crucial fact, that notwithstanding the disproportionate numbers, the men who have won distinction are the men who have risen from the ranks? However, I am sorry my right hon. friend will not accept the Bill, and we must only submit to have it voted down; but I would press upon him that in the exercise of his functions as superintendent general he will revert to the system that obtained under the Conservative government of promoting men from the ranks.

Amendment (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) agreed to.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston) moved second reading of Bill (No. 29) to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: I do not know whether the government have in any way considered this Bill, but I am convinced that the adoption of the machine described in it would be of the greatest possible benefit to the whole Dominion. It will be seen that the Bill is only permissive. It provides that the Governor in Council may at any time decide to have the voting done by such a machine. The model of this machine was in the different rooms of the House of Commons, and I suppose it has been seen by most of the members; and every one who has seen it, has been, I am sure, struck by its simplicity, the absence of any liability to get out of order, and its superiority to the present system of voting by ballot. The machine consists simply of a box about the size of the ordinary ballot-box, but with apertures corresponding to the number of candidates—two, three or four, as the case may be. In a cylinder that rests on the top there is a slot to receive the ball opposite the name of each candidate, and this cylinder revolves sufficiently to allow the ball, which takes the place of the ballot, to pass down a tube through the registering machine until it reaches a tube at the bottom of the box by means of which it returns to the deputy returning officer. The crank which turns the cylinder is under the control of the deputy returning officer, as is also the ball. When an elector enters a polling booth, and his name is found to be on the list of voters, the deputy returning officer hands him the ball and he goes into the compartment where the ballot-box is and deposits it for the candidate for whom he wishes to vote. The deputy returning officer then turns the cylinder half around, and the ball immediately returns to the deputy returning officer. He sees that the voting has been done and the registration is complete. Now, what is saved by this device? First, the printing of the ballots.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question here? How does the voter know what has become of his vote? The returning officer knows that the vote has been recorded. Has the voter any certainty that a proper record is made of his vote?

Mr. BRITTON. He has an absolute certainty unless the machine gets out of order; and if the machine gets out of order so that the ball does not come back to the deputy returning officer, then there is a provision in this Bill for the deputy returning officer to go into the compartment with the scrutineers and unlock the box so as to see what has detained the ball from passing into the registration machine and returning to him. There is nothing about the machine that renders it at all liable to get out of order. The registering part of it is very much like the registering of a turnstile, such as is used at the gates of an exhibition ground. The pellet, as it goes down a tube, registers, and the number of the vote is marked double. First is registered the number for the particular candidate, and then on the side of the box is registered the total number of votes.

Mr. WALLACE. What about the cost of this machine?

Mr. BRITTON. It would not exceed $20, and one would be required for each polling place. The cost of the present ballot boxes and the printing would very nearly come to the figure of the cost of this machine. There would be no possibility of forging or spoiling ballots. At the close of the poll all the deputy returning officer would have to do is to open the box, and there before him he will find the registered number of votes for each candidate, and the number on the side of the box gives the total vote polled. That must agree with the number of voters entered on the deputy returning officer's book as those to whom this ball was furnished.

Since this Bill has been introduced, I have received numerous letters from different persons who pretend to have invented something as good as this machine, which is called the Macdonald voting machine. The inventor is Anderson Macdonald, who holds the position of registrar in the court at Winnipeg, and the machine has been used in Manitoba at several local elections and given satisfaction in every case. It has been used under a law of the Manitoba legislature, which allows the municipalities to adopt and use this machine.

Other persons from different parts of the country, including a gentleman of British Columbia, have written stating that they have inventions as good and superior to this one. This Bill could be so drafted that any machine on the principle of this one, having a pellet instead of a written printed ballot, and a registering machine such as is in use in the United States, could be adopted, instead of this, if the government thought proper.

Mr. SPROULE. How would you do in the case of a tendered ballot?

Mr. BRITTON. If a person tendered a vote, that fact would be entered in the book of the deputy returning officer; and if his application were accepted, he would be furnished with a pellet. If it were rejected, there would be a record in the book that he had offered to vote but was refused.

Mr. SPROULE. But, supposing his vote were wrongly accepted, how could you tell for whom the vote was given?

Mr. BRITTON. If accepted, there is no provision to show for whom he passed his pellet, unless he were to say for whom he voted.

Mr. SPROULE. What would happen if the machine got out of order?

Mr. BRITTON. There is a clause of the Bill which allows the deputy returning officer and a scrutineer for each candidate to go in and have the machine put in order.

Mr. SPROULE. But, supposing it could not be put in order?

Mr. BRITTON. That is an eventuality that is not contemplated, and is not likely to happen, as the machine is very simple.

Mr. JAS. McMULLEN (North Wellington). Hon. members will, no doubt, recollect that some years ago a number of inventions, among them the one my hon. friend refers to, were brought to Ottawa, and a committee was appointed to investigate the whole question. The matter was referred to Mr. Arnoldi, then chief engineer of public works. He reported upon one ballot box, which he pronounced the most complete piece of mechanism he had inspected for many years. The owner of the box happened to be in my riding. He brought the ballot box here and showed it to a number of members. If we could make any improvement so as to secure a perfect system of voting and prevent irregularities, that would be very desirable. I would not oppose a permissive Bill which would allow the government to select any ballot box it thought the most perfect, but would oppose a Bill that would limit the choice to the one box. I think it would be better to have a permissive measure first passed in each province, that would enable any municipality, by by-law, to adopt whatever contrivance they thought most perfect, and then the one that gave the most satisfaction could be adopted for the purposes of a general election, but to adopt a contrivance here before the municipalities had tested it would be dangerous. We have adopted a ballot system which is now being used for some years, and to which the people are getting accustomed, although it is marvellous that in most of the constituencies there should be enough spoiled ballots to elect or defeat a candidate, and in many constituencies more than enough.

I am not disposed to offer any opposition to a Bill throwing the responsibility upon the government of adopting any particular device they consider most perfect, but, should oppose a Bill limiting the choice of the government to one particular device. But, I do not know that the House is in the mood to adopt a measure of this kind. I question it very much. We had an extended discussion of this question some years ago, and, though it was strongly recommended by some, it was considered, after all, that it would be dangerous to introduce such a revolutionary measure as this, and adopt the system of voting through one of these inventions rather than by ballot.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). If any machine could be devised which would secure an honest expression of the opinion of the electors of the country, it would be very desirable to have that machine. The experience of the last few years in politics has demonstrated that beyond any question. But, it seems to me that the machine must be possessed of a good many qualities that we have no guarantee this machine is possessed of to accomplish it. In the first place, it would need to be fireproof, because the burning of ballots is one of the ways in which elections have been interfered with in the past. In the next place, it would need to be such a machine that the deputy returning officers could not manipulate it, for I think it must be admitted that they have manipulated the ballots in the past to the injury of the honest electorate. But, there is one objection, in my judgment, to this machine, if there is no other, and that is the cost of it. I take it that the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) has given the correct cost, about $20 each. The ordinary constituency has about fifty or fifty-two polling subdivisions, each of which would require a machine. At any rate, it would cost about $200,000 or $216,000 to supply enough machines to carry on the general elections. That is a very large cost to begin with, and a particularly large cost for something that is untried and unproved as this must be. Therefore, in my judgment, it would be unwise for the government to pass any Bill that would make it compulsory to adopt such a machine. There is a good deal of force in what the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) says, that if a Bill providing for the use of a machine is passed at all, it should be a permissive Bill. I think it would have to be much cheaper than the machine proposed by the hon. member for Kingston, before it would be adopted. There is a general election coming on, and I suppose that the hope would be to have this in that election. If any means would secure a fair election, the opposition would welcome it. The fear is that the election will not be a fair one, and we are justified in that suspicion by what has taken place in the past.

At any rate, the government must take the responsibility of the matter, and if it turns out correct, it will be in their favour, and, if otherwise, the electorate will hold them responsible. Therefore, I think it would be well to hear the members of the cabinet on this question. They appear to be reticent, but this is a most important matter, and it surely will not be allowed to pass without our having the benefit of the opinion of the Premier or some other member of the cabinet.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I was just waiting to hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) and others before I gave my opinion. I may say my views are not at all favourable to the Bill. I have no great confidence in any of these fancy machines, of which we have had I do not know how many. I have looked at this one in particular, and it seems to be meritorious, and I think it would work, on the whole, well. But, I think it will not work better than our system when the people are accustomed to it. The simplest form of a ballot is the best. Some years ago, a disc on the ballot was introduced, and the result has been that more ballots were set aside under the new system than under the old. When we come to take up the Bill which we have introduced to amend the election law, we shall be able to give statistics to establish that there were fewer errors under the old ballot than under the new. So, we propose to return to the old form of ballot. Our object is to make it as plain as possible, simply dividing the names by a broad line. Thus, the illiterate elector may be quite able to see how he is recording his vote. If we adopted the machine proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Britton), I do not see how we could provide for the chapter of accidents. It might happen that on the morning of polling day, either by accident or design, the machine might be altogether disabled, and disabled beyond the possibility of repair. If this were to happen at a distant place, in any one of the back townships, how is the voting to take place? At the present time, it is always possible to get ballot boxes, even though they were to become disarranged in some way. If we adopt a simple system of voting—and the one we shall propose is a very simple one indeed—and if we persist in it, election after election, the people will learn to know it, even the children can be taught to understand it, it will become part of the institutions of the country. In that case, I believe, the mistakes will become fewer and fewer. As to the innuendo, the fear expressed by my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), I think that fear is altogether groundless. If my hon. friend is as wide-awake as I suppose he would be at election, and if his scrutineers look sharply after their business, I do not see how there can possibly be fraud on polling day. And if, at the end of polling day, the scrutineers are particular to see that the returning officers give a certificate, as they are bound by law to do, of the state of the polls, I do not see how fraud can be committed with any chance of success. If both parties are wide-awake and look after their own business and see to it that the scrutineers do their duty well, my hon. friend has no reason to fear anything. I may reassure him also, and he may be quite sure—and if he does not know, I am glad to tell him—the returning officers will be good, honest true men, who will discharge their duties with impartiality, with fear of none and favour for none, determined to have a fair expression of the will of the people and nothing else. My hon. friend may think I am boasting in so saying, but I will give my reasons for it at once. In the present condition and temper of the country, the returning officers appointed by the government will have nothing in view by recording the views of the people. That will be sufficient assurance for my hon. friend. I move that the Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. BRITTON. I am, of course, sorry that the amendment is moved. I should have been glad if the Bill could have stood until after the discussion which will take place on the Bill introduced by the government to amend the Elections Act, because when the discussion takes place on the form of ballot, I think it will be seen that it is not so simple a thing to provide a ballot that is not open to any objections, as experience has proven. Of course, I must submit. But, I will call attention to one or two points that have been brought up in the course of the discussion, because the time must come, I believe, when a machine will be used instead of the ballot system. One objection is the cost. It is compensated for by the fact that by the use of such a machine as this many more voters can vote at one polling place than can vote at the present time. That may not apply to rural constituencies because there distance has to be regarded, but in cities, at all events, the use of this machine will enable many more votes to be cast at one place. So that even if it costs as much as I suggest, a fewer number will be required for Dominion elections, and expense will be saved in printing as well as fewer polling places being required. Then the objection has been made by the hon. member for Wellington that the provincial governments ought to take action in this direction. I have already said that one provincial government has provided for the use of this machine. On the whole the objections do not seem to me to be strong. The machine itself has merits which, I think, the House fails to appreciate. The more I think of it the more I am confirmed in the conviction that some such machine as this ought to take the place of our present system of voting by ballot. It is well known that in the state of New York they have a very complicated and very expensive machine. I saw one of them work in Buffalo in their last state elections. It is so complicated that you can vote for either a whole ticket, or you can strike out certain names and vote for others as you please. Of course, I can only acquiesce in the motion that has been made, unless the Premier will allow the matter to stand until after the discussion of the Bill that is now before the House for the amendment to the Dominion Elections Act.

Amendment (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) agreed to.

LAND TITLES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 31) to amend the Land Titles Act, 1894. He said: This Bill is merely to get rid of a blemish that must have been allowed accidentally to creep into it by the draughtsman. The closing part of section 89 reads as follows:

For the purpose of this Act letters of administration drafted by the proper court of any province of the Dominion of Canada shall be sufficient.

The consequence of having it so worded is this: That where the exemplification is an exemplification from the English courts from any part of the United Kingdom, they would have to bring it in the ordinary way under the operation of this Act.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). I do not remember whether in the Interpretation Act the words 'United Kingdom' are held to mean the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Unless that be the case, I would suggest that the words 'and Ireland' be added to 'United Kingdom.'

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I think even if those words are not understood in the Interpretation Act, there is no need of adding them. There is only one United Kingdom. But I have no objection.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

COMPANIES CLAUSES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. JAMES GILMOUR (East Middlesex) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 32) to amend the Companies Clauses Act. He said: This Bill refers only to manufacturing and mercantile companies that have been incorporated by special Act and are subject to the Companies Clauses Act. Under that Act companies have no power to remove their head office without coming here and getting a special Act for that purpose. This Bill is for the purpose of enabling them by by-law to do this. Of course the by-law has to be duly published and notice given to the stockholders, and published again in the Gazette. Furthermore, in order that all interests may be safeguarded, a certified copy of the Bill must be sent to the Secretary of State, and any objections that may be made to the removal of the head office have to be made to him. The Bill does not become valid nor come into effect until his sanction is given. The present mode of coming to this parliament for special Acts for that purpose is found cumbersome and expensive. I may state that the Ontario Act does not give such company power to change its head office. I may repeat that this Bill refers only to manufacturing and mercantile companies, and does not refer to companies that have been incorporated under Dominion letters patent.

Mr. BRITTON.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). If there are any objections to the Bill they can most conveniently be brought before a committee, so that we might pass the motion and refer the Bill to the usual committee.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend (Mr. Gilmour) had better move that the Bill be referred to the Private Bills Committee, where it will be dealt with.

Mr. GILMOUR moved:

That Bill (No. 32) to amend the Companies' Clauses Act be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. A. F. MacLAREN (North Perth) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 62), to amend the Criminal Code, 1892. He said: Mr. Speaker, I have already explained the provisions of this Bill and I do not think I need say anything further about them at the present time.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sorry that I cannot agree to this Bill of my hon. friend. The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) is in charge of a Bill to amend the criminal law, and if he will offer his suggestion to him perhaps he may incorporate it in his own Bill, if he sees fit. I could not take the responsibility of saying yea, or nay, to the legislation proposed by the hon. gentleman. I would rather have the Solicitor General deal with this. I would suggest that the Bill stand, and my hon. friend, when we come to the consideration of the criminal Bill, can make a suggestion to the hon. Solicitor General. I beg to move in amendment the adjournment of the debate.

Amendment (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. May I ask the right hon. leader of the government what the course of business will be to-morrow?

The PRIME MINISTER. We will proceed with the Bills on the Order paper. We will take up most of the Bills and the resolutions on the paper.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, May 8, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DESTRUCTION OF PAPER MILLS— PROPOSED SUSPENSION OF DUTIES.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I wish, very briefly, to call the attention of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the government, to a matter that, I think, is deserving of their consideration. Since the budget was brought down and the policy of the government announced, very serious fires have occurred, which have had a most important effect upon a number of great industries in this country. I would ask whether the government might not consider it well to look at the question I am about to present to them in the light of the peculiar circumstances which exist in consequence of these disastrous fires. I refer to the postage on newspapers. The House and the government are quite aware that one of the largest manufactories of paper, that of the Eddy Company in this neighbourhood, has been destroyed by fire. This circumstance alone would be sufficient, I think, to make it necessary for the government to give special attention to this question. But, in addition to that, as we are all aware, the very large manufactory of the Laurentide Pulp Company, singularly enough, immediately following the great disaster to which I have referred, has been consumed by fire. The effect of this has been to enormously increase the difficulty of obtaining paper in Canada for the supply of the newspapers and for other purposes. But, this especially affects the publication of newspapers, and I wish to ask the reconsideration by the government, under the circumstances, of the propriety—without touching the question of general public policy, or taking into consideration the views we may hold on either side in connection with this matter under ordinary circumstances—of removing that postage. In a year or two, these industries will have resumed their normal condition, and then the question may come up upon its merits as to what policy should be pursued. I am quite sure that, in view of the fact that, if no change is made, those engaged in the publication of newspapers will have to pay enormous additional sums for paper, the government will give a sympathetic hearing to the suggestion I make.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). If the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will pardon me for a moment, I desire to say that I have just come from a meeting of newspaper men, which meeting unanimously passed a resolution requesting the government to take the very step the leader of the opposition has suggested, namely, that the government be asked to request parliament to empower the Governor in Council to suspend the duty on news print in view of the recent fires at Hull and Grande Mère. This we ask on the ground in which everybody can join us, namely, that the Canadian mills to-day cannot supply the Canadian newspapers. I received a telegram last night from the Laurentide mill to the effect that they can carry out their contract with us and other Toronto papers by buying in the United States for us. That would bring the price up nearly four cents a pound; and, that being the case, I think parliament would be justified in empowering the government to temporarily suspend the duty on news print. The Laurentide mill, I believe, had a capacity of from fifty to one hundred tons a day, and the Eddy mill fifty tons. These mills being destroyed, the paper needed cannot be produced. Twenty tons of paper are used in Toronto daily, and sometimes thirty tons, and the demand is growing all the time. Some papers will have to go without a supply, unless they buy in the United States. I would like to take this opportunity of saying that the newspaper industry in Canada has deep sympathy with Mr. Eddy in the loss of his mill. He is one of the most progressive men we have in Canada. He built up the town of Hull and established a great industry there. He has seen everything swept away. But, even though over seventy years of age, he is prepared to rebuild his mills in Hull. It would help Mr. Eddy and those dealing with him if this temporary suspension of duty took place.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Representations have been received by the government from various sections of the country that the disastrous fire that visited this city and the neighbouring city of Hull and which destroyed one of the largest paper establishments in the country, and the almost as disastrous fire which has reduced to ashes another very important industry in the same line, have created such a condition that it might be expedient for the government to reconsider the whole question and bring in some measure of at least temporary relief. It has been suggested to us that we might remit for this year, or permanently, the customs duty which now weighs on paper; and it has been represented to us that we might suspend or abolish the postal duty, as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition recommended a moment ago. The condition of things which has been created by these fires, and the representations which have been made to us, are at this moment engaging the attention of the government. Whether these new circumstances are sufficient to justify us in making a new departure, is a question which we shall have carefully to examine. I will only say to the House that the government has come to no conclusion yet upon the representations thus made. The question is one which requires a good deal of consideration; but I can inform the House that the matter has not escaped our attention, and we are dealing with it at the present time.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). I would like to say one word with regard to this question. The publishers and printers of Ottawa, along with those who are members of the House of Commons and the Senate, have just held a meeting and have passed the following resolution:

Moved by G. W. T. Maclean, M.P., seconded by Robert Jeffrey, Esq., that in view of the recent destruction of the pulp and paper mills at Hull and at Grande Mère, the government be asked to request parliament to pass an Act empowering the Governor in Council to temporarily suspend the duty on newspapers under such conditions as the Governor in Council may deem advisable.

The question having been so opportunely brought up, I think this is a good time to impress these views upon the government. There is no doubt whatever that the destruction of these paper mills is going to be a serious matter to the newspapers throughout the Dominion. I am in a position to say that so far as we are concerned in the west we have been held up to the extent of nearly 60 per cent advance in the price of paper; it is apparently going to cost us at least that much more. The House will understand that when so large an amount of paper is consumed by the newspapers that they are brought face to face with a very serious question, and more especially so by reason of the imposition of a postage on newspapers. That of itself is a very considerable tax on the newspapers of Canada. Although a newspaper man myself, I want to say that there is no branch of commerce in the Dominion where less profits are made on the paper itself, because the paper is sold practically to the consumer for almost the actual cost of the paper itself. I may take this opportunity of saying that I think the government should institute a thorough inquiry into the charge that a combination has been formed by the manufacturers of paper in the Dominion. The last issue of the Printer and Publisher makes the editorial statement that such a combination has been formed, and calls upon the government to institute an inquiry. When the Fielding Act of 1897 was passed it contained a provision that wherever evidence could be produced to show that a combination existed, a reference of the case should be made to a judge and evidence taken; and if it were shown that a combination did exist, then the duty should be suspended. I would be very glad to see the government remove the postage from the papers in the meantime. While speaking on this question I want to enter a strong protest against one feature of the postage on newspapers. I do not think any publisher has made objection to the general proposition of a postage on newspapers, but many do object to the exception made in favour of weekly newspapers as regards their circulation within the forty mile zone from the place of publication. I do not think that is a fair proposition. If the law were made to apply to all newspapers daily and weekly alike, I do not think any objection would be raised. From time to time I see protests published in the newspapers with regard to this subject. I would like very much if the Postmaster General would take the matter into his serious consideration, and if the postage is to be imposed, let it be imposed upon all papers alike.

Mr. WM. McCLEARY (Welland). Whatever the government may do in the way of removing the postage on newspapers, I think it would be a very serious matter to remove the duty on paper. There are very large paper mills in my section of the country, and I am personally aware that they have ample facilities to meet all the requirements, and to fill any contracts that may come to them. I think it would be a mistake on the part of the government to take the duty off paper coming into this country. Any company that is under contract with a newspaper can furnish the paper, and although it may cost a little more, it will only be for a short time.

Mr. WM. GIBSON (Lincoln). I think there are two sides to this question that has been brought up by the leader of the opposition. While I will go as far as any one in this House to assist the newspapers, if it can be shown that they cannot get paper except by importing it from the United States, I think before the government takes a step of that kind—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will my hon. friend allow me to interrupt him to say that I have not raised that question at all. I have simply suggested to the government the removal for the time being, at all events, of the postage duty now imposed by the government on newspapers, not on the materials used by them.

Mr. GIBSON. I stand corrected so far as the leader of the opposition is concerned. But the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) suggested the propriety of allowing paper from the United States to be imported free of duty in order to assist the newspaper publishers in the present stringency of the market. I may say that I am in possession of a telegram from the owners of an important paper mill in the section of the country which I have the honour to represent, urging me to oppose anything of the kind until they have been heard from in regard to the matter. I think it would be only fair to all interests concerned for the government, before proceeding to reduce the duty on paper or to abolish it for the time being, to consult the manufacturers of paper who now have paper mills in operation in Canada, and give them an opportunity of saying whether they are in a position to supply the wants of Canada today. Therefore, I ask the government to stay their hand before they take such an important step. I concur in the remarks of the leader of the opposition in suggesting the abolition of the postage so as to assist the newspapers in the present juncture; but to abolish the duty on paper would be, I think, a dangerous thing to do. Hon. gentlemen can easily understand what a dangerous thing it is to do, because the wealthy newspapermen could import a very large stock, and our millmen—

Mr. MILLS. It will be a step in the direction of free trade.

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, exactly; it is a step in the direction of free trade, but I want no one-sided free trade and no one-sided protection. I want both parties to be alike, fairly dealt with. I would be recreant to my duty as representing the county I come from, where large paper works are established, if I did not at least, bring this matter to the attention of the government, and ask that these gentlemen may be heard along with the newspaper men.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). Like the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson), who has taken his seat, I am strongly in favour of protecting the paper industry. He has spoken very strongly on that line, and I, personally, feel that very great consideration should be given to the question by the government before making the change. It is possible, that, within a few months, these industries may be restored to the country, and it seems to me that it would not be well to disturb the existing state of affairs. If there is only to be a temporary trouble of, say, a few months, it would be unwise to interfere with the industry. The paper industry, in the past, has had its difficulties; it has been struggling against considerable odds, and if it has chanced that fortune has brought in its way a little benefit, I do not know that we are justified in saying that it should be entirely taken away from it. I think the government should consider this question very carefully and fully, before they take the step which has been suggested by some hon. gentlemen, in the way of removing the duty. A partial reduction, even, I think, would be a somewhat dangerous step. As to the reduction of postage on newspapers, for my part, I think it is a troublesome matter, and it does not amount to anything. I would have no hesitation in expressing my approval of the proposal to wipe out the postage.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words on this question. I think the difficulty can be got over very nicely, if the paper manufacturers of Canada will agree with the publishers, that they will supply them at a schedule price no higher than they have been charged for the last six months. If the paper manufacturers urge that no duty shall be taken off the paper industry they should enter into a contract with the publishers that they will supply them at the schedule price at which the latter have been buying paper for the last six months, or a year. If they will agree to that, I say, certainly give the Canadian manufacturers the advantage, but if they will not make contracts of that kind, if they will take advantage of the conditions to raise the price charged to publishers, above what it was during the last six months, it is the duty of the government to step in and protect the publishers, by seeing that they are supplied with paper at the schedule price charged for the last six months. I am perfectly willing that the Canadian manufacturers shall get the price that they have been charging during the last six months, but the moment that they begin to raise the price to the publishers, then, it is the duty of the government to step in and see that they are not taken advantage of.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). As I understand the question raised by the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), it was in regard to taking the postage off newspapers. I think that if any great calamity which has affected Canada can warrant such a measure, it is at the present time. Of course, the question as to the duty, is a matter in regard to which the government will have to consult the various interests in this great industry, but the question, as I understand it, at present, is merely the removal of the postage imposed on newspapers. We all know that the newspaper industry, if I may so call it, has been very much affected by the calamity which has affected so many other industries in Canada, but the point is whether 'now' with the large surplus which the government are continually boasting about, it is not a proper measure to take, under the circumstances, to remove the postage from newspapers. That is, as I understand the proposition of the hon. leader of the opposition and the only one that he submitted for the consideration of parliament and of the government.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). I wish to refer, for a moment, to the newspaper matter, which was brought to the attention of the House, by the leader of the opposition, and by my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean). The statement made by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), is one of which the government should take cognizance at once. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson), stated from his place in the House, that since the fire had caused a scarcity of news paper, the newspaper proprietors had been held up to the tune of 60 per cent. That statement is either true or not true. If it is not true, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson), has of course been labouring under a mistake, and it is very unfair to the paper manufacturers of Canada. If it is true, it is a statement which the government cannot allow, for a moment, to pass, it appears to me without taking action. In the Customs Act of 1897, there is a clause which deals with this very question, and which is as follows:

Mr. McMULLEN.

Whenever the Governor in Council has reason to believe that with regard to any article of commerce there exists any trust, combination, association or agreement of any kind among manufacturers of such article or dealers therein, to unduly enhance the price of such article or in any other way to unduly promote the advantage of the manufacturers or dealers at the expense of the consumers, the Governor in Council may commission or empower any judge of the Supreme Court or Exchequer Court of Canada, or of any superior court in any province of Canada, to inquire in a summary way into and report to the Governor in Council whether such trust, combination, association or agreement exists.

2. The judge may compel the attendance of witnesses and examine them under oath and require the production of books and papers, and shall have such other necessary powers as are conferred upon him by the Governor in Council for the purposes of such inquiry.

3. If the judge reports that such trust, combination, association or agreement exists, and if it appears to the Governor in Council that such disadvantage to the consumers is facilitated by the duties of customs imposed on a like article when imported, then the Governor in Council shall place such articles on the free list, or so reduce the duty on it as to give to the public the benefit of reasonable competition in such article.

I did not rise for the purpose of asking that the protection given to the paper industry in this country, be at all interfered with. On the contrary, I believe that protection should be maintained, except perhaps under very exceptional circumstances, and even then the very greatest care should be exercised. But here we have a law on the statute-books placed there amid a great deal of applause from gentlemen opposite; a law for the purpose of preventing the undue enhancement of prices to the consumer by means of combinations. We, on this side, have always said that that action was a farce. It has been a farce from the time it was passed until the present. I believe it was intended to be a farce, but we have always been told by the government: Well, give us a case and we will deal with it. Here we have a case given to the House and to the government by one of their own supporters. We have the statement made by the member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), that owing to the misfortune which befell Hull and the Laurentide Paper and Pulp Company, that the publishers of Canada have been held up to the tune of 60 per cent on the price of their paper. That statement is either true or false. If it is false it should not go to the country, and if it is true, it is the duty of this government to act, and to act without a moment's delay, so as to see that this law should be put in force, and justice done to the consumers of this particular article.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The Act which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague), has read, refers to a judicial proceeding. While parliament itself may judge as to the circumstances under which it shall do any given thing, it has been deemed wise that where the government is called upon to deal with such matters, we shall surround the procedure with some restriction. I think, perhaps, in the main, that will be found a wise provision, that parliament should not delegate all its functions to the executive, but that the executive before it should do any one of these things, would take certain steps to see that the conditions exist under which it should act. In this case there has to be a judicial proceeding. With all due deference to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), and the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), I venture to state that any remark which they make in this House, is not in itself a sufficient ground for procedure under that Act.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I made no remark. I only called attention to the statement of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson).

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Well, if the hon. gentleman had made a remark, my statement remains, that any statement made by the hon. member for Lisgar, or the hon. member for Haldimand, or by any other hon. member, cannot be regarded as a sufficient basis of proceeding under that Act. We must have certain facts established. If the hon. gentleman from Lisgar, or any other gentleman in this House has a personal knowledge of facts which will bring the paper manufacturers under the provision of that clause; then if these facts are set forth in writing to the government, they will be referred to the proper quarter for inquiry, and whatever power the law gives to the government will be called into operation. I call attention to the House to the fact that a mere statement made by any hon. gentleman, on one side or the other, is not a sufficient basis to proceed upon.

Mr. MACLEAN. If the House will pardon me, I will state that I have just received a telegram from the Laurentide people, who say that they hope to have their plant running within a week, so that the damage is not so extensive as was thought.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The paper plant?

Mr. MACLEAN. Their pulp mills are destroyed, but the large paper plant which was delayed by reason of the damage to the pulp mill, will be running within a week.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). And all this time has been wasted for nothing.

YUKON INQUIRY FOR RETURNS—THE JOHN C. BARR.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, I called attention yesterday to a report in connection with the John C. Barr, and I find that the order mentioned in another document does not appear to have been brought down, and which would have been a very important contribution to that record. The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) will perhaps recollect that on May 16, 1899, he caused a communication to be addressed to Mr. Ogilvie, the commissioner of the Yukon district, instructing him to investigate and report on the question that had been raised in the House on May 12. There seems to be no report from Mr. Ogilvie, except the communication of the 8th of June, which, obviously, could not have been written after the receipt of this letter of May 16. The only reference to the John C. Barr is three or four lines at the end, and it shows, on its face, that it had nothing to do with the instruction sent of May 16. I would be very much obliged if the hon. Minister of Customs would ascertain whether there ever was a report made in compliance with these instructions of May 16, and if there was, that it should be included by way of a supplementary return and laid on the Table of the House in compliance with the order for the return.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I will inquire, certainly if it is there. Of course, if it be of a confidential nature, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will not consider me bound to lay it on the Table. I think, if it is what I refer to, all the papers have been brought down. I may be mistaken, but, I will look into the matter.

I.C.R. INQUIRY FOR RETURN—DISMISSAL OF EMPLOYEES.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), whether a return of the evidence respecting investigations concerning persons who had been dismissed from the service of the Intercolonial Railway has been brought down. I moved for it in the session of 1898, and during the latter part of last session I made a careful inquiry, extending over two or three days, of every official that could have anything to do with it. In order to refresh the hon. gentleman's memory I may mention that early in the session of 1898 he made a speech in which he referred to evidence stating that the late chief engineer had been in the habit of referring to passes as shingles, and of sending out telegrams respecting the supplying of shingles. Subsequently I moved for a return asking that these papers should be brought down that hon. gentleman had quoted from, and I could not find, up to the end of last session, that these papers, had been laid on the Table of the House. When I moved for the return the hon. gentleman stated that some of the papers had been brought down. After making very careful inquiry, I could not find that evidence.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). My impression is that these papers have been on the Table for some weeks.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Brought down this session?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is my impression.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That may be the case very likely. I wish to inquire from the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) in regard to the papers in connection with the application for a petition of right by John W. Broderick and others.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). They were laid on the Table a week ago last Thursday.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The returns which the hon. gentleman from Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Prior) asked about yesterday were brought down on the 15th of March last.

N.W. REBELLION—LAND GRANTS TO MEMBERS OF MILITIA FORCE.

Mr. JAMES SUTHERLAND (North Oxford) moved the third reading of Bill (No. 107), to make further provision respecting grants of land to members of militia force, on active service in the North-west.

He said: At the request of some gentlemen opposite, I promised to bring down information on the third reading of this Bill, and I shall furnish the information now. The number of warrants issued altogether since the Act was passed in 1885 was 1,368. The number of warrants located on 320 acres was 724, and there were 246 warrants located on 160 acres, making 970 warrants in all, and the total acreage of land located 271,040 acres. The difference between 1,368 and 970, namely, 398, have been in many cases exchanged for $80 scrip, so that at this date there are only fifty warrants remaining outstanding. The House will see that there are only fifty warrants which may take advantage of this extension of time for the current years.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time, and passed.

CHINA AND JAPAN STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

House resolved itself into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Act 52 Victoria, chap. 2, intituled: 'An Act relating to Ocean Steamship Subsidies,' so as to provide for a continuance of the authority given under the said Act to the Governor in Council to grant a subsidy for steamship service between British Columbia and China and Japan for such period or periods of time as may be deemed expedient, not however to exceed in the aggregate ten years, and to pay therefor a subsidy or subsidies, as the case may be, of not exceeding the sum of fifteen thousand pounds (£15,000) sterling per annum for a monthly service, or not exceeding the sum of twenty-five thousand pounds (£25,000) sterling per annum for a fortnightly service.—(Mr. Fisher.)

Resolution reported, read the second time, and concurred in.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 151) to amend the Act relating to Ocean Steamship Subsidies.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT AMENDMENT.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 110), to amend the Weights and Measures Act.—(Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). This is merely to repeal the Act passed last session, to remove doubt as to the exact capacity of the apple barrel.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). When we had this matter under consideration some days ago, I asked the minister what was the capacity of the present barrel and what was the capacity of the proposed barrel. The minister had not the information then. Can he give it now?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I can give it now. The apple barrel legalized last session holds 103 imperial quarts, or 106.34 United States quarts, dry measure. The apple barrel provided for by this Bill will hold 96.51 imperial quarts or 99.55 United States quarts.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How did the department come to recommend the minister to legalize such a barrel as that last year?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The barrel we legalized last year was the barrel which had been legal for many years, only some measures were so uncertain that we thought it right to make such provision that they would be uniform. From 1886 up to last year the barrel had been described in this way:

The stave of such barrel shall be twenty-seven inches in length from croe to croe.

The croe is the little indentation made in the staves to hold the head. Representations were made by the apple-growers that that description was not correct, as it was possible to make the heads of the barrel of such a thickness as considerably to diminish its contents. My hon. friend can understand that if the head of a barrel is made one inch thicker, that would mean a loss of two inches on the whole length, or one barrel out of fourteen. In order to settle that question, we provided that the apple barrel will be twenty-seven inches head to head, inside measure. The changes made in the law last year were made for the purpose of removing all doubt that might exist as to the capacity of the barrel. But we were not aware then that our American competitors had adopted another barrel, which is $6\frac{1}{2}$ quarts smaller than the one we have now. This was noticed by the Nova Scotia people, who are perhaps keener than the people of Ontario and Quebec, and they sent us a number of petitions asking us to reduce the size of the barrel so as to give them a fair field with their competitors in England. It is rather curious that the legislation passed in the United States provides for 100 quarts dry measure, but we find on careful calculation that the United States barrel holds only 99.55 United States quarts.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). The government is tinkering with those laws a little too much. Because one state of the American union makes a change in the size of its apple barrel, the minister rushes in to change the whole legislation of last year. We have different weights and measures in Canada to-day, as compared with the United States. A bushel of oats in Canada weighs thirty-four pounds, and in the United States it weighs thirty-two pounds, and we have not found it necessary to make a change. The apple barrel of last year and former years was the size of a flour barrel. That is a convenient size for the purposes of business. When you take the flour out, you utilize the empty barrel for apples. These empty flour barrels are all over the country, and will continue to be utilized as apple barrels, and you will have two sizes of apple barrels, which will be quite unsatisfactory.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). The primary object of the Bill, I understand, is to protect Canadian exporters in the British market, but the hon. gentleman's Bill goes much further and interferes with domestic trade. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) has pointed out that empty flour barrels are used for packing apples. So are empty sugar barrels. If the hon. gentleman's Bill becomes law, every one selling apples in those barrels will be liable to punishment. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman add the words 'for export' so as not to interfere with our domestic trade.

Mr. E. G. PENNY (St. Lawrence, Montreal). I would like to point out that there are purchasers in Canada who want standard measures in fruit as well as in other commodities. Great inconvenience is experienced in Montreal because the shippers of Ontario ship their fruit in packages of all sizes.

Mr. CLANCY. Let my hon. friend remember that a bag of potatoes is eighty pounds in his own city and ninety pounds in the province of Ontario, and if we commence to try and make all these things uniform, we will be met with no end of difficulties.

Mr. PENNY. That only applies to potatoes.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is really no difficulty in this Bill at all. This Bill has been brought in largely at the request of the growers of apples in the Annapolis valley. The apple-growers of the Annapolis valley, which is now famous for its apples, have to meet in England the competition of the American producers. The American standard barrel is seven quarts smaller than the Canadian barrel, and the Nova Scotian producer of apples, when he sells his fruit in competition with the American fruit in the English market, is compelled now by the law of the land to give seven quarts more than his American competitor. Therefore, it is all right to make it uniform and to place the Canadian producer on the same footing as the American producer in the English market. Now, it is very true, as is also pointed out, that, so far as the domestic trade is concerned, the farmers growing apples use the flour barrels. But, if they continue, for their own convenience to use the flour barrels for apples, no one will complain. The law only requires that a barrel shall contain not less than a certain quantity, but, if a man chooses to give more, the purchaser will not kick about that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But, if the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will pardon me, that is not the idea.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, what is it?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The argument is, that by this law the farmers of Ontario will be deprived of the convenience of using barrels that now cost practically nothing and to buy barrels specially made.

The PRIME MINISTER. Not at all. He uses the flour barrel because it is more convenient. But, if he goes to market his apples in Montreal or elsewhere, and gives more than the law requires, he will not be prosecuted for that, or, if he is, the prosecution will come to nothing.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the right hon. gentleman answer me a question? If his argument is a good one in favour of reducing the barrel by six and one-half quarts, why not reduce it six and one-half quarts more, and so get ahead of the American producer?

The PRIME MINISTER. I think I will listen to my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) before answering that question.

Mr. J. B. MILLS (Annapolis). I am thoroughly in accord with the proposal to have a standard barrel for Canada. I believe that this parliament should legislate for Canada and not for sections of Canada, as in the case of the weight of a bushel of potatoes being one thing in the province of Quebec and another thing in the province of Ontario. Still, if we are driven to that kind of thing, I say we should have a standard barrel for the maritime provinces. But, as I say, I believe in a standard barrel for the whole of Canada, and, if that is established, I think that the farmers all over the country will approve the change. I take it that this legislation is for the benefit of the farmers and the speculators together, and should not be for the benefit of the speculators alone. If that is the case, the adoption of a standard barrel will be of great benefit to the growers of apples. But, there is another element that is not touched in this Bill, and that is with reference to establishing specifically how much a barrel of the dimensions set forth in the Bill shall contain. And the farmers of the Annapolis valley and the boards of trade of the Cornwallis valley—and when I speak of the Annapolis valley I take in the Cornwallis valley, which runs over Annapolis and King's—the boards of trade of Kentville and King's county, and the municipality of King's county, which is represented by the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden), are all in accord that it should be stated that the standard barrel shall contain so many bushels.

Mr. TAYLOR. So many pounds?

Mr. MILLS. No, bushels, that it shall contain, say, three bushels, and it does, by actual measurement, contain ninety-six imperial quarts, or three bushels. If this is done, it will benefit the farmers as well as the speculators. But, if this is left out, what will be the result? As regards potatoes particularly—and potatoes are merely a secondary crop in the Annapolis and Cornwallis valleys—speculators will, as they do now, furnish barrels to the farmers to pack potatoes in. These barrels will be large, but, however large they are, the farmer will be paid on the basis of a barrel of two and a half bushels. That has been the custom, and what has been the result? The farmers for years have been losing money, because they have been giving over three bushels of potatoes for the price of only two and a half bushels. The speculators repack the potatoes, and sell upon the basis of the actual contents of the barrels sold to them by the farmers. But, if the contents of the barrel are stated, the speculators cannot work their little racket, so to speak, and make money out of the farmers as they have been doing in the King's and Cornwallis valleys. One of the amendments that I laid before the minister, and that I gave notice I would ask the House to insert in this Bill, was to cover this point. But, I agree that there should be a standard barrel. And, of course, when I say 'I agree,' I do not pretend that I am an expert in this matter, but I get my information from men who understand this matter most thoroughly and who are all in accord upon it. I think that the members of the government have had communications from these people asking that this be done. I would respectfully ask that the hon. minister insert that in his Bill. As regards the matter of weight, that is specified in the Bill. We do not sell apples by weight, although I do not suppose we would have any objection to that. But, it would be rather difficult to sell apples by weight for the reason that the same bulk of different kinds of apples varies in weight. But, with respect to potatoes, they vary very little in regard to weight. This Bill provides for the weight of potatoes, for it says:

When potatoes are sold by weight, the weight equivalent to a barrel shall be 174 pounds.

That is exactly what the people most interested in this matter desire. But there is a little difference in regard to the weight of a bushel. The Weights and Measures Act distinctly specifies that a bushel of potatoes shall weigh 60 pounds. Now, if you put in this Bill that 3 bushels of potatoes, when sold by weight, shall weigh 174 pounds, as you will do if you specify that a barrel shall contain three bushels, then there will be a discrepancy with the law as it stands now. The law now makes 3 bushels of potatoes weigh 180 pounds, because it says that a bushel of potatoes shall weigh 60 pounds. But I think that law is wrong and should be amended. It is not a fact that a bushel of potatoes weighs 60 pounds, and in order to make the weight of three bushels conform with the weight of a barrel, which it is provided in this Bill shall weigh 174 pounds, it is necessary to specify that a bushel of potatoes shall weigh 58 pounds, and then 3 bushels will weigh 174 pounds. In order that the standard barrel shall contain 3 bushels, you will have to amend the Weights and Measures Act by making a bushel of potatoes weigh 58 pounds instead of 60. That weight was put in the Act a long time ago, and it was re-endorsed, so to speak, in 1898; still, if I remember right, there was a good deal of contention with regard to that re-endorsation of the weight of a bushel of potatoes; quite a number were unwilling to endorse the statement that a bushel of potatoes weighed 60 pounds. I think that in order to accommodate the people and do the greatest good to the greatest number, it would be well to make the barrel contain 3 bushels, whether of apples or of potatoes, and then alter that Weights and Measures Act so as to make a bushel of potatoes weigh 58 pounds instead of 60.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the Minister of Inland Revenue if he is prepared to give the capacity of a sugar barrel and a flour barrel respectively. I ask this on account of the argument adduced by the First Minister. If they are larger than the barrel which is now proposed, then I do not see any objection. I think the position taken by the First Minister is quite tenable; but the Minister of Inland Revenue ought to give us the capacity of a sugar barrel and a flour barrel before we go further.

