentleman said:

There is nothing in the way now. The coast is clear. The ground is ready for discussion—

And this is what I want to call special attention to.

—and it can be discussed with the hope of obtaining some satisfactory solution of the problem.

Well, then, Mr. Speaker, if the right hon. gentleman had come to the conclusion, after his return from England, that the coast was clear, that the time was ripe, and that we could discuss this question with the hope of obtaining preferential trade upon satisfactory terms, I want to know why it is that he has rejected every overture that we have made from this side of the House to have the matter taken out of the lines of party politics and to let this parliament act as one united body in pressing this great policy on the favourable consideration of the mother country? I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that it was not merely before he went to England that the right hon. gentleman said he could obtain preferential trade, but that after his return from England, fresh from his interviews with Mr. Chamberlain, he declared that the coast was clear, that the ground was ready for discussion, and that we could enter upon the discussion with the hope of finding a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. What is the explanation that the right hon. gentleman gives of his inaction? He said that Mr. Chamberlain proposed free trade pure and simple. I say so too, because I think we are bound to accept Mr. Chamberlain's statement in regard to the matter. I may say, in passing, it would not have been a very remarkable thing after the reception his suggestions received from the right hon. gentleman in Liverpool that he should venture to go no further than to make such a suggestion as that, but, suppose that Mr. Chamberlain's suggestion was what we accept it to be, a suggestion for free trade pure and simple. Does it follow that Mr. Chamberlain was determined to adhere rigidly to the very terms of his suggestion, that he would make no modification of its terms, that he would not modify its terms in the direction of the suggestion that we supposed had been made in his Canada Club speech? Is it to be supposed that on a question of such enormous importance he would not follow a well-known principle of British statesmanship? We know that one of the cardinal principles of British statesmanship is moderation, compromise and concession. Is it to be supposed that in reference to a question which he described as the most important of all Imperial questions he would depart altogether from the traditions of British statesmanship and adhere rigidly to this one proposal and make no concession whatever? The suggestion is absurd; common sense and a priori reasoning tell us it is absurd. What does the Daily News say, that great organ of the Liberal party in England which, next to the Times, has a standing as high as any public organ in the world? It is exceedingly interesting to see what the Daily News says. It says, referring to Mr. Chamberlain's proposal:

The real question is, what amount of compromise with that principle—

That is free trade within the empire.

—the colonies would require and the mother country could admit to produce the advantages above described.

That is what the Daily News says. The date of the article is the 10th of June, if I recollect right. That is an expression of opinion on the part of this great organ of the Liberal party in England, an organ which one would suppose, would, naturally, be opposed to Mr. Chamberlain's views. But, we have more than that; we have the statement of the right hon. gentleman himself, who, coming fresh from his interviews with Mr. Chamberlain, declared, judging from what he had seen and heard, that we could enter upon the discussion with the hope of obtaining preferential trade upon satisfactory terms for Canada. Therefore, it is absolutely useless to pursue the controversy further so far as this aspect of it is concerned. It is simply breaking a butterfly on the wheel; nothing more nor less, and I do not propose to delay the House longer in reference to it. It is, I think, Mr. Speaker, clear to the meanest comprehension, that this government stands here to-day convicted out of the mouth of its own Prime Minister of having known that the door was open, and that they could, as he himself said—I am glad my right hon. friend is now in his place—that we could, as he himself said, when fresh from his interviews with Mr. Chamberlain, enter upon this discussion with a hope of obtaining a satisfactory solution of the problem. This government knew that the door was open and they deliberately slammed the door in the face of the people of Canada, and they have barricaded that door and kept it closed from that day to this. Sir, the Canadian people may approve of conduct of that kind. If they do approve of such conduct they will have an opportunity of saying so at the polls; but I venture to think that unless their ballots are stolen and unless they are thus disfranchised to keep this government in power, the people of Canada will tell a different story. That, Sir, is at least my belief.

A good deal has been said, Mr. Speaker, about the state of public opinion in England with reference to this matter, and the question has been discussed so much better and more fully by others that I do not intend to take up the time of the House with a discussion of it now. I will say that I have many extracts—from the Times, the Daily News, the Telegraph, the Standard, the Morning Post, the Chronicle, the Pall Mall Gazette, the St. James Gazette, the Westminster Gazette, the Saturday Review, the British Trade Journal, Invention, the Textile Mercury (published in the very heart of the Manchester school), the Glasgow Herald, the Belfast News-Letter, and the Irish Times, all of them showing that this question has taken a tremendous hold of the public mind in the United Kingdom, and almost all of them favourable to the view which we favour on this side of the House—at all events, writing encouragingly in reference to Mr. Chamberlain's proposal. The hon. gentleman who leads the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has already pointed out that a very large number of the Conservative members of the Imperial parliament were returned, pledged to support such a policy as this. The representatives of one of the Chambers of Commerce at the great conference of Chambers of Commerce of the empire, made use of one or two expressions which I will give to the House in a moment. The representative of the Warrington Chamber of Commerce said:

I have the honour of being chairman of a workman's confederation, and I tell you that every member of that organization is strongly in favour of preferential duties.

The representative of the Middlesboro' Chamber of Commerce made this remarkable statement with reference to a resolution in favour of preferential trade which had been proposed at a meeting of the Chambers of Commerce in London:

The great industrial centres of the United Kingdom, voting through their chambers were strongly in favour of that resolution, while smaller towns were not in favour of it, and hence it was that it was lost.

So that we have the great industrial centres of the United Kingdom with us.

I think, Sir, that those evidences are sufficient to satisfy any reasonable creature that all this talk about there being no public opinion in England favourable to this policy is mere moonshine. But, Sir, I do not rest the case upon these evidences alone. I take also into consideration the fact that so astute a statesman, and a statesman of the high standing of the Colonial Secretary, has deliberately suggested that it might be advisable for the mother country to alter her whole fiscal system and to impose duties upon foodstuffs and raw material in order to bring about this closer union of the empire. I rest the case also upon the further fact that Mr. Chamberlain suggested that there should be a commission of inquiry to endeavour to arrive at a satisfactory solution of this matter. I rest it also upon the fact that the Duke of Devonshire, as I have shown, has stated that the mere fact that the first suggestion of Mr. Chamberlain was not acted upon, had acted as a check to the movement. I rest it upon the further fact, that the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) stated in Toronto immediately after his interviews with Mr. Chamberlain: That we could enter upon the discussion of this question with the hope of arriving at a satisfactory solution of the problem. I rest it upon the additional fact as well, that a short time after the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had made that statement in Toronto, Mr. Chamberlain made a further statement in Liverpool in which he said he was prepared to meet the colonies more than half-way; and in order to encourage the right hon. gentleman to proceed, said: That he would not allow any consideration of economic pedantry to stand in the way, and that he believed that the mother country would not regard it as a question of present profit and loss, but would look, and wisely look, to the future for her reward. I venture to say—using the term employed by the right hon. gentleman himself, and subsequently employed by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Russell)—that the man who really wants preferential trade, the man who desires to have it for Canada and believes in it, is no less than an idiot if he is of the opinion that this government in regard to this matter has not betrayed the interests of Canada and of the empire. I see my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) opposite; I do not know whether it is right to refer to what he has said, because it is not strictly apropos to this debate, but I must say to my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) and to the House, that I think it was unfair to him, that it was not less than cruel to him, to call upon him to attempt (as he himself describes it) 'to justify' the course of the government in this regard. I think it is always an unfair thing and an unkind thing to drive a willing horse to death. It is unfair to ask a man to make ropes out of the sea sand, or to carry water in a basket, or to prove at the same time that two and two are four and that two and two are not four; and I think that it was just as unfair to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) to endeavour to reconcile the utterly self-contradictory statements of the government of which he is a supporter—to attempt to 'justify them' (as he says himself) without perforce condemning them. And, Sir, I know that to an hon. member of his practical turn of mind, nothing could be more unpleasant than to find himself condemning his own government. At least, I have been sitting with him in the House now for some five sessions, and I am not aware of any occasion on which he has arisen to differ from the administration of which he is so brilliant and so worthy a supporter. I may be mistaken, but I have never had the privilege of hearing him calling in question any act, great or small, of the government in this House, whether it was the Yukon deal, the Drummond Railway deal, or the burking of inquiry in reference to corruption at elections; and I can quite understand that my hon. friend, constituted as he is, would naturally think there was something mystical in the make-up of any one who, at times, took a different course with reference to the government he happened to support. I say it was unfair; and while I listened with pleasure, and with more than pleasure—with admiration—to a speech which the hon. gentleman made earlier in the session, I must say, with great frankness, that having read his speech on this matter—I had not the pleasure of hearing it delivered—it does not come up to what I would have expected from him. But, we must remember that he was asked to do the impossible. I thought, when my hon. friend was reduced to say as a criticism that the hon. leader of the opposition was splitting hairs in the discussion of this question, that he had got into very deep water when he had to catch at a straw of that kind. Why, who ever heard of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition stopping in a discussion to split hairs? Perhaps the hon. gentleman had reference to the kind of warfare that Robert Bruce carried on at the battle of Bannockburn, as described by Sir Walter Scott:

High in his stirrups stood the king,
And gave his battle-axe the swing;
Right on De Boune, the whiles he pass'd,
Fell that stern dint—the first—the last!—
Such strength upon that blow was put,
The helmet crashed like hazel-nut;
The axe shaft, with its brazen clasp,
Was shivered to the gauntlet grasp.

That is the kind of warfare my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) carries on, and if the hon. gentleman chooses to describe that as splitting hairs, we need not object. But, I would rather describe it as a splitting of skulls and a scattering of brains, that is, where there are any brains to scatter. I admit that my hon. friend has a good supply, although I would like him to use them at times to better purpose. It is very amusing to read my hon. friend's speech, because he is so very often brought to the point where he is just about to condemn the government, and then he makes a desperate struggle to get out of the difficulty. He has a long magnificent sentence piled up here about the selfishness of our demanding of the mother country, after all she has done for us, to impose duties upon her breadstuffs and her food, and to stifle her trade, which is the very lifeblood of her arteries. It seemed to me as if the hon. gentleman, when he got to that point, said to himself: 'Confound it, Laurier said he wanted this thing,' and so, he turns round and says: 'It would be selfish to ask for it, but if it were offered to us, we might accept it.' I think my hon. friend was hardly doing himself justice. If it was so dreadfully selfish to ask for this, if we were really proposing to stifle the trade of England and to injure England, I do not think we should accept from her an offer to that effect. I think that would be only one degree less selfish on our part. But, the fallacy of my hon. friend, as I think he must know, consists in the fact that we do not propose to ask England to do anything that is not beneficial to herself; and the beauty and the glory of this policy is, that while it benefits Canada, it benefits England also. But, there was another very amusing slip which my hon. friend made. He said that when we proposed any kind of trade arrangements with the mother country, we would be acting the part of President Kruger. I do not want to misrepresent my hon. friend in any way, but I think that is what he said, that when we were proposing any kind of arrangement for a quid pro quo, we were pursuing a Kruger policy. When my hon. friend said that, he remembered one thing and he forgot one thing. He remembered that President Kruger was, perhaps, the most corrupt politician of modern times, but, he forgot that his leader had declared in this House, in express terms, that he personally entertained the most profound admiration for President Kruger. My hon. friend also forgot that the British Empire League, of which he is a member, and of which Her Majesty is the patron, has laid it down as a principle that we should strive for reciprocal trade between the different parts of the empire. Of course, I know that my hon. friend's mind is more practical than mine; but, to a mind constituted as mine is, I do not see how we can discuss these matters without entering into a discussion of a business kind. However, I do not know that it is necessary to deal any further with the speech of the hon. gentleman, except to say that when he said that it was an infinitely small concession that Mr. Chamberlain had made in his Canada Club speech, when Mr. Chamberlain said that an exception might be made of all articles taxed chiefly for revenue purposes, I think my hon. friend was not showing that practical grasp of the subject which I would have expected of him, because, if there could be a large concession, I think that is one of the largest we could have expected to be suggested by Mr. Chamberlain at such a time.

Now, I am afraid I am wearying the House; but, if I am not, I would like to make reference to another matter which, I think, has scarcely received the consideration which its importance deserves. We know, all of us, I think, that if we obtained preferential trade it would enormously benefit the farming community in Canada. We set out in our resolution last year, that this policy, if adopted, would be a great benefit to the farming community, that it would set in motion a great tide of immigration to our shores, that it would people the vast wheat areas of our North-west, that it would enhance the value of farming lands in the older provinces, that it would promote the unity of the empire, and deliver the empire from a dangerous dependence on a foreign food supply. These things we set out last year, and I do not think they were gravely disputed by any member of weight in this House. But what about our manufacturing industries? How is such a policy as this going to affect them? Is it not going to be injurious to them? That is a question which I think we ought to consider very gravely. Well, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, two years ago—and I think they ought to know something about this matter—passed a resolution in favour of this policy, and within the last few weeks they have passed another resolution endorsing it. That, I think, is pretty strong evidence that it is not likely to be injurious to our manufacturing interests.

Mr. McNEILL.

That the adoption of this policy would increase the population of Canada with a rapidity, and to an extent altogether unprecedented in any British colony, I think goes without argument. There is not an immigrant in every thousand who would deliberately select the south of the line, and have to pay a duty to get his produce into the English market, if by going to the north of the line he could get his goods into that market free, and thus obtain a greater value for what he would have to export than he could possibly obtain to the south of the line. Therefore, I think the tide of immigration would be attracted to the north, and Canada would become the magnet. The Manufacturers' Association realize this, and they know that a prosperous population with its many and ever increasing wants—a population which would be increasing by leaps and bounds at their own doors—means unprecedented prosperity for them, even if there should be a reduction in favour of British manufactured goods, and a displacement in this market by British manufactured goods of foreign manufacture. That itself opens a prospect of vast advantage to our manufacturers. But this by no means exhausts the benefits which are contained in the policy of preferential trade for the manufacturers of Canada. The mother country imports manufactured and partly manufactured goods to the enormous sum of $500,000,000 annually, and that huge trade is to-day controlled and operated almost exclusively by the foreign rivals of the empire. Then, what would not be the advantage to our manufacturers, the moment there is discrimination against those foreign rivals and our manufacturers get their goods into the English market with a preference as against the foreigner? We are competing in the English market to-day in many lines with these foreign manufacturers, but we are competing under enormous difficulties. How great would be the advantage if we had preferential trade and discriminatory duties against our foreign rivals in that huge market? Mr. Speaker, the main portion of that advantage would go to the manufacturers in England, as a matter of course. But who will set bounds to the advantages which would accrue to many of our manufacturers in Canada? Take for example our lumbermen, take the manufacturers of dressed lumber, take the manufacturers of doors and sashes and mouldings, of furniture, of handles for implements, of agricultural implements, take our four millers and others, take the many lines of boots and shoes which we manufacture in Canada, take our canned meats and canned fruits, and canned fish, take hosts of other lines of industry which can be mentioned, they would all be enormously benefited by this advantage, given to our manufacturers over our foreign rivals in the enormous markets of the mother country. Surely that would be an immense benefit to this country.

But even this does not exhaust the treasures that are contained in this truly Imperial policy for the manufacturers of Canada. What about our possessions in the Orient? What about our trade under the Southern Cross, in South Africa and the West Indies, on the day when it is declared that there shall be a preference in all British markets to all British goods over foreign goods? Take India, for example. Germany has got in there with her exports now. She has increased her export trade in India since 1890 to the extent of 300 per cent. The United States is carrying on an export trade with India to the extent of four and one-third millions to four and one-half million dollars, I forget which, and is rapidly increasing that trade. Take Australasia, the United States is carrying on a trade in Australasia to-day of $19,500,000. That trade has increased since 1867 from $9,500,000 to the figures I have given, and it would have increased a great deal more had it not been for the fearful financial calamity which overtook those colonies, a few years ago, and in which every financial institution almost went by the board, and when, had it not been for the interposition of the Bank of England, the whole financial fabric apparently would have collapsed.

The Australian colonies, according to the British Trade and Navigation Returns, have a foreign import trade of $29,000,000, but these returns, as was clearly shown in the consular reports presented to Mr. Chamberlain a year or two ago, do not by any means show the extent of the foreign imports of the Australasian colonies. They only show the port of export and not at all the country of origin, and it would be probably very much nearer the mark if we said that that trade amounted to $35,000,000 rather than $29,000,000. Take South Africa, the total import trade of that country is $130,000,000. In the Cape Colony alone, the imports amount to $90,000,000. How much of that trade do you suppose our American competitors are walking away with to-day? Ten and a half million out of the $90,000,000, and in lines in which our Canadian manufacturers could well compete.

For all those lines which Canada is especially calculated to produce, these vast regions will be opening wider and wider the door as time goes on, and great as the advantage to the Canadian farmer of this great beneficent British policy would be, I very much question whether it would not be almost, if not quite, as great for the Canadian manufacturer. Of course I do not wish to make the suggestion for a moment that in all this trade to which I have referred, the great manufacturers of the mother country would not, as a matter of course, have the lion's share, but the benefit to Canadian manufacturers would be enormous.

I am afraid I have spoken too long, but I just wish to say before closing, a word or two with regard to the 33½ per cent preferential rate, and then I will have done.

Now, with regard to this 33½ per cent, I have to say this—although it may seem an unkind thing to say—that I regret the reduction of the duties in favour of the mother country by 33½ per cent.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. Yes, I regret it; and I regret it for two reasons. As I have said here before, for my own part, speaking personally, I would be quite willing to make some small concessions without asking anything in return, as a mere evidence of good-will, as a recognition of past favours received, and especially as a breaking of the ice, as an initial step, in the prosecution of this great policy. But we have gone altogether too far. I object to this as I say, for two reasons, first, because it will injure our own Canadian native manufactures, it will cripple them. They are at present, I believe, under the 25 per cent reduction, just staggering along, many of them, even in these prosperous times. So soon as the pendulum takes a swing in the other direction, many of them, I believe, will be unable to resist the pressure even under the 25 per cent. Now that the preference has been increased to 33½ per cent, I believe it will mean the crippling and destruction of many important industries in Canada. I think that anything which will retard the development of Canada, this great member of the empire will injure the mother country herself—will injure her trade and detract from her strength and security; and therefore, I say, from that point of view, I regret that this concession has been made. I regret it still further for a second reason, because it is an encouragement to those in England who are opposed to this policy, and who even now say that it is unnecessary to make any concession to us in order to obtain free access to our markets, because we are rapidly coming around to free trade. I think I have proved conclusively that the government has demonstrated that it is hostile to this policy of preferential trade; and I must say that if they had desired to strike it another severe blow, I do not think they could have adopted a better course than they have adopted in making this further reduction. In order that hon. gentlemen may see the effect that it is having already in England, I will read from the Times as quoted in the Toronto Globe, the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite themselves:

'It was, perhaps, within the bounds of possibility, said Mr. Fielding, that England might be induced to impose a duty for the benefit of the colonies.' We do not question the possibility, in the abstract, but, inasmuch as Canada has found her advantage in successive reductions of her tariff in favour of a country which imposes no duty except for revenue purposes, it is perhaps, equally possible that the solution of the problem of an Imperial Zollverein may, in the end, be found in the common acceptance of a policy of free exchange rather than in a reversion to a policy of protective duties and preferential tariffs.

So, if hon. gentlemen desired to furnish arguments to the opponents of this policy in England, if they desired to plant the leaven of opposition to this policy, they have evidence that they have succeeded and that that leaven is working.

Again, I fear that this increase in the preference to the extent of 33½ per cent is going to be a very serious injury to the mother country herself. Under this preference, the mother country is not given what we propose to give. The proposition we make is a preference in a market which will be an increasing market, increasing both in population and in purchasing power. But the preference that the government is giving is a preference in a restricted market, in a market which will become more restricted by reason of the preference that is given. Their preference is in its very nature restrictive, ours is expansive. Therefore I say, on behalf not only of my own mother country, but on behalf of Canada, in which I have spent almost thirty among the happiest years of my life, I regret the policy that the government has pursued in making this reduction.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to traverse throughout its whole length and breadth—for I dare not say, its depth—the ground covered by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) who spoke before recess, and who is known as the father of the empire. But, after the eloquent and patriarchal address we have heard this afternoon, I think the hon. gentleman is entitled to the still more venerable name of grandfather of the empire. I do not pretend to set myself up as an authority as to the rather ill-defined ground upon which the budget debate has turned. Moreover, that debate has now been so long engrossing the attention of the House, that it is no easy task for one as inexperienced as I am, to approach the discussion of the various questions under review. I shall, therefore, confine myself to the consideration of what may be called the paramount issue in this debate. I mean the preference given by our government to the trade of Great Britain in 1897, a preference which they are still bettering to-day in a certain measure. Three years ago, I was glad to vote in favour of the preferential treatment of 25 per cent tendered by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to British trade. The reason for the position I then took is very simple and consistent with the political principles which I have always acted upon, and which I still adhere to, and it was because I thought that, by that tariff abatement, the burden of taxation which weighs upon the Canadian consumers would be materially lightened. Now, in dealing with the proposal laid before us by the government, I still view the question from a purely Canadian standpoint. For the same reason, should circumstances allow it, I would also place myself on record in favour of any government proposal to reduce duties on articles of large consumption in this country, coming from the United States or from any other foreign country.

Mr. McNEILL.

A few weeks ago, I deemed it my duty to register my vote against a proposal submitted to the House by my hon. friend, the member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). I think that action of mine created quite a scandal in political circles,—supposing that I can be a stumbling block in such quarters. If I voted against that proposition, it was not because I was opposed to the preferential tariff in favour of Great Britain. No, far from it, and I have just shown it—but because to my mind, that resolution was apparently inopportune and unjustifiable. In fact, the statement embodied in it was but an academical statement which, under the circumstances, seemed to answer no useful purpose. Either the preferential tariff of 1897 is a policy that commends itself to our approval or it is an objectionable policy. If it is a good measure, it cannot be bettered by the academical resolution to which the government deemed it fit to give its support; and if it is a bad policy, it will remain so, in spite of the resolution. But the chief ground on which I voted against the resolution of the hon. member from Halifax, was this: That, this resolution as worded, is instinct with a feeling, and embodies a principle which does not commend itself to my approval, and further, because it received from its promoter an imperialistic import which I could not accept. I need not tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I am opposed to imperialism. I think I have placed myself on record clearly enough on that question, both by my speeches and my votes. Let me tell you further that so long as I shall enjoy the confidence of my constituents, my attitude on the floor of this House will be that of a Canadian, it will be the attitude of a representative of the people of Canada. Whenever a measure is brought down which is calculated to promote the interests of the Canadian people, I will give it my support; but as often as a measure is brought forward, involving some change in the constitution of the country or in our relations with Great Britain, I shall oppose it, unless they positively tell us where they are prepared to stand on that imperialistic policy. On the same ground, I intend, to-night, to give my vote against the amendment brought down by the hon. leader of the opposition, an amendment which, I think, savours still too strongly of imperialism. I know that imperialism is now the rage. A wave of imperialism is sweeping over the country, and politicians who like to go with the stream, allow themselves to be carried away by the wave, without even knowing what country the billows will drive them to. I must say at once that I have no fault to find with the attitude taken by my hon. friend from Halifax. I quite realize the position into which he is forced. I received, a few days ago—and most members have, no doubt, also received it—the report of the Halifax Board of Trade for 1899. The contents of that report are quite variegated; the first section is being devoted to the dry goods trade, the second, to the wholesale grocery trade; the third, to the hardware trade; while the fourth section deals with our West India trade, and the fifth is devoted to a vindication of imperialism and winds up with the following lines :

Britain's myriad voices call:
Sons, be welded each and all
Into one Imperial whole,
One with Britain, heart and soul,
One life, one flag, one fleet, one throne.

They then pass on to the trade in cured fish. When a body of responsible business men, having to deal with trade matters, go so far as to insert in their return lyrical lines of that description, I quite realized what position the unfortunate member who has the honour of representing such a poetical city finds himself in.

However, I am free to say that I do not feel too uneasy about all those inflamed statements, and about those poetical outbursts whose merit is more or less questionable: for their daily repetition cannot fail to bring about a reaction. I remember reading somewhere that in Sweden and Norway, in the case of persons suffering from dipsomania, a strict homeopathic diet is prescribed. It seems that those wretched persons are forced to eat and drink nothing but food and beverages saturated with alcohol. At first, they are delighted with their diet, but there comes a moment when the constant absorption of alcohol provokes such a loathing in them that they cannot even bear the smell of alcohol. They are thus cured permanently. Nowadays, wherever imperialists meet, whether they meet in legislatures, in municipal councils, in trade and banking circles,—and it matters little whether they are two or three or a hundred,—forthwith they give free course to their enthusiasm, translating it either into verse or into prose. But, Sir, a reaction is sure to come at no distant date. That reaction has already set in, at the Antipodes, in Australia. Allow me, Sir, to read to the House a recent statement from Mr. Walter Griffiths, a member for South Australia, who is at present in London, where he is engaged in looking after the passing of the Commonwealth Bill by the House of Commons. I translate from the New York Herald :

Australia's patience is worn threadbare on this federation proposition. We have spent too much time and thought and money perfecting the scheme, and getting it endorsed by our people to tolerate any trifling at the hands of Downing Street or Westminster. We do not intend to permit our constitution to appear to sanction the false notion that it is necessary for Australia to nestle under the wing of England. . . . We are loyal to the mother country, but our loyalty must be purely voluntary. The slightest suggestion of compulsion will estrange our people from the empire beyond recall, with the result that a united states of Australia, a republic modelled on American lines, will be added to the independent powers of the earth.

We cannot consent to any arrangements which will compel us to assume all England's burdens and responsibilities. We love the mother country, and will do whatever is reasonable to defend her, but our national position and resources are such that we must decline to take any steps that shall deprive us of liberty of action in any particular emergency that may arise.

In Canada, the reaction is slower in taking place, and the reason for it is mainly to be found in that racial cry which is raised and in those appeals to national prejudices which are made at every turn, and I might say almost invariably without purpose. A certain number of politicians of British descent and some followers of the government think it their duty to protest of their loyalty, as an off-set against what they are pleased to call the disloyalty of the French Canadians. On the other hand some French Canadians in order to ward off the blows aimed at them, think it fair fighting to join in that steeple-chase and to outrun their English-speaking fellow-countrymen in their professions of ultra loyalism. Thus, it comes to pass that English-speaking Canadians confound loyalty to the British Crown with jingoism, and so it is also that French Canadians confound cringing and servility with conciliation.

However, a reaction is sure to come, and I have no hesitation in saying that it will come sooner or later with greater force perhaps in the English-speaking provinces than in the province of Quebec, because our English-speaking fellow-countrymen will come back from a longer way off. We have had fresh evidence of it. A few weeks ago, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association gave a banquet in the city of Toronto. Now, some of those gentlemen, like their fellow-countrymen of the Halifax Board of Trade, after putting themselves on record as being strongly in favour of the unification of the empire and after venting their loyalty in verse and in prose, ended by saying this: That is all right, but let us now attend to business. We are very loyal and we all stand by the empire and its unity, but on condition that it does not cost us too dear. And these gentlemen did put themselves on record as being strongly opposed to the government policy, as they think it savours too much of imperialism and because it is not favourable enough to Canadian interests.

I venture to say, Sir, that the proposition submitted to the House by the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) proceeds from that current of opinion and that it is conceived in the same spirit as the speeches delivered in the city of Toronto before the Manufacturers' Association.

The hon. leader of the opposition, in spite of his advanced age and his strong convictions, is the most accomplished acrobat among Canadian politicians, and he throws in the shade all his rivals in the art of wheeling round and changing his batteries. Of late, upon two different occasions he succeeded in putting himself on record, before the electors of the province of Quebec, as an anti-imperialist.

The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) was good enough to tell me, the other day, that he had no use for me in his party. I am quite aware that owing to his long political career, and the position he occupies in the country, any comparison between the hon. gentleman and myself would be odious; but let him allow me to tell him that I have no use for him in the ranks of the opponents of imperialism.

The hon. gentleman is no doubt, a man of great experience, but in the matter of anti-imperialism, I venture to tell him that to my mind, his new-born zeal bodes the cause no good.

I agree that the resolution of the hon. leader of the opposition has less sentimentality about it than the resolution of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). It is apparently more practical and more consistent with Canadian interest. It savours less of imperialism than the resolution of the hon. member for Halifax, but it is perhaps still more ill-timed, and it is less justifiable than the former. At all events, it has received from the prophet of imperialism a plain and sharp answer. Forty-eight hours after the hon. leader of the opposition had brought down his proposition, Mr. Chamberlain publicly stated that neither the British government nor the people of Great Britain would agree to a measure of commercial reciprocity with the colonies, which falls short of complete free-trade within the empire. That is, no doubt, the best solution of the problem from the standpoint of British interests, but I need hardly add that the suggestion of the Secretary of State for the Colonies is altogether outside the pale of practical politics here, at least under the present circumstances. Canada, under the Conservative regime, has committed herself to a policy of extreme protection. Now, under the present regime, a political party who had pinned their faith upon free-trade or at least had shown a leaning towards free trade, were compelled to maintain to a large extent the protective tariff adopted by their predecessors. Therefore, it stands to reason that we cannot launch out with full sail into free trade, though it were limited to British-made goods. In fact, by the adoption of inter-imperial free trade, our home industries would be for the most part, left to the tender mercies of British manufacturers who are able to manufacture under much more favourable circumstances than we can. Moreover, we would thereby be handing over to Great Britain the control of our trade relations with foreign countries; while, we ought, on the contrary, to direct all our efforts towards securing the exclusive control of our fiscal policy and our trade relations with every country in the world. That is one of the principles to which the Liberals are wedded, and on which they had repeatedly placed themselves on record prior to their advent to power. I hope, at least, that we have not yet gone back on that promise, as on so many other pledges.

Mr. BOURASSA.

Mr. BERGERON. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA. (Translation.). It seems to me that Canada—and whether you call her a colony or a free country bound to Great Britain by a light tie, matters very little—should have the necessary power for controlling her fiscal policy. Our fiscal policy should be framed by Canada, and for Canada, with a full eye as to what is in the best interests of the Canadian producer and consumer.

Of course, when we enter into trade arrangements with England and other countries, I agree that we ought to make certain concessions, if we wish to secure corresponding advantages. We told the American government that we were not willing to give them any preference in our markets unless they consented to give us a quid pro quo; and I would be ready to take a similar position towards Great Britain. And still, there is a wide difference between the two cases. The people of the United States are our next-door neighbours, and American products naturally seek our home markets; while British made goods and products are thousands of miles distant from our markets and owing to the cost of transportation alone, we ought to be able to reduce the customs duties imposed on those articles, without imperilling the vital interests of Canadian industries.

I say that Canada, in framing her fiscal policy, should legislate with a full eye as to what is for the interest of Canada. Whether that policy goes under the name of moderate protection or revenue tariff, and whether, within ten or twenty years hence, it is known as fair trade or absolute free trade, it matters very little, provided the guiding star of the framers of that policy be to safeguard Canadian interests. That is the reason why I could not support the proposition of the hon. member for Halifax, and that is also the ground on which I have made up my mind to cast my vote against the proposition of the hon. leader of the opposition. That our fiscal policy should be framed with a view to fostering the interests of Great Britain or drawing closer the ties that bind us to the motherland, is an idea which I most strongly antagonize. We are called upon here to legislate on behalf of Great Britain. The British people have their own free institutions; and their past record shows that they are quite able to take care of themselves. I say, therefore, that any public man in Canada who would legislate here from the standpoint of British interests rather than with an eye to what is in the interest of the Canadian people, would prove false to his duty and would be unworthy of the mandate he has received at the hands of the people.

As to our attitude towards the United States, Sir, I may say that there is nowadays a display of hostile feeling towards our American neighbours, or rather that this antagonistic feeling, which has always existed, is prevailing and spreading more and more. I agree that the people of the United States are the first to blame for that state of things. I am aware that there is, in their midst, a school of exclusivism which, at the time of electoral contests, seeks to revive American prejudices against Canada. In Canada, the Tories enjoyed for many years that monopoly, trying to embitter the feelings of the Canadian people and to excite bad blood in the country against the people of the United States. And, strange to say, a certain fraction of the Liberal party is apparently seeking, nowadays, to emphasize and revive that spirit, after having, for so many years, counselled moderation and preached the gospel of conciliation at any price, towards the American republic.

But when we come to sift the real facts and when we thoroughly analyze the policy pursued by our neighbours to the South, it would be sheer nonsense to pretend that American statesmen are actuated by a feeling of hostility towards Canada. I hold that such a proposition is indefensible and absolutely puerile. Besides, there is a fact which we should not forget, and it is this: that, let our policy and our trade relations with Great Britain and the United States be what they may, the neighbouring republic is and shall always be our natural market. And we have that statement from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) himself, who enjoys in such matter an undisputed authority. On the other hand, we are and we shall always rank among the best customers of the American producers. Quite possibly, through our fiscal policy, that natural position may undergo changes of more or less importance; but to believe that we could throw down those natural barriers and substitute to them artificial barriers of our own creation, which would divert the course of trade, is sheer nonsense. We may fancy that we are all-mighty, but our all-mightiness has not yet reached that degree. The work of the creator was built up on stronger lines of foundation than the policy of the imperialists, even such a policy as advocated by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill): We should have no sympathy with a policy the underlying principle of which is a pre-conceived hostility towards the United States. We ought simply to stand upon the firm ground of Canadian interests and tell Great Britain: 'We are ready to trade with you, provided that your terms be acceptable.' To our neighbours of the American Republic we should say this: 'Whenever you are willing to meet us upon a common ground, we are ready to join hands with you.' Let us beware of fostering an exaggerated British feeling which would only prove a source of difficulties to us, whenever we are ready to develop mutually advantageous trade relations with foreign countries.

To sum up, the guiding star of all the nations, whether small or great, rich or poor, powerful or weak, is their own interest. The people of the United States, in framing their policy, have been guided by their own national interests and Great Britain has also followed a similar course; why then, should not the interests of Canada be the guiding star of our policy and legislation?

Some are trying to fool the people into believing that if the British consumers buy our products, it is out of love for us, because we are always waving the British flag, and singing 'God save the Queen'; because we have sent our sons to fight and shed their blood on the battle-fields of South Africa in a war in which we are in no way concerned. I need not say that such a view is preposterous. I know that sentiment is a great factor in the general government of the world, but to ignore the incentive of self-interest would be a sad mistake. There are circumstances when sentiment prevails and a wave of enthusiasm sweeps over a country, but a reaction is bound soon to set in.

If British consumers are buying more and more our products, the reason is that those articles reach the English market with less delay and in a better state of preservation than was the case formerly. You may send as many soldiers as you like to fight the battles of England in South Africa; you may spend as much money as you choose for Great Britain; that is all right, but I say that if you send over to England and place on the British market decayed eggs and rancid butter, the British consumer will not buy your things, under the pretense that you are spilling your blood for him on the battle-fields of South Africa. No, Sir, the British people are guided by their own interest. I would like Canada to follow in their wake. I am loyal to the British Crown; I am a great admirer of the British people; I admire their political institutions, and their commercial genius, and it seems to me that we would have everything to gain by following their example. It often happens that hon. gentlemen bandy charges across the floor of the House, and fling at each other, for not doing enough in favour of Great Britain. For years and years, the Conservative party tried to make political capital in charging the Liberals with being disloyal and professing principles inconsistent with our allegiance to the British Crown. But to all those old-stock arguments which they trotted out, we used to oppose a triumphant reply—at least from the viewpoint of sound logics and reason—by saying that we had a Canadian policy and that we placed the interests of Canada above those of Great Britain. I do not mean to say that since our coming into power, we have turned our back to our profession of faith in this respect; but I think we are too fond of apologizing to the hon. gentlemen opposite, and telling them that we are more loyal, more British than they are, and that we have done more for England and for the empire than the hon. gentlemen themselves did when in power.

What the people of Canada expect from their political men is that they should place the interests of Canada above the interests of the British people or the people of Australia.

I may perhaps be told that the manner does not always show the intention and that, provided we secure from Great Britain, the commercial advantages which we expect from her, it matters little whether or not we make more or less fuss about our patriotism and whether the note of loyalism rings more or less throughout our speeches. I quite agree that it matters very little whether we introduce more or less sentiment into these matters or not. However, I think we should guard against those outbursts of enthusiasm, lest we make ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of the world. Let us show the British people that we are as practical, and as intelligent business men as they are themselves. What do we see, to-day, at the very moment when the watchword given to the British press is to trumpet the merits of the colonies and to sound very high their praises? The Secretary of State for the Colonies seems quite disposed to exact the pound of flesh and tell us: 'Go on, gentlemen, and you will have your reward!' Mr. Chamberlain does not say anything very definite as to the nature or the value of that reward. And when we approach the consideration of the matter from the standpoint of our interests and when we stand on the solid ground of material facts and figures, he merely says: 'I am a British minister first and Secretary of State for the Colonies secondarily; and if you want reciprocal or mutual trade, you will have first to put it on a basis which suits Great Britain.'

Well, let us take the same position; let us put our trade relations with Great Britain and the colonies on such a basis as is calculated first to favour the interests of Canada. I do not intend to enter into the merits of that preferential tariff; nor am I prepared to say whether this additional reduction of duties to the extent of one-third which we are making this year in favour of British-made goods, will result favourably to Canada. I do not pretend to be competent or to pose as an authority on the matter. But, when I see such a conflict of opinions among those who can speak with authority on these questions, I think it more prudent to be silent on that point. Arguments have been brought forward pro and con, with respect to that abatement of duties. Some gentlemen said to the government: 'When you brought down your tariff, three years ago, you stated that you were laying down a settled policy, and that you would not interfere with it, until it had produced substantial results. The manufacturing industries of the country depended upon the stability of the tariff; while the traders throughout the country, when arranging for their sales and purchases, and fixing their prices, were under the impression that the fiscal policy would not be interfered with; but to-day, you come down and without a word of warning, you tell the country that you are going to make another act in the tariff in favour of England. But they say further: 'These are growing times; prosperity prevails to-day throughout the country, business is improving in all directions, and we are quite able to face the competition of British traders.' But let me remind them this: fortune will not always smile on us; these booming times will not go on always; a time will come when commercial depression will give place to this extraordinary activity, when capital will become more timid, and when competition will bring down prices; and then it is that the efforts of this tariff abatement will be keenly felt and that Canadian interests will suffer. But here I am confronted with an argument whose strength I do not attempt to conceal. They say: 'The two-thirds of tariff duties are still maintained against British-made goods; and to that you have to add the cost of transportation of British goods from Great Britain to Canada, the cost of shipment and transshipment, the cost of rail transportation; now, if, in the face of those charges by which British trade is handicapped, Canadian industries cannot compete with British produce, then those industries have no right to live at the expense of the consumer.' As I said, these reasons seems to me most cogent, and, moreover, the reasons for which I supported the reduction of 25 per cent still hold good. Therefore, I shall vote in favour of the further abatement of duties proposed by the government, hoping that this policy will result beneficially to the Canadian consumer. I do not say that this measure cannot be improved, or that its results will show that it was a wise policy, but it seems to me that the objections raised against it are not strong enough to warrant my opposing it. Besides, should competition materialize later on, it will always be open to us to remedy it.

I shall, therefore, vote against the proposition of the hon. leader of the government and in favour of the government policy, and in so doing, I stand by the principles to which the Liberal party have committed themselves.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House, in this most important debate, it is not my purpose to discuss exhaustively all the points that have been brought by hon. members on both sides of the House. But, my object in asking the indulgence of the House at this late period of the debate, is more particularly for the purpose of addressing myself to some points which I consider of the greatest possible importance, not to Canada alone, but to the whole British Empire. Mr. Speaker, after I have touched on these points, I hope my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa), who has just taken his seat, will permit me, in a very few words, to reply to what he has said to-night. I state that it will require very few words, because the attack from the hon. gentleman has been more against his own party, than against the one which he is supposed to be combatting on this side of the House, and I have no doubt that, as on former occasions, his leader will find somebody on his side of the House to reply to the attacks which have been made by the hon. member against his leader, and the policy of his leader, upon the very important questions which have been brought up. Sir, there is in the foremost rank of all the questions which, at the present moment, are interesting, not Canada alone, but which are agitating the whole British Empire, the question of Imperial federation. If one reason induced me more than another, at this late period, to rise and express my views, it is that I consider that upon a question of such importance, every public man who is supposed to represent public opinion in Canada should have an expressed opinion of his own upon the point, and the country should know exactly on what ground he stands when this great and important question is brought before the parliament of Canada, as it has been brought before the Imperial parliament in Great Britain. Now, there is one thing that must, to my mind, impress those who study the evolution of public sentiment, upon the great and important questions of the day; there is one point that must strike the close observer of the course followed by the two great political parties in Canada. I claim, and before I resume my seat, I venture to express the hope that I shall be able to convince parliament, and to convince the country, through parliament, that the policy of the Conservative party, upon that vital, that great and important question, has never varied, and that it is to-day what it has always been. My hon. friend who has just resumed his seat, has expressed his views as a Canadian, isolated, as he happens to be, on his own side of the House, he seems to believe that he is also isolated in this great country, among the members representing other constituencies, as a great patriot. Sir, the hon. gentleman has stated that his policy was to remain a Canadian, and he said:

Our loyalty must be altogether voluntary. That is our policy.

Mr. Speaker, it is the policy of the Conservative party, and traditionally, in the history of that party from the day when the late lamented chieftain, Sir John Macdonald, was controlling the destinies of this country, up to the time that other eminent leader of the Conservative party (Sir Charles Tupper), who is controlling the destinies of that party, the same old Conservative policy has been followed, and the fact that that policy has never varied, is the reason why, within the ranks of the Conservative party, we find no dissensions such as you find, as exemplified by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, in the ranks of the Liberal party. Let me turn back a few pages in the history of this country, and let me tell you what our policy has been. The hon. gentleman said:

Our policy must be altogether voluntary.

Sir, it is absolutely voluntary, in so far as the Conservative party is concerned. Referring to the well-known book, written by Mr. Joseph Pope, relating the events of the eminent career of the great leader of the Conservative party, Sir John Macdonald, at page 215 of that book, I find among the oldest records, and probably the beginning of the movement in favour of Imperial federation, what Sir John Macdonald lays down as his policy, and the policy which the Conservative party has followed ever since. He says:

I am, of course, in favour of any feasible scheme that will bring about a closer union between the various portions of the empire, but I have not yet seen any plan worked out by which this can be done. The proposal that there should be a parliamentary federation of the empire, I regard as impracticable. I greatly doubt whether England would agree that the parliament which have sat during so many centuries at Westminster should be made subsidiary to a federal legislature. But, however that may be, I am quite sure that Canada would never consent to be taxed by a central body sitting at London, in which she would have practically no voice; for her proportionate number of members in such an assembly would amount to little more than an honorary representation. That form of Imperial federation is an idle dream. So also, in my judgment, is the proposal to establish a uniform tariff throughout the empire. No colony would ever surrender its right to control its fiscal policy.

This was the inception of the movement in favour of Imperial federation. Sir John Macdonald well remembered the hard battles which Canada had fought for her autonomy, and as the leader of a great political party he knew that it would be impossible to get a political federation in which Canada could preserve that autonomy. And, Sir, standing in my place tonight as representative of the people in this federal parliament, I say that Canada will never give up her autonomy; nay more, Sir, the day has long since passed, when Canada will allow herself to be governed from Downing Street in regard to matters which are absolutely within the control of this Canadian parliament. While I thus raise my voice in protest against interference with the autonomy of Canada, I am in favour of Imperial federation; I am in favour of it as my leader, Sir John Macdonald was in favour of it, I am in favour of Imperial federation as the present leader of the government was once in favour of it, but has now ceased to be. I continue the quotation :

But while Sir John Macdonald regarded both these schemes as unworkable, he by no means despaired of the future of Imperial federation. Indeed, I may say that he looked upon it as necessary to the continuance of the empire's greatness that some form of co-operation—some common bond, other than their common allegiance—should be established between the colonies, uniting them with one another, and with the motherland. That bond, in his opinion, should be one of material interest. Parliamentary federation we could not have, but he saw no insuperable difficulty in the way of a commercial union between England and her great colonies. A union for purposes of defence and trade was, in his judgment, the true Imperial policy. Take, for example, the case of the Dominion. Sir John Macdonald believed that a mutually preferential commercial arrangement between England and Canada, under which a small duty should be levied upon foreign corn coming into the United Kingdom, and a similar advantage accorded to British manufactures by Canada, would not raise the price of food in England, and would result in a large and permanent development of trade, both to the mother country and the colony.

That was the opinion of Sir John Macdonald, and I may say that I had the great advantage of being in England when Sir John Macdonald was laying down these principles which have become the political programme and policy of the Conservative party, and which, following in his wake, Sir Charles Tupper, the present leader of the Conservative party, is now advocating. I quote again from Pope :

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Sir Charles Tupper, in two able papers ('Nineteenth Century,' for October, 1891, and April, 1892), sets this forth with great clearness. He shows from official reports that, in the years 1890 and 1891, when the price of corn varied 10 shillings and 6 pence a quarter, the fluctuations had to reach practically 10 shillings a quarter before it made a halfpenny difference in the four-pound loaf. In the latter article, Sir Charles Tupper states that, during the Canadian elections of 1891, he had several conversations with Sir John Macdonald upon this subject of 'inter-imperial' trade, and that their views practically coincided.

Those are the views of the Liberal-Conservative party in Canada. Sir, I have had the honour of serving in this parliament for very many years, and although that may be an advantage in one way, it is a disadvantage in another, because it reminds one of how old he may grow in the service of his country. At all events, speaking as one who has for a long period been concerned in the discussion of all these great questions under the leadership of men in whom was reposed the entire confidence of the Conservative party, I can say, that I cannot recollect the day or the moment when that policy of the Conservative party varied in any shape or form. No one will venture to deny that Sir John Macdonald's ideas as to more intimate connection with the empire, and his desire to draw closer and stronger the bonds connecting the colonies with the motherland; no one will dare to deny, I say, that the ideas and hopes of Sir John Macdonald in this respect, could not be exceeded by the hopes of the most ardent enthusiast on the subject. But, Mr. Speaker, while we are Imperialists, let us not, as Canadians, forget that we must also look after the interests of Canada. I believe that the true way to give strength and power to the empire, is to give strength and power to the colonies which compose Greater Britain. We should not give up one iota of the policy which has made Canada the great nation she is today; that national policy which has made this country since 1878 prosperous and happy and which has enabled the government now in power to announce to the people that they had a surplus of $7,000,000. The reason why the Liberal government has been enabled to announce a surplus in the Treasury, is because the leaders of the Conservative party in former years; men like Sir John A. Macdonald, established the policy upon which was based the future prosperity and greatness of our country. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who now leads the government, when in opposition, announced that the national policy was detrimental to the best interests of Canada, and yet, when he came into power, the first thing he did, was to cling to the national policy, which was introduced by the Conservative party. I say, Sir, that the policy of the Conservatives to-day upon Imperialism is an absolutely national policy, in so far as Canada is concerned. It is a policy under which Canada wishes to be more closely united to the empire, but it is a policy under which Canada, standing up as a nation says to the motherland: We are prepared to give you reciprocal advantages for the advantages which you will give to Canada under a preferential tariff, and which will apply to the empire all around, as against countries outside the empire. That, Sir, is carrying out the old national policy in Imperial affairs, and that, Sir, is making Canada in this agitation all over the empire, true to the policy of protection for Canada, while she is also true to the policy of drawing closer the links connecting the motherland and her colonies. Sir John Macdonald went on to say:

Meanwhile manufacturers and their working people must, or rather should, be taught that they can find friendly and expanding markets in the colonies, if they are treated in the same spirit. Take Canada, for instance; our tariff is a revenue tariff in substance, and averages 30 per cent, while the prohibitory tariff of the United States averages fully 60 per cent. Now, Canada has undertaken the development of her resources on so large a scale that she must have a revenue, and from various causes can only look to customs and excise for it. While, therefore, she cannot promise a reduction of her customs duties, she will be quite ready to give British goods a preference of 5 or even 10 per cent in our markets, if our products receive a corresponding preference in England. The United States are the chief rivals of English manufacturers with us at present; with such a differential scale of duties as I suggest, all that we do not make ourselves would be supplied by the mother country.

I see that Mr. Cecil Rhodes is in favour of such a policy, and I have little doubt Australasia would adopt it.

The Americans boast that such is the extent and diversity of their soil and climate and products, that they are independent of the rest of the world. But they cannot compare with the British Empire in those respects. It is a world in itself.

The present leader of the Liberal-Conservative party (Sir Charles Tupper), not very long ago addressed a meeting in Quebec on the same subject. Owing to the multiplicity of his engagements, he had not had an opportunity of visiting Quebec for a long time, and I can say that his friends there were delighted to meet him. On that occasion he said that Canada could not abandon the liberties which she was enjoying at the present time to accept an Imperial regime based on representation of the colonies in the Imperial parliament. Mr. Chamberlain also, not long ago, said that parliamentary representation for the colonies did not appeal to his experience and his judgment as being the proper means whereby the bonds between the colonies and the empire could be tightened. My right hon. friend the leader of the government viewed the matter from the same standpoint; but he differed from Sir John Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper and the Conservative party. One day the right hon. gentleman entertained one opinion upon this important question, and on another day, without very much trouble and without any qualms of conscience, he entertains another opinion. The hon. gentleman said, in his London speech:

Look at what an immense advantage it would be for Canada if our wheat, our cheese, our butter, which we send to England, could obtain in that English market a preference over similar products coming from other nations.

He said the possibilities of such a policy were absolutely immense. Well, Sir, in crossing the Atlantic Ocean, which to-day takes so little time, the right hon. gentleman changed his views completely; and instead of believing that policy would be an immense advantage, not only to our farmers, but to our manufacturers, whose wealth depends upon the prosperity of the farmers, when he reached England, and when the Duke of Devonshire, Mr. Chamberlain, and all the other leading men of England, were expressing the opinion that the time had come for England to put aside the old theories about absolute free trade, and to make some change with the view of giving advantages to the colonies in return for the advantages which England was getting from the colonies, my right hon. friend said to England: 'We will give you a tariff which will be preferential to you.' The English statesmen were rather astonished at this extraordinary liberality on the part of the Canadian people, because they felt that, rich as Canada was, it was not rich enough to make a free gift to the wealthy manufacturers of England, who have been enriched by centuries almost of protection. The right hon. gentleman, at a great dinner, where the Prince of Wales was present, said: 'Canada wishes to make a free gift to England of this preference.' And his liberality in this respect, since he has been studying the great question of Imperial federation, has increased to such an extent that he has increased the preference from 25 per cent to 33½ per cent. Well, Sir, I believe in Canada for the Canadians. I also believe in Imperial federation, because that gives us the strength of the empire added to the strength and the permanency of the colonies. I say that the Dominion of Canada, Australia and South Africa enjoy privileges in our connection with the empire that we could not possibly enjoy if we were independent. I do not believe in independence, so far as Canada is concerned, for this reason, that I cannot believe that five or six millions of people, with the great advantages we possess—with the River St. Lawrence, the great artery of this continent, and the Canadian Pacific Railway, the shortest route across the continent that can be built—could never hope to be allowed to remain independent by seventy-five millions of Americans to the south of us. The only thing that has preserved our independence and permitted us to grow quietly and peaceably from year to year, developing our resources, and improving our country by the construction of great and important public works, has been the fact that we were part and parcel of the British Empire. Strong Imperialist as I am, I am a strong Canadian as well, at the same time. I want something for everything that Canada has to give, except her loyalty, that would always be given freely. Our loyalty to the empire, that sentimental feeling which is the inheritance of every Canadian, we give without any material consideration. We give our loyalty to England, but when we come to discuss questions of trade, questions of tariff, questions of finance, England will respect us all the more when she finds that she is dealing with business men and not with men who are willing to give her everything that Canada possesses without Canada getting anything in return. I venture to express the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that when the great appeal to our people takes place, one of the most important questions that will be discussed, will be the question, whether the right hon. leader of the government was true to his trust, as the representative of the party in power, framing the policy of the government, when he went back on the policy he announced in his London speech, in which he showed the great advantage it would be for us to have our products given a preference in the English market over the products of foreign countries—whether he was true to his trust in giving up that great advantage, which it was in his power to obtain, for simply the vain glory of boasting that Canada had made a present to England, which England did not and could not expect to obtain without giving an adequate return. These are the views entertained by the leaders of the Conservative party.