Mr. A. T. WOOD (Hamilton). I wish to make a remark with reference to a statement made by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), in reference to the use of flour barrels. Speaking of the district around Hamilton, which is one of the largest apple-growing districts in this country. I may say it is a rare thing to see a flour barrel used for shipping apples. Nearly all the barrels used for that purpose are made new in the factory for that purpose. I do not believe there is one flour barrel in a hundred used for shipping apples, although such barrels may be used occasionally for local shipments. I think the minister, in making a standard barrel for shipping purposes, is going in the right direction. If we can save our farmers seven or eight quarts of apples on the English market, and get the same price for them, we are doing the farmers a great service. It is absurd for the hon. gentleman to say that farmers would lose their flour barrels if not allowed to ship apples in them, because they can use them for any other purpose.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). Certainly, the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) is right, no man would be crazy enough to ship apples in a barrel which had contained flour, and no one on this side of the House has suggested such a thing. I do not rise either to support or oppose this measure at the present time, but I rise to protest against proceeding with the Bill today. We were assured last Friday by the minister who has charge of the Bill, that sufficient time would be given us to hear from our constituents in respect to this Bill, which came suddenly upon us, and since last Friday we have had no opportunity to do so. I think the minister, in view of his promise, will have no hesitation in again asking the committee to rise, and allowing this matter to stand for a few weeks longer until we have had some opportunity of consulting our constituents.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not desire to press this Bill against the wish of any hon. members. I would like to give one explanation with reference to barrels that are either larger or smaller than the barrel proposed in this Bill. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) gave notice of a motion that he was going to introduce. He mentioned a difficulty that might arise in case barrels were either larger or smaller than the one proposed. This is the motion of which he gave me notice:

That barrels holding a larger or lesser quantity than therein specified shall not be used for the sale of apples, unless such barrels are plainly marked on the outside thereof with the words 'small barrel' or 'large barrel,' as the case may be, in letters not less than one inch in height.

I think this will prevent any trouble, and when the Bill again gets into committee, I shall be glad to adopt the amendment.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to answer the question I asked, namely, the capacity of a flour and a sugar barrel respectively?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The capacity of a flour barrel is 103 imperial quarts. I cannot give the capacity of a sugar barrel.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). Before the committee rises I would ask the minister if any representations were made from the apple-growers or apple-shippers of Ontario in favor of such legislation?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No; this is what I stated the other day. I did not hear either from Ontario or Quebec, but all the representations came from the province of Nova Scotia first. I do not wonder so much that they came from Nova Scotia because their communications, established by sea with the northern states, are much more frequent for the shipping of barrels to the other side of the Atlantic. Therefore, inter-communication and interchange must be more frequent between the maritime provinces and those states, and that is why I think the petitions should have come first from Nova Scotia. I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. JOHN McMILLAN (South Huron). Mr. Chairman, before you put the question, I wish to say a few words in regard to this Bill. I am perfectly favourable to the present Bill, but I am unfavourable to any Bill providing for a barrel that would contain a larger quantity of apples than the barrel that the Americans send in competition against us into the English market, and where their barrels and our barrels are taken on the same platform and sold by the same auctioneer. I think it is in the interest of the province of Ontario to reduce our barrels to the size of theirs. I am in favour of one size of barrel being used, because, when apples are sold at auction in the old country there is no time for the purchaser to make an examination of the kind of barrel he is getting to ascertain whether he is getting a small barrel or a standard barrel. I hold that all the barrels should be of the same size. They should be of the same size also for the home trade, because, as I said a few days ago, a great many people in the apple trade purchase apples when they cannot say whether they are for export to the old country, or to the United States, or whether they are to be sent to the North-west Territories, or sold locally. Therefore, I hold that all the barrels should be the same size. There is just one thing that I would mention, and it is this. The Bill says :

All apples packed in Canada for sale by the barrel, &c.

If that were passed the farmer could not use a sugar barrel or a flour barrel, to take apples to the local market, and I want it to be left so that he may do that, because a great many of our farmers sell large quantities of apples in that way in the towns and villages. If the clause is made to apply to all apples packed in Canada they will not be enabled to use flour or sugar barrels. Farmers take a great many of their cull apples to vinegar factories and to factories where they are peeled and dried, and the peelings are exported to Germany. We ought to make it just as easy as possible for the farmer to market his apples in all conditions. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) mentions three bushels in a barrel. I would remind him that there are two kinds of bushels ; there is the street bushel and the heaped bushel.

Mr. MILLS. Excuse me ; the Dominion bushel is clearly defined by the Weights and Measures Act.

Mr. McMILLAN. If I sell wheat, or oats, or grain of any kind, I sell by the street bushel, but, if I sell potatoes, apples, or turnips, I have to sell by the heaped bushel.

Mr. MILLS. No, that is against the law.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is the rule all over with us. We sell by the heaped measure if we sell apples, potatoes, turnips, or roots of any description. We sell by the street measure if we sell grain. I think I can speak for all portions of the farmers of Ontario when I say that they are perfectly willing to adopt a barrel as described by the present Bill.

Mr. MILLS. I will just, by way of explanation, read section 19 of the Weights and Measures Act, which is as follows :

In using a Dominion measure of capacity the same shall not be heaped, but either shall be stricken with a round stick or roller straight and of the same diameter from end to end, or if the article sold cannot, from its size or shape, be conveniently stricken, shall be filled in all parts as nearly to the level of the brim as the size and shape of the article admits of.

That applies to wheat, Indian corn, rye, pease, barley, malt, oats, beans, clover seed, timothy seed, buckwheat, flaxseed, hempseed, potatoes, turnips, carrots, parsnips, beets and onions.

Mr. THOMAS SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Chairman, I do not see any force whatever in the argument of the hon. member for South Huron. His contention is that the farmer should be allowed to put apples in any barrels he likes for sale in the local market. He can do that at the present time, under this Bill, provided the barrel he uses is at least the size of the barrel stipulated here, and it may be as much larger as he likes. You very often see the smaller or crab apples placed in a sugar or flour barrel and covered over with canvas and sent to market that way. A sugar barrel will hold about half a bushel more than the ordinary apple barrel. This Bill does not prevent the farmer using such a barrel. Any barrel that he uses, whether it is an ordinary sugar barrel or flour barrel, will be larger than a standard apple barrel, and therefore he is at perfect liberty to trade in that class of barrel in the local market or sell such a barrel in the foreign market if he likes, but, it must not be of less dimensions than are here specified. I see no objection in the world to this Bill. It provides that there should be a standard barrel, and the parties who make barrels will make them up to the standard. Then, we will know what the usual contents of a barrel of apples will be. But, there is nothing in the Bill to prevent a farmer selling his apples in any kind of a barrel he likes so long as his barrel is not less in its dimensions than the standard barrel.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of continuing this discussion, but, in view of the statement made by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) that, in compliance with the pledge he gave to the House that this Bill would not be proceeded with until time had been given to hear from the country, I think we are wasting the time of the House in discussing it further. It will come up in a few days with all the information from the country before us, and we can then deal with it.

Mr. ALEX. McNEILL (North Bruce). There are barrels made in Ontario specially for the sale of apples. How does the size of the barrel used there compare with the size of barrel used in the maritime provinces ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Under the present law it is the same size in the maritime provinces as in the province of Ontario, only the maritime provinces have followed more closely the doings of their competitors in the United States. They found that their competitors were sending to England a smaller barrel, one of nearly seven quarts less capacity, and very naturally, they say it is not fair that they should enter into competition with barrels of nearly seven quarts more capacity than are sent by their United States competitors. Therefore, they asked me to introduce this Bill. Some of our friends on the other side of the House have found fault with me for introducing legislation every session in connection with the Weights and Measures Act. I consider that it is my duty to follow, as much as possible, the changes taking place in trade. I do not think that I ought to adhere to red tape and have no change such as becomes more or less indispensable in a case like this, when the people are threatened with competition, with barrels holding seven quarts less than theirs do, I think I am justified in bringing a matter of this kind before the House. The House has got to decide, and I do not think we should say that this is unchangeable like the laws of the Medes and Persians; but, we should try to meet the convenience of the public as becomes necessary.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to say to the hon. minister (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), that nothing was further from my thought or intention than to suggest that his object in introducing this Bill was not a good one. I am quite satisfied that the Bill is in the right direction, but I would like to call the attention of the hon. minister to the suggestion made by my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), with regard to the word 'packing.' It all depends upon the meaning of the word, as to whether the farmers of Ontario can use the ordinary barrel for dealing in Ontario itself. If they are obliged to pack the barrel, it will interfere very much with the local trade.

Mr. M. J. F. QUINN (St. Ann's, Montreal). I wish to say to the minister that, inasmuch as these changes are considered necessary in the manner of the exportation of apples, I think it would be well for him to put himself in communication with the large exporters of apples in this country to ascertain what their views on this subject are. I understand, that so far, the representations on the matter have only come from the Annapolis valley. The largest exporters of fruit in the Dominion, are in the city of Montreal, and I think it would be well for the minister to get an expression of opinion from them, as to what they think about the size of the apple barrel, before legislation is passed.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

COLD STORAGE ON STEAMSHIPS.

House resolved itself into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to enter into contracts with H. & A. Allan and Robert Reford & Co., to provide cold storage on steamships from Montreal to the United Kingdom during the seasons of 1900 and 1901, on such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council deems expedient, the sum to be paid for such cold storage not to exceed $28,750 in one year.—(Mr. Fisher.)

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). In explaining this resolution, I would say that the contracts which had been entered into three years ago by my department, with various steamship companies, to provide cold storage, have expired during last season. When these contracts were entered into, it was expected that the results would be sufficient proof of the value of cold storage, that the steamship companies would be quite willing to continue this business and make the provisions necessary for the cold storage carriage of our food products without any further contracts. The unfortunate occurrence of the South African war, has, this year, disturbed our shipping trade to such an extent that the demands upon it have been very great, and a large number of the ships which had been devoted to our cold storage trade have been drawn into the carriage of troops, horses and materials to South Africa. In addition to this, I found this deplorable condition of affairs: That the ship-owners being relieved from the contract conditions imposed upon them three years ago, had offers from American shippers of these perishable products, by which the whole cold storage accommodation leaving the Canadian ports this coming season, were bid for, and had I not been able to make further arrangements, the result would have been that the cold storage accommodation from Montreal, St. John, Halifax, and Quebec, would have been monopolized by the Americans. I, therefore, felt that in the interests of our Canadian producers, those who have benefited by cold storage during the three years past, would be secured in the enjoyment of that benefit. The proposals which I now have to lay before the House, are for the continuation and the extension of the cold storage service, and in the arrangements which I have been making with the Messrs. Allan and Messrs. Reford, for enlarged cold storage facilities, I have been able to secure the continued control for another two years of the vessels which have been under contract for the last three years. To do this, I have had to make some slight modifications in the new contracts, as compared with the old. The new contracts are only for two years, instead of three years; a total of five years from the commencement. I have been obliged to pay the same sum for the two years, as I then was able to secure the three years' service for. In addition to that, I have been obliged to modify somewhat the prices which the shipping companies are permitted to charge for cold storage accommodation. I found that it was impossible now to get the same terms that I got three years ago. The fact of the matter is that these terms were so favourable to the shippers, that the shipping companies were not prepared to renew the compact on the same terms. I shall be very glad to answer any questions that may be asked.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). The hon. minister should give us information as to the number of cold storage steamers, the amount of produce carried, and whether the scheme was successful.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I would like the minister to explain on what terms he had secured this cold storage in these various ships, which has now broken down, because of the reasons he has mentioned.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), hardly used the correct words when he described the system as 'having broken down.'

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I said, in consequence of the war.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Four years ago now, my department was able to enter into contracts with various ship-owners for cold storage, and these contracts expired last season.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What did the contracts provide?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Varying with the different ships, the contracts provided: That they should supply a certain quantity of insulated chambers to be cooled by mechanical refrigerating plant; that they should be available to Canadian shippers, and could only be availed of by others when there was no demand for cold storage space by Canadians; that the government could reserve at any time, a certain portion of that space for government experimental shipping; that the ship-owners would only be allowed to charge ten shillings per ton, over and above the usual freight charges, for such freight as went in the cold storage, and that a ton calculated for that purpose should be equal to a ton of butter, which occupies seventy cubic feet, and that it should not be the ordinary ship ton, which is only forty cubic feet. In addition to that, these vessels were to provide a certain service. The vessels to London were to provide a weekly service, divided between the Allans and the Refords, each of them providing three vessels. The Allan Line and the Dominion Line were to provide a weekly service to Liverpool; the Allan Line and the Thomson Line, of which the Refords are the representatives in Canada, a fortnightly service to Glasgow; and the Elder-Dempster Line a weekly service to Bristol. In addition to that, we had some services from the maritime provinces. Furness, Withy & Co. were to provide, if I remember rightly, a fortnightly service from St. John and Halifax to London; and the Pickford & Black Co., I think, were to provide a steamship service to the West Indies on the same terms and conditions. The first contracts entered into, amongst which are those with the Allans and the Refords, expired last fall. The result was that for the coming season we had these contracts, and the owners of these ships were at liberty to turn them to another trade, or to do what they liked with them.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understood the minister to say that these contracts were entered into four years ago.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They were entered into four years ago this spring; but, the term of the contracts was really for the three seasons just passed.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). That is, they served for 1897, 1898 and 1899?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, the summers of 1897, 1898 and 1899. I felt, and I feel still, that it was very important indeed that our producers in Canada should have the advantage of this continuous cold storage accommodation, and that it would be a most deplorable misfortune if they should not have it for the coming season.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the point on which I want information. Why did the Minister of Agriculture, when he knew the great importance of this accommodation, let the arrangement lapse, and leave the Canadian producers in the lurch, to be crowded out by people in Chicago and elsewhere?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is exactly what I am providing against by the resolution before the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Exactly, but a year too late.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Not at all. The condition of affairs that has arisen in consequence of the war in South Africa was not foreseen last year—the condition that required this additional contract.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten the resolution which this House passed last year with regard to the war? He had all the evidence before him as to the danger, which was likely to occur which has occurred, and which he is now obliged to regret as a disaster; and yet, he did not provide for it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman surely is not serious when he states that the resolution passed by this House last year, which hoped that there would not be any war, was an indication of the necessity of doing last session what I am doing now?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I thought the hon. gentleman just explained to the House that the cold storage accommodation had been completely interrupted in consequence of the lapsing of this contract, which left our producers in a position to be crowded out by foreigners?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I regret that the hon. gentleman did not understand me; and I shall have to explain it again, I suppose. There would be danger that that would have occurred this season if this resolution were not adopted by the House, and the contracts which I have made were not ratified. But, if the House supports me in the course I have taken, the dangers which I have foreseen, and which, as I explained, were in the future, will be completely obviated.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When did the minister begin the negotiations for the renewal of the contracts?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. About January 1 last.

Mr. MONTAGUE. After the contracts had run out?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. When the contracts were running out. The hon. gentleman must understand that this accommodation is practically used only during the summer months. During the rest of the year there is practically no necessity for cold storage. When I began to discuss the question with the ship-owners early last winter, they refused absolutely to make any contracts.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear; because you negotiated a year too late.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that at the time parliament was sitting last year there was no information or knowledge as to what might occur; and furthermore, when we found, as a matter of fact, that these very ship-owners last winter would not undertake to say what they would do in the future, it is not at all likely that they would have undertaken to say it during the term of their contracts. Having negotiated with these gentlemen, I believe I have been able to make, by the contracts for which I am asking ratification to-day, most successful and satisfactory arrangements; for, not only am I securing new ships, but the same control over the service of the ships which were engaged under the older contracts.

Mr. SPROULE. At the same price?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. At the same price, except with the change of condition as to fifteen shillings; that is to say, ten shillings was paid under the old contract, and hereafter fifteen shillings will have to be paid.

Mr. MONTAGUE. For what?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. For the capacity per ton.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is, 50 per cent advance.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Certainly; and when we take into consideration the advance in freights all over—

Mr. MONTAGUE. But that does not include the advance in freights.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Certainly not; but the hon. gentleman must understand that the space in the cold storage is of greater value than the space in the rest of the ship; and this is an additional charge for the cold storage.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The arrangement we made was that the cold storage should cost so much in addition to the freight. The company now get the increased price of freight, and also the 50 per cent increase for the cold storage. Yet, the minister says it makes no difference.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman certainly misunderstands me. I did not intend to say, and I think I did not say, that it made no difference. It is very evident that fifteen shillings instead of ten shillings makes a difference. But, what I did say was, that just as other freights have risen, because we have to pay a higher rate for everything sent abroad, so we have to pay more for the cold storage.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That does not make any difference. You pay it on the freight.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. We pay on the freight and on the cold storage. Moreover, the shipping companies have been complaining that they have only got ten shillings, while the steamers from New York, Boston and other American ports, have never got less than twenty shillings, and to-day they are paid twenty-five, and even thirty, shillings for cold storage accommodation. Notwithstanding that, I have succeeded in keeping the price of cold storage from Canadian ports down to fifteen shillings in the new contracts, and to ten shillings in the old contracts. I think the hon. gentleman will not deny that this is a favourable showing.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think there was a great deal in the point taken by the hon. leader of the opposition. It is shown that this cold storage arrangement was no doubt advantageous, and the hon. gentleman should have taken the greatest possible care to have negotiated at a very early period, when freight rates were cheap, a renewal of the contract. I have no hesitation in saying that that contract could have been renewed, from what I know of the circumstances, at the old figures. But the hon. gentleman has placed the cold storage service just where these hon. gentlemen have placed the fast line service. We have the minister without portfolio (Mr. Dobell) pointing out that the fast line service could not be put on without enormous expense because of the increased price of iron.

Mr. A. T. WOOD (Hamilton). It is a good thing for the country that there is no fast service.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend has at last let the cat out of the bag. He usually does once a day expose, to the dismay of his friends, the policy they have been trying to hide.

Mr. WOOD. The hon. gentleman is quite aware that, from the very first inception of this fast line service, I have been opposed to it as utterly unnecessary for Canada.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman says that he has been opposed to it from the first. He, however, is a very consistent supporter of the government. He is willing to vote for any sort of resolution commending these hon. gentlemen for the wisdom of their policy, but that same policy he opposes piecemeal. Their fast line policy, he says, is a very foolish one, yet the government say that it is a wise one and that they have been trying to carry it out, and the hon. minister without portfolio tells us that he has expended a vast amount of energy in the endeavour to carry it through. The government are, I believe, playing a game, notwithstanding their professions. The member for Hamilton has given the game away.

Another specific policy, on which the hon. member for Hamilton opposes this government, is the removal of the restrictions with regard to the coasting trade. This government have allowed the Americans to come in and do the coasting trade of Canada, and, if I am correctly informed, the hon. member for Hamilton came down here with blood in his eye and told the Prime Minister that if he did not go back on that policy he would see that he went out of office.

Mr. WOOD. I never said so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But the hon. gentleman felt that way.

Mr. WOOD. You are not my father confessor.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not, but the electors of Hamilton are, and this is the place for him to announce his policy.

Mr. WOOD. The electors will take care of you, too.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am prepared to meet them, and am not ashamed to say in this House, or in the constituency I represent, what my policy is. Nor am I afraid to say whether I have supported or opposed this particular line of policy or not. However, we have the announcement of the hon. member for Hamilton that he is opposed to the fast line service, and we have the government, by its conduct and actions, announcing that they also are opposed to it, though they profess to be in favour of it. The announcement of the hon. member for Hamilton is in accord with the action of the government on that question. The government have dilly-dallied and humbugged the people with it until at last we have the minister without portfolio declaring that while they were shuffling and quibbling, the price of iron had gone up so high that it would be impossible now, at anything like a fair rate, to secure such an advantage at present.

Coming back to the cold storage matter, there can be no question that the hon. Minister of Agriculture ought to have negotiated for the renewal of the contract long ago. He has said to the House: We have got it at the same prices, except that we pay fifteen shillings instead of ten shillings. That is only an advance of 50 per cent, and yet the hon. gentleman says that freights have gone up all round, and so consequently has cold storage. But I want the farmers to understand that the freight increase has been paid; that the steamship companies get their advance in the freight increase and also get 50 per cent more from the government, for the cold storage apartments supplied under arrangements with the government. How many steamships does the hon. gentleman propose to have fitted up?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Before replying, I would like to point out one or two things which may tend to modify the opinion of the hon. gentleman. In the first place, before the contracts had expired, a number of the steamship companies were putting on cold storage vessels without any contract at all, and there was a fair expectation that, had not the unfortunate condition arisen which did arise on account of the South African war, there would have been abundant cold storage accommodation from Canada without any contract or subsidies at all. That was my anticipation, and it was justified by the fact that the Dominion Line and the Elder Dempster Line and one or two steamers of other lines—I think the Reford and the Allan Lines—had put cold storage into new vessels without any subsidy or contract, and I anticipated that when the three years' contract had expired, the same steamers would be continued on our service, equipped with that accommodation, without any further contracts. Unfortunately, the condition of affairs arose which I have described.

When that condition arose, I had to face the difficulty and make new arrangements, and those arrangements were made on the basis of a certain number of steamers, new ones, which had not been under contract before, being equipped and a continuation of our control of the old steamers. When the proposition was first made to the steamship people, they refused to consider any proposition. They said that the condition of affairs as to freights and the future of their steamers was such that they could not undertake to make contracts at all, and would not discuss the matter. It was not until quite recently that I was able, through Professor Robertson's exertions, to bring those people to a frame of mind in which they would undertake to make contracts. Even up to the present, the Elder-Dempster people are not willing to make any contract for the future. The contracts made are for three new steamers of the Refords to London—I am speaking from memory—

Mr. MONTAGUE. How many altogether ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think ten new steamers.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How many did you make arrangements with in 1895 ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think seventeen, and then there were others put on so that last year there were twenty-three. In addition to these new steamers, I am continuing the contracts with and the control over, twelve others, contracts of which have expired but are renewed by this contract.

Mr. MONTAGUE. All trans-Atlantic ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, so that if this contract is ratified by the House, I will have control over 22 steamers in addition to those of the lines whose contracts are not yet expired—the Manchester liners and the Furness Withy people. We will have, if this contract goes through, for this season, some 27 or 28 steamers instead of the 23 which we had last year. The contract with the Furness-Withy, Manchester liners were not made the same year as that with the Refords and Allans. The consequence is that they are still operating under the original contract.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wish to say that it appears to me that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) has very seriously given away his whole case. It has been the boast of the hon. gentleman throughout the Dominion, wherever he went, that he had been a great boon to the farmers of Canada, that, as a practical farmer he had been watching their interests very carefully, and that while those interests were in his charge they would never be lost sight of. In fact, when the hon. gentleman was addressing the electors down in Sherbrooke, I am told, he claimed a great deal of the credit for the prosperity of that section of country, because of the prosperity of the dairying industry, as a result of his own labours. But he has shown by his explanation how well and how carefully he guarded the interests of the farmers, and how valuable his foresight was to the agriculturists of this country. He says that while he was making the speeches, declaring that he had done so much for the farmers, he had come to the conclusion that they would not need any further governmental aid as regards cold storage, and that when the contracts which have been made and which expired last winter were ended, the conditions would be such that it would not be necessary for the government, who were so anxious to help the farmers, to do anything in the way of cold storage further. I want to examine the hon. gentleman's statements for a moment, and see just how correct they are. The hon. gentleman himself shows how correct they are when he discusses it further, because he says he found out, when the contracts ran out, that hardly for love or money could the government continue the cold storage contracts or get renewed contracts with these steamship companies. In other words, the hon. gentleman neglected the interests of the Canadian farmers. He allowed himself and his department to get into a hole ; he allowed the interests of the farmers to be sacrificed for the want of foresight in making these arrangements at the proper time and at proper prices. What is his own expression—he sought 'to get these people in a proper frame of mind.' It was a lovely time to get them into a 'proper frame of mind' when freight rates were increased, and the vessels had twice as much work as they could do. It was at this time that the powerful Minister of Agriculture started out to get these people into a 'proper frame of mind.' And he did it by allowing them to charge such rates that the exporters of dairy produce from this country to England will pay 50 per cent more than they were paying under the old contract that he had allowed to lapse, and which he had not, previous to that time, attempted to get renewed. The hon. gentleman is welcome to his position before the Canadian farmers. They are paying 50 per cent more, as I have said, and they are paying it by reason of the hon. gentleman's neglect to negotiate at a time when he might have negotiated with great advantage, because he was at that time considering the dropping of the question altogether. That is a most important admission, this admission that the government contemplated dropping cold storage altogether. Instead of contemplating dropping cold storage, they should have been planning to extend it very greatly. Certainly, sir, because of this neglect, a contract is to be made by which the steamships get 50 per cent more than under the old contract.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) has presented the matter, no doubt, in a very favourable light from his own standpoint. At the same time he has ignored two or three very important elements in the argument which knock his argument into a cocked hat. The first is that I never said and never suggested that I was going to drop cold storage altogether. The second is that I believed, and was justified in believing at that time and up to the end of last session, that when the cold storage contract with certain steamers, not with all, were expiring, the owners of those steamers were putting on other vessels equipped with cold storage accommodations without contracts, and that when these contracts did come to a conclusion these owners of vessels would continue the same steamers in the same trade coming to the same ports as for years past, and continue the same service to the people of Canada with other vessels not under contract at all. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) ignores the fact that when the time came to discuss the cold storage contract the unfortunate war in South Africa came and completely changed the condition of our foreign trade and shipping trade.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When did that come ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have forgotten the exact date of the declaration of war, but I think it was in October.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But before the war came, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) heard that war was likely ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have heard a good deal, but I did not hear from anybody, even from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) himself, that there was any certainty of war. The hon. gentleman assisted last session in passing a certain resolution, which was passed towards the end of last session in this House; and he knows perfectly well that the House and the whole of Canada, and the whole of the empire, prayed most earnestly and sincerely that there would not be any war, and believed that the Imperial government and the governments of the South African republics would be able to come to terms without an appeal to arms. At the time the session closed, and after that time, the same feeling prevailed; and it was only after parliament closed that any further contracts could have been made. But, as soon as there appeared to be a probability that these steamships would not continue in the trade in which they had been engaged, measures were taken, and I may say, in explanation, that the majority of these steamships have been, since the beginning of the war, engaged in carrying troops and supplies to South Africa. It happened, unfortunately for us, that a large number of the ships engaged in the Canadian trade seemed especially adapted for this service, and owners of these ships have been able to make contracts with the Imperial government to a greater extent than almost any other ship-owners in the empire. As soon as there appeared a likelihood that these vessels would not be retained in our trade, I proceeded to negotiate with these people to see what we could do in future arrangements. I insisted upon it as a condition that we should not only have control of the steamships engaged under future contracts, but should also retain control of the steamers which had been under control for three years past. The result is that during the coming season there will be a larger number of vessels in the trade between Canada and Great Britain with cold storage facilities than there were last season or have been since mechanical cold storage was inaugurated. I am not going to enter into a discussion of what I may have said at Sherbrooke or elsewhere. It is on record, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) is welcome to it, and I am ready to go before the people in regard to that as I did then. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman, in the statement he had made, has so entirely ignored the important points—

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have not ignored anything. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) has admitted my contention. He has admitted that many months before a blow of war was struck, the whole empire was ablaze with the anticipation that war might come.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not admitted that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Everybody anticipated that there was about to be trouble.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Everybody prayed that there would not be.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Everybody prayed, but everybody kept his powder dry, except the Minister of Agriculture. Paul Kruger kept his powder dry, the authorities of the empire kept their powder dry. But the Minister of Agriculture entertained the beautiful hope that the farmers would not need assistance. He allowed month after month to go by, and when the hon. gentleman wakened the war had commenced. He slept to the fact that in the ordinary course shipment across the ocean would be interfered with, and he awakened too late to the fact that there was likely to be war in South Africa, and the result is that the dairymen of Canada are paying 50 per cent more.

Mr. TAYLOR. The minister stated a few moments ago that in 1895, contracts were entered into with seventeen steamers for a certain term. Could he tell us for what length of time the contracts were made in 1895, and the price ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not the details of those contracts here, and could not give them off-hand. But the hon. gentleman is mistaken in saying 1895, because I was not in office in 1895, and could not have entered into any contracts. There were no contracts for mechanical cold storage in 1895.

Mr. CLARKE. What was the additional price paid for sending produce in cold storage during the whole season of 1896?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There was no mechanical cold storage in the season of 1896. There was some ice cold storage, two or three boats. I do not know the amount extra that was paid at the time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman says two or three boats. He knows that an arrangement had been made with a large number of boats, but that it fell through. The hon. gentleman knows there were boats on in 1895.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. For ice cold storage.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yet the hon. gentleman has repeatedly said throughout the country that he was the originator of the cold storage.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman is misquoting me.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. minister to say there were seventeen vessels with which arrangements are now in existence for cold storage.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think not those figures. Speaking from memory only, most of the contracts were made to commence in the spring of 1897, and they expired this last year.

Mr. SPROULE. How many?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They expired at different periods, according to the time the contracts were made. Some were made in one year and some in another. The commencement was made in the spring of 1897. Speaking from memory, I think there were seventeen first contracted for, and afterwards others were added. I cannot say exactly the year each contract commenced.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that last year there were at least twenty-three boats under contract for cold storage, and that a number of those had run out, and he is now proposing to make an arrangement with ten.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. For ten new ones.

Mr. SPROULE. And when these ten new ones are added you will have twenty-seven.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I do not think the hon. gentleman quite understood me. In addition to the ten new ones, I am extending contracts with, I think, twelve of the old ones, so there will be twenty-two which will be practically renewed or new under this arrangement. It may be twenty-one, instead of twenty-two. In addition to that, there are some six or seven contracts made some time ago which have not yet expired. Adding these figures together, we have twenty-seven or twenty-eight boats that will be under contract to supply cold storage accommodation during the season of 1900.

Mr. SPROULE. In other words, the minister is making a contract now with twenty-two boats.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Practically.

Mr. SPROULE. I presume the renewed contracts will be at a higher figure, 50 per cent higher than before.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Then do the old boats continue to carry produce under the original contracts, at the prices agreed upon when the contracts were first made?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Those whose contracts are not expired, do certainly, some six or seven.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman said the cold storage was supplied on the mechanical refrigerator plan. Could he tell the House what is the difference between that and the original refrigerator system that was in existence under the first contract, and how far the first was a failure, while the second is successful?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. So far as the first is concerned, I would be disposed to refer the hon. gentleman to the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), who made these contracts for the ice cold storage—either that hon. gentleman or his predecessor, for, I think, the hon. gentleman himself was not in the Agriculture Department, at the time the first arrangements for cold storage were made. Those arrangements were for putting ice into insulated chambers on the vessel, they had no mechanical apparatus by which the chambers could be cooled. All the contracts that I have given for cold storage, since I have been in office, have been for mechanical cold storage, by a system known as the Linde. I think all the apparatus is on the Linde system, and that system works by the compression of ammonia, creating a cold in pipes which pass through the chamber and cool the chamber.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman means chemical and mechanical, because it is by the use of ammonia that the cold is generated. Could he say what the arrangements were in this contract with regard to Canadians being compelled to pay for a certain amount of space whether they used it or not?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. So far as I remember the contracts, there is no difference between those now being entered into, and the old contracts, except the points I have named, that 15 shillings will have to be paid instead of 10 shillings. There is no obligation on the part of anybody to pay for space which they do not use. I am speaking from memory, as I have not the contracts under my hand.

Mr. SPROULE. I was told they were obliged to pay for certain space whether they used it or not. They had an opportunity of filling that space, but in the event of their not filling it, they had to pay for it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Of course if anybody, whether a Canadian or anybody else, contracts for space for cold storage and does not fill it, he will have to pay for it, as he would under any contract system.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the contract with the government provided for certain cold storage space for the exporters. There was some provision made that Canadians would pay a certain consideration, that they were to have the first chance of filling that space, and in the event of its not being filled, then the Americans could take advantage of it. I understood the minister to say that the Americans would have taken up all the cold storage, if he had allowed them to do so.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. After the contracts were expired.

Mr. SPROULE. Then several shipments were made of different kinds of fruit, tomatoes, pears, peaches, apples and dairy products under the new system. Can the minister give us any information as to the success attending that effort?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not got the details of those reports before me. I had prepared them so as to be able to submit them to the House when the estimates came up. If the hon. gentleman wishes me to do so, I will give him a short resume now from memory; but perhaps it would be better to wait, either until this Bill is in committee, or until the estimates come up, when I will give full details.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What are the reports of his officers and of his experts with regard to the success of the present cold storage system?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The present cold storage system, so far as cooling the chambers is concerned, seems to be absolutely successful; I do not know that there can be any improvement made in it. There have been one or two complaints in regard to certain of the vessels that the products were not received on the other side in the condition that was expected, and accusations have been levelled in general terms against the management of the ships, that the mechanism was not kept going on the whole voyage across the Atlantic. In that case, of course, the chamber would not be kept cool and the products in the chamber would be seriously damaged.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Have you an officer in your department named Grindley?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has the hon. minister a report from that gentleman?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Mr. Grindley has made several reports. Mr. Grindley was the gentleman I had in England during the last two seasons to examine as much as he could of our products when they arrived there.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the nature of his report?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. His reports are very varied. His report on the fruits that went over is sometimes satisfactory; that is to say, the character of the fruit was sometimes satisfactory and sometimes it was not. I could not give the hon. gentleman the details.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, knows that Mr. Grindley made a speech in Cowansville, Que., and I am told that that speech was anything but complimentary to the cold storage system.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I was present when Mr. Grindley made that speech. He made some statements that were rather sweeping, and which, perhaps, went beyond the facts.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is one of the hon. gentleman's own officers. What were the sweeping statements?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I cannot recollect them now. I do not carry them in my mind.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Did the hon. gentleman have them investigated? I am told that Mr. Grindley, at Cowansville, the other day, said the whole cold storage system, as operated at present, is a farce. This is one of the hon. gentleman's own officers.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I was present when the speech was made, but I do not remember that statement.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But, you would not be surprised to know that this statement was made.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, I would be.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. gentleman tell us what were the statements made?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I cannot quote Mr. Grindley's speech. The hon. gentleman should not be unreasonable enough to think that I am going to undertake to quote, or even to give the substance of a speech made a number of weeks, or months ago. The hon. gentleman, however, I think, will see a report of that speech in the newspapers published the next day after it was made. I am perfectly willing to give him the reports of Mr. Grindley in regard to the fruit shipments which he has presented to my department.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Grindley is still an officer of the department?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes; he is still in the employ of the department.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) mean to say that he was present and heard an officer of his department make sweeping statements contrary to the facts, and that he does not know any of the particulars about them? An officer of his department has made sweeping statements, the hon. gentleman himself says, in reference to the management of his own department, and yet, he professes to say he is not sufficiently interested to remember what they were. One would suppose that it would be his duty, as the minister in charge of that department, to arraign that gentleman and ask him to give his reason and account for the sweeping statements which the hon. gentleman says he made in reference to the department over which he presides. But, it appears that this is so small a matter in the estimation of the hon. gentleman that it has passed from his memory. He says that these statements were sweeping, that they were very great misstatements, but he cannot remember what they were. I think this is the most extraordinary exhibition that could possibly be made, after the credit the hon. gentleman has attempted to take at the expense of others to whom it is more due, that he now admits that, in his own presence, cold storage, under his management, has been represented as having utterly broken down, as having completely failed, and as having resulted in the loss and destruction of the property sent by parties who attempted to use that cold storage. Yet, this has all passed from his mind. He has kept the same expert in his department, he has kept him under his control, but, he has not discussed this with him, he has not called him to account for making these misstatements, or called on him to prove that they were true, in order that he might remedy the defects. I think it is a most deplorable exhibition, but, it is an exhibition that we are too much accustomed to in this House. It is an exhibition of the deplorable incapacity of the whole of this government. What was the first fatal mistake that these hon. gentlemen made in reference to cold storage? When they came into power they found a contract arranged; all that it required was the signature of the Governor General to authorize that contract to be closed to provide for four fast steamers running between Great Britain and Canada, and a part of that contract was that the contractors were bound to furnish all the cold storage that the government could demand. These were to be weekly fast steamers, provided with the latest and best form of cold storage, which should be as ample in its extent as the government demanded. Here was the whole thing done, and ready to their hands. But, owing to their incapacity, or something worse, no result has been achieved. What we have heard here to-day almost leads me to believe that the House and the country have been deluded by these hon. gentlemen. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) rose in his place and said that from the first he had been bitterly opposed to the whole scheme of a fast Atlantic service. He made this declaration despite the fact that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell), to whom this matter was committed, stated in the House on April 6 last:

I believe there is nothing in this country that will bring us such great credit, or will do us more good and establish us as a great commercial nation more readily than having the very finest possible steamers we can put on the route from Great Britain up the St. Lawrence to Quebec and Montreal.

There is the statement of a member of the government, but the statement we have just heard here, to-day, by one of the supporters of the government, leads me to believe that the government have never been sincere. That the hon. member for Hamilton put a pistol to the breast of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and told him that they must not go on with that fast service and cold storage scheme as he was opposed to it, and as upon other occasions, he, no doubt, told the hon. gentleman and his colleagues that they might find that they would want his support. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, in obedience to this threat, I suppose, from the hon. member for Hamilton, said: We will put it into the hands of one of our colleagues who has declared in public, in the city of Quebec, that he was totally opposed to the whole thing, and you will find that it will not advance very fast. Is that the way that this House is being played with by this government, or is it that total incapacity for public business which has marked their career from the first hour they took the reins of office? It is one or the other. The hon. member for Hamilton, I suppose, reposing confidence in the pledge he had got from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, that he would hand this fast Atlantic service over to a colleague who had declared that he was opposed to the whole thing, and that he need not be afraid it would ever come to anything, has voted twice, in this House, in support of a fast Atlantic service that he has denounced as being something that would be most injurious to the interests of Canada.

Mr. WOOD. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I have no recollection of ever having voted for a fast Atlantic service.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman finds it convenient to go to sleep when the government are making large charges on the revenues of the country, contrary to his opinions, it will not excuse him. Every man that does not vote against a measure of that kind votes for it, and the hon. gentleman stands accountable before his constituents. I am giving the hon. gentleman an excuse, and that is, that he had the same pledge as was given in the prohibition business when the hon. First Minister obtained a pledge from the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That he need not be alarmed about prohibition. Just in the same way the hon. member for Hamilton relied on the pledge given, I suppose, by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce that he would fix that in his own way, and that there never would be any fast Atlantic service between Canada and Great Britain. That, Sir, is what I suppose did take place. Sir, the fact is that if that did not take place two years ago, Canada would have had running across the Atlantic ships that would compare with the finest afloat on the ocean, and we would have had a cold storage system capable of placing all our farm products on the English markets in the finest possible condition. But, that scheme was killed, and killed by handing it over to be dealt with by a gentleman who had pronounced himself as against the principle of it, and who may be against it to-day, although he admits now that the fast Atlantic service is of vital importance to Canada. Cold storage is of absolute necessity to the agriculturists of Canada, but owing to the utter incapacity of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fraser), the system has now been allowed to fall into a most deplorable condition. We have the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) compelled to admit to the House that if his government had not the folly to interfere with the fast Atlantic service, provided for by the Conservative government, it would have been in existence since the 1st of May, 1898. We have him compelled to admit to-day that the foolish attempt of this government to obtain the service at a lower price than their predecessors, has ended in utter disaster—as has every effort this government has made to depart from the policy laid down by the Conservatives. The Minister of Agriculture, by his admission to-day, has shown his utter incapacity to administer any department. He may be a success in the fattening of chickens by some new and novel process, but as Minister of Agriculture his confession made to-day on the floor of this House has shown the people of Canada his utter incapacity. He did not foresee what every man with an eye in his head, or a particle of brain in his cranium saw, viz.: that there was going to be war and a demand for steamship accommodation. And the reason he did not see that, he tells us, was that the people were praying that there should be no war. It would seem as if he had more confidence in prayer than his colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), who told us that the Liberals did not make their elections with prayers. The Minister of Agriculture closed his eyes to the events which were about to take place, and consequently the agriculturists of Canada are called on to suffer for his neglect. He was utterly devoid of that far-sighted prescience which a statesman is bound to have when looking at the condition of the country, and considering the conditions that surround him. Why did he not look ahead as he should have done, and secure the extension of his cold storage contracts at a cost 50 per cent less to the people of Canada, as he could have done, before this great demand for steamers took place. His confession on the floor of this House has stamped him as utterly incompetent for discharging the important duties of his office, and never had the people of Canada greater reason to deplore that a gentleman of so little qualifications for statesmanship ventured to undertake the duties of a department for which he has shown himself so completely disqualified. There is nothing that this government has undertaken that they have succeeded in. When they assumed office they had the cold storage system ready-made at their hands, and they had there Professor Robertson who was appointed by their predecessors, and who was thoroughly qualified to deal with this subject. Professor Robertson is a man who has satisfied the people of this country by his ability in the discharge of his duties, and the minister has no excuse for his dereliction of duty. The government went asleep on the subject. They neglected to avail themselves of the able expert assistance provided for them by the Conservatives, and so they have miserably failed. All that was necessary for the Minister of Agriculture was to study the first lesson of a public man, that is, to learn what other people could teach him. But he did not do that. If he had placed himself unreservedly in the hands of Mr. Robertson, I have no hesitation in saying that we would not have had to listen to-day to his deplorable confession on the floor of this House; that 50 per cent has to be paid by the agriculturists of Canada more than they should pay for the privilege of sending their products to Great Britain in cold storage. The minister could have sought the approval of parliament eighteen months ago to renew these contracts for five years, and if he had done that the farmers of this country would not have to pay to-day out of their toil and labour this extra 50 per cent tax for cold storage. That is all due to the folly and incapacity of the government. If they had carried out the policy of their predecessors—provided the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) could be induced to let them do it—we would have had a fast Atlantic service to-day. The first great blunder of the government was that they did not arrange for the fast Atlantic service, and the next blunder was that the Minister of Agriculture allowed all his opportunities to lapse to secure cold storage at reasonable rates. Why, he could have anticipated the action of parliament—as his government have done in other things—and then come to this House for the approval of the contracts which he made with the steamship companies. He could have done that before the demand for steamers came for the South African war, and had he done so, he would have saved thousands and thousands of dollars to the farming community. Were it not for his incapacity, he would have been able to see ahead what every intelligent man in the country except himself saw, and he would have arranged for the renewal of those cold storage contracts long ago.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Mr. Chairman, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, the hon. leader of the opposition had been making a somewhat violent attack upon myself. I regret to see that he is not here just now, and as this Bill will come up for other stages, I think I shall postpone my reply until I have an opportunity of making it in the hon. gentleman's presence.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the motion is adopted, I would like the hon. minister to promise to inform us, before the Bill goes through, as to the number of vessels for cold storage that were contracted for in 1895 by the late government, and the price that was agreed upon per steamer in excess of the freight. I would also like to inquire now if arrangements for cold storage were not begun under the guidance of Professor Robertson, and if any improvements that have been made in the system since have not been suggested by Professor Robertson?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I understand that the hon. gentleman wants the number of steamers running in 1895 and 1896 under the ice-cold storage system, the price that was paid for the accommodation above the freight, and the number of vessels that have been running each year since, and the arrangements made for them. Is that it?

Mr. TAYLOR. And I want the hon. gentleman to state now whether it was not Professor Robertson who inaugurated the system, and who has suggested any of the so-called improvements made since.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. With regard to the hon. gentleman's allusion to the improvements as so-called improvements, I regret that the hon. gentleman does not know enough about the cold storage systems employed in the world to fully understand that it is well agreed upon that mechanical cold storage is far superior to any system of ice-cold storage. As a matter of fact, ice-cold storage has been discontinued everywhere. At the time the ice-cold storage was inaugurated between Canada and the United Kingdom, mechanical cold storage was in existence, and the butter which competed with our butter in the English market came from Australia in vessels fitted up with mechanical cold storage. At the time my predecessors fitted up the vessels with ice-cold storage, mechanical cold storage was well understood. I have no means of knowing what communications passed between my predecessors and Professor Robertson, but I do know that Professor Robertson at that time knew about mechanical cold storage, as did every one at that date who had studied dairy questions, and he appreciated the great superiority of mechanical cold storage to ice-cold storage. I am glad to tell the hon. gentleman that in connection with all the improvements in cold storage I availed myself to the utmost of the experience and the technical knowledge which Professor Robertson, one of the greatest dairy experts in the world, had to place at my disposal, that I discussed with him every improvement that was made, that some were suggested by him and some were possibly suggested by myself, and that the result was the system inaugurated after I came into office. That system has been an eminently successful one. I think I am safe in saying that the improvement has been very great, and that the system established in the steamships which have been sailing between Canada and Great Britain for the last three years or more is as good as any cold storage equipment known in the world. I am satisfied it is the best obtainable. I have the endorsement of the Butter and Cheese Association of the city of Montreal, announced in a resolution which was passed by that organization last fall, to the effect that they appreciated the equipment, that it was an excellent one, and that it had accomplished great results. I think perhaps I have answered the hon. gentleman's question. If there is anything more he wants, I shall be glad to give it to him as well as I can.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). The hon. gentleman's statement is rather an interesting one as regards the part which he himself has played and the part which Professor Robertson, the expert, has played in this matter. Boiled down, his statement is this, that he availed himself of the best advice of the best expert he knew of. That was the expert of the department, who was appointed by the Conservative administration; and I may say that that administration, in establishing a cold storage system made use of Professor Robertson's opinions and experience and followed his advice. There can be no doubt that the government at that time did their very best as regards the cold storage system which was established, which the hon. gentleman in his highness and mightiness has referred to as a one-horse system. Just before the recess, however, we had a very interesting discussion about a gentleman named Grindley, who had made an address, I believe, at Cowansville. I thought that perhaps that address would be published in the Cowansville papers, but I notice that the Cowansville Observer for February and March has been torn out of the file, so that I have been unable to get a report of the address. But the hon. minister admitted this afternoon that Professor Grindley had very seriously criticised his cold storage system at that meeting—that he had made sweeping statements which the minister said were not true. I would like to ask the minister whether he has investigated Mr. Grindley's statements, and if so, whether he found them true or untrue; and if he found them untrue, how he has dealt with Mr. Grindley as an officer of the department for making statements at a public meeting which were absolutely untrue, and which were given a wide circulation.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am glad the hon. gentleman has asked me this question, and I think I can reply correctly from memory. I do not know whether the meeting referred to was reported, or whether Mr. Grindley's remarks were reported in the Cowansville Observer, but they were reported in the Montreal Gazette.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What date?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I cannot tell off-hand.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What month?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I cannot even tell that. The meeting took place, I think, either in the month of February, or the early part of March. It was after the session began and before it had been very long opened. Mr. Grindley was an officer of my department, and invited to attend that meeting—a meeting of the dairy convention at Cowansville. At the close of the afternoon meeting, at which Governor Hoard and Mr. James Fletcher and myself had spoken, Mr. Grindley was called on to make a few remarks. He made a few hurried remarks, lasting about ten minutes, in which he alluded to several things in connection with the shipments of fruits and other perishable products in cold storage, and gave instances in which some fruit had arrived in bad condition on the other side. He said something in the nature of condemning the system of cold storage, I presumed, as applied to that class of goods. His statement was of a sweeping nature, and I stated then that it was altogether too sweeping and not justified by what he had instanced, or the actual facts. After the meeting was over, I pointed out to him that he had made statements far too sweeping in their character. He told me that he did not think he had conveyed to the meeting what I thought he had. I told him that I so understood his words, and presumed the meeting did likewise, and he said that he was very sorry, and that he had evidently done what he did not intend doing.

At that time he was engaged upon his report on the shipments of fruits and other things in cold storage to England. That report has since come in, but I have not had time to go over it with Prof. Robertson. I propose to do so as soon as I have an opportunity, and give to the House whatever information it gives. I must confess that I did not think these details would be asked for on this resolution, and if the hon. gentleman wishes to have this resolution held over until the information is brought down, he is within his rights.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. minister has put as pleasant a complexion upon the matter as possible. But here is an officer of his department, who makes a very severe statement at a public meeting with regard to a system for which the hon. gentleman now asked us to vote money. I cannot conceive of that gentleman having been retained in his position in the department, if he made statements condemnatory of the policy which the hon. minister still adheres to, and is attempting to carry out. That kind of harmony existing in the department, I cannot understand, though the hon. minister may.

There is one subject to which I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentleman, and that is the sale of Canadian products, once they are in the market of Great Britain. Does he propose to take any steps to place Canadian dairy fruits, meat and other products upon the British market as distinctly Canadian products?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman is perhaps aware that all food products going into Great Britain must, under the British law, be marked with the name of the country from which they come, and all Canadian food products entering Great Britain, are marked Canadian. In addition, under our own law, our dairy products must be marked with the name Canadian. There has been no attempt to follow those products after they reach the English market, beyond the observation of our officers there, who have tried to find out the disabilities under which they may labour in that market, and report to us. I have found by the experience of last year, that one officer in England is not sufficient to watch the great volume of our food products arriving in that country. I had a deputation wait on me a little while ago, of the Ontario Fruit Growers' Association, most of whom came from the Niagara district, and I told them the conclusion I had come to with regard to that particular point. I told them it was necessary this coming season to provide more officers in England, who would, at each of the greater ports, meet our cold storage vessels on arrival, and try to trace and watch over the products as they arrive.

As far as our dairy trade is concerned, the men engaged in it, have over and over again told me, and have said so publicly that they could manage that trade very well without any government interference, that all they required was transportation facilities afforded by cold storage, and these they say, they have received very effectively in the last three years, through the contracts my department was enabled to make.

As regards our fruit trade in England, I believe that something more should be done. There is on the Order paper, a Bill which I have introduced, with regard to the marking of our packages of fruit going to England, and there are other things in connection with this cold storage, which, when the vote comes up, I propose to suggest, as probable steps to be taken in this coming year. I have not, however, taken any steps that I might call of a commercial nature in the government side, of dealing with our products in England. I have believed that that was best left to the commercial channels, which are well known and well established, and that our commercial men were, perhaps, better able to deal with that than any government officials could be.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, Mr. Chairman, the hon. minister has stated that he does not intend to take any steps directly under the control of the government—

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Of a commercial nature.

Mr. MONTAGUE—Of a commercial nature—for the purpose of having our products sold in the old country as distinctively Canadian products. He definitely states his policy in that matter. I am very sorry that he has come to that conclusion. The hon. gentleman intimates, though he does not exactly say it, that our products are all sold as Canadian products at the present time. This, I regret to say, is a great mistake. It is quite true that everything has to be marked with the name of the country from which it comes, but the hon. gentleman knows as well as I know and as well as other gentlemen who have looked into the subject know, that that only refers to the first sale, and, sometimes, not even to the first sale itself. The hon. gentleman can appoint all the inspectors he likes and he will fail in advertising Canada and Canadian products unless he devises some means by which the consumer will be able to know, when he purchases these products, that they are Canadian products. Now, I am bound to say that our meat products, our dairy products, our fruit are of a sufficiently high standard, are of a sufficiently excellent quality, to be an advertisement for Canada, for all time, if the consumer knows that he is purchasing Canadian products. But, if the hon. gentleman has gone through the shops of London or Glasgow, he must have found cheese, which, if he knows the distinctive marks of Canadian cheese, he has found to be Canadian, being sold by the retail dealers as first-class British cheese. It is true, there is no fraud on the purchases, but there is a fraud on Canada, because we miss the advertisement that the excellence of these products should give us among the people of Great Britain. I tested that many times myself. I am not an expert, but I was instructed by Professor Robertson how to distinguish Canadian cheese, and, time after time, I found it in London shops, being offered as British cheese, and a high price charged for it, while some of the toughest-looking product you could find would be put up as Canadian cheese.

Now, when the late government were in office, they intended to establish a system by which depots would be opened for the sale of Canadian products, and we brought down a vote to this House for that purpose. Our idea was to establish shops in London, Glasgow and two or three other large cities in the United Kingdom. We did not intend to interfere with the regular course of trade, but to take advantage of the regular course of trade.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. May I interrupt the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) to ask him a question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, certainly.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. What vote was that, and when was it brought down?

Mr. MONTAGUE. It was in 1896; and the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) objected to it, and would not allow a dollar to go through. The hon. gentleman will find the debate in Hansard. As I was saying, we did not intend to interfere with the regular course of trade, for I recognize that if you do that you raise prejudice against us and thus injure us with the people who have the handling of these products, and they may pass them by. Our idea was to get dealers in these large cities, to ask them to establish shops or use the shops which they have already established, and have on exhibition and on sale in these shops nothing but Canadian products; to have butter, cheese, meat, fruit, and every other product of which Canada is capable of shipping to the mother country, and have them labelled as Canadian, and thus not only open a market for our products, but, at the same time, to advertise Canada as a great agricultural, fruit-growing and dairy country. Now, apropos of that very subject, here is an article in the Farmers' Advocate of March 15 last. It deals with this subject by correspondence from the old country. If the House will permit me, I would like to read a few paragraphs from this article. It clinches what I have said, and shows our weakness in the market of Great Britain at the present time. The correspondent says:

Amongst matters likely to interest your readers, I know of none more so than the question of imported Canadian produce; I mean those commodities which you produce in larger quantities than you consume, shipping the balance to our markets. It is needless going through a long list of articles, for the principle at stake in one is pretty much the same in respect to others; for instance, there is bacon, known to be sent us in large quantities from your country, and, according to reports of its purchasers, as judged by the value it realizes here, of excellent quality; yet, strange though it may appear to your readers, though I am constantly in London and at many of the leading towns of England, I do not know that I have ever seen any shop or store, as you call them, where Canadian bacon is sold. Then, again, in respect to cheese, American is the general tune; then, in respect to butter, the tune is colonial, which includes a lot of different colonies, but no individual one; and thus one after another of your exports might be enumerated, and few, if any, would be found to be sold as Canadian. This surely is not as it should be. I prefer, as an Englishman, to spend my money for English produce, and hence, would naturally prefer to buy that produce within the limits of the empire rather than from other sources. Then, again, every tub should stand upon its own bottom, or, in other words, the country producing any commodity should either have the credit or discredit, as the case may be. This matter is one that needs the attention of your authorities, it being, of course, impossible for purchasers to discriminate between the produce of one country and another; hence, it appears to me that it would be a grand thing, and a great benefit to your country, to have a central depot in London or Liverpool, or both, and small branches in other centres, whereat Canadian products only should be sold, and depend upon it, if those products were of that high merit and quality those were that I had the privilege of sampling when on my trip in Canada, the demand would soon be found to repay the cost incurred. What I want to bring home to your readers, who are practically the producers of most, if not all, the commodities which would be affected, is the bare, startling fact that a far larger proportion of the Canadian produce sent us is sold under some other name than Canadian, possibly a good deal goes for English produce; but whatever may be the description under which it is sold matters not, for it does not alter that fact, namely, that Canadian farmers and producers are not receiving nearly all the benefits the high merit and quality of their products merit.

Mr. WOOD. Who is the writer of that?

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is not signed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) can see it.

Mr. WOOD. I will give the hon. gentleman an instance—

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) will allow me another word—he is looking up the vote to which I referred, and he will see that the present Minister of Trade and Commerce objected to the vote we brought down. We proposed to establish the depots to which the correspondent refers; and I think it was greatly against the interest of the Canadian producer that the hon. Minister of Agriculture did not follow that plan and place our products as distinctively Canadian products upon the markets of Great Britain, by which means our products would have a wider sale and Canada would have the advertisement as well.

Mr. A. T. WOOD (Hamilton). I do not know when the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), was in England last, but I have been in the habit of going there for many years, and frequently living there during the winter, and I can tell the hon. gentleman that I have seen Canadian goods advertised in the leading produce houses in London. Take, for instance, Hudson Bros., of Ludgate Hill, one of the largest dealers, almost, in butter, cheese and beacon to be found in England. These people have warehouses throughout the large towns of England, and in Bournemouth where I lived for several winters—

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is not wholesale.

Mr. WOOD. They wholesale in London, and have warehouses in the various large towns where they retail goods just as people want them, five pounds of beacon, or ten pounds of butter, or cheese, or whatever quantity you want.

Mr. TAYLOR. They deal exclusively in butter and cheese.

Mr. WOOD. Butter, cheese, eggs, beacon, hams and all that class of goods. I am aware that instead of selling Canadian goods for English goods or goods of any other country, these retailers take pride in saying to their customers that they were the products of Canada. I am sure that if the hon. gentleman has visited England within the last three or four years he has found that Canadian produce for sale was plainly advertised as Canadian produce, the country from which it comes is not hidden. I think the hon. gentleman should give the Minister of Agriculture a little more credit for the efforts he is making in securing to the Canadian farmers all the advantages that can be obtained by the cold storage that he has really been the author of.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WOOD. Yes, I am speaking of the real cold storage business, not the ice storage that was a failure in every respect. I say he is the author of the mechanical cold storage that is now provided on the leading ships, and which he is going to continue for the advantage of Canadian farmers. I merely rose to correct the hon. gentleman's statement that Canadian dairy produce as a rule was sold as coming from some other country. The dealers in Canadian products in England are so satisfied of the good quality of the products of Canada that they are proud to be able to say to the people that they come from Canada.

Mr. J. FEATHERSTON (Peel). The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), says that the retailers in England do not know what produce comes from Canada. I say that there is no man in business in England selling fruit or other produce of Canada, but what knows the kind of articles he is handling. I say the retailer knows very well where the article comes from that he is handling, but the great trouble is that the consumer does not know. The retailer is in the business to make money and the consumer is the man that has to pay the money.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is what I meant to say, that we ought to have a system by which the purchaser should know what he was purchasing.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. That is what I say. I may mention that Mr. Flatt of Milgrove, Ont., told me the other day that when he was over in England for over two months this winter, having a good deal of time at his disposal, he went into some of the shops for the sale of Canadian bacon and ham. In one of the shops, after examining the bacon, he said to the dealer: What do you call this? Why, that is Canadian pea-fed. Mr. Flatt said: You cannot fool me, that is American fat pork, for we do not produce any such pork in Canada. Then the dealer said that it was Canadian pea-fed. That is one argument why we should have the produce of Canada branded. I am satisfied that until that is done the consumer in England is defrauded nine times out of ten. I believe, as Mr. Flatt says, that these men will pass this American bacon off on the consumers of England as Canadian bacon, and if there is not some move made our trade is going to be damaged with the consumers of England. He also told me that every one of the Wiltshire sides of bacon was branded with a red hot iron, so there can be no deception as to the Wiltshire bacon. I think the system proposed by the late Minister of Agricultural for handling our products would have been a good thing, as it was outlined by Professor Robertson, it would have been an experiment which might have been a success. I am afraid that unless we adopt this system of branding bacon so that no deception can be practised on the English market, Canadian interests will suffer. We have already established a good trade there, but we need to take steps to maintain it, otherwise we should lose it shortly. I think the minister should take hold of this thing in a practical way, and not leave it to the commissioner. All our produce should be put on the English market in such a shape that there can be no mistake in the minds of the English consumers about its being of Canadian origin; and the sooner that is done the better for Canada.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like the minister to tell us what success has been reached with regard to the shipment of fruit under the new system which he calls mechanical cold storage. I would remark also that the hon. gentleman is fond of pluming himself on having been the parent, almost, the inventor, of this system, although he does admit that before the Conservatives went out of power Professor Robertson knew, and everybody else knew, there was a system of mechanical cold storage, and the hon. gentleman has adopted that. Let me show when he adopted it. Professor Robertson was examined on the 9th of May, 1899, before the Committee on Agriculture, and this is what he said in the presence of the hon. gentleman himself:

The department has also been in correspondence with the owners of steamships, and they have promised to provide ventilated chambers.

That seems to be the first time the hon. gentleman adopted that system. I may be wrong, but it would appear that it is only since the 9th of May last, that this system of mechanical cold storage has been adopted by the hon. gentleman. Now he has left the impression that the moment he came in the whole thing blossomed out, he abandoned the old method, and he set aside what he called the one-horse system of cold storage. I do not know what made the hon. gentleman change his mind. I would like him to tell the House what he was doing all these years between the time he made the discovery that this was a one-horse system and the 9th of May last. I tell the hon. gentleman it is not much to his credit, if he knew three years ago there was a better system, that the old system was a one-horse system, and it is only since the 9th of May last that the new system has been put on foot.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Mr. Chairman, before the motion is put I would like to reply to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy). Perhaps he will send me over that report.

Mr. CLANCY. Yes.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman, evidently, has misunderstood the whole question. The hon. gentleman must know, if he has thought about it at all, that what is known as mechanical cold storage was arranged for and supplied by, I think, seventeen vessels sailing from the ports of Montreal, Quebec and St. John as long ago as 1897, or immediately after I came into office. The hon. gentleman might have heard the explanation given this afternoon that all the contracts then made for three years expired last winter. The hon. gentleman takes a report dealing with an entirely different subject containing some words of Professor Robertson and appeals to it to show that only last May I undertook to introduce mechanical cold storage.

Mr. CLANCY. I am sure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) does not wish to mislead the House. I am going to ask the hon. gentleman what Professor Robertson meant by that. It was to be applied to cheese, butter, fruits and to all classes of goods.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman is interrupting me, and I am just going to tell him and to show the House how utterly ignorant the hon. gentleman is as to this very thing which he has been quoting. This was a reference by Professor Robertson to a request made by us to the steamship companies to improve the ordinary cargo capacity of their vessels by introducing electrical fans and ventilating chambers into them to carry fruit or cheese. Professor Robertson was discussing the question of cheese and apples being carried over under about the same conditions. For years our fruit and cheese had been carried in the ordinary holds of the vessels. Complaint having been made as to the ventilation of these holds, Professor Robertson and myself, when in England two years ago, went to the head offices of the shipping firms which trade with Canada asking them, in addition to cold storage accommodation which is an entirely different thing, to introduce electrical fans in their ventilating shafts so as to ventilate and secure a current of air through the ordinary holds of their vessels where cheese and apples are so largely stored. That was the reference which Professor Robertson made in this report which the hon. gentleman has quoted from. He undertakes to show from that report, dealing with an entirely different subject, that I did not introduce cold storage until last May. If the hon. gentleman has ever known anything about cold storage, or if he has ever dealt with the cold storage question, or listened to a discussion of the question in this House, he ought to know that mechanical cold storage was introduced in 1897 for the first time in Canadian vessels by contracts made by myself.

Mr. FISHER.

An hon. gentleman asked me a few minutes ago to explain the difference between mechanical cold storage and ice refrigeration, or cold storage. Ice cold storage is simply an insulated chamber in the ship into which a certain quantity of ice is put to keep the chamber cold. When the ice melts the chamber warms and the ice may have to be replaced during the voyage. Under any circumstances the placing of ice in a cold storage chamber is comparatively an ineffective method of cooling the chamber. It was the old method used for a long time before mechanical cold storage was invented.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Were any of the products spoiled in transit?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They were deteriorated in value.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Butter, for instance. There was very little of anything but butter sent.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, cheese and fruit were sent.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Fruit was not sent to any extent.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Only about to the same extent as the hon. gentleman sent it. A trial shipment was sent, which failed, and the hon. gentleman's trial shipment failed too.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I will show him the records.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No, I am not mistaken.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The cold storage in use then was found not to be satisfactory and Professor Robertson recommended that it be changed. I understand Professor Robertson to say that he wished to have mechanical cold storage introduced earlier. The hon. gentleman voted a certain sum for providing cold storage in these years. I must give the hon. gentleman credit by saying that he was only a short time at the head of the department, and that during a large portion of that time he was in England ill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What I mean is this: I think the hon. gentleman will not say that Canadian products deteriorated to any great extent under that system.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes. I most emphatically say, that, under that system, the butter which arrived in England was not found to be in a much superior condition to the butter which had been carried before that cold storage was inaugurated. Since mechanical cold storage has been established the reputation of our butter has been increasing in the English market to such an extent that to-day it stands in the highest rank, a position which it did not attain before the introduction of mechanical refrigeration. I must say a word in reply to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), having answered the question of the hon. member for Bothwell. The hon. member for Haldimand spoke about his experience in England. I do not know what the hon. gentleman's movements have been; I do not know if he has been in England since 1896. I may tell the hon. gentleman and the committee that the condition of things in England has changed very much since 1896. It is quite true, that before 1896, and perhaps for that season, Canadian products were frequently sold under different names on the English market. It was quite common for these Canadian products to be marked 'British,' but, since 1897, since the Jubilee year, when Canada came so much to the front and when Canada inaugurated her preferential trade arrangement in favour of the mother country, from that day, and increasingly so, every day, every month, and every year, Canadian products have been at such a premium in the English market that not only do dealers in the English market have to mark them Canadian products and nothing else, but, to-day, they are prompted to mark things that are not Canadian products as Canadian products, because they find they can get a better market and a better price for the products of Canada.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is an extraordinary thing that that correspondent writes in such a tone.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That gentleman must have had a different experience from mine, but, having been in England since the hon. member for Haldimand was I may tell him that I saw Canadian products marked Canadian products in the shop windows of London, Liverpool and Manchester, which were flaming with cards calling attention to these products.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That was not the experience of Mr. Flatt, quoted by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Featherston).

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Excuse me, the hon. gentleman is going a little too far. The hon. gentleman says that Mr. Flatt had seen Canadian products not marked Canadian products, but that he had seen American products marked Canadian, which confirms what I said that the people in Great Britain are tempted to mark American products as Canadian products for the sake of the better price which Canadian products bring on the English market. The hon. gentleman is convicted by what he said himself and by what was said by the hon. member for Peel.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then why the exhortation of the hon. member for Peel to the minister to do something at once?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) is arguing that the government should do something.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is what the hon. member for Peel is arguing.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, and the hon. gentleman himself wants us to do something. Does the hon. gentleman want us to go to England and pass laws in England prescribing what shall be done there? Does the hon. gentleman undertake to say that the parliament of Canada should control the retailer in England and say how he shall market his goods? As a matter of fact, we have done a great deal, and as much as we are able to do. We have gone to this extent, that we have required that all our products, exported from Canada, shall be marked 'Canadian.' When they get to England that mark may be wiped out, but, from what I said a few moments ago, it may be gathered that it is not in the interest of the dealers handling these products to erase these marks, thereby depreciating their value, but rather, to make them more conspicuous. As a matter of fact, the best exporters of Canadian bacon brand their names on the sides, and it is sold as Canadian bacon in the English market where it has a high reputation. There is no doubt that the Englishman has a strong prejudice in favour of the home product as against anything that comes from abroad, and Canadian bacon may not be fancied quite as highly in England as is the English bacon.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would the minister compare 1896 with 1899, and take up the question of our shipments of agricultural products to England. The hon. gentleman says that under the preferential tariff our trade immediately extended wonderfully. Does the minister know that the percentage of what England imports, sold by Canada in 1899, is much less than the percentage sold to England by Canada in 1896?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The percentage of what?

Mr. MONTAGUE. All agricultural products, meats and dairy products generally.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. What do you mean?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I mean the percentage of England's total imports.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I quite believe that, but as a matter of fact Canada has exported all that she produced for export.

Mr. MONTAGUE. So she did in the other years.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, not by a long way. Canada could not then export because she had not the facilities and she had not the reputation in the English market. Since 1896 the English market has extended marvellously. The English people are richer since then, and they are importing a great deal more and eating more. They have asked for and obtained every pound of butter and cheese and beef and other products which Canadians could send them. While that has been going on, the hon. gentleman is aware that Canada has been extending in another direction, and that under the beneficent rule of the present government Canadian markets have also been much better for the products of the farm.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Owing to the beneficent policy of the late government.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Well, it did not eventuate under the late government, and the hon. gentleman can try to salve over his chagrin by thinking that the influence of his work has continued to the present. As a matter of fact Canadian exports have increased enormously in all these articles mentioned by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague). They have increased to the extent that the people of Canada could produce, and for the last two years England would have taken more butter and more cheese from Canada if she could get it. Last year Canadian cheese and Canadian butter could have been exported much more largely, but they were not made in Canada to be exported.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Quite so.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The reason of that has nothing to do with cold storage or transportation, or the English market, but was two-fold in its character—

Mr. MONTAGUE. And nothing to do with the preferential tariff?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, it had. The demand for these articles was created in England, in consequence of the preference tariff. The reputation of our goods depends solely on their being tried and tasted.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman need not continue his argument—

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have been pretty patient in allowing interruptions, and I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) might permit me to finish my sentence. The quality of Canadian goods is such that when the Englishman once tastes them he wants more of them. Until the preference tariff the Englishman did not taste the Canadian article under the Canadian name. But, when he appreciated what the parliament of Canada had done by giving that preference, he was anxious to taste Canadian products, and once having tasted them he found them so good that he asked for more. He got just all the farmers of Canada could send him last year, and they did not send so much as they otherwise might, because they found a good and ready market at home, in a prosperous country, where the population is increasing, and where the people are able to pay for better things. These exports cannot be increased in a day or in a month. It takes time to grow more cows, to produce more milk to make butter and cheese; and the increase has to be regular and steady and gradual. The increase has been regular and steady and gradual to an enormous degree, and it has been just as great as the development of the country could possibly admit of. These are the reasons why, in comparing the percentages of English imports, it may appear that Canada has not done so well in proportion to others, but that is no reflection in any way on the Canadian producer, or on the quality of the Canadian products, or on the transportation facilities to England.

Mr. TAYLOR. The minister would have us believe that he inaugurated this mechanical cold storage in 1897, and from that day to the present it has been a success. In 1898, he tried the experiment with fruit, and the Auditor General's Report for 1899 (B-47), shows that he invested $3,088.58 in a trial shipment. If his system was perfect in 1897, why was he experimenting in 1898, and why are the returns from that fruit 'nil'? According to the Auditor General's Report, there is not one cent returned for this $3,088 worth of fruit sent to England under his magnificent mechanical cold storage system. Does he not know that under the old system these trial shipments brought back a revenue. Let the minister explain what became of the $3,088.58 that he paid to some of his friends around Niagara for peaches, pears and apples.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The explanation is very simple, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) had attended the meetings of the Agriculture Committee last year he would know it. The government did not purchase any fruit to send to England. That fruit was sent by certain exporters who wished to create a market in England for their grapes and peaches. Some of the fruit did not seem to be suitable to the English market, or did not bear the transportation, not because the cold storage did not work, but because the fruit was bruised in the handling.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Was it not inspected?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It was inspected when it left here, and when it arrived in England it was put upon the market. The fruit was not the property of the government, but of private individuals.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, but the reputation of Canada was at stake, and a most careful inspection should have taken place.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I grant you. The experiment was carried on by the representatives of the Fruit Growers' Association. All we did was to guarantee them the value of their fruit at the point of shipment, and the reason no counter receipts appear is, that the expenditure indicated there represents the loss on that fruit, and was not the cost of the original purchase. Several times the Fruit Growers' Association sent this fruit, and although Prof. Robertson thought the experiment was not likely to be successful, yet they were so eager to have their fruit placed on the English market that we yielded. The loss was largely on grapes, which arrived in England in good order, but which did not seem to suit the palate of the English people. The fruit-growers have said over and over again that our grapes are not the same as the English public are accustomed to, and we shall very likely require a considerable time to experiment before our grapes can be placed on the English market. The losses to which the hon. gentleman has alluded were in connection with these shipments.

Mr. TAYLOR. I alluded to the sums paid by the government for these articles, and the names and the prices are given here.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The government paid the difference between what was received and the value of the articles at the point of shipment.

Mr. TAYLOR. Under your successful mechanical cold storage, this is what you paid: W. J. Andrews, Grimsby, 118 cases of pears at 46 cents a case; 162 cases of tomatoes at 33 cents a case. That is the full price for tomatoes at Niagara; and surely the tomatoes grown in Ontario are the same as the tomatoes grown all over the world. Apples, 24 cases at 43 cents; grapes, 28 cases at 43 cents, amounting to $130. The Grand Trunk Railway freight charges were $72. John H. Grout of Grimsby, veneer baskets for grapes, $100. D. J. McKinnon, Grimsby, 364 cases of pears at 46 cents; 89 cases of peaches at $1.23—the full price; 45 cases of tomatoes at 33 cents; apples, 35 large cases at $1; one small case at 43 cents; grapes, 150 cases at 53 cents; amounting to $392.35. The Ontario Box Company, Limited, of Hamilton, fruit boxes, 10,141 at 5½ cents, 2,507 at 6 cents; teamage, $80.83; making, $789. A. H. Pettit & Son, Grimsby, pears, 607 cases at 46 cents; peaches, 10 cases at $1.23; tomatoes, 37 cases at 33 cents; apples, 38 cases at 43 cents; grapes, 38 cases at 43 cents. R. W. Sheppard, of Montreal, fruit shipped to Great Britain, 11 cases. Geo. H. Smith & Son, Grimsby, 167 cases of peaches at $1.23. And so it goes on until $3,088.58 were paid out by this government for this fruit sent to England in this beautiful mechanical cold storage, and not one cent of return got for it. That is the beautiful system which this hon. gentleman claims the credit of having inaugurated, while the fact is that Prof. Robertson inaugurated the first system, which proved successful for the shipment of butter and cheese.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That was not the only system then in existence. The mechanical cold storage was in use in all parts of the world.

Mr. TAYLOR. It was the system which Professor Robertson suggested to the government, and which they adopted. Then Professor Robertson suggested improvements to the hon. gentleman, which he adopted, but which have not worked so well, because the whole of the fruit sent to the old country under it was lost. The Minister of Agriculture claims to be the party who inaugurated this mechanical system, overriding Professor Robertson altogether; but I am quite satisfied that Professor Robertson recommended it to this government, as he recommended the other system to the late government. He did not get the information from the Minister of Agriculture. If he did, and adopted the system to please the minister, perhaps this is the reason this fruit was spoiled.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. He managed this fruit shipment.

Mr. TAYLOR. Perhaps he had to manage it under the system the hon. gentleman forced upon him, and that may be the reason the fruit was spoiled. The minister acknowledged that the fruit sent in 1897 was a failure as well. There was a little credit given then.

Mr. WOOD. What was the loss in the butter sent by the late government?

Mr. TAYLOR. When the late government was in power I recommended them to appoint a man at Montreal to brand every article of Canadian produce that was sent out of the country. Mr. Berney was appointed for that purpose, and every case of butter and cheese that went to England was branded as Canadian. But the moment this government came in, they had no use for that officer and dismissed him.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There has been a man there ever since.

Mr. TAYLOR. That was an excuse to dismiss Mr. Berney, and to put one of their friends in his place—not for the purpose of branding, because goods are not being branded to-day, and butter and cheese is going out of Canada not branded.

The MINISTER OF ARGICULTURE. Might I ask the hon. gentleman whether he makes that statement advisedly, that the goods are not being branded to-day, and that butter and cheese are going out of Canada not branded ?

Mr. TAYLOR. I make the statement that the government dismissed Mr. Berney.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is not the question. The hon. gentleman makes the statement that goods are not being branded to-day, and I ask him whether he makes that statement advisedly or recklessly, like too many other statements made on that side of the House ?

Mr. TAYLOR. I accept it from the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Featherston), who made that statement a few moments ago.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. member for Peel did not say anything of that kind.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Peel did say that Canadian goods were sold in England under another name.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is a very different thing.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know that the hon. gentleman dismissed Mr. Berney, saying that there was no necessity for him, and put another officer in his place. That is only what this government are doing all along the line. As the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals said the other day, they appointed a newspaper man to inspect the Rideau Canal.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman has no right to refer to a former debate.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am only illustrating what this government are doing. The hon. minister says now that they have a man there doing that work, as they always follow the footsteps of the late government in anything that is right. The hon. member for Peel fairly lectured the Minister of Agriculture and the government for their negligence in this business ; but when the Minister of Agriculture says that he inaugurated this cold storage system, and that nothing was done until this government came into power, he makes a statement that is not in accordance with the fact. He had to admit that the late government established a cold storage system in 1895.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have always said that.

Mr. TAYLOR. The ice plant did not involve the loss of $3,000 of the people's money in experimenting on fruit. Under that system the fruit was sold and the country got a return from it ; but under the hon. gentleman's mechanical system, the fruit was lost.

Mr. WOOD. Will the hon. gentleman tell me how much return was made from the butter that was bought for 20 cents a pound and sold in England for 16 cents a pound by the late government ?

Mr. TAYLOR. I will refer the hon. gentleman to Prof. Robertson, who was managing the dairy department then, as he is now. Prof. Robertson experimented on butter, and if he made a loss, I am not aware of it, but he will be able to supply the exact data. The late government had nothing to do with it ; they simply allowed him to try the experiment of having the butter sent over and sold as a Canadian product. He proposed doing that in every town and village in the old country. He proposed having an agent appointed in every town and village, who would sell Canadian goods as such, and educate the people of Great Britain into using these products. But this government would not allow Prof. Robertson to carry out that scheme, which the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Featherston), says the Minister of Agriculture ought to carry out, even at this late hour. Prof. Robertson tried the experiment of having these goods sold on their merits, as Canadian products, and if a little money was lost, the advertisement was well worth it.

There was not a loss of $3,888 in 1898, or any other year, by the late government experimenting on the shipping of fruit by cold storage, which the hon. Minister of Agriculture says was a success from the time he encouraged it.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. What I said was that the experiment proposed by Prof. Robertson might have been a good one, and that unless our products were branded Canadian people would not get the benefit. The retail dealers, in England, are selling to-day, and have been all along, American products as Canadian products, and getting better prices on that account.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Taylor), has made some particularly strong statements, which are absolutely lacking in accuracy. I did not care to take the trouble of making him withdraw most of them, but there was one statement concerning which I asked him, whether he made it advisedly or not, and immediately he dropped it and declined to go on with it, and took up other things. I regret to say that other statements he made are equally unreliable.

He said that I made the claim to have inaugurated cold storage. That was an absolute misconception.

Mr. TAYLOR. You said that in your speech at Sherbrooke.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There is not a speech I made, either at Sherbrooke or anywhere else, in which I said anything of the kind. I defy the hon. gentleman to show any speech of mine in which I claim to have inaugurated cold storage. But I said, over and over again, that I started mechanical cold storage in this country, and so I did. I also said in Sherbrooke that the late government had experimented with cold storage, but it was only a one-horse storage.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That was in the House.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If so, I repeated it elsewhere.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You would not repeat yourself?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, hon. gentlemen opposite, repeat themselves so often, that if I did not repeat myself sometimes in reply, the public might think I accepted their reckless statements.

As far as Prof. Robertson is concerned, it is to be regretted that his name should be so frequently used in debate. My own conception of ministerial responsibility is that the ministers should assume the responsibility for their officials, and that I am quite ready to do. Prof. Robertson was no doubt a faithful and good servant, before I came to the office, just as he has been since. He has done a lot of very good work for the Dominion. I was glad when he was appointed years ago, and endorsed his appointment, and was glad to find him an officer of my department. I found him a useful and faithful officer, with whom I have been glad to consult in all that I have done in connection with this work, and whose technical knowledge has been of great advantage to me. It is unfortunate, I repeat, that his name should be bandied about in the way it has been, by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. E. B. OSLER (West Toronto). I do not wish to object to any expenditure in this way. In fact, I rather think the government are remiss entirely in not spending enough. So far from the government being entitled to credit for their cold storage business, they are to blame entirely. That system has not made one-tenth the advance since this government came to power, that it should have made, if properly carried on. It is rather amusing to hear the arguments used by the hon. minister and his supporters. If they will turn to the Hansard of last year, they will find that the hon. Minister of Agriculture then gave as a reason why he reduced the grant for cold storage from $100,000 to $85,000—the only piece of economy which his government ever attempted to perpetrate—that the government cold storage experiment had been entirely successful, and there was no further need of spending money. That was repeated over and over again, in the debate of July 27, 1899. The position taken by the hon. minister was objected to very strongly by members on this side, and by many on his own. However, he persisted in reducing the expenditure from $100,000 to $85,000. Of all the foolish things this government has done—and it has done many—that is one of the most foolish.

The statement made by the Minister of Agriculture that because of the preferential tariff, the whole of the population practically of Great Britain and Ireland, were rushing about, from shop to shop, to find out something that came from Canada, is perfectly absurd. Why, there is not one man in ten thousand in the country towns in England, outside the men who take an interest in politics, who knows that there is a preferential trade between Canada and Great Britain to-day. There is not one in a hundred who knows what a preferential tariff means, and to say that our fruit and butter and cheese are being consumed to a greater extent because of this magnificent piece of statesmanship, the preferential tariff, caps the climax of all the absurdities to which those hon. gentlemen have given utterance.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. Where have they a better system of cold storage than we have in Canada?

Mr. OSLER. Go to the Niagara district, go to almost any district in Ontario, and you will find that there has been no attempt to instruct the people how to pack their fruit. Their apples are packed badly and their plums and other fruits. We have only touched the fringe of instructing the people in the proper preservation of their fruits. And I contend that it would pay this country, for the government to spend $200,000 a year, for ten years, for the purpose alone of thoroughly instructing our producers how to grow and how to pack their fruit, and then you should have no difficulty of finding a market for it in Great Britain.

Mr. F. T. FROST (Leeds and Grenville). My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Osler), has just said that very few people in England know anything about the preferential tariff. I have under my hand, clippings from over fifty newspapers in England and Scotland, referring to this preferential tariff. If the newspapers are exponents of public opinion, the public must be pretty well informed as to what the preference is that this country is giving to Great Britain. We have heard to-day considerable discussion of this question of cold storage. It is plainly evident that the Minister of Agriculture has made a complete success of it, or it would not have been denounced by the opposition in such unmeasured terms as we have heard this afternoon and evening. We have heard about the fast Atlantic service. Mr. Chairman, I never was a very strong advocate of the project, and, since the Minister of Agriculture has been able to secure from twenty to twenty-five steamships for an expenditure in the neighbourhood of $80,000 or $85,000 to transport our fruit, dairy products, poultry and other perishable articles to Great Britain, I say it would have been madness on the part of this government to have paid $750,000 a year for four steamers which could not possibly have transported the products that have been transported within the last year or two. These four steamers would not have been able to cope with the extension of trade that we have witnessed under the present government and the present Minister of Agriculture. I am very glad for my part, that the fast Atlantic service was a failure—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FROST. Yes, I am glad that it was a failure. I believe it would have been madness on the part of this country to spend $750,000 for such a service, for you could not have got over two thousand tons of cold storage in these steamers, while we have nearly twenty steamers subsidized with nearly double that amount each, and it will not cost more than about $80,000 a year. That, I think, is evidence that the course pursued by the government in regard to cold storage and the transportation of our products has been a wise one under the circumstances. Further than this, considerable has been said to-day in regard to their not having these contracts ratified before the war broke out. That is as much as to say that the Minister of Agriculture should have foresight and forethought beyond almost human power, that he should have been better informed than even the government in England with all their great ability and statesmanship. It is a well known fact that the government in England never supposed for one moment that the war would take place, otherwise they would have been better prepared for it when it broke out. They expected that diplomacy would have settled the question. But hon. gentlemen opposite condemn the Minister of Agriculture, because he did not possess that prescience, that forethought that could not have been found in any other statesman either on this side of the water or on the other side. I think that manifestly unfair. Here are contracts with a number of vessels running for three years, some of them running out last January. We find that vessels are hurriedly pressed into the service of conveying troops and supplies to South Africa, and, as a consequence, there is scarcity of transportation. Under these circumstances, the Minister of Agriculture has simply to go into the market and make the best arrangements he can. It has been the same thing with every business interest upon the continent during the last year. Go into any business establishment and you could not make a contract. I do not know a man who could have made a contract for iron or steel or many other things during the last few months, simply because the people in these industries were so crowded with work that it was not possible for them to make a contract. It was the same with our ship-owners. They could not enter into a contract with the Minister of Agriculture, because they were not able to say positively that they would have ships for that purpose. Then, again, they could not make contracts at the old prices. There has been a general increase in freights all round. But it has been shown this afternoon that the contracts made by the Minister of Agriculture, notwithstanding that they are 50 per cent in advance of the old prices, are from 25 per cent to 40 and 50 per cent less than those made for cold storage running out of any American port. That is evidence, I think, that the Minister of Agriculture has carefully guarded the interests of the agricultural class of Canada, and that he is doing all that is possible for any man to do under the present circumstances, which are abnormal as we all know.

Now, we were told by the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), that the Minister of Agriculture had left the agricultural population to drop, that there would be no cold storage. The hon. Minister of Agriculture has stated plainly that he will have twenty-eight steamers with cold storage facilities running out of Montreal and Quebec during this season. I think that is evidence that he has not allowed the agricultural population to drop. In any case, we have from fifteen to twenty lines of steamers running between Canada and Great Britain, and the proprietors of these lines of steamers themselves are anxious to have freight go in cold storage, and there is competition amongst them. We must not forget that there is the interest of the ship-owners as well as the interest of the people of Canada themselves. This competition certainly creates a demand and there always will be, under the present circumstances, ships carrying our produce. I rose more to correct my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Osler) than for anything else. I received these clippings from British papers only a few days ago. The shipments of products from Canada to the United Kingdom have grown so enormously, have increased so rapidly, that if there is any one in Canada to-day who is discontented with the administration of the Department of Agriculture, I am sure it cannot be the people who are directly interested—the farmers themselves. There never was a time in the history of Canada when the products of this country brought better prices, and when farming was paying better than at the present time. The price of land is going up all the time, and the farmers themselves are more contented than at any previous time in the history of this country. I think therefore we are justified in coming to the conclusion that the Department of Agriculture, under the present administration, has been more ably conducted and given more satisfactory results to the farming community as a whole than at any other time in the history of Canada.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers) The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Frost) has said that really there is no necessity for this fast line. I leave it to the hon. members here whether I am not correctly stating the words which fell from the hon. member. He even went beyond that, and he said it was a great advantage that there was no fast line, since the present Minister of Agriculture had provided all the needed facilities for the carrying of perishable goods to England. But will the hon. member tell me that he is so ignorant of the conditions of the contract entered into between the late government and the Allan Line as not to know that ample provision was made in that contract for cold storage on the fast line? It is evident that the fast line, in the opinion of the present government, is of very little consequence to this country. It is looked upon as a project that the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) can change every month when he goes from this side of the water to the other, and come back with new plans, new forms of steamers, bottle-necked or otherwise. The hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost) has given us the secret of all this delay. He says that it never was looked upon by his party as an important question, that it is unnecessary, he does not see the use of it.

Mr. FROST. The hon. gentleman misunderstands me. I simply spoke for myself, not for the government or for the party.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I know the influence which the hon. gentleman exercises within his own party, and I cannot think he would have voluntarily assumed the responsibility of declaring that the fast line was not necessary unless he was in accord with the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. It cannot be in his case as it is in the case of the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who differs from his party on almost every question. I would ask the hon. gentleman to consider the conditions upon which the contract for a fast line was entered into between the late government and the Allan Line and the Dominion Line. If the hon. gentleman, instead of quoting those innumerable extracts from newspapers, were to look into the projected contract as it was submitted to parliament, he would find that ample provision was made for cold storage. I want to call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that cold storage, important as it is, is not the only consideration in the establishment of a fast line between Canada and Great Britain. Canada has expended large amounts of money to build up a transcontinental railway, and to subsidize a line on the Pacific Ocean, and unless you have a fast line on the Atlantic it is impossible that the money which we have expended on the Canadian Pacific Railway and in subsidizing lines of steamers, can give any return to Canada. A policy which will combine a fast line service of steamers that will bring passengers and mails more quickly to Canada than at present, with ample cold storage for perishable goods which we send to Great Britain, is a policy which should appeal to the common sense of the business men of Canada.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost), speaking of the action of the government in connection with the fast Atlantic service, said that events had proved that the course they took was a wise one. Well, I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that a government cannot be complimented for taking a wise course if the result was not intended by them. Therefore, when he states that the course which the government took was a wise course, he is in so many words saying that the government, by the course which they did take with regard to this fast Atlantic service, have been in effect of humbugging the country; in other words, they foresaw the result of the action which they saw fit to take.

Mr. FROST. The wise course I referred to was the non-ratification of the first contract, and if the other contract has been allowed to lapse it is because of other circumstances that were practically beyond their control.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman made no such qualification in his remarks, but he makes it now. I think that hon. gentleman either voted for a motion authorizing that fast Atlantic service, or else he did not rise up and object to it. It has been well observed by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Sir Adolphe Caron), that while cold storage may be one of the objects which was to be attained by this fast Atlantic service, it was not the only object, and, perhaps, it was not the main object. The main objects, possibly, were the quicker conveyance of passengers and mails by a Canadian line from the old country to this country, connecting with our transatlantic line, the Canadian Pacific Railway and with the line of steamers which we are subsidizing between the western part of this continent and Asia. Even if the hon. gentleman had made good his proposition in regard to cold storage, which I do not think he has done, there still would remain very many considerations which would make it desirable and necessary that a government, acting in the best interests of the country, should subsidize this fast Atlantic service.