I do not wish to weary the House. I know that, coming late as I do into this debate, it is almost venturesome for me to ask hon. gentlemen to listen to me for more than a very short time, and my only excuse is that if I do take up a little time tonight, I do not do so frequently, and I only do it because I think that on this important question every Canadian public man should stand by what he has stated in parliament; and the people should know exactly what are his views.

Leave out the leaders of the Conservative party, leave out the leaders of the great Liberal party, and go to the practical men of business, go to the commercial men of this country, the men who very frequently have no politics, but who have invested their capital in the industries of the country, and are developing these industries by the study of every possible question which may affect them. The right hon. gentleman was interviewed by a deputation of the manufacturers on the preferential tariff. These men came from all parts of the Dominion, and they presented to him the memorial of their association. They had not the high privilege of dining in the Hotel Cecil in London with the Prince of Wales, and of being captivated by all the great privileges which were accorded to our representatives who happened to be in England at that particular moment. These men remained in Canada, where they studied the interests of Canadian industries, and what are the conclusions to which they came:

Resolved, that while this association is heartily in favour of the principle of allowing a reasonable preference on goods manufactured in Great Britain, it desires to place itself on record as being strongly in favour of reciprocal preferential trade between Canada and every part of the British Empire with which arrangements can be effected to their mutual benefit, and by means of which each would receive a substantial advantage in trade as a result of its relationship, especially with Great Britain, which is not only the natural, but the best market for the bulk of our surplus products.

So it would appear to any man who has at heart the interests of Canada. England is our great market, our best market, and when hon. gentlemen opposite failed in the attempt they made shortly after they came into power, to open up the American markets to our products, as others had failed, I am quite prepared to admit, before, they found that really England was our best market. But where does the advantage to us come in, if we are going to give everything to England and get nothing in return? I do not pretend to have gone thoroughly into the study of these complicated financial and commercial questions, but it seems to me to appeal to the common sense of any reasonable man that the first duty of our statesmen, in their endeavour to get commercial advantage in England, was to say to England that for any privilege we would grant her she should be prepared to give us in return an equal advantage. Otherwise, I believe that, without helping England, we would be sacrificing the best interests of Canada.

These are the points upon which I wish to express my views as a Canadian and as one who takes a great deal of interest in these matters. I go in for Imperialism upon this one ground. I am in favour of Imperialism, just as the late Sir John Macdonald was and Sir Charles Tupper is, and all the leaders of the Conservative party have been, upon this one ground. I do not desire that Canada should have representation in the parliament of England, or that all the colonies should have such representation, and I will give you the reason why. Is it possible to imagine that England would consent to have her parliament controlled by her colonies, by Australia, by Canada and South Africa, whose population some day, and whose representation consequently would outnumber the population and representation of England. The great principle of representation underlies the principle of taxation. If England were to have an Imperial parliament, in which all the colonies would be represented, our parliament in Ottawa would cease to be of any value at all. All the great questions affecting Imperial interests would be decided by the Imperial parliament in London, in which England would be outnumbered by the colonies, whose population exceeds hers. England will never accept such parliamentary representation, because it is impossible to imagine that she would ever consent to have her fiscal policy, her national policy, her foreign policy controlled by the colonies, and on the other hand Canada would certainly never consent to give up her autonomy. I for one would not consent to give up the autonomy of Canada and allow Canada to be controlled by the vote of an Imperial parliament in Great Britain. Not because I do not consider that the statesmen of England are not fitted to deal with any question affecting the empire. But, Sir, this is transplanting a plant into a soil in which it cannot live, it is transferring from the colonies the autonomy for which we fought, which we have gained, which has made England stronger, which has made the empire more powerful than it could have been if we had remained as we were under the control of the Foreign Office in Downing Street. Hence, I say that, so far as I am concerned, I want Imperial federation by the process of more intimate commercial relation by preferential advantages between England and her colonies as against other portions of the world that are not within the charmed circle. That is the policy which I am prepared to discuss before the people, and which, I believe, will appeal to their sentiments, that is the policy upon which I am prepared to meet my electors.

Now, I wish to refer, briefly, to another point. I said I was not going into figures, and I do not mean to go into figures, except so far as one department is concerned, and that is the department of the Postmaster General. We had to wait a long time for the Postmaster General's report. We appealed to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) that his report should be placed upon the Table, but, it seemed for a time impossible to induce him to bring it down. And, now that it is before us, I am sorry to say that, in running over it, I find we have been waiting in vain, and that the report is a very unsatisfactory one. I wish to give to the House a few figures which have been taken from the reports of the different years mentioned in the statement, beginning with 1896, the last year when I was in the department:

A comparison of the statements contained in the reports of the Postmaster General for the years 1896, 1897 and 1898 shows that the expenditure for mail service by stage and other vehicle or by hand was as follows:

1896.....	$847,080
1897.....	847,660
1898.....	765,660

For Steamboat Services.

1896.....	$79,218
1897.....	83,734
1898.....	84,743

For Railway Mail Service.

1896.....	$1,285,383
1897.....	1,350,786
1898.....	1,352,257

For Salaries (Outside Service).

1896.....	$1,249,402
1897.....	1,250,609
1898.....	1,175,185

Total Expenditure.

1896.....	$3,665,011
1897.....	3,789,478
1898.....	3,575,411

The reduction in the total expenditure for 1898, compared with 1896, was $89,600; but, of this reduction, no less than $74,217 has been saved mainly by withholding from the junior members of the outside service the annual increase of their salaries, to which, I contend, the law, the practice and their good services equally entitled them, and the rest by scrimping the post office service in every possible way. I am sorry the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) is not here; but, upon the estimates, we shall have an opportunity of discussing these facts and figures. Of course, it is very true that, for the year 1898, the difference between the revenue and the expenditure of the Post Office Department was only $47,602. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the Postmaster General stated that the difference between the revenue and expenditure in the Post Office Department was only $47,000. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman did not take the House into his confidence; he did not tell the House that the increase in revenue was not one for which he really deserved any credit, it resulted from the postage stamps containing the map of the world. This made them wonderfully attractive, and collectors all over the world came to the Postmaster General, who actually peddled in these new stamps. I can tell hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that they have merely to take the different reports from which I have quoted here—and if I make a statement which is incorrect, I shall be glad to be corrected, and will be ready to admit that I am wrong—that the increase in revenue was largely due to the peddling of the postage stamps which was carried on to a vaster extent than has been at any time within my recollection. While the annual increase in the revenue of the Post Office Department, for the five years ending 1896, was $125,800, the increase in 1897 over 1896 was $305,353, and that for 1898 over 1897 was $375,406. So that, hon. gentlemen will see that the increase of revenue for the two years amounted to $680,759. This added to the $74,317 which represents the increases properly due to the members of the outside service and refused to them, increased the amount beyond the $733,549 by which the Postmaster General claims to have reduced the expenditure of the department since 1896. He did not go to the trouble of calculating these providential things which came to him in the shape of remittances from collectors of stamps, and a reduction of $74,000, and when you put these figures together, you find that they represent the increases of revenue which the Postmaster General claims. As one who presided over that department, I had occasion, in the first year when the hon. gentleman occupied the position which I do now occupy, to state that the annual increase was part and parcel under the law of the salary of the post office clerks. I want to show the hon. gentleman how this matter stands. Schedule B of the Civil Service Act says :

Clerks in the city post offices, third-class clerks, salary $400, by annual increase of $40 to $800.

Now, I want to know whether, if the law states that the salary is to be $400 by annual increases to $800, that increase is not a part and parcel of the salary. This is proved by the fact that in order to avoid any mistake, the law introduces a clause giving the only reason why this increase can be taken away from the clerks. Speaking as one who occupied that high position, I can say that no department in Canada or outside of Canada had a better service than was at the disposal of the Postmaster General of that date.

Second-class clerks, $900, by annual increase of $50 to $1,200. Letter carriers, sorters and stampers, messengers, box-collectors and porters, $360 to $600, by annual increase of $30.

Now, I draw attention to the wording regarding the inside service :

The minimum salary of a first-class clerk shall be $1,400 per annum, with annual increase of $50, up to a maximum salary of $1,800.

Now, if the law says that the salaries will be so much with an increase of so much per annum up to a certain amount, I want to know whether it was possible, without breaking the law, to deprive that civil servant of the salary fixed by the statute and which he is entitled to receive.

The minimum salary of a second-class clerk shall be $1,100 per annum, with an annual increase of $50, up to a maximum of $1,400.

Section 26. The increase of salary of any officer, clerk, or employee, authorized under this Act for the then current year may be suspended—

For what reason? It does not say that he is not entitled to it, but section 26 points out the only reason why that increase may be suspended :

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

—may be suspended by the head of the department for neglect of duty or misconduct, and may be subsequently restored by such head but without arrears.

That is the only reason given by the statute for refusing to give the increase to the occupants of the different positions mentioned in that schedule. So convinced am I, Mr. Speaker, that such is the law, that I believe that if the civil servants were to apply to the courts for redress, they would receive redress. Sir, it is out of this reduction of well-earned salaries that the hon. gentleman builds up what he calls a surplus in his department. Now, Sir, speaking of the introduction of 2-cent stamps, the hon. gentleman, on page 11 of his report of this year, makes a remark that I wish to refer to. The report was brought down so late that I could look over it only cursorily, but I find that between the report of last year, when the peddling of stamps could no longer be carried on, and the report of this year, that great surplus has been fast melting away like snows in the spring season.

This change has been accompanied by such a marked and continuous increase in the number of domestic letters being transmitted through the mails as to warrant the conclusion that the loss of revenue consequent on such reduction will soon be overcome.

I want to draw attention to the nature of this extraordinary increase :

Report of Deputy Postmaster General (page xi.)

This change has been accompanied by such a marked and continuous increase in the number of domestic letters as to warrant the conclusion that the loss of revenue consequent on such reduction will soon be overcome.

The percentage of increase in letters posted in 1897 over the number mailed in 1896 was very nearly 7 per cent, the increase for 1899 over 1898 is 11½ per cent, so that the marked and continuous increase amounts to 4½ per cent above the normal rate.

To deficit of	$398,917 79
Should be added	58,503 78

$457,421 57

the $58,503.78 excess of expenditure over revenue in the Yukon district, making the real deficit for the year $457,421.57, and it must be remembered that the reduced rate of postage was only in operation for six months, so that the deficit for the year ended June 30, 1899, was at the rate of $900,000 a year.

When I was at the head of the department I estimated the loss of revenue consequent on a reduction of the rate of postage to 2 cents at about $800,000 a year, but then I did not include in that loss of revenue by reducing the ocean postage from 5 cents to 2 cents, which, no doubt, accounts for a good deal of the excess over my estimate.

There is another point to which I would draw the attention of the government. The Postmaster General, in his report of this year, has left out all the statements and schedules which are published in extenso in all the reports from 1896 down. I do not know a single instance where a Postmaster General has left out any one of these tabular statements. Hon. gentlemen can see how we made up the tabular statements, the absence of which can be found in the last report of the Postmaster General. For instance, we had in our report of 1896 the service between Europe, Japan and China, via the Canadian Pacific Railway route and Vancouver, and I believe that this service has been completely demoralized, and I will state why. It must be remembered that these lines are subsidized by the Imperial and Canadian governments, hence if Canada and England pay their money to have a service between Great Britain and Canada, and China and Japan, one would understand that the lines subsidized would do this service. But, by the policy of the present government, this correspondence all goes by way of San Francisco. Hon. gentlemen overlooked the advice given them by the hon. leader of the opposition to ask his Excellency the Governor General to sign the contract which had been entered into between the previous government and the Allans and which would have given us, this year, four steamers, equal to anything afloat on the Atlantic. Naturally, if we had had such accommodation we would have kept the mails of Great Britain and of Canada for Canadian lines. But, as it is, we pay a subsidy to the lines which are subsidized by the British government and by Canada, and most of the mail matter comes over by American steamers, goes by American lines to San Francisco, and is carried by American bottoms to China and Japan. I am not mentioning this in any spirit of hostility; I am mentioning it as a matter that should immediately call for the most searching investigation on the part of the government of the day, and it will be seen whether I am correct in my statement. I know I am from the information which I have received. When I was in London some of the commercial houses which have relations with China and Japan, gave me the reasons for this state of affairs. Why, I asked, does this mail matter go over American lines? They said: You have a wonderful system of railway across your continent, you make the fastest time possible over the continent owing to the enterprise of the people of Canada in having built this great trans-continental line, you have a magnificent line of steamers crossing the Pacific Ocean as a result of the enterprise and business ability of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but, what is the use of spending all that money if the time you save in traversing the continent and in navigating the Pacific is lost altogether by the slowness of the steamers on the Atlantic ocean? In view of these facts, the Conservative government felt that it became an absolute necessity to make our system equal to the requirements, and to have on the Atlantic ocean a line of steamers equal to anything that the Americans have.

Now, there is another point. Hon. gentlemen opposite had some reforms to make, but, they could not reform the fiscal policy because they found that if they touched they would kill the industries of the country. However, they had to do something. It was no use changing seats and continuing the old programme of the Conservative party. The Conservative party, previous to the coming into power of hon. gentlemen opposite, had abolished the postage upon newspapers. We were at that time not as prosperous as are hon. gentlemen through circumstances over which they have had no control up to the present time. But, Canada was growing wealthy and prosperous and we felt that we could not do better than abolish the postage on newspapers, because the press is the great communicating agent of thought all over the country. It appeals to the rich and the poor, and hon. gentlemen know very well that no part of the population enjoyed that privilege more than those who are not gifted with great wealth, in the farming districts and among the poor people in the cities. The hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), says that this tax, as he calls it, produces only $50,000 per annum. When hon. gentlemen boast of $7,000,000 of a surplus I should not imagine that it is absolutely necessary to destroy the happiness of the reading people of Canada who want to educate themselves, because the newspaper is the great element of education among the people by reimposing an odious tax. I believe that the press, communicating through its columns, everything that is useful to the knowledge of the people, does more to educate the people than any possible means of imparting education. But, the fact is that this $50,000 is paid by the daily newspapers. The weekly newspapers absolutely pay nothing. The press in the city of Montreal, for instance, pays one-half of this tax. That evidently indicates that it is not properly applied. If it is to be retained I think it should be so changed that it would apply equitably, and that it would not bear more heavily on one portion of the press than upon another. But, I say more. I say that the fact of the postage being reimposed upon newspapers is not doing the good that the hon. Postmaster General expected. It is a retrograde measure. In this period of progress, after a concession of that kind has been once given it can never be withdrawn without creating a great deal of trouble among the people interested. But, to come back to the reduction of the postage from three cents to two cents, I say, there, again, it does not apply impartially. Whom does it benefit? The great commercial houses who write to Bombay, to China and to Japan for the purposes of their trade.

The farmer does not write any more letters than he used to, but he has to make up, out of his hard earnings, the difference between the two cents and the three cents and the two cents and the five cents. It is the poor man who has to pay that. The wealthy men and the wealthy houses who have to communicate for their own purposes with the great commercial centres of the world write their letters, whether they pay five cents or one cent, and to make up for the loss of revenue the poor man, who writes one letter a month, or two letters a month, has to put his hand into his pocket and contribute the amount necessary to make up the difference between two cents and three cents, the postage which formerly existed. I have stated that I was in favour of reducing the postage from three cents to two cents, if we could have afforded to do so. I met a gentleman in England, Mr. Henneker Heaton, when I was Postmaster General, and we discussed the whole question. I admitted that it would be a good thing to have one rate of postage for the whole empire, but I said that Canada could not afford it as we would be losing $800,000 of revenue a year. With this hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House agreed that time; they said it could not be done, but, as soon as they came into power they introduced the change, and now the people are paying for the difference between two cents and three cents, although the great commercial houses would have continued to write the number of letters they have always written for their own commercial purposes. The poor people are making up for the deficiency. Now, I stated that the hon. gentleman had made up his difference between the revenue and expenditure, but I go beyond that. I want to know how he can explain why he goes into the Interior Department and gets the mounted police who are paid to do a certain work to perform postal services. I never knew, in my experience of official life, that mounted policemen were letter carriers. I never heard any man on the other side of the House getting up in parliament and pointing out the injustice of this report of the Postmaster General, and its palpable deficiency in giving the people information as to the manner in which their money is expended by the present government. What does the Postmaster General do? Instead of calling for tenders for carrying the mails to the Yukon, as I believe he is bound to do under the Post Office Act, he puts the mail bag on the back of a mounted policeman, and so the Interior Department pays for doing post office work. I am told forsooth, that there is a favourable financial administration in the post office now as compared with the time I was minister. Sir, that is very easily explained. When I was minister I put down everything that was expended for the carriage of the mails, and if they had been forwarded to the Yukon then, the post office would be charged with their carriage to that distant country, but now the Postmaster General (Mr. Mullock) uses the policemen to do post office work, and the cost is not charged against the Post Office Department, but against the Interior Department, and so there is, of course, a favourable financial showing in the post office.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Mr. TAYLOR. And the post office gets the revenue from the Yukon.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, the post office gets the revenue and they are not charged with the expenditure. These figures which I have given will appear in Hansard, and they can be criticised by the Postmaster General when he finds time to occupy his seat in the House. There is another matter which I wish to call attention to. The Liberal party came into power in 1874, by accident, when the people of Canada made a mistake, and they came into power similarly in 1896.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hear, hear.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I knew the hon. minister (Sir Louis Davies) would agree with me on that point. When the Liberals came into power in 1896, the Conservative government had been for a considerable time endeavouring to establish a fast line of steamers upon the Atlantic. I shall discuss this now as a business proposition, speaking as a Canadian only, and I do not wish any other element to be drawn into the matter. I need not refer to the history of the contracts that were entered into by the administration of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and afterwards confirmed by the administration of Sir Charles Tupper. Suffice it to say that when the Liberal party came into power it was known that His Excellency had taken the responsibility of refusing to sign the contract made between the Conservative government of Canada and the Allans and so impressed was Sir Charles Tupper with the importance of the subject that he wrote to the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier asking him to press upon His Excellency the importance of signing that contract. However, that was not done, and the Liberal government came before parliament and told us that they had a far better proposition to submit, that they had entered into negotiations with Peterson, Tate & Co., who had reduced the amount of subsidy to such an extent, that it might be an object for Canada to agree to the change. At that time hon. gentlemen on this side of the House ventured the opinion that Peterson, Tate & Co. were not sufficiently strong in the great money market of London to carry out the undertaking. Hon. gentlemen opposite not only refused to confirm the contracts accepted by the Conservative government, but in order to make the change absolutely complete, they proposed even to remodel the kind of ships to be used. The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) who was supposed to be one of the great business men of the country was entrusted with the negotiations. I need not tell you, Mr. Speaker, who have been so long in this House and listened to so many speeches that I am not exaggerating when I say that the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) had a reputation as a great business man, and possibly he might have remained with that reputation, if he had not attempted to change the contract which had been entered into by Sir Charles Tupper, and if he had not endeavoured to secure bottle-necked ships. Well, Sir, the contract entered into by the Liberal government was never carried out, and the bottle-necked ships were never built, and to-day we are without a fast Atlantic service. You, Mr. Speaker, as a business man know that during this year of the Paris Exposition when thousands are flocking from this continent across the Atlantic, you know, Sir, what a great advantage it would be to have thousands of passengers from the western states, from New York, from Philadelphia, from Boston, and elsewhere, travelling on the Canadian line of steamers. But for the culpable and guilty carelessness of the government, and the inefficiency of the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), who has been travelling across the Atlantic almost every month to try and get these bottle-necked steamers, and has never found anything but failure; but for all that folly of the present government in connection with the matter, we would this year of the Paris Exposition have thousands of Americans travelling on the Canadian fast steamers, and advertising the advantages of the St. Lawrence route all over the world. I believe, Sir, that irrespective of party, every gentleman in this House will agree that not only have we lost this opportunity which may not present itself for years to come, but, a further evil effect of the conduct of the government has been that their failure has destroyed to a large extent the usefulness of the expenditure which Canada has made in building the Canadian Pacific Railway, and subsidizing a fast line of steamers on the Pacific. What is the use of being able to make fast time across the continent, and what is the use of having fast steamers on the Pacific if it takes you fourteen or sixteen days to cross the Atlantic? I want to draw the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that the steamers of the Elder-Dempster Line, to which he gave the contract for carrying the mails between England and Canada, instead of to the Allan or the Dominion Line, takes sixteen days to cross the Atlantic. He might just as well have given the contract to a line of sailing vessels. The result has been that all the mail matter between Great Britain and Canada has been carried by American steamers. That is how the money of Canada has been expended as the result of the guilty negligence of the Postmaster General.

Why did he not allow the contract to remain with the Allan Line? I can show from the records in his department, that the average time of crossing by the Allan Line and the Dominion Line, was ten days. To-day the Allan Line have three steamers of 10,000 tons each, equal to anything on the Atlantic. The Tunisian, the Bavarian and the Corinthian; and the Dominion Line have built the Canada, the Dominion, and the New England, of 10,000 or 12,000 tons each, equal to anything afloat. Did he take away the contract from the Allan Line because it had been given to the old pioneers of the navigation of the St. Lawrence by the Conservative government? I have nothing to say against the line of steamers which at present carry the mails. They are at present improving their fleet, but why not have waited until they had improved it before taking away the contract from a line of steamers in the hands of a company which is recognized in England as the only one that will ever be able to establish a line of fast steamers between England and Canada? The capitalists of London say that if the Allan Line or the Dominion Line do not take a hand in the building of the fast Atlantic fleet, they will not invest their capital in the enterprise. That has been the reason of the failure of Mr. Huddart, Peterson, Tate & Co., and others who have tried to secure English capital for the building of a fast line of steamers. The public of England and the capitalists of England have confidence in the Allan Line and the Dominion Line, because these great concerns have made a success of a great venture; and they will look to these companies for advice, before they invest their capital in any enterprise for the establishment of a fast line between Canada and Great Britain.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Will my hon. friend permit me to say that at the time the contract was made with the Elder-Dempster Line, my recollection is, that neither the Allan Line nor the Dominion Line were willing to make their terminal points in Canada; and that was the vital question.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I for one, believe that any line subsidized by the Canadian government should make its terminus in Canada.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They were not in a position to do so, owing to the war, which had taken the steamers off.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. On that point I am quite ready to agree with my hon. friend. But the point I make is that if the hon. gentlemen could not come to an agreement with the Allan Line or the Dominion Line, it was of no use giving the contract to a line whose steamers take sixteen days to cross the Atlantic, as I can prove that some of their steamers do. When we have telegraph lines, cables, telephones, typewriters, and other improvements, to increase the means of communication to an electric rapidity, you might as well go back to the old sailing vessel, as to give the mail contract to a line of steamers that take sixteen days to cross the Atlantic.

Before I sit down, I want to say one word about the militia; and in this connection let me refer to the painful news which we have to-day, that the son of one of the best officers I know in the service, Col. Cotton, has died on the field of honour in South Africa. I have no details, but I merely mention the fact, because I want to make this point, that the militia force of Canada, whether in Canada or abroad, have been the proudest boast of our country. They have done their duty under the most trying circumstances, and they have done it well. I think that Canada could not have done anything less than Canada did, in sending her sons to help to fight the battles of the empire in South Africa. I have already expressed my views in regard to Imperialism. I say that what we do for England, we want to do voluntarily, not under coercion. Being done voluntarily, it will be all the better appreciated by England. I wish to suggest to my hon. friend, the Minister of Militia, that we should multiply our rifle ranges in Canada. The experience of this war has indicated that the success of the Boers has been due in great measure to their wonderful accuracy as sharpshooters. That skill can only be acquired by extraordinary practice, and I believe that the best training that the Minister of Militia could give to the militia force, would be to multiply, as far as possible the rifle ranges all over the country. I am not complaining or criticising: I am suggesting. I believe that every encouragement possible should be given to rifle practice, which could be done without great expense. The present war is likely to change completely the tactics of all the armies of Europe, in regard to heavy ordnance, light ordnance and rifle practice. I think also, that every school receiving a grant of money from a local government, or from the Federal government, should make drill a compulsory part of its exercises, one day or two days in the week. No doubt the objection would be raised that we cannot interfere with the local governments; but the local governments are just as patriotic Canadians as we are, and I think the Minister of Militia could very well come to an understanding with the ministers in those governments, who have charge of public education in the provinces. The Minister of Militia might furnish the arms and instruments free. We do not want an aggressive army, but we want every man to be so well trained that when called upon to defend his country he will understand what he has to do. I have not gone into details, and I must say that the hon. gentleman at the head of the department has done his work very well and under very trying circumstances, and I wish to say to him that in making these suggestions I do so because the subject is one of great moment both from a national and economical standpoint. From his experience in the department, my hon. friend must know that the annual drill is not one that can do very much more than give the rudiments of drill and evolution in company and battalion. But if we were to get our young men trained when they are boys at school, that training would stick to them all through life. They would not forget it any more than does a man forget how to ride who has learnt that art in his youth. He may not have ridden for five or six years, but when he gets astride of a horse, he finds his riding muscles again coming into play, and he knows exactly how to manage his horse and protect himself against accident. So it is with the boy trained from early youth in the practice of drill, that training he never forgets, but it comes back to him whenever he is again called upon to perform military duty. We have splendid material for an army. We have material which has elicited admiration from the military trained nations of Europe, and having that material we ought to give it every possible advantage which we can afford with the means at our disposal.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

There is another point to which I wish to refer. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has made many changes in our rifles and ordnance, but I think it would be true economy to replace all the old ordnance by ordnance of the most improved modern descriptions. Before the Conservative government left office, several batteries were brought out, and if any of the old ordnance still remains on hand, it should be replaced by new material. In my opinion the Lee-Netford is the best rifle, but, in any case, whether it is best or not, our Canadian military force ought to be armed with the same kind of rifle as is used by the Imperial army, if only for this reason, that should we ever be called upon to fight, we shall have to fight side by side with British soldiers, and it is not only inconvenient but very detrimental to efficiency that the same army should use different kinds of arms.

I have given, Mr. Speaker, utterance to these few crude ideas without having gone into the question very closely. I have not had the pleasure of reading the report of the hon. gentleman, but I believe that as we all take a deep interest in the future of our militia force, those suggestions will be taken in good part as coming from one who was for so many years at the head of the Militia Department.

I beg to apologize most sincerely, Mr. Speaker, for having detained the House so long. I did not really mean to go into all these matters at such length, but the ground had to be got over, and I waited until the last moment thinking that possibly there would be no occasion for me to make the remarks I have made, and which I have offered to the House as my views on the Imperial question and also a question which I consider of great importance, namely, the position of the department of the Postmaster General, and that other question, the condition of our militia forces.

Mr. J. G. SNETSINGER (Stormont and Cornwall). At this late hour of the debate, Mr. Speaker, I intend occupying the attention of the House only a very few moments. I have no intention of recalling the benefits conferred by the present administration on the country in the last four years they have been in power, because that has already been discussed over and over again, but I merely want to touch on two or three matters concerning which I hope this government will make some changes in the next parliament.

The first subject on which I wish to say a few words is the article of coal oil. I voted for free coal oil last session, and if the question came up again, I would repeat my vote. I think that the oil wells of Canada have been fairly protected, and under that protection they seem to have fallen into the hands of the Standard Oil Company. I believe that it would be to the advantage of consumers in this country that coal oil should be put on the free list, and I hope that next parliament this government, which no doubt will then be in power, will see that that is done.

I desire also to make a reference to the question of sugar as well. Every one will admit that sugar comes next, as an article of consumption, to the article of breadstuffs. In my opinion, it is a food, and should not be taxed any more than we can afford. No doubt raw sugar was on the free list once, but the late government saw fit to make a change and put a small tariff on it. I have no objection to the tariff on raw sugar, but I claim that the protection given our refineries is more than they are entitled to. It amounts to at least about 60 cents per 100 pounds. Not only are the refineries getting more protection than they should, but they do not treat the consumers of sugar fairly in this country. Last summer any purchaser of sugar in Montreal was obliged to have it delivered along the line of the Grand Trunk Railway and paid the Grand Trunk Railway rates. If you go to a wholesale house in Montreal, they will tell you that they will deliver it at a certain price over the Grand Trunk Railway. I wished to have any sugar I purchased taken up by steamer to Montreal, as I could get a better rate from the steamer than from the Grand Trunk Railway, whose rates are about sixteen cents from Montreal to Cornwall, and I suggested to the wholesale house of Hudon & Hébert, one of the best houses in Montreal, that they should ship the sugar by steamer, but they replied that even if they did send it by steamer, they would have to charge me the same rates as if they sent it over the Grand Trunk Railway. They said :

You can purchase your sugar from us and have it delivered in the city of Montreal to some of your friends and have them reship it to you by steamer, and make whatever saving you can in that way. But when the refineries are enjoying the protection we are now giving them, I see no reason why they should treat their customers in that way. They have carried that thing too far and are getting more protection than they deserve, and I hope that next session the government will revise the tariff and see that that protection is lessened. When the duties on sugar were changed, the hon. Minister of Finance will remember that I did all in my power, in a weak way, to induce the government to put a tariff on coffee and tea and take it off sugar, but he saw fit to leave it on sugar and allow coffee and tea in free. I claim that the opposite policy should be followed. In England the government levies a tax of fourpence a pound on tea, a large duty on coffee, while sugar is free. Sugar is a food, and it is one of the articles we should reduce as far as possible, putting the duty on tea and coffee, and things of that kind. I can see no good reason why sugar should be taxed as highly as it is under the tariff we now have in this country.

I have a word or two to say with regard to the manufacturers of spirits. Under our law, they are obliged to keep spirits in bond two years, but liquor can be brought in from other countries fresh from the still. No doubt it will be said on behalf of the late government, which imposed this rule upon the distillers, that it was made for the benefit of the health of the people. But the fact is, it was made for the benefit of the health of the Conservative party. There is no doubt in my mind that that was the object. And I see no good reason why we should keep spirits in bond for two years while allowing foreign liquors to come in fresh from the still. There is a very large amount of liquor from outside, imported into this country at the present time. Still, I think myself, it has given a great advantage to the distillers, because spirits are 100 per cent higher than they were twenty years ago, while grain is much cheaper.

The policy of the Department of Agriculture has been discussed to a certain extent. I find that the Minister of Agriculture is criticised by the consumers of butter in this country, who say that he should have notified the exporters of butter, last fall, of the great increase in population in this country, which would have been a warning to them to retain in this country a larger amount of butter than they formerly did. But the butter was sent to England, and then it had to be brought back again and freight paid on it both ways. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will notify the exporters this year that the increase in population in Canada furnishes them a market for a much larger portion of their output than formerly.

I was surprised to hear the ex-Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron), discussing the management of the Post Office Department under the present Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). I would like to give one instance to show how that department was conducted under the late government. They gave a contract to a party in Cornwall to take up the letters from the boxes in that town, and carry them to the post office, paying for that service $561.60. No tenders were asked for, the contract was simply given to a friend of the government. This party did not take up the letters, but simply farmed out the contract; somebody else did the work, and the contractor pocketed the profit. When this government came into power, the Post Office Department called for tenders. That work to-day is done for $144 a year. And hon. gentlemen opposite paid $561.60 for it. I venture to think that there is very little ground for criticising the present management of the Post Office Department. Hon. gentlemen opposite tried to make capital out of the fact that the government have placed corn on the free list. The county that I represent, Stormont, is a corn-growing county; a large quantity is raised there. But in that county they are all in favour of free corn. The dairying industry is carried on to a large extent, and free corn is found a great advantage. The farmers there will never want to go back to the duty on corn.

As the hour is late, and the government is anxious—and so is the House—to close this debate, I shall say no more, except, in closing, to express the hope that the suggestions I have made, will be carried out by the present government in the next parliament.

Mr. THOMAS BEATTIE (London). Mr. Speaker, rising at this late stage in the debate, I do so, Sir, for the purpose of calling the attention of members of this House to some important points that have not been touched upon by any member that has yet spoken.

I consider it is the first duty of this parliament, to legislate for the benefit and well-being of the people of Canada. If we fail to do that, we are not doing what this House of representatives was created for. I consider that giving preference trade to the British manufacturers and workmen, must naturally injure and become detrimental to the Canadian workman and manufacturer.

The first duty of this parliament is to build up this country and create employment for all our people at as remunerative wages as possible. This cannot be done in this protective age, by removing that protection and assistance which all young countries require, and must have, if they intend to take any place amongst the manufacturing countries of the world. Preferential trade, to my mind, is too absurd to be considered for one moment. Preferential tariff is an entirely different question, but requires very careful consideration, and great care taken in adopting it, so that you do not destroy existing industries without obtaining an equivalent in return. Canada has made rapid strides in the past twenty years, in many respects, but especially in manufacturing. If our duties were raised as high as in the United States, I will venture to say, in ten years, almost every manufactured article that we import from that country, would be made in Canada, and our imports from there would drop 75 per cent.

We send many millions of dollars out of Canada every year to the United States for manufactured goods, when we know that every article could be made in this country, giving employment to our own mechanics and workmen, and many more that would come to settle here.

I call British free trade nothing but preference trade to the foreign workmen and manufacturers of the world, against the British workmen and manufacturers. While the British workmen have to live in Britain, pay all taxes and support their country in every respect, the foreigner has every advantage and privilege of the British market, the same as the British workman, without one cent of charge; but if the British manufacturer wishes to enter the foreign manufacturers' market, he must submit to a tariff of from 25 to 60 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, what are we doing to-day? Simply supporting the workmen of the United States and Europe, while our own good Canadian workmen have considerable difficulty finding permanent employment. I will give this House a sample of how one of the largest agricultural implement factories in the world was kept out of Canada. The firm I refer to had decided to come to Canada, and if they had, we would have had implements 25 per cent cheaper than they are to-day, and all made in Canada. But, Sir, the duty at that time was lowered, and they decided not to come. Why? They said: There is no use going to Canada, and putting in new plant; we can manufacture in Illinois, pay the duty, and sell our implements in Canada. And, what has been the result? Nearly $2,000,000 worth of the articles that that firm makes, came into Canada last year, yet the farmers paid the same price as formerly for implements which are no better than the Canadian. If this sending millions of dollars of our money out of Canada to the United States, year after year, for what we can manufacture as well as they can, is going to last, Canada will never improve. I say it should not be allowed to continue.

The Reform party contested the election against me on the line of free trade as they have it in England. Now, Mr. Speaker, Great Britain was not always a free trade country, and why did she adopt free trade? Because at that time she was mistress of the world in manufacturing, and she imagined she could influence all the countries of the world to adopt free trade. But all have gone farther and farther away from it, and to-day she stands alone. Every other country has adopted high protective tariffs, and what has been the result in sixty short years of free trade? Let us see what preference or free trade has done for Great Britain. For the first thirty years of free trade, it did not affect her industries to any marked degree. But, Sir, during the past thirty years most alarming changes have taken place. Many of her manufactures have been entirely wiped out by foreign competition, until to-day her imports exceeds her exports by nearly $800,000,000. I venture to predict the tendency will become worse and worse every year, unless protection is adopted. To prove my statement all one requires to do is to observe the decrease in Britain's exports of woollen goods. This trade every one imagined Britain could hold for ever; but, Sir, in the past three years it has dropped down several million of dollars. No place complains more than Sheffield. There is more German and Yankee cutlery sold to-day in Britain than British. Mechanics' tools, farm implements, such as spades, shovels, forks, rakes, &c., are all imported from the United States and have been for years.

In case some may doubt my statement regarding the woollen and worsted trade of Great Britain, I will quote the decrease in the past three years, said by the present government to be years of great prosperity. In 1896 she exported nearly $120,000,000 worth, in 1897 she exported $105,000,000 worth, in 1898 she only exported $90,000,000 worth. In three short years her woollen exports have dropped $20,000,000. To my mind, this is most alarming to all British manufacturers of woollen goods. But, Mr. Speaker, it is only on a par with many other lines of Britain's industries that have gone in the same manner, and which I intend to mention, and that cannot be disputed by any member in this House, nor by any business man outside of this House.

The British merchant as a rule denies he sells anything but English-made goods, and the purchaser or customer is not suspicious, but believes his merchant's statement. Some time ago a cattle dealer from London, Ont., paid a visit to London, Eng., and going out one morning with his sister, who held a very good social position there, they went into a shop to order some meat. The Canadian cattle man remarked: You have very fine beef here. The owner of the shop replied: Yes, sir, all the best English beef. The Canadian replied: he did not know English beef was refrigerator shipped. The shopman, knowing he was caught, called the Canadian to one side and requested him not to say anything about it, for if it was known, it would ruin his trade. In fact many of the general public know little about where the articles they purchase to-day are manufactured. Another incident just comes to my mind to prove that. Some time ago a mechanic was going to England, and his brother workman in the shop asked him to bring him out a good English hammer, as he could not get a good hammer in the United States. The hammer came out, was examined and pronounced by all, superior to anything made in the United States. But next day, to the astonishment of all, one of the men discovered marked on the end of the handle, 'Made in Massachusetts.' Of course the new trade regulations that all goods must be marked where they are made, only came into operation a few years ago. Were it not for that, half the people of Britain who sell foreign made productions would not know where they were made, because good, shrewd buyers and merchants don't tell as a rule where their goods are bought.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me give you an idea of what is taking place in other lines of trade in Great Britain with which I am more familiar. Take the once great silk trade. It has gone. Switzerland, France and Germany have captured it; and strange to say, Italy is now supplying England largely with silk. Take the once great velvet trade of Spitalfields, Eng. Nothing of it remains except the better grades. Germany has captured all that business, and makes a very slightly article at lower price. Almost every yard of velvet in Canada to-day is German made. Take the lace and embroidery trade that Nottingham once was supreme in. Switzerland has taken the entire trade in muslin embroideries, and much of the lace business. France also has a large share of it.

The imports of silk manufactures into Britain to-day are £17,000,000, or nearly $90,000,000. Sixty years ago her imports of silk manufactures were almost nil. In fact I challenge any member of this House to name half a dozen of articles of British manufacture the exports of which have not decreased since the introduction of free trade in Great Britain. The same will be the case in Canada if preference is continued.

Nottingham was once the great hosiery centre that supplied the British market. Why, Sir, as a hosiery centre the place is hardly ever mentioned. Germany has captured that entire trade, except a few of the better grades of goods. Seventy-five per cent of the hosiery and underclothing exported from Great Britain to-day is made in Germany. The glove trade, another very large trade, is in about the same condition, all coming from Germany and France. The good old Scotch lamb's-wool underclothing can no longer be had in Canada. The slightly cheap German manufactures have completely driven it out of the market.

The Bradford district was, and is to-day, supposed to be the place where all fine dress fabrics are made; but Britain cannot any longer boast of being the maker of superior fine fabrics. And where has that class of trade moved away to—same as many others, to Germany. In Gera, Saxony, as fine fabrics as ever were or ever can be produced in Britain, are being made, and have been coming into Canada for many years. And every dollar's worth that comes in through Britain comes in under the preference tariff. Of course, some comes direct from Saxony.

Some may ask why so many continental goods come in to Canada through Britain. The continental merchant will only give three or four months' time, and many will not do direct business, but only through commission merchants. Unless a Canadian merchant is an A 1 credit, there is no use of him going to the continent to buy. On the other hand the British merchant, as a rule, is able to pay cash, buys fairly cheaply, and in large quantities. He gives from seven to eight months' time to merchants from Canada, but never less than six months. Goods can almost be sold before they have to meet their bills. That is why Great Britain has so many foreign goods come through her merchants.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word about dear old Ireland. Let us take the Irish linen trade. Most people to-day imagine that that important and great industry is still confined to Ireland, but such is far from the case. Belgium and Germany have been large producers of linens for years, and I am told that Austria now is manufacturing linens largely of all kinds. More than half the linen goods sold in Britain to-day are of foreign make. You will find the linen productions of these countries all through Canada, and all coming in through the back door of Britain, under the preference tariff, as British made goods.

I will venture to state here that there is not one customs official in Canada who knows the difference between British and foreign made linens. If any one doubts my assertions about the decrease in the Irish linen trade, let him take the decrease in the acreage formerly growing flax in Ireland. In the year 1874, 106,886 acres were sown with flax. What do we find in the year 1898, only twenty-five short years later? That the acreage used in cultivating flax has decreased to 34,489 acres. One can hardly believe this, but it is nevertheless true, a decrease of 72,397 acres, or about 70 per cent. And what does it prove? It proves two things: First, that the flax is no longer being grown in Ireland. Second, that the manufacture of linen is fast departing from Britain and Ireland, and being manufactured in and imported from foreign countries. Nothing but Britain's free or preferential trade has permitted this change to take place. There is no place more agitated to-day, than the town of Northampton, England, the boot and shoe town of England. It is well known that leather can be produced cheaper in the United States than in Britain, and has been exported to Britain largely for years. But boots and shoes are now being shipped into Britain in large quantities and causing much uneasiness in that branch of industry. Boots and shoes from the United States come very largely into Canada, but if our tariff was as high as theirs, not one dollar's worth would come in. All would soon be made in Canada. What has become of the immense trade in ribbons—that the town of Coventry once controlled? Why, Sir, at one time Coventry made all the ribbons exported from Britain, but that trade to-day is entirely wiped out and gone to Switzerland and France. It can never be brought back until a duty of 25 per cent is imposed. If that was done I believe it would return. The wholesale merchants of London, Manchester and Glasgow do not care where the goods are made, so long as they can export them and make their profit. But what about the British workman? Where is his living to come from? At one time Britain supplied the United States with every yard of carpet that was used in that country. But, Sir, about thirty years ago the high tariff was adopted in that country, and what is the result to-day? The United States is making more yards of carpet than are made in Britain, and if it was not for the excessive duty on wool coming into the United States, would be exporting carpets to England. Not only that, but the United States are making styles of carpets that British manufacturers are copying. What is the cause of this change? The American high tariff. I will give you another sample of a small article, but one in which an immense trade is done. I refer to spool cotton. Before the adoption of the high tariff in the United States, that article was manufactured in Paisley, Scotland. The Scotch manufacturers of that article were compelled to transfer their business across the Atlantic, and the millionaire firm of J. & P. Coates have larger works in New Jersey than they have in Paisley. And I am told that they are actually shipping thread to Britain instead of enlarging and improving their works in Paisley. If time would permit, I could give many other evidences of what free trade has brought many branches of Britain's industries to. Some may think it strange why she cannot compete with the European countries I have mentioned. But, Sir, British workmen cannot and will not live as workmen in those foreign countries do, and I hope they will never have to do so, working twelve and fourteen long hours per day for about 75 cents per day, and wearing blue jean smocks and wooden shoes. Now, let us take an ordinary transaction of preferential trade. Father and son live on farms opposite each other. The father is worth pounds to the son's pennies—as Britain is to Canada. The son purchases considerable from the father and pays him the same price as every person else. But, when the father purchases from the son, he expects and gets from the son 10 per cent discount. Is there any member of this House who will say that is not stupid on the part of the son? That is just what the present government is doing with Britain, making Canadian workmen give the British workmen a discount. I am an out and out protectionist, for both the farmer and workman, and when I hear a man stand up and advocate free trade for this country, I cannot look upon him as a true citizen. I always feel he has some personal object in doing so.

I have heard several members of this House advocate the duty being taken off one of our natural products, which, if done, would wipe out its entire production in Canada—I refer to coal oil. Why are they doing so to-day? Because, Sir, they imagine the Standard Oil Company of the United States have entered Canada and have purchased all the oil-producing lands in Canada. A more erroneous impression could not have got abroad. It is true the Standard Oil Company have entered Canada and have purchased the refining interests of Canada to a considerable extent, but not entirely. A large number of prominent Canadians are still interested in it, if the Standard do control it.

But, Sir, the oil production of Canada they do not control, and are not trying to control, from what I know, and I know all about it. The Canadian oil production to-day is all in the hands of Canadians, as much as ever it was, and is likely to remain in the hands of Canadians. But, wipe that small duty out, small and all as it is, and you will do away with all the Canadian oil miners, and no more Canadian oil will be produced. What will be the result? The difference will be that we will have to burn United States coal oil, and pay very likely a much higher price for it. The many different purposes coal oil is used for to-day is the main cause of the advance in price, as well as the great advance in price of all materials used in producing it. The advance in materials used in the production of coal oil is fully from 50 to 150 per cent. A short time since a number of the gas companies of Canada waited on the Finance Minister and asked to have the duty taken off oil. Evidently the gas companies do not care who suffers so long as they obtain what they want. This deputation was headed by the Toronto Gas Company. That company are reported to have a surplus of millions of dollars. If they require oil for making gas, why not go to the oil district and purchase oil lands and produce their own oil? The territory is large, extending from Ridgetown, on Lake Erie, to Sarnia, on the St. Clair River. And one hundred acres can be had at a very reasonable price. Mr. Speaker, they are afraid to risk their own capital, but willing to ruin those who have invested and risked their capital in producing coal oil. And many of the miners were practically ruined before they succeeded in getting oil. Do not let us forget that the oil refiner is not the oil producer. The oil producers are our own Canadian people, and do not let us destroy them for the sake of a few parties and companies, such as I have just mentioned. The farmer is making no complaint. But why should coal oil not go up and down just the same as iron, wheat or anything else? There is no article that I know of that remains stationary. Besides, coal oil is the cheapest light the farmer ever had or can get.

As I said before, Sir, I am an out-and-out protectionist, a protectionist for the farmer and for the mechanic. I believe protection to be the best policy for Canada, and if I had my way I would raise the tariff wall so high between Canada and the United States, that no Yankee could shoot any of his goods over with a Maxim gun. If that were done, then, in less than ten years all the goods we now import from the United States would be made in Canada, and our money would be kept in Canada, and paid out to our own Canadian workmen. What are the great warehouses of Britain doing to-day—I mean the wholesale houses of London, Manchester, Glasgow, and all the large British centres? Why, Sir, 50 per cent of their business is in foreign-made goods, which, previous to free trade, were all produced in Britain and Ireland. Yes, and these foreign goods are now coming in to Canada through Britain, under the preference tariff, as British-made goods. I have given this House some statements as to the changes in British industries since free trade was adopted that cannot be contradicted, and, Sir, the pre-existing condition of things will never return to Britain without protection.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that no country, no matter how wealthy or how great, can afford to think she can fight the entire world, commercially or otherwise.

Mr. H. J. LOGAN (Cumberland). If we believed all the statements made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Beattie), who has just taken his seat, we would have to come to the conclusion that the old motherland had about gone to the dogs. He sang the old song of free trade not being a success in England. I do not propose to enter in detail into the statement made by the hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie), but I think if I quote from Mr. Mulhall, the well-known English statistician, his opinion of the trade of Great Britain, that will be sufficient to refute the statements made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Beattie). Mr. Mulhall, speaking of the progress of British trade since 1859, writes in the Contemporary Review :

In that year (1859) the total imports and exports amounted to £335,000,000 sterling, being about £11 10s. per head of the population. Ten years afterwards the total was £532,000,000, and the rate per head £17. Twenty years afterwards, total £743,000,000, making £20 per head. In 1899 the total trade was £815,000,000—per head, £20 2s. For the first time in the world's history, the external trade of one nation has reached this great total value. During these forty years, British trade with the United States amounted to the great sum of £4,192,000,000; and the trade with the colonies was still larger, having attained to £6,043,000,000. Trade with all European countries is increasing.

Now, Sir, at this late stage of the debate I shall not take up much of the time of the House. I have listened attentively to the different speeches made, and it seems to me that the most amusing of all was that delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). For years he has been looked upon as a paragon of British loyalty; loyalty seems to have been bubbling over in him, and he again this afternoon spoke in eloquent terms of his love for the motherland, and what he would like to see done for her. Let me ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) what he has done to prove his love for the motherland during the many years he has occupied a seat in this House. Did he ever propose that a Canadian contingent should help England in her foreign wars? Has he ever offered to England a preference for her goods in our Canadian markets? Not at all. Why, he boasted this afternoon that he regretted that this government has seen fit to increase the preference in favour of Great Britain from 25 to 33½ per cent. That is loyalty without having to pay for it. That is loyalty which I think we must all admit is nothing more nor less than lip loyalty, and it comes with very bad grace from the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill), to refer to a gentleman who unfortunately is not with us to-night, and to state on the basis of a report in the newspapers, that that hon. gentleman had spoken in Paris words of veiled treason. Does he know that the hon. gentleman to whom he refers (Mr. Tarte) was the first French Canadian in the Dominion of Canada to join the Imperial Federation League, of which the hon. member for North Bruce was one of the chief exponents in years gone by? Was it veiled treason when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) took that step in the province of Quebec? Sir, the term 'veiled treason' is not new to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I remember, after the election of 1891, when the hon. baronet who leads the opposition came to the conclusion that the Grand Trunk Railway did not favour him in that election, he called a meeting in Nova Scotia at which I had the pleasure of being present. Sir Charles Tupper then quoted Sir John Macdonald, and said that that distinguished statesman had alleged that the Liberal party had gone to the country with veiled treason in their mouths, but he said he would go one better and say: That the Liberal party had gone to the country, not with veiled treason, but with treason with the veil torn aside. These were the sort of declarations that were made by leading Conservatives in years past to try and impress upon the people of other countries that there was one political party in the Dominion of Canada that was not loyal to the British Crown. The hon. gentleman from North Bruce and others of his friends have propounded the policy of preferential trade as they desire it within the empire. Sir, we would all hail with delight if England would impose a duty which would give an advantage to the goods of her colonies in her markets, but what is the good of our running after something that is entirely impracticable. I ask any of these gentlemen opposite to name to me one single leader of thought in Great Britain who has up to date, given his opinion that preferential trade of the kind the Conservatives propose, is practicable, in the near future at any rate. The only distinguished man in Great Britain who has even hinted that a preferential trade could be constructed in the way which they desire, is the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, and he has laid it down that there must first be the condition, (even before the matter can be discussed), that there shall be free trade within the empire. Now, Sir, the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) and other gentlemen opposite have stated that the preferential tariff is hitting very hard the manufactures of this country. This afternoon the hon. gentleman said:

Mr. LOGAN.

The manufactures of Canada are staggering under the 25 per cent preference and I do not think they can stand 33½ preference.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if the manufactures of Canada are staggering under the 25 per cent preference, what are the manufacturers of Canada going to do if there is free trade within the empire, which Mr. Chamberlain has stated was the only condition upon which this question can be discussed at all. Sir, the scheme proposed by the Conservative party is impracticable. The policy of the present government is a policy which shows to the motherland an appreciation of what she has done for us in the past and of what she is doing for us to-day.