Mr. R. R. DOBELL (Quebec West). Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat astonished by the quiet assurance with which the hon.

member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) got up this evening and reviewed the fast line and condemned me in my absence, because, I generally regard it—

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I apologized for your absence.

Mr. DOBELL—as an act of courtesy, that, when an hon. gentleman is going to attack an hon. member who is not in the House he shall give him a little intimation before the time that he is going to speak. When it was my part to say a few words about this fast line, and when the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) was not in the House, I took occasion to find him and to intimate to him that I was going to speak upon the subject. I am exceedingly happy that I have the opportunity of saying a few words again on this fast line, and I hope to speak so distinctly and clearly that there may be no further misunderstanding of this matter. I would like to ask the hon. member for Three Rivers if he ever read that contract that he seems to be so much taken with.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. DOBELL. You really did?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I really did.

Mr. DOBELL. Because my impression is that you have not the slightest knowledge of that contract. I would like to ask, first, how many steamers was that service to be performed by. I pause for a reply. The Allans never signed a contract. They made a submission, and I have stated it so often that I think it ought to have impressed itself on the mind of that hon. gentleman who took me to task and reflected so much on my business career. I will let it speak for itself, because I am not afraid of the estimation in which my business career may be held, and I think it will stand when many careers will have been closed. The Allan contract was merely a submission, and a very extravagant submission when they asked this government to be bound for four months while they went around to see whether it could be carried out or not.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DOBELL. Yes.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman must recollect, as he has read the contract, probably oftener than I have, that the four months was given up completely by the Allans when the hon. leader of the opposition wrote to the present leader of the government and asked him to appeal to the Governor General to sanction the contract which had been entered into.

Mr. DOBELL. That engagement never was completed. It was suggested that if—that little word came in—the Allans were agreeable to strike out the four months' clause what would we then do. But that obligation was never entered into.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman gave me leave to interrupt him, but I am afraid I should not have interrupted him, because I have had no chance of telling him the position I have taken in the matter. The four months were put in as a condition by the Allans for the purpose of making some arrangements which they required to make, but when Lord Strathcona, the High Commissioner, cabled out to the leader of the government at the moment he told him that they were perfectly prepared to sign the contract without any reference to the four months. Now, this is in the printed book which the hon. gentleman's leader has placed on the Table of parliament.

Mr. DOBELL. Every one understands the nature of a contract, and no contract is considered complete until the matter is distinctly agreed to and signed. The proposal was made, I know, that, if under certain conditions the Allans were willing to complete it would we then agree. Lord Strathcona told me, himself, that they never came under the obligation to sign the contract without the four months' condition. He certainly told me that he thought they were prepared to do it, but they never came forward with a distinct and clear obligation to fulfil that contract. Therefore, it never was a contract.

Mr. OSLER. Was the Petersen contract fulfilled?

Mr. DOBELL. Most distinctly, and unfortunately—I say it because I do not believe any one in this House entered into it and devoted so much time and trouble to seeing that contract completed as I did myself, and I felt it to be a grievous disappointment to myself when it did not go through. When I extended the time, in England, for another six months, I would not do it without Charles Russell, our attorney in England, giving me a written document that he believed that if we would extend the time the matter would go through with Lord Tweedmouth as chairman and a directorate composed of men whose superiors in the operation of steamship lines you would have great difficulty in finding. Unfortunately the Spanish war broke out, and in this, as in all large contracts there was a distinct provision that in case of war between two nations the underwriters were not obligated to find the money to carry it out. But I am not going to dwell further upon this because the House must be weary of it. I will say this, that I still hope to have a fast line contract carried out in such a way as to provide a service that will be a credit to this country. I claim that if we had this fast line today we have no means whatever, up to the present time, of loading these steamers in the harbour of Quebec, and they could not have gone up to the port of Montreal. But, we are not idling and we are not giving ourselves up in despair. We are building a million bushel elevator in Quebec to-day, and if I can manage it we will have another 500,000 bushel elevator at Point Lévis on the other side of the river, so that these fast line steamers can get away without delay. This is a necessity. I would like to ask how many steamers were provided for in this fast line contract.

An hon. MEMBER. Four.

Mr. DOBELL. I take issue with the hon. gentleman. There was a distinct provision that they could do it with three steamers.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Four.

Mr. DOBELL. I point that out because that would not have satisfied the country. It would never have been as advantageous to this country as the facilities that are being provided in regard to cold storage. The hon. Minister of Agriculture last year provided cold storage in twenty-three steamers, and this year in twenty-seven steamers. Hon. gentlemen will realize that you want steamers for perishable goods sailing twice, or thrice, a week, and the question of a few days on a vessel does not amount to anything. The real advantage of a fast line of steamers is to carry our mails and passengers, and to have something for Canada faster and better than any steamers on the Atlantic. Such a service I will do my best to carry out, and I could hope that no better tribute should be pronounced to my memory than that I had carried out this fast Atlantic line. I will state that the firm of Hawthorne, Leslie & Co., kept their yard empty for six months to allow for the keels of the steamers that we contracted for, believing that Mr. Petersen was going to carry out his contract.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Very few people in England did.

Mr. DOBELL. I beg pardon. At one time every one believed in Peterson, and I am only sorry that his course was such that that confidence was withdrawn from him. I have given the best authority that that submission—I will not call it a contract—was never considered by the Colonial Office, and I may say further that it never was read. That is a fair statement in answer to the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron), who said that the contract was only waiting to be signed by us. Is there any one in this House who cannot appreciate the difference between a submission going into the Colonial Office, and lying there and never submitted to the Treasury authorities, and I say more, never read; cannot any member of the House appreciate the difference between that and what the hon.

gentlemen opposite state, viz.: That it was a contract agreed to by the British government and only awaiting our signature. Why, the British government never knew that the Allans had the privilege of doing the service with three steamers until I pointed it out. I hope that the next time the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) wants to bring up in the House any little scheme that I have made such a pet of as the fast line, he will give me notice.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I did not bring it up.

Mr. DOBELL. Pardon me, you brought it up the other day, and I trust that if you bring it up again, I will have an opportunity of being present, because I am not in the least ashamed of what has been done, and I believe we are going to benefit by not having the fast line accomplished before this. I have perfect faith in this style of steamer. The model is in Montreal now, and is admired by every one. Let me point out that the first steamer of that type was built in 1893, and there are now over forty of these steamers. The Glen Line, sailing from Glasgow, and the Johnston Line, from Liverpool, have adopted it, and you will see that it will be the type of the future.

Mr. CLARKE. Are the Glen Line and the Johnston Line noted as being fast lines? Are they not freight lines?

Mr. DOBELL. The Johnston Line and the Glen Line, sailing to Calcutta, carry passengers and freight.

Mr. SPROULE. It is interesting to note that one gentleman after another on the opposite side have proclaimed that there is no need of a fast line, and that there never was any need for it, while the minister in charge of promoting it, says that he expected to secure it, and that it would be valuable to the country. When the proposal was made in the House, did the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) say there was no need of a fast line?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. He did not declare that until the negotiations were a failure, and it was necessary to crawl out of it in some way. The hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost) says there is no need for a fast line to-day, but the members of the government he supports have told the people over and over again that there is urgent need for it. When they allowed the contract to fall through, they boasted that they had provided a substitute for $500,000 a year, while their predecessors required $750,000 a year for the service. Their supporters all over the country proclaimed to the people the good that had been accomplished by this business and far-sighted government in this respect—

Mr. WOOD. When the resolution was first introduced, I spoke from my place in the House against the fast line.

Mr. COCHRANE. You voted for it.

Mr. WOOD. I did not. I was always against it, because I was satisfied there was no necessity for it.

Mr. SPROULE. I must have been out of the House when the hon. member (Mr. Wood) made that declaration, because I never heard him make it. But, I did hear several gentlemen opposite applaud the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) when he declared that he had almost completed the contract with Petersen & Tate for a fast Atlantic service for $500,000 a year, for which their predecessors proposed to pay $750,000. They proclaimed the wisdom of the government all through the country for doing that, but now when the whole scheme has failed through, they make a virtue of necessity, and they tell us there is no need for a fast line. The hon. member (Mr. Frost) made a statement that requires a little attention. He told us that the cold storage system inaugurated by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) was a complete success.

Mr. FROST. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPROULE. If it was a complete success, how was it that the fruit sent to England was spoiled in transit?

Mr. FROST. We have never heard that the cold storage system has been in any way a detriment to the products that have been exported from this country. These products have been exported in greater quantity than ever before, and that is self-evident proof that cold storage is a perfect success.

Mr. SPROULE. It is self-evident to every one who has a grain of common sense, that if the cold storage was a complete success this fruit would have been landed in England in as good condition as when it left Canada. That fruit having been spoiled in transit, either the vessel owners failed to carry out their contract or the cold storage was a failure, and for either the minister (Mr. Fisher) is responsible. If the steamship companies failed he should have prosecuted them and made them adhere to their contract, and if they did not fail, then the kind of cold storage provided was not a success. The hon. member (Mr. Frost) had better learn more about it before he again tells this House that the cold storage system of the minister (Mr. Fisher) was a complete success. Every one in Canada who has taken any interest in the matter knows that his statement is not founded on fact. For months and months we have heard it heralded over the country by the government and their supporters, that the cold storage system of the late government was a failure, and that when they came into power they adopted another system which was a grand success in every way. Well, our experience in that fruit shipment proves that it was not a success. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) made the strange statement this afternoon that Mr. Grindley had made statements that were not in accordance with facts about this cold storage. How does the minister know that? His own official stated that the system was comparatively a failure, and yet, the minister who appointed Mr. Grindley to supervise that work says that Mr. Grindley exaggerated the defects in the system. We have a right to know how the minister came to that conclusion. It is a matter of importance for us to know whether what Mr. Grindley said was fact or fiction, and whether what the minister has stated is correct or incorrect. If the minister knows of his own personal knowledge that the system was a success, then he is justified in criticising his officer; but, if the minister got that information in some roundabout way, from an authority that could not be expected to be as reliable as his own expert under whose supervision the system was carried out, then the minister is not justified in making that statement. I think the Minister of Agriculture should give us some information about that. The hon. member for North Leeds and Grenville told us to-night that this system was a complete success. If it is, the hon. gentleman should give us a better demonstration of its success. Every person knows that fruit will keep in a proper degree of cold storage; and as this fruit did not keep, but was entirely destroyed before it reached the market in England, this, to my mind, is the best evidence that the system which the Minister of Agriculture introduced is as much a failure as that introduced by his predecessor.

Mr. A. T. WOOD (Hamilton). I want to say just one word in regard to the question of my supporting the fast Atlantic service. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, questioned the statement I made, that I had spoken against the resolution when it was first introduced, because, he said, he did not hear me.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman will excuse me, I did not question the statement he made. I said I must have been absent from the House when it was made. I do not question the correctness of the hon. gentleman's denial.

Mr. WOOD. I have to state now, as I did then, that I do not believe that Canada requires a fast Atlantic service. I do not think the farmers and the mechanics of this country are willing to be taxed $750,000 a year, for the purpose of giving certain parties an opportunity of travelling a little faster to the other side of the Atlantic than they can travel on the ordinary steamers. I stated, when I spoke on the subject before, that the Canadian route is not adapted to a fast line service. I have crossed the Atlantic, perhaps, as often as any gentleman in this House, except one, and it has been a rare thing for me to make the passage between Montreal and Liverpool, without having been detained hours, and sometimes days, by the ice. A vessel of seventeen or eighteen knots an hour, with a larger carrying capacity, is better for this country, than a faster steamer, with only a couple of thousand tons carrying capacity; because you cannot have a fast service and a good freight service combined. None of the fast steamers sailing from New York, carry any great amount of freight. It is impossible to combine the two to any advantage. The route by the Gulf of St. Lawrence is not suitable for a fast service. If the vessels started from St. John or Halifax, and got outside the ice belt, they might make fast time, even in a fog; but within the ice belt, no government would be justified in allowing vessels under their control, to run at the rate of 20 or 22 knots an hour. How do we expect to compete with a route, where the same state of affairs does not exist? It may do very well for some gentlemen around Quebec and Montreal to have the prestige of having a fast service; but it is not in the interest of the country, the country does not require it, and I tell the government that if they go to the country with a fast Atlantic service, as one of their planks, it will be of no advantage to them. I, for one, so long as I have a seat in this House, will raise my voice against the expenditure of $750,000 a year for a fast Atlantic service. It is not required, and I think the country would not support it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), stated that what he calls a submission, and what any ordinary member of parliament looked upon as a contract, was not a contract, and he gave as one of his reasons that it was subject to a delay of four months. I ventured to express the opinion that the four months clause had been withdrawn under the government, at the head of which was Sir Charles Tupper, and I said the withdrawal was contained in a blue-book which had been laid on the Table of parliament. To save the hon. gentleman the trouble of reading from these blue-books, I shall just quote from it, 'The Atlantic Steamship Line, between Great Britain and Canada,' brought down in 1896, a letter from Sir Donald A. Smith, now Lord Strathcona, to Sir Charles Tupper. It is dated 'Victoria Chambers, 17 Victoria Street, July 10, 1896.' In that letter Sir Donald A. Smith says:

I may add that Mr. Dunlop—

Who was acting for the Allans——informed me before my interview with Mr. Chamberlain—

The hon. gentleman said that the contract had never been referred to the Imperial authorities.

Mr. DOBELL. Pardon me; I did not say that. I most distinctly said that it had never been considered by the Colonial Office, and I added, nor even read. That is true.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Chamberlain, I presume, generally reads important matters on which a despatch from a High Commissioner would be sent to the Premier of Canada. At all events, Sir Donald A. Smith said:

I may add that Mr. Dunlop informed me before my interview with Mr. Chamberlain that his firm were prepared to withdraw from the stipulation, to be given in the form of a letter, that the contract should be given to them subject (without penalty) to their succeeding in floating a company in four months. I communicated this statement to the Secretary of State, although Mr. Dunlop has not yet placed it before me in writing.

The hon. gentleman knows that when the contract was entered into between the Allan Company and the late government, the company reserved to themselves four months—not, as the hon. gentleman knows quite well, to enable them to make financial arrangements in London, because the Allan Company is financially strong enough to undertake a fast line between Great Britain and Canada, without any trouble in making the necessary financial arrangements. But the four months were simply inserted because they required that time to make arrangements with the different railway lines in Canada, and the hon. gentleman knows well, that that was not at all a condition that could interfere with the carrying out of the contract. So much was that the case, that when the question of the four months' delay was mentioned at the time, when Lord Strathcona referred the matter to Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Dunlop, on behalf of his principals, immediately said: We are going to set aside the four months clause without any further consideration.

Let me draw attention to this one fact. The question of the fast line was looked upon as one of the most important questions which had to be submitted to parliament. The hon. the present leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), received that information before the right hon. gentleman succeeded to office, and what did the leader of the opposition then do? Did he try to make of it a party question? Not at all. He wrote a letter to the right hon. the First Minister, in which he said that if the right hon. gentleman would induce His Excellency the Governor General to sign that contract, within two years, Canada would have a fast line equal to anything floating on the Atlantic Ocean.

But my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), has told the House that the Imperial government did not even take the trouble to read the contract submitted by the Allans. Well, we have a further despatch, dated 4th July 1896, signed by Lord Strathcona, then Sir Donald Smith, stating:

As stated by Sir Charles Tupper, the Act authorizing the contract was concurred in by both parties in the Dominion parliament.

Does it not seem strange that at that period of time, when my hon. friend from Quebec West was put to the great trouble of crossing the Atlantic so often to secure this fast line, both parties in the House, according to Lord Strathcona, concurred in the necessity of having this fast line. And Lord Strathcona went on to say:

As stated by Sir Charles Tupper, the Act authorizing the contract was concurred in by both parties in the Dominion parliament, and the contract will in any case be subjected to the approval of parliament. I venture to hope, therefore, that the Secretary of State will reconsider the matter, which, by the direction of the government of the Dominion, I have the honour to submit to him.

Is it credible that the matter was not submitted to the Imperial government by Mr. Chamberlain, or that the Imperial government did not take the trouble to read it, as my hon. friend from Quebec West has stated. I have too much confidence in the good faith and intelligence of British statesmen to believe that in a question of such vital importance to Canada, submitted to the Imperial government by our High Commissioner, the documents should have been laid on the Table without being read. If that be the cause of the long delay and the unsuccessful efforts of my hon. friend from Quebec West to secure a fast line service, it is no credit to those who, since the last effort of the leader of the opposition, have undertaken the task of obtaining for Canada such a service, which is not only indispensable because we require to make fast time on the Atlantic Ocean, but because it provides the cold storage facilities, which my hon. friend from Leeds and Grenville has been telling us is the one thing necessary for this country.

Mr. DOBELL. I would again recommend to my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), that he had better take that submission and read it through, because he has missed a very important point, and that is that it never was a contract. He says that Mr. Dunlop told Lord Strathcona that the Allans would, by letter, withdraw the four months clause. Well, when a statement of that kind is made on behalf of a principal, the latter, as a business man, is bound to take the first opportunity to follow that promise up by giving the letter. But that letter was never given, and Lord Strathcona cabled across that that letter had never been forthcoming. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but let him read the whole thing.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have read it all.

Mr. DOBELL. There are plenty other things I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, but I am afraid his memory is getting very short, and it would be a waste of time. Let me ask him, however, how many knots an hour those boats had to go. My hon. friend claims that they had to go twenty knots. Is he sure of that?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Twenty-two knots.

Mr. DOBELL. If he will read the submission again, he will take that back.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Twenty knots. Here it is in black and white:

That steamers are to be provided capable of performing the voyage at an average speed of twenty knots an hour.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is the advertisement calling for tenders.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I am reading from the blue-book, page 9, a letter addressed to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and signed by the Allans:

Steamers are to be provided capable of performing the voyage at an average speed of twenty knots an hour.

That is not an advertisement.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. When we resumed business this evening, I remarked that the hon. the leader of the opposition was not in his seat, and therefore did not take up some matters which he dealt with in his remarks just before recess. I shall not undertake to reply to the torrent of adjectives which the hon. gentleman then indulged in with such vehemence. But since the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), has taken up this question of the fast line, and since the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) has dealt with another matter to which the hon. leader of the opposition referred before dinner, I wish to say a few words on these subjects.

This is the second occasion on which this fast line has been brought up and we have been told of all that the late government were going to do in the matter of cold storage, and it is only in that connection that this fast line service has anything to do with the subject before the House. I would just say that under that submission, as my hon. friend from Quebec West rightly describes it, the Allans did offer to provide a service on certain conditions and under certain restrictions, which service was to be fitted up with cold storage. Three, or at the most four, vessels were to be supplied with cold storage, to sail between Quebec and Liverpool, and that was to be the whole cold storage system at that time.

There was no condition that the cold storage should be mechanical. It might have been the same cold storage that had been supplied in the previous year by my predecessors in the Department of Agriculture. This, I need not say again, I considered inadequate, and I hold yet that it was inadequate. But the submission of this contract by the Allans to the then government of Canada was so hampered with conditions, so guarded by the Allans in the letter which accompanied that submission that, I venture to say, anybody without prejudice examining that letter and the contract must acknowledge that there was absolutely nothing binding upon the Allans at all, that while the government of Canada would be bound, the other side of the contract would not be bound in any way. Now, I wish to put before the House a few clauses of this letter, a very few of which the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) has read. The Allans submitted a tender in accordance with the advertisement of Mr. Parmalee, the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, and they accompanied it with this letter, the first part of which is of no consequence, and I will not read it:

We have reason to believe that we shall have no insuperable difficulty in completing the financial and all other necessary arrangements within four months of the acceptance of this offer; but should we, from any unforeseen cause, fail in doing so, we reserve the liberty to resign the contract at or before the end of that period.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the date of that?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is dated the 9th of June, 1896.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Chairman.—

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am going to deal with what the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) said in a few minutes. But I want to lead up to it. It went on to say:

1. That steamers are to be provided capable of performing the voyages at an average speed of twenty knots per hour, and that the voyages of each vessel are to be completed within the shortest possible time consistent with prudent navigation; but that penalties will not be exacted for reduction of speed during fog, snowstorms or heavy gales, or when slowed to avoid danger in the vicinity of ice or land.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is all right.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It may be all right, but it completely and absolutely nullifies the condition that the vessels are to go at any average rate of 20 knots an hour.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Except on given condition.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, but I will let the hon. gentleman know a little more about the conditions before I am done. They say further:

There are other details necessary to the successful working of the proposed service which are not mentioned in the published terms and conditions. Our tender is made on the understanding that a detailed contract will be drawn up containing such necessary provisions, and in accordance with the interpretation above stated.

It may prove to be impossible to obtain delivery of the four mail steamers in time to commence the service on May 1, 1898, as their construction may be delayed by strikes of shipworkers or engineers, or other causes beyond the control of the contractor.

They were not bound in any way to provide for steamers.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Why?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have just read the conditions from their letter which nullifies that. Then they went on to take the time that the hon. gentleman alludes to. I find, on the 30th of June, a telegram addressed to Hon. W. B. Ives and signed Andrew Allan:

We agree to your decision on clause 18, as expressed in your telegram of 27th instant, and as confirmed at our interview yesterday, on the understanding that you interpret it so as to cover the forfeiture under both clauses 16 and 17, and will give us binding letter, as agreed yesterday.

But the telegram I wish to read was one dated 7th of July, signed Smith—that is Sir Donald Smith—and addressed to Tupper, Ottawa, being Sir Charles Tupper, who was then Premier:

Saw Dunlop to-day. Informs me your government agrees substitute 'shall' for 'may,' clause 18, conditions contract; also that you will give letter making contract subject withdraw penalty to Allans. Succeeding float company in four months. That government accept following addition clause 19—

Showing that still at that date they wanted to have that four months:

It is understood, however, that speed may be reduced during fog, snowstorms or tempest, or to avert danger in the vicinity of land, and delays arising therefrom shall not involve the contractor in penalty, nor be deemed breach of contract. Also that under clause 9, date of commencement of service to be extended if required by them for completion of steamers.

The leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) said this afternoon in his vigorous remarks, that if the government had not changed in 1896 we should have had this fast line, and yet here is a specific cable addressed to him by Sir Donald Smith in July, 1896, stating that the date of commencing the service is to be extended if required. I come now to a telegram from Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, addressed to the Governor General, and dated 10th of July, 1896:

No decision will be given by me in regard to the tenders until Her Majesty's government have received copies of all tenders and all communications made to your government in regard to them, and until your new ministry is formed, and until also full information is forthcoming as to the proposed modification of the tenders of Messrs. Allan, which may possibly make a fresh call for tenders necessary.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Chamberlain had read the contract when he sent that.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. He does not say so. He wants all the information in regard to the tender and all communications made to the Canadian government in regard to it, communications such as I have read, which modified and changed the character of the submission. Having heard of it, but not having seen it, he required to have full information before his government could come to any conclusion in regard to the matter. Then, Sir, we have here a letter from Andrew and Henry Allan, addressed to Mr. Laurier, the president of the council, dated the 13th of July, the very day, I believe when the Prime Minister formed his government :

Our tender was accepted subject to the following conditions :

1. We are to have four months from date of completion of contract in which to float a company with necessary capital, and to carry through certain necessary arrangements. Should we from any unforeseen cause fail in doing so, we are at liberty to resign the contract without penalty.

2. With reference to the penalties provided in the government conditions clauses 16-19 inclusive, the contract shall provide that speed may be reduced during fog, snowstorms or heavy gales, or to avoid danger in the vicinity of ice or land, and that reduction of speed or delay in sailings due to such causes or to serious marine disaster, shall not involve the contractor in penalties, nor be deemed to be a breach of contract.

Then it goes on to say that the contractors are not to be liable for penalties for any unavoidable delay, showing that after the government had changed, the contractors still insisted upon the conditions contained in their letter accompanying the tenders and dated 9th of June, therefore showing that the submission was in no sense or way a contract, as the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) said it was not, but simply a submission which was modified and changed by the letter that accompanied that submission. The hon. gentleman alluded to the letter signed by Donald A. Smith, and from which he quoted, but there is this point which nullifies what he quoted. Sir Donald A. Smith says :

I communicated this statement to the Secretary of State, although Mr. Dunlop has not placed it before him in writing.

Now, Mr. Dunlop did not place it before the Secretary of State in writing, he never has since that time done so, he never did up to the time of the rejection of the contract by us.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman knows that the contract could not be submitted as a contract until it was signed, and the Governor General refused to pass the order in council.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, this is not the contract that I am talking about, it is a letter which Mr. Dunlop promised to write, but which was not written by him.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Just read on and you will find it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There is no letter here signed by Mr. Dunlop in which he gives up the four months' delay.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Does not Lord Strathcona refer to it ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No. Lord Strathcona refers to it as not having been done. The last reference in this book is the reference the hon. gentleman himself quoted, and it winds up by saying :

I communicated this statement to the Secretary of State, although Mr. Dunlop has not yet placed it before him in writing.

There is no letter in existence which Mr. Dunlop did write, and therefore his verbal statement was never implemented, and the original terms of the contract, with the rider contained in the letter which the Messrs. Allan wrote to Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he became Premier, are the only things we have on record, and the only statements to show what was their offer and their conditions. That offer was an offer in which the government gave them the privilege of withdrawing during four months, and contained these restrictions and these changes in the conditions from the original specifications as asked for by Mr. Parmalee, and was, as a matter of fact, no contract in any sense of the word. Moreover these conditions completely nullified it as the boasted fast line of a 20-knot service, because practically it enabled them to make the service just what they choose to make it.

Now, my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Osler) alluded to what the leader of the opposition had stated just before the House rose at six o'clock, namely, that I ought to have foreseen the difficulties of making contracts in the fall and winter, that I ought to have asked for more money than I did, and that I was very much to blame for not having done so.

Mr. OSLER. I did not say that.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that when last session I was condemned and criticised by the leader of the opposition for not asking for more money, and that I ought to have foreseen that more money would be required—

Mr. OSLER. No, I said nothing about more money having been required.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Then I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. But I may give my explanation of it. Last year when this motion was up there was no expectation that the conditions would arise that have arisen in consequence of the war in South Africa. The conditions are entirely different from what they were at that time, and it is only in consequence of the change that this money is needed. When I asked for money last session the steamship owners were themselves putting in additional cold storage, without any bonus or subsidy from the government; and there was then a full assurance that there would be an abundant supply of cold storage for our Canadian products. The present difficulty is almost entirely due to the fact that the steamers have been called away to the South African transport service, and that is what has forced me to make these further contracts. The leader of the opposition this afternoon undertook to say that I ought to have foreseen the war, that anybody with any sense knew that there was going to be a war, and that at least a year and a half ago we ought to have made arrangements which would have obviated the difficulties which have arisen in the course of the last six months in consequence of the war. Now, I do not think that the hon. gentleman realized, as I said to him this afternoon, fully what he was saying. Just before six o'clock he launched a very vigorous diatribe against me, and used a great multitude of vigorous adjectives, which he has become so much in the habit of using, that I do not think he realizes why he uses them. Neither the hon. gentleman nor anybody else, at the end of last session, believed there was going to be a war. When we passed the resolution last session we did not do it in the expectation of a war, we did it to uphold the hands of the mother country in the hope that by diplomacy she would succeed in averting war. That was the opinion not only of this House and of the people of Canada, but it was the opinion of the people and government of Great Britain. It was the opinion frequently expressed by Lord Salisbury, by Mr. Chamberlain and by Lord Lansdowne. They publicly expressed the belief up to within, I think, one month of the actual outbreak of hostilities, that diplomacy would secure the end that they had in view without a resort to war. So general was that belief that the Imperial authorities, even up to the very outbreak of the war, made no provision in South Africa for carrying on a war. So sure were they that diplomacy was going to succeed that they did not send out supplies of troops, and took no steps to protect their frontier. Moreover since that time Lord Lansdowne has been criticised in England because he did not take those precautions, and his defence was that there was no expectation on the part of the government that war would occur until hostilities actually broke out. Still, under these circumstances the leader of the opposition undertook to read me a long lecture, and applied to me epithets which were unworthy of a man occupying the position he occupies, as applied to another member of this House, blaming me because I could not foresee and provide against, what the Imperial authorities themselves were not able to foresee and provide against. Under these circumstances I think the accusations which have been levelled against me in regard to this matter must fall to the ground. I have only to ask the House to allow the resolutions to pass, and I shall be very glad to give all further details of information when the Bill comes up, but which I have not under my hand at this moment.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. Minister of Agriculture challenged me to produce any statement he had made, either in this House or out of it, claiming that he was the originator of cold storage. I am satisfied that I have read speeches made both by himself and by his supporters that leave that impression on the hearer. I hold in my hand a document entitled 'Laurier and the Conservatives,' and there is a chapter devoted wholly to the Minister of Agriculture. Every person who has read this book must be satisfied that this chapter was written by the Minister of Agriculture himself. Any person who has read this book must be satisfied that this has been written by the hon. gentleman himself.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I deny that statement. I did not write it, or have anything to do with it.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman denies having written it, or having read it, or having anything to do with it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I did not say that I did not read it.

Mr. TAYLOR. He had this to do with it, that he fathered it, by franking it, and sending it to the electors in Sherbrooke.

Mr. GIBSON. The same as you did.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), says the same as I did. Every elector in Lincoln received an envelope, franked by the hon. gentleman, containing a copy of the Montreal Herald, with the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and the speech of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), made at Massey Hall. These two documents were sent all over the country.

Mr. GIBSON. So they ought to be.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am glad the hon. gentleman is sending out the information. What I rose particularly to refer to, was this statement made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture in this document distributed by him through Sherbrooke :

At the present time, owing to the system of cold storage which Mr. Fisher has established on the railways and on the ocean steamers, Canadian farmers can export all their perishable products with the certitude that these will reach their destination in perfect condition, and that the carriage will not depreciate their value.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Hear, hear.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will leave it to any unprejudiced man in this House, if that statement, which is contained there, does not convey to the people the idea that the hon. Minister of Agriculture established cold storage.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It says the present system of cold storage.

Mr. TAYLOR. It does not say anything about the present system.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will read it again.

At the present time, owing to the system of cold storage—

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. Not the present system. There is only one system.

Mr. WALLACE. Who is the Mr. Fisher who is referred to there ?

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. Minister of Agriculture who has written this about himself.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor), must withdraw his statement about the Minister of Agriculture having written this about himself. I have just denied that I wrote it. I did not write it.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher), was willing to have his party puffed by the statement which he franked and distributed. Whether the hon. gentleman wrote it or not, he franked it, and sent it broadcast through the country. It is as follows :

At the present time, owing to the system of cold storage which Mr. Fisher has established on the railways and on the ocean steamers, Canadian farmers can export all their perishable products with the certitude that these will reach their destination in perfect condition and that the carriage will not depreciate their value.

I want to put against that the Auditor General's Report, the document which has just been brought down and placed in our hands.

Mr. TAYLOR.

At page B-45, I find that the heading is as follows :

Cold storage on steamships, &c., and trial shipments of products.

When the hon. gentleman makes the statement in that book that the farmers have a certitude in sending their products to the old country, that they will reach there in the same perfect condition as when they left, why is this account headed in this way ?

Trial shipments of products.

I find that $3,088.50 has been expended in making trial shipments of fruits. I want to point to another steal, because it must be a steal. At page B-45 of the Auditor General's Report, there is a charge of $1,328 for a quantity of cheese. On the next page there is an amount of $1,257, which the hon. gentleman has paid to Mr. St. Amand Clement, Montreal, for cheese, June make, 14,583 pounds. I want the hon. gentleman to give me an answer to my question when I sit down. All this money has been paid out by the government to purchase cheese to make trial shipments. Then, there is a charge of $236 at Ottawa to make trial shipments of beef. A portion of the money paid out by the hon. gentleman went into the cramming and stuffing of chickens for the English market. The hon. gentleman paid out $234 to various parties and Mr. Joseph Yuill—I know Mr. Yuill, who lives in Carleton Place, and who is a gentleman who goes around lecturing for the Farmers' institutes—received $215.18. These chickens were crammed and stuffed for the market. This makes altogether $3,271 that the hon. gentleman paid out for cheese, beef and chickens, to make trial shipments under the fancy cold storage system of the hon. minister. What has become of the money ? Not one cent has been returned for it, and it has been either misappropriated or the produce has spoiled on the way. Not a cent of revenue is credited as having been received from the sale of any of these articles. This matter requires investigation. If the money of the people is going to be paid for products which spoil in transit so that they will not pay the freight when they get to the British market, it is a subject that requires looking into.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency). Mr. Chairman, when we consider that the fast line service has fallen through, and in view of what we have heard here tonight, we must come to the conclusion that it was not the intention of the government ever to carry out the contract which was entered into with the Allans.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). There never was a contract entered into.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I think I will show the hon. gentleman that there was a contract. When this question was brought to the attention of the House for the first time in 1895, the present right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), got up and pressed all kinds of objections against it. One of these objections was that the St. Lawrence River was not fit for such navigation as this service would involve, and he pointed out the dangers of navigation in the St. Lawrence. But, public sentiment, notwithstanding what the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) has said, was so much in favour of the project, that when the government proposed a vote of $750,000 a year, no one in this House dared oppose that vote. The vote was carried unanimously, and a statute was passed providing that the government was to give $750,000 a year. Tenders were advertised for. The Messrs. Allan tendered, and one of the conditions was that their steamers were to run twenty knots an hour. As the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), has pointed out, this was barring fogs, icebergs, &c. My hon. friend surely does not think that if a twenty-knot boat was running up near an iceberg, it would not slacken speed. This is a condition which would be put into any contract, and any set of men making a contract of this kind who would not insist on such a stipulation, would be considered to be people who did not know anything about their business. But it is a fact well known, that the service was to be a twenty-knot service. The sentiment of the country was so great that nobody in the House dared to raise a voice of dissent when the vote was taken. But, when hon. gentlemen came into power, they found, if not a complete contract made between the government and the Allans, negotiations at such an advanced stage, that the final step only was to be taken to make it a complete contract between the government and the Allans. The only thing which was to be done, the final step which was to be taken, was that this contract was to be approved by the Governor General in Council. The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), whose constituents are so much interested in this project, says that the Colonial Office never had this contract before them, that they never had these tenders before them, that they never read them, and that they never gave them any consideration at all. I cannot find that in the book which has been produced before the House. I find exactly the contrary, because in the despatch, read by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, dated July 10, 1896, Mr. Chamberlain says:

Have received your telegram of the 7th of July. No decision will be given by me in regard to the tenders until Her Majesty's government have received copies of all tenders and all communications made to your government in regard to them, and until your new ministry is formed, and until also full information is forthcoming as to the proposed modification of the tenders of Messrs. Allan, which may possibly make a fresh call for tenders necessary in justice to other tenderers.

I have informed the High Commissioner to the above effect.

(Sgd.) CHAMBERLAIN.

This implies that the Colonial Secretary not only had received the tender made by the Messrs. Allan, but that he had considered it fully. I cannot understand how the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) now says that this contract was never considered by Mr. Chamberlain. It appears to me from the correspondence that there was only the final step to be taken, namely, that when the tender was accepted by the government the order in council would be passed, and then the contract would be completed between the parties. I go further and say, that judging from the correspondence, the Colonial Office was prepared to recommend that a subsidy of 75,000 pounds would be given towards the establishment of this fast line. We have further in the history of this transaction the fact that when the Liberals came into power the objection was made in the House that $750,000 was too great a sum, and members on the Treasury benches told us that the facilities for cold storage were not sufficient for us to give such a large sum for the establishment of the fast line. I believe, Sir, that from the very day this government came into power, they decided that no fast line should be established between Canada and the United Kingdom, and in that, they were carrying out the policy of the Prime Minister when in opposition. From what I have read and from what I know of what passed in this House, it seems to me that it was the signed policy of the Liberals that this fast service should not be accomplished. In proof of this, let us look at the action the Liberal government took. They confided the carrying out of this great scheme to the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), who it was well known at the time, was opposed to the fast Atlantic service, and was adverse to the employment of twenty-knot steamers.

Mr. DOBELL. I stated distinctly that $750,000 a year was too extravagant to pay for that service.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I have laid a trap for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) into which he has fallen. In 1896, I brought this matter up in the House, and I will read from Hansard what the hon. gentleman then said. I know that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) will not contradict the report from Hansard. I read a report in 1896, of a meeting held in Quebec at the time, and I was alarmed at the language used by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell), there. Not only the hon. gentleman's constituents, but every one in the district of Quebec were highly interested in the establishment of this fast line for they felt that a great service would be done to Quebec, if they had these great twenty-knot ships making it their terminal port. I was consequently surprised when I read the remarks made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell), at a meeting of the board of trade of which he was then president. I read to the House the report of La Semaine Commerciale with reference to this meeting, and which was as follows :

This meeting was of more than ordinary importance. The presence of a member of the government gave rise to observations made on the question of the fast line of steamers, the bridge and other topics. Mr. Dobell stated that Quebec would not receive any advantage from the establishment of a fast line of steamers, as the line running seventeen or eighteen knots was sufficient for the needs of the country, and the fast line could only be useful to Quebec when other great enterprises shall have been accomplished, such as the Great Northern Railway, the bridge, and the deepening of the canals.

I questioned the government as to the accuracy of that report.

Mr. DOBELL. That is strictly correct.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I was surprised indeed that a gentleman representing a constituency in the city of Quebec should advocate a seventeen or eighteen-knot service, which was inferior to the lines running from New York to Europe, when every one knew that it was absolutely necessary that Canada should have steamers capable of competing with the best steamers sailing from New York. My hon. friend (Mr. Dobell) was in the House at the time I refer to, and the only thing he corrected in the statement was, that he advocated eighteen-knot steamers and not steamers of 'seventeen or eighteen knots.' It was to this gentleman that the government entrusted the carrying out of the fast line of twenty-knot steamers, for which this parliament had voted a subsidy. My hon. friend (Mr. Dobell) crossed the ocean several times, and he went to Messrs. Petersen, Tate & Company to contract for this service, for $500,000 a year. I had the pleasure of crossing with my hon. friend on one of his numerous trips to England, and I remember going with him to the Metropole Hotel to see the model of these boats. The gentlemen interested in shipping business there, said that Petersen & Tate would never carry out that scheme, because they were too weak financially. It was well known to every one in London and in England that Petersen & Tate had not sufficient standing on the money market to enable them to carry out the contract. Mr. Petersen took a great deal of trouble; he was an energetic man and spent a good deal of money in connection with the matter, but he was not sufficiently strong financially to perfect the undertaking, and the result was as had been predicted, that both he and the government failed and failed signally. The fact that the government confided the carrying out of the scheme to the hon. gentleman from Quebec (Mr. Dobell) is evidence to me that they never bona fide intended to accomplish the transaction. They knew that the agent they were employing was hostile to the project, and that if he could possibly do so he would carry out his own scheme to have a seventeen or eighteen-knot service, and not the twenty-knot service which the people of the country desired and which the Messrs. Allan undertook to supply. I am sorry that my hon. friend (Mr. Dobell), has failed. I was told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) the other day, in reply to a question, that the failure was in consequence of the trouble which had arisen on account of the war, but the hon. minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) did not hold out any hope that the government would ever be able to perfect that scheme. With all due respect to the hon. gentleman from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), I do not think he will ever succeed with his unsinkable bottle-necked ships. I am not an expert, but from what I have heard I do not think the scheme will ever become a reality, because these new fashioned ships are an experiment, and in a project of this magnitude those who have money to invest will not risk it on a new idea like that. I tender to the hon. member for Quebec West my sympathies on his failure. He knows, as I know, that his electors in Quebec West, and the electors of the whole district of Quebec, had the fond hope that in a very few years from 1896 these great steamers would come to Quebec would bring trade and business to the port, and it was also hoped, that probably they would not go as far as Montreal. It has fallen through because the government of the day thought they could do better than the government which preceded them, and instead of voting $750,000, which was the lowest sum for which they could establish this line, they voted a paltry $500,000, which, it was well known to the business community, was absolutely inadequate for the fulfilment of that which had been held out to the country. I am sorry for my hon. friend, because, as I stated in 1896, if my hon. friend had succeeded in carrying out this great scheme, I have no doubt that he would have attained the great object of all his desires, and that we would now have had another Sir Richard in the House.

Mr. CLANCY. I desire to say a word with regard to a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture a few moments ago. I asked him to give a statement to the House of what success had been achieved in the shipment of fruit last season. The hon. gentleman sat down without giving any answer at all, so that, I presume, he has no very definite answer to give. What I want to call particular attention to is this. The hon. gentleman is nothing if he is not somewhat offensive, I might say insolent. The hon. gentleman complained that the leader of the opposition had used harsh terms towards himself. Does the hon. gentleman remember that he used harsh terms himself? All that this intellectual gladiator wanted was that every one should stand out of his light, and if they did not, he would get even by insolent retorts. The hon. gentleman said that I was ignorant of the cold storage system when I said that they had adopted electric fans. I challenged the hon. gentleman to show that up to this hour our eggs, butter or cheese had been received in England in good condition. I tell the hon. gentleman that his own officers declared in evidence that they were abandoning cold storage and adopting the very system to which I had made reference, that is, the electric fans. Let us see what the report says. We have a Minister of Agriculture at war with his own officials. We have them making one statement, and him coming here and asking for a grant of money on the very opposite statement. This House should hesitate before giving the hon. gentleman a single cent on the evidence that he has placed before it, when we have his officers, in printed reports circulated from one end of Canada to the other, declaring the very opposite. We had the hon. gentleman this evening making a very humiliating exhibition by telling us that he had taken Mr. Grindley aside, after he had stated a few months ago that the cold storage had been an absolute failure up to the present time. The hon. gentleman said that Mr. Grindley had made a sweeping statement, and he called him aside and imposed the penalty upon him that he was to make a report, and I venture to say that Mr. Grindley will be asked to place a falsehood in that report, and withdraw the statement he made. Mr. Grindley either made a true or a false statement. If he made a statement contrary to facts, the hon. gentleman was bound to have dismissed him. But, what does Prof. Robertson say:

The department has also been in correspondence and consultation with the owners of the steamships, and they promise this year to provide ventilated chambers on the ships for the carriage of cheese—not cold storage, but simply ventilated chambers.

What does that mean? It means that cold storage, so far as cheese was concerned, was a failure, and that the other plan had to be adopted. I am going to bring other evidence to prove that that is not simply a sentence dropped there by accident, but that it runs through the whole report. Later on Prof. Robertson said, in answer to a question by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan):

Q. Does not the same hold for apples and eggs? A. For eggs and all except early varieties of apples, cool, ventilated storage is better than cold storage on steamships.

What does that mean? It means that the hon. gentleman was abandoning cold storage in itself, or rather was adding to it something to perfect it—that he had to put in ventilating fans, or the fruit and other articles could not be landed in good condition. Yet, the hon. gentleman asserted that those who called his attention to this, when he was parading his great achievements, were ignorant, and did not know what they were talking about. But I will go further. What I have quoted was stated by Prof. Robertson on May 9. On May 16, he practically repeats the same thing:

It does not seem possible to carry apples safely across the Atlantic unless the holds in which the apples are placed are provided with a sufficient ventilating apparatus.

That statement was made not more than a year ago. The hon. gentleman must know that mechanical cold storage unassisted by fans has proved to be a failure.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The fans do not belong to the cold storage department at all.

Mr. CLANCY. They are a separate thing, but they are an adjunct to the cold storage system. He has abandoned his cold storage system for fans. Not more than a year ago Prof. Robertson said that was the case.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, he did not.

Mr. CLANCY. Here is what Mr. Grindley says:

Now, as Prof. Robertson says, the steamers are going to have ventilated holds. I think it will be the most satisfactory system we have adopted yet, that is, to have a system of fans working during the day.

So we have the statement that it is not to be cold storage at all, but a system of fans for the purpose of ventilating and giving dry air. That was discussed very fully last year. Up to this hour the hon. gentleman has been unprepared to say that his cold storage system has been a success. Yet the hon. gentleman declares, from one end of the country to the other, that he has established a system of cold storage that has been a success. Why his own officers contradict him. And I might point out that neither Mr. Grindley nor Professor Robertson has appeared before the committee this year, and it would be interesting to have their evidence on this matter. It may appear very smart for the hon. gentleman to say to the people that they are ignorant of the general question, because they discuss one portion of the system, but he cuts a very sorry figure before the country, as Minister of Agriculture, when he asks us to approve a system which stands to-day where it did practically five years ago. We have had changes from time to time, but up to this hour there has been no improvement in the system, and no reliance can be placed on the hon. gentleman's statement that it is an absolute success.

Mr. SPROULE. It is really regrettable that we should be asked to consider such a resolution as this without having the proper information before us. We have now been three months in session, and we have not yet received the report of the hon. gentleman's department, which gives the details of the experiments made last year. So far as the information that has been disclosed to us goes, it shows that the present system has been an absolute failure. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) has shown, by the evidence of the hon. minister's own official, that the system has not been a success, and that is shown still further by the fact that the hon. gentleman is proposing a change. Why should he propose any change if the present system is successful, as he claims it is.

Take the Auditor General's Report, and we find that last year fruits were sent over by the present system in order to find out whether they could be successfully placed on the market or not in proper condition, and so far we have had no return from the sales of these fruits. We must come to the conclusion, either that they were destroyed or given away, and the information we have through the press is to the effect that the fruit reached the old country in a very imperfect condition and was either unsaleable or only saleable at a very small figure.

I protest against being called upon to vote this money blindly; I protest against being called on to vote it without having the report of the department before us, giving the results of the experiments last year, and without having more information than we are at present possessed of.

Mr. TAYLOR. I see by the Auditor General's Report that the hon. gentleman has been experimenting on feeding chickens, and I have been credibly informed that the food he experimented with was a mixture of sawdust and grain. I am further informed that some of the fowl fed on this mixture laid eggs, and that when the eggs were hatched there came out eleven chickens with wooden legs.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman is so incredulous that I do not think it necessary to answer him.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am just as credulous as the hon. minister is, and I do not make any statement here in this House or out of it that I do not believe to be true.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Do you believe that statement about the wooden-legged chickens?

Mr. TAYLOR. No.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yet you said you were credibly informed.

Mr. CLANCY.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend beside me says that the twelfth chicken was a woodcock. But when the hon. minister said that he never declared to the country that he had inaugurated a system of cold storage, I quoted from a pamphlet that he was sending out by the thousand to the electors of Sherbrooke, in which he claimed the whole credit for that system, and he had not a word to say in reply. Who was making the false statement there?

Mr. CLARKE. I do not blame the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Dobell) as much as some hon. gentlemen on this side do, for his failure to accomplish what he thought he could accomplish by making a contract with Mr. Petersen in 1897. But when this government undertook to set aside the agreement which had been made by the late government with the Allan Company, they must assume the responsibility. If that contract had been carried out—and I do not think there is any hon. gentleman on the opposite side who will say that it would not have been carried out in the time named if the arrangements had been concluded—it would have been of inestimable advantage to the people of Canada. That, I think, is recognized on both sides. The hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches urged that they could accomplish a great deal for Canada by declining to enter into the contract with the Allans and making a contract with Mr. Petersen. We have heard very severe criticisms to-night on the conditions which the Allans proposed to the government. Well, these conditions embodied certain common sense restrictions that will no doubt be found in every proposition made by a shipping firm to furnish an adequate service to a company or the government for a number of years. Fault was found by the Minister of Agriculture with the condition that the vessels which it was proposed that the Allans should construct for the fast Atlantic Line for the late Canadian government were not to be compelled, during rough weather, fog or untoward conditions to maintain a speed of twenty knots an hour, and ridicule was attempted to be heaped on that condition in the contract. Upon examination of the contract entered into by the present government with the Petersen firm, and which failed of accomplishment, I find practically the same conditions. Not one word was said by hon. gentlemen opposite to draw the attention of the committee to that fact. It seems to me that they would have acted a little more frankly if, having pointed out the difficulties, disabilities and untoward conditions in the contract with the Allan Company, they had also stated that in the conditions imposed upon them by the Petersens in their new contract, the same conditions existed. I find in the memorandum of agreement brought down on the 14th of June, 1897, by the hon. gentleman then leading the House,

And the said vessels are to make and maintain on each and every trip a speed of 500 knots in every twenty-four hours from port to port in ordinary weather.

If the weather was not what might fairly be termed ordinary weather, if they encountered fog or ice, the vessels were not bound to go twenty-one knots an hour. If it was an improper condition to be incorporated in the contract with the Allan Company that its vessels should not be compelled to maintain a speed of twenty knots an hour in all weathers, hon. gentlemen opposite, wiser in their generation should have made it a condition that in all weathers the Petersen vessels should maintain a speed of twenty-one knots an hour. In clause 14, subsection f. it is provided :

(f) Provided always that should any failure or default for which the payment of damages are herein stipulated or provided for, happen or be occasioned, or occur from any circumstance or accident beyond the control of the contractors, and not due in any way to the default or neglect on their part or on the part of any officer, agent or servant of theirs (the burden of proof of which shall be on the contractors), then and in that event the damages stipulated for, or the sum or amount forfeited shall not be payable or be forfeited notwithstanding the apparent default.

I claim that these conditions which I have read to the committee are precisely similar conditions to those which hon. gentlemen opposite have been objecting to and finding fault with. They thought they could make a better arrangement with the Petersen Company than their predecessors had made with the Allan Company, but notwithstanding the warning given them by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), who leads the opposition, notwithstanding that it was pointed out that it was impossible for them to get reputable steamship companies to give this service for a sum so much less than that provided in the Allan contract, they proceeded, with the result that to-day the people of Canada are deprived of the substantial advantages which would have accrued to this country if the fast Atlantic Steamship Line had been established. And we are in the humiliating position that if we desire to make rapid transit between this country and the old country, if we desire our letters to reach the old country rapidly we must mark them 'Via New York' and have them conveyed hundreds of miles to a foreign port and thence to the old land. I say that is a humiliating position, it is a position that has been brought upon us and in which we have been kept by hon. gentlemen opposite because they thought they could make a better bargain with the Petersen Company than their predecessors had made with the Allans, and because they have miserably failed in doing so. They should assume the responsibility for that failure and not attempt to throw responsibility for failure on hon. members on this side of the House, because of alleged unfavourable conditions in the contract made with the Allans. In looking over the debate in this House in 1897, I find that the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) had so much faith in the ability of the Allan Company to carry out any contract that they might enter into with the government, that he was most anxious to have them associated with the Petersens in the enterprise. Any person who knows the standing of the Allans in the commercial world cannot have the slightest doubt that if the contract they proposed to enter into with the government of Canada had been completed by the hon. gentlemen opposite, when they assumed office, we should long ago have had the advantages, which are many and inestimable, of having a line of vessels that would be equal to any plying from New York.

I may, perhaps, be permitted to say a word about cold storage. The Minister of Agriculture will surely not find fault with the criticism offered to his proposition of last year and reported in Hansard of July 27, 1899. Objection was made by every hon. gentleman who then spoke on this side to the reduction in the estimate for this service then made by the Minister of Agriculture. There was no suggestion from this side that the amount was excessive, but gentleman after gentleman rose in his place and objected to the diminution of the amount. And the hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler), who shares with me the honour of representing West Toronto said that if the sum had been doubled he would be ready to support it. If the hon. minister had been guided by the advice of gentlemen in opposition—advice tendered in the most respectful way—he would have made more extended arrangements for this service than he did. The hon. gentleman said that the sum was smaller.

This item is smaller than it was last year, because we have found that we could get off with less in the ensuing year. A number of the steamship companies have received their third payment, and, therefore, the account with them is closed.

I think it is not too much to suggest that it would have been wiser on the part of the Minister of Agriculture, if he thought he had made a favourable arrangement for the supply of cold storage in the vessels of these steamship companies, to have renewed the agreement with them and to make that agreement for a period of three or four years. In making further explanations, he declared :

I might tell the hon. gentleman, what he does not seem to be aware of, that while at first we were obliged to subsidize vessels to get them to put in cold storage equipments, and while three years ago some of these companies required a bonus to induce them to put in that accommodation into their vessels, they are to-day putting into their new vessels cold storage accommodation without any bonus at all.

Now, I take it that if that means anything, it means that the Minister of Agriculture was satisfied that, with the expenditure he had made in inducing steamship companies to provide cold storage, they themselves had become alive to the importance and advantage of that accommodation and, in future, would supply cold storage without cost to the people of Canada. I say that was an evidence of short sightedness, and I say with the greatest respect to the Minister of Agriculture, that if the shippers of Canada for the next three years at least, have to pay 50 per cent more for cold storage accommodation in vessels crossing the Atlantic than they have paid hitherto, the responsibility for the increased burden must undoubtedly be placed on the shoulders of the Minister of Agriculture, and he alone must bear that responsibility.

The hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Frost) referred in addition to the fast Atlantic service, to the splendid position which the farmers of this country occupied at the present time, and he tried to leave the impression upon the House that that prosperity was due to some action of the Minister of Agriculture and of the hon. gentlemen who are associated with him. He said that our farmers were prosperous, that the value of farm lands was rising, and that a condition of things existed now among the farming community more favourable than had existed for many years previously. Well, we are delighted to know that our farming community is prosperous, and we on this side of the House desire just as earnestly as hon. gentlemen opposite that that prosperity may continue. But we would be placed under a deep obligation to hon. gentlemen opposite if they would deign, during the course of the debates in this House to tell us—something which they have kept secret hitherto—what has brought about this prosperity. We have not been able so far to extract from them any evidence that this prosperity is attributable to any act of theirs. The hon. member for Leeds spoke of the increase in the value of farming lands. Well, I have no statistical report later than that issued by the Ontario Bureau of Industries, dated November, 1899. I find that in 1896 the value of farm lands in the province of Ontario was $557,468,270, and that in 1898 the value was $556,246,569. Now, if these statistics are correct, and they have been quoted time and again by hon. gentlemen opposite during the last twelve or fifteen years, they do not show that the value of farm lands in this province is increasing very rapidly. The same story is told if we turn to the table that gives information as to the wages of farm operatives. It seems to me that if the farmers' position is so much improved as hon. gentlemen opposite declare it to be, if their life is better, if they are more progressive, if they are becoming wealthier, they ought to divide a portion of their additional wealth with those who helped to create it. What do the statistics show with regard to farm wages and farm labour? For yearly engagements for 1898, with board, the average wages was $148; for 1897, $144; for 1896, $144. The average for the sixteen years, from 1882 to 1898, was $157. Without board, the average wages in 1898 was $246; in 1897, $236; in 1896, $243, and the average from 1882 to 1898, was $251. If the hon. member for North Leeds and Grenville were present he might explain to us, if such redundant prosperity obtains amongst the farming community, how it is that the value of farm lands is not increasing as rapidly as we would like, and why the wages of farm labourers has remained practically the same for the past five years. But if there is any greater degree of prosperity existing in this country than was formerly the case, it is due to a condition of things over which hon. gentlemen opposite have had no particular influence. The value of farm crops in the province of Ontario—and these are the only statistics available—has been immensely greater during the past two years than it was during the three years preceding. In 1894, the value of farm crops in the province of Ontario, as estimated by the compiler of the Bureau of Statistics, was—giving round figures—$94,000,000; in 1895, $99,000,000; in 1896, $88,000,000; in 1897, $106,000,000; in 1898, $110,000,000. The increased value of farm crops raised in Ontario during the past three years, as well as the increased value of animals, of beef and pork, these have been the causes of the increased prosperity which has prevailed in this province, but these conditions have also existed in other provinces of the Dominion. These have been the causes of the additional prosperity which has prevailed amongst the farming community. What do these figures that I have just quoted show? They show that the market value of the crop in 1897 was greater by $18,000,000 than the value of the crop of 1896; the market value of the crop of 1898 was greater by $21,000,000 than the crop of 1896. The market value of the crops of 1897 and 1898 was $217,000,000, or an average value for each year of $108,000,000. The market value of the crops of 1894, 1895 and 1896 was $282,000,000, or an average of $94,000,000. That is the reason why the farmers in this province, at any rate, are in a better position than they were previously.

Reference has been made to the advantage which is obtained by the farming community because of the introduction of the policy of preferential trade; and the member for North Leeds and Grenville stated that he had over fifty clippings from newspapers to show that the people of Great Britain were alive to the fact that this preference had been actually given to the artisans and manufacturers of England by the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I think the Minister of Agriculture, and those who are associated with him, would like the House and the country to believe that the increased export of the products of the farm which has taken place during the last two or three years has been due mainly, if not entirely, to the adoption of that preferential policy. Nothing can be further from the fact, because, as has been pointed out again and again, unusual conditions prevailed. We had the advantage of abundant crops here and on the other side, and the exports of our products to the old land largely increased. The Minister of Agriculture has referred to the enormous expansion in the butter and cheese trade, and also in the bacon and ham trade. If time permitted, and a reference to the Hansard was permissible, it could be pointed out that up to the time the late administration placed a duty on American beef and American pork coming into Canada, the exports of these commodities to Great Britain were practically nil; and the hon. gentlemen opposite, one and all, denounced the proposition which their predecessors in office made to place a duty upon American pork and beef coming into Canada, because they said that such a duty would be of no advantage to the Canadian farmers but rather a detriment. The hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in referring to the proposition made by the ex-Minister of Finance to put that duty on, said:

What earthly good will it do our farmers to increase the revenue in this manner. . . . He knows, and they know, that no greater sham and delusion was ever put on the statute-book than this duty on pork, in so far as it is declared to be a duty which will benefit our farmers. I tell the hon. gentleman again that so far from his duty helping the farmers, he and his friends are doing all they can to strengthen the hands of those parties in the United States who are clamouring for an increase of duty.

That statement was made as reported in the Hansard of 1890, at page 3418. But, a reference to the exports of pork, ham and bacon, from that time up to the present, will show whether the imposition of that duty upon American beef and pork was injurious or advantageous to the farmers of this country. In 1889, the year previous to the additional duty being put on imports of pork from the United States, we imported 15,000,000 pounds of pork, and 8,283,000 pounds of lard. In 1896, the last year of Conservative administration, these imports had decreased to 8,726,174 pounds of pork and 392,602 pounds of lard, while the exports of Canadian hams and bacons had increased from 7,150,756 pounds in 1891 to 87,526,058 pounds in 1896. The adoption and maintenance of that policy from 1891 to the present time has been responsible and to it is due the enormous and gratifying increase in the exports of natural products from this country to the old country, and if hon. gentlemen opposite had not maintained the policy which their predecessors had laid down and enacted, the condition of the farming community would not have been as prosperous and as satisfactory as it is to-day. I repeat, that so far as the responsibility for the increased cost of cold storage between Canada and the old country is concerned, the hon. Minister of Agriculture, and the hon. Minister of Agriculture alone, must assume the responsibility, and if he had acted with the prudence and sagacity which his hon. friends give him credit for having possession of, I am sure that when the contracts for cold storage, that he spoke of as having terminated last year, expired, he would have taken the opportunity of making provision for a continuation of the contracts, and if that had been done they could have been renewed for a term of years to much greater advantage than at the present time to the exporters of the Dominion of Canada.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and concurred in.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 152) to authorize contracts with certain Steamship Companies for Cold Storage accommodation.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. SPROULE. I think we may reasonably expect the hon. Minister of Agriculture to distribute his report before we are asked to consider the second reading of the Bill, because we cannot do it intelligently without that information.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). It is now about twelve o'clock, and there are twelve government Bills on the Order paper which we proposed to put through. We have made no progress to-day, but I do not see any reason why we should sit later than twelve o'clock.

Mr. TAYLOR. Put them through now.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is twelve o'clock now: we cannot stand it. I move the adjournment of the House.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. What will the government take up to-morrow?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We will go right on with these Bills.

Mr. CLARKE. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture if he will bring down the conditions under which this cold storage, or ice storage, was provided for in 1895 and 1896?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, I suppose I can find them in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SPROULE. And those relating to the new contracts as well?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Certainly.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12 o'clock a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, May 9, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRINTING OF RETURNS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). I would like to move that some papers which happen to be referred to in the Votes and Proceedings by the Joint Committee of both Houses on the printing of parliament, and relating to two subjects there mentioned, should be printed for distribution. The report in the Votes and Proceedings recommends that these papers be printed as sessional papers, as to which I have no wish or opinion. But, I desire for the convenience of the House, and I think the Treasury benches will agree with me, that these papers should be printed in connection with the motion that I propose later on to move. I refer to the papers relating to the John C. Barr, concerning which I shall have a motion to make, and the papers relating to applications for dredging leases, mentioned on page 433 of this report:

Return to an order of the House of the 7th of February, 1900, for copies of all correspondence, applications, grants and other papers relating to the area of, and any part thereof, covered by the following applications.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Those were the subjects of a prior return not covered by this return, and in regard to which there was some discussion last session. In referring to these papers, as I propose to do, it would be a matter of great convenience to the House if they were printed, instead of hon. gentlemen who wish to take part in the debate being confined to the one set of unprinted papers. So, I have two motions on that subject. One is:

That the papers relating to the steamship 'John C. Barr' referred to on page 431 of the Vote and Proceedings, being Nos. 63 and 63a, be printed forthwith for distribution.

The other is:

That the papers referred to in No. 105, page 433 of the Votes and Proceedings, be printed forthwith for distribution.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would suggest that the hon. gentleman allow these motions to stand until to-morrow, so that I can take communication of them.

Mr. WM. GIBSON (Lincoln). The rule of the Printing Committee is, that unless some special request is made by an hon. member, in order to save expenditure for the printing of the documents all the returns asked for, every hon. member who desires it is provided with a copy. The members of the committee have no desire to omit the printing of any documents particularly asked for by members of parliament, and it would simplify matters very much if such members would send a request to the clerk of the Printing Committee, so that it may come intelligently before the committee, and that the committee may recommend the printing to the House in the usual way. There was no exception made in the case of the papers referred to by the hon. gentleman. The information was given to the committee last Friday that a copy of these papers was in the hands of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), and the committee then deemed it a local matter, and considered that it should not be printed, since serious objections have been taken by some members of the committee to doing any unnecessary printing, because the sum set apart by parliament had been overrun already by some $25,000. The committee are trying to cut down the expense as much as possible. I would suggest that in future, if any member has any special reason why a paper should be printed, he should give his reason to the committee, and the committee will be only too glad to meet his wishes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have no doubt that had I attended that meeting of the committee and made a suggestion on that line, it would have been carried out. My motion is not in conflict with the report of the committee, as I do not ask that these papers be printed to be included in the sessional papers. My motion simply relates to the distribution. It is quite true I have a copy of the papers, but, they are quite extensive, and in the debate it would not be satisfactory to the House that the only copy should be in my hands.

THE WINDING-UP ACT.

On the Order being called for introducing a Bill, further to amend the Winding-up Act (Mr. Britton).

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). The Bill which I proposed to introduce was to amend chapter 129 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, which is called 'The Winding-up Act.' This general Act was amended in 1889 by somewhat extensive amendments; also amended in 1890, in 1892, in 1895, and again, twice in 1899. I may mention to the House that sections 5, 6, 7 and 8, of chap. 129, R.S.C., and sections 4, 5, 6 and 7, of the amending Act of 1889, are, if not in conflict, certainly very confusing, and it is difficult to arrive at a proper interpretation. There ought to be an amendment which will bring these latter sections into harmony with the sections of chap. 129, R.S.C. I submit that there should be a complete revision of these sections, both in the Revised Statutes and also in the amending Act. But, I wish particularly to call the attention of the House to the fact that in the province of Ontario, with which I am most concerned, the Revised Statutes and the amending Act of 1889 do not give a county judge, or any official referee of the court, power to make a winding-up order. As soon as the winding-up order is made, power may be given by order of reference to any officer of the court to do everything else from start to finish in connection with proceedings under the Act. The amendment I desire is to confer power to make a winding-up order in the province of Ontario upon the county judge. I have presented the matter to the Minister of Justice, and also have spoken to the Solicitor General; and in view of the near revision and consolidation of the statutes, I have decided, with the permission of the House, after making this statement, to drop the Bill.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT APPOINTED TO POSITIONS.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

What are the names of all members of the House of Commons of Canada appointed to positions each year since January 1, 1879, up to July 1, 1896? What were such positions, and what were the salaries?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The list which I have to read is a pretty long one, and it has taken some time

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton).
 Mr. Speaker, before you go any further, I would like to draw the attention of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to what I think is a very great inaccuracy in the paper which he has just read. Of course, it is very difficult, hearing a paper in that way, to be certain, but, the question asked by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), is :

What are the names of all members of the House of Commons of Canada appointed to positions each year since January 1, 1879, up to July 1, 1896? What were such positions, and what were the salaries?

If I heard correctly the list, as read by the right hon. gentleman, it included a large number of persons who are not included in this question at all. This question asks the names of members of parliament who were appointed, but the names of a number of gentlemen were read who had ceased to be members of parliament, and, therefore, were not referred to in the question. I call the attention of the Prime Minister to that, because it is calculated to mislead the House and the country. I have no objection to a statement of all the appointments made by the Conservatives, whether of members of parliament or any one else, but if there is intended to be any point in the answer, I would remind the Prime Minister that no member of the Canadian House of Commons of the Liberal-Conservative party, ever introduced a Bill, making it a crime to appoint a member of parliament to office, or to appoint him for a considerable period after he had ceased to be a member.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McMULLEN. I just desire, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, sit down.

The PRIME MINISTER. In my preliminary remarks I said that I divided the names into two groups. First, those appointed during the parliament, and second, those appointed after dissolution.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. On the question of procedure, it is not competent to give information in an answer that is not pertinent to the question.

Mr. McMULLEN. I requested the information.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The PRIME MINISTER. If my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) raises the question of procedure, I shall be happy to discuss it with him at any time.

I.C.R.—SALE OF ROLLING STOCK, &c.

Mr. HAGGART asked :

What rails, rolling stock or other material, if any, have been sold or otherwise parted with by the Intercolonial Railway each year since the 1st day of July, 1896?

To whom were the same sold or otherwise parted with?

Were the sales made by public contract or tender?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I am informed that this information will be very voluminous, and if the hon. gentleman puts a motion for a return, I will have it brought down immediately.

Mr. HAGGART. I would consent to that if the minister had made the statement when the question was first put on the Order paper, but it has been met constantly with the observation from the government: 'Stand, stand.'

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not know to what extent this question would require to be dealt with, and until I got the information I could not give it to the House, and I am giving it to the House at the first moment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What the minister means to say is: That he is refusing to give the information to the House at the first moment.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am giving the information at the first moment, that what is asked for is too bulky to be given in reply to a question.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, sit down.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I can put myself in order at any time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was put down, and no other member has a right to speak if I am not allowed.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have put myself in order. I do not desire to interrupt the proceedings of the House for more than a moment. If hon. gentlemen will repress themselves, I shall not be long. We are now coming to the estimates, and we do not desire to delay the government, nor do they, I presume, desire to withhold information. It is impossible to get this information at the present time by a motion for returns; and I suggest that it would be sufficient for us to give notice that we shall ask certain questions when the estimates are being discussed.

Mr. McMULLEN. I rise to a point of order. I claim the floor.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I suppose the minister will see that the information will be forthcoming.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. member (Mr. Haggart) says he would like the return brought down, I will bring it down without a motion.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Very well, I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. McMULLEN. I object to the hon. member withdrawing his motion. I was prevented from speaking on a question in which I was directly interested. I was called down by gentlemen opposite, and it was unfair that another member should be allowed to speak. I want the protection of the Chair and the protection of the House. I want my rights and nothing more. If I am going to be called down, I want other members called down too.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to say that the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) put himself in order by moving the adjournment of the House. The subsequent debate, however, did not remain in order because nobody seconded the motion.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think it was seconded by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen.)

Motion (Mr. Montague) to adjourn, withdrawn.

CANADIAN REGIMENT AT HALIFAX—SUPPLIES.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

1. What are the names of the contractors furnished by the Imperial authorities from whom any supplies of provisions have been obtained for the Canadian regiment now garrisoning Halifax?

2. What amount of supplies or provisions has been obtained from each such contractor?

3. What amount of supplies and provisions has been obtained from each contractor not so furnished by the Imperial authorities, and what is the name of each such contractor?

4. Were J. A. Leaman & Co. and Moir, Son & Co., contractors for the furnishing of supplies or provisions to the Imperial authorities for the garrison at Halifax?

5. Have any supplies or provisions been procured from either of these firms for the Canadian regiment now garrisoning Halifax?

6. What supplies of meat have been obtained for such regiment from W. A. Maling & Co.?

7. Were they contractors for the supply of meat to the garrison for the Imperial authorities at the time when the Leinster Regiment left Halifax, or during what other period?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I ask that this question should stand, in the absence of the Minister of Militia.

Mr. CLARKE. It has been standing for two weeks.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, the minister is absent on public business.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is always the same way.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question stands.

REPORT OF POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

At what date was the MSS. of the following departmental report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, sent to the Queen's Printer, namely:

Postmaster General.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The manuscript of the whole of the departmental report of the Postmaster General, making in all 465 printed pages, was sent to the Queen's Printer on or before the 24th November, 1899, and on the 2nd March, 1900, the department received for the first time any portion of the proofs for revision. Thereafter, from time to time, further portions of the proofs were sent to the department for revision until the 23rd April, on which day for the first time the department received the proof of the last portion of the manuscript.

Mr. McMULLEN.

The prefatory part, embracing about eleven pages, was sent to the Bureau on the 14th April, and the proof thereof received at the department on the 18th April. It has been the invariable practice of the Post Office Department since confederation not to send the prefatory part to the printer until the printing of the departmental portion was approaching completion.

A difference of opinion exists between the head of the Stores Branch of the Post Office Department (the officer in charge of this part of the work) and the Queen's Printer as to occurrences since the 28th March, the Queen's Printer stating to the effect that the Bureau was out of copy on the 28th March and so remained until the 18th April, the head of the Stores Branch alleging that after the 28th March and down to the 23rd April he continued to receive portions of the proof of the report, in all seventeen different portions of the proof, that had not until that time been sent to the Post Office Department, and that it was not until the 23rd of April that the Post Office Department received for the first time the first proof of the whole report.

BASIC SLAG FERTILIZER.

Mr. DOMVILLE (by Mr. Fraser, Guysborough) asked :

1. Has the Agricultural Department any knowledge or experience of an English fertilizer known as Basis Slag or Thomas' phosphate powder?

2. If so, has any of it been experimented with on the government Experimental Farm at Ottawa?

3. What fertilizers have been experimented with from time to time on the Experimental Farm at Ottawa?

4. In experimenting with various fertilizers does the officer having charge of such experiments take cognizance of analysis, with a view to ascertain the commercial value of such fertilizer to the various crops?

5. If so, what steps does he take to verify the analysis of the manufacturer or seller? Does he keep a record of such analysis?

6. Has he analysed the Thomas' phosphate powder; if so, what result did he get? What percentage did he find of moisture? Of phosphoric acid citric soluble? Total phosphoric acid? Average citric soluble phosphoric acid? Average of phosphoric acid?

7. What method did he adopt in his analysis, and for what reason did he adopt such method, and what result?

8. Did he use the process used by the scientific chemical analysers of London, Paris and Germany, known as the Wagner method, and what were the results? If not, why not?

9. Is he aware there has been in use in the United States a process for determining the available phosphoric acid in bone and mineral superphosphates and mixed manures?

10. What has been the results of such tests as compared with the Wagner method?

11. What method do you consider would be in the best interests of the producer, the manufacturer, the consumer and the farmer, and for what reason?

12. Has the departmental officer above referred to any knowledge of the Wagner method? Has he any knowledge of Dr. Bernafd Dyer, district agricultural analyst for the counties of Bedford, Cornwall, Essex, Hants, Herts, Leicester, Rutland, West Suffolk and East Essex, Analytical Laboratory, 17 Great Tower Street, London?

Professor Wagner, Ph. D., Privy Councillor of the Imperial Research Station, Darmstadt, Germany?

A. Maret and Ch. Delattre, Paris?

Dr. Augustus Voelcker & Sons, London, Consulting Chemists of Royal Agricultural Society of England?

13. Is he aware that these chemists sent direct analyses to the Department of the Interior at Ottawa from samples drawn by an officer of the Department of Inland Revenue for the purpose, with the following results:

Analysis of Dr. Bernard Dyer—

Percentage of total phosphoric acid.....	16.77
Including phosphoric acid dissolved by a 2 per cent solution of citric acid, employed precisely according to the method of Prof. Wagner of 1899.....	14.60

Analysis of A. Maret and Ch. Delattre—

Phosphoric acid soluble in citric acid (Wagner's method).....	14.71
Phosphoric acid, total.....	16.63

Analysis of Dr. Augustus Voelcker—

Percentage of phosphoric acid dissolved by a 2 per cent solution citric acid (Wagner's method).....	14.44
Total phosphoric acid.....	16.47

Analysis of P. Herlwig—

Percentage total phosphoric acid.....	16.83
Percentage citric acid soluble phosphoric acid.....	14.53

14. Are these professional chemists well and favourably known in the scientific world and would their analyses be accepted by the department in this case or on an arbitration of analysis generally? And is their professional services in such respect accepted in Europe?

15. Why have they adopted the Wagner method or methods in preference to the method or methods now in use in the United States, or said to be in use?

16. Are the methods said to be in use in the United States, applicable to the analysis of the Thomas' phosphate powder to get most perfect results, or has it only been applied to it for reasons that this powder not being produced in the United States, no special analysis was considered necessary? If not, why not?

17. Who are the largest producers of this fertilizer?

18. Is it produced in the United States?

19. With such samples of the Thomas' phosphate powder as you may have had access to, would it be possible for analysis to give—

Nitrogen—total including that of nitric acid or ammonia, if present.....	16
Total calculated as ammonia.....	20
Potash.....	1.88

Or take another analysis—

Nitrogen, including that of nitric acid or ammonia, if present.....	1.81
Total calculated as ammonia.....	2.19
Potash.....	14

20. If so, where did the nitrogen and potash arise?

21. If not, how do you account for such analysis?

22. Are you aware that under the Adulteration Act all articles not containing certain percentages are classed as adulterated, whether actually adulterated or not?

23. Are you aware that the Adulteration Act and Fertilizers Act must be read together on percentages to be contained in certain fertilizers?

24. Are you aware that clause 7, subsection 2, chap. 24, 53 Victoria reads: 'No fertilizer shall be sold or offered or exposed for sale unless it contains 8 per cent of available phosphoric acid'?

25. Are you aware the chief analyst of the Inland Revenue made the following report:

Laboratory of Inland Revenue Department,
Ottawa, September 15, 1899.

Sir,—I return herewith file No. 80772 and have to report that the samples referred to in Messrs. Wallace & Fraser's letter of the 1st instant, have been analysed in this laboratory with the following results:

	Moisture.	PHOSPHORIC ACID.		Total.
		Reverted.	nsoluble.
		Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
No. 17,661.....	0.14	7.16	5.44	12.60
No. 17,662.....	0.18	4.75	7.85	12.60
No. 17,663.....	0.14	6.72	6.40	13.12

26. Under such an analysis would it be possible to offer or expose for sale Thomas' phosphate powder in the face of section of Fertilizers Act quoted, which calls for 8 per cent ?

27. Why was 8 per cent available made the standard ?

28. If it was to protect the farmers, is there any good and sufficient reason why the standard should now be reduced to 5 per cent, except to meet the government prohibitive analysis which brings it under 8 per cent ?

29. Is it not detrimental to the farmer and manufacturer that this fertilizer should be branded adulterated in consequence of a difference of opinion as to what system of analysis should be adopted, the Wagner or an obsolete method in use for many years in the United States and Canada before Thomas' phosphate powder was discovered and manufactured, and in no way applicable to the correct analysis of the Thomas' phosphate powder ?

30. Is it not in the interests of the farmer that a high grade Thomas' phosphate powder should be imported and sold, rather than reduce the standard of available phosphoric acid and open the door to low grade fertilizers ?

31. To meet the difficulty between the producers of the Thomas' phosphate powder and the farmer who consumes, what system of analysis should be employed that would be in the interests and fair to both and thoroughly in the public interests ?

32. Do you see any good reason why this fertilizer should be prohibited from importation and sale, or is it in the interests of the farmer that it should enjoy a portion of the field with other fertilizers ?

33. Would the adoption of the Wagner method or any other similar method lead to confusion ? If so, in what way ?

34. Have the experimental farms the proper facilities at the experimental farms to carry out such methods ?

35. Would it not be in the interests of the agricultural community that the actual analysis be given irrespective of any particular view of any particular analyst, so that it might be known exactly what the buyer was buying and paying for irrespective of any personal views on the utilization of antique and obsolete methods of analysis ?

36. Did the Minister of Inland Revenue make the following statement :—' The department cannot alter its system at the instance of any special manufacture, but it is ready to adopt the latest and best scientific methods approved by the Society of Public Analysts in England, or recommended by any such body as the Royal Agricultural Society of England. It is also prepared to adopt that system which the authorities of the Dominion Experimental Farm recognize as giving results corresponding most closely with those obtained in actual agricultural practice.'

37. Has there been any protest to the method of analysis adopted by the chief analyst for the determining the availability and total phosphoric acid in Thomas' phosphate powder ? If so, when and by whom ?

38. When such protest was made, were any steps taken to obtain the opinion of the Society of Public Analysts in England, the Royal Agricultural Society in England, or the authorities of the Dominion Experimental Farm, as to what method of analysis gave results corresponding most closely with those obtained in actual agricultural practice ?

39. Will the government submit an explanation of the methods of analysis adopted by the Department of Inland Revenue, viz., 'the citrate of ammonia solution,' and forward a copy of the explanation of the method used in England and Europe, viz., 'a 2 per cent solution of citric acid,' to the chemist of the Dominion Experimental Farms, consulting chemist of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, and the director of the Agricultural Research Station, Darmstadt, Germany ?

40. Will the government submit the following question to such authorities : 'Which method of analysis for determining the availability of the phosphoric acid in basic slag or Thomas' phosphate powder, would, in your opinion, give results corresponding most closely with those obtained in actual agricultural practice ?'

41. Will the government adopt the system recommended by those authorities as giving 'results corresponding most closely with those obtained in actual agricultural practice' ?

42. Has the Department of Inland Revenue received samples of Albert's Thomas phosphate powder during the month of April, 1900 ?

43. If any samples were received, have they been analysed by the chemist of the department, and what was the result of such analysis ?

44. Who is the consulting chemist of the Royal Agricultural Society of England ?

45. Were certificates of analysis of Albert's Thomas phosphate powder received by the department ? If so, by whom were the certificates signed ?

46. What was the result of the analysis of Albert's Thomas phosphate powder, as expressed in such certificates ?

47. Upon what basis or analysis will the 'relative value per ton of 2,000 pounds,' as given in the bulletin of the Inland Revenue Department, be calculated or determined ?

48. Does such relative value so calculated or determined give a fair and correct result of the agricultural value of Thomas' phosphate powder as a fertilizer ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The answer to this question is so voluminous that I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Domville) to make a motion for a return, or I will bring it down without notice at the earliest possible date.

Mr. SPEAKER. Question dropped.

P.E.I. RAILWAY—NEWS AGENT.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. Who is the news agent for the Prince Edward Island Railway ?
2. Has he the contract by tender ?
3. When were tenders called, and when were they opened ?
4. Who were the tenderers, and the amount specified in each ?
5. Was there any delay in awarding the contract ; if so, for what reason ?
6. What period of time does the contract cover ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Mr. Sydney Gray is the news agent for the Prince Edward Island Railway, and has been so for many years past. 2. Tenders were called for as hereinafter stated and after receiving the same, the department concluded that it would be in the interest of the service to continue the contract to Mr. Gray, who had given great satisfaction for many years in preference to other tenderers, provided, he would engage to pay $360 per year. 3. Tenders were called for by advertisement in public press, and were opened on the 25th of February, 1899. 4. The tenderers' names were: R. B. Norton, R. H. Jenkins, and Sydney Gray; and the amounts specified in each tender was respectively: $420, $284, and $240 per year. 5. There was some delay in awarding the contract and it was finally given to Mr. Sydney Gray (who has had the contract for some years) at $360. 6. The contract covers one year from the 1st of September, 1899.

BELFAST AND MURRAY HARBOUR RAILWAY, P.E.I.

Mr. MARTIN asked:

1. Is the work of survey and location of the Belfast and Murray Harbour Railway in Prince Edward Island being proceeded with? If not, for what reason? Is the work to be proceeded with this summer? If not, why not?

2. Is work begun on construction of 11½ miles under contract? If not, what is the cause of delay? Have any changes been made in plan, profile or specification since the contract has been entered into? If so, what are they?

3. Is the contractor to receive additional compensation on account of those changes? If so, what amount?

4. Are tenders to be called for the construction of the rest of the line, and when? If not at once, why?

5. Is the work to be proceeded with piecemeal, or are tenders to be called for the whole of the line not now under contract?

6. When will the line be completed and open for traffic?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. A preliminary survey has been made of the whole line, but 11½ miles only have been located, the location of the balance of line will be proceeded with during the summer season. 2. The work has been commenced by the providing of materials, the grading will be proceeded with as soon as the ground is sufficiently dry. No changes have been made in plan, profile, or specification, since contract has been entered into. 3. The contractor is not allowed additional compensation on account of changes in grade, as no change of grade has been decided upon. 4. When the proper time arrives tenders will be invited for further sections of the road. 5. The road will be divided into sections and tenders will be invited. 6. The date named in the contract for the completion of the 11½ miles is 1st of August, 1900. At present I cannot say when the line will be completed and opened for traffic.

I.C.R.—PASSES TO CLERGYMEN.

Mr. TAYLOR asked:

To what clergymen, indicated by ecclesiastical position, have permanent or annual free passes now in operation on the Intercolonial Railway, been granted? What are the numbers of such passes given to representatives respectively of different religious denominations?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The following are the annual passes granted to the heads of the churches who personally applied for them. For many years passes have been granted to the same heads of churches by the Intercolonial Railway, with no change in rules in their issue: Most Rev. J. T. Lewis, D.D., LL.D., Archbishop of Ontario; Most Rev. C. O'Brien, D.D., Archbishop of Halifax; Most Rev. Paul Bruchesi, D.D., Archbishop of Montreal; Right Rev. W. B. Bond, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of Montreal; Right Rev. C. Hamilton, D.D., D.C.L., Bishop of Ottawa; Right Rev. A. H. Dunn, D.D., Bishop of Quebec; Right Rev. H. T. Kingdon, D.D., D.C.L., Bishop of Fredericton; Right Rev. F. Courtney, D.D., S.T.D., Bishop of Nova Scotia; Right Rev. J. P. Dumoulin, M.A., D.C.L.; Bishop of Niagara; Right Rev. J. C. McDonald, D.D., Bishop of Charlottetown; Right Rev. John Cameron, D.D., Bishop of Antigonish; Right Rev. John Sweeney, D.D., Bishop of St. John; Right Rev. Campbell, President, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Methodist Conference; Rev. A. Carman, D. General Superintendent, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Methodist Conference; Rev. Robert Campbell, Sc.D., Moderator of General Assembly, Presbyterian Church.

The number of annual passes given to Episcopal clergymen is 7; to Roman Catholic clergymen, 8; to Methodist Conference, 2; to Presbyterian Church, 1.

DOMINION VOTERS' LISTS—PAY TO SHERIFFS.

Mr. DOMVILLE (by Mr. Fraser, Guysborough) asked:

Has the government made any provision to pay the sheriffs of New Brunswick for services performed by them in respect to the Dominion voters' lists?

If so, what scale of fees or remuneration has been laid down?

If not, why not?

Will the government this session make provision to pay the sheriffs of New Brunswick for their services in respect to the Dominion lists?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It is not the intention of the government to make any provision for the services of sheriffs in respect to the Dominion voters' lists. The government is not aware of any services to be rendered by sheriffs in that respect.

I.C.R.—TENDERS FOR FENCING.

Mr. FOSTER (by Mr. Taylor) asked:

Were tenders invited last year for either the wire, the posts, or the erection of fencing along the Intercolonial Railway?

Who were the successful tenderers, and was the lowest tender in each case accepted?

Have tenders been called for, for the like purpose for the present year?

If so, who are the successful tenderers?

Is any fencing being done by agreement other than contract after tender, and if so, how much, by whom and at what rate?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Yes, tenders were invited last year for the wire, the posts and the erection of fencing along the Intercolonial Railway. 2. The following are the names of the successful tenderers: Enoch Steeves, John Kelly, Raymond Rand, James Cooper, Strathy & Co. They were the lowest tenderers, taking into consideration the quality of the fencing and points of delivery. 3. Yes, tenders have been called for, for the like purpose for the present year. 4. The following are the names of the successful tenderers: The New Brunswick Company, the Maritime Company, the St. Lawrence Company, T. McAvity & Sons. 5. I am not aware of any fencing done by agreement other than contract.

I.C.R.—CLAIM OF G.T.R.

Mr. FOSTER (by Mr. Taylor) asked:

Has the Grand Trunk Railway Company any claim against the Intercolonial Railway in connection with freight divisions, which they are pressing; if so, what amount, and what is the nature of the claim?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I am not aware of the Grand Trunk Railway Company having any claim against the Intercolonial Railway, in connection with freight divisions; unless it be an unadjusted division of freight rates to New England points by way of St. Lambert, which has been under discussion with the Grand Trunk and is about settled. The question has been whether the Grand Trunk Railway should have one dollar or seventy-five cents for the haul of twenty-one miles from St. Lambert to St. Johns, P.Q.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOLS.

Mr. DUGAS asked:

1. Is the Prime Minister aware that the Board of Public School Commissioners of Manitoba does not permit the Catholics to set up religious pictures, statues or other pious emblems in view of the children in their school-houses; and

2. That the said board refuses to allow religious women engaged in teaching to wear their religious costume and insignia in teaching the children in schools subsidized by the state, as it was stated by the chairman of the said board to the delegates of the Catholic laity of Winnipeg, at an interview during the month of April last?

3. Under these circumstances, does the Prime Minister consider that the settlement of November, 1896, and the subsequent provincial legislation of 1897, in relation to the schools, render full and complete justice to the Catholics of Manitoba?

Mr. FOSTER.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. The Premier is not aware of any such regulation ever having been passed by the Board of Public School Commissioners of Manitoba. If such regulation exists, his attention was not called to it. 2. The Premier has read with care the report of the meeting which took place between the Roman Catholic ratepayers of the city of Winnipeg and the chairman and members of the Public School Board of that city and he affirms positively that the chairman never expressed the opinion attributed to him by the hon. member. 3. He has no reason to change the opinion which he has always held and expressed of the settlement of November, 1896, and of the subsequent legislation of 1897.

GOVERNMENT LOAN TO G.T.R.

Mr. MORIN asked:

1. When was the loan mentioned on page xx of Public Accounts made to the Grand Trunk Railway, what was the rate of interest thereon, and has any portion of either the principal or interest been paid to the government?

2. Is the interest due, as shown in Public Accounts, compounded?

3. What is included in the special account $7,302.18 on same page?

4. Has the government any intention of applying to this debt the money it has agreed to pay for the rental of track and terminal privileges from the Grand Trunk Railway under the arrangement made in 1897 and 1898?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). 1. The loan mentioned on page xx. of the Public Accounts, made to the Grand Trunk Railway, $15,142,633.34, represents that amount of debentures issued for Grand Trunk Railway before confederation and has stood unchanged at these figures since 1861. The rate of interest was 6 per cent per annum. No portion of either principal or interest has been paid to the government. 2. The interest due as shown in the Public Accounts, is not compounded. No interest has been charged against the company since confederation. 3. One half year's interest to 30th of June, 1866, on $243,406.33 balance found to be due by Grand Trunk Railway Company on settlement of old differences. 4. By the Grand Trunk Railway Act, passed in 1884, the claims of the Dominion were made to rank after the common stock and securities of the company. The present government are, therefore, precluded from enforcing these claims until after the holders of the company's common stock have received a dividend. In the meantime the company are entitled to receive any money that may become due to it for any service rendered to the government.