Last evening the junior member for Picton (Mr. Bell), in the course of his speech used the following language, speaking of the present prosperity of the country:

We attribute it to the effect that that policy which was inaugurated in 1879 by the Liberal-Conservative party was a policy calculated to set this country firmly upon its feet, and that policy has been continued down to the present. To-day we are reaping the benefits of it.

Further on, he said:

It is due to their decision, wisely taken, not to interfere with the protective policy inaugurated by their predecessors, but to go on administering our affairs after the example set for them by the various Conservative administrations which held office for many years when these gentlemen were in opposition.

Once before in this House I had to remind the junior member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), that he did not always entertain these opinions, and I feel called upon to-night to remind him once more, as he has sinned again, that he did not entertain them in 1887, when he was a candidate against the then administration of the Liberal-Conservative party. Nor did he entertain them in 1891, when he delivered a lecture in the town of New Glasgow, in Nova Scotia, reported in a paper published there—and I do not know that he has ever denied the correctness of that report—as having made the following statement:—

I consider the argument of the free trader unanswerable. I believe at this moment that if Canada took a liberal step in the direction of free trade, it would go a long way to place her upon the road to the greatest prosperity. The reasons why I consider Canada should turn about and adopt a free trade policy are: (a) that we might free ourselves from the dominating influences of the United States; (b) on account of the failure of the national policy; (c) because of the startling revelations of the census.

Yet this is the gentleman who in the year 1900, comes to us and says that the reason of the present prosperity of this country is because we have had the national policy since 1878, which he condemned in 1891, as an absolute failure. He admits that we have prosperity in this country. We are all thankful that that must be admitted by all parties in this House and out of it.

We had this afternoon a deliverance from the junior member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall), in which he attacked the Liberals for their policy on the coal question. We were taught down in Nova Scotia that the high tariff on coal was absolutely necessary to the life of the coal industry in the province. But, Sir, by the Fielding tariff the duty on coal was reduced from sixty cents per ton to fifty-three cents per ton under the general tariff, while under the British preferential tariff—the bugaboo of English coal was always held up before our eyes in Nova Scotia—the duty is thirty-nine and three-fourths cents per ton. In spite of these reductions in the duty, we find under the operation of the tariff for three years very gratifying results. I will not give you my own statement, but let me quote from the report of Mr. Fergie, the president of the Intercolonial Coal Company, and a strong supporter of the hon. members for Pictou in the last election, and now the chairman of the Miners' Society of Nova Scotia. In the report he presented a few days ago, he said:

It is very gratifying that we notice all branches of industry in this province to be in a most flourishing condition, and particularly those of coal and iron. Every coal mine is working full time, and is taxed to its utmost and finds no difficulty in disposing of all it can produce, and no able-bodied workman need now go idle.

A very important statement coming from such a gentleman.

The output for the year ending September 30, 1899, as shown by the Department of Mines returns, was 2,642,333 tons of 2,240 pounds, and it is safe to predict that the present year will show an increase of close on a million tons over these figures.

But, Sir, the hon. junior member for Cape Breton, in the speech he made this afternoon, and also in the speech he made two years ago, claims that the Fielding legislation, so called, of Nova Scotia was not in the best interest of the coal-mining industry of that province. He referred to it in Hansard of 1898, page 1050, as follows:

He (Mr. Fielding) was Prime Minister of a government in Nova Scotia at whose instance legislation was passed only a few years ago, handing over to a large foreign monopoly the management, control and ownership of vast coal-bearing properties in that province.

Afterwards, at page 1051, said:

It is was not until all this came about that the Finance Minister realized the nature of the injury he had inflicted upon the people by this improvident legislation.

Improvident legislation, Mr. Speaker! No legislation has ever been brought down in Nova Scotia since it has been a province that has been of such benefit to that province as the legislation which was brought down prior to the formation of the Whitney Syndicate. It has not only resulted beneficially to the coal industry, but it has brought so much foreign capital into the province that business is prosperous, both the coal and the iron industries are flourishing, and industrial establishments are being established from Cape Sable to Cape North. Mr. Fielding, then the Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, realized that the coal trade had reached the high-water mark of development in the home market. The mining population was increasing. There was not work to go round. Wages were at a low ebb. As a matter of fact, men were employed in the mines as labourers at from ninety cents to a dollar a day. In many cases they were not able to get work even at these rates, and in the Island of Cape Breton they were out of work during the winter months. What was to be done? The home market was expanding, but very, very slowly. Gentlemen connected with the Liberal party and leading politicians, studied the question and arrived at the conclusion that the coal deposits were so advantageously situated that it would be possible to secure a market in the New England States. This was vigorously opposed by the Liberal-Conservative party. Mr. McKeen, now a senator, in the Commons, in 1889, in support of his contention that an American market was an impossibility, read a letter from a leading coal merchant of Boston stating that our coal was so sulphurous and otherwise objectionable that even if freights permitted, it could not obtain a footing in Boston. In 1891, the people of Cape Breton were warned by Mr. McKeen, and by the present member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall), against any attempt to increase our sales by a reduction of the coal duties. Particularly they urged that English coal would supplant that of Nova Scotia in the St. Lawrence market. The Liberal government of Nova Scotia, of which the present Finance Minister was the Prime Minister, persisted in spite of all the opposition given to it—opposition which was carried almost to the foot of the Throne, because, I believe, they approached the Governor General of Canada on the subject.

They indulged in all kinds of hysterical predictions of what would ensue if American capitalists got control of the large collieries in the province of Nova Scotia. Unfair methods were used to induce the electors to reject the local government candidates in 1894; but what are the facts? A few years have passed by, and instead of devastation existing there, we find the condition of affairs described by Mr. Fergie, the president of the Miners' Society. Not only have the prophecies in reference to getting a market in the United States failed, but we find that the Dominion Coal Company, of which Mr. Whitney is the head, is at this very moment filling a contract for about 800,000 tons per annum to be delivered in the New England States to one concern alone. We find that last year $1,300,000 was paid in wages by this one company, and we find that the excess of wages paid by this company in 1899 over the amount paid by the owners of the mines before the syndicate got control of them, amounts to no less a sum than $400,000. And yet the junior member for Cape Breton calls this improvident legislation. More than that, if the Island of Cape Breton in days gone by, when these collieries were worked by small proprietors, they were closed down during the winter months. As a matter of fact, it took most of the wages the miners earned during the summer to keep them in the winter, and this year is the first in the history of the coal trade of Nova Scotia, in which the Cape Breton mines have been worked all through the winter months, so that we find that that legislation, far from being improvident, has had the very best results.

Going into the coal trade of Nova Scotia generally, hon. members from the province of Ontario can scarcely realize the extreme importance to Nova Scotia of the development of that trade. It is the mainstay of our provincial revenue. It not only gives employment directly to about 7,000 hands, but our road service, education and transportation, and our agricultural industry, are largely indebted to the coal trade and the income which the province derives from the royalty therefrom. The increase in the coal trade of Nova Scotia, prior to the last year or two, was about 7 per cent per annum. Had any one said, before the Fielding legislation was brought down for the encouragement of the coal industry, that in ten years the royalties would equal the Dominion subsidy to the province of Nova Scotia, he would be laughed at as insane. But the probability is that this will be reached in the year 1900. Yet that legislation was opposed by the Conservative party.

Let me give you, Mr. Speaker, a few statistics of the coal sales in Nova Scotia for the past year, as compared with 1898:

	1899. Tons.	Increase. Tons.
Dominion Coal Co.....	1,553,102	434,861
Cumberland Railway and Coal Co.	350,000	28,000
Canada Coals and Railway Co.	66,451	*1,165

*Decrease.

But this decrease can be explained by unfortunate circumstances which I need not go into at present.

	1899. Tons	Increase. Tons.
Acadia Coal Co.....	233,665	57,530

	1898.	1899.	Increase.
Cumberland Co.	389,616	416,451	26,835
Cape Breton Co.....	1,361,467	1,787,424	425,957
Pictou Co.	386,325	450,919	64,594

	Tons.
Grand total, 1899.....	2,654,794
" " 1898.....	2,137,408

Total increase 517,386

The increase in the shipments in 1899 was twice larger in tons than at any former time. To come down to the present year, we find that the coal trade is jumping even greater than in 1899. In January, 1900, the output of Cape Breton county was 130,289 tons, and the shipments 100,000 tons, and in January, 1899, the shipments were 37,300 tons, showing an increase in shipments in the one month of January, 1899, of 62,819 tons.

The shipments to the United States in January, 1900, amounted to 58,750 tons, and in January, 1899, 8,465 tons, showing an increase in one month of 50,285 tons.

Take the Cumberland Railway and Coal Company, in January, 1899, the shipments were 31,790 tons, and in January, 1900, they amounted to 36,781 tons, showing an increase of 4,991 tons, and the increase over December, 1899, was 3,569 tons.

Take the Acadia Coal Company, its shipments in January, 1899, were 19,505 tons, and in January, 1900, 20,940 tons, showing an increase of 1,435 tons.

Then we have the Intercolonial Railway Mining Company which shipped 10,480 tons in January, 1899, and 19,517 tons in January, 1900; or an increase of 9,037 tons in one single month.

In the month of February, 1900, the Dominion Coal Company output was 153,172 tons, and its shipments 95,454 tons, and its shipments to the United States in that month were 69,285 tons.

The Acadia Coal Company in the month of February, 1900, shipped 19,707 tons, being an increase over the month of February, 1899, of 1,526 tons.

The Intercolonial Railway Coal Company's sales in February, 1900, amounted to 17,741 tons, being an increase over February, 1899, of 6,261 tons.

In March, 1900, the Cape Breton output was 155,785 tons, and the shipments 85,000 tons, and the shipments to the United States in that month amounted to 55,827 tons.

The Acadia Coal Company's sales in March, 1900, were 18,551 tons, and in March, 1899, 17,865 tons, or an increase of 686 tons.

The Intercolonial Coal Company, Drummond Colliery, had shipments in March, 1900, of 18,255 tons, as compared with 11,799 tons in March, 1899, or an increase of 6,456 tons.

Then with reference to the Cumberland Railway and Coal Company, situated at Springhill, I find that the shipments in March, 1900, amounted to 36,878 tons, being an increase over March, 1899, of 9,480 tons, and its shipments for the three months, ending March, were 108,145 tons, or an increase over the three months ending March, 1899, of 28,067 tons.

The increase in the Dominion Coal Company's shipments in 1899 equals half the total shipments in 1895, and the Cumberland Railway and Coal Company takes second place in spite of some difficulties. The increase in Springhill between 1898 and 1899 shows an increase over that of the two previous years of over 100,000 tons.

The year 1899 was the first in which our miners of Nova Scotia got employment all the year round, and more coal was shipped to the United States that year than in any year since 1873, or it may be said since 1867, when the reciprocity treaty was abrogated. A year ago, there were too many collieries for the limited market, but to-day the market is too great for the supply. The Port Hood mines, Inverness, which were idle for thirty years, are being reopened, and the Broad Cove mines are receiving orders for a very large quantity to be shipped even across the Atlantic Ocean to ports in England and on the continent of Europe.

The prospects of the coal trade for the year 1900 are of the most promising character, and I am sure it will tax the full capacity of the mines to meet the demand. The Dominion Coal Company alone are prepared to ship more coal than all the Nova Scotia collieries combined, its own colliery included, shipped in any year previous to 1899. The total shipments for 1899 amounted to 2,137,000 tons, and this year it is expected that the Dominion coal shipments will reach at least 2,200,000 tons. The Acadia Company expects an increased output of 50,000 tons, and the Springhill Colliery should increase its output about 20 per cent. If the demand keeps up, the increase over last year will be three-quarters of a million tons from the province of Nova Scotia. The increase in shipments to the United States, as compared with last year, was between 265,000 and 275,000 tons. Of this the Dominion Coal Company sent 260,000 tons, while the balance came from the collieries of Springhill. And, as I have said, this year the Dominion Coal Company have one contract to supply about 800,000 tons to one company in the United States, and the trade of that company is being diverted to that market. Not only have coal shipments increased, but, still better, the wages of the miners have increased. In the Island of Cape Breton, the wages of miners have increased very materially. There was a 10 per cent increase all around, and, instead of men working for 90 cents and $1 a day, as they did in the old days described by the junior member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall), there is not a labourer about the Dominion Coal Company or the Dominion Steel Company, in the Island of Cape Breton, who is working for less than $1.25 a day. The wages have been increased all along the line, including the Springhill Colliery, which means that the men are happy and the country is prosperous. Then, the Dominion Steel Company, which is being organized, is also directly due to the organization of the Dominion Coal Company. The present very energetic and distinguished manager, Mr. Moxham, is paying $1.25 to $1.35 and $1.50 per day according to the worth of the labourer. This shows that what we have been looking and working for for years is coming to pass—men's wages are increasing. In the elections of 1896, the miners of Springhill were spoken of as the best-paid workmen in the world. I ventured to say at that time if that were so, I pitied the rest of the workingmen of the world. But the day has come when wages are increased in Springhill, and miners will be more prosperous than in the days gone by, for which we must give a large amount of credit to the Fielding legislation in Nova Scotia, to the legislation of this government and to the great prosperity that exists in Canada to-day.

I have some more statistics, but I will not weary the House with them at this late hour.

We have associated with this great coal trade the great iron industry. It is well known that throughout Canada there is a great development in this industry. Many hon. gentlemen, I believe, do not realize the tremendous development that is taking place in this line. Millions of dollars are being spent in building furnaces, coke ovens, &c., for the production of iron at Sydney. What was, a few months ago, a country village, is to-day a booming city. Thousands of men are being employed, and, as I said before, at good wages. I believe we have considerable iron deposits in the province of Nova Scotia. As time goes on and our country is better prospected, I believe it will be found that we have a large quantity of iron. At present, the company is bringing iron from Newfoundland. Not only in Cape Breton is there iron ore, but also in Cumberland and in other parts of the province of Nova Scotia.

There is another industry which I wish to refer to for a moment or two—the industry of copper. It is not generally known that copper exists in the province of Nova Scotia to any very large extent. It was known that there were large deposits in British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec, but it is now found that the deposits of copper in Nova Scotia are very large, and that the work of production of this metal is to be one of the great industries of the future in that rich province by the sea. It may not be generally known, but probably one hundred and fifty years ago copper mines were worked in the county of Cumberland by the residents, at that time, of the county. But, since that time, nothing has been done in that industry until about three years ago. In that year some gentleman in Boston became interested in these copper deposits, and so favourable have the reports been, that they have come in and invested their money to a large extent. They have invested at least $100,000 in smelting works in the town of Pictou, and about $150,000 in the development of properties throughout the province of Nova Scotia, until they have to-day, I am informed, under their control over 100 square miles of copper property in Nova Scotia, Cape Breton and Labrador. They have, as I say, built a large smelter in Pictou, for the smelting of copper and all low-grade ores. They propose to further their industry by the erection—if they can get favourable conditions—of a refinery in the town of Pictou, or some other place in the province of Nova Scotia. We are in this condition in Canada—although we produced in 1899, 17,956,421 tons of copper, not a single pound of that copper was refined in the Dominion. It may not be widely known that before the Ways and Means Committee of the United States Congress, Mr. Thompson, the president of the Orford Copper Company, of New Jersey, testified that while they paid $25,000 a month in wages in Ontario, they paid $100,000 a month to American labour in treating Canadian ores, or four times as much for the American as for Canadian labour. My hon. friend from Cornwall (Mr. Snettinger) has made some suggestions to the government. The only suggestion I desire to make at the present time is that as they have taken upon themselves the duty of granting a bonus for the manufacture of iron—which I believe was right—they should give a small bonus for the production of copper, so that this great industry may be built up in Nova Scotia and throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion. The harnessing of electricity has demanded a large supply of copper, as shown by the fact that copper has jumped in price about 50 per cent within the last few months. We have in Nova Scotia, at present, the Copper Crown Company, controlling, as I have said, 100 square miles in Cumberland, Colchester, Pictou and other parts of Nova Scotia and Labrador. They have developed eight properties, and are in a position to mine 200 tons a day from mines at Wentworth, Oxford, New Annan and Lansdowne. At Lansdowne the copper seam is thirty-two feet in width, and at Wentworth development has gone on, the ore showing an average of 10 per cent of copper. The use of brass is very extensive, and brass, as we all know, is composed of about 60 per cent of copper, the balance being zinc, which is also found in Nova Scotia and other parts of Canada. It was very important that an industry of that kind should be encouraged for a few years, at least until it gets on its feet, for the results and development of such an industry will be greatly beneficial to Canada. Besides, the Copper Crown Company, the National Copper Company control five square miles in Cumberland and Colchester counties. The Intercolonial Copper Company have 15,000 tons already mined, and are capable of turning out from 100 to 200 tons a day. Copper enters into the production of many articles in daily use, and is a very important metal. I would urge the government to look into this matter and to grant a bounty on copper, as they have granted a bounty on iron in the past.

All those who have spoken in this debate have admitted the great prosperity in Canada. We do not need to quote elaborate figures to prove it. As the visitor to Westminster Abbey who looks for the monument of Sir Christopher Wren is told to look about him, so we have only to look about us to see that Canada is prosperous. I need not quote many figures, but when I state that the average foreign trade of Canada increased under the Liberal-Conservative rule $66,000,000 in 18 years, and under Liberal rule in three years over $88,000,000, and that the average annual increase under the Conservatives was only $3,700,000, while under Liberal rule it was $27,000,000, it will be admitted that this country is prospering in a way of which any man who has eyes will be convinced in looking about him. It has been said that the government is not entitled to credit for this prosperity. Well, if they are not entitled to credit, which I do not admit, I think we are entitled to look at what might have been the case had the Conservative party been in power. In 1896 we had higher and yet higher protection being imposed in this country. Men who had money invested in industries were taught not to depend upon their own energies, but to depend upon the government. We had a record of scandals of which every Canadian must be ashamed. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) tonight has boasted of the unity of the party on the other side of the House. The boast brought a smile to the faces of a large number of men in this House, particularly those who were here in 1896. We have not forgotten yet the episode of the anonymous letters; we have not yet forgotten the episode of the nest of traitors; we have not yet forgotten that seven members of the government, just previous to the election of 1896, deliberately cut the throat of their leader and were consequently called by him a nest of traitors. In 1896 industries were languishing, the farmers were not prosperous. The census returns showed plainly that we were simply marking time in this young country of ours when we should have been going ahead by leaps and bounds. When the Laurier government came into power they found deficits, hard times, the country stirred from end to end by a racial and religious question. They found the great national railway of Canada ending in a field in the province of Quebec, they found a tariff discriminating against Great Britain, they found the rate of postage upon letters to Great Britain twice as high as it was for foreign countries. Yet, Sir, the hon. member for North Bruce, with all his zeal and love for the motherland, does not seem to have suggested a reform in the postal laws by which postal matter could be sent to the mother country at a cheaper rate. To-day we have penny postage in Canada; and whereas it cost in times gone by, under the Liberal-Conservative party, 5 cents an ounce to send letters to England, to-day it only costs the small sum of 2 cents. The Liberal government approached the tariff, not in a way to ruin industries, but in a statesmanlike way, slow but sure. Tariff reform is in the air. We have had tariff reform. I do not need to quote any higher authority on that subject than the leader of the opposition, who said in the House of Commons, in speaking of the Fielding tariff in 1897:

The result is that this tariff goes into operation, and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed in consequence, while hon. members gloat, vindictively gloat, over the destruction of Canadian industries. I was reading the wall, the sorrowful wall, of those industries in the Montreal 'Gazette' where one manufacturer after another declared that those industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw facing them a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.

I feel that, so far from rejoicing at it from a party standpoint, I deplore from the bottom of my heart the ruin that is going to be inflicted upon the best interests of Canada, and upon the great industries.

Yet we have man after man getting up on the other side of the House and stating that we still have the national policy in force in Canada, that there has been no reduction in the tariff whatever. How can they reconcile that statement with that of the distinguished baronet who leads them? In 1900 the days of scandals are passed; the days of a divided cabinet have gone by. The people of Canada have confidence in the Laurier administration, and that confidence is one of the greatest causes, in my opinion, of Canada's extraordinary prosperity.

Hon. gentlemen opposite still cling to the thought that Manitoba has gone to their side. They forget the fact that the leader of the opposition and his friends went down into the province of Nova Scotia previous to the last local elections, and when he left he put in charge his gallant son. When the election had been fought out it was found they got 3 members out of the 38. They went into the province of New Brunswick on the same mission. The distinguished member for York (Mr. Foster) called a convention at Moncton and gave forth the fiat that they must run the elections on party lines. That hon. gentleman and the Minister of Railways and Canals locked horns, and the result was that the government of Mr. Emmerson was returned by 43 to 5. I have heard it stated here that there was an election in Carleton, N. B., where the Conservatives won a seat. Any one acquainted with the facts knows that they won the seat through local jealousies. But, what was the case in reference to Gloucester, represented in this House by a supporter of the distinguished baronet? In the county of Gloucester, a few months ago, an election was held, and although there were four Liberal candidates in the field supporting the Emmerson government, not a single Tory dared to put up his head to be knocked down. I need not refer to the province of Quebec and to the results that have taken place there.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that in Canada confidence in the Laurier administration is so great that if an appeal were made to the country to-morrow we would sweep the field from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Why should the electors of Canada turn to the Conservative party, that party of scandals, that party of divided cabinets, that party of nests of traitors, when they have at the head of affairs a government of business men who are conducting this country on business principles? The result is that we have prosperity, and the trade of the country moving forward by leaps and bounds throughout its whole extent. The electors of Canada do not propose to exchange their leaders at the present time, by any means. When an appeal is made to the country, whether made this year or next, it will be seen that hon. gentlemen opposite are destined to remain in the cold shades of opposition until they find some better policy than this jug-handled preferential trade policy which is condemned by every statesman in England. They have got to stay there until they find men who are competent to fill the cabinet positions in this country, who will be true to each other, true to the country, and true to their party instead of cutting one another's throats.

When we come down to the present session, one of the great events has been the increase in the preference to Great Britain from 25 to 33½ per cent. This increase is being condemned by the ultra-loyal member for North Bruce and others. They have talked loyalty until they are black in the face, but they have never done anything for loyalty from 1867 down to the present day. I call upon them now to state what their party has done for the motherland in the days gone by. Have they given the motherland a preference in our markets? Now they are so loyal that they are prepared to say to Great Britain: We won't give you one iota of a preference in our markets unless you put a tax on the breadstuffs of your workingmen. Loyalty of that kind is mere lip loyalty, a mere quid pro quo loyalty. I for one am heartily in favour of this preference being increased. I hope it will not remain at 33½ per cent, but that it will be increased to at least 50 per cent in favour of Great Britain. We have, then, Sir, by doing this, given tariff reform, to a very large extent, to this country. Another part of the budget speech refers to the extension of the free list. I will not go into that. But, we have another plank which has not been mentioned in this debate, to any great extent, and it is in reference to a conciliation board, to settle labour disputes in Canada. In this matter I am directly interested. I am the representative here of a large labour element in the province of Nova Scotia and I hail with delight any government that is radical enough, that has strength of conviction enough to come forward and bring down such a measure as this government propose to place before the House for the reference of disputes to a conciliation board. Now, I would like to have had an opportunity to discuss the tariff reductions, but, I do not think it would be fair to the members of the House to detain them while I read the list to them. Sufficient to say that upon a large number of articles that are used in daily life of the artisans and the workingmen of this country the duties, in many cases, have been entirely removed, and in many other cases they have been cut down from the high tariff of the Conservative party to less than a revenue tariff under the Liberal administration. I will not go into these matters except to mention one or two. We find, for instance, in the matter of woollen goods, that, under the old tariff, blankets paid 5 cents per pound and 25 per cent. Under the preferential tariff they pay 23½ per cent, or down to a revenue basis. We find that coatings, under the old tariff, were 33 per cent, under the preferential tariff, 23½ per cent. Flannels were 33 per cent, under the old tariff; under the preferential tariff they are 23½ per cent. Shawls were 25 per cent under the old tariff, while under the preferential clause they are 20 per cent. Shirts were 36 per cent under the old tariff, while under the preferential tariff they are 23½ per cent. Socks, stockings, underwear, etc., were reduced from 35 per cent under the old tariff to 23½ under the preferential clause. I do not propose to weary the House with any more of these statistics at the present time.

Mr. LOGAN.

I only wish, in closing, to say that if an appeal is made to the country we can go to the country with confidence of success because we have the right policy and record to place before the people. I would be ashamed, as a young Canadian, to be a follower of a leader who would promulgate a policy of roaring loyalty in the provinces of Ontario and Nova Scotia and who would go to Quebec and preach the doctrine that he is preaching there to-day. I would be ashamed to be the follower of a leader who would make the following statement in Quebec. The words I am quoting are those of the right hon. baronet who leads the opposition, as reported in his own Conservative paper:

A great deal has been said with reference to the federation of the empire. I was a member of the Imperial Federation League, and when I found that a number of active spirits in that league were young men, without a great deal of experience, whose great aim it was to compel the colonies and outlying portions of the empire to make direct contributions to the army and navy of Britain, I opposed that policy on the ground that, in my judgment, it would break up the empire. . . . I showed what had been spent upon our militia system, and I said that under these circumstances the imposition of an Imperial tax upon Canada for the army and navy of Great Britain would, in my judgment, be a great mistake. I said: 'What we have done in the past is a guarantee of what we will do in the future. (Cheers.) You must leave it to the independent judgment of the people of Canada, and to the spirit of the people of Canada, to come to your aid whenever and however they think it is necessary.' They say that I broke up the league by taking that position. If so, I am proud of it.

People in the provinces of Ontario and Nova Scotia can scarcely believe that the hon. gentleman could have made use of such a doctrine in Québec, but it is not denied. He condemned the representation, in the Imperial House, of Canadians, and yet we find that his lieutenants are going about the country preaching that as one of their doctrines. I heard a lecture given, not long ago, by one of his lieutenants in which he expressed the belief that within twenty-five years we would have full representation at Westminster and he adopted the analogy of a man who, living in New England States, goes to California and still has representation at Washington, although he is 3,000 miles away from home, and he asked why should not Canada have representation at Westminster although she is 3,000 or 4,000 miles away, but he is turned down by his leader. The hon. member who spoke before me referred to the condition of England. It has been the song and dance of hon. gentlemen for some years past, to cry down the mother country. What are the words of the hon. senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). They have often been quoted in this House, but they cannot be quoted too often. They come from the son of the hon. leader of the opposition. They are as follows:

What is the whole policy of the motherland to-day? Driven from the civilized markets of the world, steadily and every year finding their output to those markets decreasing, they spend millions on their navy and millions on their army to force their wares and their goods and their merchandise into the uncivilized markets of the world, which they are endeavouring to occupy, to settle and control, &c.

That is the loyalty of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. It is part of their campaign to decry the mother country. I would give preference to the words of that distinguished American, Ralph Waldo Emerson, who visited England in 1847. What does he say? These words were applicable to the motherland then and they are applicable to her now:

I see her not dispirited, not weak, but well remembering that she has seen dark days before; indeed, with a kind of instinct that she sees a little better on a cloudy day, and that in a storm of battle and calamity she has a secret vigour and a pulse like a cannon. I see her in her old age, not decrepit, but young, and still daring to believe in her power of endurance and expansion. Seeing that, I say, All hail! mother of the heroes, with strength still equal to the time; still wise to entertain and swift to execute the policy which the mind and heart of man require in the present hour, and thus truly hospitable to the foreigner, and truly a home to the thoughtful and generous who are born in the soil.

These are the words of a noble man, and they are as true to-day as when they were written. We say: All hail to the empire of which we form a part. We are willing to give her a preference in our markets; we are willing to give our blood and treasure; we are proud to do this for the motherland which has done so much for us. We are not of those who stand up and talk about their loyalty continually; we believe in acting loyally and not talking it. We do not believe in the policy of preaching one thing in Ontario and another thing in Quebec. We find that there is incontrovertible evidence of the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite are using distinctly different arguments to the people of these two provinces. This fact has been brought to the attention of the House time and time again during the present session. We believe that we should build up a nation in this country, that we should not make a special appeal to Englishmen, Irishmen, Scotchmen or Frenchmen, but that we should have a united country. We do not believe that we should quarrel with our French friends of the province of Quebec. We admire them for their many very excellent qualities, and I cannot close these remarks, at this late hour, better than by quoting from a poet living in one of the maritime provinces, who says:

Why stand in angry mood upon the plains of Abraham,
Where fell the young heroic Wolfe, the chivalrous Montcalm;
A cycle has allayed the feud of Briton versus Gaul;
Tho' erst opposed in strife, we're now Canadians one and all.

Mr. MARCOTTE (Champlain). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, at this late hour, and after this protracted debate, it is not my intention to occupy the time of the House at any great length. But I cannot help expressing my surprise at the little progress made in the business of the House. This debate has now been dragging along for about a month, and it strikes me how little benefit we have derived from it.

However, if there is one thing that strikes me more than another, it is this: that, prior to the elections of 1896, the hon. gentlemen opposite claimed that the country was going to the dogs; that it was certainly on the verge of bankruptcy and that, if they came into power, the country would be blessed with universal prosperity; the fires of content would blaze upon the hearthstones and the light of hope illumine every household. Well, Sir, it is true that the country is prosperous, there is no denying it, and we all rejoice in the fact that fortune smiles on us; but that prosperity, after all, is shared in by other nations as well and there seems to be a conspiracy of events to produce that 'boom' in every country under the sun.

Let us now make a brief review of the Conservative policy. From 1890 to 1895, the dark cloud of a panic settled down over the length and breadth of the land; but, as we all know, crises like this are mysterious and unavoidable incidents in the progress of the human race, and thanks to our fiscal policy, thanks to our national policy, we were enabled to weather the storm.

And if we see to-day business improving in all directions; if signs of prosperity are visible on every side; if our imports and exports are steadily going up at such a rapid pace; if the credit of Canada is continually on the ascending scale, and if all these causes tend to diminish the burdens of the people, it is not due to the advent of the Liberals to power, but to the fact that they have maintained the national policy and the sound fiscal system built up by the Conservatives. I said, at the outset, that this debate had been dragging wearily along for about a month; but I may here remark that, in spite of that lengthened discussion, the hon. gentlemen have not yet been persuaded into the belief that they have broken their promises and gone back on their ante-election pledges. These pledges may be summed up under the following different heads: they were to reduce taxation, they promised to cut down the controllable expenditure, and keep it down to the lowest possible point consistent with efficiency; they pledged their word that they would put a stop to the piling up of the public debt; they were to do away with the national policy and protection was to be torn up root and branch; they were going to raise the standard of public morality and to uphold the independence of parliament; they held out to the electors the promise that they would do away with the system of railway bonuses and subsidies; and, finally, their watchword, they said, was to be: honesty, economy and efficiency in the administration of public affairs.

Those were, in brief, the promises held out to the people at the Liberal convention of 1893, and at the elections of 1896. They were most loud in their denunciations of the Conservative government for piling up the public debt. Let us now see how their performances square with their statements. Deeds speaks louder than words. The hon. gentlemen boast that they will carry the constituencies not only in the province of Quebec but throughout the whole country, at the next general elections; but I doubt very much whether an outraged public will feel like condoning the violation of so many pledges and such a betrayal of confidence. Let us compare the debt under both administrations.

In 1892, the debt was $241,131,434, and in 1899, it was $126,273,446. In 1896, the last year of the Conservative administration it was $258,497,432, as against $266,273,446, in 1899, or an increase of $7,776,014. Now, when the hon. gentleman go to the people and ask them for their votes and their suffrages what excuse shall they give them for such a gross breach of faith and for running up in that way the public debt of the country? I think they will cut a very poor figure before the people, and the outraged public will tell them that they are no longer worthy of their confidence. At this late hour, I do not intend to enter at any great length into the discussion of all those statistics, but let me just quote a few for the information of the hon. gentlemen opposite. When in opposition, year in and year out, they never tired of denouncing the extravagance of the Conservatives. When the expenditure was $38,000,000 a year, they claimed that it was a crying shame to squander in that way the people's money, and they pledged their word that, should they come into power, they would cut down the controllable expenditures, they would, they said, put a stop to all that extravagance, they would put a brake upon the reckless manner in which the Conservative party, as they said, had been running up the public expenditure. The present Minister of Justice stated, upon one occasion, that they were even ready to reduce the expenditure by four and even five millions a year. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) and many other gentlemen made similar statements. So did hon. gentlemen who represent the province of Quebec in this House. Now, when they go before the electorate, they will have to tell them, that far from cutting down the public expenditure, and far from putting a stop to that unnecessary drain upon the resources of the country, they have increased the burden of taxation.

Mr. MARCOTTE.

Let us now compare the expenditure under the Conservative government and that under the Liberal regime. From 1887 to 1891, the average annual expenditure was $36,000,000. It was a crying shame, they said, to expend $36,000,000 a year. And should they come into power, they pledged their word that they would reduce the expenditure by six millions a year. Well, the hon. gentlemen have climbed into power, after having fooled the people into the belief that they were pledged to economy, what did they do? They have increased the expenditure, instead of reducing it; they have gone on piling up the debt, and that increase is wholly unwarrantable.

In 1897, the total expenditure was $42,972,000; in 1898, it was $45,000,000, and in 1899, it was $51,542,000, in round figures. Such is the increase in the total expenditure, both on the consolidated fund expenditure and in the expenditure chargeable to capital. I now come to the expenditure per head of the population. In 1898, the per capita taxation was $8.14, as against $9.40 in 1899. That is the way in which the hon. gentlemen opposite have lightened the burden of taxation under which the people were groaning, as they said.

The hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Turcotte) stated on the floor of the House that while in power, the Conservatives had increased the public debt at the rate of $6,563,533 a year, while, under the Liberal regime, the debt had been increased only by $2,503,000 a year. I think I might on very good ground dispute the accuracy of that statement. The hon. gentleman does not fairly state the case, as he does not give credit to the Conservative government for the extraordinary expenditure incurred in connection with great public works. I shall not enter into a review of these works ; but, as the hon. member (Mr. Savard) was formerly a Conservative, he ought to be conversant with the facts of the case, and he cannot plead ignorance of the works carried out by the late government.

Let us now deal with taxation. Taxation was the bugbear they made use of, to frighten the electorate. They never tired, when in opposition, of crying out that the country was being bled white ; that the rate of taxation was exceedingly high, and that if they were returned to power, the load of taxation would be relieved. But, Sir, they forget to tell us that in 1894 the Conservative government considerably reduced the taxes on sugar ; they forget, I say, that the remission of taxation made by the late government exceeded by far all the tariff revisions made by the present government since 1896. The Conservatives also reduced the duties on articles of household necessity such as tea and coffee. We are now being much more heavily taxed for sugar than we were in 1896.

The hon. gentlemen are fond of boasting of their surpluses and they say that the era of deficits has passed. Let me give to the House the figures in that respect. Since confederation, we have had 20 surpluses, and out of that number 17 took place under the Conservative regime and 3 under Liberal rule. During the same period, there were 5 deficits under the Liberal government and 7 under the Conservative regime. The deficits under the Conservative regime are easily explained, if we remember that in 1886, we had to pay out of the revenues of the country $4,800,000 on the North-west rebellion. If we had a deficit in 1894, it is easily accounted for by the remission of taxation on sugar, to the extent of $4,821,000. In the face of the record of the Conservative government the hon. gentlemen will cut a very poor figure, when they go to the country, when the people of this country realize to what extent the hon. gentlemen have gone back on their ante-election pledges, they will come to the conclusion that there is no principle of ethics which justifies individuals or governments in breaking their promises. And as to electorate of the province of Quebec as they are public-spirited and jealous of the honour of their public men, I have no doubt that, when the hon. gentlemen seek their suffrages, they will tell them : 'Gentlemen, you have forfeited the respect and confidence of the people.' and the Conservatives will be returned to power by an immense majority.

The hon. gentlemen are fond of talking of the prosperity of the country, and they say : 'See how Canada has gone forth with leaps and bounds, since our advent to power.' But, Sir, what is the cause of that prosperity ? I heard the hon. gentleman who spoke before me, (Mr. Logan), say that, if the country was so prosperous, it was not due to the fact that the Liberals had maintained undisturbed the national policy. What fiscal changes, I ask, have the hon. gentlemen made since their accession to office ? Have they reduced the tariff ? No, Sir ; or, if they have reduced it, that tariff revision amounts to so little that it is not worth mentioning. The Liberal government dared not to disturb our fiscal system, although, when in opposition, they had boasted that the National policy was to be torn up root and branch, and that they were going to free the people from the slavery of protection. Have they declared war to the knife to protection, as they said they would do ? No, Sir, and when confronted with their past pledges in this respect, the hon. gentlemen indulge in a sarcastic laugh. They know perfectly well that they have fooled the people ; that they have betrayed the trust which the electorate had placed in them. Now, that they enjoy the sweets of power, they are quite willing to maintain that Conservative policy, which has built up our national industries, and which is the cause of the present prosperity of the country.

What are the electors going to say to these gentlemen who had pledged themselves to a policy of economy and retrenchment and who have shamefully betrayed the confidence of the country in that respect ? What are they going to tell those unfaithful servants who had promised that, upon their coming into power, they would relieve the load of taxation, and who instead of redeeming their pledge, have only added to the burdens of the people ? What are the electors going to tell those gentlemen who had so often denounced on the hustings and on the floor of parliament, the national policy, and who had boasted that protection would be torn root and branch and that the country would no longer be bled white by monopolists, and who instead of destroying that policy, have only maintained it, afraid as they were to disturb our fiscal system ? What are they going to say to the people at the next general elections, when confronted with another unfulfilled pledge of theirs, that they would, as soon as they reach power, obtain reciprocity with the United States ? Why, Sir, if there was an atom of self-respect, a scintilla of personal dignity left in their breasts, they would go and hide for very shame, and they would never show their faces before an outraged people.

I now come to another matter which has so largely engrossed the attention of the House, during this debate. I mean the preferential tariff question. That is, no doubt, the most important question which has ever come under our consideration. The government first reduced the duties by 12½ per cent and later on, by 25 per cent.

Mr. SAVARD. (Translation). Would the hon. gentleman say a word about the Manitoba school question ? We are all so anxious to hear from him whether the question is settled or not.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman (Mr. Savard) is very anxious that I should say a word about the Manitoba school question, and to hear from me whether the question is settled or not. Let me refer him to a higher authority in the matter, and I dare say, a man whose word is law in such educational matters; let me refer him, I say, to his lordship the Bishop of Chicoutimi, who will tell him whether the question is settled or not. The Manitoba school question is within the province of our religious authorities, and I do not think he will find fault with me if I refer him to his bishop.

I certainly had no intention of referring to that question now, nor to recall to the hon. gentlemen opposite their past pledges in this respect, and if the hon. gentleman had not interrupted me, I would have remained silent on the matter.

As I said, the preference given to Great Britain under the preferential clause of the tariff was raised from 12½ per 100, to 25 per 100. Now, they are raising it to 33½ per 100. I heard the hon. gentleman who spoke before me state that the mutual trade system, which is being advocated by the leader of the Conservative party, was outside the region of practical politics. Well, Sir, let me tell him this: That, if there is any reliance to be placed on the views given expression to and reiterated by British business men; if, I say, any trust can be reposed in the statements of eminent British statesmen, as Mr. Chamberlain and the Duke of Devonshire and several others who declare that, before long the fiscal policy of Great Britain will undergo a change, I maintain that the proposition of the leader of the opposition is quite practicable. Besides, may we not cherish the hope that, following in the wake of other European motherlands, Great Britain will give a preferential treatment to her colonies in her markets?

Of late, we have made a grand demonstration of sympathy towards the mother country. Never before had the motherland been the object of so much sympathy on the part of her colonies. I trust that Great Britain will follow the example of France, our old mother country, who gives her colonies a preferential treatment in her markets. England would only be following in the wake of Germany and Italy. I do not see why England should not give a preference or an advantage to her colonies, the more so as she knows beyond a doubt, from events that transpired of late, that she may now rely on the aid of her colonies. She knows that her colonies are her best friends and that she may obtain from them her food supplies.

I do not want to detain the House any longer; but before resuming my seat, I may be allowed to recall to the hon. gentlemen opposite one of their past pledges in connection with the necessaries of life. When in opposition, they never tired of speaking about the cutting down of duties on coal oil, and they promised that if they were returned to power, they would considerably reduce the duty on that article. But, what do we see, to-day? The farmers are not blind by any means and they see perfectly well that they have to pay more than they did formerly for that article. The price of coal oil has been enhanced by more than 6 cents a gallon. It sells now for 25 cents a gallon. The electorate realize that they have been deceived, when they see that the duties have been raised on the necessaries of life. The hon. gentlemen boast that they enjoy the confidence of the people. The hon. gentleman who spoke before me stated that the country had put all their confidence in the present government and he was sure that they would be returned to power. But, Sir, we see what is going on in the country and we know that there is a great deal of grumbling and dissatisfaction in the rank and file of the Liberal party. The people know that they have repudiated all their promises and betrayed the confidence reposed in them by the electorate. They know that agricultural products do not fetch a higher price than they did formerly; that the price of hay, for example, is not enhanced, and so it is with all the other products of the farm, although farmers have to pay more for what they buy. And yet the hon. gentlemen had told the people that they would reduce the prices of the necessaries of life; but upon their coming into power, they were so intoxicated with their grandeur or so wrapt in wonder and delighted with their good fortune, after having so long done penance in the cold regions of opposition, that they forgot all their promises, dreaming that they were going to have a perpetual lease of power. As I said, there is great deal of discontent in the rank and file of the party. Besides the electorate are dissatisfied with the enhancement of the prices of the necessaries of life. Moreover, they know that the Liberals deserve no credit for the great prosperity of the country; and that, if we can anticipate a continuation of that prosperity, it is due to the fact that the government have decided not to disturb the Conservative fiscal policy to which that prosperity is due. In the face of all these facts, I cannot help coming to the conclusion that at the next general elections, they are going to be defeated by an overwhelming majority of indignant electors of this country.

Mr. MARCOTTE.

Mr. P. V. SAVARD (Chicoutimi and Saguenay). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate, had not the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, referred to me personally in the course of his speech. The hon. gentleman was surprised at the merriment created in the House by his really amusing speech. The fact is that there was cause for it. He deemed it fit to go out of his way to attack me personally, and I consider that the charge which he has brought against me is one of the most serious charges that can be levelled at a member of this House. He claimed that I had once been a Conservative. There is not a single man in this House who will not agree with me that this is a purely gratuitous imputation, a charge which is not borne out by facts. The hon. member for Champlain represents here, as well as the hon. gentleman from Three Rivers and St. Maurice (Sir Adolphe Caron), the electoral district of Three Rivers. This hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron), who is the leader of that district, can boast, at least of having one soldier behind him; for the battalion of which he has the command consists of but one soldier: the hon. member for Champlain. Let me state here—in order to obviate, for the future, the damnable reiteration of such an unpleasant charge—that I have never been a Conservative, and should the hon. gentleman (Mr. Marcotte), challenge my statement, I would refer him to his leader the member for Three Rivers and St. Maurice (Sir A. P. Caron), who will tell him how matters stand in that respect. It would be impossible for me to refer him to a more reliable witness, seeing that I defeated the hon. gentleman (Sir A. P. Caron) in the county of Chicoutimi and Saguenay, and if my memory serves me right, he was at that time a minister of the Crown, being a member of the cabinet of which Sir John A. Macdonald was the leader. Under the circumstances, as I said, I simply look upon that statement as an outrage. Why, Sir, in the face of such attacks, one would be apt to doubt whether there are any responsible and serious men left in the ranks of the hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. leader of the opposition, (Sir Charles Tupper), is not in his seat, as I see; and, upon my faith, I think it would be a great pity if he understood French, because he could not but have felt ashamed at the disheveled harangue delivered by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Marcotte), who is one of his strongest supporters. I do not think that we have been sent here from the province of Quebec or from the other provinces of the Dominion to listen to such buncombe and nonsense as has fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman ought to be able to realize that nobody here takes any stock in what he may happen to say about the Liberal party or our illustrious leader. He should have understood that I was only joking when I put him a question on the Manitoba school question.

What does he know about the preferential tariff? As to the school question, it is different; he is supposed at least to know something about that issue, as, in the district of Three Rivers from which he comes, the Conservatives have no other plank in their political platform, and that issue is their only stock-in-trade. As I said, what does he know about the preferential tariff? In spite of all the trouble involved in the preparation of such an eloquent speech, the saying about the mountain in travail that brought forth a mouse finds here its application; and it was hardly worth while for him to devote two weeks of his precious time to ransacking the parliament library to produce such a sample of his literary ability. I feel really sorry for him, as he is one of my personal friends, but I cannot help telling him that his literary reputation is sadly compromised in this House. I do not think he has anything to lose in that respect in the province of Quebec where he is well known. I am glad that there are only a few English speaking members in their seats now, who are conversant with the French language and who have understood the drift of his speech; but, as for us, members from the province of Quebec, it was a real humiliation to have to listen to such a speech. And how many weak and insignificant speeches like this have we not had to listen to, in the course of this debate which has been dragging along for over a month and a half! That is certainly not the best way to make progress. The speech of the hon. member for Champlain involves a large expenditure of public money, for the printing alone. It would have been better for him to have kept silent. That speech will not help him in his constituency and it will be no credit to the French Canadians, in the eyes of our fellow-countrymen of English descent.

His favourite topic was coal oil. He told us that at the last elections, we pledged our word to the electors that we would reduce the prices of that commodity, should we be returned to power.

The hon. gentleman would be quite puzzled, should he be asked to explain why the price of coal oil has been enhanced. If he was open to conviction, I might perhaps advise him to obtain information before tackling such a question; but, party spirit is so strong in him that he was no doubt fooled into the belief that Sir Wilfrid Laurier is responsible for the increase that has taken place in the price of coal oil, since his advent to power.

He further stated that the Liberal party had repudiated and gone back on all their pledges. Well, Sir, whatever may be said about those broken promises, I think I may safely venture to say that there is, at least, one promise which they will redeem—and I for one, though I am but a private soldier in the party, I here pledge my word to it—and it is this: that in the interest of the Dominion, the Liberal party shall remain in power and the Conservative party in the opposition.

The hon. gentleman told us that, since the Liberals have come into power, agricultural products have depreciated in price. The hon. gentleman should not have approached such a topic and it would have been better for him, had he confined his remarks to coal oil. Fortunately for the country and for the House, nobody takes any stock in his statements. At all events, even supposing that such evils as he has described really existed, what he has said about coal oil will hardly constitute a balm for the wounds and sores of the poor ratepayers of this country over whose fate he has wept so copiously, and shed so many crocodile tears.

The hon. gentleman claims that the price of agricultural products has gone down, while everybody, farmers and traders as well, know that never did the products of the farm fetch a higher price than they do now. As a matter of fact, there is such an activity in the home market, that they find it impossible to fill up all the orders. The member for Champlain did not say anything about cheese and butter, although these are staple articles which prove a source of untold wealth to the farming community. Dairying is one of our most flourishing industries. I know, from my own experience, having visited the county of Champlain, that there are first class cheese and butter factories in that county. Now, I say that if that industry is going up by leaps and bounds, the credit for it must be given to the Liberal government who now rules the province of Quebec, a government who has at heart the welfare of the people and the prosperity of our farming community.

Cheese which sold, a few years ago, from 6½ to 7 or 8 cents a pound sells now for 10, 11 and 12 cents a pound. Butter, which, a few years ago, fetched 14, 15 or 16 cents a pound, now sells for 21, 22 and as high as 25 cents a pound. Those are products which we can export abroad, and which, in fact we do export to England and other countries, and why, Sir? Because we have in the different provinces of the Dominion Liberal governments, patriotic governments, who have at heart the welfare and prosperity of the farming community.

Several other industries have sprung up as if by magic, since the advent of the present government to power. There is the pulp industry which has such a bright future before it, thanks to our magnificent water-powers, which have improved in value and importance in the eyes of foreign capitalists, oats are now finding a ready sale in the spirit of enterprise displayed by the statesmen at the head of affairs in our provinces. Agricultural products, such as hay and oats are now finding a ready sale in the country for the needs of local consummation, and this, owing to the extraordinary development which the wood pulp industry has taken. The credit of all this should be given to the Liberal governments who are now ruling here and in Quebec, and who, by their wise and progressive policy, have taken the proper steps for promoting the interests of the country.

Mr. SAVARD.

The hon. member for Champlain does not realize the progress achieved by the country. He still has to learn that we need no longer export our hay and oats abroad, as those products find a home market in Canada, for the wants of local consumption. Before the next elections come off, he will, no doubt, have succeeded in forming an idea of the progress and development achieved in the part of the country where he lives; and, for his information, I would advise him to visit the pulp-mills at Grand-Mère. He will see there a town which has sprung up as if by enchantment. He will find there shanties of considerable magnitude which have opened under the impetus given to the pulp industry; and the farmers of his constituency, who are benefited by the progress realized in that part of the country, will not fail to give him proper information as to the economical revolution and the progress made, since the Conservatives were turned out.

Farmers can now get for their butter and cheese much more remunerative prices than they used to obtain for them formerly, and they give proper credit to the government for this boom. Therefore, at the next general elections, they will not fail to show their confidence in the government as they have invariably done at each by-election, by returning them to power.

At this late hour, and at this advanced stage of the debate, Sir, I do not wish to detain the House any longer. While I am on my feet, I wish to give expression to an earnest prayer, and I think I am but echoing the views of the great majority of the electorate of this country, when I express the hope that the present government may long remain at the head of affairs, under the able leadership of the Prime Minister, so that they may continue the beneficent policy which has been instrumental in fostering the progress and development of Canada.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Before the vote is taken, Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a few words, not for the purpose of dealing with the general question under discussion, but bearing on a point of difference of a personal character which arose at an earlier stage of the debate, between the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and myself. It may be remembered that in the budget speech I referred with satisfaction to the great enterprise which is being established at Sydney, Cape Breton, for the manufacture of iron and steel. I referred to it, not so much in connection with any part I had in the legislation at Ottawa touching that question, for on that I did not dwell for a moment, but I had special reference to earlier movements with which I was connected in the provincial legislature, in which the foundation of that great enterprise was laid. I referred to the fact that some years ago, when I had the honour of being Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, my colleagues and I agreed upon a measure which we believed was for the promotion of the coal interests of that province, and under which there was organized the Dominion Coal Company. I pointed out that measure was bitterly opposed by the Conservative party in the legislature of Nova Scotia. I pointed out that that opposition was not confined to the provincial parliament, but that it was carried forward to Ottawa, and that a number of hon. gentlemen formed a procession which marched to the office of the Governor General, and asked him to save the province of Nova Scotia from the disasters which they said were threatened by that proposed measure. I then pointed out that the same men who were brought into Nova Scotia by that legislation, the same men who created the Dominion Coal Company, were the very men who were promoting that great enterprise for the manufacture of iron and steel, and that the new enterprise was the direct outcome of the earlier one I was able to refer with pride and satisfaction to the fact that that enterprise, so bitterly opposed by the Conservative party, had not only been advantageous with regard to the development of the coal industry, but that it was the means of promoting this other great industry with which all are so familiar. Speaking later, the hon. the leader of the opposition did not touch upon the main point of my remarks, which were in relation to the organization of the Dominion Coal Company, but he did refer to legislation which had taken place in Ottawa, and in the course of his speech he made some statements to which I took exception. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), stated that when the promoters of this great enterprise came to the government of Canada for assistance, they were met by me with a point-blank refusal and were sent away discouraged. I asked the hon. gentlemen to give me his authority, and he answered very promptly that he obtained his information from Mr. Graham Fraser, of the New Glasgow Steel Company, and from Mr. Henry M. Whitney, of the Dominion Coal Company. Mr. Graham Fraser is out of the Dominion I understand, but inasmuch as there were no negotiations between the government and Mr. Graham Fraser it is utterly impossible that Mr. Fraser could ever have authorized such a statement. However, I attach more importance to what was said respecting the other gentleman. There were negotiations with Mr. Henry M. Whitney, the president and one of the promoters of this great enterprise. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition stated in this House that Mr. Whitney told him that when he approached me on that question he was met with an absolute refusal. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), gave it to be understood that it was not until a later date, when he himself took up the matter, that this enterprise was aided by the government at all. I addressed to Mr. W. B. Ross, of Halifax, the solicitor for Mr. Whitney, through whom most of the negotiations took place, the following telegram :

Ottawa, March 30, 1900.