I.C.R.—MR. EVARISTE TALBOT.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked:

1. Is Mr. Evariste Talbot still freight agent at Rivière du Loup, as stated in the minister's answer, page 2038 of the unrevised edition of 'Hansard,' March 15, 1900?

2. Is it not a fact that he has been appointed to another position in the service of the Inter-colonial Railway?

3. If so, what position does he now occupy?

4. What is his salary?

5. When was he appointed to said last position?

6. Who was his predecessor in said position?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Mr. Evariste Talbot is still freight agent at Rivière du Loup. 2 and 3. He is temporarily engaged on additional duties not inconsistent with those of freight agent. 4. His salary as freight agent is $65 a month; but he may possibly be allowed extra for the additional work he is now engaged at. 5. He has no special appointment other than freight agent at Rivière du Loup. 6. Such being the case, he had no predecessor in any such employment, as there was and is no office. He had a predecessor as freight agent, but not in the extra employment.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—HAY PURCHASES BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

Mr. POWELL asked:

Was any hay purchased in the counties of Westmoreland or Albert by the agents of the British government for shipment to South Africa, since the commencement of the war with the Transvaal? If not, why not?

Were there any prejudices against hay grown in the said counties or either of them which prevented it being purchased by said agent?

If so, did the Canadian government take any, and what, steps to remove such prejudices?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). In reply, I beg to say: 1. No hay was purchased by the Department of Agriculture direct from dealers in Westmoreland county; some was obtained from dealers in Albert county. 2. All hay purchased was to be in accordance with the requirements of the War Office, as to quality, and as to size and weight of bales. 3. Not to the knowledge of the department. 4. Answer implied in above. The War Office required that the hay sent, should be only timothy, with no other grass, and not more than 25 per cent clover. Some hay was offered from Westmoreland county which contained other grasses, and consequently could not be accepted.

GAS INSPECTOR AT CHARLOTTETOWN, P. E. I.

Mr. MARTIN asked:

1. Has the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue any report of work done by the inspector of gas for Charlottetown, P.E.I., during the months of February, March and April last? If so, what is the nature of the work performed?

2. How often is that officer required to report? When was the last report received?

3. Was the late inspector fully paid up? If not, why not?

4. Has the department any information complaining that little or no attention is paid to the work of inspection?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). In reply, I beg to say: 1. Yes, for February and March. Inspection of gas and gas meters. 2. Monthly for stamps issued, and for test of illuminating power, and quarterly for meter inspection. On April 5, report for the month of March. 3. The late inspector was paid up to the date of his removal from the service, viz.: February 1, 1900. 4. No, no complaint has been received.

GOVERNMENT STEAMER BRANT.

Mr. MARTIN asked:

1. For what service was the government steamer 'Brant' built? at what cost; by whom built; were any extras paid and to whom?

2. Are any bills for construction still unpaid; if so, what is the amount? Have all the labourers been paid?

3. If not, will the Minister of Marine and Fisheries Department, make inquiries as to the reason?

4. Does the steamer pay dock dues while lying at private dock; if so, how much, and why does she not lie at the government wharf?

5. Do the steamers 'Stanley' and 'Minto' lie at a private wharf; if so, why and what is the wharfage charged?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I beg to reply: 1. The steamer Brant was built as a lighthouse and buoy tender, and for similar work, at a cost for hull, boilers, machinery, &c., of $18,579. Hull by John White, and machinery and boilers by Bruce Stewart & Co., $916.78 for extras, were paid to Bruce Stewart & Co., for heating apparatus, castings for stern post (brass), and engine room supplies. 2. Yes; $749.72, being the amount awarded made by the arbitrator between department and Contractor White. The department has received no information that any labourers have not been paid. 3. Answered by previous reply. 4. The arrangements for docking were made by the agent. No account has been received for wharfage. 5. The steamers Stanley and Minto lie at private wharf; it has been found more convenient when the steamers are on the route in fall and spring at Charlottetown for the delivery of freight. The wharfage charged is $1 per day when the steamers are at the wharf.

SUBSIDY TO MUSGRAVE & CO.'S STEAMERS.

Mr. MILLS asked:

1. Has the government received a resolution from the King's County Board of Trade in Nova Scotia respecting a subsidy for Messrs. Musgrave & Co. line of steamers to London, G.B.?

Is the following a true copy of said resolution :

Whereas the policy of subsidizing steamship lines without government control has led to the serious loss and inconvenience of growers and shippers of apples from the Cornwallis and Annapolis valleys to the markets of Great Britain, by creating a transportation monopoly with insufficient service and excessive rates of freight ;

And whereas Messrs. Musgrave & Co., of Halifax, as agents for a responsible firm of London shippers, now offer to furnish a regular fortnightly service during the apple shipping season between Annapolis and London, G.B., on condition that the line be put on a similar footing in respect of subsidy as the Furness Line ;

And whereas the establishment of such a service would introduce competition and would help to do away with the monopoly, insufficient service and high rates of freight on apples of which the fruit-growers and shippers of the aforesaid valleys complain.

Therefore resolved, that the board recommends the application for a subsidy by the proposed line which will place it on a relatively even footing with the Furness Line to the favourable consideration of the government, and further recommends that as regards both lines, and all subsidized steamers that the government reserve and exercise the right to inspect vessels and supervise and control the rates charged.

RALPH S. EATON.

Secretary B. of T.

Board of Trade,
King's County, N.S.,
April 25, 1900.

2. Has application for said subsidy been made, and by whom ?
3. What other petitions, resolutions or communications have been received by the government asking for such a subsidy ?
4. Is the government aware that such a line of steamers as in the said petition referred to is of great importance to the fruit-growing districts of western Nova Scotia ?
5. Does the government intend to favourably consider the application for a subsidy to such a line ?
6. If not, why not ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I beg to reply: 1. The foregoing is the same as what purports to be a copy of the resolution in question transmitted to the Department of Trade and Commerce. 2. Application has been made for a subsidy by Messrs. Musgrave & Co. 3. What purports to be a petition addressed to the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce, has been received from the inhabitants of the town of Annapolis Royal and the vicinity. It is typewritten, as are also the signatures. What purports also to be a copy of a resolution passed by the Middleton Board of Trade, of date April 6, 1900, has been received. Inter alia it is set forth that in the opinion of the board, if subsidy be granted, the government should retain a supervision of rates and ventilation on steamers. A copy also has been received of what purports to be a resolution passed by the 'Nova Scotia Fruit Growers' Association,' held at Wolfville, on April 9, ultimo, favouring the subsidizing of a line, of which Messrs. Musgrave & Co. are said to be agents, to run between Annapolis and

Mr. MILLS.

London, 4, 5, and 6. As the applications, resolutions, &c., only came to hand on the 4th, 5th and 7th instants, the government has had no opportunity of considering the same, and cannot, therefore, state what may be its intentions in regard thereto.

BINDER TWINE—KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

Mr. CLANCY asked :

How many pounds of hemp or other fibre was purchased for the manufacture of binder twine at the Kingston Penitentiary between the 30th of June, 1899, and the 1st day of January ?

What was the quality and price of each class of hemp or other fibre so purchased ?

How much binder twine was shipped from the Kingston Penitentiary between the 30th of June, 1899, and the 1st day of January, 1900 ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Pending the sale of the output, it never has been the policy of the department to make public the price either of the raw material or the manufactured product. It would be against the public interest to do so. But, as regards quantity, between June 30, 1899, and January 1, 1900: October, 1899, 53,049 pounds of sisal was received; October, 1899, 55,178 pounds of New Zealand was received.

CLAIMS IN YUKON TERRITORY.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Will the government lay on the Table, copies of the order in council passed in 1898 and 1899 empowering the Minister of the Interior to dispose of any claims and portions of claims in the Yukon Territory reserved for the Crown in such manner as he may decide ? Also, will the government lay on the Table copy of an order in council authorizing him to issue leases ? Also, will the leases for hydraulic mining locations without competition to those applicants who can satisfy the commissioner of Yukon Territory that the applicant himself, or a person acting for him was upon, and actually prospected prior to December 3, 1898, the location applied for and upon compliance otherwise with the provisions of the said regulations.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: I will lay on the Table the orders in council referred to by Mr. Davin, on page 425 of 'Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons,' No. 61, of May 7, 1900, were presented to parliament on February 23, 1900. Order in council of October 24, 1899, respecting issue of leases for hydraulic mining in locations prospected prior to December 3, 1898; and, order in council of October 27, 1899, respecting the disposal of fractional reserved claims in the Yukon Territory, as the minister may decide. Hereto attached, will also be found the following orders in council, bearing upon the mining regulations: 1. Order in council dated June 13, 1899, in relation to the granting of free miner's certificates, and amending the regulations by leaving out the words 'in person.' 2. Order in council of January 18, 1898, amending the regulations governing placer mining along the Yukon River, and its tributaries. 3. Order in council dated January 30, 1900, amending the said order in council of January 18, 1898. 4. Order in council, dated February 20, 1900, further amending the said order of January 18, 1898.

PRINTING PAPER.

Mr. PUTTEE asked :

Has the government given any attention to the matter of the scarcity and extremely high price of printing paper ?

Will the government take into consideration the wisdom and necessity of transferring printing paper from the dutiable to the free list ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). This matter has been under consideration of the government; but we are not in a position to make a statement concerning it to-day.

YUKON—CLEARANCE OF STEAMSHIP YUKONER.

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou) asked :

1. Did the firm of F. C. Wade (Messrs. Wade & Aikman), on July 10, 1899, request D. W. Davis, collector of customs at Dawson, to refuse clearance of the ss. 'Yukoner' until the wages of the crew were paid ?

2. Did the collector of customs clear the ss. 'Yukoner' and afterwards, at the request of Mr. F. C. Wade, detain the said vessel ? If yes, what are the respective dates of clearance and detention ?

3. If yes, in what capacity did Mr. Davis act in clearing the said vessel, and in what capacity did he act in detaining her after clearance ?

4. If Mr. Davis detained the said vessel after clearance granted, under what statute and section thereof or under what authority did he act ?

5. Did Mr. Davis, in connection with the claim against said vessel, allow the firm of F. C. Wade (Messrs. Wade & Aikman) the sum of $750 for legal services rendered to the master in the prosecution of the crew of the 'Yukoner,' notwithstanding the solicitors or the owners of the vessel had declined to prosecute under the facts alleged ?

6. Did the collector of customs at Dawson receive in his official capacity a cheque for $5,099.45 from the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner' after tying up the ship subsequent to her first clearance ?

7. Did the owners of the 'Yukoner' request an accounting and return of the said sum, or at all events that it be paid into the court of the district pending the determination by the proper court of the question in dispute between the vessel-owners and the master and mate of the said vessel ?

8. Did the Department of Customs obtain any opinion or advice on the subject from the Department of Justice ?

9. Did the Department of Customs on the 16th December, 1899, request Mr. Davis, 'in view of the opinion from the Department of Justice,' to arrange a settlement with the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner' ?

10. Did the opinion from the Department of Justice, if any, refer to Mr. Davis' conduct as 'unwarranted and improper' ?

11. In reporting to the Department of Customs, did Mr. Davis say he was 'submitting to all these details 'without prejudice,' and did he comply with the advice of the Department of Justice as above in question 9 ?

12. After communicating the report of this public officer to the solicitors of the ss. 'Yukoner,' did the Customs Department of Canada write to the solicitors on April 21, 1900, and say : 'This information as received from Mr. Davis, together with a copy of further statements submitted by him in relation to this matter, has been furnished to you (without prejudice) ?

13. Does the Department of Customs, or the Crown represented by the Canadian government, admit that it is accountable to the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner' for disposal of the proceeds of a cheque made payable to the collector of customs at Dawson for the sum of $5,099.45 in connection with the ss. 'Yukoner' ?

14. Has the Department of Customs declined to account for the money in question ?

15. Has the Department of Customs left the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner' to its remedy against the collector of customs personally in connection with the receipt of the said $5,099.45 and repudiated all responsibility for his conduct in regard thereto ?

16. Has the hon. the Minister of Customs declined to produce for the information of parliament the opinion of the Department of Justice referred to in question 9 ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that it would be better for him to ask for a return, and copies of such documents in connection with this matter as it may be proper to call for, and to bring down, can be laid on the Table in a short time.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have no objection to that, but the hon. gentleman will remember that some correspondence has passed between us, and some of these questions relate to documents which he has distinctly refused to bring down under any circumstances. The questions are based on documents in my possession, and I am entitled to have the hon. gentleman tell me which of those questions he will answer, and which he refuses to answer. The remedy he has suggested is absolutely useless, because by dropping these questions, and by the hon. gentleman refusing to bring down, for instance, the report of the Department of Justice, referred to, the question will never be answered. I would be perfectly willing that the hon. gentleman should answer such parts of this question as relate to documents that he does not intend to bring down.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I judge from what the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) says now, that he is in possession of such papers—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Some of them—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS—such papers as I felt it would be proper to bring down. I do not understand why, if I am not bringing down the papers, he should ask the question.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will explain. I have the bulk of these papers. The Marine Department has very kindly given me access to certain public documents. But, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson), having the same request made to him as was made to the Department of Marine, has seen fit to refuse to give access to such papers I desire. Therefore, I am driven to ask the hon. gentleman questions based on the papers in my possession, which, obviously, refers to papers that he withholds. I think I am entitled to a definite answer. After that, I can discuss his answer. I am entitled to know how much information he will give in regard to questions, the papers concerning which he refuses to bring down. I think that if the question stands, understanding my object as I have explained it, he will see that he can give some answers to the different subsections of that question without much trouble. I would suggest that the question stand that the hon. gentleman may consider his answer.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not wish to enter into a discussion of the question, for that would be improper at this time. The questions asked would necessarily entail a lot of explanation, and to give answers without the qualification that the papers in the case would disclose, I think the hon. gentleman will admit, would not be fair. As the hon. gentleman is aware, as I judge from what he says, the matter is still in controversy and may be referred to the courts; and I must really express a little surprise, if he knows this, that he should seek, from his position in the House, to draw out information that should not be given at this time. Though I declined the request that he made personally to see the papers, I did so in as courteous a way as I could. I thought that as a former minister of the Crown, and especially as an ex-Minister of Justice, he would know that it was not proper that I should yield to his request. Bourinot, in his work on 'Parliamentary Procedure and Practice,' at page 338, says:

As a rule the opinions of the law officers of the Crown are held to be private communications when given for the guidance of ministers, and may be properly refused by the government.

The hon. gentleman will see that as the matter is not concluded and may go to the courts, he should not ask for information that may be used to the prejudice of any one, possibly to the prejudice of the Crown, if an action should be taken against the Crown. I have no desire to withhold any papers that would explain the question, but, as one who has administered a department, and who has been a Minister of Justice, he will know that I have not sought to withhold any questions that he might properly ask.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I can only say, in regard to the hon. gentleman's reference to this case as one still unsettled, that I have no knowledge of the matter that leads me to believe that it is in the hands of the courts, or is to go before the courts. If it has anything to do with litigation, I have nothing to do with that litigation. The only interest I have is that papers have been presented to me as a member of parliament; and as I proposed to call the attention of parliament to the extraordinary conduct of the hon. gentleman's department and his own position, before doing so, it seemed proper that I should seek to obtain from him answers to the questions that are suggested by official papers placed in my possession. I have received papers from the department of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, where there was not the slightest desire to withhold a single document. So far as the Department of Justice is concerned, and the hon. gentleman's reference to my own experience, I can tell him that when I was a member of the government—and I was a member of the government for some time and a Minister of Justice for some time—I cannot recollect having withheld, or the government withholding, the opinion of the Department of Justice to another department, except in the case of the exercise of the prerogative of mercy and matters of that kind which were considered confidential. I can give him many instances where the present leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), when leader of the opposition, and where, I think, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson), himself in opposition, have asked of the government of which I was a member, reports including the reports of the Department of Justice, and these requests have been invariably complied with. But, I would press the suggestion I made, which I made in all candour. Here are questions which I ask for the purpose of discussion; I wish the hon. gentleman to take the responsibility of saying: I decline to give this information. I am not pressing it for any other purpose. Having the Department of Justice report, which he has refused me, he can see how far he will answer these questions.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) had better take the course I suggest and make a motion for a return. There will be no delay—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I decline to do that. I have the papers—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If a return is moved for, the papers will be brought down, so far as the department feel they are justified in bringing them down. The hon. gentleman will then be able to say whether he has received all the information he wishes or not. I am told the Department of Marine and Fisheries has not given the hon. gentleman all the papers in the matter. That information does not come from the minister, but from another source. I have no desire to withhold anything except what I think should not be made public at the present time; and, so far as I am individually concerned, I have nothing to hide.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. May I say a word in order to save time?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think it in the interest of the House that I should say a word. By declining to answer these questions, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) drives me to a position I do not want to take—he makes it necessary to have two discussions, one as to withholding the papers, and the other as to the facts disclosed in the papers I have received from the Department of Marine and Fisheries. At this period of the session, this will not be desirable. I should be driven to read a vast number of documents, and to comment on the refusal of the Minister of Customs. A great deal of time will be saved to the hon. gentleman and myself and the House if these questions are answered. They are capable of being answered, Yes or No, every one of them. If the hon. gentleman is not ready to answer the questions, I ask that they be allowed to stand.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) has already answered the question, declining—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But, Mr. Speaker, he—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am answering Mr. Speaker. Surely that will not disturb any hon. gentleman. The hon. minister asks that the question be dropped. I decline to agree to that. He has not answered the question, and until it is answered some way or other, I have a right to press it.

Mr. SPEAKER. But, if he declines to answer the question, I do not know—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But, he has not declined; he has suggested that I should make a motion for a return. I will read the question. I claim the right to ask my question, and we will see what the answer of the Minister of Customs is. I claim the right to ask my question and receive an answer from the Minister of Customs.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman has already received an answer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I asked question 33 in that form and the hon. gentleman said he would suggest to me that I should make a motion, but I received no answer.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is out of order in discussing it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If I am out of order I will conclude with a motion in order that I may discuss this question. I do not propose to be snubbed out. The different paragraphs will give us some reason for this extraordinary action on the part of the Minister of Customs.

The PRIME MINISTER. Order. The hon. gentleman has made his question and has received his answer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have received no answer.

The PRIME MINISTER. I raised the point of order. The hon. gentleman put his question in the usual form, which is: 'I asked question number so and so, which stands in my name.' He might have read it, but he selected to put it in the form which has lately become usual, and he has received his answer. The Minister of Customs says: I cannot answer this, let him move for the papers. The hon. gentleman declines to do that. But he has received his answer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask my right hon. friend if he thinks the statement that he has made, assuming the question to be exactly as he states it, precludes any hon. member from moving the adjournment of the House and discussing this question on the motion?

The PRIME MINISTER. I do decidedly think so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I claim that it is strictly in order for an hon. member to move the adjournment of the House and to discuss this question, which is one of the greatest possible importance.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Understanding that the hon. gentleman took the extraordinary position that after having suggested to me a course that I did not adopt, my mouth should be closed from reading the question, I propose to put myself in order by moving the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing the action of the Minister of Customs, supported as he is by the government, in attempting to withhold information in regard to his own department, information which would enable this House to judge as to the manner in which he discharges the responsibilities which devolve upon him. When the House understands the nature of these questions which would be disclosed by reading them, I think there will be a suspicion not creditable to the Minister of Customs in consequence of his disinclination to give a full answer. These questions largely refer to matters that will not be explained by any papers laid on the Table of the House, they relate to very important facts which, if answered by the Minister of Customs, would be most material in the consideration of his conduct. By sheltering himself behind a return, the House will see that he will escape from having those important facts laid before the House at all. I grant that they are largely matters that can be inferred, but not explicitly brought out within the papers within reach. But we do not want mere inferences, it would be more satisfactory to have the facts, and I was willing to take them from the official head of the Customs Department. Those questions on their face, suggest an unparalleled state of things. The hon. gentleman knows that is one reason why he is so delicate in regard to answering these questions. He has practically two departments of the government against him. He knows that the Justice Department never approved of his course or of the course his officials adopted in this matter. He knows that the papers within reach and outside of the Department of Customs altogether, refer to a document, opinion or letter of the Department of Justice which characterizes the conduct of his officer, whom he is attempting to shield, as 'high-handed and improper.'

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. How does the hon. gentleman know that?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. By the statement of this officer, D. W. Davis, collector of customs, who refers to Mr. Newcombe's reference to his conduct as being high-handed and improper. That is the document I wanted in full. I did not wish to have the mere reference of the hon. gentleman's officer to this document, and this is the document the hon. gentleman positively declines to give. It is in regard to that he has been searching for precedents; it is in regard to that he has Sir John Bourinot's book on his desk; it is in regard to that he has endeavoured to shelter himself by these technical rules that have been honoured more in the breach than in the observance in this House; it is in regard to that the hon. gentleman wants to keep back information; it is in regard to that he has declined to give a full and frank statement of the facts which an answer to these questions in No. 33 would bring out. But the facts of the case are extraordinary. I could not understand any other opinion coming from the Department of Justice than the one that was put before Mr. D. W. Davis, when the Minister of Customs was not altogether influenced by the considerations that now apparently influence him. He was asked, in compliance with the advice of the Department of Justice, to account for his conduct, to disgorge the money that he had taken out of the hands of a company doing business in the Yukon, instead of which he handed it over to Mr. F. C. Wade, of exceptional notoriety, the gentleman who holds so many government offices, and in connection with those offices is able to obtain extraordinary treatment for his clients every time he has to deal with the government. A public company, owning the steamer Yukoner, an English company, incorporated in London, sends that ship into Canadian waters. The law is violated time and again, according to the information that I have. The owners of the ship are wronged by Mr. D. W. Davis, and Mr. F. C. Wade is benefited by $750 of hard cash actually wrung out of that company and put into the pockets of Mr. F. C. Wade. All that is disclosed by the papers within reach. When these London capitalists seek the protection of the Canadian government against an officer of the Canadian government, whose action has been reported upon by the Department of Justice as high-handed and improper, and that department is at first induced to call on Mr. Davis to account for his conduct and to act according to the advice of the Department of Justice and settle with the parties who are complaining of this wrong and extortion, the hon. gentleman's officer practically writes back to him and tells him that he will do nothing of the kind, he sets at defiance both the Department of Justice and the Department of Customs. It is an unheard-of thing. He writes this report in answer to the instructions of the department and it is written without prejudice—without prejudice, Mr. Speaker. He is deigning to do this, he is really not bound to do it, but he is writing back to the department without prejudice because I, D. W. Davis, propose to accept all this responsibility; let this company go into court and sue me. I acted personally; I did not act as collector of customs. Why are you sending me letters from the Department of Justice, and why are you sending me letters as the head of my department in regard to these thousands of dollars I have in my hands and which went into the hands of F. C. Wade? Let these people come here and engage in litigation in this Yukon territory; let them hale me before the courts, personally, and I will answer them. I write you this as a matter of favour; I write it without prejudice. Down comes the hon. Minister of Customs, after this rough handling from the collector, and actually sends these papers to the parties interested, who have been wronged, and asks them to remember that these papers are being communicated to them without prejudice. The hon. gentleman thinks it enough to say that they may have their remedy in the court.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will lay the papers he is quoting from on the Table after he is through?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I intend to deal with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) at arm's length.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Certainly, when he is quoting from documents, he will lay them on the Table?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If I can get my hands on them; probably, I will be able before I get through, to send for them and I will read them. But, as I said, I am dealing with the hon. gentleman at arm's length. I am doing this without prejudice, to use the hon. gentleman's words. I am speaking from recollection; I am not speaking of all this in a positive way after the hon. gentleman has refused to give me any official information. After he has driven me to the information I have and driven me to the information I have so far as I can recollect it, I have to give it as far as I can, and I am giving it tolerably well. I was mentioning something of the history of this extraordinary case and the more extraordinary conduct of the hon. Minister of Customs. I believe there is a sense of shame in the hon. gentleman in regard to this. I believe it is an excuse for his conduct to-day, that, instead of answering frankly and fairly these questions, or, when he reached one of them, saying that he did not consider it in the public interest that he should answer it, he has attempted to shirk his responsibility. I think, perhaps, after all, that it does him credit that he can see the extraordinary position in which he is placed. Shortly put, these are the extraordinary facts: An officer of his department at Dawson City, who is the collector of customs, is clothed there, also, with the authority and powers of shipping officer. Claims were made against a ship that was then in port of a large amount of money by the crew and the master of the ship against the owners and against the ship. There is no Admiralty Court at that place, and the claims were presented to the collector of customs, who is an officer of this government, whether a customs collector, or a shipping officer, is wholly immaterial. After a discussion with the solicitors representing the owners of the ship, Messrs. White & McCaul, the collector came to the conclusion that it was right to clear the ship, and she was cleared from the port of Dawson. After that occurred, Mr. F. C. Wade appeared on the scene—either before or after—and invoked the good offices of the collector of customs. He could do nothing as to the claim, whether it was good or bad, against that ship so far as arresting or detaining the ship was concerned by an admiralty warrant as there was no Admiralty Court in the district. His only remedy against the owners of the ship was to proceed in a court of law. The condition of the law was not a matter of his responsibility, but, the remedy for these parties was, as I have stated, wholly outside of the admiralty jurisdiction and the admiralty process. But, Mr. Wade and Mr. Davis have appeared together in several capacities on occasions other than this, and Mr. Wade was able to induce that officer to violate his duty and to adopt a course of conduct that the Department of Justice characterized in a communication sent by it to the Department of Customs, and transmitted by the Department of Customs to the collector at Dawson, as high-handed and improper. He was induced to violate his duty, and without authority or warrant, to arrest or detain that ship again after having cleared the ship as collector of customs, to put officers on board of the ship to detain her, to proceed to act as an arbitrator between the parties to decide upon the merits of these claims, and finally to pay over a large sum of money, some $5,000 odd, I think, which had been put into his hands as collector of customs, which he had been forbidden to pay by the parties who had put it into his hands, saying that they had put it in under coercion and by force of the necessity of the case in order to get their ship out of the port, and who asked him to keep the money in his hands as collector until they could put the facts before the head of the department at Ottawa, or until they could get justice in the regular way in a court of law. But, having succeeded in furthering Mr. Wade's wishes, the collector arbitrarily proceeded, in the face of the protest and behind the backs of the owners of the ship, to hear Mr. Wade, to hear his clients, and to award this money for wages in settlement of their claim, and then, on the top of it, he took the balance of $750 over the wages, for Mr. Wade's fees, that would not have been allowed in any court of law if the matter had ever gone through, as any lawyer in this House will know, and handed that over to Mr. Wade. When these people complained of this state of affairs, and this state of facts, which is practically admitted, as these papers will show, then they appealed to the responsible head, to the man who should either vindicate his officer or suffer with him, when he stands by him in committing a wrong, the hon. Minister of Customs, with the advice of the Department of Justice, and with practically the same advice, as I shall show, from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, is content to take this gentleman's answer, away back from Dawson, that, as he assumes personal responsibility in this matter, these parties must look, not to the Department of Customs for their remedy, but that they must look to him personally for their remedy. And he tells them to go to Dawson, and in that region settle the question of right or wrong. It is the most extraordinary case as between an officer of a department and the head of a department that I have ever heard of. It is, I think, without precedent, even since 1896, and I am certain it is without precedent anterior to that date. The hon. gentleman was afraid to answer this question :

Did the firm of F. C. Wade (Messrs. Wade & Aikman), on July 10, 1899, request D. W. Davis, collector of customs at Dawson, to refuse clearance of the ss. 'Yukoner' until the wages of the crew were paid ?

In the first place, so far as that goes, the papers disclose that that was the fact, and the question could have been answered 'yes.' It was necessary to put the question in order that the House might understand what a succinct statement of the facts would imply. In connection with that request, which was most improper, it put the collector to work, and the collector went at Mr. Wade's bidding to bring the influence and weight of his office to bear in a matter in which he had no concern whatever. After listening to the solicitors of the owners for a while, and being clearly advised that he was improperly interfering in this matter, he did clear the ship.

2. Did the collector of customs clear the ss. 'Yukoner' and afterwards, at the request of Mr. F. C. Wade, detain the said vessel? If yes, what are the respective dates of clearance and detention?

Mark you, Mr. Speaker, it is important to remember in connection with the consideration of this case, that while to-day the Minister of Customs is satisfied with Mr. Davis's statement, that he acted in this matter personally, I have no doubt whatever, that the correct answer to that question would be that it was as collector of customs that Mr. Davis, after the clearance, did detain that vessel. The minister surely would not pretend that his officers would dare use their authority as collectors of customs in that manner, and afterwards that he should be permitted to say to the parties aggrieved: Although our officer, as collector, did detain your vessel, he now tells us he did it in a personal capacity, and you are referred to him; you can obtain no redress at the hands of his employers, nor will we meddle in the matter. That, surely would not be the attitude of any well advised department of government. It is only but reasonable that the Minister of Customs would take the responsibility with the official information before him of saying in what capacity this officer acted, after he had once cleared the vessel, and again put officers of the law on board to benefit Mr. F. C. Wade personally, to put $750 into his pocket, that he could have got in no other form, and to pay the claims that Mr. Wade's clients were pressing against that vessel.

3. If yes, in what capacity did Mr. Davis act in clearing the said vessel, and in what capacity did he act in detaining her after clearance?

That is a matter that should be cleared up, wholly regardless of what the company may be advised it shall do. Speaking personally, I do not know whether this company intend to go to law, whether they intend to file a petition of right, or whether they intend to accept the invitation, and sue Mr. Davis, away up in the Yukon. That cannot contribute anything to the discussion in this parliament. The question that concerns the House, is the administration of the Customs Department, and whether the House approves of the ratification by the minister of this extraordinary conduct on the part of a subordinate, who is already condemned by the Department of Justice, as we shall see.

4. If Mr. Davis detained the said vessel after clearance granted, under what statute and section thereof or under what authority did he act ?

There is the pinch. There is the reason why the opinion of the Department of Justice is withheld. The Department of Justice referred to this officer's conduct as high-handed and improper, and the reason it did so is, that there is no statute, and no authority for the conduct of that officer in holding that vessel under the circumstances. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), was ashamed to stand up here and admit, after the letters he sent to that company, that his officer, though he acted without authority, was still personally responsible.

5. Did Mr. Davis, in connection with the claim against said vessel, allow the firm of F. C. Wade (Messrs. Wade & Aikman) the sum of $750 for legal services rendered to the master in the prosecution of the crew of the 'Yukoner,' notwithstanding the solicitors or the owners of the vessel had declined to prosecute under the facts alleged?

I was entitled in every sense, and this parliament was entitled to an answer to that question.

6. Did the collector of customs at Dawson receive in his official capacity a cheque for $5,099.45 from the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner' after tying up the ship subsequent to her first clearance?

That was brought about in this way, and it indicates the extraordinary powers that are exercised by the officers of the government in the Yukon to their own advantage, and for their own purposes. For instance, by reason of Mr. Wade's influence with the collector of customs, the owners were put in the hands of this officer, who paid no regard to the law whatever, and they were compelled to give the collector a cheque for that large sum of money, rather than have their vessel detained in consequence of which they might possibly lose a great deal more. The owners were coerced by this Mr. Davis, backed as he was and aided and abetted by the other official of the government, Mr. Wade, acting also personally, and for his own benefit; and the owners for their own protection, made that cheque, as I am informed, payable to this man as collector of customs. I have not got the cheque, and that is the reason of the question. This English company thought they would be safe in doing that. They thought that although this man was at a long distance from the central authority, yet he was an officer of the Canadian government, and if they paid $5,000 over to him as collector, they thought they could enforce the good offices of his superiors, and that this man could do them no wrong, unless the Minister of Customs thought there was no justice in their case, and that the officer was right. Now, the papers would not show how that cheque was payable in the ordinary course, but whether the minister brought down the cheque or not, there is an important question put, and I am entitled to a distinct answer to it.

7. Did the owners of the 'Yukoner' request an accounting and return of the said sum, or at all events that it be paid into the court of the district, pending the determination by the proper court of the question in dispute between the vessel owners and the master and mate of the said vessel?

If the answer would be, as I suppose, that this was paid by cheque to the collector of customs, the House will see at once how important the next question becomes, because surely no member on either side of any experience in government matters, will say, that money paid under such circumstances to a government officer does not entitle the person paying, to an accounting by that government officer. No one will deny that his superiors should see that he does render an account, and not drive the company to a personal remedy against the government officer, as an individual.

8. Did the Department of Customs obtain any opinion or advice on the subject from the Department of Justice?

It is quite clear that they did. The papers in my possession show it. My correspondence with the Minister of Customs shows that he will not produce that report. Well, that should be brought in some proper way before this House. It should not be left to me to make these statements in debate. I have the right, at any rate it has been the usual practice, to have all these preliminary facts settled officially; and the official way to settle them is by putting a question across the floor of the House in this manner, and getting the official and formal answer, instead of reading correspondence that may have passed between the minister and any member of the House. The next question is:

9. Did the Department of Customs on December 16, 1899, request Mr. Davis, 'in view of the opinion from the Department of Justice,' to arrange a settlement with the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner.'

Instead of being told to wait for papers to come down some day, and to look over them at my leisure, I was entitled to the only answer that could have been given to that question, an answer in the affirmative.

And yet, mark you, Mr. Speaker, this is the position from which the hon. gentleman shrinks, after having ordered his officer to follow the opinion of the Department of Justice in regard to this large sum of money, $5,000 odd, which he obtained, in his official capacity, from one of the public, whether an Englishman or a Canadian. Having told his officer to follow the advice of the Department of Justice, the department is now backing up this man in leaving these parties, who come with their grievance and with an admitted state of facts, to take their remedy against Mr. Davis personally, saying: 'We have been only asking these questions of him and sending the answers to your solicitors without prejudice.' The next question is:

10. Did the opinion from the Department of Justice, if any, refer to Mr. Davis's conduct as 'high-handed and improper'?

The hon. gentleman jumped when I referred to that, and said: 'Where did you get that?' My answer is, from Mr. Davis's declaration as to that part of the opinion of the Department of Justice. Perhaps that is the most important part. It is the most important part from the point of view of these people who claim that they have been wronged by an officer of the Department of Justice, and cannot obtain the good offices of that department to right their wrong.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). What is Mr. Davis's reply to that?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Davis's reply I will give shortly, and I will venture to say that any one who hears it read will understand that it was not Mr. Davis's reply, but the reply of Mr. F. C. Wade, who was using the collector from start to finish, and who made $750 in the transaction. But, it is in a reply signed by Mr. Davis, in which he impertinently and most offensively deals with the opinion of the Department of Justice. The next question is:

11. In reporting to the Department of Customs, did Mr. Davis say he was 'submitting to all these details without prejudice,' and did he comply with the advice of the Department of Justice as above in question 9?

I am entitled to a definite statement in reply to these questions. There are occasions, hon. gentlemen will remember, where this procedure is not followed, when a member is chided because he did not obtain the correct and official statement before coming to any conclusion; and now, when I attempt to obtain official information, which could have been given in a very short time, and which would have employed the clerks of the department but a short time to prepare it, the hon. gentleman endeavours to withhold the information, and to drive me to a course that would not secure the answers to the question. The next question is:

12. After communicating the report of this public officer to the solicitors of the ss. 'Yu-kcner,' did the Customs Department of Canada write to the solicitors, on April 21, 1900, and say: 'This information as received from Mr. Davis, together with a copy of further statements submitted by him in relation to this matter, has been furnished to you (without prejudice)?'

A technical position, to say the least of it—a most extraordinary and disgraceful position from the point of view of a government. Just fancy any department of government in England communicating with a party claiming to have a grievance, and handing out information in regard to the manner in which a public officer got $5,000 odd, and saying to the party who is asking to have his grievance adjusted: 'There are the facts we give in regard to our public officer, but do not use them against us or against him, but go to law with him. We give you the information sub rosa, or relying on your honour not to take advantage of it either by petition or right against the Crown or by seeking your remedy against the officer.' I venture to say that there is not such a letter from any other department of the government to private parties seeking to have a grievance of that character redressed. Why, every bit of that information we are entitled to in this House. Every bit of that information the Minister of Customs has said to-day he would lay before parliament. Then, why did the department endeavour to protect this officer or to protect themselves in this manner? The Minister of Customs thought that by doing all this he could avoid this question being considered, or his conduct or that of his department being considered: he thought he could avoid the censure of another department, the Department of Justice—could avoid the contrast between the Department of Marine and the Department of Customs. I will say for the Department of Marine, that as far as the correspondence has gone, that department, as is usually the case in connection with its part of the administration of the fishing laws, has acted as a department should. It had nothing to conceal. There was one document as to which I did not quarrel with the minister when he said that instead of it being a report, as I supposed it was, it was a memorandum from an officer to the head of the department, and he declined to bring it down, for I had no order of the House directing him to lay it on the Table. But, the importance of that is a matter of no concern to the hon. minister. The fact is, that from the documents that do emanate from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, there is not, perhaps, equal condemnation, but there is condemnation of the conclusion at which the Department of Customs arrived.

13. Does the Department of Customs, or the Crown, represented by the Canadian government, admit that it is accountable to the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner' for disposal of the proceeds of a cheque made payable to the collector of customs at Dawson for the sum of $5,099.45 in connection with the ss. 'Yukoner'?

And we have lived in Canada to see the day when a member of parliament, asking a question of that kind, is told that the Minister of Customs declines to answer. All I ask is for the Crown to let the claimant know what he has to meet in case he should file a petition of right and the fact be granted and should proceed in law against the Crown. Is the Crown going to gainsay his liability? The Minister of Customs wants to preserve his recourse without prejudice and shelters himself by saying that he declines to answer. The papers he will bring down will not answer that question definitely, and the only way to obtain the information, as he suggests, is to try a suit with him or his officer. By question 14. I ask:

Has the Department of Customs declined to account for the money in question?

And by question 15:

15. Has the Department of Customs left the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner' to its remedy against the collector of customs personally in connection with the receipt of the said $5,099.45 and repudiated all responsibility for his conduct in regard thereto?

Surely it was only right that the issue should be defined in connection with this matter. Then I asked:

16. Has the hon. the Minister of Customs declined to produce for the information of parliament the opinion of the Department of Justice referred to in question 9?

Before this debate concludes on the motion for adjournment, it will be quite evident to every one, whether the Minister of Customs takes part in it or not, whether any one follows me or not, that these questions should have been answered without any loss of time, that they are reasonable questions from any point of view, whether this man has a good or a bad claim, and that when a member of the House, as I have done, intimates to the minister that he deems it his duty to bring the subject up in the House, so as to put himself properly before the House, by asking officially for the information which had been refused to him privately, the only proper course for the Minister of Customs to take was to stand up manfully in his place and answer the questions one way or the other.

I can refer to several cases in which all the papers were brought down in connection with claims against the government, whether the government admitted or denied its liability. I have revised a great many such cases which came up in the session of 1891, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in opposition, and also in 1893, and could not find one in which, with regard to a claim on the part of an individual against the Crown, correspondence had taken place, the Crown refused to disclose the fullest information. So that this case seems to stand alone.

In order that the hon. minister may see that I am not unreasonable in my desire to have these questions answered, I make this proposition to him, that I will disclose to him what he is so anxious to ascertain, namely, the papers I have in my possession. If the hon. gentleman still persists in his extraordinary attitude, I will, by way of heaping coals of fire on his head, let him know how much information I have on this subject. Then, on another occasion, we will discuss the conduct of the government as indicated by such papers as they could not prevent falling into the hands of a member of this House. On the 19th August, 1899, the following letter was written to Major F. Gourdeau, Deputy Minister of Marine, Ottawa :

Re ss. 'Yukoner.'

Dear Sir,—On behalf of our clients, the Trading and Exploring Company, the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner,' we beg to present the following facts to your department, by way of complaint against Mr. D. W. Davis, the collector and shipping master at Dawson, in the Yukon.

The matter is fairly urgent, and the facts plain and, we think, undisputed.

In the third week of July last, the Trading and Exploring Company engaged a crew and advertised the 'Yukoner' to sail from Dawson for St. Michael's, Alaska, on Saturday, July 22. Previously the owners had interviewed Collector and Shipping Master D. W. Davis in order to make the necessary outward entry and procure the necessary clearance. Mr. Davis informed our clients that the ex-captain of the steamer, E. S. Morine, had lodged a claim against the vessel for $3,400, and that the ex-mate, D. H. Volkner, had similarly claimed $1,444—making a total of $4,844. The owners disputed these claims, admitting only $1,400 as being due to the ex-captain, and somewhat less than $500 as being due to the ex-mate. The owners called Mr. Davis's attention to the fact that he had no authority to prevent the vessel from clearing on account of any such claims filed with him; for that, if the ex-captain and ex-mate had any lien on the vessel for their wages, their proper course was to commence an action in rem, in which case the owners would be entitled to give security and obtain the release of the 'Yukoner'; or the claimants might proceed in an action in the court of the territory in the ordinary way. However, rather than have any difficulty about the matter, the owners deposited $3,500 in cash with Mr. Davis (being more than double the amount the owners admitted to be due), and also gave Mr. Davis the company's bond for $5,000 to indemnify him against any claims which might be made against him by reason of his clearing the vessel. The owners then told Mr. Davis that the claimants might proceed to sue in the usual way. Mr. Davis then gave the owners a receipt to the effect that the $3,500 was held by him to answer any judgment which might be recovered by Morine and Volkner against the company in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. Davis appeared quite satisfied; and, since everything else was regular, granted and issued a clearance for the 'Yukoner.'

On the 22nd ult., however, as the vessel was about to sail, Mr. Davis boarded the 'Yukoner' with a constable of the North-west Mounted Police, and stated to the company's manager, Mr. Wood, that he could not let the vessel sail, notwithstanding the clearance given. Asked for his reason, Mr. Davis replied that the ex-captain and mate claimed that they had a lien on the vessel, and that the $3,500 was not sufficient to cover their claims; adding that he had given the clearance in mistake. Mr. Davis then required the owners to give up the clearance which he had already issued; or, failing their so doing, he would place a constable in charge of the 'Yukoner.' The owners declined to give up the clearance, denying that there was any mistake in the matter, and urging that the money already deposited with him was there to answer any judgment that might be recovered. Mr. Davis accordingly placed a constable in charge, and the vessel was tied up.

Later in the day, Mr. McCaul, Q.C., representing the vessel-owners, attended with Mr. Davis at the office of Mr. Wade (Crown prosecutor), who was acting for the claimants, Morine & Volkner, when the matter was again further discussed.

That is, they all had to proceed not to the office of the officer of the government, but to the office of the Crown prosecutor who was representing private parties, who ultimately were benefited by the illegal, the 'high-handed and improper conduct,' to use the language of the Department of Justice, of the collector of customs.

Mr. BRITTON. Was there any libel or seizure?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There was no process of law whatever. And when I asked the Minister of Customs to-day under authority of what statute this was being done, he claimed that he had the right—and stands to it to refuse the information. There is no return that he can bring down that would support him. The only return that he could give that would throw light upon it, is the opinion of the Department of Justice, which he declines to bring down. Fortunately, a little of that happens to be included in the letter of Mr. Davis :

Mr. McCaul, on behalf of the company, then offered to deposit with Mr. Davis the full amount claimed, together with an additional $1,000 to cover any costs which the claimants might incur, the money to be held by Mr. Davis as security for any judgment that the claimants might obtain in a court of competent jurisdiction.

That was a pretty fair offer, as, I think, the hon. gentleman will see.

Mr. Wade claimed that they had a lien upon the ship and intended to enforce it, and that they had a right to detain the ship until they were paid.