W. B. Ross, Q.C.,
Halifax, N.S.

Sir Charles Tupper stated in the House of Commons this afternoon that Mr. Whitney went to him at Sydney, summer before last, and told him that he, Whitney, had applied to the government for an extension of the iron bounties, and had met with an absolute refusal. The negotiations were chiefly with you as Whitney's agent. What have you to say to Sir Charles Tupper's statements?

(Signed) W. S. FIELDING.

To this telegram I received the following reply :

Halifax, N.S., April 2, 1900.

Hon. W. S. Fielding,
Ottawa.

Have just received your telegram of March 30, having been in the country on a holiday. H. M. Whitney's first and only representations and suggestions to the government of Canada, in respect to the iron bounties, were made through me, or by Mr. Whitney after consultation with me. I know that the government never, at any stage, refused to consider the question of extending the bounties, nor did any member of the government, after the matter was first presented to the government. Information was repeatedly asked for, and eventually legislation was enacted. Sir Charles Tupper had no more to do in the matter than any other member of the opposition.

W. B. ROSS.

I also addressed the following letter to Mr. Whitney :

Ottawa, April 4, 1900.

Dear Mr. Whitney,—I desire to call your attention to a statement made on Friday last in the Canadian House of Commons, by Sir Charles Tupper, in the course of some remarks respecting the new iron and steel works at Sydney. After mentioning your own name and that of Mr. Graham Fraser of New Glasgow, as gentlemen interested in the iron and steel industry, Sir Charles proceeded as follows :

'They came to my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), and they implored him to extend that measure of assistance necessary for the inauguration of a great enterprise of that kind. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), gave them an absolute, palpable refusal to do anything, and they went home utterly discouraged.'

Continuing, Sir Charles said :

'Whatever the cause was I was informed by the gentlemen that they had met with an absolute refusal.

'The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding), Who were these gentlemen? Who were the gentlemen who made that statement to the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper)?

' Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What statement ?

' The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The statement that he has just made. My hon. friend says they had met with an absolute refusal. I wish to know who 'they' were ?

' Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no hesitation in saying that statement was from Mr. Whitney and Mr. Graham Fraser. It was from the representatives of the Dominion Coal Company and the New Glasgow Steel Company.

' The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What time ?

' Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When I visited my constituents the summer before last, after they had been here and met with an absolute refusal from my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding)'

The quotations I have made are from the notes of the official stenographers of the House of Commons.

Before making any comment on the remarks of Sir Charles Tupper, I think I ought to call your attention to the statement which he has attributed to you in relation to what passed between you and me, with respect to the desired legislation on the subject of the bounties.

Yours faithfully,
(Signed) W. S. FIELDING.

Henry M. Whitney, Esq.,
95 Milk Street, Boston, Mass.

To these I have received the following replies :

(Telegram.)

New York, N.Y., April 10, 1900.

Hon. W. S. Fielding,
Ottawa.

Letter 4th, just received. So far as I am concerned, Sir Charles is in error. Have written you and him.

H. M. WHITNEY.

25 East Sixtieth Street,
New York, April 10, 1900.

Dear Mr. Fielding,—I received your letter of the 4th, only last evening, too late to reply to it yesterday. I have written Sir Charles, and herewith inclose a copy of my letter.

Trusting that this will suffice to set the matter right so far as I am concerned, I remain,

Very truly yours,
(Signed) H. M. WHITNEY.

25 East Sixtieth Street,
New York, April 9, 1900.

My dear Sir Charles,—My attention has been called to a statement made by you in the House of Commons, that 'summer before last' at the time you were visiting your constituency in Cape Breton, I had stated to you that in company with Mr. Graham Fraser, I had implored Mr. Fielding for the necessary assistance for the inauguration of a great enterprise—meaning the iron and steel works at Sydney—and that he gave us an 'absolute, palpable refusal to do anything,' and that we went home 'utterly discouraged.'

Now, this is a mistake, so far as I am concerned, and I feel it my duty to you, and to Mr. Fielding, to set the matter right. At the time referred to I had no interest in the iron and steel business. I did not visit Ottawa in company with Mr. Fraser, and do not now remember having spoken to Mr. Fielding about the matter until the following winter or spring. I do remember discussing the subject with you at the time you mention. We talked of the desirability of establishing an iron and steel industry at Sydney, and the probability of receiving government aid. But I was not concerned in the application to Mr. Fielding until after that time. And it is but simple justice to Mr. Fielding to say that from the moment of my first presentation of this subject to him it has received his hearty encouragement and unvarying support.

Mr. FIELDING.

Very truly yours,
(Signed) H. M. WHITNEY.

House divided on amendment of Sir Charles Tupper :

YEAS :

Messieurs

Beattie,	LaRivière,
Bell (Addington),	Macdonald (King's),
Bell (Picou),	MacLaren,
Bergeron,	McAlister,
Broder,	McCleary,
Cargill,	McDougall,
Caron (Sir Adolphe),	McInerney,
Carscallen,	McLennan (Glengarry),
Casgrain,	Martin,
Clancy,	Mills,
Clarke,	Moore,
Cochrane,	Morin,
Davin,	Osler,
Dugas,	Pope,
Earle,	Prior,
Foster,	Quinn,
Ganong,	Roche,
Gillies,	Sproule,
Gilmour,	Taylor,
Guillet,	Tupper (Sir Charles
Haggart,	Hibbert),
Henderson,	Tyrwhitt,
Hedgins,	Wallace, and
Ingram,	Wilson.—48.
Kaulbach,

NAYS :

Messieurs

Archambault,	Lang,
Bazinet,	Laurier (Sir Wilfrid),
Beith,	Lavergne,
Bell (Prince),	Lemieux,
Bernier,	Livingston,
Blair,	Logan,
Borden (King's),	Macdonald (Huron),
Bourassa,	Macdonell,
Bourbonnais,	Mackie,
Britton,	McClure,
Brown,	McGugan,
Bruneau,	McHugh,
Burnett,	McIsaac,
Salvert,	McLellan,
Campbell,	McLennan (Inverness),
Carroll,	McMillan,
Casey,	McMullen,
Champagne,	Madore,
Comstock,	Malouin,
Copp,	Marci,
Costigan,	Meigs,
Cowan,	Mignault,
Davies (Sir Louis),	Monet,
Demers,	Morrison,
Desmarais,	Mulock,
Dupré,	Parmalee,
Edwards,	Paterson,
Ellis,	Pettet,
Ethier,	Préfontaine,
Featherston,	Proulx,
Fielding,	Puttee,
Fisher,	Ratz,
Fitzpatrick,	Richardson,
Flint,	Rogers,
Fortier,	Rosa,

Fraser (Lambton), Gauvreau, Geoffrion, Harwood, Heyd, Holmes, Hutchison, Johnston, Joly de Lotbinière (Sir Henri),	Rutherford, Savard, Semple, Somerville, Stenson, Stubbs, Sutherland, Tucker, and Turcot.—88.
---	--

PAIRS :

Ministerial.	Opposition.
Christie,	Roddick,
Gibson,	Corby,
Cartwright (Sir Rich'd),	Tupper (Sir Charles),
MacPherson,	Rosamond,
Charlton,	Tisdale,
Snetsinger,	Reid,
Davis,	Hale,
Scriver,	McCormick,
Frost,	Klock,
Fenny,	Bennett,
Wood,	McNeill,
Fraser (Guysborough),	Monk,
Landerkin,	Poupore,
Lewis,	Robertson,
Hurley,	Craig,
Angers,	McIntosh,
Tolmie,	Montague,
Dobell,	Ferguson,
Sifton,	Maclean,
Talbot,	Kleppfer,
Brodeur,	Hughes,
Tarte,	Powell,
Fortin,	Chauvin,
Russell,	Borden (Halifax),
McGregor,	Seagram,
Maxwell,	Robinson,
Domville,	Kendry,
Dechêne.	Marcotte.

Mr. MARCOTTE. I ask that my name be struck off. I have just been reminded that I am paired with the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Dechêne).

Amendment negatived, motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). At this late hour, we do not propose to proceed with the resolutions. I, therefore, move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, committee rose and reported progress.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the First Minister what the order of business will be for this afternoon?

The PRIME MINISTER. We will take up Bills.

Mr. FOSTER. No supply?

The PRIME MINISTER. I think the whole time will be consumed with Bills; but, if not, of course we will take up supply.

Some hon. MEMBERS. What Bills?

The PRIME MINISTER. All the Bills on the Order paper.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1.20 a.m. Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, May 4, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 148)—from the Senate—respecting the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company.—(Mr. McAlister.)

Bill (No. 149) respecting inscribed stock of Canada in the United Kingdom.—(Mr. Fielding.)

COLD STORAGE ON STEAMSHIPS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier (for the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Fisher), moved that on Tuesday next the House resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to enter into contracts with H. & A. Allan and Robert Redford & Co., to provide cold storage on steamships from Montreal to the United Kingdom, during the seasons of 1900 and 1901, on such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council deems expedient, the sum to be paid for such cold storage not to exceed $28,750 in one year.

Motion agreed to.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Before the Orders of the Day are taken up, I want again to raise my voice with reference to these returns. I have not yet got from the Minister of Railways and Canals the emendations of return No. 74, the defects in which I have now three times explained in the House. I got yesterday what purports to be a return showing all regulations passed with respect to the sale of liquor in the military canteens since 1890, denoting those now in force, and all correspondence with the Militia Department, or any of its offices, since 1896, in relation to the carrying out of the existing regulations at the military camps. There is almost absolutely no correspondence except simply the official correspondence, and I know that there are pages and pages and pages of it, and the minister alluded to it in the House last session in part. So that, this return is of no use at all for the purposes for which it was intended.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I will find out if there are any other letters.

Mr. FOSTER. I intended to ask the Prime Minister, and I think I did—I may be mistaken—not only for the petitions with reference to representation in the Yukon Territory, but for the correspondence. Only the petitions have been brought down.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My impression is that I brought down everything there was in the Privy Council, but I will look into it again.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). What return does the hon. gentleman allude to when he speaks of No. 74?

Mr. FOSTER. It was brought down on March 20, 1900. It was about tenders and agreements for the supply of steel rails.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman will find that the return is absolutely complete, and an entire compliance with his motion.

Mr. FOSTER. I have already made my reference to it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I brought the attention of my department to it, and they tell me unhesitatingly that it is a full return.

Mr. FOSTER. What I asked for was: 'Detailing quantities and price, dates, places of delivering and quantities delivered from July 1, 1896, to date.'

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is all there.

Mr. FOSTER. What I cannot find in this return is the dates and several quantities which were delivered. I find the whole quantity delivered.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman did not move for any return of the several quantities or the several dates of their delivery. He asked for the date when delivery was to be made; he has got that. He asked for the quantities delivered; he has got that in the whole. If he wants any more detailed return, let him move for it, and I will furnish it; but, he cannot complain that the return is not complete, for it is.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think that that can be called an answer by the hon. minister, simply bringing down the gross sum delivered, because the delivery of rails took place from time to time, and I want the date of these deliveries and the weight of the rails delivered at each date.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Then the hon. gentleman ought to have asked for it.

Mr. FOSTER. I did.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I beg your pardon.

Mr. FOSTER. There is not the least doubt about that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is not the least doubt that the hon. gentleman did not.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. minister's appreciation of it may be little more keen than he now gives the House to think it is. Then I asked for a return giving the correspondence relating to the admission of the United States to coasting privileges on Canadian lakes in 1899. I am certain that all the representations made by the board of trade in Toronto, and the shipping interests and various other bodies, must be in the department, and none of those have been brought down.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

The PRIME MINISTER. I know what my hon. friend means, and they will be brought down.

Mr. FOSTER. I want the correspondence as well as the petition. I would like the attention of the hon. Postmaster General for a minute. I asked for correspondence relating to the mail service between Woodhall Cape and Woodhall, but it should have been Hillsborough. The error is mine. If my hon. friend will take that as the order of the House and bring down the correspondence, I would be much obliged.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Certainly.

Mr. DAVIN. I hope the right hon. gentleman will not think me too persistent, but I would like to remind him of a return which is now the last of mine—

The PRIME MINISTER. About tea?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is being looked after.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). There is a small matter of privilege, to which I wish to refer. I saw in the Citizen this morning, the following report of what took place at the Public Accounts Committee:

Mr. Gordon, formerly connected with the government, explained the circumstances under which an advance was made on account of the printing of laws. Mr. Davin asked for an advance before the work was completed, and it was made.

I am quite sure that this is a mistake in the report, and am perfectly certain that Mr. Borden could not have said it. It is not a matter of any importance to the essence of the question inquired into, but the fact is that Mr. Davin did not ask for any advance.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—CANADIANS DEAD AND WOUNDED.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I desire to read two telegrams received from South Africa:

(Sir Alfred Milner to Lord Minto.)

Cape Town, May 2, 1900.

7165, Pte. H. Barr, Royal Canadian Regiment, died of enteric fever, April 30, Bloemfontein, and 255, Gunner E. Picot, 'D' Battery, Canadian Artillery, died of enteric fever at DeAar to-day.

(Sd.) MILNER.

88447.

(From O. C. Militia to Deputy Minister.)

Headquarters, May 4, 1900.

The O. C. the Second (special service) Batt., R.C.R., reports this day from Bloemfontein the death on the 2nd instant of No. 7068, Pte. B. Liston, 90th Winnipeg Rifles.

(Sd.) M. AYLNER, Colonel, Commanding Militia.

I. C. R.—SYDNEY BOARD OF TRADE REPRESENTATIONS.

Mr. H. F. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways, whether he has received, within the last few days, a communication from the Board of Trade of Sydney, on the subject of the Intercolonial Railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Yes, within the last two days.

Mr. McDOUGALL. May I ask whether the hon. gentleman has matured any plan for proceeding to carry out the request of the board of trade?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have told the hon. gentleman that plans have been in process of maturing for a long time.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The people are suffering for a long time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think it would be possible to mature plans on so large a subject at once. We are maturing them from time to time, and are making progress from time to time, and I think that matters are progressing very favourably towards satisfactory arrangements in the interests of the trade and business of that locality.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. A. MARTIN (East Queen's). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to remind the hon. Minister of Railways, that an order of the House was passed on February 7, for copies and specifications, plans and tenders received, and contracts entered into by the government, relating to the construction of ten miles of railway known as the Belfast and Murray Harbour Railway, in the province of Prince Edward Island. Also on February 7, an order of the House was passed, for copies of all correspondence, telegrams, memorandums and all papers in the hands of the government, or any member, or official thereof, relating to the admission of Newfoundland into the confederation of Canada. Also for copies of all correspondence, specifications, plans, tenders received, and contract, or contracts entered into by or on behalf of, the government, relating to the straightening of about two miles of the Prince Edward Island Railway, at Colwell?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The papers the hon. gentleman refers to in his first question, were received yesterday or the day before, and will be ready on Monday, without doubt.

CONDITIONAL LIBERATION OF PENITENTIARY CONVICTS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the third reading of Bill (No. 89), from the Senate, to amend an Act to provide for the conditional liberation of penitentiary convicts. He said: In moving the third reading of this Bill, I will endeavour to give to the House certain information asked of me when the Bill was last before us. I was asked to give information upon two subjects. The first was as to the particular procedure followed by the Department of Justice in the granting of this ticket of leave. I am informed by the Department of Justice that the procedure adopted by them is as follows: When a petition is received for the pardoning of a convict or the granting of a ticket of leave, the matter is referred at once to the warden of the penitentiary and afterwards to the judge who tried the case. The warden of the penitentiary is asked to report the following particulars as to the prisoner—name of judge who tried the convict, and the date and place of trial; the crime committed; the sentence; the convict's age; a report as to the conduct of the convict and the remission he has earned; report as to illness in cases where illness is given as a reason for pardon; previous conviction, if any. Upon the receipt of this information, all the papers, including the warden's report, are sent to the convicting judge, who gives a full report upon the case, giving the details of the crime and any special reason why the particular sentence passed was imposed. When the minister has received this information from the warden and from the judge, he reaches his own conclusion whether or not the petition should be granted or whether it should be granted in modified form, for instance—if release is asked, whether it should be a release entirely or release upon ticket of leave. The minister having made his report, it is sent to the Governor General for his approbation.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the same procedure followed in provincial institutions?

The PRIME MINISTER. I was about to come to that. The next question I was asked, was whether the pardoning power resided in the provincial or the Dominion authorities. I think my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) put that question. The information I have from the Department of Justice is that the pardon for all offences against the criminal law undoubtedly lies with the Governor General, that is, with the Dominion authorities; but that the pardon for all offences against provincial statutes rests with the Lieutenant Governor, that is, with the provincial authorities. In no case do we pretend to interfere with a sentence imposed for offences committed against provincial law; we deal only with offences against Dominion law. Now, there are certain classes of offences which, though they are formally known as felonies, are not always punished by a penitentiary sentence. Some convicts may be sent to prisons, or even to reformatories; but it is only with the classes of offences that come under the Criminal Code that we deal and no others. Now, an account of the manner in which the Act has so far been administered has been furnished me by the Minister of Justice. There have been received altogether 202 applications for ticket of leave, most of them being applications for clemency with a request for ticket of leave as an alternative in case unconditional pardon were refused. Thirty licenses, or tickets of leave, have been granted out of 202 applications, have been issued since the Act went into operation, three of which have been revoked, because the holders failed to observe the conditions as to reporting to the police authorities. No tickets of leave have been issued to persons previously convicted, and only where the convict's conduct in the penitentiary has been reported 'very good.'

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). May I ask the right hon. Premier if there is any time for which a prisoner must be incarcerated before an application for ticket of leave would be considered. Or, would it be proper at any time—say immediately after sentence?

The PRIME MINISTER. I could not give information on this point without referring to the Act, which I have not, at the moment, before me.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

N. W. REBELLION—LAND GRANTS TO MEMBERS OF MILITIA FORCE.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved the second reading of Bill (No. 107) to make further provision respecting grants of land to members of the militia force on active service in the North-west.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Before this motion is carried, I wish to say a word or two. I am very glad that my hon. friend the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) has brought forward this measure, because there are certain parties in the west who were and are entitled, in respect of their services, to the benefits of the legislation, the benevolent and grateful legislation referred to in this Act, but who have allowed the time within which they could have availed themselves of them to pass; and I think it is quite fitting and right that this parliament should give these people an opportunity, within a reasonable time, to avail themselves of the privileges provided for in the existing law. I cordially support the measure.

Mr. JAMES SUTHERLAND (North Oxford). My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) is quite right. Though the time has been extended, from time to time, within which the parties entitled to land under this Act should apply for it, it is discovered that there are a few warrants which have been located, and it is thought fitting to extend the time for another year, so that parties holding these warrants may take advantage of the Act.

Mr. GEORGE E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). This may be very clear to my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and to the acting minister, but I must confess it is Greek to me—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I shall be glad to explain to my hon. friend (Mr. Foster). As no explanation was asked, I thought the matter was generally understood. By chapter 73 of the statutes of 1885, with which every member of the House is probably familiar, grants of land were authorized to members of the militia force who took an active part in the suppression of the North-west rebellion. This land was granted by the Minister of the Interior on a warrant issued by the Militia Department. The time within which the land might be located, I believe, was first fixed at the 31st of December, 1886. From time to time it has been found that parties who were entitled to these warrants, and to whom they had been granted, had not found it convenient to locate the lands to which they were entitled. As I have already stated, it is still found that a few of these warrants are in existence, and the parties intimated that they wished to avail themselves of their right to locate the land. It is thought desirable that this privilege should be granted during the current year.

Mr. FOSTER. How many of these warrants have been issued already, or how many of the holders of them have located land, and what quantity of land have they taken.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am unable to inform my hon. friend as to how many have taken advantage of locating lands to whom warrants have been granted, but I would be pleased to make inquiry from the department.

Mr. FOSTER. How much land was granted to them?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Two sections, I think, originally under the Act.

Mr. FOSTER. How many are eligible now to take this advantage?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The report says a few warrants, it does not give the number. The time has been extended from 1886 to the end of 1899, and this is extending it for the current year, on information from the department that there are still a few warrants in existence.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, considered in committee, and reported.

GAS INSPECTION.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 78) to amend the Gas Inspection Act. He said: As the law now stands, every undertaker, that is every man who furnishes gas, is bound to keep the public informed of the purity of the gas supplied by him. It is stated here how many times and at what periods the certificate showing the degree of purity must be posted up, and this is in proportion to the number of meters. It would tend to the security of the public if the analyses were more frequently made, and would tend to secure greater purity in gas. The main object is simply to increase the number of times when these analyses are to be made and the certificates are to be given.

Mr. FOSTER. Has there been an abuse?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No, only we find that it is desirable to keep the public au fait of the quality of the gas, and to keep posted up in the office of the company the number of analyses that have been made. As the law stands now a gas factory having 4,000 consumers has to procure a certificate once a week; we leave that to stand as it is. Factories having less than 4,000 and more than 3,000 meters, have to procure certificates once in two weeks; and those having less than three and more than 2,000 meters, once a month, and we propose to change that and make it once in two weeks, with the object of increasing the security of the public by ascertaining more often the degree of purity of the gas. It will not increase in any way the expense.

Mr. FOSTER. I want a little more light on this subject. What do these men who take care of dead bodies use so much gas for.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. They are not members of parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. I know, but what is the difficulty? There is something opened up here that I do not understand.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not like that word 'undertaker,' but I find it in the old law, passed so many years ago that I can scarcely be answerable for it. It refers to the gas company who undertakes to enlighten the public.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to have the definition of 'undertaker.'

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There are so many different kinds of undertakers, that I do not know how to define them. This one means a gas company.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the interpretation clause, what is the definition of 'undertaker'?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. 'Undertaker' means any company or person undertaking to furnish gas to any other person. I have followed the excellent advice my hon. friend gave some time ago, and that is, as we have so often to amend our different departmental Acts, to recite the whole clause again instead of merely putting in a word here and there. I have taken out the whole of that clause 36 in the old Act, and have replaced it as now amended in this. But there is one slight correction that has to be made in the Bill as we have introduced it. The Bill says that undertakers having less than 4,000 and more than 3,000 meters shall have an inspection once in two weeks. Those words 'less than' ought not to be there, because it does not provide for those who have 4,000. I want to strike out those words 'less than' whenever they occur.

Mr. J. G. HAGGART (South Lanark). Will the hon. minister please explain what benefit it is to the general public that the quality of the gas shall be published in the gas company's office?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is merely a detail putting it up in the gas company's office. We want to have the analyses more frequent and the result published, that is all.

Mr. HAGGART. If the gas company are supplying a bad quality of gas, if it is sulphuretted, or anything else, does the hon. minister take precautions, on behalf of the general public, to see that the gas company furnish a better quality of gas?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We make an analyses of the quality of the gas for the protection of those who make use of the gas.

Mr. HAGGART. If it is only published in the gas company's office, the users of gas will never know what the result is.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We cannot send around to every one of the shareholders of the gas company a statement of the quality of the gas. If they are willing to take the trouble they can go to the gas company's office and see the statement.

Mr. HAGGART. It is not the shareholders that I am concerned about, but the general public who use gas.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I mean the consumers.

Mr. HAGGART. There should be some way in which the public could have notice as to the quality of the material that is being supplied to them other than by putting it up in the gas company's office.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). I want to ask a question in regard to these certificates. I see that they are to be procured from the inspector according to the number of meters. Is there a fee attached?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It will not increase, in any way the cost, because the present Act allows the Governor General in Council to fix the fees, and of course, they will be reduced so as not to increase the present cost.

Mr. BRITTON. Another question. Are these inspectors paid by fees according to their services or are they paid salaries?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. They are paid salaries.

Mr. McMILLAN. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue what is the law in regard to the inspection of electric light.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We have an inspector of electric light who inspects electric meters, but I am not prepared to say that the same precautions will be taken in regard to electric light as those that were taken so many years ago in regard to gas light. In 1886 the Act that I am amending now was passed. In those days the use of electric light had not become as general as it is now. I am not able to say that the companies furnishing electric light post up such a notice as is to be put up in the gas companies' offices, but, we have inspectors of electric light who inspect in the same manner as gas is inspected.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT—GRADE FOR FLAX SEED.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 79) to amend the General Inspection Act, so as to provide a grade for flax seed. He said: The production of flax seed in Manitoba has so considerably increased, and has assumed such proportions that the establishment of standard grades has become a necessity. I have here a report of the Board of Trade of Winnipeg which recommends strongly the establishment of these standard grades, giving, at the same time, details which we have adopted in the Bill. Last year, I may say, over 300,000 bushels of flax seed were purchased in the province of Manitoba. The Bill contains the recommendations that have been made by the Board of Trade of Winnipeg.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time; and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

Mr. HAGGART.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. By looking over the recommendations of the Board of Trade of Winnipeg, I find that we have to add a few words to the Bill as it has been prepared, and, Mr. Chairman, I now hand the Bill to you with these few words added. I would ask that the words 'not less than fifty-three pounds' be inserted in the eleventh line of section one.

Mr. HAGGART. How many pounds to the bushel are necessary for the first quality?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Fifty-three pounds.

Mr. HAGGART. And the second quality?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Fifty pounds.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) moved second reading of Bill (No. 110) to amend the Weights and Measures Act.

He said: I draw the special attention of hon. gentlemen to this Bill. Previous to the last session of parliament there was some uncertainty as to the exact size of apple barrels, and a Bill was passed here so as to remove doubt and fixing the exact size of the barrel. Since then, the legislature of New York State have passed a law fixing the standard apple barrel at a size much smaller than ours. I have received a number of petitions—some through the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden)—all from Nova Scotia, pointing out the difficulties which the apple-growers of that province labour under, in the circumstances. I conclude that the apple-growers in the other provinces have not been notified, and they, perhaps, may not know the change which is now proposed. In view of that, I propose to proceed no further than the second reading of this Bill until we obtain the opinions of the horticulturists and apple-growers of Quebec and Ontario. One of the numerous petitions which we have received from the apple-growers of Nova Scotia will show the nature of the complaint made. It says:

At a public meeting of farmers and fruit-growers of King's County, N.S., held at Kentville, on March 10, A.D. 1900, called to consider and discuss the question of a standard barrel, it was, upon consideration of the report of a committee appointed to investigate the matter, unanimously resolved as follows:

Whereas, the farmers and fruit-growers of this county are large producers of apples, potatoes and other like products, which they export in competition with the state of New York and the New England states to the markets of Great Britain and the West Indies, and

Whereas, the National Fruit-Growers Association and the National League of Commission Merchants of the United States have adopted and agreed to use only a standard barrel of a capacity of 100 quarts, United States dry measure, which barrel has been legalized in the state of New York and adopted in the New England states, and

Whereas, the apple barrel legalized during last session of parliament is of a larger capacity by seven quarts than the barrel now in use by our competitors, a circumstance which we look upon with much apprehension and alarm, because it will entail an annual loss of from $30,000 to $40,000 on apple products alone to the farmers of this county.

They ask that our standard apple barrel be made similar in size to the legal standard in New York and the northern states. The United States apple barrel contains seven quarts less than our legal standard barrel, and the growers of Nova Scotia have naturally come to the conclusion that when they come into competition with the American apples in England that they will not get a higher price for their larger barrel. The matter is worthy of the consideration of the apple growers in Ontario and Quebec, and I would, therefore, not propose to make a change in the law until we hear from them what their opinions are.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHN McMILLAN (South Huron). Last year I brought before the House a short Bill with respect to the sale of eggs, and I would ask the minister to incorporate it this year in his amendment to the Weights and Measures Act. My Bill is very short and simply proposes:

Between the buyer and the seller eggs shall be sold by weight and the weight equivalent of a dozen shall be one pound and one-half.

The egg industry is growing steadily, and there is often friction between buyers and sellers living at a distance in Canada, and also between sellers in Canada and buyers in the old country in respect to transactions in eggs. In England the standard weight for a dozen of eggs is one and a half pounds to the dozen, but in Canada we have no standard. This Bill is not intended to interfere with local sales, although, perhaps, if it did it would be all the better. I quote the following article from the Montreal Witness, which, I believe, expresses the general feeling prevailing throughout the country:

Selling Eggs by Weight.

Mr. John McMillan, M.P., has introduced a Bill into the Dominion parliament to provide that eggs shall be sold by weight and not by count. The object of this measure is to regulate the trade in eggs between Canada and Great Britain. As it is, contracts are frequently made on a large scale at so much per dozen. Under the present plan there is no encouragement to the farmer to keep hens which lay large eggs.

Large eggs are certainly worth more money than small ones, and the man who produces them should get more money for them. The defect in Mr. McMillan's Bill is that it does not apply to the local trade in eggs in Canada. This should be corrected before the Bill passes, which no doubt it will. Nothing would so directly tend to the improvement of poultry as a law of this kind. Mongrel and ill-bred fowls cannot lay eggs of respectable size. So long as it does not matter whether eggs are large or small, indifference will prevail as to the breeding of superior poultry. But once have a law applicable both to the home and foreign trade, and farmers will at once begin to inquire for the breeds of hens that lay large eggs. Poultry men and poultry societies should use all their influence to get a law of this kind passed. It is not only essentially just, but will tend to promote the interests of all.

I was somewhat unwilling that this Bill should apply to local buyers and sellers, and I thought, perhaps the change would be too much to make at once, but I must say that I have found no objections in the country to the Bill being extended so as to include all transactions in eggs. In the interests of the egg trade, it is, in my opinion, well that we should have an egg standard between buyers and sellers living at a distance in Canada, as well as between buyers and sellers in Canada and England. I think we should have a standard in this country to correspond with the English standard, and I ask the minister to incorporate this amendment in Bill No. 110, as it will save the trouble of passing two Bills.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There are three different Bills that have been introduced for the purpose of amending the Weights and Measures Act. This one of them, refers to the weight of eggs; another refers to the size of fish barrels; and the third refers to the packing of fish. When we go into committee on this Bill, the hon. gentlemen who have those Bills in charge, might introduce them as amendments, and they could then be considered in all their details. Therefore, I would ask that the Bill be now allowed to pass its second reading, and I would postpone the committee stage, in order to give time to all parties interested, to study the whole question.

Mr. JAMES GILMOUR (East Middlesex). I would like the hon. minister to explain what is meant by the words, 'all apples packed?' Does the word 'packed' mean that the apples are to be headed and pressed, or does it mean apples laid in a barrel for the purpose of being carried to market? Then, I would like to have it explained whether the dimensions proposed for the new barrel, are the same as those of the apple barrel commonly used in Ontario, or the same as the flour barrel, because there is a variation between the two?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This is why I thought it my duty not to take any one by surprise, but to notify the Ontario and Quebec fruit-growers that the size of the barrel would be smaller than the size of the apple barrel now employed. As to the word 'packed,' I thought it was one of those words that every one understood. The action of packing apples, is putting them in a barrel with such care as every honest man, who wants to give good measure, would exercise.

Mr. GILMOUR. I understood the word 'packed' to mean that the apples are headed and pressed down; but I do not know how a judge might construe it.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We are changing our ground completely. I know what complaints have been made, and justly, as to the mode of packing apples. It threatens the good name and reputation of our fruits abroad; but this is a different branch of the case altogether. The Bill merely deals with the size of the barrels. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), has introduced a Bill which goes much further than mine, dealing with the mode in which apples are packed.

Mr. SPEAKER. We are really doing committee work at the present moment. I wish the House to understand that.

Mr. TISDALE. We want to understand what is meant by a packed apple, so as to be able to make inquiries.

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps it would be better for the House to go into committee, and then, instead of reporting the Bill, rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). Before the motion is passed, I would like the minister to explain why he is altering the size of the barrel. My object in asking that question is that I may inquire of some of my constituents who are largely interested in this Bill whether that is a desirable change or not.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I suppose I did not express myself very clearly when I explained a moment ago that the Bill was the result of numerous petitions received from the apple-growers of Nova Scotia, one of which I have read to the House. They discovered that last year the New York State legislature passed a law, which has been adopted by the northern states, fixing a certain size for the apple barrel, which is seven quarts smaller than the barrel used in Canada.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the object of making it smaller?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I think it is due to the attempt, not only in regard to apples, but to everything else, to give as little as possible for as much money as possible. This did not originate with the people of Nova Scotia, for they were satisfied with the size of the standard barrel which has been in use for so many years; but when they heard that the people with whom they were in competition in England for the sale of apples were packing them in barrels seven quarts smaller than the barrels which they had been using, they naturally felt that they should not be placed at such a disadvantage. I think my hon. friend will admit that I have not in any way attempted to take the House by surprise, and that I have drawn the attention of the apple-growers of the other provinces to the fact that this will be a considerable change, and now it is a question whether they will adopt it or not.

Sir HENRI JOLY DE LOTBINIERE.

Mr. JAS. CLANCY (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that this covers a great deal more ground than he intended. What he intended was to regulate the size and the quality of barrels for export, but by his Bill he is extending the same privileges to barrels of apples intended for home consumption. His Bill applies to all apples, whether for export or not. I would like to ask him if that is his intention?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It states apples for sale, and I think it is in the same terms as the present law.

Mr. J. B. MILLS (Annapolis). I take objection to the wording of section 18. We are dealing more particularly with barrels and not with apples, and therefore the barrel should be given more prominence than the apple. I would suggest that the clause should read this way: 'Barrels for the packing of apples should be strong and of seasoned wood, etc.' The principal thing to be considered by this Bill is the barrel and not the apples.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That is a mere detail.

Mr. D. TISDALE (South Norfolk). I understand that this Bill is intended to regulate the size as well as the quality of the barrel. The barrels are to be of a certain strength or quality of wood, but that is not the most important thing. The really important thing is the size of the barrel or the quantity of apples each barrel contains. That is very important, because from Ontario there are several hundred thousand barrels of apples shipped to England every year, and the number is increasing, and when we export to the same countries as the United States, the price, when we sell by the barrel, will be so much per barrel, and it is important that our barrels be of a uniform size, because we will not get a higher price if they are a little larger than others. I do not see much difficulty about the question whether the apples are for consumption at home or abroad.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, yes, there is.

Mr. TISDALE. I think not, because when apples are purchased for home consumption, the purchasers do not buy by the barrel, but by measure, and they estimate how many pecks or bushels are in the barrel before buying it. Packing is well understood among the packing men, but not by the general public. The packing men usually use a lever to press the apples down tight, and in such a case the size of the barrel might make quite a difference. My view is that we should deal with the question as a whole, because the people do not want to have two classes of barrels.

Mr. CLANCY. I understand that the object of the hon. minister is not to meet a difficulty at home but abroad, and the difficulty abroad is that other countries are exporting smaller barrels than we do. The hon. gentleman is endeavouring to protect Canadian interests in the foreign trade, but I wish to point out that he is also creating a difficulty at home and imposing an unnecessary burden in the case of apples put in barrels for home consumption.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). The Bill is intended to protect the buyers of apples, and is applicable to all apples packed in Canada for sale by the barrel. As I understand the matter, the hon. minister is not going to press the Bill to-day, and is asking for suggestions, and my suggestion is one that properly should be made in the committee stage. All lawyers are anxious not to have too many statutes on the one subject. We have this Bill before the committee to-day, and the hon. Minister of Agriculture has another Bill, No. 127, which deals with the inspection of apples. I can hardly see why those two Bills should not be embodied in one, and thus save a little looking up when we have to go into the subject. I also would call attention to the wording of subsection 3. I have not looked to see whether this is the same wording as in the Act which this pretends to amend, but it seems to me that this must be a wrong wording when it provides that when potatoes are sold by weight, the weight equivalent to a barrel shall be 174 pounds. If potatoes are sold by weight, no difficulty arises. But, if they are sold by the barrel, it is right to provide that the barrel shall be not less than a certain size or measure. This is for the protection of the buyer, and it is only necessary to provide that a barrel shall not be of less than certain dimensions, for, if the packers care to give more that is their business, and the buyer is not injured.

Mr. MILLS. As I understand the matter, the minister does not intend to put this through the committee stage to-day, but will leave it over for future consideration. In view of that, I desire to give notice that when it does come before the committee for final consideration, I shall move that subsection 2 shall read as follows, instead of as it appears in the Bill :

When pears, quinces or potatoes are sold by the barrel, such barrel shall be of dimensions specified in this Act, and shall be held to represent a quantity equal to ninety-six quarts, or three bushels.

Then, so far as the penalty clause is concerned, I shall move that another subsection, No. 4 be added, as follows :

Every person who makes, offers or exposes for sale, or who packs for exportation apples, pears, quinces or potatoes by the barrel otherwise than in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this section shall be liable to a penalty of 25 cents for each barrel of apples, pears, quinces, or potatoes so made, offered or exposed for sale or packed.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have an amendment that I intend to introduce covering one point referred to by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills). As to the other, I would ask him to let me have a copy of the amendment, that I may consider it.

Mr. MILLS. I only submit this as a notice of my intention to move it when the matter comes up for further consideration.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Time must be allowed for the consideration of this Bill. No doubt, if the matter were pushed forward now, many hon. members would be taken by surprise.

The PRIME MINISTER. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) give us the reasons for the amendments he proposes ?

Mr. MILLS. So far as the penalty clause is concerned, my object is to make the cooper as well as the packer subject to the penalty. As to the other point, with reference to the weight, my object is that there shall be no quibbling with reference to a barrel of potatoes or whatever it may be—that it must be of a certain weight as well as of a certain measurement. This is absolutely necessary, in order to meet the competition that the Canadian farmers are experiencing from the farmers of the New England states.

Mr. CLANCY. But a barrel is not always of the same weight, and, in that case, you cannot decide the weight of the contents without weighing the package.

Mr. QUINN. Not necessarily.

Mr. TISDALE. My hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) should make some inquiries, I think, about the differences in dealing in potatoes and in fruit. Potatoes go by weight, but fruit does not. I happen to live in a district that deals largely in both, and I have bought and sold a great many of them for use, not so largely for family use, though I am Irish enough to want a good potato. Potatoes are valued by weight, but the size often affects the value of apples more than the weight. I agree with the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue that the weight of a potato is the standard.

Mr. McMILLAN. Do I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) to mean that there are to be three bushels of apples in a barrel?

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Mr. McMILLAN. That increases the size of the present barrel, instead of reducing it. I would say, as one who has purchased apples and shipped them to the old country, that I think that whatever standard is made for a barrel, it should be made alike for both home and foreign trade. When buyers purchase apples they purchase on speculation, and can hardly tell whether those apples are to be sent to England, to the North-west, or to the United States. Different sizes of barrels, would, therefore, only cause confusion.

Mr. A. C. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) This clause may affect the province of Prince Edward Island very considerably, and should receive a good deal of consideration on the part of the minister. The potato trade of the province is carried on at present on the basis of a barrel measuring five half-bushels and a gallon, a cylindrical measure. I trust that nothing will be done that will affect that standard barrel which is in general use there. With respect to apples, I think it would be better to have a certain standard barrel, as we have in the case of a flour barrel. Everybody knows what the weight of flour in a flour barrel is supposed to be, and an apple barrel can be made in the same way, so that it can sell for a certain weight.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). I am sorry to be obliged to differ from my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald, King's) as to the weight of a barrel of apples, because different kind of apples weigh very differently. I feel satisfied that a bushel of 'Duchess' apples, for example, would not weigh nearly so heavy as a bushel of 'Northern Spys.' A barrel of early apples would be found, as a rule, to weigh lighter than a barrel of winter apples. The size of the apples also would affect the weight, because the larger, the less closely they would pack. I am afraid my hon. friend's idea would not do for selling apples.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is just what I was going to mention. There is a good deal of difference in the weight of the same bulk of various kinds of apples. In case of the Snows, the Baldwins or the Northern Spys, you will find ten or fifteen pounds difference in the weight of a barrel of apples of the same size. If we were to have all the barrels of the same weight, we would have to have barrels of different dimensions. The size of the barrel is what should regulate the sale of apples.

Mr. TISDALE.

Mr. WALLACE. Do we understand that a flour barrel contains 100 quarts?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The American barrel, which is the one the Nova Scotia people are asking us to adopt, contains 100 American quarts, and is smaller than our standard barrel by seven quarts.

Mr. WALLACE. The minister says that the proposed barrel is ninety-three quarts, that it is seven quarts smaller than the flour barrel which has been the one in use so far for apples. He says the flour barrel contains 100 quarts.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I am not ready to say exactly how much an apple barrel contains; but the American barrel, which the Nova Scotia people are asking us to adopt, contains 100 United States quarts.

Mr. WALLACE. I am simply saying that our Canadian flour barrel does not contain 100 quarts. That would be twelve pecks and one gallon. Now, a Canadian apple barrel has not that capacity. The usual estimate, I think, is eleven pecks.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It is larger than the American barrel, at all events.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would like to draw the minister's attention to a matter which I think of some importance. No doubt throughout the country the material for making barrels has already been cut and prepared; in all probability the barrel makers and coopers have their headings cut for the old sized barrel. Now, in the event of this Bill coming into operation at once, there would result a tremendous loss to the men who make barrels, which I think should be guarded against. Besides, it might be impossible for these men to get the material to make barrels of the new capacity. I think, perhaps, the minister should defer putting this Bill into operation for another year.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That is what we did with the Bill we proposed last year. We gave a whole year before putting it into operation. Now that hon. members have understood the different proposals made and the difficulties that may arise, I would ask the committee to think it over, and I move now that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the hon. minister will give us notice when he brings the Bill up again.

Motion agreed to; committee rose, and reported progress.

REPORT.

List of shareholders of the Chartered Banks of the Dominion of Canada for the year ending December 31, 1899.—(Mr. Fielding.)

INSPECTION OF FOREIGN GRAIN.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 142) respecting the inspection of foreign grain.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the inspection law provides only for the inspection of articles of Canadian produce, and, as is well known, from some of our shipping ports an enormous amount of American Indian corn is shipped, especially from the port of Montreal. This Bill is introduced to authorize the inspection of that grain, and provision is made for the purpose of the issue of a certificate of inspection showing that it is not Canadian grain, but that it is foreign grain. We have thought that it might be wise to take that precaution. For some years past that Indian corn was being inspected, and in many cases the inspector omitted to mention that it was foreign grain, so that there was a certain amount that might have passed as Canadian grain. While the intention of the Bill is not to interfere in any way with shipments of foreign grain from the port of Montreal and other sea ports, and while it is intended to give satisfaction to the people on the other side, who rest contented with our official inspection, we want, at the same time, to make Canadian people and the people on the other side acquainted with the fact that the grain is grown in the United States, that it is not Canadian grain. That is why this exception to the General Inspection Act, which now only deals with the produce of the country, is made.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the inspection apply to all the ports at which grain is shipped?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. M. J. F. QUINN (St. Ann's, Montreal). I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) if the Bill, in its present form, meets with the approval of the Board of Trade and Corn Exchange Association of Montreal? I do so because I formed one of a deputation that waited on the minister about a month ago, referring to this very subject. The difficulty at that time was that the European merchants refused to accept the inspection of the Canadian inspectors, alleging that these inspectors had no authority to inspect American grain here. Unless that difficulty is covered by the present Bill which the hon. minister is asking the House to pass, I am afraid it will have very little effect. I would simply like to ask him if this Bill has been submitted to the Corn Exchange Association, and if it is satisfactory to the members of the association?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. My hon. friend (Mr. Quinn) was present at a meeting which took place with the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Since then, I have had repeated interviews with Mr. Hadrill, the secretary of the Montreal Board of Trade and Corn Exchange Association, and we have had correspondence with him, which ultimately resulted in our framing this Bill, which gives such complete satisfaction to the Montreal Board of Trade and Corn Exchange Association. I will take the opportunity of satisfying my hon. friend and the House by reading a letter—

Mr. QUINN. It is quite satisfactory.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This is from Mr. Hadrill, the secretary of the Montreal Corn Exchange Association. It is as follows:

Sir,—I am in receipt of yours of yesterday's date communicating form of amendment of General Inspection Act specifically providing for the inspection of United States grain, and am to say that the committee of management of this association approves of the same, and prays that it may become law at the earliest possible date. I am to add an expression of the committee's gratification that the hon. minister—

And then there are a certain amount of compliments which we are not accustomed to receive in cases of this kind, and I do not think I need read what follows to the House. But, my hon. friend sees that this Bill gives complete satisfaction to the Montreal grain trade, and at the same time, as is mentioned in the letter, it is important that it should be passed as soon as possible.

Mr. QUINN. Yes, yes; I understand that.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I understand so well the importance of it that I have taken upon myself to write to the Corn Exchange to tell them that the Bill was now before the House, and that I had every hope that it would be passed unanimously. In the meantime, I took upon myself to instruct the inspector to inspect and to give certificates according to the tenor of the Bill.

Mr. J. G. HAGGART (South Lanark). Will this Bill apply to grain that is passing in transitu from the United States to a port in Great Britain?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. Well, it seems strange. The certificate of inspection is attached to the security for the money that is advanced as well as the bill of lading and the bill of insurance. Are you going to alter the certificate of inspection that is attached to it, or does the Bill give you power to change it because it is only passing in transitu through Canada? It surely only applies to grain which is not inspected, or is not in transitu from one foreign port to another.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It only applies to American grain.

Mr. HAGGART. But the American grain is shipped from Chicago.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is shipped to Montreal.

Mr. HAGGART. Suppose it is shipped to Liverpool?

Mr. QUINN. It does not apply to that.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No such shipping is done at our Canadian ports. It is bound to be placed in the elevators and inspected, either at Montreal, or St. John, or Halifax. I will read the Bill to my hon. friend. It is as follows:

1. Inspectors of grain shall, when required, inspect grain of United States produce passing through Canada in transit to Great Britain or to a foreign country, and shall grant certificates therefor based on standard samples of such grain furnished the said inspectors by the Department of Inland Revenue; and the said standards shall be established by the board of examiners of the board of trade for the district wherein such inspection takes place, and shall be known as the standards for United States grain of the said district.

2. Every certificate relating to such grain shall state that it is of United States production, and that the grade mentioned is that of the board of examiners of the board of trade of the district wherein the inspection takes place.

3. The fees for the inspection of such grain shall be the same as provided by the General Inspection Act, chapter 99 of the Revised Statutes, with respect to grain of Canadian produce.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would like to explain to my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) that this legislation is introduced at the special request of the Chicago shippers. They have been in the habit, in the past, of having a voluntary certificate given by our inspector at Montreal, to which it was discovered there was no legal value at all, but, they attached great importance to having their grain inspected and covered by our inspection. So, there was some question whether or not we had power to authorize a compulsory inspection of foreign produce, and in order to obviate that we agreed to introduce this legislation at their request, providing that, upon their own demand, they will have the grain inspected by our inspectors at the port of Montreal, and then they can show that certificate in the European markets, and it will serve the purpose they require. This is the object of the Bill. It is done at their own request.

Mr. HAGGART.

Mr. HAGGART. I can understand it if it is at their own request that it is done, but ninety-nine hundredths of the grain shipped from Chicago is shipped with a certificate of inspection, a bill of lading and an insurance ticket, and that is what is attached to the security for the money which is advanced for the purpose of buying the grain and carrying it to a foreign port. I could not understand the object of another inspection, unless it was at the request of the shipper, or the party who had the security on the grain going over. It may be because our certificate of inspection bears a higher value than the certificate of Chicago.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is really the case.

Mr. SPROULE. This would only apply to grain in transit through Canada?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time; considered in committee, and reported.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. BRITTON. It is perfectly clear that the first section simply empowers us to appoint an inspector who is a government official, and who shall make an inspection when required. But it does not say by whom he is to be required. I assume it is by the owners of the grain. If the words 'when required' do not demand any further qualification then, of course, the Bill is all right.

Mr. TAYLOR. The purchaser of the grain should have just as good a right as the seller to demand an inspection.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It means when it is required by the interested parties. Those who receive it in England attach as much importance to our certificate as the Chicago people; in fact they attach a very high value to our inspection.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 132) to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. HAGGART. Is it intended to send this Bill to the Railway Committee for consideration?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think not.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then explain.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. When the Bill was introduced

I explained its general purport, and if necessary, I will do so again. The first section contains two sub-clauses relating to street railways, and what you might describe as tramways. The object of the section is to withdraw certain street railways and tramways, which otherwise would be subject to the legislative control of the parliament of Canada, from such control, and to make them subject to the legislative control of the particular province in which they are situated.

Mr. WALLACE. Is that confined to street railways alone?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is confined to street railways and tramways. The area in which the particular railways referred to by this subsection are included is: all railways passing through or over Queen Victoria Niagara Falls Park, or through or over the property of the province of Ontario lying upon or along the Niagara River, and known as the Chain Reserve. This provision has been introduced at the suggestion of the Ontario government, which has been exercising legislative control over this particular area, and it is done in order to remove any question in regard to it, and to give them a free hand, except in regard to the reservations contained in the Bill. It will be observed that the clause, while it withdraws from the operation of the General Railway Act, and the control of the parliament of Canada over the railway, does not make that absolute and complete. It does so with certain exceptions which are mentioned. It specifies that the mere fact that the street railway or tramway crosses a line of railway (as is mentioned in the General Railway Act constitutes it a railway for the general advantage of Canada, and subject to our jurisdiction, because it crosses such line), does not of itself constitute it a railway subject to the control of the parliament of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. Give us a practical instance of the effect of that?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The effect would be to enable the legislature of any province to legislate in respect to such electric street railways or tramways. Under the existing law all legislative control over them is removed entirely as soon as they cross any of the great trunk lines specified in the Railway Act—at least that is the interpretation which is placed upon the clause in the Railway Act which deals with the subject. It is not found very desirable in practical experience that these street railways should be regarded as works for the general advantage of Canada, and should be withdrawn from the legislative control of the provinces which are familiar with all the local and municipal conditions attending them. In common sense these are not the works for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. WALLACE. If the Confederation Act gives that power to the parliament of Canada, how can you change that?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The parliament of Canada has so enacted, but it has equal power to repeal such enactments, and say that such an Act will not constitute a railway for the general advantage of Canada, and will leave it within the legislative authority to which it otherwise belongs.

Mr. J. G. HAGGART (South Lanark). Will it interfere with the jurisdiction that this parliament has given to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council for regulating the mode or manner of crossing.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. HAGGART. Then, there is another subject on which I suppose the hon. gentleman has obtained the opinion of the Department of Justice. When a railway is declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, can this parliament afterwards divest itself of that work and reinstate it under provincial jurisdiction?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Where parliament has made that specific declaration with respect to a certain work, there is a doubt whether the step which parliament has taken can be retraced; but I think there is not the same doubt in the minds of the Justice Department where parliament is seized of jurisdiction by virtue of any implication from its own legislation. The next section of the Bill deals with the building of stations by a railway company incorporated by an Act of this parliament or which has received assistance by way of subsidy from parliament. A railway, the company to build which was incorporated by an Act of one of the provincial legislatures, would not be subject to this provision unless it had received a subsidy from parliament. One or the other of those conditions must exist in order that this clause of the Act shall apply; and this clause is framed for the purpose of enabling the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, on being appealed to by the people of any locality in which a railway is being constructed, to require the location of a station at some particular point.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Not merely if the railway is under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, unless, in addition to that, the parliament of Canada grants it a subsidy.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. This clause would give to the Railway Committee the power to require the location of a station at any point by a railway company which got its charter from this parliament, quite irrespective of whether or not any subsidy had been voted to it by parliament.

Mr. WALLACE. Where is that in the clause ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It was meant to be in the clause.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to a case that came before the Railway Committee—that of the Boundary Creek Railway. It was not subsidized by money or land from the parliament of Canada; but the minister said it was intended to legislate for such a case. Does this clause apply to it, or does it not ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My own impression was that it did. It was intended to do so. I think the word 'and' ought to be 'or.' This may be an oversight.

Mr. HAGGART. Does the hon. minister propose to impose this condition on a railway whether it gets a subsidy of land or money or not ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know if this provision will apply to sections of existing lines, say in the province of Ontario, which have been incorporated into the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Pacific Railway. For instance, the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway was chartered by the Ontario legislature. I am not certain whether or not it ever got a subsidy from this parliament. The question is, would this clause enable the Governor in Council or the Railway Committee of the Privy Council to order that a station on that line should be reopened, if closed, or should be established at a point where there is no station ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the company originally incorporated to build that particular line was incorporated by the province, and did not receive any aid from the government of Canada, it would not be subject to this legislation.

Mr. McMULLEN. Although it is now owned by a company which received large subventions ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, that would be my interpretation.

Mr. TISDALE. Has the hon. minister taken the opinion of the Justice Department as to whether we have any jurisdiction in this matter ? It looks to me a marvellous thing. It says :

2. In the case of a railway not subject to the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada, but subsidized in money or in land under the authority of an Act of that parliament, the payment and acceptance of such subsidy shall be taken to be subject to the covenant or condition (whether expressed or not in any agreement relating to such subsidy) that the company for the time being owning or operating such railway shall, when thereto directed by order of the Railway Committee, confirmed by the Governor in Council, erect, maintain and operate a station, with such accommodation or facilities in connection therewith as are defined by the committee, at such point or points on the railway as are designated in such order.

Mr. BLAIR.

Surely, when we have no authority over a railway whatever, the whole jurisdiction being vested in the province, we have no right to pass legislation subjecting that railway to certain conditions.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman will see how inconvenient it is, with the Speaker in the Chair, to discuss the question in this way. I may answer the hon. gentleman by saying that the opinion of the department is just what he thinks it is not. The Bill was drawn by the Department of Justice and reached me with the opinion from that department to the effect that it would be unquestionably ultra vires the parliament of Canada to deal with railways created by a provincial legislature and which did not receive any aid from the Dominion government, but that when such companies had received Dominion aid, it was proper for this parliament to annex that condition to the grant.

Mr. SPROULE. Does this apply to all railways that have been subsidized in the past ? Is it to be retroactive ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The Bill does not profess to be limited in its application to railways that shall be hereafter built. It is very probable that very few cases will arise in which the jurisdiction of the Railway Committee will be invoked in the case of railways that have been in operation for some time.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). When the grants were given, they could have been given subject to conditions, but surely the hon. gentleman cannot make grants already given without conditions subject to the present legislation.

Mr. SPROULE. Would this Bill apply to railways which obtained a grant when no such law, as the one now proposed, was in force ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think that would be the effect of the measure, but we can discuss all these matters much more conveniently in committee.

Mr. WALLACE. Would it not be better to refer the Bill to the Railway Committee where it could be more thoroughly dealt with ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think not; the conclusion we came to was that we would not refer this Bill to the Railway Committee.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). The question is, whether we have any right at all to impose conditions upon railway companies which have received public grants in the past, either from the municipalities or from parliament. It seems to me that inasmuch as these companies have received these grants in order that they might be a benefit to the public, the fact that they did receive grants from the public funds of this country ought to make them amenable to reasonable laws passed by this House, and for my part I should be sorry to see a limitation imposed upon this measure which would deprive the Railway Committee of the power to deal with companies that have received public grants, and which the Railway Committee think are not employing the powers conferred upon them by the government in such a way as best to promote the public interest.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I had not completed my explanation of all the clauses, but it seems to me it would be better, unless the principle of the Bill is objected to, to let the measure go to the committee of the House and discuss the various clauses then.

Mr. HAGGART. No, we want to contest the general principle of the Bill.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The next clause I will refer to is that which relates to the establishment or the approval of a body of rules and regulations, regulating the operating of railways in this country. The House is aware that under the existing law the railway companies are required to submit their rules and regulations for the approval of the Governor in Council. The little experience I have had in the working of the department has convinced me that it is very desirable that these rules should be uniform and generally applicable to the railway system throughout the country. It is within the recollection of some hon. gentlemen opposite that more or less discussion has already taken place in this parliament with regard to the action of the Governor in Council in approving the rules and regulations which were submitted to them from time to time by different companies, and it has been contended that it is only reasonable that the railway employees have some opportunity of being heard. When these rules, which have already been dealt with by the present government, were submitted to the Railway Committee, I took some pains to obtain the opinion of the associations of employees of the different lines, but through some misconception on the part of the gentlemen who were representing these associations, they did not avail themselves of the opportunity opened to them, and did not make their views known to the government, in consequence of which the rules were approved. The claim which the associated bodies connected with the railways have made to be heard in respect of these matters appears to me reasonable, and that is one reason why the present clause is found in this Bill. The other reason I have stated, namely, that it is exceedingly important that there should be uniformity with regard to these operating rules. It is important that they should, as far as possible, conform to the rules which govern the operation of railways upon the other side of the line. The trains are so interchangeable, they run between the two countries in such large numbers and so frequently, that it is desirable the same rules should be employed to govern the management of all the systems which make close connection between the two countries. It certainly is calculated to ensure greater safety in the running. When a man who is running an engine from some point in Canada across the border finds after he gets across the border that the same rules apply as applied before he reached the border, there is much less danger, at all events, of accident or mishaps occurring than if he were confronting a different system of rules after he got across the line. So that, all these considerations point, it appears to me, to the desirability of uniformity, to the desirability of being some authority which can, when necessity arises, impose its will definitely upon all the railways in the country and establish uniformity in the system.

Now, there is no ground upon which, it appears to me, any person could fear that this authority would be exercised in a manner likely, in the slightest degree, to be injurious to the railways, or in any way to jeopardize the interests of the public. We know very well, those of us who have any knowledge with regard to what these rules mean and what their working means, how essential it is to the safety of life and property that they should be carefully framed, and should be adopted only after the most mature consideration and reflection. Judgment and experience should govern in establishing them. We all fully recognize that. I cannot conceive that under any circumstances it is at all likely that this power would be exercised otherwise than in the most careful manner and after the most mature and thorough consideration. It is a power, it seems to me, that ought to be vested somewhere, and I know of no person, at all events, I know of no better tribunal upon which to bestow the power than the Railway Committee. It appears also to me that, however much the idea of having the rules and regulations of the railway companies subject to the revision and control of a tribunal which might not be supposed to have much experience in the working of railways, however that might strike any one, I think that the provision for expert advice and opinion is a very wise and necessary piece of legislation. I think it will be so felt when it is noticed that the Railway Committee will, under this Act, be empowered to avail itself of all possible and proper sources of information, that it will be able to secure expert authority and advice in respect to these matters, and ample provision is made for that purpose in the Bill. The third subclause says :

The Railway Committee may from time to time appoint competent persons to advise or assist the committee in the preparation or revision of such rules or regulations, or of any other matter coming before the committee, and any person so appointed may be paid under an appropriation of parliament.

Mr. HAGGART. Why do you use the word 'appoint' instead of 'employ'? Is it to be permanent?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know that any particular significance is attached to the word. The word 'employ' might be as well chosen as the other.

Mr. CASEY. The employment is only temporary.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the service which is referred to here would only be temporary and not permanent. From time to time, as occasion might arise, after looking into the question and before making a revision, expert advice would have to be sought, and that would only be of a temporary character.

Mr. INGRAM. Do you mean an expert on rules and regulations?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes. In framing rules and regulations in questions arising, I am sure no committee that might be constituted, no government, would feel that it could venture to undertake so complicated a duty, and one which requires knowledge and experience, without availing itself to the fullest possible extent of the best knowledge on the subject, and the most expert authority that could be obtained. It appears to me that in constituting such a body, it would be exceedingly proper that so large a body of people as the railway employees of Canada should have a representative upon it who might voice their wishes and their views.

The third clause deals with a question of importance, but not of the general importance of those to which I have referred. It refers to the sequestration of a railway, and is designed to enable the government, by proclamation of the Governor in Council, to avail itself of the provisions which may be in existence in the laws of any of the provinces of Canada, to compel companies which are not operating railways either to operate them or to surrender them in accordance with the provisions of those local Acts.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. HAGGART. This is, perhaps, one of the most important Bills in reference to amending the Railway Act that ever came before the parliament of Canada. In the first clause, removing the jurisdiction over street railways and tramways from the parliament of Canada and transferring it back again to the local legislatures, the intention may, perhaps, be right. I do not know what legal effect it may have. Suppose the bonds were issued upon a road which was under the jurisdiction of the Dominion, and you transfer the jurisdiction back again to the local legislature. The party who has the bonds may prefer to have the bonds that are issued under a Dominion Act rather than under a provincial Act. It seems reasonable, and I do not see a great deal of objection to it if the clause is carefully guarded, in transferring back to the legislature this jurisdiction. It never was the intention of the parliament of Canada, I think, to assume jurisdiction over electric roads which happened to cross certain lines of railway like the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railway. The minister says that this clause carefully guards the jurisdiction of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council to control the crossing of railroads, that the clause is only for the purpose of re-transferring a jurisdiction which was unintentionally assumed over electric roads which crossed certain roads in Canada.

Another clause of the Bill covers a power which, I think, the government should be careful in assuming—that is, that the Railway Committee may provide that stations shall be built at certain points. And this is to refer not only to roads which have been subsidized by the government either in land or in money, not only over all railways over which this parliament has jurisdiction, but it presumes to take authority over every road.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Which we have subsidized.

Mr. HAGGART. It says :

And in the case of a railway not subject to the legislative authority of Canada, but subsidized in money or in land under the authority of an Act of parliament.

That is, the subsidizing by land or money of a provincial road removes it out of the jurisdiction of a province and gives this parliament the authority to legislate with regard to it. We have no power over it whatever. This clause is ultra vires of this parliament. And why is it that the minister takes power over a provincial road which has been subsidized either by a land grant or money to fix the railway station?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think there are a great many of them.

Mr. HAGGART. Why does the hon. minister take this jurisdiction? Look at what he is subject to. Say that in my riding my supporters think that every three or four miles of railway there ought to be a station. They send down a petition to me. I go to the Minister of Railways and Canals and tell him that it is necessary these stations should be established. And if I am a supporter of the minister, I will say: You must get this for me. The hon. minister knows the difficulty he is in with regard to the Intercolonial Railway on this account. He has complete power over that road, and he knows that ministers have been forced to exercise that power when it was not advantageous to the railway. He ought to be very careful in taking such power over other railways. There is no reason for assuming such jurisdiction. He is taking a power which will be a nuisance to him, and which will put him in antagonism to nearly every railway company in the country. There is no necessity for it. The railway company know perfectly well where stations should be placed for the benefit of the people, and the benefit of the railway themselves. It is a perfectly right and legitimate power to be exercised, if you are going to subsidize a railway or give it a grant of land. In that case, you can make it a provision that before they receive a subsidy or grant of land they shall locate stations where the minister requires them to. I object to that power being given to the government of Canada, for the reason that they will be forced to exercise as directed by political supporters, which, perhaps, is neither in the interest of the public or in the interest of the railway. Then there is this other power provided for:

The Railway Committee may, from time to time, make regulations not inconsistent with this Act for the operation of all or any of the railways now or hereafter to be constructed in Canada.

That the rules and regulations should be uniform, as advocated by the minister, is right. But why not follow in this case the same principle as in classification and rates? We could say to the different railway companies that they should adopt a uniform set of rules and regulations, and the government might be a party to that agreement, as they run a railway themselves—just as in the case of classification and rates. The rules and regulations thus adopted for the railways of Canada should be made subject to the approval of the Governor General.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. How are you going to get it?

Mr. HAGGART. As I say, in the same way as you do in case of classification of rates. That is arrived at by a system of agreement between the railways and the government. Look at the dangerous power the government are asking. You will be at the mercy of every labour organization in the country if you adopt such a course. Who will urge the revision of the rules and regulations? Will it be the railway company? No, it will be the labour associations that will complain that the rules and regulations in one company or another are not such as they ought to be, and will insist upon their being changed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And would you not hear them?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, but the manner of hearing them and the altering of these rules and regulations is a power that no government ought to assume. If the Minister of Railways and Canals had this power tomorrow, he would be very sorry, just as I think he will in the case of the location of the stations. As to the appointment of competent persons to assist in these matters, if he takes these powers, it is quite right to have such persons, because he would require expert testimony to guide the Railway Committee to make these rules and regulations. The only question was as to the word 'appoint.' But the minister explained that these appointments are not to be permanent, that they are to be simply temporary.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is no objection to substitute the word 'employ,' because that covers the ground.

Mr. HAGGART. Then, there is another power sought here, the full effect of which, I think, the minister could not have appreciated.

An hon. MEMBER. Six o'clock.

REPORT RE OUTBREAK OF SMALL-POX.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the House to one point. Two days ago, I said, speaking of the small-pox matter, that I had heard of it in Rossland, B.C. I have here a telegram from Mayor Goodeve of that city, which reads:

No small-pox here. Last case developed March 17. Isolation hospital closed three weeks. Kindly correct statements.

I draw the attention of the House to this matter, and trust the press will give it the fullest publicity.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 145) to incorporate the Toronto and Georgian Bay Short Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Britton.)

Bill (No. 146) to enable the city of Winnipeg to utilize the Assiniboine River water power.—(Mr. Puttee.)

BILL FOR THE RELIEF OF CATHERINE CECILIA LYONS.

Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (No. 144)—from the Senate—for the relief of Catherine Cecilia Lyons.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). On a division.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. HAGGART. Before six o'clock, I was discussing clause 2 of the Bill to amend the Railway Act, and I stated the objections that I had to this particular clause. I would urge strongly on the government the necessity of sending the Bill to the Railway Committee. There are two very radical clauses in the Bill, and they are clauses on which the railway companies ought to be heard whether they have any objections to them or not, or whether they have any suggestions to make. It is impossible to make them before the committee of the House, while the Bill may be fully considered in the Railway Committee, and, I think, the proper course is to send the Bill to that committee. As to clause 3, there was no explanation offered upon the introduction of the Bill by the hon. Minister of Railway and Canals (Mr. Blair).

3. The said Act is further amended by inserting after section 89 the following section:

89a. Whenever a company, constructing or operating a line of railway which is situate wholly within the limits of one province, and with respect to which, or any part of which, the government of such province has previously granted and paid a subsidy to such company or any other company, fails to comply with the requirements of its charter as regards the commencement or completion of its works within the times therein specified, or fails, for a longer period than ten days, to continue in an efficient manner the running, operating or working of its railway, or any part thereof, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of such province, upon the report of the Railway Committee of the Executive Council thereof may, at any time (even though the company is incorporated by the parliament of Canada, or the railway is otherwise within the legislative authority of such parliament), authorize the commissioner of public works of such province, or other proper officer therein, to cause the railway, the roadbed and all the rolling stock and equipment thereof, to be sequestered or sold.

Mr. PRIOR.

It is left within the legislative authority of the provinces to take the proceedings provided for in this clause. This is a power which, I think, ought not to be given to the provinces. It might interfere seriously with the securities that have been issued under the authority of an Act of the Dominion parliament. It is true that the power is limited to certain railways as provided in subsection 3, as follows:

3. This section shall have force and effect only with respect to such companies as are designated from time to time by proclamation of the Governor General.

That applies to all the railways, whether they have their entity from the province or whether they have their entity from the Dominion parliament. It gives the power to the provinces under any legislation which they may adopt, from time to time, or which may be in force in the different provinces to completely sequester, sell, or convey, the franchise, rolling stock and everything else belonging to these railways. In the province of Quebec, for instance, the sheriff may sell the franchise and absolutely everything that the railway company may possess to the purchaser, except such debts as are due to the Crown. Debts due the Crown are especially excepted, I believe, in the province of Quebec. It is true that there is a limitation to such roads as are designated by the Governor General, but suppose that the parliament of Canada, or any provincial legislature, gives authority to a railway to commence work within two years and require it to be completed within five or six years. The company may have completed half of the road under the authority of the parliament of Canada, and they may have issued bonds on that particular part of the road. It is true that under their charter they are required to complete the rest within five years. Take the Credit Valley road, for instance, where one of the branches of twelve miles is completed, or another road, which strikes me, at the time, has a charter to build from Gananoque to James Bay. Only four miles of the road are completed. Bonds are issued on the road from the Grand Trunk Railway station to the town of Gananoque. They are required by their charter to have the road completed to James Bay in five years. If any province insists upon the completion of the road the Governor General's duty would be, under the Act, to give the power to require the company to complete the road within the time specified. If they could not do it their franchise and property could be sequestered. The province could deprive the bondholders of their lien on that portion of the road unless the charter was carried out by the company. I think this is a power which ought not to be granted to the provinces, I think that the power of sequestration, or of the absolute disposition of the road, to the prejudice, it may be, of the creditors and bondholders of the road is a power that should not be granted to the provinces. The Bill is of such importance and so far-reaching that I think it is the duty of the government to send it to the Railway Committee. The attention of every railway company in the country has been drawn to the Bill. I consider as a matter of course that the Bill should be sent to the Railway Committee of the House where the objections, if any, of the railway men of the country could be heard and considered. We would have no objection to the second reading, if the minister would consent to send the Bill then to the Railway Committee, rather than a committee of the whole House. Further, I notice that my leader is not here this evening, and I know he takes a great interest in the Bill, and under the circumstances the government should delay pressing this measure until the leader of the opposition is in the House.

Mr. DAVID TISDALE (South Norfolk). I have listened with a great deal of interest to the argument of the hon. gentleman from Lanark (Mr. Haggart), and I must say, that with the information at present under my command, I am not prepared to express an opinion on the different propositions contained in this measure. Until the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) announced it this afternoon, I had no idea that he would decline to send this Bill to the Railway Committee. While I am always ready to express my opinion and to vote accordingly, whether it affects small or great interests, yet, in a matter of this sort, there are gentlemen in this country who have devoted all their lives to studying the complex problems connected with our Canadian railway system, and I would not like to form any conclusion without hearing what they have to say on this measure. Whether we agree with their arguments or not, yet, it is only fair and just that we should hear their suggestions in regard to the drastic changes which the Minister of Railways here proposes. This Bill contains within it, some of the most far-reaching propositions that have been for many years submitted to parliament, and these propositions are worthy the most serious consideration of members of this House. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) has admitted, in reply to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), that he thinks this should be retroactive, and that in itself is a serious thing. Taking all the complicated questions between electric railways and general railways, and the clauses in our Railway Act which bear upon them, we should have the advantage of hearing from these gentlemen who represent those great institutions which contribute so largely to the commercial development of our country. I was surprised to hear from the minister, that the Department of Justice had decided that under subsection 2 of section 2, it was intra vires for us to acquire jurisdiction over a road which the province had jurisdiction over, and that it would be intra vires to deal with the question of stations along that line. Suppose that in the charter of a provincial road the province sees fit to say we will take jurisdiction to compel these railways to place stations wherever we please, what position would our legislation be in? There would be two conflicting powers, and if they did not agree the only way out of it would be that the railway company would have to build two stations. Without being able to carefully consider the Bill or express an opinion upon it at the present moment, that strikes me as one matter which we would have to pay serious attention to. I am quite satisfied that the government, as well as all the members of this House, are not desirous to precipitate any conflict between the Dominion and the provinces. We all know that a good many differences arise which cannot be avoided without creating new differences. I believe if the minister took the course of referring the Bill to the Railway Committee it would tend to facilitate the passage of this legislation. It would be more satisfactory to the hon. minister, to the government, and to the community at large, if we should have an opportunity of hearing expert opinion on the many grave questions involved in this measure. I believe that the public interest would be best served by referring this Bill to the committee. I believe that matters of this importance should be referred to the general committee.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think it will be conceded on all hands that the Bill now under consideration is not the class of Bill which is usually referred to the Railway Committee for its consideration and report. As a public Bill introduced by government, it would be quite in accordance with rule and usage that it should be disposed of by the House without reference to that committee. But last year, when I introduced the Bill, or one similar to this, I recognized that it was one which would provide fair matter for discussion; and, without the suggestion being made to me at all, but of my own motion, I stated to the House that it was my intention to refer it to the Railway Committee for the purpose of having it thoroughly discussed and allowing persons to be heard who desired to be heard in respect to it. The reason why I did not pursue the same course this session, I am free to say, was because the Bill did not receive from influential and important members of that committee last session the treatment which it was entitled to, nor did I receive at the hands of the committee the consideration which I thought was due to me under the circumstances, having myself voluntarily suggested its reference to the committee. I confess that the Bill did stand some little time. I allowed it to stand from day to day at the request of gentlemen who were promoting other Bills, and for their convenience; and when we got down to within ten days or a fortnight of the close of the session, advantage was taken of the fact, and a system, not of discussion, but of obstruction, pure and simple, was entered upon by those opposed to the Bill, who declared their intention not to allow it to pass under any circumstances. Under these circumstances, I felt that it could hardly be expected that I would voluntarily propose the same course this year.

Mr. TAYLOR. Why did you not introduce it three months ago, and have it before the committee then?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the Bill has been introduced in ample time to afford an opportunity for the very fullest discussion of it. It has been recast, and differs in some respects from the Bill of last year. It has been in the hands of the Department of Justice, and for some time between the law clerk of my department and the officers of that department, and it reached here as soon as it reasonably could, under the circumstances. It was introduced on April 5. I recognize the importance of the Bill thoroughly well. I recognize that it involves some new principles which we are asking parliament to incorporate in our Railway Act; and I am not averse—on the contrary, I am very desirous that all the features of it should be thoroughly discussed. If the Bill will not stand discussion, then do not let it pass. I have myself, confidence in the wisdom and propriety of passing legislation of the character embodied in this Bill. Experience has led me to entertain a very strong opinion in favour of such legislation. I will not say that I regard every feature of it as vital; but there are many features of it that I do regard as vital. At the same time, I am prepared to have the Bill submitted to the most thorough and critical examination, and it is only the duty of gentlemen who do not agree with me, as to the prudence of this legislation, to express their views as strongly as they desire. I have no wish to appear, nor am I, unwilling at any time to accede to any reasonable request that is made courteously and with an honest desire to promote proper legislation; and since hon. gentlemen opposite have requested that the Bill should go to the Railway Committee, I am not going to interpose any objection to the reference. But I will say this, that I shall expect when the Bill goes before the committee that it shall be discussed fairly, and not met in a spirit of obstruction or by a resort to practices which certainly do not proceed from a bona fide desire to treat bills fairly.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Picton). I suppose it is hardly necessary to say it, but under the circumstances, the second reading is taken with the understanding that the House is not committing itself to the principle of the Bill, but that that stage is taken merely pro forma in order that it may go to the committee.

Mr. BLAIR.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think any member of the House will be prejudiced in his future action by the second reading of the Bill. It is hardly a Bill to which you would apply the criticism of the hon. gentleman, because it simply amends the existing law, containing four or five separate and distinct propositions, and there are several principles and not only one principle in it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I move that the Bill be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). Does not the House think it a mistake to send such an important Bill as this to the Railway Committee, where you will not have as large an attendance as you have in this House? I know that the minister is a man of excellent sense, but I think he is making a mistake in sending the Bill to the Railway Committee; for the probability is that if it ever gets through that committee, it will not get through here. I would appeal to the minister not to allow it to go to the Railway Committee, but have it discussed here, and if it is accepted by this House, then let it become law. Last year he had a Bill of a similar character, and it did not get through the House, and the same thing will happen this year. It is a great mistake to send it to the committee at all.

Mr. TISDALE. The good faith of the opposition is pledged to help to get the Bill disposed of, and I can assure the hon. minister that nothing of an obstructive spirit will be shown towards it. While the minister is quite correct in his statement of the circumstances of last year, the Bill was brought in late, and an impression got abroad that it was not going to be pressed, but was only introduced pro forma with the intention of bringing it forward again this session. I am frank to say that the minister was not treated fairly, but I am satisfied that this year, as it is introduced early, there will be no obstruction to the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE.

Bill (No. 137)—from the Senate—to amend the Criminal Code of 1892 (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

On section 8 (third paragraph),

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Picton). I would like the hon. Solicitor

General to give us some idea of the change. I understand that this clause is taken from the Imperial Draft Bill. Is it based on that draft or is it the law anywhere?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). It was in the proposed Imperial Bill of 1891. Clause 166 of our present Code reads as follows:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment (a) who rescues any person or assists any person in escaping, or attempting to escape, from lawful custody, whether in prison or not, under a sentence of imprisonment for any term less than life, or after conviction of and before sentence for, or while in such custody upon a charge of any crime punishable with imprisonment for a term less than life; or (b) being a peace officer of any prison in which such person is lawfully confined, voluntarily and intentionally permits him to escape therefrom.

The proposed clause reads as follows:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment, who, by failing to perform any legal duty, permits a person in his lawful custody on a criminal charge to escape therefrom.

This was the original draft of our Code of 1891, and also 1892, and was struck out in the committee of the whole House of Commons, on the ground that the offence was not essentially a criminal one. But, there is a corresponding provision in the old law of this country, as we have it in the Revised Statutes. This clause is taken from the Imperial draft Bill.

Mr. DAVID TISDALE (South Norfolk). This clause appears to go very far. If, for instance, an officer calls upon persons around him to help him in arresting a criminal, and they do so, and he gets the man in his custody, would it make those persons responsible afterwards, if they did not continue their help?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not think it would. But, if a man were arrested and were placed in the hands of some one, who voluntarily assumes to take control of the prisoner and then through neglect allows him to escape, he would come under this provision.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This seems to me to be a good deal wider than the old law, section 7 of the Revised Statutes. In that law every one having the custody of a prisoner, who allows him, through carelessness, to escape, is guilty of a misdemeanour and liable to fine or imprisonment, in the discretion of the judge. The punishment in the suggested clause is much more severe, and the gravamen of the offence is the failure to perform a legal duty. There need be no intention, which is always the first essential of crime. All that need be proved is simply the failure to perform a legal duty, and for that failure, no matter what may be the nature of the offence that the prisoner may have committed, the person who allows him to escape is liable to a year's imprisonment. I do not know that I am altogether opposed to this change, but, one can see that it is a departure even from the spirit of the old law. That is not in our code to-day, and it is not in the law of England, but merely finds its place in the draft or code under the consideration of the Imperial authorities. I think it is a question that might well be very carefully considered. Perhaps, if, where one or two members of the committee think that in connection with a section changed, the matter might be considered a little, and we could make good progress if we went on with the clauses to which there was no decided objection, and then come back to these.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think the suggestion made by my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is an extremely reasonable one, and one in which I readily acquiesce. But I wish to point out that the departure that he points is not so serious as he seems to think. Under chapter 155 of the Revised Statutes, it speaks of 'any one who carelessly allow any prisoner to escape.' Here it is, 'any one who by failing to perform any legal duty.' I take it that, practically, this section is merely a reproduction of the old law.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The difference is simply in the punishment?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes. Formerly, it was optional whether there should be fine or imprisonment, or fine and imprisonment. Now, it is restricted to imprisonment alone. I would like to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that there is a provision under the code—I cannot place my finger on the clause at the moment—which gives power to a magistrate to fine or imprison in case of misdemeanour. Here it is imprisonment without a fine. If the Chairman will take a note of it we will consider this clause as read to be taken up again. My hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), who is an authority on criminal law in our province is not present, and I have a tacit understanding with him that he shall be present when this code is discussed.

Mr. HAGGART. Would the violation of a provincial Act, which makes a crime, be punishable under this clause?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am sorry to say that my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) has brought up a very wide question, and one that is much discussed—whether or not the provincial legislatures can legislate with respect to the criminal law. They do impose penalties for the infraction of provincial laws. The question of the meaning of the word 'criminal' under the British North America Act has been recently much discussed. But I think that we might leave that matter over for the time being, if my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) will agree.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The clause will stand.

On section to amend section 179.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I do not think this clause goes far enough. My hon. and learned friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) has made clause 179 with a view to making it perfect; but I think a very useful amendment could be made to subclause b of the first subsection. We have recently had exhibited at a theatre at this city plays as corrupting to morals, as degrading to social well-being as any of the things forbidden by subsections a or b or c, either in the clause of the Bill before us or in the clause of the Act; and I would suggest to my hon. friend who has charge of this Bill that as we are legislating in that direction, we had better strike at what is a source of grave danger to Canada at the present time. Unfortunately, the theatrical taste of our friends and cousins below the line, especially in New York and Chicago, has run in gutter lines; and, at the present time, the stage of New York is revolting, from any standpoint of either social or artistic excellence. And, only the other day we had a play put upon the boards of a theatre in this city as degrading—

Mr. INGRAM. What play?

Mr. DAVIN. 'Miss New York Junior.'

An hon. MEMBER. Did you go?

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friends are very curious. I will gratify their curiosity. I did not go.

An hon. MEMBER. How do you know about it?

Mr. DAVIN. I heard from persons who were there the first night, and I was disgusted with what they told me. From what I heard, I have no hesitation in saying—and I can speak with some authority on this subject of artistic theatrical presentation—that nothing more degrading or corrupting to the community could be imagined than that there should be represented before the eyes of men and women young and old—sometimes very young—such a play as this one was described to be. I see it announced that we are to have presented at the Russell Theatre 'Sapho.' Well, I have read of the presentation of 'Sapho' on the stage of New York, and I would not go to see such a play put upon the stage. I have read Daudet's 'Sapho' in the original, and I admire Daudet's genius. But it is genius of the most super-excellent kind, wreaked on filth. To dramatize 'Sapho' and to trace the stages in the vice of this abandoned woman on the boards of the theatre is about the most demoralizing thing that could be done. And it is against the canons of art, it is contrary to the principle of art. Here we have the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) coming forward occasionally with legislation which has no practical bearing in the improving of the morals of society. We have other hon. gentlemen taking an interest in these matters and looking to the amelioration of society, but, doing it in such a way that I confess I do not always feel edified in contemplating their actions. But, those evils that the member for North Norfolk aims at, and which other hon. gentlemen aim at, are trifling compared with the power of a corrupt theatre. I say that it is demoralizing to have in the capital of Canada such a spectacle as was exhibited in a theatre here, a lot of abandoned women exhibiting themselves in such a manner as to be revolting to all decency, and, as I say, contrary to all the canons of art; if they appeared absolutely nude it would not be as revolting to the principles of art as the manner in which I learn they did appear. Now, I suggest to my hon. friend to add to subclause b the following words, and it would then read as follows:

Mr. FITZPATRICK

Publicly exhibits any disgusting object or any indecent show or places on the stage a play or drama, or melodrama, or spectacular entertainment, pandering to sensuality and licentiousness.

I think if we really want to strike at this evil we must make it clear. The words 'publicly exhibits any disgusting object or any indecent show' will not suggest to a public prosecutor what I want to suggest to him, that is, to put down such plays as those that I refer to. We already have in the old Act these words, and will any man tell me that if at the present time Sapho, the heroine, utterly abandoned, played by a woman in New York, herself abandoned, demi-mondaine over the whole play—will any man tell me that if that is brought here to-morrow and played, we shall see anybody going to arrest the manager of that play and have him brought before a magistrate and punished for an action more corrupting to the youth of this capital than any other thing that could possibly be done here? I think that he would leave with the money in his pocket, and with the most perfect impunity. Therefore, I move that these words be added to subclause b after the word 'show':

Or places on the stage a play, or drama, or melodrama, or spectacular entertainment, pandering to sensuality or licentiousness.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth). While I agree with the principles laid down by my hon. and learned friend in regard to the line which parliament should take in matters of this kind, yet, I think we should be very careful in defining the terms in which these offences against art and morals are made criminal offences. I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the very play he has denounced so severely, and which met with so much reprobation by the moral and best social element of New York, was actually brought into court, the actress and the proprietor of the drama were indicted, were tried, and were acquitted. I have seen the terms of the New York Act, which is very similar to this one. Notwithstanding the outcry that was made by the press and pulpit, and by the best moral elements in New York in that very case, apparently with a great deal of justice, yet, after all, it became a question for the jury to decide upon the evidence presented, and in that case, one of the most flagrant, probably, that is likely ever to occur, the parties were acquitted, and, I believe, the play went on immediately afterwards, and is still running. I think my hon. friend made another remark, perhaps, without due consideration, applying an opprobrious epithet to the actress in the case. Having read what appeared in the press at the time, I do not think that that phrase applied to that actress was justified. I notice in a New York paper yesterday that an action has been brought by a person alleged to be aggrieved against a clergyman for the use of language of a somewhat similar character. It is true that the play may be very demoralizing, and the great genius exhibited in the words of the writer may attract a great deal of admiration, yet, the artists may be persons of irreproachable character, and they may look at the matter purely from an artistic standpoint. A person's private character and a public exhibition of indecency are two entirely different things.

The amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman opens up a greater question than the clause we have before us. I think the more general this can be made the better, and the larger scope it will give to a judge and jury for reaching a decision. There can be no doubt that an exhibition of indecent pictures upon the show-boards have a demoralizing tendency; and many of our plays of the lower order are of a character very annoying to large portions of the community. But, it is a difficult matter, as I believe every member of the committee will agree, to define the offence in such a way that it can be promptly punished. I do not suppose any member of this committee intends to institute a censorship over the literary portion of plays of this kind, except in that way which will enable an offender to be brought before a magistrate for representing improper things on the stage. That opens up one of the most difficult questions that a legislature has to deal with. I admit that it is very desirable to deal with such questions if it is possible to do so; but, I rather advocate leaving this clause as it is, because I know of no actual concrete case that has been tried in any particular case in Canada in which this law has been found to be a failure.

Mr. TISDALE. In dealing with these matters I have great admiration for plain English. My hon. friend from Assinibola (Mr. Davin) may think that his words add light, but, I do not think so. I am inclined to think the clause as it at present exists is sufficient to cover the case, but, when my hon. friend comes in with his euphonious language, I confess that I always get a little alarmed. I think it would confuse those who have justice to administer, and that is the reason why we should not change the clause as it is. That is what the law has been. If he speaks correctly, and his views are those of common sense, as to what is decent, or indecent, I think we would have had some cases which would give us an opportunity of deciding whether it is broad enough or not. Somebody has to take the initiative, if people are shocked. I am one of those who, unless the necessity arises, do not want too much law. I trust to the good common sense and decency of the people, and if an indecent exhibition is presented action will be taken and the performers will soon get out of town. The Criminal Code was an admirable work and imposed a great deal of labour on the members of this House. Many of the alterations are technical, and they are very necessary, but we should not, without an absolute case arising to justify it run the risk of confusing those who have to administer justice. Unless there is a positive case shown where a failure of justice has occurred, I think it would be unwise to make a change, because I think of all the undesirable things it is to produce an unsettled state of mind as to what is the intention of the law and what is not. The plainest language that every one can understand should be employed in the law so that there shall be no uncertainty as to what it means, and what it means should be enforced. I think this clause is broad enough, and that it will cover every reasonable proposition such as that which the hon. member for Western Assiniboia has brought up.

Mr. DAVIN. One word in reference to the precision of language. There is no want of precision in the words: 'or places on the stage a play.'

Mr. FLINT. Let me ask my hon. friend a question right here. These words 'places upon the stage a play,' open up a perfect mine of dispute. Does the hon. gentleman mean to apply them to literary performances, stage settings, pictures and so.

Mr. DAVIN. 'Or drama, or melodrama.' I must say, with all deference to my hon. and learned friend opposite (Mr. Flint) and to my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Tisdale), that the schoolmaster in Canada has not done justice to their great natural capacity for education if he has put into their heads the notion that the words 'play,' or 'drama,' or 'melodrama,' or 'spectacular entertainment' are not definite words.

Mr. TISDALE. They are all covered by the word 'show,' in my opinion.

Mr. DAVIN. If they are all covered by the word 'show,' what harm can there be in enumerating the particulars that are covered by the general term

Mr. TISDALE. You would make it doubtful if you enumerated them whether the clause covered everything but those that you mentioned, whereas, by using general terms you make it evident that it covers everything.

Mr. FLINT. I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) to define the word 'melodrama.' It is not capable of legal definition.

Mr. DAVIN. The contention of these hon. gentlemen is, that if we add to the word 'show,' 'or play, or drama, or melodrama, or spectacular entertainment,' we would make it more difficult to procure evidence of an offence against art and morality, than if we left the clause as it is at the present time. 'Pandering to sensuality or licentiousness.' That definitely points to what is not pointed out in the clause as it stands. 'Publicly exhibits any disgusting object.' A disgusting object is not an object that panders to sensuality. Objects that pander to sensuality are sometimes clothed in the elements that appeal to the æsthetic sense. A discoloured and unwashed hag would be a disgusting object. That hag would not appeal to sensuality. But hon. members can very well understand that the very opposite of a discoloured and unwashed hag through behaving herself improperly would appeal to sensuality. 'Or any indecent show.' Why I object to leaving the phrase as it is, is that it will not cover the point. Any man who knows the meaning of the word 'show,' or the word 'indecent,' knows what the added language is intended to cover. It may be said to me: How are you going to define what panders to sensuality, or licentiousness? I say that is a question for the courts. The morality of the community as embodied in the courts, will interpret these words. The hon. gentlemen are really, I may tell them, not in a position to treat me, on this question, in a de haut en bas manner, because I have seen, on the very greatest stages of the world, every kind of play, every kind of melodrama and every kind of spectacular entertainment. I have seen noble results produced by high drama. On the other hand, I have seen bad results produced by depraved drama. In regard to the defence that has been made by my hon. friend for the impersonator of Sapho, it is one of the most extraordinary things I have heard of that an hon. gentleman, who is, himself, not merely a family man, but a moral teacher of the community, should lay down the proposition that a woman can impersonate for two or three hours, before a public audience the heroine of a play, the heroine's whole life being one of abandoned sensuality and yet remain pure. All the incidents of her life are sensual. All the incidents of her life represent an abandonment to sensuality, and yet the hon. gentleman, contrary to the book that he professes to honour and, I believe, teaches, thinks that you can touch pitch and not be defiled. What the actor or actress does is to lend himself or herself to the character that he or she presents. This clause as amended would hit the actress or the actor, who improperly is representing an otherwise fit character for the stage. I do not know whether my hon. friend (Mr. Flint) has even seen La Grande Duchesse.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. FLINT. I have.

Mr. DAVIN. I see he bows to it. I hope my hon. friend was as much edified with it as a lady in Toronto, a pillar in the Presbyterian Church, was with another opera that she went to see. I forget the name of the French actress who used to impersonate La Fille de Madame Angot; but after seeing the impersonation, this Toronto lady came home and when asked the next day what she thought of it, she said: Oh, it was as edifying as Dr. Topp; and Dr. Topp was the most solemn preacher I ever listened to from the pulpit. However, after seeing La Fille de Madame Angot kicking her heels upon the stage, this lady decided that she was as edifying as a sermon from Dr. Topp. I know my hon. friend (Mr. Flint), has a mind hinged on recondite principles and it is possible that if he had seen Schneider play La Grande Duchesse, that he might have been edified, but I may tell him that the way I have seen Schneider play La Grande Duchesse was immoral; it was suggestive; it was vile, although I grant it is possible to play it in a way that might not be offensive. Here in Canada we have advantages, political and social, that are not enjoyed in the United States. We have a more democratic form of government, and I hold that our politics and our social life have advantages as compared with those of the great cities of the United States. I do not want to see any replica in Canada of the New York stage—not because I am opposed to the theatre, but because I am in favour of the theatre; not because I think theatre-going wrong, but because I take the same view as Mr. Gladstone about the theatre: That the high drama, the drama that will really express the genius of the time, the drama that will really embody before the people their best ideas; is one of the noblest stimulants to high thought and great endeavour. Feeling, that just as the depravation of the best is the worst, I feel that you could not strike more insidiously a blow at the morality of Canada at the security of our rising sons, and at the security of our rising daughters, too, than to tolerate in our theatres such exhibitions as are to be found every day of the year in New York. As to this very exhibition spoken of, I would not go to it; I have not been to it, although I have recently come from New York. I would not go to see Sapho, I would not go to see any woman so defile my idea of what true womanhood should be as to impersonate the heroine of Daudet's novel and play. It has been found necessary to guard against the bad in the theatre in the history of every community in the past, and in modern times too. Every government that has known what its duty is to its people has sought to guard the theatre as it would guard the wells from which we drink; as it would guard the milk that is taken around to our homes. It would guard the theatre where our youths go and where they can either be ennobled, or be corrupted. The theatre can become as powerful an engine for the improvement of the community as a great pulpit; on the other hand it can become as corrupting, as degrading, as demoralizing and ultimately as weakening, physically and morally, to the community, as any immoral force that ever emanated from darker regions, than we care to think of.

Mr. FLINT. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), is not justified in his assumption that I and others were reflecting on his method of remedying these evils. What I said was: That I entirely agreed with him in the main outline of his remarks, but I thought the language of his amendment was not so well calculated to meet the difficulty as the language of the law as it now stands. That was no justification for the hon. gentleman indulging in a certain amount of badinage. Of course I do not myself mind it, but I think it was unnecessary to introduce it in this discussion. The only point here is the definition of a crime, and when we come to punish people for a crime which we are creating by statute, the words to be used in defining that crime are of some importance. Although there is great literary elegance in the wording of the amendment, I fear it will not afford the remedy that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) desires.

Mr. BRITTON. Even though I run the risk of having my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), indulge in satire against me, I must declare that I do not think his amendment should be added to this clause. The moment we attempt to include in words, everything we want to proscribe, we are running the risk that anything not enumerated will be held to be excluded. Whereas, if you leave the general words of the Act as they are, then if there is anything which may be considered an offence, the public prosecutor can lay a charge without being hampered by definitions. The moment you classify particular crimes, then those who desire to violate the law exercise their ingenuity to discover something that cannot be brought within the particular letter of the offence stated in the statute. Our experience is that it is not very difficult for those of evil intent to evade the letter of any law, and the more particularity you have, the more easy it seems to be to evade. It ought not to be forgotten that this clause appears in section 179 of the Act, and is not altered by the Bill before us. The section is printed in extenso, I think very properly so, to show what was the original law, and what is now proposed as an amendment. This clause comes before the House with the amendment proposed by my hon. friend as an addition, which I think we ought not to accept. The law has been fairly well carried out; prosecutions have been successfully laid under it; and no difficulty has been experienced in stopping indecent shows. The Criminal Act of 1869 was a most valuable piece of legislation. Although the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) says that the Criminal Code was a very great work, and so it was, in respect to involving a great deal of labour and pains on the part of the gentleman who was its father, yet we cannot lose sight of the fact that from 1892 down to to-day, in every session of parliament there has been tinkering at it to make amendments to it which have been found necessary. I think it is not very difficult to see how that is. In the framing of that code there was an attempt to provide for every possible case that could arise, whereas the Act of 1869 and the criminal law before that dealt with offences in more general terms, according to the common sense and the experience of judges and juries. I hope the committee will not accept the amendment which my learned friend offers.

Mr. DAVIN. I should like to ask my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) what is the wording of the Criminal Code of New York. I understand him to say that it is precisely the same as this.

Mr. FLINT. I said I did not remember the exact wording, but that it is very similar to this. It is very general. I saw it in a journal at the time of the discussion.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend says that it is not necessary to add these words, because in New York, where the words of the code are almost precisely the same as the words in our code, the impersonator of 'Sapho' and the manager were brought before the courts and were acquitted by the jury. That is an extraordinary piece of reasoning.

Does it not suggest that the code in New York is not effective or stringent enough? In regard to the argument which we have had ad nauseum. I must confess, from all the learned Thebans who have spoken on this question that you must not define too closely, but that you had better have one or two words, what do you find my hon. friend doing? Subclause a, as it stands at present, reads thus:

Sells or exposes for sale or public view any obscene book or other printed or written matter, or any picture, photograph, model or other object tending to corrupt morals.

Is 'tending to corrupt morals' different in character and style from 'pandering to sensuality and licentiousness?' Are they not both phrases that would leave the interpretation to the court? But if you are only to use a few words or one word, and make it as general as possible, my hon. friend should pare down the clause instead of amplifying it as he is doing. According to the reasoning of these gentlemen, 'something printed or written' would cover both 'book and printed or written matter;' 'object' would cover 'picture, photograph, model or other object.' Yet we find that the authors of the Act from which this was taken, who were great English draughtsmen, did not take the view of my hon. and learned friend, but thought it was necessary to define, just as I think it is necessary to define. I am not at all convinced by the arguments to which I have listened; in fact, in the face of the clause as it is before us, and in face of common sense, they are futile. Therefore, I hope the committee will pass the amendment which I suggest, which will greatly improve the Act.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am sure every one in the House agrees fully with all that has been said by the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) as to the necessity of keeping the representations on the stage in this country absolutely pure. At the same time we must remember that we have had this law in force since 1869, and the hon. gentleman was obliged to pay a tribute to the morality that exists in this country when he drew a distinction between Canada and the United States in that respect. If the law has been sufficiently effective up to the present time to draw his approbation, it seems to me that we have all the guarantees that we require. While I would not put myself against my hon. friend on a question of phraseology or artistic knowledge, I think I might venture to make the observation that the words of the statute as we have had them since 1867, are quite sufficient to meet the case. The words of paragraph b are:

Whoever publicly exhibits any disgusting object or any indecent show, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment.

Mr. DAVIN.

My hon. friend has not pointed out in what respect his amendment improves these words in such a way as to make them extend to what the present law does not reach.

Mr. DAVIN. Take the play of Sapho—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would unhesitatingly say that the law as it now stands, would meet the play of Sapho as that play has been described by my hon. friend. I know nothing about it myself. I have not had the advantage that my hon. friend has had of being able to appreciate Sapho as it has been presented in New York and I, consequently, would defer to his judgment.

Mr. DAVIN. You have read Daudet's book?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I know something about Daudet's works, but I would not like to say too much on this subject lest I might be catechised too closely by my hon. friend. I would like him to say, with his knowledge of Sapho, if we could not suppress such a play under the law as we have it at present.

Mr. DAVIN. The only phrase in paragraph b, under which those who produce the play Sapho could be prosecuted would be the words 'indecent show.' But I submit that these words would not suggest to the ordinary prosecutor to deal with such a play, but if you would adopt the language that I suggest a provincial prosecutor would see at once the necessity of taking notice of such a play.

Mr. M. J. F. QUINN (St. Ann's, Montreal). I do not think that anybody can question the necessity of some legislation for protecting the youth of our country, both male and female, against certain exhibitions, unfortunately quite common in Canada, in the form of theatrical performances. I quite recognize the difficulty which the Department of Justice has in dealing with this subject, but it seems to me that, with so many lawyers in this House, we ought to be able to devise some form of language that will prevent these disgraceful theatrical exhibitions which are common in our large cities and which are so largely patronized by the youth of our country. I do not agree with my hon. friend the Solicitor General when he says that a theatrical performance would come under paragraph b. I do not think that any magistrate would commit to trial persons who had put upon the boards theatrical performances calculated to injure the morals of our people, because the word 'show' does not cover such performances. A theatrical performance comprises a good deal more than a show. The indecency in such a performance, it is quite true, may be in the exhibition itself, but it also may consist in the language, and you could hardly call the use of indecent language an indecent show. It struck me that the object of my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) would be met by making paragraph b read as follows :

Publicly exhibits any disgusting object or any indecent show or indecent theatrical performance.

I think that the term 'indecent theatrical performance' would serve all the purposes which my hon. friend from Assiniboia has in view. There is always a great deal of difficulty in administering the criminal law in any form, and a great deal of danger in making a criminal Act too precise in its wording. We very often defeat the object we have in view by making the language too precise, but I think that the use of the term 'indecent theatrical performance' would prevent the people who give these performances from coming to the country at all, and thus strike at the very root of the evil. I throw this out as a suggestion with the idea of meeting the view of every hon. gentleman, for our desire is to put a stop to these horrible exhibitions which are given daily in our large cities, and which are frequented by the youth of our country. I would like to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) one other question. I understand the reasons for the amendments, except one in subsection 3—'it shall be a question for the court or judge.' I find in the law, it says: 'It shall be a question of law.' How is the Act improved by the change from 'law' to 'court or judge'?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There has been some difference of opinion expressed in the courts as to the meaning of the word 'question of law,' so we changed it to the present form. To my mind, it is the very same thing; but, it seems that it is necessary to make it perfectly clear that the jury has nothing to do with it.

Mr. QUINN. Do you think it makes it clearer?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think it makes it absolutely certain.

Mr. DAVIN. I agree with the Solicitor General as to the advantage of the change he is making. But, if we are to adopt the reasoning we have just heard, why not leave it vague?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The clause will stand.

On clause to amend section 180,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In this case the word 'scurrilous' is added.

Mr. DAVIN. I can see the advantage of the change, but, again, why make the addition?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This paragraph was originally taken from the Post Office Act, and in the adaptation the word

'scurrilous' was left out. It has been found in the application of the law that it was useful to have this word added. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has not been able to show that in the application of the law it was found necessary to make the amendment he suggested.

Mr. QUINN. This is to make it conform to the Post Office Act?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, it was found that some language was used on postal cards which should not be permitted, and yet which was not covered by the terms we had under the old section.

On clause to amend section 180,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The amendment here is in the addition of the word 'shop or store.'

Mr. QUINN. I think there is objection to such words as those at the end of subsection b. I think it is opening the door to a great deal of blackmail.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This is suggested as the result of reading the reports of the National Council of Women of Canada. I do not want to discuss details, but, this meets a difficulty that will occur to all of us with reference to people employed in our large departmental stores. Persons, while not directly employed, may be in receipt of a salary, even working in rooms outside. I do not need to be too precise; I am willing to give information if necessary, but the hon. gentleman will see that it is not necessary. The difficulty which my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Quinn) suggests is, to a certain extent, met by the provisions added by the Senate, that no such persons shall be convicted under this clause under the evidence of one witness only unless such evidence be corroborated.