The Minister of Customs will be unable to produce the report of the Department of Justice to that effect, or even to obtain the assistance of the Solicitor General in this House as a responsible law officer of the Crown to maintain any such position :

The company, on the other hand, submitted that the remedy the ex-captain and mate had, in respect to their alleged claims, was to proceed to an action 'in rem,' a right which is usually enforced by the arrest of the ship, in which case the company could procure the release of the vessel by giving security in the usual way and leaving the questions in dispute between the parties to be settled by the courts in due course. Mr. Wade desired that Mr. Davis should decide the matter; but the solicitors for the company pointed out that Mr. Davis had no jurisdiction, that at most he could only act as arbitrator, by consent, and that the company declined to submit the important questions of law and fact involved in the dispute between the parties to Mr. Davis for settlement. The matter thus stood over, the vessel being meanwhile tied up over Sunday, the 23rd ult., in charge of a constable.

Those who have followed the history of that locality will understand how important every day was to the company. The season is a limited one, and besides, there has been keen competition, unfair and illegal competition, against British bottoms by reason of the fraudulent transfers of American vessels to British registry in that district:

On Monday, the 24th ult., there was another futile discussion before Mr. Davis, who refused to do anything unless the owners would submit the dispute to his determination. Commissioner Ogilvie was then applied to, and asked to interfere; but Mr. Ogilvie could find no authority to enable him to interpose in the matter; Mr. Wade, as counsel for Collector Davis taking the position that Mr. Davis's powers were statutory, and could not be interfered with by Commissioner Ogilvie—

This was the conduct of this convenient gentleman, to whom I have the right to refer as the Pooch-Bah of that district, holding all these various offices. He appeared on this occasion, as the House will see, and as the papers show, as counsel for Mr. Davis, this self-constituted arbiter, in the capacity of their Crown officer. At the same time, Mr. F. C. Wade acts for private parties who are going to submit to the arbitration on decision of the collector of customs, a brother official. Mr. Wade, as counsel for Collector Davis, after having finished all he had to say as solicitor and counsel for these parties claiming against the ship—

—taking the position that Mr. Davis's powers were statutory and could not be interfered with by Commissioner Ogilvie, by virtue of any order in council, or as inspector of customs.

Because Mr. Ogilvie, the House will remember, was appointed inspector of customs, and I think the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) will agree with me—though on that point I am not at all sure—that Mr. Ogilvie had authority over Mr. Davis as inspector of customs, and that all his inspectors of customs exercise at different times very great authority over the customs officers in the various ports to which they go to inquire into or adjust matters:

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

The vessel consequently remained tied up until Tuesday, the 25th ult.

As matters were now getting desperate, Mr. Wood, the manager of the owners, the Trading and Exploring Company, pressed Mr. Davis for a release of the vessel, informing him that the detention of the 'Yukoner' was costing the company about $650 a day, and that he was most anxious to get down the river to bring up a barge with three or four hundred tons of the company's goods aboard, of the value of about $60,000, and that the company could not get the same up the river by another steamer at a less expense than $19,000. Mr. Davis remained obdurate; but, under stress of circumstances and in order to secure the release of the vessel, being unable to communicate with Ottawa, the company's solicitor ultimately deposited with Mr. Davis, on the 26th ult., the sum of $5,099.45, as required, signing at the same time the following letter to Mr. Davis:

Copy.

Dawson, July 26, 1899.

To the Collector of Customs,
Dawson, Y.T.

Re 'Yukoner.'

Dear Sir,—As our clients, the Trading and Exploring Company, are very anxious to get their steamer out (her detention costs $650 per diem), we hereby agree—on condition that you at once withdraw the officer you have placed in charge of the vessel and permit her to sail—to deposit with you the full amount of the respective claims of E. S. Morine and D. H. Volkner; and agree to submit the amount of their claims against the ship to your determination—the money in your hands to be applied in payment of the amounts found due by you.

Yours truly,

WHITE & McCAUL.

Mr. Davis accordingly, on receipt by him of the $5,099.45, withdrew the constable on the 26th ultimo, and the vessel sailed for St. Michaels.

The company claimed that they had been simply coerced into complying with the demand, by which Mr. Davis forced himself upon the company as a court to determine very important questions both of law and fact. The company's solicitors accordingly, the same day, wrote and delivered to Mr. Davis the following letter, having previously ascertained from Mr. Davis that he had not parted with any of the money deposited with him. The following is a copy of the company's letter of protest against Mr. Davis assuming jurisdiction to determine the question in dispute, and against his paying over any of the money deposited with him:

Copy.

Dawson, Y.T., July 26, 1899.

D. W. Davis, Esq.,

Collector of Customs, Dawson, Y.T.

Sir,—Owing to your forcible detention of the steamship 'Yukoner' after you had given the vessel her clearance papers, we were coerced into submitting to your demand that the dispute between E. S. Morine and D. H. Volkner on the one part, and the owners of the vessel, The Trading and Exploring Company, Limited, on the other, should be left to you to determine, and were forced to deposit with you in your capacity as collector of customs the sum of $5,099.45.

We wish to point out to you that there is no authority by which you can force yourself upon the parties as a court to determine the many difficult and important questions of law involved in the disputes between the parties. The law has provided the methods by which the master and seamen can enforce their liens, if any, and obtain payment of their wages—and we decline to recognize that you have any jurisdiction in the matter.

We consider your action in this matter has been illegal from the first, and must respectfully request that you should communicate with the authorities at Ottawa before attempting to deal with or dispose of the very considerable sum of money that our clients have been coerced into depositing in your hands.

We beg to notify you that until the question of the legal liability of our clients to pay the exorbitant demands of Capt. Morine and Volkner, is settled by a court of competent jurisdiction, and our clients are given the opportunity of establishing any defence, at law or equity, as well as any set-off or counter claim that they may have against the claimants, we forbid you to pay over any of the money extorted from our clients, and we shall hold you and the Department of Customs responsible to our clients for these moneys.

We again call your attention to the fact that these moneys were deposited with you only in your capacity of collector of customs, and again request that you report the facts (giving us an opportunity of stating our side of the case) to your superior officers at Ottawa, before assuming to deal with this very important and serious matter. This report to Ottawa is particularly desirable in view of the fact that you declined to recognize the commissioner of Yukon Territory as your superior officer or as having any jurisdiction to interfere in this matter.

We have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servants,

WHITE & McCAUL.

On the 28th ultimo, notwithstanding the foregoing letter of protest, Messrs. White and McCaul, the solicitors for the vessel owners, received a letter from Mr. E. F. Wade's firm, inclosing an appointment made by Mr. Davis for the hearing and settlement of the claims of the ex-master and mate, of which the following is a copy :

Copy.

In the matter of the dispute between the late captain and mate of the steamer 'Yukoner' and the owners of the said steamer.

I hereby appoint Friday, the 28th day of July, 1899, at the hour of 4.30 o'clock in the afternoon at my office for the hearing of the above disputes.

Dated at Dawson this 27th day of July, 1899.

(Signed) D. W. DAVIS,

Collector.

And it has the official stamp of that department. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, I say I am informed by the firm of Lewis and Smellie that the cheque for that amount of money was made payable to D. W. Davis, collector of customs at the port of Dawson, and not to D. W. Davis.

The solicitors for the owners of the vessel, did not, of course, attend on the above appointment—having already fully protested—but it is not likely Mr. Davis proceeded further in the matter or paid over the money.

The owners of the vessel submit that Mr. Davis, having given the 'Yukoner' a clearance with a full knowledge of all the facts, was functus officio, and that the whole of his action in afterwards seizing the vessel was a trespass.

Moreover, the proposition of the owners to deposit the full amount of the claims of the ex-captain and mate—exorbitant as they were—with an additional $1,000, to answer any judgment that might be obtained in a court of competent jurisdiction, was most reasonable; and we submit that Mr. Davis was not justified in further detaining the vessel for the purpose of forcing the owners to submit the matters in dispute to his final determination.

The owners, The Trading and Exploring Company, now ask that Mr. Davis be at once instructed to refund the company the amount thus deposited with him ($5,089.45); or, in any event, that Mr. Davis be at once instructed to hold the money subject to the determination of the questions in dispute by the court of the territories or to pay the amount into court. They further ask that Mr. Davis be prohibited from proceeding with any inquiry, or from paying over any of the money to Morine or Volkner.

Your immediate and kind attention to this matter, in the absence of the hon. the minister from Ottawa, will greatly oblige your obedient servants.

LEWIS & SMELLIE,

Agents for White & McCaul,

Solicitors for the Trading and Exploring Company, Limited.

That is their appeal to the Department of Marine on the supposition that this officer, as a shipping officer, was subject to that department. That letter was sent on the 19th of August. On the 22nd of August this firm of Lewis and Smellie wrote again to that department as follows :

Further to our letter to you of the 19th inst., and with reference to the writer's interview with you this morning, we beg to now point out that the alleged agreement to submit the claims of the ex-master and ex-mate of the 'Yukoner' to the arbitrament of Shipping-Master Davis—as contained in Messrs. White & McCaul's letter to the collector of customs of Dawson of the 26th ultimo,—is not in terms a complete agreement or submission under section 42 of the Seamen's Act, if so be that it is to be construed with reference to that section of the Act. It is not, on its face, an agreement in writing signed by both parties. It is not signed by or on behalf of the ex-master and ex-mate. Section 42 of the Act requires that both parties should agree in writing to submit the matter to the shipping master.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, however, will corroborate me in saying that the substance of this point is that the department did agree, and there is no dispute about it, that Mr. Davis was not acting as shipping officer, but was acting wholly as collector of customs.

The letter in question—subsequently protested and repudiated—does not purport to be such a submission. It does not comply with the conditions of section 42, and is incomplete. Moreover, it is alleged by the owners that it was obtained under coercion and duress. Nor does the Act provide for the deposit of money with the shipping master for the purpose of implementing any award made by him under section 42. There is no provision in the Act that the shipping master shall distribute any such fund, or insist upon a deposit for the purpose, as was done in this case. On the contrary, the vessel had been granted a clearance some days previously; but, alleging that he had acted under a mistake, the shipping master, notwithstanding put the police in charge and tied up the vessel for several days.

As the case now stands, the shipping master justifies his action with respect to the clearance by alleging that he acted under a mistake. The owners, on the other hand, promptly protested and repudiated the so-called agreement to arbitrate, on the ground that they had thus acted under coercion and duress. Both sides have, therefore, alleged grievances.

Under these circumstances, the department should accord the owners at least the same consideration that a court would do under similar allegations of fact, and should instruct Shipping-master Davis, we think, to report the facts fully to the department and meanwhile hold over both the determination of the matter under the alleged submission and the distribution of the fund pending instructions from your department. If Shipping-master Davis be directed to stay his hand and report fully, no one can thus be prejudiced.

Now, on August 22, the Department of Marine and Fisheries, sent to D. W. Davis, Esquire, collector of customs and shipping master, at Dawson, this letter:

August 22, 1899.

Sir,—I send you herewith two letters received by this department from Messrs. Lewis & Smellie, dated August 19 and 22, 1899, re ss. 'Yukoner.'

A faithful report is requested from you without delay in respect of the matters referred to in the inclosed letters, giving the reasons and authority for your course of action, and the facts relating to the matters in question as clearly and plainly as you can.

The foregoing request for a full and early report is concurred in by the Customs Department.

(Sgd.) JOHN McDOUGALD,
Commissioner of Customs.

Both departments request from this officer, a full report in a letter of August 22, 1899. Mr. Davis reports on September 26, to the Deputy Minister of Marine, as follows:

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 22nd of August last, inclosing copies of letters, received by you from Messrs. Lewis & Smellie, dated August 19 and 22, re the ss. 'Yukoner,' and in reply thereto, I beg to make the following report, namely:

That in or about the third week of June last the captain and mate of the ss 'Yukoner' arrived at this port and reported to me that the crew of the steamer had mutinied and had forced the captain to give up command, after which the captain and mate left the steamer and reached Dawson a few days before the steamer. That some time after the arrival of the steamer the owners took the side of the crew as against the captain and applied to me for a clearance; but, owing to the fact that the captain and mate had put in their claims for wages, I refused to clear the vessel until a settlement had been arrived at with reference to the claim so put in by the captain and mate. After several meetings between Messrs. White & McCaul, advocates, acting on behalf of the owners of the steamer, and Messrs. Wade & Aikman, acting on behalf of the captain and mate, and myself—

And myself, Mr. Speaker. This is the statement of Mr. Davis, in explanation of his course addressed to the Marine Department, and ordered by the two Departments of Customs and Marine.

After several meetings between Messrs. White & McCaul, advocates, acting on behalf of the owners of the steamers, and Messrs. Wade & Aikman, acting on behalf of the captain and mate and myself, and it being pointed out to me that there was no admiralty court established in the Yukon district, and all parties agreeing in writing, copies of which agreements or submissions are herewith inclosed, to refer the whole matter to me for settlement, I appointed a day for the hearing of both sides herein.

Nothing about the fact that the same day he had been told that this whole submission which took place, in consequence of the force, coercion and advice of the solicitor for himself, and of these parties claiming against the ship, was illegal and void. There was not a word as to that, one way or the other.

But instead of Messrs. White & McCaul or the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner' appearing, they then sent me in a written protest, a copy of which you have, and I adjourned the day of hearing of the dispute herein and gave notice again to Messrs. White & McCaul, calling upon them to appear under the terms of their submission aforesaid, and fixed another day for the hearing of the matter. Nobody appeared on behalf of the owners, so I proceeded to hear the respective claims of the captain and mate ex parte, and after all their evidence had been given—

These gentlemen were represented by the representative of Mr. D. W. Davis, and of the government.

I decided that they were both entitled to the moneys, which I gave judgment for, and accordingly paid them the moneys so paid to me for that purpose by Messrs. White & McCaul.

The facts contained in the letter to you by Messrs. Lewis & Smellie are not quite in accordance with the true state of affairs. I did clear the vessel upon the representations made to me by Messrs. White & McCaul that, upon their depositing with me sufficient moneys to cover the amount of the said claims, that all parties herein would be satisfied.

I have no doubt that this report that the hon. Minister of Customs will not produce, the report of the Department of Justice, which he wishes to hide, will state that this was the inception of the illegal conduct of this officer, pretending, or representing to any parties, that he had any jurisdiction, or right to interfere with the vessel after the clearance.

But immediately after the clearance had been given, I received a protest from Messrs. Wade & Aikman to the effect that their clients would not consent to a clearance being given, and that they would hold the vessel by virtue of the respective liens, so therefore I refused to allow the vessel to clear from Dawson, after which Messrs. White & McCaul wrote me the letter in which they agreed to submit the whole matter to me for settlement; a copy of this letter is inclosed, and Messrs. Wade & Aikman also wrote to me a similar consent, a copy of which is also inclosed. After the vessel had cleared and left the port of Dawson. Messrs. White & McCaul sent in to me their letter of July 26.

The date is the same as the date of the submission.

But seeing that the condition of affairs had been changed to such an extent as to hold the captain and mate here until midwinter, owing to the fact that the steamer had obtained her clearance and left Dawson, and owing to the fact that the parties had agreed to submit the matter to me for settlement, I paid no attention to their said protest, and proceeded with the inquiry which both parties had consented to my hearing.

So far as Messrs. Lewis & Smellie's letter of August 22 is concerned, I did not go according to the Seaman's Act, but considered that, as both parties had consented to my hearing the matter and giving judgment as to me seemed fair, that I was then in the position of an arbitrator appointed by both sides for the purposes of hearing and deciding any dispute that may have arisen between them and which they had consented to my disposing of.

This officer passes over entirely, all the illegal steps with which he is charged, and which he was called upon to answer—all this coercion, all these illegal acts, the result of which was to force these parties into this submission. He keeps harking, in this report, only upon this pretended submission. He passes over the protest of the parties who are willing that the money shall remain in his hands until the responsible heads know of it, and give directions, and who only ask him to stay his hand until they can get into communication with the head of the department. He passes over all of that, and simply dwells upon what happened after the coercion.

Mr. McMichael, chief inspector of customs, when here, went into the whole matter with me, and will no doubt give you a full report on his arrival in Ottawa.

I have the honour, &c.,
(Sgd.) D. W. DAVIS,
Collector of Customs.

Then, there are copies of these papers that I have referred—the submission of both parties.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, if he says anything about the taxation of Mr. Wade's fee of $750?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Nothing whatever, Mr. Wade, who was advising him, and also representing these claimants before him, advised him to pay $750 over into Mr. Wade's private pocket, and he paid it. With these disgraceful facts put before the department, two of them are ashamed of it, and two suggest that the man should be dealt with properly, but this department that did not wish these facts to be brought out to-day, the Department of Customs, not only shelters this man, and retains him in that position, away from the government, in the Yukon district, to discharge these responsible duties, having these great powers, but actually tells the parties who have a grievance, that for what Mr. Davis has done, he is personally responsible and that there the matter is to end.

Mr. PRIOR. Is there a report from Mr. McMichael?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have no report from Mr. McMichael, but, perhaps, the minister will tell me if he has a report from that gentleman on the subject.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will that report be produced?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If the hon. gentleman moves for the papers, I will bring down all the papers that I think proper to bring down.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The minister has already told me that the report of the Department of Justice will not be brought down, and I am, therefore, reasonable in asking whether this report will be.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I would ask the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) upon what he bases his statement, that Mr. Wade was acting for Mr. Davis in this matter?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Well, it is very poor authority, I admit. It is Mr. Davis' own written statement. I think the authority is poor, but Mr. Davis states it himself; and the minister will see how disgraceful the statement is in what it involves.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That shows that the hon. gentleman would do better if he had consented to the suggestion I made in the interests of justice, namely, that the papers should be brought down.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I prefer that.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Because from some of the documents before me, I think that what the hon. gentleman has now stated with reference to Mr. Davis was denied.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I speak, of course, subject to correction. I am reading from what, I have no doubt, is a correct transcript of most of the documents. The hon. minister will see that everything pertinent to this matter should be before the House in official form, and I do not wish to discuss it on information supplied outside of official sources.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Why not ask for the papers?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am willing to do so, but I tell the minister that these questions of mine would not be answered by the papers. They are pertinent questions, and he could answer them 'yes' or 'no,' or state which he did not feel warranted in replying to. But, when the minister tells me that the whole of these questions are to go by the board, and that I am to be swept off the deck by a brush of his hand, I claim my right to protest.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Which would not be answered by the papers.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I say that a great deal of them have been answered to-day. Since the minister attempted to throw aside my questions, he has, by his interruptions while I have been speaking, answered several of these questions that I sought a reply to. He cannot deal with this subject fully and satisfactorily without answering every one of them. I have a long story ahead of me. Forced to this position by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson), I say that if these questions, which are necessary for a fair discussion of the matter, are allowed to stand, and the hon. minister gives me the usual answers that are given in this House, I will postpone the discussion that has to be dealt with in a more formal fashion than this.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I would like the hon. gentleman to go on with his statement.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am perfectly ready to do so, and I was only modest enough to suppose that the hon. minister would prefer me to stop. I may tell the hon. gentleman that this now is only by way of meeting his request to tell him what information I had. He seems to think this is a game in which cards are played, and he has made the unfair request that I should show my hand.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think you are acting for Lewis & Smellie, the lawyers in Ottawa who have the case.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am acting in the interest of the public of Canada, who are interested in stopping these scandals in the Yukon. I am bringing to light information which I will put before the House, which is something unequalled even in the Yukon Territory, and which is directly connected with the Yukon maladministration. It shows a corrupt alliance between two officials of this government; it shows such a scandalous condition of things that the Minister of Customs is amazed when I call his attention to the language of a document which has been before him for a month. If the original document of Mr. Davis contains the statement I have read—from what I believe to be a copy—that Mr. Wade in this matter was acting both for him and for the parties claiming that money before him in that contest, the minister will agree with me that it is a gross scandal on the part of Mr. Davis.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is denied.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. minister will understand that I have read it from what purports to be, and what is, I have every reason to believe, a copy of a letter in his department. The hon. gentleman says it is denied, and to be exact, I will read it. It is from D. W. Davis, collector of customs, and is his report in answer to the joint demand of the Customs and Marine Departments. It says:

Dawson, September 26, 1899.

The Deputy Minister of Marine.

After several meetings between Messrs. White & McCaul, advocates, acting on behalf of the owners of the steamer, and Messrs. Wade & Aikman, acting on behalf of the captain and mate, and myself, and it being pointed out to me that there was no admiralty court

Does the minister mean to say that that language is not in the original document?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not know whether I have that. That is in the Department of Justice, I fancy.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is addressed to the Deputy Minister of Marine. I suppose the matter is not fresh in the memory of the minister (Sir Louis Davies), but is he positive there is anything wrong in that?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not recollect it at all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am not going to force the point. It may be the bad English of Mr. Davis, and that it means Mr. Wade acting on behalf of these people, and he (Davis) being present when this conference took place between them.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I thought it only fair to say that it is denied.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think the minister has any letter denying that statement. Of course, this question was brought up in very prominent form. It is possible, of course, so far as that is concerned, that Mr. Davis has not expressed himself properly. It does not matter, so far as the scandal in this case is involved, whether Mr. Wade was acting for him or not. That he was acting as Mr. Wade's tool from beginning to end, the papers that I have indicate only too plainly, and this conduct which the Department of Justice calls 'high-handed and improper,' I call, scandalous in the extreme. I have here a letter from W. L. Magee, for the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to Lewis & Smellie, as follows:

Ottawa, October 31, 1899.

In further reference to your correspondence respecting the ss. 'Yukoner,' I now inclose a copy of statement—

That is where the copy I read from came, the accuracy of which was challenged.

I now inclose you a copy of statement made by Mr. Davis, collector of customs at Dawson City, giving his version of the matter. You will notice by the latter part of Mr. Davis's statement that he in no sense acted in his capacity as shipping master or under the authority conferred on shipping masters under certain circumstances by the Seaman's Act.

I ask the attention of the House to what follows :

You will also notice by the first part of his letter that he acted in his capacity as collector of customs when he refused to clear the ship, and that he also acted in the same capacity when he subsequently cleared her, and afterwards detained her, apparently ignoring his former action in clearing the vessel.

There is the opinion of the Department of Marine, that it was as collector of customs that he did all these things, and he would be a bold man who would contend that a man holding the position of collector of customs could hold up a ship that had been cleared, and claim that he was acting only as D. W. Davis, and had no authority in any sense to do such a thing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is it a matter of liability of the government for the money ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not at all. The hon. Minister of Customs has several times attempted to throw me off the track. He has almost expressly stated that I was acting for the owners—acting in some professional manner, practically holding a brief. My position is not as representing any one in a professional capacity. It is as a member of the House of Commons endeavouring to obtain the fullest information I can for parliament, in order that we may consider whether a frightful scandal has not been perpetrated by an officer of the government, whether the conduct of that officer has not been condemned by the Department of Justice, and practically condemned by the Department of Marine, and whether, notwithstanding all that, the man is being shielded by the Department of Customs and allowed to remain in a most responsible position in the service of the country. Then, when we get the full facts, it will be a matter for consideration what this parliament ought to be asked to do in the premises. That is my position. This discussion is for the purpose of seeing whether or not I was justified in putting these questions on the paper, and whether under the circumstances, the Minister of Customs was justified in taking the extraordinary course he did, of telling me that such information as I could get out of the papers he might bring down I was welcome to, but that any question not covered by those papers would remain unanswered. I claim that that was so extraordinary an act on his part, and would be such an intolerable and improper practice if pursued in this House, that it was my duty to show what course this hon. gentleman has endeavoured for the first time in parliament to take. I have nothing to do with the question whether these gentlemen got a cent or not, except as a coincidence. I think it is a disgraceful thing that these men who were trying to do business in the Yukon were handled in this manner. To continue this communication from the Department of Marine :

I also send you a copy of the submission on the part of Messrs. Wade & Aikman and Messrs. White & McCaul.

You will notice that Mr. Davis claims that he acted in his private capacity as arbitrator—

That is, as to the disposition of the money. There are two questions : First, his trespass in regard to the ship ; and, second, paying money to Mr. Wade's clients. But here is the Department of Marine speaking, and every line seems to show that department to be in the right path :

—but I notice that the submission on the part of Messrs. White & McCaul is addressed to the collector of customs, Dawson City.

Under these circumstances, I think you will agree with me any future reference to the matter had better be made to the commissioner of customs at Ottawa—

Not, mark you, the ridiculous if not disgraceful answer which he finally got from the Customs Department, that it was not an official matter ; but the very proper and very regular suggestion that it was a matter for the Customs Department and not for the Marine Department, as the papers everywhere showed that he acted as collector of customs, and got the money for the Department of Customs.

—as the matter does not appear to be one within the province of this department. I have furnished the commissioner of customs with a copy of Mr. Davis's statement. I retain copies of the papers which you furnished this department for record of the facts, and have not sent them along with Mr. Davis's statement to the commissioner of customs. I presume you will furnish the commissioner with copies of them.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 113) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of the Frost and Wood Company (Limited).—(Mr. Cowan.)

Bill (No. 131)—from the Senate—for the relief of Edwin James Cox.—(Mr. Montague.)

Bill (No. 102) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of James Milne.—(Mr. Clarke.)

THE TORONTO HOTEL COMPANY.

The House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 114) respecting the Toronto Hotel Company.—(Mr. Osler.)

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). This Bill had already been before the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, and that committee has recommended it to the House, and hon. members will be disposed to endorse the recommendation of the company. Nevertheless, I do not think the Bill should pass without the attention of the House being called to it, because, in my judgment, although not in the judgment of others, it contains an unsound policy. It is a Bill to practically amend the charter of a great many Dominion companies with regard to the investment of moneys in a hotel in Toronto. There are some gentlemen, some of whom are members of parliament, who think that we throw needless restrictions around the operations of joint stock companies. We are familiar with the argument that a company is only a combination of men, and that whatever a man may do individually, there can be no great wrong in permitting him to do when associated with others in a joint stock company. But parliament has not yet accepted that argument as sound reasoning, but it has accepted as sound the principle that there should be restrictions thrown around joint stock companies, particularly those which have anything to do with trust funds. If, in a Bill relating to banks or insurance companies, the proposal were made to allow these companies to invest their moneys—trust moneys largely—in hotel stock, such proposal, I am sure, would not commend itself to the judgment of the House. Yet that is exactly what we are proposing to do in this case. The only excuse is that it is only one case and that it only refers to one city. We do not propose to do this generally, but propose that, as respects one hotel in one city, we will violate the general rule governing the administration of such companies. I know that the gentlemen connected with the enterprise are men of the highest character and standing, and no one doubts that whatever they undertake will be wisely done. But that does not alter the principle. Gentlemen connected with banking corporations and insurance companies are in all cases men of high standing, but notwithstanding their high position and reputation, parliament would not, as a general principle, permit them to invest their trust moneys in hotel stock. We are, therefore, proposing a departure from the general rule as respects the Toronto Hotel Company. The Bill, as proposed originally, provided that any company chartered by the Dominion of Canada should have this power, but I believe the company have amended the Bill so as to restrict the exercise of this power in some respects. It is only companies doing business in the city of Toronto or within a radius of one mile of the proposed hotel to which we give this power, but any company chartered by the Dominion for business throughout Canada may have an agency in the city of Toronto, and practically, therefore, the Bill is still a very wide-reaching one. In view of the strong desire of leading men to build a great hotel in Toronto, it may seem somewhat ungracious to question a move of this character, but there is a principle involved, and I am afraid that we are establishing a precedent which will be found very inconvenient. I do not see how we can justify a departure from the principle in the general law as respects one city and one hotel, without opening a door to an application for the same departure with regard to other cities and other hotels. I do not see how we can say that the general law is good, but that we will depart from it as respects the city of Toronto and refuse to depart from it in the case of Montreal or some other city. I am speaking only on the general principle, and I humbly submit that we are taking a grave departure from what is recognized as a sound principle respecting legislation on the investment of trust moneys.

Mr. E. B. OSLER (West Toronto). It is rather amusing to me to hear the hon. Finance Minister talking about a departure from sound principle, and objecting to certain corporations investing to a limited extent in this concern. You will remember that in the Banking and Commerce Committee last year, or the year before, a very prominent loan company applied for powers, enabling them to invest in any company chartered by any parliament of Canada, or by the Dominion, even to own the whole of their stock; so that they would be empowered to buy up any wildcat mine that might be chartered anywhere in the Dominion, to invest in street railways, railways, mines and telegraphs. A great deal of objection was raised, but the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), supported it in its entirety. He carried out his principle so far, that he brought in a Bill for loan companies generally, authorizing the loan companies, as a rule, to invest in any of these concerns. There is no loan company in Canada to-day that is controlled by Dominion legislation, that is not empowered to invest in these stocks. In view of that, it is rather interesting to hear this great protest from the departure from sound banking principles which is enunciated by the Finance Minister—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler), say what Act he refers to?

Mr. OSLER. The Central Canada Loan Company Bill. The minister and the government forced through that Act, under which the company has power to invest in the stock or bonds of any company chartered by any provincial legislature, or by the Dominion parliament, and that Bill was passed in spite of considerable opposition. I myself, pointed out in the committee, that the charter enabled the company to buy a loan company, to buy an insurance company, through that to buy a bank. But, in the other Act, there was a restriction made, I think, that, in connection with banks, there is only a limited amount of their capital to be invested, or a limited amount of bank stock is to be bought by one company. The ministers have very short memories, or they must have had a very poor understanding of the legislation they put through.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The ministers did not bring in such legislation.

Mr. OSLER. But the ministers approved it, and forced it through the committee.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, they did not.

Mr. OSLER. They supported it strongly. The Minister of Finance was there, and, I think, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), was there also, and I am very much mistaken, if he was not a strong supporter of the measure. I am not speaking of any uncertainty. I know what I say is true. Now, it may be quite true, as the Finance Minister says, that such a power as is here proposed, might be abused, if given generally. Yet, the banks, if not with the formal approval of parliament, yet with general approval, have contributed to the patriotic fund. I am a director of a bank of high standing in this country, and, as a rule, we are strongly against giving away our shareholders' money. But occasions arise, such as the making up of this patriotic fund for our soldiers in South Africa, and I do not think that any shareholder of any bank will object to contribution by that bank, in fact, I think the shareholders of a bank would object, if it did not take part in the general movement, and give its contribution towards this fund. The banks have also contributed to the fund for the relief of the Ottawa and Hull fire sufferers. It is a thing well recognized in this country and in London, in every banking institution in Great Britain. I think the Bank of British North America cabled a thousand pounds to be contributed to the patriotic fund. They had no right to do that by their charter; and if their shareholders called them to account, they must suffer for it. But they felt that they will be justified by the subsequent action of the shareholders. I have represented, for many years, a company having its head office in Aberdeen, and it is supposed that Aberdonians are not usually anxious to give away their shareholders' money. But, when our volunteers were sent to South Africa, the chairman cabled to give any subscription in reason, one or two thousand dollars, if a patriotic fund was being raised, and said the board would sanction it. Again, in Montreal and Toronto, in the building of the board of trade building, all the banks contributed. I think you will find it is a recognized principle, if there is any strong movement for the benefit of commerce in the large cities, the banks and financial institutions contribute toward it directly, according to their capital, or according as they think commerce will be benefited. Almost invariably they submit such contributions to their shareholders at their first annual meeting, and I have yet to hear one instance in this country, or in Great Britain, where such an act of generosity on the part of the directors was not confirmed by the shareholders. All, or nearly all, the banks contribute to the Dominion Rifle Association. In this particular case it has been felt, for many years, that Toronto is suffering materially, suffering financially through the want of a modern hotel. It is a very expensive matter to provide such a hotel, and many of the richest men in Toronto are rather imbued with the idea that hotel-keeping or contributing to a hotel, is a rather bad thing. Many of them, who would otherwise contribute, refrained from contributing because in a hotel, you usually have a bar. Now institutions have contributed very moderately, and, I venture to say, with great judgment, in connection with this hotel project, and, if they can secure the building of a hotel there, the contributions which they have voluntarily offered to make, will yield great service to the people of Toronto. I do not think there can be any reason of principle or any other reason against the proposal that is now made.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I confess I am very much surprised at the extraordinary arguments the hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler), who is supposed to be a financial authority in this House, has used in support of the Bill. The measure may be a good one, or it may be a bad one, but more irretrievably bad arguments than those of the hon. gentleman, I could not conceive of being used by any sane man. What does he say? He says that banks, trust corporations and loan companies, or the directors of these, from time to time, contribute certain moneys without authority, to patriotic and charitable subscriptions; and that he never knew a case where the shareholders did not afterwards endorse the action of the directors—

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler), went further than that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But I am talking about this particular argument. What did he intend the House to infer from that argument? Does not he know that directors, in such cases, act illegally and rely upon the fact that the shareholders will approve, and if they do not get the approval of their shareholders, they have to pay the money themselves? What has that got to do with parliament passing a law authorizing the directors to divert moneys from the purposes for which parliament has said the moneys should be devoted? I cannot conceive what the hon gentleman meant. Why, this particular Bill, which refers to a scheme passed through the local legislature of Ontario and no doubt a very good scheme for the establishment of a hotel in Toronto, provides that the moneys of the stockholders which were subscribed for certain specific purposes under the Bank Act and under the Loan Act, may be diverted from those purposes by the directors without the consent of the shareholders at all. That is what this Bill provides. If the directors of any one of these banks choose to devote certain moneys of the bank from the bank purposes towards the construction of a hotel in the same way that they devote money from the bank for the patriotic and charitable purposes to which he referred, and if the shareholders endorsed that action, who would complain? No one, no one would have a right to complain. The directors would do an act which in itself might be illegal, but would be made legal by the assent and consent of the shareholders. But that has nothing to do with the question now before the House, which is a very simple one. I regret that my hon. friend did not confine himself to an argument that this purpose was so good that the House ought not to refuse it, instead of arguing that the House ought to consent to all diversions of trust moneys—for that is what his argument amounts to—that may be applied for. Now, this construction of a Toronto hotel, is, as I said before, a very estimable object. The very names of those associated with the enterprise, and the arguments which have been advanced in committee and otherwise, convince me that it is a good thing to build a hotel in Toronto. It was a good thing to build a hotel in Montreal, it would be a good thing to build a hotel in Ottawa, a hotel where hon. gentlemen could get the best accommodation. But does that justify us in passing an omnibus Bill that every bank doing business in Ottawa should devote the moneys of its shareholders to the construction of that hotel, in whole or in part? The parties who subscribe or buy stock in a bank know that the funds of that bank are strictly limited for use towards certain purposes, are guarded and protected, and these parties know exactly what stock they are buying, and know that it is safe because it cannot be used for speculative purposes or other purposes than provided for by the Bank Act. Now this parliament comes in and says: Notwithstanding that you bought that stock and invested your money, whether it is $100 or a million dollars, with the statutory guarantee that the money should only be used for legitimate bank purposes and should not be used for speculative purposes, we say: We will sweep that away and allow the moneys to be used for any purposes they like. Does not the hon. gentleman think there is a gross violation of proper principle in that? It seems to me that there cannot be anything more vicious than the principle of the Bill. I concede that the object which the hon. gentleman has in view is a good one, I dare say it is, I have nothing whatever to say against it; but I say that to pass an Act declaring that the banks doing business within the radius of one mile from the location of this hotel can devote the money of the shareholders towards the construction of a hotel, is a violation of the trust under which the shareholders bought or subscribed stock in that bank. It does seem to me, and I say it with great respect to the House, that when you once adopt that principle you break down all the guarantees which shareholders have in the banks that their money should be appropriated and devoted strictly for the trust purposes with which bank moneys have been ear-marked by this parliament for the last 30 or 40 years. Our banking system has been a marked success in this country because of the conservative principles which have been applied to it; and the thin end of the wedge is now being introduced—not for a bad purpose in itself, but for a purpose altogether foreign to the purposes for which bank moneys ought to be used. I cannot conceive of a more vicious principle than that which is embodied in this Bill. Shortly it amounts to this: There is a local charter incorporating a local hotel, and that local hotel company comes here and asks that all banking and loan companies, and other companies chartered by the Dominion of Canada, if they do business within a radius of one mile of the location where this hotel is to be built, shall have the privilege of subscribing stock in it to an amount equal to $2,500 a year, tantamount to a capital of $50,000. That appears to me to be a violation of the ordinary principles which we have hitherto applied to banks, loan companies and other companies of that kind.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I agree with what the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has said that we would be adopting a very bad principle—not saying anything about the quality of the securities in which these incorporated companies may invest, because they might be considered good by some and not by others—I say the principle of introducing in an Act that has no connection with other corporations, a clause giving power to other corporations to invest their money in something that its charter does not provide for, is, to my mind, a vicious principle. Suppose any one wished to put money in one of these institutions and took the trouble to ascertain in what lines its money could be invested; he looks up the charter and there is nothing in that charter which enables them to invest a dollar of their funds in this class of securities he would feel safe. But he afterwards finds that in an Act which has no connection with these corporations, there is power given them to invest in such securities, what would he think of it? We are asked practically to amend the corporate powers of these institutions themselves. I say when we amend an Act of any incorporated company it should be confined to that corporation itself, so that any person looking it up might know the extent of the amendments whatever they may be. I think this should be done. But to amend, practically, the corporate powers of every corporation doing business within a radius of one mile of where this hotel may be located—we do not know what corporation it may reach or may not reach—and give them power to make an investment of this character. I think is a very unsound principle and one that the House should not accept.

Mr. E. G. PENNY (St. Lawrence, Montreal). I am very glad to hear the ministers so strongly oppose this Bill, because I think with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Sproule), that it is a very vicious principle. No doubt Toronto wants a hotel very badly, probably wants it from a business point of view more than any other city in the Dominion of Canada; at the same time I do not see why parliament should be called upon to aid the city of Toronto in building a hotel by diminishing the security of the shareholders in the banks. In the city of Montreal, for instance, we have had a very disastrous experience in the case of the Banque Ville Marie; and if the thin end of the wedge is introduced into our banking system, as proposed by this Bill, you will have all banks, loan and investment companies coming here and asking permission to invest not only in hotel schemes but in other schemes. I think it is the duty of this parliament to protect the investors as much as possible. Who are the bulk of the shareholders in a great many instances, not only in the larger banks, but in some of the smaller ones? A great many widows and orphans are induced to invest their money in these institutions. They do so believing that they have a certain amount of security and that that security is backed by the parliament of Canada. If you do away with this security you will find similar practices, perhaps, by unscrupulous bank managers and directors to those we have had in the case of the Bank Ville Marie, in the city of Montreal, and widows and orphans will be left, as they have been in this case, almost destitute. I cannot agree with the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), who has tried to make out a parallel case between this and the Patriotic Fund and the subscriptions to the Ottawa fire. I think these cases are totally different. When the banks contributed towards these funds it was a present they were making, pure and simple. The money was given by the directors for the shareholders, and it was a present which, I am sure, no shareholder, however large or small, in any bank, would question for one moment. But, when it comes to investing money, it is a different thing. It is true that we are asked here to consent to the banks only investing a small amount, but if it begins with a small amount, how are we to tell that it will not soon increase to a larger amount?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Fifty thousand dollars is the limit in this case.

Mr. PENNY. Yes. While $50,000 for the Bank of Montreal, or the Merchants' Bank or Bank of Toronto, is a small amount, when you come to the smaller institutions, it is a large amount, and it is an amount that no institution should jeopardize. Therefore, I think this Bill should be voted down and not passed.

Mr. CHRISTIAN KLOEPFER (South Wellington). Mr. Chairman, I do not think that hon. members quite understand the situation of the banks in Toronto in desiring to make subscriptions towards that hotel. The banks are all located within a quarter of a mile of the district where it is proposed to erect this hotel. In this proposal the directors know what they are doing. They will not lose any of the stockholders' money by subscribing to this hotel. The reason that they propose to subscribe is that they can get a street cut through between Yonge Street and Leader Lane that will improve the bank property and the business property in that neighbourhood. The banks will stand to gain more by this improvement than the subscription that they make. There is another consideration which weighs strongly with them, and it is that the city of Toronto needs a hotel very badly, and the erection of one will benefit the city.

Mr. T. D. CRAIG (East Durham). Mr. Chairman, I was at the committee when this question was discussed, and I think it is rather unfair to bring it up in the House when it was so fully discussed in the committee, and not only was it discussed in committee, but the Bill was passed by a large majority and with very little opposition.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. There was no division at all.

Mr. CRAIG. I was there, and there was a large majority in favour of passing this Bill.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. How do you know?

Mr. CRAIG. I know by what was said. After the matter was discussed it was allowed to go without the least opposition. I say that in the committee is the place to discuss this matter. There are members who take an interest in this Bill, and who are in favour of it, who are not here tonight. They had no idea that hon. gentlemen were going to discuss it again after it had been fully discussed in the committee. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was not there, unfortunately for himself, but that was his lookout, not the lookout of those who were there to take part in the discussion and urge their views upon the Bill. I quite admit that any one has a right to bring it up in the House, but it is hardly fair in view of the fact that members are absent who are in favour of passing this Bill, and who did not anticipate that opposition would be offered here. We are all agreed as to the principles of the Banking Act. We all believe that it should be maintained, and that people should be secured as much as possible in depositing and investing their money in the banks. But, we say that this is a special case. The hon. member for St. Lawrence division of Montreal (Mr. Penny) spoke about the Bank Ville Marie. But, I beg to point out that his argument in this particular was not at all applicable to this case. If the directors of the Bank Ville Marie had asked that they might have power to do what they did do, they never would have got it from this parliament. If that bank was ruined it was by actions which were not covered by the Banking Act, and which were done illegally by the president and the directors of that bank. This is not a case of that kind at all. These men come here openly and ask leave to do what they propose. They are not doing it under cover. They are not getting some one to discount a note who is known to be worth nothing and advancing money on that note to be invested in the stock of this hotel. They come here asking for this power, and the shareholders know well what they are doing. It is all done openly, and if everything was done as openly as this in connection with banking affairs, I do not think there would be much danger. Then, I wish to state that the amount is limited. Besides that, the contribution is voluntary. No bank is compelled to give this amount. Every bank is limited to $2,500 a year.

Mr. SPROULE. For twenty years.

Mr. CRAIG. Yes, for twenty years, but. I do not know that any bank is compelled to give $2,500 every year. No bank is permitted to give more than $2,500 a year. The banks are not doing this in a philanthropic spirit at all, as they made their contributions to the Patriotic Fund, but they are doing it on purely business principles.

Mr. CRAIG.

Another circumstance in this case is that the locality in which this hotel is proposed to be built is a part of the city that business is and has been leaving. If this hotel is built, as the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Kleopfer) said, a road will be cut through from King to Wellington Streets, running on a line with Victoria Street, and it will greatly increase the value of property in that part of the city. The erection of a palace hotel there will keep business in that part of the city, it will bring business to that part of the city, and the banks expect that it will increase the value of their property in that locality.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) advocate the principle, that if the construction of a hotel in any part of Canada will bring business to a particular part of a city, it will justify this parliament in authorizing banks to give money towards the construction of such hotels?

Mr. CRAIG. I am just going to advocate what I want to advocate. I do not admit anything that is put into my mouth. This is a special case, and we have not to consider a case that may arise when we are dead. We have to consider a case that arises when we are alive. I am not as much concerned as the present government are about establishing a precedent. We have heard a good deal about a certain matter not being a precedent before. I do not care about the precedent. If a matter commends itself to my judgment I am going to vote for it, precedent or no precedent. I am tired of hearing so much about precedents. The point is: Is this justified in the present instance? I think it is justified. The bank presidents and directors are business men. They are not doing this from philanthropic motives, but, they feel that they are acting in the interest of their shareholders, and the reason why this clause is put into the Bill was because it was felt that they could not do this legally and openly and above-board unless it was done in this way. They wanted to do it openly and they did not want to go behind the bush. I think parliament is quite justified in granting this request of these parties. It is a power which the parties applying for this Bill desire to have, and they believe that the building of this hotel will be a benefit to that part of the city where these banks and their customers are situated.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Chairman, the first argument of the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), namely, that there should be no discussion on the Bill because it was carried by a large majority in the committee, is an argument that is utterly unsound.

Mr. CRAIG. I did not say that.