Mr. QUINN. As I have said, the difficulty I see in the clause is that it leaves the door open to a great deal of blackmail. I know of a case in Montreal which was certainly a very important factor in the amendment of the Act. I had occasion to interview the Minister of Justice about it at the time it occurred. The law as it originally read provided no punishment for the offence. Any one who will look at section 183 will see that while the offence is described, there is no punishment, and that is the reason it was re-drawn in this form. But, while you are providing for the punishment for what is known to be a great offence, it is right that you should be careful to protect innocent men against designing people. There are, unfortunately, too many of these designing people, and many of them belong to what is often referred to as the weaker sex. Officials in large establishments are more liable to the attacks of these designing women than any others in the community. Take a young man who is a cashier in a large departmental store. He pays every woman, in fact, every person in the establishment. A charge is made against him under this section. What possible defence has he? It is true that it is provided that he shall not be convicted upon the evidence of one witness unless the evidence is corroborated. But, the most innocent action of that young man would be considered as corroborative testimony. It is not necessary to suggest what would be regarded as corroborative evidence, in addition to the fact that he was seen walking with her or driving with her in a cab—what other conditions would be sufficient to fasten on him irrevocably the offence she charged him with. I do not think we should say that the men who either directly or indirectly pay wages to the women in large departmental stores should be liable to conviction under this section.

Mr. BRITTON. Do I understand there is a provision regarding corroborative evidence?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, a provision made by the Senate:

No person shall be convicted of an offence under this section upon the evidence of one witness only unless that witness be corroborated in some material particular by evidence implicating the accused.

Mr. BRITTON. I do not see that that alters the law as it stands, because section 684 of the Code provides that all offences from 182 to 188 inclusive, require corroborative evidence. Perhaps for greater caution it is just as well, as the Senate has done so, to add it to this section.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not entertain any doubt that the hon. member for Pictou is absolutely correct. At the same time, as we have the Bill from the Senate, I do not see any real objection to allowing it to go through in its present form.

Mr. TISDALE. This will make responsible the proprietor of a store who may have a great many women in his employment whom he does not even know, because he furnishes the money to pay them their wages. Before, the law made the foreman responsible because he was supposed to have influence over the female employees; but this enlarges the section and makes responsible any one who directly or indirectly pays the wages. In many large stores there may be hundreds of women whom he does not even know by name, and still the proprietor would be responsible because he furnishes the money.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would remind the member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) that there are two amendments. The first amendment is to extend the law as it now stands to those who are employed in a shop or store in addition to those who are employed in a factory, mill or workshop. To that there can be no serious objection. But the objection the hon. member for Norfolk makes is that responsibility attaches to those who directly or indirectly pay the wages to these people. I understand that objection, and I think the section ought to be allowed to stand.

Section 183a,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am willing that anything that is found in the least degree objectionable or even debatable, should stand over. But I would like any hon. gentleman to state his objections so that I may have the advantage of them when I take the matter up again. This is a very serious clause, one of the most serious of all the clauses in the amendments which we are introducing. I have my own views on the subject, but I would like to hear what can be said in opposition to it.

Mr. BRITTON. My objection to that clause is that I think it means a great deal more than was meant. A charge has to be proved with the strictness required in any criminal case. There may be a great deal proved in a case of this kind that will impute to the person looseness, impute to her a character that cannot be strictly proved against her, and yet that ought to be taken into consideration in court. It requires the burden of proof to be so strict that in nine cases out of ten the proof would absolutely fail, and if it did fail of course the statement of the prosecutrix, if corroborated at all, would lead to conviction.

Mr. QUINN. I would ask the Solicitor General to leave this section over also. I ask him to leave it over because I am not prepared to say how much the change here shocks me, because it does shock me. But how far it changes the law as it now exists, it is impossible for me to say offhand.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It changes it very materially.

Mr. QUINN. I recognized that at once. I cannot remember any case at the moment that I could cite as an example showing how far this changes the law. I would like to think over it for a time before consenting to the passage of the section.

Mr. TISDALE. It seems to me this clause makes it absolutely necessary that the person should prove a negative. You cannot bring ordinary inferences to bear, it is an absolute, legal, statement that you must prove, and that would mean positive evidence.

Mr. FLINT. Perhaps the hon. gentleman, when it comes up again, will be in a position to inform the committee why this was inserted. I do not see any particular reason for it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The change is not only a very grave one, but it is so radical that we need to go very carefully. This danger of blackmail has always stayed the hand of the legislature in throwing absolute protection around every individual. At the very inception of that legislation, one of the safeguards against blackmailing was putting the burden of proof on the person complaining. That removed somewhat the danger of a designing character making money out of this legislation by perjury. Now, if the law is being extended in the direction that we see in the substantive clause, it seems to me the House should hesitate before making so drastic a change at this 183a. I think by the time we come to consider it again, we will have an opportunity of looking into the exact history of the substantive clause itself. I think the language in the second line of b 'previously chaste,' and so on, was purposely and expressly put in originally to guard against the danger that section 183 is now, apparently, opening up again.

Mr. QUINN.

Mr. TISDALE. You see the age is 21 years. It is not as if you were dealing with girls of a more tender age. It is mature women, and we are making it a criminal offence what under the law, otherwise, is not an offence in the criminal sense, and extending the protection, to which I do not object, to the store and shop. I remember that this section was discussed at the time the Criminal Code was passed, or, it may not have been at that particular time, but, at the different times that this sort of legislation has come up. We must not, to apply an old adage, because we have walked a long way, get on the run and do things that are very unfair because there are young men as well as young women in the world. Their constitutions are a good deal alike, and we are making a new class of offence that was not an offence before. When we are extending the provisions of the section to the people of such mature age as that we should very seriously consider the matter. I think the danger is very great when dealing with people of such a mature age. At first we went as far as 18. I believe, it once passed through the committee making it applicable to persons of 30 years of age, but the age limit was put back to 21 years by the Senate. I mention this in connection with the provision of 183a; the gravity of the change did not strike me as it appears to me now. We must not allow the desire of preventing what may be a moral evil to lead us to deal with morals in such a manner as to make it a criminal offence. I am not one of those who are inclined to go further than is actually necessary, or to make laws unless they will probably do some good. I hope, with the hon. member for Yarmouth, that the hon. Solicitor General will be able to give us some reason why he wants to pass this clause.

Mr. DAVIN. In regard to 183a I quite approve of the view that has been expressed by the hon. gentleman at my right (Mr. Tisdale). It is enough to read it. It is a perfectly stupendous thing to put the burden of proof on the accused under the circumstances. I think that the hon. Solicitor General, when he considers it, will not press 183a.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I agree with almost everything that has been said by my hon. friends opposite in reference to the objectionable features of 183a, in so far as it casts the question of proof upon the accused. I would like to draw the attention of my legal friends, on the other side of the House, to the law as it now is. By section 181 of the Criminal Code, you will find that:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who seduces or has illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character of or above the age of fourteen years and under the age of eighteen years.

Section 183 of the Bill extends the age to 21 years, but it also provides that it must be a person of previously chaste character. I am not aware that the case has ever arisen in this country to the best of my knowledge, but in the United States, the question of the burden of proof has been discussed. Under the law, as we have it here, upon whose shoulders does the burden of proof rest as to previously chaste character? Is it for the woman, or for the prosecution to prove, or would it be for the man to prove that the woman was of unchaste character? I am not aware that the question as to the shoulders upon which the burden of proof must rest has ever been settled in this country. It has been discussed and settled in the United States, and the object of 183a is to permanently fix, by legislation, the burden of proof on the accused. To my judgment it seems that it is a somewhat unfair responsibility to put upon the accused, who, according to the law, when he pleads not guilty is presumed to be not guilty. This would be practically setting at defiance that principle of law which is that every person is presumed to be innocent until he is proved guilty. It is for us to say whether we can accept that or not. I do not think, if the clause is to be allowed to stand, that I can give the committee much better information at a subsequent period than I have given upon this subject. It is for us to consider and take the responsibility.

Mr. QUINN. Mr. Chairman, as the clause is to be allowed to stand, I would like, while we are discussing the subject to invite the attention of the committee to the words:

The burden of proof of previous unchastity on the part of the girl or woman under the three next preceding sections shall be upon the accused.

One of the clauses preceding applies to seduction under promise of marriage. Section 182 reads as follows :

Every one, above the age of twenty-one years, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, who, under promise of marriage, seduces and has illicit connection with any unmarried female of previously chaste character, and under twenty-one years of age.

So that a young man of 21 years and a month may be indicted for seducing, under promise of marriage, a previously chaste girl of 21 years less a month on whose testimony alone he could be convicted of that offence, and it would rest upon the young man of 21 years and one month to prove that she was unchaste before. Nobody who knows anything about the world will pretend that a young man of twenty-one years is in any way equal to a woman of 21 years.

On section 210,

Mr. QUINN. The intention here is to make the word 'guardian' have the same meaning under section 186a as it has in sections 183 and 186, which is :

The word 'guardian' includes any person who has in law or in fact the custody of a child.

Now I think that is rather drastic when applied to this section.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is no reason why a tutor in our province, who has guardianship in law, should not be responsible. As to guardianship, in fact, there are a certain number of institutions that are charged with the support of waifs who are put under their control, and although they may have no legal guardianship, why should they not be made responsible for their support.

Mr. QUINN. But this is made a criminal offence.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If a man assumes a guardianship, in fact, I can see no reason why his responsibility should not be the same as a guardianship in law.

Mr. QUINN. There is a vast difference between one who assumes guardianship and one who accidentally may become a guardian in fact. A person, who by charity, would take a waif off the street for a day or two, would, under this law, be compelled to support that waif for all time, until he got some one to relieve him of the responsibility.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Oh no.

Mr. TISDALE. But the question is whether he would not. If we pass this, we will endanger the responsibility of any one who feels inclined to be charitable. You have to be very careful about these things in the interest of the child itself, as well as in the interests of the charitably disposed. We should make this very plain, and I think we had better let the section stand.

Mr. QUINN. This amendment appears to be in direct contravention of section 210 as it stands.

Mr. QUINN.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am quite willing to let the clause stand.

On section 331a,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is the explanation of this ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This has reference to the stealing of cattle on the ranches in the North-west Territories. It is designed to meet a point not met by section 331.

Mr. TISDALE. Was this clause submitted to the cattle associations of the west ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not prepared to answer that ; but the suggestion of it came from the west.

Mr. TISDALE. I have had some experience in that country, and this is a pretty broad clause, and might be a very unjust one, unless it has been considered by those who understand it. To make a criminal offence of having in one's possession stray cattle is a pretty drastic measure. The general law provides, in the eastern provinces, at all events, plenty of punishment for offences of this kind ; I have known people to be convicted of stealing cattle under it. This amendment will affect the general law all over the country, and it is a new class of legislation relating to dealings with tens of thousands of cattle, which we are considering, without any knowledge of the state of affairs that exists already, or any knowledge of the opinions of those, many in number, who will be affected by it, except, I presume, somebody who has made representations.

Mr. DAVIN. We have an ordinance which deals with these Acts, that goes as near as it possibly can to make them a criminal offence. I am not sure that this goes one whit too far in punishing the offence aimed at, because there is no reason whatever why a man should mistake another's cattle for his own, but there is great temptation to dishonest men to do it. In the case of calves that are not branded, the temptation is great to a dishonest man to brand them as his own if they become mixed with his herd. If the person on whom the wrong has been committed does not observe this in time, it is almost impossible to bring the offence home to its perpetrator. Happily in many cases, the time that elapses before discovery is not sufficient to deprive the owner of the means of proving his property. For instance, in the case of a calf which has been improperly branded and has got mixed up with the calves of another rancher, when the round-up takes place, the calves will remain with their mothers, and the proper owner is in the position to apply the great test. If the mother bears his brand, all he has to do is to put the calf by the side of the mother, and the court can at once determine whether the calf has been improperly branded or not. But the crime is such a serious one, when you take into consideration the class of people who commit it—for it can only be committed by men in whom criminality is greater than it would be in the case of ordinary criminals—that I am inclined to favour legislation that will prove a strong deterrent.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). I would suggest that at this hour the committee should rise and ask leave to sit again, because the measure is altogether too important to be properly considered at this late hour.

Mr. TISDALE. The question, to my mind, is whether we should make this a criminal offence or leave it solely to be dealt with by the civil courts. It is quite possible that mistakes may occur and calves be wrongly branded without any dishonest intention, and we must not forget that the ranchmen have district associations of their own, and are subject to the regulations of this association framed to meet the difficulty we are now attempting to deal with, and in carrying out these regulations they have to give and take a little. I find in this measure that the proposed clause 707a provides :

In any prosecution, proceeding or trial for any offence under section 331a, a brand or mark, duly recorded or registered under the provisions of any Act, ordinance or law on any cattle, shall be prima facie evidence that such cattle are the property of the registered owner of such brand or mark.

The word 'Act' would no doubt mean an Act of parliament, but I do not know whether the word 'ordinance' would mean an ordinance of the territory.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. A territory.

Mr. TISDALE. I do not know how the registration in the Territories is regulated, but in most of the cattle countries there is no law or ordinance or Act to cover this. I think it is covered by the regulations of the cattle associations of the districts, and under these regulations the difficulties are settled in the general round up. The point is whether we should make a criminal offence of a matter which, so far as any evidence before us shows, the ranchmen have so far managed under their own regulations. That is a point which we should consider, but as the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) suggests, I think, it is about time that we should adjourn. I think it is about time that the committee should rise that we may consider these matters more fully, because it is pretty hard to follow these changes. There is a brand ordinance, and a very good one, dealing with the brands in the North-west Territories. Its provision as regards the punishment of any infringement is as follows :

Any person who brands or directs—

It goes on to mention three or four cases which are practically the three cases mentioned here——shall be guilty of an offence, and upon summary conviction thereof before a justice of the peace, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $200.

After all, that makes a criminal offence, and is an assumption of the right on the part of the Territorial legislature to infringe upon our domain of Dominion legislation. I think in most cases this will be effectual enough, but there are cases of wanton designed and carefully planned offences. I have heard on pretty good authority of cases of men who are supposed to have made themselves pretty well off by a systematic stealing of other men's cattle. It is a very easy thing to do, and I have stated to the committee the only possible protection. Suppose, that the mother gets killed, or if a man were to get the mother away from the calf, there is no means whatever of proving ownership. I consider this is a case where we should step in with criminal legislation. Though there is a chance, it is the slightest possible chance, of injuring innocent men. But I join in the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Britton) that we should rise.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I agree with that view. I may say that I am obliged to my hon. friends for the assistance they have given in the discussion of the code. I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, May 7, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 150) respecting the Salisbury and Harvey Railway Company.—(Mr. Lewis.)

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Picton). I wish to ask a question with regard to a supplementary return in connection with the steamship John C. Barr. In the papers brought down, there is a letter addressed to the collector of customs at Boston by the Deputy Minister of Marine, dated February 27, 1899, the last paragraph of which is as follows :

I have not received any reply to my letters of November 10 and 15 last relative to the evidence on which you gave certain vessels British registers.

The correspondence is complete, with the exception of the letter of November 15, 1898. The letter of the 10th is brought down but not the letter of the 15th, and I would be very much obliged if that letter could be made the subject of a further supplementary return, in compliance of the order of the House, dated February 12, 1900, and for convenience the reference is No. 26, sessional papers No. 63. The first part of the correspondence was between the Department of Marine and the collector of Dawson, and subsequently transferred to the collector of customs, and these documents, of course, will not possibly be in the Department of Customs, but I would ask the Minister of Customs to kindly make a note of it and bring it to the attention of his colleague, who is not in his place.

Although the hon. Minister of Agriculture is not in his place, I would like to call attention to a return, perhaps connected with his department, but possibly connected with the Department of the Interior. I refer to the report of Mr. W. H. Lynch. On April 19, 1899, a question was asked by Mr. Powell, and the Minister of the Interior replied that the report would be laid on the Table when ordered by the House. On May 29, 1899, an order was obtained for a copy of the report referred to, but so far as I have been able to discover, the main report has been omitted, and the only part brought down is a draft Bill from Mr. Lynch with regard to mining regulations, and a letter from Mr. Lynch, of March 20, 1899, in which he says that he incloses a draft of the new code of mining regulations, such as called for by his main report. It is that main report I would like to see.

LOBSTER FISHERIES.

Mr. G. V. McINERNEY (Kent, N.B.) I wish to bring to the attention, particularly of the hon. Minister of Marine, a matter of considerable importance, affecting a large number of fishermen along the Atlantic seaboard. Some time ago, in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for King's, P.E.I., (Mr. Macdonald) the hon. minister said that fishermen engaged in the lobster fisheries would not be allowed to set out their traps before the beginning of the season for lobster fishing along the coast, and I understand that since then a regulation has been published to that effect. I would like to press on the attention of the minister the great damage that may ensue to a number of the fishermen if this regulation should be put in force. The hon. gentleman understands perfectly well what it means to set a line of lobster traps. By the report of the department for 1899, I see that the average number of traps to each fishing establishment is at least 2,000. The setting out of 2,000 traps means a line fully five miles in length. These traps are set at a distance of from two to five miles from the shore out on the Atlantic Ocean. A large line, called the 'set line,' is put out anchored and buoyed so as to set the traps, and then hauling-up lines are attached to each buoy, and these traps are set in eight, nine and ten fathoms of water.

Mr CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

ROYAL ASSENT TO BILLS.

A Message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows :

Mr. Speaker,—

His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of your honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, with the House, went up to the Senate Chamber.

And being returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name the Royal Assent to the following Bills :

An Act respecting the Kaslo and Lardo-Duncan Railway Company.

An Act respecting the British Columbia Southern Railway Company.

An Act respecting the Montreal and Ottawa Railway Company.

An Act to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

An Act respecting the Canada and Michigan Bridge and Tunnel Company.

An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

An Act respecting the Hereford Railway Company.

An Act respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.

An Act respecting the River St. Clair Railway Bridge and Tunnel Company.

An Act respecting the Canada Southern Bridge Company.

An Act respecting the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company.

An Act to incorporate the Port Dover, Brantford, Berlin and Goderich Railway Company.

An Act respecting the Supreme Court of the North-west Territories.

An Act to incorporate the Canadian Steel Company.

An Act respecting the members of the North-west Mounted Police Force on Active Service in South Africa.

An Act respecting La Banque Jacques Cartier and to change its name to La Banque Provinciale du Canada.

An Act respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company.

An Act respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.

An Act to amend the Act to provide for the Conditional Liberation of Penitentiary Convicts.

LOBSTER FISHERIES.

Mr. McINERNEY. The setting out of such a large number of traps is quite a serious matter for the fishermen. In fair weather, and with open boats, which they generally use, this takes up a week of time, and, in stormy weather, from ten days to a fortnight. When it is understood that the lobster fishing season lasts only ten weeks, it will be seen how important it is that the fishermen should not lose the first couple of weeks, the most valuable time of the fishery. I do not say that the regulation will affect all districts alike. To illustrate, I may give a case in point. In Northumberland Straits, there are two districts. In the northern district, the season begins early in the year, and fishermen would not set out traps before the season begins, but in the lower district, which starts at a point in the middle of the Kent County coast, and where the season begins on May 25, the fishermen can, long before May 25, get out traps and be ready for fishing when the season begins. Now, this is an important matter, because the lobster fishing is one of the most important branches of the fishing industry in this country. By the return last year, I see that millions of dollars are invested in plant, and that 16,000 people are engaged in this industry. As this is a matter of such great importance, I hope the Minister will reconsider his decision and will rescind the regulation if it has been issued and published, and will not take away from these people the right they have always enjoyed. I cannot understand why the regulation should have been passed at all. It may be said that the fishermen may illegally fish before the season begins. But, that is no argument. There is no reason why they should. Officers are scattered along the shore to see that the fishermen do not fish before the season begins, and, to punish the people by taking away two weeks of the season, because they might break the law by fishing before hand is illogical and will not strike the fishermen as reasonable—nor, when fairly presented, I believe, will it strike the minister as reasonable. I hope that the minister will see to it at once. The time is short. This is May 7, and the season begins on the 25th of this month. I hope this regulation will be rescinded.

Mr. PRIOR. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Prior), to allow me. I did not rise at once, because I thought somebody else might desire to speak on this subject. I appreciate the importance of the lobster fishing as much as the hon. member for Kent, N.B., (Mr. McInerney) does. I know that the facts are as he states them, that this fishing industry is a most important one for the maritime provinces generally; and it is because I realize the importance of the industry and am desirous of protecting it, that I am so anxious to see reasonable and prudent regulations carried out. Everybody knows that unless we adopt reasonable and prudent regulations and carry them out, nothing will save it from absolute extinction—as it is now extinct on the sea coast of the United States—this industry, which brings in three and a half millions of dollars to our people, will be utterly wiped out. Therefore, while it may make one popular for the time being, to extend the season, or to give a number of days before the season begins, and a number of days after it is over—in other words, to do everything possible to nullify the regulations—I submit to my hon. friend (Mr. McInerney) that that does not tend to preserve and conserve this industry. We took a great deal of pains to ascertain the time during which the close season should last, and the time during which fishing should be permitted. We appointed a commission that went all over the coast, heard the opinions of the fishermen themselves, and gave its report, which report has been adopted by the department, and has been practically put in the form of regulations. The fishermen are allowed to fish between certain specific days, between certain specific points on the coast. The idea of my hon. friend from Kent is that they should not only have that time, but should be allowed to have out their nets and traps, for as long as they please before that. The result of that will be illegal fishing, and the hon. gentleman knows that as well as he knows that he is sitting in that seat. It was to obviate that, and to put all on the same footing, that the regulation was adopted. If a specific day is fixed when they can begin fishing, they can go out with nets and gear, and take possession of the ground. If they can go out when they like, they will go out months before the law permits them to fish, pre-empt the ground, put out their traps, and do as much fishing as they like, and nobody can stop them. It would be utterly impossible for the guardians to watch the tens of thousands of traps, to see that fish are not being caught out of season. I will consider very carefully the matter that the hon. gentleman has brought up, and will go over it with the officers of the department. I have gone over it a number of times, and have a great quantity of correspondence on the subject, and I have come to the conclusion that it is in the interest of the industry itself, that these regulations should be enforced, and that there should be a time within which there should not be fishing; but if the fishermen are allowed to put out their traps during that time, it will be impossible to prevent illegal fishing.

Mr. PRIOR. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. J. H. BELL (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, before we pass from this subject—

Mr. SPEAKER. I may remind my hon. friend from Prince, P.E.I., (Mr. Bell) that there is nothing before the Chair.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) I will then make the usual motion and put myself in order. I desire to say a word on this subject, because it is of importance to the people I have the honour to represent. The time for setting back-lines and unbaited traps was not brought up before the Fishery Commission; it comes up, now, for the first time. The season allowed for lobster fishing is limited. The fishermen along the Northumberland Straits have a right to begin operations on the 25th of this month. The effect of this regulation is to take away from them one or two weeks of the time allowed for fishing, and that is why these men have thought it a great hardship. The reason assigned for the regulation by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is, that to allow unbaited traps to be set before the 25th May would lead to illegal fishing. That reason may apply to a few cases, but, in the large majority of instances, the people do not propose to carry on illegal fishing, and will not do so. It is no argument to them to say that certain persons may be tempted to fish illegally. One fisherman will have about 300 traps. It will take him, in fine weather, about ten or twelve days to put out these traps, because he has long distances to traverse. In the very nature of things he cannot begin to fish before he has half his baited traps out. I can hardly see the reason for or the justice of this regulation. Here is a man who has his traps on the bank and his back lines all ready to set out. He takes those empty traps and lines and puts them in the water. I cannot see that the law will justify the department in declaring by regulation that that man should not put his traps or his back lines in the water if he does not actually commence his fishing before the time fixed by law. To my mind it seems an arbitrary, and I was going to say, an illegal, act to prevent a poor fisherman from putting his back lines into the water, not for the purpose of beginning fishing, but for the purpose of enabling him, as soon as fishing time begins, to prosecute his proper calling. It is a great hardship to fix and limit the lobster fishing season and then deliberately pass an order in council—with the best possible intention, I admit—which has the effect of shortening that man's season from one to two weeks.

I may refer to another reason, and that is, that the time allotted for fishing along this particular coast is less than that along other portions of the Prince Edward Island shore by four or five days. It was a hardship in the first instance to fix the time and give a less number of days for fishing. For these reasons I would impress upon the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the necessity of taking this matter into consideration, more particularly as regards that section of the coast where the fishing begins on the 25th of May. There may be other localities where it is advisable to limit the time for setting out traps; but in this particular instance it works a hardship and an injustice, and it cannot be excused except upon the untenable ground that these men deliberately intend to violate the law. No such intention should be presumed. As a general rule, subject to such exceptions as are found in every locality, these fishermen intend honestly to pursue their calling, and they only ask from the government to be left alone so that they may have the full time allowed them by law for prosecuting their industry. I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. A. C. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) Before that motion is put I would like to say a word to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. While I am prepared to back him up in all his regulations for the purpose of conserving the lobster fishery, in this instance I have to find some fault with him. Now, a convention of the fishermen, who are the real parties interested in this important industry, was held, as I understand, in Charlottetown not very long since, and the opinion of those people was found to be in favour of the 1st of May as the opening season for lobster fisheries. I think the hon. minister has made a mistake in opening the season on the 20th of April instead of the 1st of May, as formerly. In the first place he jeopardizes the fishing gear of the fishermen, or rather the fishermen have to take the earliest opportunity of securing the limits on which they are to fish, for fear they will be appropriated by their neighbours, and each one is anxious to commence the first moment the law will allow. If the opening season is made too early, the fishermen are almost sure, as has been the case the present season, to lose a large quantity of their fishing gear. I understand there are now many hundreds, if not thousands, of dollars of fishing gear lost by reason of the ice not having left the coast and having drifted in on the fishermen after they had set out their traps. I think the minister has made a mistake in not continuing the season as formerly, and in opening it on the 1st of May instead of on the 20th April, especially so when the fishermen themselves were in favour of continuing it at the latter date. With respect to the question that has been brought forward by the gentlemen who have preceded me, it is rather a difficult one to decide. There is no doubt that all the fishermen should be placed exactly on the same basis, and that the opening should be made at a certain given time. With respect to that I would also suggest to the minister that instead of opening it at 12 o'clock, midnight, it should be opened at 12 o'clock midday. It would be much better if all the fishermen were placed exactly on the same footing, so that no one should have an advantage over another. I think in respect to both of these matters the minister would do well to make a note of them for another season.

Mr. J. V. ELLIS (St. John City). While there can be no objection to this question being brought up by the hon. member for Kent, N.B., (Mr. McInerney) it seems to me a great pity it should be brought up on a motion to adjourn the House, when many gentlemen who are interested in questions of this kind are not present. My hon. colleague for the city and county of St. John (Mr. Tucker), a portion of whose constituency is engaged in lobster fishing, is not here this afternoon, but no doubt he would have been here if he had known that this matter was going to be discussed. I think there ought to be a rule of the House to prevent discussions of a general character being sprung up on motions to adjourn the House. It is most regrettable. I would say this, however, not knowing as much about the question as some of my hon. friends, that it is highly desirable in the interests of this country that rigid regulations should be made with regard to the lobster industry. That industry is constantly decreasing in volume, the size of the fish is decreasing, and the time is not distant when this industry will entirely disappear unless rigid rules are made for its control. The fishermen, of course, are interested in gaining a livelihood, they have no interest but to catch the fish at the earliest moment they are allowed to engage in fishing. The Department of Marine and Fisheries having control of this great industry and looking to its future, must make regulations, and those regulations, of whatever character they may be, will not be satisfactory to the fishermen. It seems to me that in view of the importance of maintaining this industry all of us should be willing to support the department in making reasonable regulations, and this appears to be one of them. I do not quite agree with the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Bell), that a man has to have ever so many traps out before he can commence to catch fish. That can be easily evaded. The moment a man gets his traps down he can commence taking them in if he chooses to do so. I do not think there is much in that argument. I trust the House will sustain the regulations which the department has made, and while they limit to some extent, the rights of individuals, I think they are on the whole for the public good.

Mr. McINERNEY. Nobody will endorse the action of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in any regulations he may make for the protection of the lobster industries or of the fisheries generally, more strongly than I would; but I claim that these restrictions or regulations should be reasonable, and this is neither reasonable nor fair. It is not fair because it does not treat all alike. I have pointed out to the hon. minister that in the northern district of the Northumberland Straits men can get out their traps just as soon as they can fish, but in the southern districts they are not permitted, by the law, to get out their traps until after they are able to fish. They cannot get out their traps until after the season begins, while in the northern district they can get them out very much sooner; therefore, in the southern district they lose two weeks of the fishing season while in the northern district they do not lose this time.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. A man in the southern district has until the 15th of August to fish—the contention which was made, which was conceded by the commissioners and reluctantly yielded to by me. Now, after he has got that length of time, away on into August, to fish, he is kicking up his heels because he does not get a fortnight of time before the law allows him to begin.

Mr. McINERNEY. I am not arguing against the dates fixed for the beginning and the ending of the fishery. He has ten weeks. But, in the north the fisherman has four days longer than he has in the south, and therefore the argument of the hon. minister does not apply. A man in the northern district can get his traps out before the season begins, while a man in the southern district loses two weeks. The answer is made that the man in the southern district will go on fishing illegally. That is an imputation that is not to be cast on the fishermen of the south by the minister because I say they will not fish illegally. There is nobody who has a greater regard for the law governing the lobster fishery than have these fishermen. Some of the most valuable suggestions against illegal fishing were made by these men who are directly interested in the preservation of this fishery. They know that it is not wise to kill the goose that lays the golden egg, and I, for one, say that in regard to any regulation he has made I have not attempted to raise my voice against the reasonableness of it when I thought it was reasonable. I have brought this case to the attention of the minister because I believe a wrong is being done to the fishermen in certain sections, and the only answer that is made is, that if they did differently they might fish illegally. The minister is provided with officers to see that they will not fish illegally, and it is no answer to say that they will do wrong and that in order to stop them from doing wrong the minister will do them an injustice.

Mr. ANGUS McLENNAN (Inverness). Mr. Speaker, while I agree with the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) that the department should be backed up in restricting the time during which this very important industry can be prosecuted with the view to preserve this valuable branch of our fisheries, I submit that it is for us to consider whether some attention should be paid to the question of the uniformity of the length of time within which people in various localities may prosecute this industry. Around the Island of Cape Breton, the ice, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, when moving out to the north, is often very apt to close in against the western coast. Under the old regulations the same length of time was permitted to the fishermen around the whole coast of Cape Breton notwithstanding that it is against the western coast of the island that the ice first wedged in. The contention was always set up that on the eastern side of the island ice was blown in and rounded the coast later in the spring. Under the old regulations, then, it was conceded that somewhat similar conditions prevailed and that the same time should be allowed to the fishermen along the coast of the island to prosecute this industry. Upon reading the report of the Lobster Commission, I saw nothing in the evidence that would justify any deviation whatsoever in the time as to the prosecution of that industry along the coast of that island. The island is about 100 miles in diameter and about 300 miles in circumference. The amount of fish which is caught around that length of coast is of very great value and, therefore, the industry of great importance, and hence the interest naturally taken in the time for its prosecution. It would appear, then, that notwithstanding the fact that the evidence given before the commission would seem to point to the fact that the conditions prevailing around the coast of the island are somewhat the same. An order in council was issued declaring that the people along the western portion of the island should cease to catch their fish three weeks before the people on the eastern side of the island. In other words, the season available for prosecuting that valuable industry was to be shortened by three weeks on the western side and, of course, lengthened to a similar extent on the eastern side. While I again say that I agree with the hon. member for St. John in the desire to back up the Department of Marine and Fisheries in restricting the prosecution of this fishery in order to save the people from themselves, as it were, yet, I submit, whether it is fair to permit the people along a certain line of coast to prosecute that industry for three weeks longer than their neighbours along the same coast, living under similar conditions, the conditions prevailing along the coast in regard to the ice and other conditions being precisely the same. It is against this discrepancy that I raise my protest, and I say again that in regard to the curtailing of the season for prosecuting the fisheries I have not one word to say provided it be considered wise to do so, but I have a most decided protest to enter against this wide discrepancy involving a discrimination against the western portion of the Island of Cape Breton which constitutes the whole of the coast along the Gulf of St. Lawrence of the county which I have the honour to represent. The hon. member for King's, P.E.I., (Mr. Macdonald) has said that it was a mistake to limit the time when the fishermen could not prosecute that industry too closely. I think hon. gentlemen will remember that I made a protest similar to the one I now make, last year, and I do not think the hon. gentleman showed me so much sympathy as he claims to have now after experience, but, all the same, it is correct to say that it was a mistake, on some parts of the coast of the Island of Cape Breton and on some parts of the coast of Prince Edward Island, to name the 20th of April as the opening of the season in view of the fact that lobster traps cannot be set out at least with safety at that time. I declare now, that there is not a trap set on the western coast of the Island of Cape Breton, in view of the fact that the ice is still on that coast, and yet these men are told, by regulation, that they can forsooth fish from the 20th of April. It is now past the first week in May and ten days of April, after the 20th, have passed without one trap having been laid along a very great portion of that coast. Therefore, permission being given to these people nominally to fish lobster on the 20th of April, being required to cease fishing on the 10th of July, is simply depriving them of the right which is conceded to their neighbours on the eastern side of the island, making three weeks of a difference. I venture to say that if inquiry were made by the Department of Marine and Fisheries it would be found that all around the eastern side of the Island of Cape Breton the lobster industry is now vigorously prosecuted, while on the western side not a trap is out north of a certain point. I, therefore, say that while restrictions should be placed on this industry in order to preserve it, yet, the same measure should be meted out to all who are engaged in it. In other words, the same limit of time should be allowed to all. For instance, in Prince Edward Island, and on a portion of the coast of New Brunswick, they are not permitted to commence fishing until late in May—I think May 20—but they are allowed to continue until August 15.

Mr. McINERNEY.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is only in a limited locality.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). I know, but it demonstrates the very point that I claim should be conceded to the western coast of Cape Breton. On the western coast of Cape Breton Island, the time allowed these parties to prosecute this important industry is only a little over six weeks, whereas, on the eastern side and along the coast of Nova Scotia proper, the time is in many instances three months. Along the eastern coast of Cape Breton particularly, the time is exactly three months, while, I am sure I am correct in saying, that the fishermen on the western side are limited to six or seven weeks. I make these observations so that a readjustment of the time limit for lobster fishing shall be made by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and this particular injustice rectified.

Motion (Mr. Bell, P.E.I.), to adjourn, negatived.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the point raised by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis). In ordinary cases, two days' notice is required before a question can be put across the House; but, latterly, we have drifted into a habit which is a violation of that rule. If there is a case of urgency a member is entitled to ask a question across the floor without notice, but he is not entitled to make a prolonged statement on the subject. The House will agree with me, that we have seen to-day an example of a very marked contravention of the rule of the House in that respect. The case brought before us was one that could very well be discussed on the items in supply, and the hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Ellis) very properly pointed out that when such a question is raised without notice a number of members interested in it were precluded from discussing it, should they be absent at the moment. A motion to adjourn the House under such circumstances dissipates the time of the House and reaches no satisfactory results. I would, therefore, ask hon. members to remember the rules of the House in this respect, and if hon. members are obliged to ask a question on a matter of urgency, I would ask them to put that question as precisely and as pointedly as possible. Of course, if a case requires urgent investigation, a motion to adjourn would be in order so that the matter might be discussed at once. I would ask hon. members to economize the time of the House as far as possible, and this can be best done by adhering to the rules.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) I have been unable to find, from the Votes and Proceedings, that a return has been brought down to an order of the House passed on February 14, in regard to claims on the White Horse Rapids in the Yukon country. I would ask the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) to bring it down as soon as possible. There was also an order of the House passed on March 28, for all correspondence in reference to the new steamer required on the Pacific coast for the Marine Department and the Customs Department. That order is not yet down. There was also an order passed on April 23, for the report made by Mr. Stumbles, a portion of which the hon. gentleman promised to bring down, but it is not down yet.

YUKON TERRITORY—ORDINANCES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) laid on the Table of the House the ordinances for the Yukon Territory for the year 1899.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 148)—from the Senate—respecting the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company.—(Mr. McAlister.)

DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

At what dates was the MSS. of the following departmental reports for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, sent to the Queen's Printer, namely :

Postmaster General,
Public Works.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The preparation of the copy of the report of the Minister of Public Works was delayed in consequence of the illness and ultimate death of the clerk in charge of the work, and of the illness of the clerk to whom the work was thereafter entrusted. and, finally, said report was placed in the hands of the Queen's Printer on the 24th ultimo. As to the Postmaster General's report, an answer will be given next question day.

THE DOUKHOBORS—EMIGRATION TO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

Has any action been taken by the government, or any of its officials, to prevent certain Doukhobor settlers in the Canadian North-west from emigrating to the United States? If so, what action was taken, and by whom?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. Yes. 2. The action taken by the department, the deputy minister and the commissioner of immigration was as follows : As soon as the report reached Ottawa that an agitation was being promoted amongst the Doukhobors to induce them to move to California, communication was had with the following gentlemen who had interested themselves in their removal from Russia: John Bellows, London, Eng.; V. Tchertkoff, of Essex, Eng., and Joseph S. Elkinton, of Pennsylvania. The department was advised that these gentlemen and Count Tolstoi, with whom they communicated, wrote very strong letters to the Doukhobors, urging them on no consideration to leave the North-west, as they felt certain they would achieve greater success there than in the United States. Certain officials of the department interviewed the persons who were reported as likely to move, urging them to remain in Canada. The commissioner of immigration also wrote to the United States government agent at Pembina on the boundary line, to the effect that certain persons representing corporations or otherwise, in the state of California, were working amongst the Doukhobors with object of inducing them to emigrate to California, under an agreement to provide with employment.

YUKON—SALARY OF MR. OGILVIE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. Did the hon. the Minister of the Interior, on April 4, 1899, when referring to the Commissioner of the Yukon District, state in this House: 'I think the salaries are good; Mr. Ogilvie, the commissioner, gets $5,000. When he was employed by the late government he got $1,800 . . . now be it known that the government furnishes for their men both quarters and provisions'?

2. What does Mr. Ogilvie now get?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. Yes. 2. Salary, $6,000 per annum; living allowance, $2,000 per annum; rent, $250 per month; house-keeper, $60 per month.

YUKON—PAYMENTS TO MR. W. H. P. CLEMENT.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. What is the date of the appointment of Mr. W. H. P. Clement as legal adviser in the Yukon District?

2. What salary has been paid to him since that date?

3. Has Mr. Clement been paid by the government anything beyond his salary since his appointment as legal adviser, and if so, how much, and for what service?

4. Was he paid $900, in addition to his regular salary, for acting as legal adviser to the commissioner, under Royal Commission issued to Mr. Ogilvie, at the rate of $75 per day from February 6, 22, 24, 25, 27, 28; March 6, 7, 8, 11; May 9, 17, or 12 days in all, in 1899?

5. Was he paid $375 for a five days' trip to Dominion Creek in above matter at $75, March 31 and April 4, 1899, and if so, what was the object of this trip and what was the result?

6. If Mr. Clement acted as legal adviser as above, did he act under instructions from the hon. the Minister of the Interior, or at the request of Mr. Ogilvie?

Mr. SUTHERLAND.

7. Did the hon. the Minister of the Interior by letter of October 10, 1898, instruct Mr. Ogilvie as follows: 'Your legal adviser, Mr. Clement, will give you any professional assistance that may be required in the investigation.' And if so, did the hon. minister intend that extra pay was to be given to the legal adviser for these services?

8. Did Mr. Clement render an account for $1,275, being at the rate of $75 per day, for acting as counsel for Mr. Ogilvie, commissioner, under letters patent, and did Mr. Ogilvie certify that these services were performed by Mr. Clement at 'his request,' and if so, were these services contemplated by the hon. the minister, referred to in question 7 above?

9. If the above amount was paid to Mr. Clement, what was the proportionate amount of ordinary salary paid to him for the days in question?

10. What officer or officers of the government received pay for services under the said commission, and how much, if anything, did each receive proportionately?

11. Did the hon. the Minister of the Interior inform this House on April 4, 1899, that he thought Mr. Clement's salary as legal adviser—$2,500—good?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. October 7, 1898. 2. He was paid at the rate of $2,500 per annum from October 7, 1898, to June 30, 1899; and he has been paid at the rate of $5,000 per annum from July 1, 1899, to the present date. 3. Nothing beyond expenses. Since February 14, 1899, he has received a fixed amount for living expenses, viz.: $100 a month. 4. No. 5. No. He visited Dominion Creek in the matter of the charges made by one Kelly against Thos. Fawcett, as gold commissioner, but the only payment made in connection therewith, was $30.50, for expenses. 6. At the request of Mr. Ogilvie. 7. (a) Yes. (b) There is nothing on record further to show what the minister's intention was; but no payment has been authorized by him. 8. (a) Yes. (b) Yes. (c) Yes. 9. The amount has not been paid Mr. Clement. 10. Messrs. J. N. E. Brown and F. M. Shephard, stenographers, were paid respectively, the sums of $582.57 and $582.58. 11. I have not had time to examine Hansard carefully enough to answer this question, but if the hon. gentleman says that the minister is so reported in Hansard, he is doubtless correct. I may say, however, that what might have been a good salary when Mr. Clement was allowed to practice his profession, would not necessarily be an adequate salary when called upon to discontinue private practice, and to give his whole time to the public service.

YUKON—THE OGILVIE COMMISSION OF INQUIRY.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. Touching the payment of witnesses before the Ogilvie Commission of Inquiry and the following report of proceedings before the commissioner on February 22, 1899:—

'Mr. Ogilvie.—The court is now open for the hearing of charges under the Royal Commission.

'Mr. Percy McDougal.—The representatives of the miners' committee want to bring evidence to show that money was paid to gain access to the gold commissioner's office. We are anxious to see where the blame is attached and find out to whom that blame is due.

'Mr. Armstrong.—I wish to define our position somewhat. We don't wish to be understood as prosecutors alone in this hearing of charges. We understand that you are holding a commission to inquire into matters of public interest in this territory, and we wish to give our time and help in this investigation without any fee or recompense of any sort.

'There is a matter which I wish to call your attention to, that is the matter of expenses. You have told us there is no arrangement in regard to expenses; but I would call your attention to the fact that many of the miners, especially those residing outside of Dawson on distant creeks, have no money whatever, and very little food, and that they have no cabins in Dawson, and no friends to whom they can have recourse; and that to call such men into Dawson is an absolute piece of cruelty, and we are put in a position to ask these men to come and help the government to make an inquiry into matters of government interest. This seems to us an act of cruelty. I would ask you to make an order that witnesses might apply for such expenses as might be necessary for their maintenance during the times they are before the court.

'The Commissioner.—There is no authority in the commission, as I told you before—nothing about paying expenses, and if I did what you suggest I might be held responsible myself. That I cannot afford.

'Mr. McDougal.—Could not the council make some provision for this?

'The Commissioner.—No, this matter the council cannot deal with. It has only to deal with local matters. What I suggested was, that these men keep track of their expenses and put in the accounts which will be submitted to Ottawa.

'Mr. Armstrong.—But these men have no money now; how can a satisfactory commission of inquiry be held without paying the men their expenses?

'The Commissioner.—If I trespass beyond the point of this commission I may be held personally responsible.

'Mr. Armstrong.—Then the only thing to do is to recognize the commission as limited and work within the limitation as best we can.

'The Commissioner.—I will help in every way I can.

'Mr. McDougal.—Is it not understood that under a Royal Commission the witnesses' fees are paid?

'The Commissioner.—That question I cannot decide at present. We are considering that. There is no mention made in connection with expenses at all; it is not referred to in the remotest way.

* * * * *

'As to the matter of witnesses coming in, as I told you, I will take that into consideration and suggest that they keep track of their expenses and submit the account to me, which I will forward to Ottawa. This is all I can do.

'Mr. McDougal.—The need for relief in such cases is immediate, as I would call to your attention, a number of the men called in have no shelter.'

And referring to the following papers brought down to this House:—

'Ottawa, November 20, 1899.

'To Hon. Clifford Sifton, British Columbia.

'Mr. Ogilvie telegraphs stating witnesses Royal Commission anxious for their fees. Thinks should be settled at once as some of them hard up. Shall I authorize him to pay.

'JAS. A. SMART.'

'West Prince Albert, N.W.T., Nov. 21.

'To James A. Smart, Ottawa.

'Authorize him to pay the witnesses.

'CLIFFORD SIFTON.'

'Department of Interior,

'Ottawa, November 22, 1899.

'To Wm. Ogilvie, Commissioner,

'Dawson, Yukon.

'You are authorized to pay witnesses in connection with Royal Commission.

'JAMES A. SMART,
Deputy Minister.'

(a.) When did Mr. Ogilvie conclude his inquiry under the Royal Commission aforesaid?

(b.) When did he first communicate with the department on the subject of the payment of witnesses?

(c.) Out of what fund or appropriation were their expenses paid?

2. Touching Mr. Clement's account, June 1, 1899, for $1,275 for services rendered to Mr. Ogilvie on said inquiry:

(a.) When did the department receive a communication on the subject of the payment of said account?

(b.) When was payment of this account directed, if at all?

(c.) Out of what fund or appropriation was this amount paid?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. The answer to the first question is: (a) May 17, 1899. (b) On November 18, 1899. (c) The appropriation for administration of Yukon Territory. 2. The answer to the second question is: (a) August 2, 1899. (b) Payment was never directed. (c) The amount was not paid.

YUKON—COMMUNICATIONS WITH MR. OGILVIE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked:

1. When was the communication of February 28, 1899, signed by William Ogilvie, Esq., and included in Return Sessional Paper No. 69, Ref. No. 6, Return to Address of the House of Commons February 7, 1900, received at Ottawa?

2. When was the communication of April 14, 1899, referred to in said return, received at Ottawa?

3. How many, if any, communications passed between the hon. the Minister of the Interior or his department and Mr. Ogilvie, upon the subject referred to in these communications between the above dates or afterwards?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. April 3, 1899. 2. May 19, 1899. 3. There does not appear to be any other correspondence in regard to the extension of the commission issued to Mr. Ogilvie.

HARDWARE SUPPLIES FOR THE N. W. MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. When were tenders last called for supplying hardware to the mounted police of the North-west Territories?
2. What firm or firms have supplied the North-west Mounted Police with hardware for each year ended June 30, 1897, 1898 and 1899, and for the first six months of the financial year 1899-1900?
3. Did they obtain the contracts on public tender?
4. If so, when and where were the tenders advertised?
5. If tenders were not called for, why not?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. December, 1895, not by public tender. Lists of articles required were sent to responsible firms. The prices of J. H. Ashdown, Winnipeg, were the most favourable. 2. Various firms throughout Manitoba and the North-west Territories, principally J. H. Ashdown and the Gurney Stove and Range Company, Winnipeg. 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1. 5. It has been considered more satisfactory to purchase from time to time as required, the articles being of a varied character, and prices regulated by patterns and sizes.

REFERENCE RE CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. FLINT asked :

1. Was a reference made to the Supreme Court of Canada by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, under authority of the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act, as amended by the Act 54-55 Victoria, chapter 25, on the 1st day of February, A.D. 1900, for the hearing and consideration of certain questions touching the validity of section 6 of the Act 51 Victoria, chapter 34?
2. Has the said reference been heard and considered?
3. If not, for what reason has it not been heard?
4. Does the government propose to take any steps to secure hearing and consideration of the said questions by the said court?
5. If so, what steps are proposed to be taken?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). A reference was made to the Supreme Court of Canada on February 1, last, for the hearing and consideration of certain questions touching the validity of section 6 of the Act 51 Vic., chapter 34. The matter is still before the Supreme Court, and will take its turn.

Mr. FOSTER. What Act is that?

The PRIME MINISTER. The Canada Temperance Act.

BASIC SLAG FERTILIZER.

Mr. DOMVILLE (by Mr. Ellis) asked :

1. Why was the official sample of 'thomas' phosphate powder drawn by John C. Ferguson, of the Inland Revenue Department, and sent to

Mr. SUTHERLAND.

Ottawa under the seal of the department for analysis, under section 7, subsection 2, chapter 24, 53 Vic. (Fertilizers Act), official number of sample 17,640, sent from Ottawa to Quebec, and analysed by Dr. M. Fiset, public analyst, Quebec?

2. Was it from lack of proper facilities to do it at Ottawa by the chief analyst of the Dominion, or for what reason?

3. It is stated that the system used for the analysis of the sample referred to was what is known as the method adopted by the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists of the United States, heretofore been in use and given satisfaction.

4. What is this system and what are the particulars of the methods used in analysis under it?

5. What year and month was the method of analysis adopted by the Association of the Official Agricultural Chemists of the United States?

6. At the date it was adopted had the production of basic slag, or Thomas' phosphate powder, been discovered and become an article of commerce?

7. If not, then it would in no way have any bearing on the question of analysis of this slag, and why it was applied by the department?

8. Was not the method as named above adopted solely for the analysis of bone phosphate, coprolite and other phosphates and manufactured fertilizers?

9. Did the chief Dominion analyst, whilst analysing the Thomas' phosphate powder, in using the citrate ammonia solution to determine the available phosphoric acid in superphosphates which have been made by mixing raw material, phosphates with sulphuric acid, take into consideration the basic nature of Thomas' phosphate powder, and first neutralized the free lime?

10. If not, what reason is assignable for not doing so?

11. If he had done so, would it not have given a different analysis and much higher percentage of available phosphoric acid? If so, the analysis is misleading.

12. If the chief analyst under the system he has imported from the United States, had neutralized the free lime, would it not under careful analysis, have given far different results than in his analysis Nos. 17,661, 17,662, 17,663, and bring up the average of available phosphoric acid considerably in excess of 8 per cent?

13. Under these circumstances, would it not be better to amend and correct the system of analysis rather than to reduce the standard of value to the farmer of 8 per cent available phosphoric acid to 5 per cent, thus making values and farming conform to a particular method of analysis, insisted upon by the chief analyst, ignoring later and more scientific methods?

14. Is the government aware that under the direction of the chief analyst of the Dominion, a fine was imposed on the Thomas' phosphate powder for not coming up to his standard of percentage, although duly analysed in England and certified to as having full value?

15. Was such fine collected? If not, why not?

16. If the chief analyst had adopted a certain method of analysis, will the government so amend the laws that in case of difference of opinion of analysis, the public may have some independent means of other analysis or an appeal to the Minister of Justice?

17. Does the government hold itself responsible for any loss sustained by the manufacturers or importers consequent on reports published by the Department of Inland Revenue placing the Thomas phosphate powder under the category of being adulterated by an analysis which may have had the same effect?

18. Will the government permit the matter to be tested before the Exchequer Court to determine the rights of all parties?

19. How long has the chief analyst been in the employ of the Department of Inland Revenue?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). 1. The sample in question was one of three parts, or duplicates collected under the provisions of the Adulteration Act, section 9, and was sent by Mr. Ferguson direct to Dr. Fiset, at Quebec, there being at the time no district analyst at St. John, N.B. 2. It was not for want of proper facilities at Ottawa. It is only in the case of an appeal from the decision of the local analyst, that analysis is made at Ottawa, and there was no such appeal. 3. Yes. 4. It is explained in Bulletin No. 46, Revised Edition of the United States Department of Agriculture, published in 1899, of which a copy was sent to Messrs. Wallace and Fraser, at their request. 5. The 11th, 12th and 14th November, 1898. 6. Yes. 7. See answer to question 6. 8. The methods in question are stated to be for the analysis of fertilizers. 9. No. 10. Because no such method has been practised elsewhere. 11. It might, but the chief analyst does not know from his own experience. 12. Preceding answer applies to this question. 13. Not expedient for reasons given in answer to question No. 17, on April 4, last. 14. No. 15. No fine imposed, because department did not recommend prosecution. 16. See previous answer given to question 20, on April 4, last. As for an appeal to the Minister of Justice, it is a question whether the law ought to be amended in that direction or not. 17. No. 18. I am not ready to answer that question. 19. Fourteen years.

ST. PASCAL AND KAMOURASKA MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Is the hon. Postmaster General aware that the contractor for carrying the mail between St. Pascal and Kamouraska, on several occasions between June 1 and December 26, 1899, failed to perform his undertaking to exchange mails with the mail clerks on the maritime express, and by so doing deprived the parishes of St. Pascal and Kamouraska of their mail for whole days?

2. If so, is it the intention of the Postmaster General to compel the said contractor to comply with the terms of his contract in that behalf?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. No. 2. Answered by No. 1.

MAIL DELIVERY ON I.C.R.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Davin) asked :

1. Whether it is true that the sacks containing the mails for stations on the Intercolonial Railway between Ste. Flavie and Campbellton are received on the mail car and delivered therefrom by means of a system of hooks or brackets while the train is running at full speed?

2. If so, when was the said system inaugurated?

3. Is the Postmaster General aware that, since the inauguration of the said system, a considerable number of the said sacks have been torn and the contents scattered on the roadway, thus causing the loss of registered letters and other mail matter?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). In reply, I beg to say: On the section of the Intercolonial Railway referred to, mails for a portion of the train service, are received and delivered by means of the catching service system, a system which has been in operation on railways for over a quarter of a century, and which was established last year on the section of the Intercolonial Railway referred to. Owing to a defective construction of the catching posts, bags were injured on two or three occasions, but as soon as the defective construction was discovered it was remedied, since which time the department has not heard of any further trouble.

TENDERS FOR INDIAN SUPPLIES IN MANITOBA AND NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. Will the hon. the acting Minister of the Interior lay on the Table copies of the schedules calling for tenders for Indian supplies in Manitoba and the North-west Territories for the fiscal years 1898-9 and 1900?

2. Copies of the tenders accepted?

3. Copies of the contracts awarded, if any, where no tenders were called for?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I cannot do better than place on the Table of the House for the information of the hon. gentleman a printed copy of the form of tender and schedule used by the Department of Indian Affairs in calling for tenders for supplies, and a list of the tenders accepted; and I would add that no contract was made without tender, and that the lowest tenderer was in every instance awarded the contract.

ROWAN MILLS POST OFFICE.

Mr. TISDALE (by Mr. McDougall) asked :

1. Is there any officially appointed postmaster at Rowan Mills post office, south riding of Norfolk?

2. Is Daniel Biddle still postmaster there?

3. If not, when did he resign?

4. Who is acting postmaster?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). In reply, I beg to say: 1. The Rowan Mills post office is at present vacant, and there is, therefore, no officially appointed postmaster in charge of the office. 2. Daniel Biddle is not, and has not been, postmaster of Rowan Mills. 3. He did not resign. 4. Inquiry is being made.

WINNIPEG POST OFFICE.

Mr. PUTTEE asked :

What is the number of letters shown by the recent enumeration in Winnipeg to be annually handled by the Winnipeg post office?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The last enumeration shows that 87,170 letters were posted at Winnipeg during the week ended 7th April, 1900, aggregating at this rate for the year 4,545,292 letters.

TIMBER PERMITS IN MANITOBA AND NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

What was the object of passing the order in council of July 1, 1898, enabling the Minister of the Interior, in his discretion, to grant, in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, permits to cut timber?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I beg to reply : Under the authority of an order in council of the 1st of July, 1898, a number of amendments were made to the regulations governing the disposal of licenses and permits to cut timber in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and in the railway belt of the province of British Columbia. The new regulations made the same provision as the old regulations with reference to the acquisition of timber limits ; namely, that they should be acquired at public competition, but in view of a recommendation made by the Crown timber agent at Winnipeg, a provision was inserted that in the discretion of the Minister of the Interior, permits might be granted in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, to saw-mill owners to cut over a definite described tract of land, not exceeding fifty square miles in extent, on payment of Crown dues at the rate of 50 cents per thousand feet on sawn lumber, and a further sum of 50 cents per thousand feet in lieu of a bonus and ground rent, other products of manufacture to be paid for at the rate set forth in section 11 of the regulations. The intention was that saw-mill owners might obtain timber to be manufactured at their saw-mills without competing with the public. Prior to 1885, timber berths could be acquired without public competition. The law was changed so that any person who desired to acquire a timber berth was compelled to compete for the same, and the consequence was that in the case of mill-owners it proved a hardship when an expenditure had been made by them in exploring a timber limit, it was granted to an outsider who offered a larger bonus therefor, thus depriving the mill-owner of the timber he required for his saw-mill and compelling him in many cases to pay the holder of the berth a considerable sum in advance of the amount which he had paid for the berth.

When was it repealed?

Mr. MULOCK.

This regulation was repealed by order in council dated the 13th of January, 1899.

Why was it repealed?

It was felt that while it could be fairly claimed as reasonable that saw-mill owners holding limits should, in order to provide timber for their mills, have the privilege of acquiring other timber by paying practically double dues under the suggested arrangement contained in section 17, yet demands might be made upon the department with regard to it which would have the effect of practically annulling the general policy of the department, which is that no limits should be disposed of except by public competition. For this reason the clause affording this privilege to mill-owners was repealed.

How much timber did Theo. A. Burrows cut under his permit?

1,523 fence posts ; 1,730 cords of wood ; 2,318 telegraph poles ; 4,786 feet of piling ; 98,372 railways ties. The dues paid by Mr. Burrows for this timber amounted to $3,632.29.

How much did H. B. Mitchell cut?

578,122 feet b.m. of timber, for which he paid dues amounting to $578.12.

How much Hooker & Co.?

No permit under section 17 of the regulations was issued in favour of Messrs. Hooker & Co.

How much William Robinson?

2,031,500 feet b.m. for which he paid dues amounting to $2,031.50.

SCRIP TO HALF-BREED SCOUTS.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia) moved :

That during the rebellion of 1885 half-breeds at Wood Mountain and Maple Creek and at other points in the Territories were employed as scouts. That a number of persons who were employed as scouts during the rebellion aforesaid received scrip. That as a fact, the half-breeds at Wood Mountain, Maple Creek, Swift Current and Moosejaw, with one or two exceptions have not received scrip. That, in the opinion of this House, scrip should be given to those who are found to be entitled to it.

He said : I would solicit the attention of the House while I call attention to this motion. By chapter 29 of the statutes of 49 Victoria, clause 1, subsection 4 reads as follows :

1. In the Act hereinbefore cited the expression 'member of the enrolled militia force actively engaged and bearing arms in the suppression of the Indian and half-breed outbreak,' shall be deemed to include, in addition to the members of the said force mentioned in the said Act:

* * * * *

(b.) Every scout actively engaged during the said outbreak, whose services have been certified to by competent authority.

This legislation enlarged the scope of the legislation of 1885, which was confined entirely to the members of the militia force serving in the rebellion. This included both the volunteers and scouts. I wish to call attention to the language 'actively engaged during said outbreak,' because on the interpretation of that clause hinges the claim that I am now bringing before the House. I may say, as hon. gentlemen are aware, this is not the first time I have brought this claim before the House. I originally brought all the claims before the House in 1887, the first year that I had the honour of a seat in this House. At that time, I presented the claims of all the volunteer corps in the North-west Territories as well as the claim of the scouts, both at Moosejaw, Maple Creek—and for that matter wherever scouts were whose claims had not been adjudicated upon. The contention I made at the time was not agreed to by the Minister of Militia of the government of Sir John Macdonald. I brought it up again in 1888, and again in 1889. In that year Sir John Macdonald decided to give me a commission to inquire into the claims that I pressed upon the attention of parliament, the commission consisting of Mr. Sedgewick, Hon. Mr. Justice Sedgewick, of the Supreme Court. He sat in the Department of Justice, and we brought before him the claims of the Regina volunteers and of volunteers from other points and also the claims of half-breeds and others who had acted as scouts at Maple Creek, Moosejaw and Wood Mountain. Mr. Sedgewick at once decided in favour of my contention in regard to the volunteers. In regard to the scouts, he laid it down that the scout had no claim under this Act, unless he was employed from the beginning and unless he was actively employed, and I think he interpreted, 'actively employed' very strictly—that the scout must be in some way exposed to danger. Now, in regard to these scouts, for whom, at the present moment, I interest myself, I wish to call attention to the fact that on the 12th of May, 1885, Mr. Dewdney, then Lieutenant-Governor, wrote to Mr. Légaré the following letter :

Government House,
Regina, May 12, 1885.

Dear Sir,—With regard to our conversation of to-day, I think it advisable that you should engage a few more half-breeds in the Wood Mountain district, if you find that you can make good use of them, as I understand that they are in very poor circumstances and I am anxious to give them work where I find it possible to do so. Consequently, you are authorized to increase the number of your scouts up to forty.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) E. DEWDNEY,
Lieut.-Governor.

Mr. Jean Légaré,
City.

Probably I ought to have told the House that earlier than that, there seems to have been an employment of Mr. Légaré in connection with these scouts, because I find the following communication from Mr.

Deane, superintendent of the North-west Mounted Police :

(Memorandum.)
North-west Mounted Police,
Regina, April 8, 1885.

To all whom it may concern,—

Mr. J. L. Légaré is employed by the government of Canada in connection with the North-west Mounted Police in supervising the international boundary between Canada and the United States of America, with a view to the maintenance of the public peace and suppression of breaches of the law.

(Sgd.) J. BURTON DEANE,
Supt. N. W. M. Police.

Then, this document :

(Memorandum.)
N. W. M. P. Force.

I, J. L. Légaré, having been appointed constable for the North-west Territories, do solemnly swear that I will truly, faithfully and impartially perform the duties appertaining to the said office according to the best of my skill and ability.

So help me God.

(Sgd.) J. L. LEGARE.

Sworn before me at Regina, this 8th day of April, 1885.

(Sgd.) R. BURTON DEANE, J.P.

Certified, true copy.

(Sgd.) R. BURTON DEANE,
Supt. N. W. M. P. Force.

And these are the instructions that were given :

Orders for Scouts in the Southern District.

No. 1. To detain and closely examine all persons coming from the American frontier.

Arms, ammunition and explosives to be special objects of search in all baggage. All conveyances to be thoroughly searched.

No. 2. Any person, other than a known settler on Canadian soil, found carrying or found in possession of arms and ammunition or explosives to be charged under 31 Vic., chap. 15, the information being sworn 'on just grounds of suspicion that the same are dangerous to the public peace.'

No. 3. Suspicious characters from across the border to be charged with evasion of the customs duties, provided they have any property with them to sustain the charge.

All persons who fail to give a satisfactory account of themselves are to be charged under the Vagrant Act.

No. 4. All half-breeds carrying arms and ammunition to be arrested and charged under 31 Vic., chap. 15.

No. 5. The utmost vigilance must be exercised to prevent any crossing the border within the scouts' limits without being subjected to inquiry.

No. 6. No such person having come into Canada is to be allowed to recross the border if it can be prevented.

April 2, 1885.

I have here a memorandum in Mr. Légaré's handwriting, as follows :

The following names are scouts employed in Her Majesty's service in the southern district during the late rebellion, 1885, under my charge:

By authority of Hon. Edgar Dewdney, Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories.

Appointed and sworn before Capt. Deane, as an officer of the North-west Mounted Police, to take charge of the said district.

J. L. LEGARE, J.P.

Napoléon Lafournaise, Bernard Hamelin, Abraham Beauchamp, Pierre Brière, Zacharie Chartrand, François Boxer, Johnny Chartrand, Jérôme Champagne, William Houle, Louis Lacroque, W. John McGillis, Hylaise Rainville, Antoine Gosselin, Joseph Gosselin.

There were others, as for instance :

Alphonse Langer, François Lafournaise, William Berston, Louis Hamelin, Joseph Hamelin, Joseph Alaire, Alexander Houle, Théophile McGillis, Alexandre Gosselin, sr., André Beaudry, Jonas Hamelin, sr., Napoléon McGillis, J.-Bte. Lafournaise, Baptiste Adams, Jérémie Adams, Narcisse Lacertes, jr., Jonas Hamelin, jr., Louis Descoteau, Joseph Lapointe, Andrée Gariépy, Joseph Ouelette, Elzéar Bottineau, Pierre Alary, J.-Bte. Amyot, Joseph Short, François Bottineau, Alexandre Gosselin, sr., Jean Louis Légaré.

On June 10 I referred to the decision to which the present Mr. Justice Sedgewick came ; and in 1891 I again brought the matter up. On June 10, 1895, I made a motion similar to the present one, that the government should consider the matter. We had obtained the certificate of the commanding officer, Captain Macdonald, of the mounted police, and we sent that certificate to the Department of Militia. On September 21, I brought the matter up in the House, and the Minister of Militia and Defence promised that he would inquire into it. I again brought the matter up in 1897, drawing attention, not only to the general claims of the half-breeds and these special claims of the scouts, but the general claims of the half-breeds for extinguishing the Indian title. On that question the right hon. gentleman spoke as follows :

My hon. friend is aware that the half-breeds have petitioned for the extinguishment of the Indian title and to be treated as the Manitoba half-breeds were treated. The Manitoba half-breeds were treated in this way: In 1870, when we took possession of the country, the law which was then passed was to the effect that all those half-breeds at that time, that is, all the heads of families and all the children born before 1870, were entitled to scrip. The head of a family received 120 acres of land, and the child born before 1870 received 240 acres. A commission was issued in 1885 to settle the half-breed claims. Shortly after the opening of the rebellion they were settled with under that law, that is to say, the half-breeds of the North-west were treated in the same manner as the half-breeds in Manitoba had been treated, and arrangements would go back to 1870, and not before that year; whereas, the claim now put forward by the half-breeds of the North-west is that the date of their claim should go back to 1885—that fathers of families and children born since 1885 should receive scrip. I am not prepared to say whether it would be fair or unfair, just or unjust, to accept these claims made by the half-breeds. But one point I want to press on the attention of my hon. friend is this: It is the intention of the government during the recess to investigate all these claims, those of the Wood Mountain scouts, those of the half-breeds for additional scrip in order to extinguish Indian claims arising out of rebellion losses, and, in so far as possible, to acknowledge all those claims for scrip. I would, therefore, ask my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) not to press his motion further at the present time.

Mr. DAVIN.

Nor did I. The result was that the government took into consideration those questions during the recess, and as the House is aware, legislation was passed in consequence of my action. Last year we had a half-breed commission in the north, and in still further pursuance of that legislation. I believe—the hon. gentleman who is acting as Minister of the Interior would know—I believe at the present moment, in Macleod and at Wood Mountain, that part of the promise to me of the Prime Minister has been carried out. But the right hon. gentleman will see that at the time he made that speech in 1897 he referred to the extinguishment of the Indian title, and he also said that the claims of the Wood Mountain scouts would be taken up, that is to say, that their claim as Indian people would be taken up and also their claim as scouts. Now, in 1896 I received a letter from Mr. Légaré in which he said that he hoped the question would be taken up ; and in accordance with his suggestion, and also with the letter that he wrote me in 1895, in French, as I have recounted to the House, I brought the matter before the attention of parliament. I think there can be no doubt that these men acted as scouts. The certificate is in the Department of Militia. I may say further that with reference to some parties I was not able to get scrip. For instance, Mr. Aspdin, of Moosejaw, was one of the persons for whom I was contending for scrip up to the time this government came into power, and I never succeeded in getting it for him. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was acting as Minister of Militia and Defence, did yield to my contention in regard to that gentleman. Of course I would not wish to leave a false impression on the minds of the government, or put them to any trouble ; but I do not think it can be affirmed that the scouts at Wood Mountain were employed at the beginning of the rebellion ; the documents speak for themselves. At the time we had this long conference with the commissioner, now Mr. Justice Sedgewick, I doubted the justice of his decision that the claim of the men was not to be heard because it happened that they had not been employed from the beginning. A man might render first-rate service and come within the spirit and letter of that Act, who was not employed from the beginning, at least I think that is a fair contention, and I place that contention before the judgment and consideration of the right hon. gentleman. These men, it is admitted, were not employed from the beginning, but they were employed to act as scouts. Inducements were held out to certain parties below the line from people who were actively engaged in rebelling against Her Majesty on the Saskatchewan, and if these inducements had been listened to, Wood Mountain would have been a very dangerous part of the country and these scouts would have been called upon, perhaps, to have done dangerous as well as active work. Although they are principally half-breeds who are interested in this claim they are not all half-breeds. For instance, there is Mr. Cheeseman, of Maple Creek, employed on April 1, and Mr. Fouque, employed on the 4th of May. These are Englishmen. Seconded by Mr. Kaulbach, I beg to move this motion, and I commend it to the attention of the government. I think, that, now, finally, we may hope to have this matter considered and settled.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) has certainly been very persistent in bringing to the attention of the government and the House this question which he has again called their attention to. The whole question which he has brought before the House is contained in the last sentence of his motion :

That, in the opinion of this House, scrip should be given to those who are found to be entitled to it.

It is not desirable, I am sure, in any way, to deal unfairly, or to deal even, not generously, with these parties who are entitled to scrip. The question is whether or not these parties, in whom my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) has taken a deep interest, are entitled to scrip or not. I am sorry to say that when we came into office we found that the government which preceded us had come to the conclusion that these parties were not entitled to scrip. The matter is not one which involves a very serious loss to the country, or a very serious price to be paid. There are only some forty persons interested in the claim. For my part I have always thought, that, in this matter, it would be better to err on the side of generosity than otherwise, and that all questions that have arisen, in so far as the settlement of half-breed claims is concerned, or losses arising out of the rebellion, should have been settled with a generous hand. Canada is quite able to pay the price if these claims have been incurred in regard to services rendered to the country. But, whilst this is surely the intention, not only of the government, but was the intention of former governments. I am sure, also, all parties who have had to deal with this question have come to the conclusion that these Wood Mountain scouts were not entitled to any compensation for their services. In the rebellion which took place in 1885 there were several parties who had rendered services in subduing that rebellion. The North-west Mounted Police, I am sure, rendered valuable services. They were not given any extra compensation, but parliament thought the militia who had left their occupations in the east and had rendered valuable service to their country, should be entitled to special treatment, and that they should be given scrip. Then the question rose whether or not those persons who did not belong to the militia, but who had been engaged as scouts and who had performed services in the suppression of the rebellion, who had done patrol work along the frontier and had prevented all possible aid coming from the southern part of the frontier to those engaged in the rebellion, were entitled to such compensation. They had performed valuable services, and a special statute was passed in 1886, to which the hon. member for Western Assiniboia alluded a moment ago. Under that statute the question arose whether or not these scouts, who had been engaged to do patrol work and to aid in the suppression of the rebellion, were entitled to scrip or not. Personally I am sorry to say that the Department of Justice came to the conclusion that they were not entitled to scrip. They could not be placed on the same footing as the militia. My hon. friend alluded, a moment ago, to the report of Mr. Justice Sedgewick, then the Deputy Minister of Justice, who was authorized by the late Sir John Macdonald to look specially into the case. The conclusion arrived at by Mr. Sedgewick was as follows :

Claims of the Regina, Wood Mountain, Moosejaw and Maple Creek Scouts.

These men were not, I venture to say, 'scouts' within the meaning of the statute. No doubt, their services were valuable, as valuable, perhaps, as those of many who come within the intendment of the statute, but I think that the persons there designated as scouts were persons employed in connection with the military force as distinct from the mounted police force. These claimants were, it seems to me, employed, not as military scouts, but as temporary police or constables in connection with the mounted police service only, and not in connection with the purely military service. They were engaged by the mounted police, they were paid, as I am informed, out of mounted police appropriations, and they performed police service only, dangerous though it might have been. The certificates are those of the officers of the police only, and are not those of any officer of the military force.

I do not think that the 'competent authority' referred to in the statute by whom scouting service is to be certified, is any officer of the mounted police, unless such officer is for the time being a recognized officer of the military force. I am, therefore, of opinion that it was not the intention of parliament that claimants such as these should receive other than ordinary remuneration.

We found this when we came into office, and after giving the question the best possible consideration we came to the conclusion, that, under the statute of 1886, as interpreted by the Department of Justice, it was not possible for us to give scrip to the scouts whom the hon. gentleman now represents, and in whose behalf he interests himself. Such being the case, the question arose: Should we take this as final or, if the statute was not broad enough to cover the claim of these men, should the question be reopened. The question arose whether it would be good policy to compensate these men and to give them that gratification which we have given to the militia. I looked into the case myself; I made somewhat of an effort to familiarize myself with it, and this is what I found. As the hon. gentleman alluded to it, I can go back, to some extent, to what he has said, and complete what he has omitted. In 1885, at the time of the rebellion, Mr. Dewdney, who was Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories, came to the conclusion, evidently, that it would be the part of prudence to scour the frontier, to have it patrolled so that there should be no possibility of aid coming from the south to the half-breeds engaged in the rebellion. He authorized a certain number of men amongst the half-breeds of Wood Mountain to be engaged. I have a certificate of A. R. Macdonald, ex-sergeant of the mounted police, who certifies as follows:

I hereby certify that the following persons served under me as chief officer of the North-west Mounted Police, then stationed at Wood Mountain post, in the North-west Territories, as scouts during April and May of the rebellion of the year 1885, by authorization of the Hon. Edgar Dewdney, then Lieutenant-Governor of the said Territories, that is to say:

1. Bernard Hamelin.
2. François Boxer.
3. Abraham Beauchamp.
4. Pierre Briese.
5. W. John McGillis.
6. Louis Larocque.
7. John Chartrand.
8. Zacharie Chartrand.
9. Alphonse Langer.
10. François Lafournaise.
11. Napoléon Lafournaise.
12. William Houle.
13. Antoine Gosselin.
14. Hylaise Rainville.
15. William Berston.
16. Louis Hamelin.
17. Joseph Hamelin.
18. Joseph Alarie.
19. Alexander Houle.
20. Théophile McGillis.
21. Jérôme Champagne.
22. Alexandre Gosselin, sr.
23. Andrée Beaudry.
24. Jonas Hamelin, sr.
25. Napoléon McGillis.
26. J.-Bte. Lafournaise.
27. Baptiste Adams.
28. Jérémie Adams.
29. Narcisse Lacertes, jr.
30. Jonas Hamelin, jr.
31. Louis Descoteau.
32. Joseph Lapointe.
33. Andrée Gariépy.
34. Joseph Ouellette.
35. Elzéar Bottineau.
36. Pierre Alary.
37. J.-Bte. Amyot.
38. Joseph Short.
39. Joseph Gosselin.
40. François Bottineau.
41. Alexandre Gosselin, sr.
42. Jean Louis Lègaré.

The Wood Mountain scouts, which include those of Willow Bunch and Moosejaw, were men employed between the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the United States frontier, principally in the vicinity of Willow Bunch and Wood Mountain, for the purpose of watching the boundary, as it was feared that half-breeds from Dakota might attempt to send men, arms and ammunition to the assistance of the rebels.

There were in all fifty-four men employed in this manner, and they were paid at rates varying from 75 cents to $3 per day, with the exception of one man, J. L. Lègaré, who received $6 per diem.

In the Maple Creek district thirteen men were employed specially as scouts at rates of pay varying from $50 to $99 per month.

The pay, where it exceeded 75 cents per day, was for man and horse. The duties performed were simply those of scouting and keeping the police officers at Maple Creek and Regina informed of what was going on south of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The claims of these scouts were reported upon adversely by the Deputy Minister of Justice on December 17, 1889.

It appears that these men were paid liberally at the time, but, nevertheless, from that day up to this, for fifteen years, they have steadily represented that they were entitled to every favour and consideration which had been given to the members of the militia force. They have contended that they contributed their share to the suppression of the rebellion, and that it would be only fair and right that they should be entitled to the same compensation. They can claim nothing legally; they can only put themselves upon the bounty of parliament. They ask that they should be given the same treatment as was given to the other parties. As I have said, if we are to interpret the law of 1886, under which the militia force received their scrip; if we are to interpret that law as it has been interpreted up to the present time by the Department of Justice, they have no legal claim upon us, and we could not confer on them what they ask under that law. But, the question arises: Whether it would not be best, after all, to settle these claims as we have settled the claims of the other parties. We have gone, perhaps, a little beyond the law. We passed new legislation last year in order to meet the claims of the half-breeds of the North-west, and under that legislation the children of some of the half-breeds who received scrip on the Red River in 1870 are going to receive scrip also as claimants amongst the North-west Indians in the Saskatchewan River. I have discussed this matter more than once with the comptroller of the mounted police, and we have come to this conclusion. As my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) has said, a commission has been issued to settle the claims of the half-breeds of the Saskatchewan River district, and I have come to the conclusion that it would be well to send further instructions to that commission to look into the claims of these half-breeds and to report to us whether or not, in their judgment, these men would be fairly entitled to the same bounty which is extended to the militia. I have given orders to Mr. White, comptroller of the North-west Mounted Police, to have this carried into effect, and to have these claims investigated. There are not many; only forty-two in all, and I believe I meet the views of the House when I say that parliament has no intention of dealing with these claimants in any other than a generous manner, so that every subject of Her Majesty there may feel that the laws of the country are not only ample to protect them, but to afford them all the justice to which they are entitled. I believe my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) ought to be satisfied with this, and that he should not press the motion any further.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not think I could wish for anything more satisfactory than has fallen from the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and I would be very hard to please indeed if I were not satisfied with his remarks. Now, after a struggle of about fourteen years, I am about to succeed. I most gladly act on his suggestion and withdraw my motion.

Motion withdrawn.

RICHELIEU RIVER BRIDGE.

On the motion being called for:

Copies of reports, papers and correspondence with the government, or any member thereof, of all orders in council and statements of all moneys paid in respect of the bridge over the Richelieu River and the $35,000 voted therefor by parliament.—(Mr. Foster.)

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) asked me to move this for him. He does not wish to discuss it, but he would like very much to get the papers.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In the absence of the Minister of Railways, I cannot agree to the motion passing. I will give my hon. friend another opportunity of moving it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As the time is practically out, it might be passed on the understanding that it could be withheld if there is any trouble about it.

The PRIME MINISTER. There would be trouble, because I do not think the correspondence is complete; I think it is still pending. I will give my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) an opportunity of moving his motion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is all he wants. All he wants is the information, as soon as possible.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not say that I will agree. I say that I will give an opportunity of discussing it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I understand; if there is no objection.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS.

Return showing the total amounts of the freight charges mutually accounted for between the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway for the year ending June 30, 1897, and with respect to freight interchanged (1) at St. John, N.B., (2) at Montreal; (b) with respect to through freight bonded over (1) at St. John, N.B., (2) at Montreal; the said amounts for the year ending June 30, 1899.

The total amounts, respectively allotted to the Intercolonial and Canadian Pacific Railways in the division of passenger fares in connection with through passengers (a) via Montreal, (b) via St. John, N.B., for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1897.

The said amounts for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1899.—(Mr. Powell.)

Return showing the total amounts of freight and charges and passenger fares collected by the Canadian Pacific Railway and accounted for by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Intercolonial Railway for the year ending the 30th day of June, A.D. 1897, and the amounts of said charges and fares for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1899.—(Mr. Foster.)

Copies of all papers, reports and recommendations relating to Lake Winnipeg fisheries since the fall of 1892, including all correspondence between the Inspector of Fisheries and the department, and report of royal commission held some time between 1894 and 1896.—(Mr. Roche.)

THE DUTIES ON TOBACCO.

On the order.

That, in the opinion of the House, the present high duties upon tobacco should be reduced.—(Mr. Gillies.)

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). I have something to say on this question; but I see that my hon. friend for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) is not present. I am willing to let it stand, if the hon. leader of the opposition so desires.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Stand.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). As this may be perhaps the last opportunity there may be of speaking on this question, my hon. friend might make his remarks, and we can adjourn the debate afterwards. We will not press the question to a conclusion until the hon. member for Richmond is here.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not care to go into this question in the absence of the hon. member who made the motion; but all I have to do at present is to lay before the House certain statistics and calculations, which the hon. member for Richmond will have an opportunity of reading in Hansard. I am glad to say that I cannot agree with my hon. friend, and when I explain the reason why I cannot agree with him, I think the House will be satisfied. I will go back a few years and show the enormous progress that the cultivation of Canadian tobacco has made since the amendment of the law, and the imposition of 10 cents a pound on imported tobacco.

In 1894-5, 523,000 pounds of Canadian tobacco went through our Inland Revenue factories. In 1895-6, only 474,000 pounds went through. In 1896-7, 690,000 pounds went through. In 1897-8, the year in which the duty of 10 cents a pound on imported tobacco was imposed, the amount that went through our excise factories sprang up to 1,949,000 pounds. That is to say, it trebled in the first year. In the year ending June 30, 1898-9, 2,500,000 pounds went through, and the increase still continues, and with great rapidity. In the six months, ending December 31, 1899, 1,900,000 pounds went through; and in the month of January, 1900, 250,000 pounds went through; that is, in one month. This increase in the use of home-grown tobacco is most remarkable. It shows two things: First, what a wonderful improvement must have taken place in the cultivation of our home-grown tobacco, under the influence of that small addition to the customs duties, and, secondly, the great improvement in the curing of the tobacco, which presents much greater difficulty than the cultivation. I must now consider the complaint that has been made that the imposition of the duty of 10 cents a pound on imported tobacco is a hardship to the fishermen and other labouring classes, to whom the use of tobacco is a solace which they cannot well dispense with. It will be seen how little that complaint applies in this case, when I remind the House that the tobacco manufactured out of imported tobacco, however poor its quality was, paid a duty of 35 cents a pound—10 cents of import duty, and 25 cents of excise—while the Canadian tobacco which goes through our factories only pays 5 cents a pound. Therefore, the displacement of so many millions of pounds of imported tobacco by Canadian-grown tobacco, is a great benefit to the consumer, and ought to be a source of great satisfaction to them, especially the poor. I have samples of tobacco to show the difference in size. The plug of tobacco sold at 10 cents is now about double the size it was before the law was changed. Some of the chewing tobacco is a mixture of Canadian and foreign. It may be said that it is not very satisfactory. The best test of the pudding is in the eating thereof, and when we find that 3,000,000 pounds of Canadian tobacco are now produced, it is evident that it finds consumers, and that the people are satisfied with it. If our factories are increasing with such rapidity that in three years they have nearly quadrupled the amount of Canadian tobacco they use, that shows that the Canadian tobacco must be satisfactory to the public. A decrease in the duties would not be at all in favour of the poor consumers, but quite the reverse, because, owing to the encouragement given the growers of Canadian tobacco, they have found out not only the best way of cultivating the plant, but also of curing it. Not only in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, but in British Columbia our farmers are growing excellent tobacco and curing it with great success, and it would be difficult to find in the Canadian tobacco to-day any of that rank taste which at one time made it so objectionable to consumers. We ought to hail with satisfaction these proofs that our climate and soil are favourable to the cultivation of this plant. In view of such satisfactory results obtained within such a short time, I do not think that we should unduly hasten to take away that encouragement we have given and which promises so much for the future of our farmers and manufacturers.

Mr. H. F. McDUGALL (Cape Breton). I was not in the House when the last debate took place in this House on this subject, but have read the discussion and was surprised to find an hon. member from the province of Nova Scotia, the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac), making the statement that the consumers of tobacco in that part of the country and the neighbouring counties in the province of Nova Scotia were to-day buying tobacco at a lower price than before the last increase in the tariff. That statement is not correct. It may be true that the consumers can buy a certain quality for the same price and possibly for less, but the tobacco preferred by the fishermen, farmers and coal miners and labourers in the lower provinces, is that manufactured by McDonald of Montreal and McKenna of Pictou, known as McDonald twist and McKenna twist, and other smoking brands. I have in my hand the invoices of wholesale merchants and manufactures, giving the price charged before and since the change in the duties, and the difference between the two is between 14 cents and 15 cents per pound, and as much as 18 cents. The people engaged in the sale and manufacture of these classes of tobacco find that they lose a great deal of their business by reason of the increase, and through the forcing in consequence of the increased duty on the market of other tobaccos which the people are unwilling to buy because of inferior quality. I am a dealer in tobacco myself, and I know that the price has gone up from one to two cents a plug on this particular class of tobacco. In charging an increase of one cent per plug, we find that our profit is less, and if we increase the price by anything we must increase it a cent and make the increase two cents when we sell by the plug. Of course when we sell by the pound or the half pound, the tobacco can be sold at a fairer rate of increase, according to the advance, but in selling by the plug we cannot do justice to our customers or ourselves. Tobacco used by the people in my part of the province is the products of the two factories I have mentioned very largely. Very little other tobacco is sold to the people, so that they are driven to pay the extra price or take a cheaper kind that they cannot enjoy.

That is the foundation of the complaint we make, that unnecessary advance has been made in the price. I do not object protecting those who raise the plant, but I think their ought to be a way by which protection could be afforded them without having the price of tobacco increased to such an unreasonable extent as it has been to the people who use this tobacco, which is the tobacco of their choice.

The statement made by the hon. member for Antigonish is not correct nor in accordance with the facts. There is scarcely a pound of the cheaper tobacco he spoke of sold in his county. Our fishermen and farmers consume the best kind they can get, and on that kind a great advance has been made. These tobaccos which they use are manufactured from the imported leaf, which is superior to the Canadian leaf in the judgment of those who consume them.

Mr. COWAN. It is not.

Mr. McDOUGALL. That is, in the judgment of those who consume it. We cannot force upon the consumers what they do not want to have; they must be allowed to purchase what they can enjoy.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I do not want to go deeply into this question, but I wish to express the opinion of my own constituents as regards this policy of the government concerning tobacco. There is the strongest feeling that a gross injustice has been done to the poor people of Canada, and that the legislation of this government in regard to those things that are the necessities of life to the poor leans severely on the very class that the Liberal party from year to year and from decade to decade professed to be the friends of. When you analyse the operation of their legislation, you find that there is relief for the rich, while the burden upon the poor is increased. The fine lady with her silks and satins gets relief, though she did not ask for it. I never heard of any petition coming here from any fine lady, saying that she had to pay too high for silk. But, they increase the price of the poor man's plug of tobacco, or, if the tobacco is sold for the same price, they lower the weight.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The plug is double the size.

Mr. DAVIN. No, no; the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. I do not myself use tobacco, but a large number of my friends do, and they have expressed to me the utmost disgust with the policy of the government in regard to this matter. A course is easily open to the government even at this stage, a course that would place the poor man in the same position as he was in before, and they might even go further and give relief in regard to this matter which to these men, is a necessary of life. Look at what has been done in regard to those burned out in Hull and Ottawa. Persons subscribing with charitable intent not only send money, not only send clothes, but send large quantities of tobacco, so convinced are the people of this country that for a man who is accustomed to smoke, tobacco is a necessary of life. I entirely agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Gillies), whose motion is on the Order paper, that something should be done by the House and by the government to give us cheaper tobacco.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). I am sure we are glad to congratulate the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue upon his desire to afford greater protection to the industry of growing tobacco in this country. But I realize, at the same time, that in the course he has pursued he has rather overshot the mark. It seems to me he might have pursued another course by which he would have obtained the result aimed at without increasing the burdens of the people to the extent he has done. Why not, as suggested by the resolution that we are now discussing, reduce the excise duty on the home-grown tobacco, and at the same time, lower the duty on the manufactured article? I understand that the excise duty is five cents. If that excise duty were lowered, a protection would be given to the grower of tobacco in Canada just as well as by increasing the import duty. Of course, tobacco is not grown in the immediate vicinity of where I reside; but, in the interest of the tobacco growers of this country, and of the consumers of tobacco—because, no matter how desirous we are of protecting the interests of the grower, we must consider the large number of people who use tobacco and are directly interested in the question of the price of the article—why not remove at least a part, if not the whole, of the excise duty? The production this year, as given by the hon. minister, is 3,000,000 pounds. This, at five cents a pound, would give $150,000. By the removal of this excise duty, we would be aiding the grower of tobacco in Canada, for this would enable him to realize just that much more on his crop, and at the same time we would be protecting the interests of the consumer by giving him an article at a lower price. Then, in order to retain the proper equilibrium between the duty on the home-grown tobacco and the duty on the imported tobacco, I would be quite willing that the duty on the imported tobacco should be reduced by the same amount. That would be following the course suggested in the resolution, and, to my mind, would be in the interest of a great number of people in this country who consume tobacco. Only about one-fifth of the people in Canada consume tobacco, for we must exclude women and children and men who are non-users of tobacco. From an answer given by the Minister of Inland Revenue and the Minister of Customs the other day, we find that the increased duty upon tobacco paid in 1899 by reason of the change made in 1897 amounted to the large sum of $1,151,345. That tax is paid by one-fifth of the people, the remainder contributing nothing toward it, although they get the same advantage from money going into the public treasury as do those who use tobacco. It does seem to me that that is not fair. Consideration should be given to the consumer as well as to the producer, and the price of this article should not be unduly enhanced as it has been, by the legislation which was put upon the statute-book two years ago. The Minister of Inland Revenue exhibits to the House sample plugs of tobacco, and tells us how much cheaper the plug is now than it was formerly. But we all know that the plug that he exhibits, certainly the larger plug he exhibits, is not of the quality of the smaller one that we obtained before. They are of entirely different qualities. Even the plug which is generally sold throughout western Ontario, known as McDonald's Briar, is a smaller plug than it was formerly; a person who buys a ten-cent plug to-day does not get as much tobacco as he formerly did for ten cents. And I may add a statement that, I think, will be borne out, if not by every hon. gentleman in this House, at any rate by the people of the country—that the quality of that tobacco is not equal to what it was formerly. It has deteriorated in quality, and I think that is one of the things to which the hon. minister should call the attention of the manufacturers of tobacco. Whilst they are being protected in this industry, the people, at any rate, ought to get the quality which they are entitled to. Whilst I have no desire to interfere with the product of any firm that may be doing business in this country, I say without hesitation that the quality of McDonald's Briar is not equal to what it was two or three years ago. I think nearly every man who smokes tobacco will agree with me. There is no question about it we are compelled to say, desirous as we are to promote home industry, that tobacco made from the Canadian leaf will not take the place of the other. You cannot by any possible means force Canadian tobacco upon all those who have been accustomed to using imported tobacco. Whilst a very considerable amount of it is being sold in the country, sold largely because imported tobacco has been made so excessively dear, people are really using an inferior article, which is not at all equal in quality to what they desire to use, simply because it is cheaper, and because, in many instances, they cannot afford to use an article which would meet their taste, and which is of the proper quality. I feel strongly on this point, I believe an injustice is done to the people of this country through this legislation. Since we are to have $7,500,000 of a surplus this year, I see no reason in the world why one-fifth of the people should be compelled to contribute such a large amount to the treasury on an article which is used really by only a fraction of the people. I trust the government will take some action in this matter, and that they will grant the relief to the consumers of tobacco, which I believe they are entitled to. They are largely the toilers of this country, men who compose the farming community, the mechanics and the workmen throughout the country, and I think it only fair that some relief should be granted in the way I have indicated. I fail to see that any harm can come to the industry if we reduce the excise duty two, three or four cents, or even strike it off altogether, and proportionately reduce the duty on imported tobacco.

Mr. HENDERSON.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). I wish to say what I have said in this House before, that in my opinion the added duty on tobacco of fourteen cents per pound is utterly unjustifiable. It is an exorbitant tax upon a portion of the community, it raises more than a million of taxation from a class of people that you have no right to single out to bear this imposition. It is said that it encourages consumption of home-grown tobacco. Well, home-grown tobacco was protected already by a duty of several hundred per cent. which, in my opinion, was more than sufficient. There was five cents a pound of excise duty upon the home-grown tobacco, and twenty-five cents on the foreign tobacco, which, I think, was quite sufficient for the foreign tobacco, the average price being fifteen cents per pound. The price of home-grown tobacco is, perhaps, eight or nine cents per pound, and a protective duty of twenty-six cents a pound on an article that costs eight or nine cents I think is quite sufficient to protect any industry of that kind. The customs revenue from imported tobacco is $1,150,000 more than it was under the old order of things; the people are consuming that tobacco and are paying that $1,150,000, which, I say, is an utterly unjustifiable tax imposed on the people of Canada by a government who claim that they are going to have a surplus of $7,500,000 wrung out of the people, and in this case wrung out of them unnecessarily and unfairly. I move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

MOUNTED POLICE PENSION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assinibola) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to amend the Mounted Police Pension Act. He said: I have so frequently explained this Bill, that probably it would not be necessary for me now to go into it at any length. We might take the second reading, go into committee and when in committee, we might discuss it, if that would meet with the approval of the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). No. I am sorry to say to my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), that I could not agree to his motion to take the second reading, I have discussed the Bill with the officers of my department, and they represent to me that the Bill involves a serious charge upon the revenue, and if my hon. friend presses it, I will have to take the point, that the Bill is out of order, because it involves a charge upon the revenue by increasing the rate of the pension. If the hon. gentleman looks at clause c of section 2. of the Bill, he will see that it reads as follows :

(c.) If he has completed twenty years' service, an annual sum equal to thirty-fiftieths of his annual pay, with an addition of one-fiftieth of his annual pay for every completed year of service above twenty years, so, however, that the pension shall not exceed two-thirds of his annual pay at his retirement.

I have had a table made by the officers of the department, and they say that this involves a serious addition to the charges on the revenue at the present time. If my hon. friend will accept a suggestion from me, it would be that he should not press this Bill at this session. I have asked the officers of my department to look into it very carefully, to see if it is not possible to recast the Bill. My opinion is that it might be recast to some advantage. I could not adopt the suggestion of the hon. gentleman to take the second reading of the Bill. These pensions would have to be looked over and if the hon. gentleman will leave it in the hands of the officers of the department, and I would suggest that the hon. gentleman leave it in the hands of the officers of the department and not press it at present.

Mr. DAVIN. Let me point out to the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and to the House, that the fourth clause of the Bill provides for the repeal of chapter 33, of the statutes of 1898. That Act, which was passed with the sanction of the right hon. gentleman, provides that wherever the words '25' occur in the Act of 1889, with the exception of section 4 which is the section which fixes the money, the word '20' shall be substituted for them. Either that Act of 1898 is a dead letter, or, if it does anything, what it does is this, it actually provides that a man may leave the service after twenty years' service as he, prior to the statute of 1898, was able to do after twenty-five years. But, as the hon. gentleman, who had charge of that Bill, did not alter clause 4, the result will be that instead of being of any use to a man, instead of being a favour to him, he would be only allowed to receive one-fiftieth, of his pay instead of thirty-fiftieths, which, after twenty-five year's service up to 1898, he would be entitled to receive. Of course, I was quite aware, if the point of order was raised, I could not go on. But, the right hon. gentleman will see that I have put the amounts in italics, and, I believe, under these circumstances, that the point of order is not necessarily taken. I do not believe, for instance, that any one on the other side of the House, other than the leader of the House, could take the point of order.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The Speaker would have to take it in committee.

Mr. DAVIN. When we got into committee.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You would not be any further on.

Mr. DAVIN. If we got into committee, the moment we came to a vote on a clause, the government would either agree to the amounts that are here, or disagree, and I have no doubt the thing would be at an end. Of course I am perfectly aware that any Bill in the hands of a private member, is completely at the mercy of the government. No private member can pass a Bill unless he has the sanction of the government; still less can he pass a Bill if it, as the right hon. gentleman says, would probably lay some little burden on the country. Of course, I am quite aware of that, but what I wish to point out is, that certainly the legislation of 1898 should not be allowed to remain on the statute-book, because it is discreditable to the House and to the government, and it is even offensive to the mounted police. If it is operative, and surely it must be operative, being on the statute-book, I hold that it is actually a disfranchising measure, or a measure that imposes disabilities, whereas it was intended to be a gift. I have the statute here, and I will ask the right hon. gentleman's attention to it. It is as follows :

The Mounted Police Pension Act, 1889, is hereby amended by striking out the words 'twenty-five' wherever they occur in sections 3, 7 and 8 thereof, and inserting instead the words 'twenty.'

No change whatever is made in the most important clause of all—the clause that apportioned the pensions to the service of a man leaving the police. The section governing that point reads as follows now :

If he has completed not less than twenty years' service shall be entitled to retire and receive a pension for life; and

If he has completed not less than fifteen years' service, and is incapacitated for the performance of his duty by infirmity of mind or body, shall be entitled to retire and receive a pension for life.

I ask the right hon. gentleman's attention to this, because, he as a lawyer will see how very ridiculous the legislation is at present. Section 4 of the statutes of 1889, reads :

If he has completed fifteen, but not less than twenty-one years' service, an annual sum equal to one-fiftieth of his annual pay for every completed year of service. If he has completed twenty-one but less than twenty-five years' service, an annual sum equal to twenty-fiftieths of his annual pay. If he has completed twenty-five years' service, an annual sum equal to thirty-fiftieths of his annual pay.

That section is unrepealed. The right hon. gentleman will see that there is a perfect jumble by reading the amending Act of 1889 into the statute of 1898. This amendment is intended to enable a man after twenty years to have the same advantage which he has now after twenty-five years' service, and wherever 'twenty-five years' service, and wherever 'twenty-five' is now in the statute, except in section four, 'twenty' is enacted, but there is no change made in section four, so that in the really operative clause of the statute the very most the man would get would be one-fiftieths instead of thirty-fiftieths. I do not want to go through the farce of going on with the Bill if the Prime Minister objects to it, but he will see that the law does not give to the mounted policeman what was intended, and if it does not then the statute of 1898 should be repealed, because it sounds as if it were doing something for the North-west Mounted Police, whereas, in fact, it does not place them in a better position, and it probably places them in a worse. If the right hon. gentleman raises the point of order there is no use in my going on.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

DRAINAGE ACROSS RAILWAY LANDS.

Mr. GEORGE E. CASEY (West Elgin) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 9) respecting drainage on and across the property of railway companies. He said: Mr. Speaker, I gladly avail myself of the opportunity which I feared would scarcely arise, to move the second reading of this important Bill. The delay that has taken place in getting legislation in the hands of private members before this House, has been such that I feared there would be no opportunity of going on with this Bill. If you pass your eye down through the list of the orders we are considering, you will find that some of these orders were set for February 5 last; the second reading of this particular Bill was set for February 7, and yet from that day to this it has been found impossible to move the House to give it its second reading. I think, Sir, we have the right to urge that the time placed at the disposal of private members who wish to bring public measures before the House, is not generally sufficient. In this particular session, moreover, such time as is, habitually, normally at the disposal of private members has been used for other purposes by gentlemen on the other side of the House. Whenever it was a public Bills' day we had a motion to adjourn the House by gentlemen opposite for the purpose of discussing some far-away question, which had the effect of shutting out the business that should have come before the House. Up until now, not a single public measure in the hands of a private member has had a second reading—there is not an item on the Order paper for the third reading of any such measure. I felt it my duty, Sir, to say these few words before entering upon the merits of the particular Bill before us.

I almost fear that I have discussed the question so often that it has become an old story, and one not apt to excite the attention of other members than those whose constituencies are interested. And yet, I must call upon the members of this House to give some attention to this Bill and to recollect that this is a measure that interests every constituency through which a railway runs. Primarily, the agitation in favour of this measure has come from the farmers. They have, perhaps, been the first to feel the injuries caused to their farms on account of the blocking of their drainage by railway companies. But it is not the farmers alone who have suffered. In cities and towns which wished to complete a system of municipal drainage, equal difficulties have arisen. Let me instance the case of the city of St. Thomas, in my own county of Elgin. It was proposed there to carry a sewer, not across the line, exactly, of a railway, but under a bridge on the line of a railway company, and they encountered difficulties, and were obliged to make payments to the railway company for the privilege of digging a deep trench between the abutments of this bridge in order to lay down the sewer. When powerful municipalities meet with difficulties of this kind, it can be understood how comparatively weak township municipalities suffer, and how greatly the individual farmer is troubled by the monopoly claimed by the railway companies over the road-bed and all that is beneath it. It would be out of place now to go into all the details of the grievances known to myself or to other members of the House suffered by individuals in our own or other counties. That would be more in place before the committee which will have charge of the Bill. But, I may say in general terms, that these grievances have been of two classes: Firstly, those caused by the original construction of railroads; secondly, those that have arisen from the development of drainage in adjacent lands after a railway has been constructed. In the first instance, there has been on the whole a very fair provision for the passage of existing drains and watercourses across railway lands. It is easier to secure that when a railway is being first constructed. Besides, a railway is somewhat at the mercy of the public until it is constructed. Therefore, pretty fair drainage facilities are generally furnished in the first instance. But as the farmers open up their lands, drain one field after another, or one line of farms after another, into township or private drains, and the volume of water carried across the railway by means of culverts increases, it is then that the facilities first furnished by the railway companies begin to prove extremely inadequate. It is then, too, that the rural municipality or the individual farmer, finds the great difficulty of compelling the railway companies to give them the same rights of drainage that they can compel any other landowner to afford.

Mr. DAVIN.

In general terms, I may say that the whole railway system of Canada, with few exceptions, has been taken under the protecting wing of this parliament, and outsiders have been unable to compel the railway companies to obey the laws of the different provinces in regard to drainage. The actual statute in Ontario was passed a considerable number of years ago, on which the present Bill is based as to principle and as to many of its details. But, the railways to which that statute ought to be applicable have been taken under our jurisdiction, and it cannot be enforced. We are told that no such statute is necessary. The late Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) has been very urgent on that point. Every Minister of Railways, I think, is apt to take that view of the case. They say that no special statute is needed because there is a remedy before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. On the other hand, I contend, and I think anybody who looks into the matter will admit, that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council is not a proper tribunal for the settlement of cases of this kind. In the first place, it is out of the question to expect distant and small municipalities, and still more so individuals, to come to Ottawa and bring counsel with them, to lay their case before this tribunal. They cannot go into a court to get it settled as they would any other grievance against a railway company. They must come to the capital of the country, whether the grievance arises in Ontario, in New Brunswick, or in Prince Edward Island. It is absurd to say that there is any remedy in the existence of a tribunal of that kind. In the next place, that tribunal is not a judicial tribunal. It is composed of gentlemen many of whom are lawyers, but at the same time they are ministers of the Crown in charge of important departments which require their whole time and attention. Such little time and effort as they can give to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council are works of supererogation. They merely take this as an extra piece of work imposed upon them by the present state of the constitution, which they would gladly escape, and which they get through with as quickly as possible. I have been at some meetings of that committee. I am bound to say that they did give to the cases before them more attention than you could have expected under the circumstances; but, as a matter of fact, even the more important cases, involving the rights of railway companies and other large corporations to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars of money, are greatly delayed by the fact that ministers can only give their spare time to the meetings of the committee. Now, Sir, I ask you and the House and the country if it is reasonable or decent to have such a state of things that the only possible remedy for an aggrieved farmer or an aggrieved rural municipality is to come before a committee of this kind, constituted at the capital, meeting only when other business allows ministers to give a little time to it, necessarily hurried and incomplete in its dealings with such cases. Fancy the Minister of Railways, the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Justice, and the ministers of two or three other departments, meeting in solemn conclave to consider whether John Jones has a right to drain a twelve-acre field in the north-west corner of his farm across a railway line. It is absurd; the machinery is out of all proportion to the work required to be done. What the farmer and the local municipality require to afford them something like justice is a cheap, local, somewhat primitive means of obtaining a remedy. This view of the case commended itself to the Ontario government, a government which, whatever failures in judgment it may have been guilty of at one time or another, has shown a vast deal of ordinary common sense in its dealings with matters of this kind. The Act passed by the Ontario legislature when Sir Oliver Mowat was Premier provided a simple method of arbitration between the railway companies and those who claimed that they sustained injuries in respect of drainage at the hands of the railway companies. Without going into all the details of the Act, I may say that the earlier clauses establish the general principle; and the clauses of my Bill are, with the necessary alterations required by the fact that we do not control municipal machinery, practically those of the Ontario Act. Let me give a quotation or two. Clause 4 provides:

4. Every railway company shall permit the opening and construction of all necessary drains and outlets for drains, and the opening, widening and deepening of outlets for natural water-courses, which are required for the drainage of lands adjacent to the property of such railway company, or which are constructed or opened under the authority of any municipality.

Clause No. 5 provides:

5. Every existing ditch, drain, creek or water-course, situate on the property of a railway company, and running along or under its railway, may be deepened, widened or extended, and any existing bridge or culvert in the roadbed of such railway may be deepened or widened, or a new bridge or culvert may be constructed, when it is found and reported upon by the engineer of any municipality adjacent to the railway, as required by this Act, or agreed and reported upon as hereinafter provided, that such works are necessary as an outlet for any creek or watercourse, or of any ditch or drain that has been or is to be constructed under the authority of such municipality, and that such works can be done without detriment to the safety of the railway: Provided, that such works shall be done in such a manner as not to injure the bridges, culverts or roadbed of the railway, or in any way interfere with the traffic thereof.

These two clauses establish the general principle that a railway company must not play the dog in the manger, but must allow the same privilege of drainage across its land as are furnished by other landowners. The end of the last clause removes the objection sometimes frivolously urged against legislation of this kind, namely, that it would not do to put the road-bed and the traffic of a railway company at the mercy of every local municipality or every township land surveyor.

The Bill then goes on to provide how the local municipality or landowner may proceed to obtain a remedy for their grievances. In every case, the services of a qualified land surveyor shall be engaged—the township engineer or village engineer or city engineer, in the one case, and in the other the engineer representing the individual who claims to have a grievance. The railway company must then be notified of the claim made, and after a certain lapse of time a meeting should be held between the engineer representing the railway company and the engineer representing the parties claiming to be aggrieved. If these two can agree as to what should be done, the matter is at an end. They report, and their report, being filed in the office of the clerk of the municipality has the effect of law.

If they do not agree, these two are to select a third as umpire, and the three will form a board of arbitration to go on the ground and examine and decide everything, under the terms of this Act, which prevent damage or obstruction to the road-bed or traffic of the company, and their report, on being registered, becomes law and compulsory as regards what should be done. To quote the wording of the Act:

8. The clerk of the municipality, or the engineer of the landowner desiring to have such drainage works constructed, shall send to the manager of the railway company, by registered letter, a copy of the report, plans, profiles and estimates made by the engineer in accordance with the next preceding section.

2. The manager of the company, or some one acting on his behalf, shall, within fifteen days after receiving such report, forward to the clerk of the municipality interested, or to the landowner, by registered letter, a notice stating whether he approves or disapproves of the said report. If he approves of it, his letter of approval, together with the said report, and the plans, profiles and estimates, shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the municipality in which the said drainage work is situated, or, if it extends into two or more municipalities, with the clerk of each municipality; and the said letter and report shall constitute a bargain binding on all parties concerned and liable for the performance of the work, or the cost thereof, upon the lands of the railway company, and shall not be subject to appeal.

3. If the manager of the railway company objects to the said report, in whole or in part, he shall, in such notice, state his objections, and shall also fix a day, not later than twenty, nor earlier than fifteen days from the mailing of such notice, upon which the engineer of the railway, or some one acting on his behalf, will meet the engineer of the municipality, or of the landowner, at the place where the work is proposed to be done, for the purpose of arriving at an amicable agreement as to the work objected to by the manager of the railway, or as to the cost thereof.

4. If the engineer of the railway company and the engineer of the municipality or of the landowner, agree upon any portion of, or the whole of, the said work objected to by the manager of the company, then such report, amended, if need be, as agreed upon, shall be made out in duplicate and signed by both engineers, one copy to be retained by the engineer of the railway company and one by the engineer of the municipality or landowner; and the said report shall be binding upon all parties concerned, as set forth in subsection 2 of this section, and shall be filed as provided in the said subsection.

If the engineers disagree, the dispute is to be referred to an engineer appointed by the Minister of Railways, whose decision shall be final and binding upon all parties interested.

Clause 6 provides:

6. When the said disagreement takes place, the engineer of either of the parties represented may, within four days thereafter, by registered letter, request the Minister of Railways and Canals to appoint an engineer as provided in the next preceding subsection, and shall in such letter give the name and post office address of the engineer representing the other party, and also his own post office address, and state the locality where the proposed work is to be done.

The Minister of Railways and Canals shall, within six days after receiving the said request, appoint a competent engineer to settle the matter in dispute. The engineer so appointed shall go down with the other two and act as umpire. But if the two engineers or the two parties agree on an umpire, the Minister of Railways need not be called upon to supply an engineer.

I do not think there is anything else I need refer to in detail in the Act except the last paragraph, which provides that:

12. If the railway company neglects or refuses to enlarge or construct a bridge or culvert within the time specified in the award or the report for the completion thereof, the railway company shall be held liable to pay to the parties interested the sum of $10, as fixed and liquidated damages, for each day from the date mentioned for the commencement of the work, during which the company so neglects or refuses to proceed with the work.

On the whole, this Bill provides a complete system on settling the differences referred to and a cheap method—one not requiring journeys to Ottawa or any distant place to attend either a court or a meeting of the Railway Committee. It supplies a quick method, for all the proceedings can be got through within a comparatively short space of time. Arbitration is a principle familiar to every one, and on the whole the fairest that could be applied for settling disputes of this kind. And above all this Bill provides a general statement of the rights of landowners adjacent to railways, which is an absolutely essential part of any legislation of this kind.

We all know that matters in which farmers are chiefly interested do not get the attention that is given to legislation on other matters. It is harder, therefore, to get a Bill through this House in their interest than one in the interest of almost anybody else. A few years ago, I was asked to introduce and put through a Bill for the benefit of the wheelmen of this country. There was no trouble with that Bill at all. As soon as it came before the House every wheelmen's association all over the country began to write and telegraph to the members representing them, and brought such tremendous pressure to bear on the members of this House that a vote was not even taken on that Bill, although it had been strongly contested in the Railway Committee and opposed by the railway companies. It is impossible to secure such united action and quickness of response on the part of the farming community. Therefore, it is all the more necessary that members representing farmers or representing municipalities that have drainage works to carry out should spontaneously take action in regard to this measure. I had hoped, I confess, that before now, we should have a government Act dealing with this matter. We have a Bill now before the House, which I do not propose to discuss, of course, introduced by the Minister of Railways and Canals, amending the Railway Act. I do not know why legislation providing for what is wanted in this particular case should not be attached to that Bill when it comes up again for discussion. If it proves impossible to get the present Bill further considered on account of the lateness of the session, I may have to propose what this Bill contains in the form of an amendment to the government Act amending the Railway Act. It will be much more convenient, I confess, to see it dealt with in a separate Bill. But, failing legislation by the government on the matter, we private members must put our heads together and see if we cannot perfect a Bill that will give satisfaction, and one that will afford relief to the hundreds and thousands of farmers throughout the country who are injured by the present state of things. I have been spoken to by many members of this House about grievances arising in their constituencies. I hope that now that this Bill is up for discussion, a number of these will state their position in regard to it, and will say a word or two to show the importance of the legislation asked for. And I hope the expression of opinion will come from both sides of the House. This is a thing that cannot be a party question, no matter whether it is brought up as a government Bill or as a private member's Bill. It is a thing which a strong feeling exists in the country, though, as I pointed out, it does not make itself so clearly felt as does feeling with regard to other measures. I hope that the Bill will pass the second reading, and, not only that, but there will be a good, solid discussion of the principles of it as it is going through.

Mr. JAS. CLANCY (Bothwell). I do not intend to discuss the provisions of the Bill, but I desire to call the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Casey), who has introduced it, and who has introduced a similar measure for many years, to the want of progress in the case of this important measure. I am not sure that this is the same Bill in detail as was introduced by the hon. member (Mr. Casey) last year, but I suppose it is substantially the same Bill. Last year, when the committee was selected, I did suspect that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had selected a committee that would be perfectly sure not to report its deliberations. But the right hon. gentleman disclaimed—and I am quite sure he was frank in his disclaimer—any idea of that kind. Nevertheless, so far as I know, no report has been made. Though I am not going to discuss the provisions of the Bill, I desire to point out in a very few words the great necessity that exists for the Bill. In the western portion of this province large drains are constructed by means of dredges. Railways take possession of these drains putting up expensive bridges. When the drain has to be repaired and a dredge has to be brought in for that purpose, a difficulty at once arises. You cannot proceed with the dredge; you have to make arrangements with the railway company or abandon the work. That is a serious thing, because it is impossible to repair these drains except with a dredge. Whether the Bill makes provisions for cases of that kind I do not know; but I would like to call attention to the need of some means of overcoming a difficulty of that kind. I know a case myself where a large drain had been constructed, involving, probably, $20,000 or $30,000. The railway company surveyed a line, constructed a railway and put up a bridge. The drain had to be repaired and a dredge was brought in. The railway company at once said: You cannot disturb our bridges; there is no law that will authorize you to do so or that will compel us to tear them down or disturb the traffic of the line. Of course, I understand, that to interfere with railway traffic is a serious matter, because life and very valuable property are at stake. But I would like the right hon. gentleman to see to it that a Bill is prepared and reported, by which the public interest will be protected in this matter, the railway interest being conserved at the same time, of course. There are two sides to the question, but that which concerns the people is that there shall be some reasonable means to find an outlet to a drain, with the least possible disturbance to the railway. I would impress upon the government the necessity of having men take hold of this question who understand something of it. I think that I suggested last year that one of the members of the committee appointed should be the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), who was official drainage referee for many years. The hon. gentleman gave great satisfaction, being, probably, one of the most thorough men in Canada. The right hon. gentleman should appoint such men as these. It is not necessary to take men from the eastern part of Canada or even from the extreme west, because they have no such cases to deal with, as I have pointed out. There may be some cases, but not such aggravated cases as that I have pointed out. I do not intend to detain the House further except to say that the Bill of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) is an absolute and pressing necessity, and I hope that the session will not pass without the government taking action.

Mr. JOHN McMILLAN (South Huron). I have received letters from no less than three of the farmers who are suffering because railways will not give them proper accommodation across their tracks to drain their land. One case I may state briefly: When the railway was built, the water was turned out of its natural channel, and a small surface drain, fourteen inches deep, was run along the track a distance of about sixty rods, whereas the original course of the water was across the railway. The gentleman who wrote to me farms fifty acres, and half of it is fit for nothing but pasture, because he cannot get drainage. He has applied to the railway company and has offered to be at the whole expense if they will allow him to do the work either under their own engineer or under an engineer that he will employ. But he can get no satisfaction. I hold that in western Canada and eastern Canada also, where the farmers find it of the utmost importance to drain their lands, a Bill such as that we are now discussing is an absolute necessity. The farmers in western Ontario are familiar with such machinery as that here proposed for securing drainage across their neighbour's land or across corporation's lands of any description, and that is by calling in a township engineer or some other engineer to go and examine the work and make a careful estimate of its cost, and to notify the railway company. I say that a farmer may just as well suffer or lose a good part of his land as to employ an engineer and a lawyer, without whom it would be nonsense for him to go before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and to employ whom would cost more, in many instances, than the value of the land to be drained. Therefore some simple means, such as provided for if this Bill should be adopted, and that at an early date. I know many farmers are suffering severely on account of the lack of such a Bill. The hon. gentleman who just spoke on the other side spoke of draining out large ditches with dredges, but that is something which would be impracticable in some localities. There are many municipalities through which a railway runs where 10 or 12, and I know in one town, 15 or 16, farmers who are suffering severely at the present time, and they feel it would be utterly useless for them to go before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. I hold it is the duty of the government to do everything they possibly can to give the farmers this relief, because a farmer at the present day requires all the assistance that he can possibly get. I say from practical experience, that there are many farms that are of comparatively little value without the under drainage that they require, and without which the owners cannot make farming pay at the present time. I hold that the extra value of crops on a farm with good soil, where there is underdrainage, will pay for the cost of it in five years. But at the present time many farmers who are willing to improve their land cannot do so for the want of such a Bill as this, and it is too bad to prevent them from making that improvement. In fact in the case of many farms on level land the prosperity of the farmers depends upon underdrainage at the present time. I hope the government will do all in their power to give us a Bill of this description, and to give the farmers that relief that they require in order to underdrain their land.

Mr. CLANCY.

Mr. M. K. COWAN (South Essex). I desire to say a word in connection with this matter and a word to the government. Knowing as I do the western section of Ontario, and as it is known by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) and others who live in that section, it seems to me that one of the greatest grievances existing there arises from the damming up of the natural watercourses by railway corporations, watercourses which the farmers had before the railways were constructed. Take, for example, the county of Essex, which has three great lines of railway running along its northern border, where there is a gentle fall in the land towards the north and down towards Lake St. Clair. The land is very low and very flat, and at the time the railways were first constructed through that country the streams and channels through which the water found an outlet into the lake were sufficient, and would be sufficient to-day to carry the water off the lands were it not for the fact that the railway companies in the construction of their roads, dammed up the natural channels through which the water flowed. It did not matter in the earlier days whether the channels were dammed up or not, because these lands next the railway were not settled at that time, and no person made any complaint if the water was dammed back on them for six months in the year. But as these lands became settled and farmers commenced to cultivate them, they found that the natural creeks and the natural channels which carried that water off the land in a state of nature, had been closed up, or nearly so by these railway corporations. Even within the past ten or fifteen years there are instances in the county of Essex where immense culverts formerly existed through which you could drive a horse and wagon, where to-day there is nothing but a three-foot pipe to show where the water formerly went.

It does seem to me there is a little misapprehension on the part of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) and the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) concerning access to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. I have here the Railway Act, and I defy any man to show where any private individual can come before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. A railway corporation can run through a man's farm and dam the water up, and I care not how great the grievance he may suffer, there is no machinery in the Railway Act by which he can come before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. Again, in the province of Ontario we have a law that is called the Ditches and Watercourses Act, according to which, before you can make a municipal drain, you must have a requisition signed by a certain number of owners showing that they are damaged or injured in some way, and these must petition to the municipal corporation, but there is no machinery in the local law by which an individual can take it up, only the municipality. The result is that if two, or three, or four farmers have a line ditch drain between them which drains their land down to that railway, there is no machinery in the Railway Act that will permit these private individuals, no matter how great the wrong that needs redress, to go before the Committee of the Privy Council, this can only be done by a municipality when they are as a municipality interested.

Now, what I desire more particularly to draw to the attention of this government is the fact that in a state of nature there is a gentle flow to the north in that flat country, and in some instances there were channels which, perhaps, could not be called natural streams within the meaning of the law, but they carried the water from off the surface of the land. That water must be got rid of. The railway corporations come along and construct immense embankments for miles. The result is that when that water which naturally flowed gently down to the railway cannot find an outlet, and when it finds no outlet there the water is dammed back for miles and the consequence is that the most fertile sections in Canada are simply held up by the railway corporations. I say here, and I use the term advisedly, that the farmers in those sections are deliberately held by the throat by the railway companies. I did not exactly catch the words that fell from the member for Bothwell, but if he referred to the case that I think he referred to, it certainly is an atrocious one. I want to state here, that Big Creek, running through the township of Tilbury North, near Lake St. Clair, bifurcates and reaches an outlet at Lake St. Clair through two channels. They passed a by-law to raise money for the purpose of cleaning those out under the Municipal Drainage Act, and the railway company, although they had a simple culvert with two iron girders along which the track ran, refused to allow the corporation of Tilbury North and the contractor, Mr. Lockerby, to pass under that culvert with a dredge until he would first, under guise of a contract, put up sufficient money to cover the expense of raising those girders. Less than 12 men in four hours raised those girders at a time on a Sunday when no traffic was moving, and when they came to raise them the company refused to let Mr. Lockerby pass under until he deposited $1,500 in cash. They then refused to let him go back with the dredge until he deposited $1,500 more, and they got him to enter into a contract on the assumption, he states, that the railway company, were only taking that money as an indemnity. But they hold that $3,000 to-day and have had it for years, and they refuse to give it up. And when the matter was brought to the attention of the Department of Railways and Canals, the great Canadian Pacific Railway sheltered themselves behind that deliberate steal by saying that that was a contract and they did not think that the government had any right to interfere in contracts between individuals. Now I want to be thoroughly understood. I say that in that country there are miles of territory in which there is no living stream, and the water in a natural state flowed over the land to its natural outlet, Lake St. Clair, and when these railway corporations came along and constructed embankments for miles they dammed that water back for miles into the country. The railway corporations now come forward and say that there was no watercourse here. True, there was no drain necessary then for the drainage of that land because it flowed naturally over the surface through swales and shallow depressions. But down to the present time, under the Railway Act, no matter how great the grievance, a private individual is absolutely unable to come before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. And railway corporations, sheltering themselves behind the railway law and behind the jurisdiction of this parliament, have never to the knowledge of any man, permitted a farmer to drain across their property if they could avoid it. I support the principle of the Bill; I desire to support it most strongly, and I want to tell this government and the hon. members of this House, that there is no legislation of such vital importance as this, that all the legislation about the tariff and anything else is infinitesimal compared with the importance of legislation in drainage matters to three or four western counties. When you find municipal corporations that are taxed $1, $1.50, $2, and all the way up to $3 per acre for the purposes of drainage, when it has to be renewed in about ten years, when the drain runs down to the railway track to be turned aside to an outlet miles away, when they are put to great expense to construct a monster outlet for miles along the side of a railway until they strike the natural stream by which they can pass under a bridge of the railway, when the railway companies take them by the throat and charge them $3,000 damages on the top of that, and when a heavy tax is placed upon the farmer's land to pay for this, you can understand what an injustice it is and how it is that the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), and the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) were so heated in their arguments over the matter. As I explained before, the general principle of this Bill is alright. Neither the government, nor any man, wants to do an injustice to any individual or company, but, for fear of doing an injustice to the railway companies, let us not do a greater injustice to the farmers and the landowners who were there long before these railway corporations came into existence. Clause 5 concludes with these words:

Provided that such works shall be done in such a manner as not to injure the bridges, culverts or road-bed of the railway, or in any way interfere with the traffic thereof.

That is a clause more favourable to the railway corporations than I am prepared to support, because, in the modern method of constructing a drain where you have to get a dredge under, you will either have to take the dredge to pieces or build the dredge up stream from the railway and abandon it afterwards. Send it to the committee, where we can get it down to a just and fair principle. The farmer was there first, and his rights should be considered. Through that section of the country there are some depressions and swales that cannot legally be called natural watercourses, through which the water naturally flowed into Lake St. Clair. These have all been closed. It should be provided that the landowner should be allowed to drain his land under the railway, and that this work should not be done at the expense of the landowner. I tell this House that they are making one of the greatest errors that, as a legislature, they ever made if they do not consider that matter, and consider it seriously. The hon. member for West Elgin has had this Bill up time and again. Refer it to a committee of men who will consider the Bill with a constructive rather than a destructive animus, and place it in such a position that it may be worked out well, and that it shall be provided that a railway corporation, because it is acting under a Dominion charter, has no greater rights and no higher privileges to trample under foot the rights and interests of the landowner, the municipality and the citizens than any other corporation has in this country.

Mr. COWAN.

Mr. CHRISTIAN KLOEPFER (South Wellington). Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words in connection with this Bill. I think the Railway Act should be amended so as to afford relief to the farmers of this country. There are several farmers in my county who are unable to drain their land owing to the fact that sufficient culverts were not built when the railways were constructed to provide an outlet for the water. These farmers desired the right to drain their property across the property of the railway companies, but they were not allowed to do so. The result is that some farms have been rendered almost useless. In view of these circumstances, I think the Railway Act should be amended so that the farmers may be allowed to drain their property and that the water may flow off in the natural courses. I shall support the Bill.

Mr. ANDREW SEMPLE (Centre Wellington). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) deserves great credit for the manner in which he has brought forward this measure, and for his persistency in doing so. As a matter of fact, the farmers in western Ontario are at the mercy of the large railway corporations. These corporations pursue a dog-in-the-manger policy, and a large portion of the land of the farmers in many instances is rendered useless on account of the action of the railway authorities. I know a case in point. There is a farm which is divided by a railway into two parts, and many acres of land on the upper side are covered by water. The individual who owns the farm has simply asked the railway company to put a ditch through beneath their tracks. He undertakes to pay the whole of the expense that is incurred in putting a ditch through so that he will have an outlet from one portion of his farm to another. The railway company will not allow the work to be done. I think it is full time that some action should be taken. Railways, I am aware, are all powerful. They have so much money; they employ the best legal talent they can get in the Dominion, and the country is simply at their mercy. As has been stated, the farmers were there before the railway companies, but, the railway companies have the privileges that they have gained under the Railway Act from year to year, and the farming community seem to have no privileges whatever. It is to be hoped that something will be done to remedy this evil, because it is a great evil, and the sooner something is done the better to alleviate the conditions under which the farmers are placed who, with railways running through their property, require outlets for the purposes of drainage. It is to be hoped that the government will take such means as will give relief to the long-suffering farmers.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the statements made by the hon. gentlemen who have addressed you on this subject are true. They have only told a portion of the truth, that is, the truth in regard to those cases that have come under their own notice and observation in their own localities. It looks to me, Sir, on the great general principle that it is a preposterous thing that all the railway companies in Canada should be able to prevent drainage under their railways when every other individual and every other corporation, every other landowner and every other land occupier in the country has to obey the law in the interest of the community. Why should the railway companies not obey the law? Why should they be able, by simply saying: You shall not put drainage under our railway track, to prevent the drainage of large areas of valuable lands? My experience and observation are not so large as that of hon. gentlemen who have spoken and who reside in the portions of the country where this is a live question, and one affecting large portions of the community, in fact, affecting the whole community. But, there are cases that have come under my observation. I know of a case where a railway company have refused to permit the owners of land to drain their property. One case occurs to me at this moment near the city of Montreal, where some owners of land required to lower a drain. There is a drain in now under the railway. They required to lower the drain, perhaps two feet—not more than two feet, I think—in order to drain an area of land eighty or one hundred acres in extent. The railway company refused to permit them to lower that drain two feet or two feet six inches—I do not think it is more than two feet six inches anyway—in order to give value to that property. The property to-day is a swamp which cannot be utilized for building purposes, for farm lands or for anything else, and the railway company is permitted to act as the dog in the manger, and to prevent the owners of these lands, even at their own cost, from making that drain, in order to make their property of value. These railway companies are given the most valuable franchises; they are permitted to go through men's farms and men's houses, to go through the streets and roads of cities and towns wherever they choose, and yet, they have the power to prevent a man contiguous to their railway lines draining his own land, to make it productive. It is intolerable that such a law should be permitted to remain on our statute-books. It is only fair that the railway companies shall be asked by this Bill to assume the expense across their own property; but under the law as it now exists, they will not permit the owner of contiguous land, to make a drain underneath their line of railway even at their own expense. We should pass a law giving full power to the landowners in this regard. The member for Central Wellington (Mr. Semple), said that the member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), deserved great credit for having brought this matter before the House. I am unwilling to concede so much credit to the hon. member (Mr. Casey), for I and other gentlemen, remember last year's farce in connection with this Bill. The Bill was ripe for discussion last year, and the First Minister, and the Minister of Railways and Canals apparently found it expedient to come to no conclusion about it. There were the interests of the people on the one side, and the interests of the railway companies on the other, and the government did not want to provoke the enmity of either, and so what did they do? They proposed to send the Bill to a sub-committee of five members of this House, instead of referring it, as the hon. member for Elgin desired, I believe, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. CASEY. Oh, no, it was the other way. I wanted a separate committee and the government wanted to send it to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. WALLACE. My memory was a little defective on that, and I am very glad to be set right. The government conceded his demand to send it to a private committee, and the Minister of Railways and Canals came across to this side of the House and he asked two gentlemen if they would serve on the committee, and these gentlemen said 'Yes.' But, Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen had already committed themselves by their speeches in this House, to oppose that Bill, and yet the minister (Mr. Blair) in my presence, asked them if they would become members of that committee.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace), say that I asked them to serve on the committee, with knowledge of the fact that they had opposed the Bill?

Mr. WALLACE. No, I do not mean to say anything of the kind. I do not know what knowledge the Minister of Railways

(Mr. Blair), had, but I know the knowledge I had, because I heard these gentlemen get up in the House and speak against the Bill. I do not know what the Minister of Railways knew about it. The fact is that ministers are so seldom in the House that they do not know what is going on here, but I am here and I know what is going on. That is the difference. I remember that the First Minister, who usually is a man of amiable temperament, and smiling, as he is to-night; I remember that he did not smile then. The committee was objected to by the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and the Speaker ruled that these two gentlemen had already declared themselves opposed to the Bill, and, therefore, could not serve on the committee. Then the First Minister got up and said: Very well; if you do not agree to these gentlemen, we will not appoint any one; and they did not appoint any one, and the thing went to the dogs, and the member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) was the consenting party, because he did not raise his voice and protest against it, and exercise his right to push that Bill through to a decision in this House. We all know that, and when there is any talk of the member for West Elgin deserving credit for pushing this matter before parliament, year after year, we know that he pushed it in a way that shows that he is the subservient agent of the members on the Treasury benches, who do not desire a conclusion to be reached on the question. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey), is playing their game, and he is not looking after the interests of the people of Canada, as he professes to do. These are the facts, and it is well that they should be known. I have my doubts that it is going to be pushed to a conclusion this session of parliament. I shall look with great interest to see the further progress of this Bill, and, Mr. Speaker, I shall look, too, with astonishment, if the parliament of Canada is permitted by the government, to give that proper consideration to this Bill, which its very great importance deserves. It is a measure of very great importance to the farmers, to owners of land, and to the great public right that railroad companies that bear their share in the general opening up and improvement of lands, which has to be borne by the farmers, and by the municipalities through which railways run. It should be no longer permitted in this country, that the railways should gobble up all these rights for their own selfish convenience. I hope that a fair and just law, making the railway companies do their share in this matter, will pass this session of parliament.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). My hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) has got very fierce and heated over what he conceives to be the treachery of the government in handling this question. During all the years I have sat in this parliament, I think the question of drainage has been brought up every session.

Mr. WALLACE.

The hon. member for West York, though not a member of the cabinet, was a controller for many years, and I never before knew him to be so fierce and active in urging the consideration of this measure as he has been to-night. I am entirely in accord with the Bill, and I say to the government and the Minister of Railways that they should unquestionably take this question up and deal with it in some way. I think the Railway Act should be amended so as to provide for an umpire, who might be an engineer, and who would be beyond the influence of the railway companies or any one else, to go on the ground, view the conditions, and make an order upon the railway company as to what should be done within a certain time to provide the necessary conveniences to drain the land of the party who had complained. At present, if a man has a piece of land that is flooded, and it is necessary to drain it across his neighbour's land, his neighbour, if benefited thereby, has to contribute his proportional share of the cost, if he is not benefited, the man who wishes to have his land drained may on application to the council obtain the right to drain across his neighbour's land in a way to be defined by the municipal engineer. I do not see why some arrangement of that kind cannot be made applicable to the railway companies. I cannot understand the railway companies standing in the way so determinedly as has been described by the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan). This parliament must pass a law to relieve men who are trampled upon in this way. I do not myself wish to do any railway company any harm, or to deprive them of any right; but I do say that when land requires drainage across a railway track, and the railway company persists in refusing to conduct the water in the best and most convenient way, there should be a law to compel it to provide the necessary relief; and I think the government should not permit this session to pass without placing a law of that kind upon the statute-book. I may say that it has fallen to my lot in two or three instances to appeal to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for relief for men who were suffering, and I am glad to say that they have complied with such applications fairly well. I do not know what railway company the hon. member for South Essex refers to, but I think something should be done to secure to those people relief. Our country is getting better cleared, land in Ontario is being more valuable, and I hope the government will take action on this matter and provide the necessary machinery. The party opposite are just as much to blame in this matter, for they held office for many years without doing anything. I do think, however, that the government should this session give this matter careful and special consideration, and either adopt this Bill or bring in another Bill to provide means of relief for our farmers. I do not think it is at all becoming of the hon. member for West York to attempt to cast a reflection upon the hon. member for West Elgin for not succeeding with his Bill last year or bringing it forward before this time this year. I think I know the hon. member for West Elgin as well as anybody else in this House, and I believe he has made an honest and earnest effort on several occasions to secure legislation of this kind, and he did not deserve the reproof of the hon. member for West York. I do not think he has connived in any way at the defeat of his Bill, but I am sure that he is earnest and anxious to get it passed.

Mr. WILLIAM MCGREGOR (North Essex). I heartily endorse the remarks of the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan), and those of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey). I am pleased to know that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) and other friends on the other side of the House are going with us this time. In 1891, 1892, 1893 and 1894, petitions were presented to this House asking for relief. In 1896 a committee was appointed for the purpose of examining into this question. In our part of the country, where we have three trunk lines—the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canada Southern—running to the north of the farming district, the farmers have a great grievance owing to the water being dammed back upon their lands. I hope the government will see their way clear either to appoint a special committee for the purpose of examining into this question, or referring it to the Railway Committee. I feel satisfied that on this occasion we have the House with us, and I am glad to see that even the hon. member for West York is coming round. But he does not come round gracefully; he wants to put party into a little ditch. I do not think that is becoming of him; I think he should rise above that. We only want relief for a few farmers, and if this Bill passes we feel that relief will be given to the parties who deserve it. I know the case mentioned by the hon. member for South Essex. It cost the man $1,500 to cross the railway, and $1,500 to return; and that is a very large amount to have to pay for taking out a small ditch. I feel sure that the government will this time deal with this measure, knowing that the House is with them. We have all the evidence on the matter necessary. I suppose we have the evidence of thirty or forty witnesses which was given in the year 1895, and that can be used at any time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), in speaking upon this question, has given us a very conspicuous illustration of the large-mindedness and breadth of view with which he discusses all these questions.

There is nothing petty about the hon. gentleman. He is inspired by no small motives; he is only influenced by public considerations. But he sees in this question an opportunity of striking a blow at the prestige of the Liberal government, and is unwilling that any member of this House should accord the smallest measure of praise to the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) for his active intervention on behalf of his constituents and the people resident in the counties named, for the purpose of removing this particular grievance.

The hon. gentleman, not content with endeavouring to withhold from the hon. member from West Elgin, the credit which some gentlemen of this House were disposed to give him, undertook to say that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways had placed obstruction in the way of passing this Bill, and were opposed to its becoming law. I wish to say that the hon. gentleman's charge is wholly unfounded in fact. Neither the Prime Minister nor myself were influenced by any hostility to this Bill on the occasion he referred to. I had no reason to oppose the Bill, and was not opposed to its full consideration; and when my hon. friend from West Elgin asked that it be referred to a special committee, I stated that it was not a measure which should be referred to any special committee, but which should go before the general Railway Committee. The Bill had already been referred to a special committee, before which all the evidence had been taken necessary to throw light upon the facts, and that evidence is still available for the consideration of the Railway Committee and this House. Therefore, instead of sending this Bill to a special committee, whose report would not carry that weight which a report of the Railway Committee would carry—because the special committee which my hon. friend desires, would be composed of men friendly to the Bill—it would be better to refer it to the general Railway Committee where it would be impartially discussed, both pro and con, and reported upon. That is the view I entertained and that is the view that I press upon my hon. friend to-day. If he wishes to have this Bill become law, this session, he ought to refer it to the Railway Committee, which has been appointed to deal with such questions. I am disposed and ready to give to his Bill every assistance which its merits demand. I think that my hon. friend has made out a strong case for his measure, and, while not committing myself to its details, I must say that the people interested, have strong ground upon which to appeal to this parliament for relief, under the existing circumstances, and I would be sorry to think that the Railway Committee would not be prepared to give this Bill every proper consideration. If my hon. friend will accept my suggestion the House, I believe, will be disposed to at once agree to a second reading, and, I can promise him, that the Railway Committee will be summoned, and afforded every opportunity to deal with the measure, and come to a conclusion with respect to its provisions which will cover the ground and meet the case before this session of parliament closes, and my hon. friend will have my assistance in bringing about that result.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I am glad to hear the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), give his consent to assist in getting this Bill through, but I do not think that his strictures on my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace), were deserved, because other members of this House were led to the same conclusion. When this Bill was before the Railway Committee, both the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), and the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), expressed themselves very strongly against it in the presence of the Minister of Railways.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not remember that.

Mr. SPROULE. I was present and remember it distinctly. After it was proposed to send the Bill to a select committee, the hon. minister put those two gentlemen on that committee, although they had expressed themselves as opposed to the principle of the Bill. I objected to their being put on the committee on that ground, because the rule has always been that no one should be appointed to a select committee on a Bill who is opposed to its principles. Then seeing the way the Bill was put off from time to time, some hon. members naturally came to the conclusion that there was no honest desire on the part of the Minister of Railways to assist in putting the Bill through.

Antecedent to this measure, there was another Bill introduced by the hon. member for East Assinibola (Mr. Douglas), which was also referred to a special committee, and on that committee certain members of the opposition were appointed, who had expressed themselves against the principle of the measure. The hon. member for East Assinibola, when he went back to his own constituency, informed his people that the two Conservative members of the special committee had done their utmost to defeat the Bill, and that its defeat was consequently due to the conduct of the opposition. It was because we feared that something of the kind would follow with regard to this measure that we objected to a similar course being followed.

The hon. Minister of Railways has now kindly consented to give us every assistance in carrying the Bill through, and has asked the hon. member for West Elgin to allow it to go to the Railway Committee. And, if it cannot stand the arguments that may be advanced in that committee, it is unlikely that it will pass this House. But, if it is sent to a select committee, I should say, at least, it should go to a committee composed of members who are not opposed to the principle of the Bill, otherwise they will endeavour to kill it, and it will not come back to this House.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. JOHN FRASER (Lambton). I heartily endorse the principle of this Bill. I have listened with a good deal of interest and profit too, I am sure, to the discussion that has taken place upon it. The condition of affairs so graphically described by two or three members of this House renders it, in my opinion, absolutely necessary that something should be done before this session of parliament comes to a close. Of my own personal knowledge I know many farmers in the constituency I have the honour to represent who are suffering because the natural outlets for water are dammed up in the manner described by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), and the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan). I believe that is true of the province of Ontario generally. I have heard complaints of this kind for many years, and to me it is a matter of great surprise to learn from a lawyer, and so able a lawyer as my hon. friend from South Essex is known to be, that there is no machinery by which a man suffering such gross injustice as has been described can reach the courts. It is said that even the humblest British subject has a right to go to the foot of the throne, if necessary, to get justice. But, it appears, there are corporations in this country at whose hands justice cannot be obtained even in the courts. If that be true, or whether it is true or not, it is the bounden duty of this parliament to see to it that a measure is passed providing simple, efficient machinery for the remedy of grievances of this kind. It is utterly intolerable that a man's land should be traversed by a railway and, under what is called the right of eminent domain, a couple of acres taken off a farm of say 100 acres and a few paltry dollars paid for it, the net result of the transaction being that the other ninety-eight acres are rendered almost valueless. If other classes of the community instead of farmers suffering from such an injustice, I am sure, as my hon. friend from West Elgin has well stated, parliament would have been besieged by deputations of sufficient power and influence to have secured a remedy long before this. The farmers, unfortunately, though numerically very strong are not particularly strong in the matter of concentrating their energies so as to bring influence to bear upon the government and upon parliament. The only time they are supposed to bring their influence to bear at all to any purpose is on election day. And then, unfortunately, there are so many silver-tongued orators, like my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace)—who, I am sorry to say, is not above impugning the motives of members of this parliament—there are so many gentlemen of his type going around telling the farmer that Codlin's his friend, not Short, and that it is the farmer's duty to support the party to which the orator owes allegiance. I am very glad that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), who, in looking after matters of this kind is, in my opinion, thoroughly up-to-date, has taken such a warm interest in the matter, and has suggested what I believe to be the best way of dealing with it—referring it to the Railway Committee rather than any other smaller committee of the House. The Railway Committee is composed of gentlemen on both sides of politics and every shade of opinion upon railways and other questions, and is undoubtedly the best body to which a measure of this kind can be referred. I unhesitatingly endorse the view that this Bill, or, at all events, some Bill having for its object, aim and end, the redress of grievances of this character should be referred at the earliest possible moment to the Railway Committee to be threshed out there on its merits. If there are arguments against the principle of the Bill, if there is any good argument in favour of a railway or other corporation being empowered to destroy a man's farm, we, I am sure, would much like to hear that advanced in the Railway Committee, and, perhaps, at a later stage in this House. But I venture the opinion that no such argument will be attempted to be brought forward either in the Railway Committee or here. I can only say that I trust this session of parliament will not be permitted to close before a measure of this character has been placed on the statute-books.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). As I occupied a position some years ago in the province of Ontario having to do to some extent, with the larger drains constructed by municipalities, I have been brought into contact with railways in some cases, and I am bound to say that in a majority of cases, and particularly in those of the three leading railways, the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canada Southern Railway, there is little tendency to be obstructive or to prevent an appropriate system of drainage going through their property. They are willing, as a rule, to concede what the engineer found necessary in order to drain land. While I say that, yet I say that there is undoubtedly a grievance, and that the principle of this Bill is right. The principle of this Bill is simply this—that the railways whether under Dominion charter or provincial charter ought to be subject to provincial legislation in connection with drainage. I do not think that any one can quarrel with that principle. That being right, it becomes the duty of parliament to find out how that principle can be carried out in such a way as not to interfere with the real interests of the railways, and at the same time allow landowners—not farmers alone, though more farmers are interested than any other class—to secure drainage of their lands under the law of the particular province in which the lands lie. I have no hesitation in saying—and I hope my hon. friend from West Elgin will not think it an assumption on my part to say it—I think the Bill as it stands is wholly unworkable, and I think it only requires reading and an understanding of the matter to see that it is so. At the same time, there ought not to be any difficulty in preparing a Bill that would be practicable and in the interests of those requiring drainage. I must confess that there never seemed to be any such difficulty as some connected with the railways have suggested in the matter. When the engineer reports a scheme of drainage, there ought to be some way to compel railways, if not to submit to the particular scheme presented by the engineer having the matter in charge, then to such scheme unchanged by the railway engineer and approved by competent authority, the drainage referee or some such officer in each province or the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. In some way power should be given the tribunal to compel the railway to submit to a drainage scheme maturely considered by the engineer who has it in charge in the particular province where the land is. If this Bill goes to the Railway Committee and the Railway Committee should be too large to deal with it, there would be no difficulty in having it submitted to a sub-committee to report upon it to the general committee. At all events, the matter can be considered in some way this session and presented in some shape to the House. I am in favour of the principle of the Bill, and would be glad if it could be read a second time.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. CASEY. I move that this Bill be referred to the Select Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines. In making this departure from the policy I have hitherto followed, in sending the Bill to a committee, I have not changed my opinion that the Railway Committee would be best qualified maturely to consider and develop a scheme for the purposes intended. The Railway Committee seems to be gorged with its legitimate business of attending to private Bills; but, as a matter of fact, I have found it was more inconvenient to secure the attendance of members of a small select committee appointed on this particular Bill than it is to get the attendance before the Railway Committee of a sub-committee thereof. Moreover, as the general opinion of members on both sides seems to be that they would rather have it sent to the Railway Committee, I am willing to have it go there. Of course, this House has accepted the principle of this Bill, and whether it goes to the Railway Committee or any other committee, it must be remembered that the principle has been passed upon by this House, and that the duty of the committee to which it is sent will not be, as some one has suggested, to consider the principle of the Bill at all, but, to consider how the principle of the Bill may be best carried out in an effective measure. So far as that principle is concerned, not a voice has been raised in the House to-night against it. The pronouncement in favour of its principle has been unanimous; the duty of the committee will be to produce a workable Bill. My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton) gives his legal opinion that this Bill as it stands is unworkable. It may be so, for all I know. I did not trust my own legal powers in drafting a Bill of this kind. I simply took the Bill drafted by the Ontario government, and enacted there a good many years ago under Sir Oliver Mowat, and made that Bill almost word for word my Bill, except where the use of the municipal machinery came in, which we are unable to control in the same manner that the legislature of Ontario controls it. I do not consider myself responsible for the details of the Bill at all. The principle of arbitration I consider a fair one, and I hope that whatever sub-committee of the Railway Committee it goes to, that committee will be able to elaborate a workable Bill. I am glad to see that the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals takes such a warm interest in it. I am assured by him that when the committee has elaborated a Bill embodying the principle now passed on, he will, if necessary, put it on the Government Orders, so that it may secure further consideration for a third reading before the end of this session. I had feared that, coming up at this late period, a reference to a committee might kill it for the session, but having that assurance, I have concluded to make the motion you have just heard. I may be permitted to say a word in regard to the personal reference of the member for West York (Mr. Wallace), that I was a very subservient follower of the government. I am afraid if he were to ask the members of the government, they would hardly endorse that flattering opinion. There have been times when I had to differ rather markedly from the government, and have not hesitated to do so. I am very glad that on this occasion there is no reason why I should differ from the government, for I believe that they are heartily with me in desiring to secure the best interests of the public in this matter.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 19) to amend the Mounted Police Act, 1894.

Mr. CASEY.

He said: I do not think that this Bill will meet with the sad fate at the hands of the right hon. gentleman as the previous one; because, if the right hon. gentleman remembers what he said at the close of 1898, he will remember that he committed himself to the principle of this Bill:

The position of superintendent shall be filled by promotion from among the non-commissioned officers, or, in special cases only, by the appointment of graduates of the Royal Military College, or of commissioned officers in the Canadian militia.

The leader of the House will remember that in the session of 1897, I brought forward a measure of this sort, and I pointed out the reasons why I wished the measure to pass, namely, for the sake of efficiency of the mounted police, and on the grounds of justice. And I pointed out the past history of the police. I dwelt on the fact that the principle should obtain in regard to appointments to the position of officer, that is embodied in this Bill. The mounted police is different from, perhaps, any corps in the world in this respect—at all events, it stands pre-eminent; I will not venture to say that it is unique, but it stands pre-eminent in that, up to the present time, the rank and file of the mounted police have been drawn from the better class of men, a better social class, than is to be found. I think, in any other corps in the world. We have had men of the very highest rank in the lowest ranks of the mounted police. We have had men belonging to the best families in England, Ireland and Scotland in the force as constables. We have had cabinet ministers' sons, the sons of Lieutenant-Governors, and the sons of a number of the foremost people in Canada, in the force. The consequence has been that we have a force, the members of which pretty generally may be, with accuracy, described as gentlemen. Therefore, to apply a principle such as is embodied in this Bill to that corps, would not suggest objections such as might occur in regard to a differently organized body. Now, what is the fact? As I say, those who have any influence in this matter, sought to bring it about that a man who became an inspector in that force, should be a man who had originally entered it as a constable. As a matter of fact the best men to-day in the force, are men who have risen from the ranks. Lieut.-Col. Steele, if my memory serves me, who is now commanding Strathcona's Horse, rose from the ranks. Major Belcher, one of his lieutenants, rose from the ranks. Major Howe rose from the ranks. Assistant Commander McIllree, is one of the best men in the mounted police. The Adjutant General of the second contingent, Mr. Baker rose from the ranks. Take Superintendent Perry, the right hon. gentleman said that he was such an excellent officer that he could not even be allowed to go to South Africa, and he rose from the ranks. When I proposed a measure like this in 1897, the right hon. gentleman met me with this argument. He said: It is unnecessary, and he read out to me a number of officers who had been appointed to commissions, and these had risen from the ranks. He said that what I wanted to bring about, by legislation, really existed. What is the fact, however? Under the regime of the right hon. gentleman's predecessor, we were actually coming to that state of things that I believe is so essential to the well-being of the force—that the officers should be recruited from the non-commissioned officers, who had risen from the ranks, and the right hon. gentleman was able to make a strong argument against me. But, what has been the practice for the last three years? Appointment after appointment has been made, and I cannot recall a single instance where an individual has been taken from amongst the non-commissioned officers and raised to the position of an officer. From the east men have come in, and been appointed over the heads of men—I will not say better men, but men, who, at all events, had given more service and were of more service to the North-west. I may tell the right hon. gentleman that a sense of disappointment has sprung up, and that one of the greatest things which in the past had given heart to the force, and has raised its morale is the fact that every one felt that he had, so to speak, in his knapsack the position of an inspector or superintendent. It has become necessary, that we shall pass this Bill. If we pass it, what will be the position? Let me point out to the right hon. gentleman the advantage that will be to him as Superintendent General. I know what trouble he has at the present time. If political friends want to have a promising youth of military instincts, and some military training appointed to a position in the North-west Territories as an inspector, an appeal is made to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The young gentleman is sent up to us in the North-west Territories. If he has an Act like this to point to on the statute-book, he is fenced around. He can say: How can I do it? I would like to do it, but, you see, this legislation prevents me. There is that Bill that Mr. Davin got me to pass. It prevents me; I cannot do it. I will point out that this is not a cast iron Bill. It leaves the door open to graduates of the Royal Military College, or commissioned officers of the Canadian militia. But, I hold that if the principle that I propose, be embodied in the statute-book, the chances are very great indeed, that the practice that has obtained for the last three years, of shunting men into the rank of officers of the mounted police, will be abandoned and that henceforth we will revert to the system that obtained prior to 1896, without any legislation, when we were going towards, what I hoped would become the almost absolute rule that officers in the mounted police would be recruited from those who had entered as constables. I hope that the right hon. gentleman will allow the second reading of this Bill to take place, and when we go into committee, we can either make the clause less stringent, or more stringent, as may commend itself to the House. I move the second reading of the Bill, seconded by Mr. Clancy.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sorry that I cannot give way to the blandishments of my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), even after the way he has appealed to me, and even though he has introduced into the measure he has brought before the House the tender motive towards me of saving me from the trouble that I must have being at the head of the mounted police. He would surround me and protect me from the seductions of my friends, and place me in a position to resist the appeals that may be forced upon me. But, my hon. friend knows that this is a world of trouble; no one is exempt from it. We all have to accept it, and that being the case, I must accept my share of the troubles that are incident to the position I hold. I am very much in favour of the system of promotion, but I am not prepared to say I am sure that all the officers of the force should be exclusively recruited as the Bill implies, from the force itself. I think, Sir, we should continue to take our officers, as in the past, from the non-commissioned officers of the force, from the Royal Military College, and from the militia. If my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) reflects a moment I am sure he will not be in favour of the Bill, even though he is the father of it; because if it became law the government would be deprived to a great extent, of the valuable services of graduates of the military college and of members of the militia force. Our three great sources for the supply of officers to the North-west Mounted Police now is, first, the force itself which qualifies a man of long experience to rise from constable to officer; second, the Royal Military College, which turns out a valuable class of men for that work, and last but not least, the militia. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) has named some good officers who were obtained from the force itself, but he might also have named very valuable officers who have come from the Royal Military College and from the militia. Of the 26 inspectors which we have at present, nine have been promoted from the ranks; two are graduates of the Royal Military College; thirteen are officers of the militia; one is an ex-Imperial officer; and one had civil occupation when appointed. I think it will be admitted that the force itself is fairly well represented by nine officers, and on the whole each of the institutions or bodies named have had a fair distribution of the favours to which they are entitled. The force at the present time is officered by three classes; the commissioner, the superintendent, and the inspector. Clause 4 of the Bill of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) reads as follows :

4. The position of superintendent shall be filled by promotion from among the non-commissioned officers, or, in special cases only, by the appointment of graduates of the Royal Military College or of commissioned officers in the Canadian militia.

Now, the hon. gentleman is aware that between superintendent and the non-commissioned officers there is the intervening class of inspector, and he will agree that it would be proper that the rank of superintendent should be filled by promotion, not from the non-commissioned officers, but from the inspectors. However, I suppose that is an oversight.

Mr. DAVIN. It is a mere verbal error.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is a very serious one.

Mr. DAVIN. We could easily amend it in committee.

The PRIME MINISTER. If that were the only obstacle to the Bill I would not be inclined to urge it very strongly. But I take this position, and I think it will commend itself to the judgment of the House, that we should not be excluded from selecting the North-west Mounted Police officers from graduates of the Royal Military College and from the militia. If this Bill were passed, there would be an obstacle placed in the face of members of both these branches of our militia service. Is there a member of the House who will say that the officers who command the mounted police are only to be recruited from the ranks of that force except in very special cases? I appeal to members on the other side, if it is not better that we should continue the system at present existing. For these reasons I cannot agree to the Bill. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has stated that the government has not given to the lower ranks of the North-west Mounted Police the recognition to which they are entitled.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know a single instance for three years, of promotion from the ranks.

The PRIME MINISTER. That may be, but the hon. gentleman cannot say that the appointments which have been made to the force have not been of the most satisfactory character. All the appointments have been made from the Royal Military College or from the militia, and I can claim for the government that all the appointments have been exceptionally good. I know we have in contemplation to take from the non-commissioned officers of the force a certain number of commissioned officers, and I know these men are well qualified and ought to be promoted, and should be promoted at the earliest possible opportunity. I speak under correction when I say that we appointed one officer from among the non-commissioned officers. However, that may be, the argument of the hon. gentleman is, that for three years we have taken men from the Royal Military College and the militia, and that we have not appointed an officer from the ranks. And, going from one extreme to another, he suggests that the officers should be limited entirely to the members of the force. The remedy is not adequate to the evil, if there is an evil. I believe we ought to leave the matter as it is. We have followed the practice which has obtained from the commencement of the force, and I think I shall be supported by the House in asking that it shall not be deviated from. I therefore move :

That the Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the amendment is put, I wish to say a word. As regards the verbal error in the Bill, that of course is a lapsus pennae and could easily be remedied in committee. As to the main objection of the Prime Minister, he dwelt on the fact that we should not exclude gentlemen from the Royal Military College, but he told us that of the twenty-six inspectors, only two came from the Royal Military College; there being thirteen officers from the militia, nine promoted from the ranks, one an ex-Imperial officer, and one promoted from a civil position. I consider that in no case should a man be made an officer of the mounted police from a civil position. I think that is vicious, because it is a military force. As regards the militia, you may say to me, is not an officer of the militia as likely to prove a good officer of the mounted police as a non-commissioned officer of the mounted police? I say no, and I will tell you why. The mounted police have to do with the Territories, and its members are riders on the plains. They have to travel long distances, going to the boundary, finding out whether there is any danger to our cattlemen, our farmers, or our ranchmen, and doing a hundred things that only plainsmen can do well. An officer from the eastern militia made an officer of the mounted police would be for some time as helpless as a child. He would be put over men, who, in nine cases out of ten, are as well educated as he is, who have been as well brought up, who are from as good a household, and who have had the training of two or three years on the plains, and know all about them. It will be observed that the door is not slammed in the face of the militia nor of the graduates of the Royal Military College. All that would be done by this Bill would be henceforth to adopt the principle that the bulk of the officers shall be taken from the non-commissioned officers of the mounted police; that is to say, that the promotion shall be from the ranks. And how are you to get over this