Mr. SPROULE. That is in effect what the hon. gentleman said. That committee is composed of but a few members of the House, and every hon. member here will admit the wisdom of every Bill when it is reported from committee, being open for discussion as much as the House desires. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) says that this is a special case. Well, it must be a special case, or I would not expect to find a temperance man advocating it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This will be a temperance hotel.

Mr. CRAIG. I always stay at a good hotel, where there is one.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman told us this was a special case, and the special features which exist in his imagination are, that property is depreciating in value in that locality, and this is needed to do something to enhance the value of that property. Well, that is no reason why this House should depart from the well understood principle we have always followed in connection with a matter such as this. The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) said that the Central Canada Loan Company got these extensive powers. If my memory serves me right, we gave that company power to invest in the stock of other companies, but we did not give any other company power to invest in its stock. This Bill gives the corporation we are creating not only power to get money from any source it can, but it gives every corporation in the locality power to invest in its stock.

Mr. CRAIG. They have it now.

Mr. SPROULE. Not by any means. No banking or trust corporation has power to invest money in a hotel, except by mortgage on the real estate. A vicious principle underlies the whole of this measure. Suppose I am about to invest in a bank or in a life insurance company, and I look at their charter and I find they can only invest in certain securities, all of which I regard as good; but suppose, as in this case, they have power to invest in something else under some outside charter that has no connection with these institutions, then I am led to a false impression as to the security afforded me by these companies. That is where the vicious principle comes in. It is true, as the hon. gentleman said, that the amount is limited, but that limited amount is $50,000, and the intention evidently is to invest to the limit. We find that loaning companies, trust companies, banks, and insurance companies occasionally go down, and upon inquiry after the disaster, it is ascertained that either the managers of these concerns have been dishonest and practically stolen the money, or else that they have invested unwisely. This is one of the ways in which corporations might invest their money unwisely. You will find in the city of Toronto that the same man will be president of a bank, and be connected with loan companies and life insurance companies and other companies, and that he has power to go from one to the other and to advise as to the investment of the funds. I believe, Sir, that the principle of this Bill is a vicious principle, and the House has not been apprised of any special reason why we should pass it.

Mr. FIRMAN McCLURE (Colchester). I was one of those who at first was inclined to oppose this Bill because of the reasons given, that it was setting a bad precedent in violating the principle of bank charters which are intended for the protection of stockholders. But, Sir, the Bill as it is now presented to the House, is much changed from that which was first presented to the committee. I believe that the principle is wrong, that this parliament should undertake by general legislation to give special powers to banks to invest their moneys in a particular way, but there is no harm in passing special legislation, if upon the face of that legislation it is made plain that it is special legislation, and if the particulars of the case are defined in such a way that they cannot go beyond the specifications set forth. In this particular case, as I understand it, an Act similar to this was presented to the Ontario legislature and was adopted, authorizing these loan companies and banks and other institutions to subscribe to this agreement and to take stock in this company.

Mr. SPROULE. The Ontario legislature could not do that.

Mr. McCLURE. Wait a moment. But it was found afterwards that that Act did not authorize the banks to take stock, because the Ontario legislature had no jurisdiction over the banks.

Mr. SPROULE. Of course.

Mr. McCLURE. Certain institutions that the Ontario legislature had control over, subscribed to the agreement, and as regards those companies the provincial Act was good. The object of the Bill before us is simply to supplement the Ontario Act and to give these companies power which the Ontario legislature wanted to give them, and in words did give them, but in effect was not able to give them. The specifications here are set out very clearly, and it seems to me that the only question this House has to consider is, whether or not under the special circumstances of this case it would be justifiable for these banks to invest their funds in this particular enterprise. As to this law being a precedent, let it be understood that the preamble of the Bill distinctly states, that it is because the Ontario legislature has passed a similar Bill and it is desirable to supplement it by legislation here, that we desire to pass this Act.

Therefore, if any other scheme comes before this House, no matter what merits it may possess, unless it also can be supplemented by the statement it has received the endorsement of the local legislature, this would be no precedent for similar legislation.

Mr. SPROULE. If the Ontario legislature does an unwise thing are we to follow it up by doing another unwise thing?

Mr. McCLURE. I do not say anything of the kind, but I do say that the Ontario legislature is in as good a position to judge of the merits of this scheme as this House is.

Mr. A. T. WOOD (Hamilton). The Bill now before the committee is one that should receive the hearty assent of the whole House. The parties to this Bill are acting in the interest of the shareholders and the stockholders they represent. Not only personally, but through the institutions over which they preside, and the confidence of whose shareholders they have, they are largely interested in this enterprise. It would be a very strange thing if this House were to step in and say that it knows better what are the best interests of the parties than they themselves know. As the hon. gentleman (Mr. McClure) says, this Bill cannot in any way be taken as a precedent. It is so hedged and circumscribed that a similar case can scarcely arise. I do think that in the interest of the property holders, in the interest of those who are largely concerned in these various institutions, this Bill should pass, and I would point out that these gentlemen are subscribing more largely in their individual capacity than almost anybody else. Therefore, if this legislation is prevented, it simply means a very large loss, not only to the banks, but to various property owners in that vicinity. If the gentlemen understood the situation, they would see that the radius in which the subscription will take place is only a mile, and only a very few institutions can be affected. So far as the loan companies are concerned, they have a perfect right to do what is proposed, without asking the consent of this House. It is only the banks that come under the jurisdiction of this parliament, and my impression is that every stockholder of every bank that will subscribe to this hotel company, would gladly endorse the action of the directors. In fact, if they did not make some effort to secure the present value of the property, and keep it from going down some 30 or 40 per cent, as it will do, unless this scheme is carried out, they would deserve the censure of the stockholders.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). An examination of the names of those seeking for this privilege is the best possible guarantee that can be given to the parliament of Canada, that their request is a reasonable and just one. For example, I find among the names, that of Byron E. Walker, the general manager of the Bank of Commerce; that of Daniel R. Wilkie, the general manager of the Imperial Bank; that of Duncan Coulson, the general manager of the Bank of Toronto; that of John Herbert Mason, the president of the Canada Permanent Loan Company, the largest mortgage company, I think, in the Dominion of Canada; that of George Gooderham, president of the Bank of Toronto; that of W. H. Beatty, vice-president of the Bank of Toronto; and that of the Hon. Mr. Forget of Montreal.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is the hon. gentleman not reading the names of the incorporators of the Toronto Hotel Company?

Mr. CLARKE. Yes, and these are the gentlemen who are to be the first directors of this company, and whose monetary institutions will be affected by the passage of this Bill. If the local circumstances were known to the members of this House, I am perfectly satisfied that there would not be the slightest opposition offered to this Bill. These gentlemen pointed out through their solicitor, to the Banking and Commerce Committee, that if they desired, they might have accomplished their object in another way—in an underhanded way, so to speak.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. How?

Mr. CLARKE. The solicitor of the company, made the argument before the committee, and pointed out how it could be done; but he said that they preferred to come frankly before parliament, and ask for these privileges, feeling sure that no reasonable objection could be urged against their request.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). While we all, I think, would agree that exceptional legislation of this kind is not desirable, still, it seems to me that, in view of the limitations imposed, a great many of the arguments used against this Bill are more imaginary than real. It has been suggested that for a bank to invest any portion of its capital stock or funds in enterprises of this kind, is taking a risk not contemplated by its shareholders. I might point out to the House, that banks are every day lending money on the shares of companies, which are in no better position than this company. For example, suppose this company were incorporated, and had a capital stock of one million dollars, it would be perfectly within the power of a bank to lend a million dollars on the security of the stock of that company. How do you guard against that? By putting in charge of your banks, men of sound business capacity, and making them subject to the will of the shareholders. So far as any danger of that kind is concerned, the interests of the shareholders of any bank in Canada, are probably well safeguarded by its directors; but if any question should be present in the minds of the majority of the House, with respect to that point, the Bill could be amended, by providing that the funds of a bank should not be invested, except by a vote of the shareholders at the annual meeting. For my own part, however, I would be inclined to support the Bill without any such provision, for the reason that every day of the week, moneys of the banks of Canada are loaned on the security of shares, debentures and bonds of companies, and the shareholders in all such matters must be allowed to depend on the judgment of the directors whom they have appointed to manage the banks.

Mr. SPROULE. I want to say a few words with reference to the argument addressed to the House by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), in parading before us the names of a number of prominent men of financial standing. We are accustomed, when Bills are submitted to us, to having such names paraded before us, as those of provisional directors; and, I believe, these names are often put in for that very purpose, although the men may have nothing to do with the company after it is floated.

Mr. WOOD. The gentlemen whose names are paraded are the very men who have instituted and have promoted this thing from its very foundation. Mr. Gooderham, one of the largest capitalists, the president of the Bank of Toronto, and Mr. Beatty, the vice-president, are really the men who originally promoted this scheme.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), although he interrupted me, has not given us any information; for what he states was already stated by the hon. member for West Toronto. The fact that these names are paraded is no guarantee that the men will have anything to do with the company after it is formed.

Mr. CLARKE. The financial institutions over which they preside are the institutions which are asking for this right.

Mr. SPROULE. Why do they not come with their charters and ask for it?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would like to ask whether, as a matter of fact, these gentlemen, whose names are mentioned—Mr. Gooderham and that class of men—are actually investing their own money in the enterprise.

Mr. WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. SPROULE. They are simply on paper as provisional directors. What they may do in the future is another thing. After the company becomes a corporate organization, they need not of necessity be in it. If some such provision as that suggested by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), were inserted, that before the money of any corporation were invested in this way, the question should be brought before the shareholders at an annual meeting, and a fair majority gave their assent, it would be less objectionable. But I still hold that the pernicious part of it is this, that we are amending the charter of every moneyed corporation, if they have an office within one mile of this hotel. If these corporations would invest in this enterprise, and have not an office within that radius, all they have to do is to establish an office there and they will be enabled to do so, although no such power is given to them in their charters originally.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Do I understand my hon. friend to say that in this Bill we are going to take the capital without consent of any of these companies in which they are directors? It appears to me that we may safely leave in the hands of such gentlemen as are in control of all these large institutions in Toronto, the investment of their funds in this enterprise if they see proper to make such investment. They have shown themselves eminently qualified to protect the interests of the parties they represent, and I hope my hon. friend will not feel it necessary to raise any question on a matter of this kind.

Mr. SPROULE. If the integrity and the ability of these men are sufficient guarantee, why do we limit by law their right to make investments? Why do we exclude them from investing outside of certain institutions?

Mr. HENRY CARGILL (East Bruce). I think that the monetary institutions of this country are ably presided over by men quite competent to guard and protect the interests of the shareholders. As a matter of fact, we have been giving charters to companies, which contain unlimited powers as regards the investment in securities and stocks. Take, for instance, the gold mining companies. They are permitted to issue prospectuses, headed by the names of leading citizens as guarantee of their integrity, even by the names of ministers, and on the strength of these, poor innocent people are induced to buy up shares in bogus mining corporations. I, for one, think that there should be an Act passed by this paternal government to protect these innocent investors from being swindled into purchasing such mining stocks. Why, Sir, we remember that one of these mining companies was boomed in London, England, by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries because it was being promoted by one of the hon. gentleman's supporters. But as far as the present Bill is concerned, I think there is a great deal of merit in it. Not only the leading citizens of Toronto, but the leading citizens of the country surrounding, are willing to back up this enterprise, and I am quite satisfied it is a good undertaking. If I had any surplus money to invest, I would very much prefer taking a block of stock in this proposed hotel to investing in a great many stocks of companies given charters by the government of this country.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hour for private Bills has expired.

YUKON—CLEARANCE OF STEAMSHIP "YUKONER."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). Before recess, I was performing a duty that was somewhat suddenly cast upon me by the action of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), in declining to answer the very reasonable questions I put to him concerning a matter of considerable importance. I was referring at some length to the correspondence that is within my control, and which brings out very clearly the extraordinary facts connected with the administration of the Department of Customs, and had come to that action on the part of the Department of Marine and Fisheries which reflects very seriously on the subsequent action on the part of the Department of Customs.

From the statements of Collector Davis, the Department of Marine and Fisheries reached the very proper conclusion that all that he had done in the premises he had done by virtue of his office, and that consequently the matter was one for the Minister of Customs to deal with. In so far as I refer to the collector of customs or any of the other officers concerned, I do so only for the purpose of drawing attention to the conduct of the minister who is responsible, and who so far as supported or protected Collector Davis in taking gross liberties in his position, by which the rights of other parties have been very seriously affected.

A letter from Lewis & Smellie, the solicitors for the Trading and Exporting Company, the owners of the steamship Yukoner, gives the facts very distinctly up to this time. That is a letter to the Minister of Customs at Ottawa, dated 4th of November 1899, which reads as follows:

In accordance with the request contained in the letter to us herein of the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries of 31st ult., informing us that this matter had been transferred by that department to you, we beg herewith to inclose you copies of the following documents herein:

Letter from Lewis & Smellie to the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, August 19, 1899, containing a resume of the facts, embodying certain correspondence herein lodging the complaint of our clients, the Trading and Exploring Company (Limited), of London, England, the owners of the vessel 'Yukoner.'

Letter from Lewis & Smellie to the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, August 22, 1899.

Letter from the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries to Collector D. W. Davis, of Dawson, August 22, 1899, countersigned by Commissioner of Customs, requesting a faithful report, without delay, in respect of the matters referred to in the foregoing correspondence, and asking Collector Davis his reason and authority for his course of action and the facts relating to the matter as clearly and plainly as possible. A report of the collector, D. W. Davis, to Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, dated September 26, 1899. A letter from the Department of Marine and Fisheries to Lewis & Smellie of the 31st ult., covering copy of Collector Davis's report.

The Department of Marine and Fisheries points out, in a letter to us, of the 31st ult., that Mr. Davis states that he did not act—

I ask the attention of the House particularly to this statement:

—that Collector Davis states that he did not act herein in his capacity as shipping master, under the Seamen's Act, but, as appears from his report of September 26 last, that he did, however, act in his capacity as collector of customs when he at first refused to clear the 'Yukoner,' and that he also acted in the same capacity when he subsequently issued a clearance to the vessel (on or about July 31 last), though afterwards, apparently ignoring his former action in clearing the vessel, he appears as collector of customs to have detained her. (It is worthy of remark that Collector Davis, in his report of September 26 last, makes no reference to his original clearance of the vessel.) As is also pointed out by the Acting Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the same letter, Collector Davis claims that he subsequently acted in his private capacity as arbitrator, and not under the provisions of the Seamen's Act; although the letter of alleged submission to arbitration by Messrs. White & McCaul (acting for the owners of the vessel), of July 26 last, was addressed to him as collector of customs at Dawson.

As you will see, Mr. Speaker, every opening that the collector attempts to take advantage of to escape from responsibility as an official is blocked by his own report that I have already read, and that is now being commented upon. That is to say, it is as clear as possible—it is so clear that it was admitted by the Department of Marine and Fisheries—that in all these matters he had acted, as he alone could act in that connection, as collector of customs. It is possible, had he attempted to act as shipping master, that there were certain things he could have done. But he himself has lost the advantage of such position by saying that he did not so act.

We regard the report therein of Collector Davis as wholly insufficient, considering the nature of our complaints (copies of which were forwarded to him), and considering the form and contents of the request of the two departments, contained in the letter of the Deputy Minister of Marine to Collector Davis of August 22 last.

Mr. D. W. Davis's statement, however, that he acted in his private capacity as an arbitrator between the parties, and as such dealt with the owners' deposit, exacted from them by him as collector of customs, simplifies the issue to some extent.

Although the owners deny Mr. Davis's right to proceed and act as he apparently has done, we think that both the department and the owners are entitled to know all the subsequent facts of this case. Collector Davis has refused Messrs. White & McCaul, representing the vessel's owners, further information, and in his report to the department tacitly refuses your department the necessary detailed information, sheltering himself behind the allegation that he acted in his private capacity as an arbitrator with respect to the disposition of moneys received by him as collector of customs.

Now, I call particular attention to the next few lines, because it will be seen that the contention or submission of the solicitors for the company commended itself to the judgment of the Department of Customs, and at this time the department saw no reason to assist Mr. Davis in his attempt to shelter himself. They saw no reason to conceal from the parties affected the fullest disclosures of all these papers and proceedings. Messrs. Lewis & Smellie continue:

We think that the department, in justice to all concerned, should obtain from Collector Davis the minutes of the evidence taken by him under the alleged submission to arbitration, the detailed claim filed with him of the master and mate, and all other exhibits in question, the award he purported to make as arbitrator, an itemized account of his disposal of the $5,099.45, paid by the Trading and Exploring Company, and details of the date, manner and method of his payments and vouchers therefor—the whole without prejudice to the rights of the owners of the vessel.

We are instructed that these moneys were distributed and paid by or through Mr. F. C. Wade's firm, the solicitors for the master and mate, and not by Arbitrator Davis. We are also instructed that the claims of the master and mate, thus paid, comprised not only claims for wages, but also a solicitor's fee of $700 and upwards, payable to Mr. F. C. Wade, and claimed as a disbursement by the master in connection with the prosecution of the crew of the 'Yukoner,' notwithstanding that the solicitors for the company, the owners of the vessel, had declined to prosecute the crew under the facts alleged.

The facts in this case, thus far disclosed, speak sufficiently for themselves; but we would fail in our duty to our clients if we did not now take occasion to point out that Collector Davis, having granted the 'Yukoner' a clearance, was subsequently guilty, on his own showing, of using his official position as collector, by tying up the vessel, for the purpose of obliging the vessel-owners to pay him, as collector of customs, the large sum of $5,099.45, in respect of a claim of third parties with which he had no concern. If the claims of the master and mate were valid, the ordinary legal procedure was open to the claimants.

We charge also, although Collector Davis now purports to have acted in his private capacity as an arbitrator with respect to the determination of the dispute and the distribution of the moneys deposited with him as an officer of the Crown, that there was no sufficient submission to his arbitration, and that the alleged submission was revoked by the solicitors for the vessel-owners on the ground of coercion, the same day it was made and before any pretended evidence was taken thereunder, and that Mr. Davis has acted without authority either by statute or agreement in proceeding after protest to disburse the money he has done.

The money of the Trading and Exploring Company (Limited), having been received by the solicitor of customs at Dawson, in his official capacity, to the amount of $5,099.45, the company ask the Crown to account for the same, and renews its request of August 19 last for a refund of the amount; or, at all events, that the $5,099.45 be paid into the court of the Territories pending the determination by the proper court of the questions in dispute between the vessel-owners and the master and mate of the 'Yukoner.'

Mr. Davis seems to have acted herein largely at the instance of Mr. F. C. Wade (who represented the master and mate of the 'Yukoner'). Considering Mr. Wade's official position as the chief law officer of the Crown in the Yukon Territory, from whom the public is entitled to expect protection, his conduct in this matter leaves much to be explained.

Now, that summary of the history of the case did not, at that date, November, 1899, strike the Minister of Customs as at all unreasonable, because I find that on November 18, the Minister of Customs instructed the following letter to be sent to Messrs. Lewis & Smellie:

Customs Department, Canada,
Ottawa, Nov. 18, 1899.

Messrs. Lewis & Smellie,
Barristers, Solicitors, &c.,
7 Ontario Chambers, Ottawa, Ont.

Gentlemen,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th instant re ss. 'Yukoner.'

The subject of your complaint is under consideration, and will be dealt with by the minister on his return to the city.

There was a reference this afternoon to Mr. McMichael, and I was unable to remember at the time whether any report of his was in my possession or under my control. I find a reference here:

S. W. McMichael, chief inspector of customs, reports that Mr. D. W. Davis informed him that 'he proceeded with the arbitration, made his award therein, and paid the amount thereof, namely, $4,899.45 over to Messrs. Wade & Aikman, solicitors for the captain and mate. In this award was included a sum of $700, covering an account of Messrs. Wade & Aikman against the master of the steamer 'Yukoner,' for services to said master in connection with certain legal proceedings growing out of the mutiny, which account was included in the captain's claim against the vessel. Mr. Davis stated he considered this a reasonable and proper fee for the services rendered.'

Please state where the steamer 'Yukoner' is registered and the ship's registered number.

Another letter to the same firm from the Department of Customs:

Customs Department, Canada,
Ottawa, Dec. 21, 1899.

Messrs. Lewis & Smellie,
Barristers, Solicitors, &c., Ottawa, Ont.
Re ss. 'Yukoner.'

Gentlemen,—Referring to your letter of the 4th ultimo, in the above matter, I beg to advise you that D. W. Davis, collector of customs at Dawson, has been instructed to furnish the information requested in your letter and to arrange for a settlement of the matter between himself and the owners of the 'Yukoner,' or their representatives.

Referring to your letter of 4th ultimo in the above matter, I beg to advise you that D. W. Davis, collector of customs at Dawson, has been instructed to furnish the information requested in your letter, and to arrange for a settlement of the matter between himself and the owners of the 'Yukoner' or their representatives.

Notwithstanding that, it would appear from the information before me that this officer has never complied with these instructions that he had stood the department off, so to speak, and that now the department is assuming full responsibility for his extraordinary conduct in this whole business, and adopting his ridiculous statement that in this matter he is entitled to assume full personal responsibility. Those instructions to this officer from his head office are dated the 21st of December, 1899; and on the 10th of April, 1900, the department sends, not the information that was requested, not even the full report of Mr. Davis, in regard to the disposition of that money, but a garbled report, a report with a large portion of the whole struck out, with none of the information that this firm had asked on behalf of the owners, this record of proceedings, these vouchers in connection with the disbursement of their money, this information which the department saw fit to inform Lewis & Smellie supported their reasonable request that it should be furnished. This information that Mr. Davis was instructed to furnish has never been supplied; but instead of that comes a document never written by Mr. Davis, not of his composition. Any one who has had anything to do with Mr. Davis will understand, when I refer to the statements in his letter, that it is nothing but a repetition of the argument of Mr. Wade, who represented these claimants before him. In this letter of the 10th of April to Lewis & Smellie, the Department of Customs say:

We send you herewith the extracts from a report forwarded to this department from D. W. Davis, collector of customs, dated at Dawson, January 23, 1899, without prejudice, together with copies of inclosures therein referred to.

So that the minister and Mr. Davis have got into the same boat, and he is actually asking that this official document, this garbled document, should be read by the solicitors for the claimants here whose money had been so ruthlessly taken from them, 'without prejudice.' I do not know whether it was without prejudice to the Minister of Customs or without prejudice to Mr. Davis, but at any rate there it is. You will observe that Mr. Davis concludes his letter with the following observations, namely:

I would respectfully submit that—

Mark you, Mr. Speaker, after having absolutely declined, or to be precise, neglected, to obey the instructions of this department, after having defied the Department of Justice, after practically telling the Minister of Customs to attend to affairs here and he, Mr. Davis, would attend to his affairs out there, though he was acting as collector of customs, the conclusion of Mr. Davis' letter is this:

I would respectfully submit that if the owners of the 'Yukoner' think that I have acted outside of my jurisdiction, the courts of the country are open to them, and they should be left to the courts for the proper relief which they no doubt could get if they are entitled to it. I have acted throughout this matter with nothing but the strictest regard to the performance of my duty as an official, and to the proper and honourable performance of my duties as an arbitrator, and I would submit that under the circumstances I am entitled to the fullest protection possible.

In that same letter, where this officer is asking the department to allow him to assume personal responsibility regarding his duties, so frightened is he with even the few facts that he lets out in that report, that he asks the Minister of Customs, and the minister endorses his request, to treat all his statements in regard to that matter 'without prejudice.' Don't allow him to be prejudiced by any reports that he may make, don't allow the report to be used to his detriment. The Minister of Customs is not able to state to these parties what substance Mr. Davis had to respond to a judgment, what a judgment would be worth against him after all the costs, and expenses of suing this officer away up in the Yukon.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think the hon. gentleman now should read the inclosures that he has mentioned, let it all go on record.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I shall not read them all.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But the hon. gentleman says that the officer did not furnish the information that was asked for. Now, I want him, if he has those inclosures, to read them so that the House may see whether he had set the department at defiance.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I propose that the Minister of Customs shall read that, I propose that the Minister of Customs, if he dares, shall read that report from beginning to end without leaving out a single paragraph. I propose that he shall read to this House what he has denied to Messrs. Lewis & Smellie. But he is afraid to refer to this document, knowing the responsibility resting on him as a minister of the Crown, that by referring to it he is bound to put the whole document on the Table. But I make bold to say, and I will refer to parts of this letter in support of my statement, that Mr. Davis did not comply with the instructions to which I have referred and upon which I dwelt. The last instructions of the department were based on the reasonable request of Messrs. Lewis & Smellie, that he should give the detailed information, that he should supply the vouchers, that he should give the proof. I deny positively, that the Minister of Customs, from this correspondence, ever attempted to show that his instructions were obeyed by Mr. Davis after they were ignored. From these papers it appears clearly that Mr. Davis practically set the department at defiance after having absolutely ignored the advice of the Department of Justice to settle with the owners of the Yukoner. The position of that officer in the service of this government is such that he has been permitted to set at naught the instructions I have last referred to, has not supplied a copy of the proceedings before him in connection with his arbitration, he has not supplied the vouchers for the money paid out by him in regard to the $4,000 or $5,000. I make that statement based on papers that are in my hands, subject to being corrected by the minister when he is ready to divulge the whole record from the Department of Justice and the Department of Customs.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What inclosures are there that the hon. gentleman has before him which he has read?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have no inclosure except the report of Mr. Davis—the garbled report. I use the phrase not offensively, but the report that, on its face, shows that it is not a full report.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Did Lewis & Smellie not give all these documents and the vouchers to the hon. gentleman?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. So far as the papers before me are concerned, not a single line, not one of them.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Did they not get any of them?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. So far as the papers before me are concerned, not one of them.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What did they tell the hon. gentleman?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I want to meet fairly the suggestion made in the hon. minister's interruptions. What have I to do with Messrs. Lewis & Smellie? My point is that we, who are here as the people's representatives, in parliament assembled, are entitled to the whole record in connection with this case, whether Lewis & Smellie want it or got it, or whether Lewis & Smellie do not want or did not get it, that so far as this question of administration is concerned, so far as the action of the hon. Minister of Customs is concerned, we are entitled to the full record.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman has not moved for it yet.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will show that the hon. Minister of Customs has refused my request.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That he has refused in writing my request for the opinion of the Department of Justice. That, he may have had the right to do, but, he must also take the responsibility for doing it. He must lie under the suspicion that the surrounding circumstances would indicate that there was no reasonable ground for his action. I claim no more at the hands of this House than any other hon. member. So far as the report of Mr. Davis is concerned, if there is in the possession of the hon. minister a report other than the document I hold in my hand, that is a longer document, a fuller document, and these vouchers and details he is under every obligation to produce them, and, as far as I know, and so far as I am concerned, they do not purport to be produced by any of the passages in the report of Mr. Davis, to which I will refer.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That shows the necessity of having the papers before you.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Exactly, it shows the necessity of having the papers before the House before one enters into a full consideration of the question before the House.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I grant it, and I proposed by the series of questions which I put on the paper to-day, as my right was, to elicit from the hon. Minister of Customs all additional information to that which I hold in my hand, in order that, on a proper occasion, I might ask the House to consider a resolution, which I will put in your hand, Mr. Speaker, to suggest what my idea of the conduct of the hon. Minister of Customs is. The hon. minister, instead of assisting me to the end which now seems to commend itself to him, took the most extraordinary course of refusing absolutely to answer one of these questions on the Order paper. Was I to submit tamely to it? Was I to sit down without a protest, and a vigorous one? It was impossible for any man who respected himself in this House to do it. My only course was to put myself right before the House, to show why it was that I considered the action of the hon. minister unreasonable in the extreme, and to disclose the substance of the information upon which I felt warranted in putting this question before the House and the country, that they might say whether the hon. minister was warranted in saying, that if the hon. gentleman will make a motion I will bring down such papers as I see fit. Notwithstanding that, it is apparent to any one who reads this correspondence, that the papers he would bring down, keeping back the documents that he said to me he would keep back, the opinion of the Department of Justice, this question would not be all answered by the return he would make. Consequently, I have gone through a large portion of it, which was available whether the hon. minister willed it or not. Coming now to this second case of contumacy on the part of Mr. Davis, it becomes more important, since this man is allowed to remain in his position, since the hon. Minister of Customs stands there equally responsible with Mr. Davis, for every act he has committed in this matter, and since Mr. Davis is sheltering himself now behind the official back of his minister, the minister is the man with whom we must deal. It is not Mr. Davis. Under our well known system, it is the duty of the minister to deal fully with Mr. Davis, or to share the responsibility with him, or be wholly responsible for him.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. How?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. By turning him out of the service, if these facts are right.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. 'If.' Now I see what you are after.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. After Davis's dismissal?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, Sir, I am not after the dismissal of Davis. I am after the dismissal of the hon. Minister of Customs for assuming responsibility for his conduct. It seems to me atrocious in the extreme. Mr. Davis was appointed, I think, by the government of which I was a member. Mr. Davis was a Conservative in this House; he may be a Conservative now, but that has nothing to do with the question of his responsibility as an officer. The hon. Minister of Customs will not impute to me any personal motives in so far as I have referred to these facts. I have said nothing against Mr. Davis except as being information in the official documents.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman said that I should have dismissed him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I say so from these documents, certainly.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. From those documents?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Unless the hon. minister wishes to assume the responsibility for the conduct of Davis, Davis should have been turned out of office the moment he received a statement from an officer under him, which, having been submitted to the Department of Justice, to his own colleague, to the legal adviser of the government, elicited an expression of opinion from that department that his officer's conduct in dealing with money and in dealing with a private ship, was high-handed and improper. Have I said anything more against Mr. Davis than Mr. Newcombe has said, or the Department of Justice has said, in regard to this conduct? And should an officer be retained in his position whose conduct in dealing with private property that comes to him by virtue of his official position is high-handed and improper? Is the hon. Minister of Customs not in this position, so far as these facts now appear, as shielding and protecting an officer who has been described by the Department of Justice as having been guilty of an action which was high-handed and improper? If he says now that these are not all the facts, why would he postpone for a day a full statement in regard to this series of questions I put to him in order that he might bring out such facts as are not known to me? I did not rush pell-mell into this matter. Having these papers before me, indicating serious maladministration on the part of the Department of Customs, I deemed it my duty to ask questions of the character that I put on the Notice paper. The hon. Minister of Customs knows that he was not confined to the strict line of these questions, but that, under the rules of the House, a minister may answer a question fully and particularly, or if it be considered that it might be indiscreet to give the full answer which might be elicited, he may answer it not unfairly in that way. So that, having the fullest scope to answer this question, it was his duty to answer that which he saw fit, but, he saw fit, at this period of the session, to refer me to such remedies as I might have, and he followed that up with the suggestion that if I would put a notice of motion on the paper he would bring down what papers he saw fit. He never undertook to answer these questions, but, on the contrary, he declined. I know enough of the papers to know that the return which the minister was willing to bring down would not give the full information that these questions would have elicited had they been answered fairly. On January 23, 1900, this officer of the Customs Department says:

I am in receipt of your letter of December 16, ultimo, inclosing copy of a communication from Messrs. Lewis & Smellie dated 4th ultimo, respecting the detention of the steamer 'Yukoner' and also a copy of the opinion received from the Department of Justice in the same connection, and directing my attention particularly to certain requests made on behalf of the owners of the 'Yukoner.'

That opinion is undoubtedly based on a previous report as to the facts from Mr. Davis himself, and it is clearly in line with the conclusion of the Department of Marine which washed their hands out of the case. It is plainly shown that this officer in all he had done acted as an officer of customs, or at all events, under colour of that. Mr. Davis continues:

I am further requested in view of the opinion of the Department of Justice—

We are gathering a little light notwithstanding the refusal of the Minister of Customs to state what that opinion was.

I am further requested in view of the opinion of the Department of Justice to furnish the department with the information required by the owners without delay, and to arrange a settlement of the matter with the owners of the 'Yukoner' and to report my action in this regard to the department.

I say that this officer having been guilty of contumacy in refusing or neglecting to carry out his instructions to settle with the owners of the Yukoner, he is now protected by the Minister of Customs alone. The Department of Marine and Department of Justice have decided against him, and so we find him sheltering himself behind the Minister of Customs upon whose shoulders the whole responsibility now falls. This is the gentleman above all others who seems anxious that the full facts should not be disclosed. After having endorsed the request of the company to get full information, the minister declined to give the full answer of Mr. D. W. Davis, and the part that dribbled out is 'without prejudice to Mr. D. W. Davis.' I am not here to say that if Mr. Davis were not collector of customs, and were simply a private citizen who had not by virtue of any office obtained other people's property, that many of his reasons for disposing of this money are wrong. I will not enter into that at all, although it is all that Mr. Davis entered into. Mr. Davis pushes aside the department, and he says: I will tell you on what grounds I acted, but as an officer of customs I will not comply with your request: all that I do is without prejudice, and all that I do in regard to this official communication is as a private individual, and if these gentlemen want any redress let them sue me. Mr. Davis might not be worth a sixpence, but the company would have to spend thousands of dollars following him up on the chance of recovering something or nothing. I will read a part of the report of this gentleman who forced himself into a position as arbiter between these parties to show that he used his powers as an officer of the government to compel an arbitration which was not official. I will read the report to show how he accounts for what he did with the money that he forced out of private pockets. Here it is:

The next item which was not admitted by the company was the fee of $750 paid Messrs. Wade & Aikman for prosecuting the mutineers. These prosecutions lasted a long time and they were undertaken by the master for the purpose of regaining possession of his ship. At the time there appeared to be a good deal of question as to who represented the owners of the ship in this country as is often the case here.

So much as to the $750. The next reference in this extraordinary document which the minister did not see fit to put in the hands of the owners in full, contains this statement:

On the representation of Mr. White, Q.C., that the master and mate had concluded to submit their claims to a court, and that their case was then laid in court and pending, and that they were not relying on their lien, I granted the first clearance. I, however, withdrew my clearance and gave as my reasons that it had been obtained by misrepresentation.

This matter of lien is largely of Mr. Davis's imagination. In another part of his report he shows that one of his reasons was that a lien could not be enforced in legal proceedings up there, and consequently (as one would infer) he had acted in this high-handed and improper manner because he wanted to deal out his ideas of justice as between the parties. The legislature of his country, according to him, had not seen fit to provide the remedy that sailors have in other parts where there is a court of Vice-Admiralty, and therefore he, Mr. D. W. Davis, decided to supply this deficiency and to put his ideas of his own law into force with the assistance of the North-west Mounted Police. At page 3, he says:

It is alleged that Mr. Wade acted as counsel for me before Mr. Ogilvie.

I read this in justice to Mr. Davis, because of a remark that I made this afternoon founded on a letter of his which was ambiguous, and which, as I read it, seemed to state that Mr. Wade was his counsel. Mr. Davis gives it another meaning, because he denies that Mr. Wade acted as counsel for him before Mr. Ogilvie.

This statement is absolutely untrue. At no time during the entire proceedings did Mr. Wade act as counsel for me or in any way whatever. Mr. Wade appeared both before me and before Mr. Ogilvie as counsel for the master and mate.

But I do not withdraw the argument I have made, that all the papers I have had access to from beginning to end justify the inference that these two gentlemen acted together. They are both connected with the government of the country, they both hold official positions, and while Mr. Wade acted nominally for the master and mate, he was able to induce this brother officer to do that which the Department of Justice has denounced as high-handed and improper. This gentleman induced Mr. Davis, the collector of customs, to act in regard to that ship in such a manner that none of these reasons commended themselves either to the Department of Marine or the Department of Justice, nor can they commend themselves to any legal mind in this House.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Would the hon. gentleman say that if it were reported that Mr. Wade was acting as counsel for Mr. Davis, and that were accepted by the Department of Justice as correct, they would not be apt to take a stronger view of the conduct of Mr. Davis than they would if they knew that that were not the fact?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It would be an additional serious fact, but it would be, as I submit, only one of many serious and extraordinary facts. Supposing it were Mr. John Smith, wholly dissociated from the government service altogether, I cannot believe that the Department of Justice, with these papers before them which were before the Department of Marine would have used any other language than the language which Mr. Davis intimates they did use, that his conduct was high-handed and improper. Again he says:

Acting entirely on their letter of submission, I had changed the whole complexion of affairs by allowing the vessel to clear for ports in the United States, a foreign country, and had thereby to all intents and purposes deprived the captain and mate of their liens, or at any rate of all means of enforcing the same.

There is his justification. He is called in as arbitrator. He is seized of what he thinks to be the merits of the case; and for the sake of the argument, let them be overwhelmingly strong, let him consider that the greatest injustice was to be inflicted on this master and mate, it would be a perilous thing to go forth that this officer or any officer of the government would be warranted in taking the law into his own hands, and calling upon the police in any part of Canada to carry out his ideas of what ought to be done. Then, coming to the very awkward point which was referred to by the Department of Marine, that that submission was not to him personally, but to him as collector of customs. They did not care a fig for this man personally. It was because by virtue of his office he was able to imperil their property and cause an enormous deal of loss, that when this proposition of submission was made to them, they acceded to it. The facts indicate, and nothing in Mr. Davis report is to the contrary, that it was Hobson's choice. They had to submit, and they took care, as they were wisely advised, to submit to him, not as Mr. Davis personally, but as collector of customs, and to appeal that submission and protest against it. They made a most reasonable request which on its face showed evidence of good faith, not that their money should be paid back to them or that it should be put beyond the reach of the law, but that it should be held until they could communicate with this gentleman's superior officer. Mr. Wade, the Crown prosecutor up there, advised that Mr. Ogilvie, forsooth, although clothed with the power of inspector of customs, had not to do with him in reference to the matter, that he was not his superior officer, and was not entitled to give his idea of what was right between the parties. Therefore, their protest bore on its face every indication of good faith; for all they asked was that the money should be held for that purpose, or deposited in a court of law of this government's own constitution in the Yukon, there to await the decision of a proper legal tribunal on the merits. What better could have been accomplished? The reason of the thing itself suggests the most horrible suspicion of Mr. Davis, and Mr. Wade, and their relations with each other in this matter. Why would not Mr. Davis obtain the advice, regardless of technicalities, of Mr. Ogilvie as inspector of customs or as commissioner of the Yukon; or, if he was only wanting to see right and justice done to the master and mate of that vessel, why was he not willing, under the circumstances, to accept the offer to have that money paid into court to abide the decision of the court? But no; with the most extraordinary haste, with a celerity which is remarkable when we consider other things that have been done under that same officer in the Yukon, the hearing, the ex parte hearing, is pressed forward. After the protest he knew that these parties would not attend, the owners would not be represented, but would rely on the government of Canada; and this officer hastened forthwith to a conclusion, assisted by Mr. Wade, and then distributed the money before the department here could get its hands upon it or hold it for further consideration, as they might be advised by the Department of Justice. Then, referring to this submission to Mr. Davis as collector of customs at Dawson, this is the best defence he can make:

Although this is the case, I took it simply to be a matter of description.

And he took the check also, I suppose, simply as a matter of description, because it was made payable at Dawson—

I understood the arbitration was referred to me without regard to my official position.

That is the kind of arbitrator he was. First of all, he could not have reached that point unless he had been an officer of customs. These people dealt with him as an officer of customs; they paid him the money as an officer of customs; they addressed an appeal to him as an officer of customs; and his only defence is, 'I never took it that I was dealing with this matter as an officer of customs.'

And I ask you to compel them now to deal with me as a private individual and do not hold me accountable as an officer of customs.

Again in this report:

I acquainted Messrs. White & McCaul with the result of the arbitration and returned to them $200, the balance left over out of the amount deposited, and I have repeatedly informed them that I was reporting the matter fully to Ottawa. The allegation that I 'tacitly refused to make a full statement to the department' is of course absurd.

There is no full statement before this except the one—if it be a full statement—that

I read to-day. That was the statement which evoked from the Department of Justice the opinion that the conduct of the officer who made the report was high-handed and improper, and that he was to settle at once between the parties, and it evoked the order for another and a full account—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The subsequent report you have not got, apparently.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think that the Department of Customs is responsible for a great deal, if there is another report than the one I have referred to, for the correspondence I have read of Lewis & Smellie intimates exactly what reports there were, and I am referring to them one by one. I read this afternoon the opinion of the Department of Justice, and it was after that opinion was given that a peremptory order was sent to Mr. Davis; and so far as the intimation furnished Lewis & Smellie goes, I do not find that the Minister of Customs gave them any report that complied with that peremptory order.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that no report was received from Mr. Davis in reply to the letter we sent asking him for one?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am reading from that now.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the only report he had was that received by the Department of Justice before they wrote that letter.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, I say that the report on which the Department of Justice have given their opinion, and upon which the Department of Customs made a peremptory order, was the report that I read this afternoon, and that when this officer says in this letter that he had informed Messrs. White & McCaul that he had fully reported to Ottawa, that full report evoked the opinion of the Department of Justice to which I have referred.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That would not be the last report.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, in the last report he says: I informed White & McCaul that I reported the matter fully to Ottawa. I see what the hon. Minister of Customs means. He may be right. He has referred to that in this report. In this report, beyond his statement or argument, there was nothing left for him except to say that he was acting in this matter personally. Evidently it was by virtue of his office that he held the ship and collected the money, but in the eleventh hour he is left stranded with his only defence, that in all that he did he was only acting personally.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He forwarded the vouchers asked for.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He does not appear to have done so by this report.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But I am telling the hon. gentleman that he did.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will not dispute what the hon. Minister of Customs says, but there is evidently much left out. It is quite clear that this is the extraordinary position of the Minister of Customs in regard to this matter, that after the solicitors for the owners of the ship induced the department to send for vouchers and papers and all the particulars, this officer sends his report, but the department did not give Lewis & Smellie that part of the report referring to the vouchers and those particulars. They furnished a report from which portions had been eliminated, as shown by the stars marked on it. And doubtless when the Minister of Customs says that Mr. Davis did send the vouchers, his statement is based on that paragraph in the report which was eliminated from the copy sent to Lewis & Smellie. But Lewis & Smellie were entitled in all fairness to obtain from the Department of Justice this order for full particulars in regard to their clients' money. Why is it then that these gentlemen are denied any access to these papers? Why is any part of the proceedings withheld from them? Why are paragraphs eliminated from the report furnished by the Department of Justice? It cannot be for the purpose of justice; it cannot be for the purposes of having a full disclosure of their clients' affairs put before the solicitors, and yet when the Minister of Customs sent that letter of instructions to which I have referred, it was clear that it seemed to him fair and right that all that information should be obtained and, when obtained, should be put before Lewis & Smellie.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Do they say that they did not get it?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am reading the correspondence from which it is clear they did not.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. My impression is that they did, but I do not say that positively. I ask the hon. gentleman do Lewis & Smellie say that they have not received copies of the vouchers for this money paid out, and other particulars?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have not examined Lewis & Smellie on that subject.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. When the hon. gentleman is censuring the department on statements made Lewis & Smellie, for whom he is acting—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, he is censuring the department on papers furnished by Lewis & Smellie, who claim to have a claim against this government for thousands of dollars. Did Lewis & Smellie withhold from him the statement that they had got, what he now says they did not?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am much freer to answer the hon. gentleman than he is to answer me, because I have nothing to conceal, but I deny his right to persist in a statement absolutely without foundation, that in this matter I am acting for Lewis & Smellie. I have told him twice already that I am no more acting for Lewis & Smellie or this trading corporation, than he is. I have no connection with them outside of this House. My only connection with them, is that, as a member of parliament, they put into my hands what they represented to be a full statement of the information that the department was willing to give them. I followed that up by a private request to the Ministers of Marine and Fisheries, and Customs, for my own purposes, as a member of parliament only. I got the information voluntarily from the Department of Marine, which in this matter has conducted itself according to law, but I have been refused information by the Minister of Customs, who now seeks to obtain from me the sources of my information, and the whole contents of my information.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, I do not.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Time and time again, the hon. gentleman has asked me what I have, and where I got it, and how did I know about the report of the Department of Justice, and where did I obtain the information? I have answered frankly, and have nothing to conceal. I obtained these papers from the source I have mentioned, and then went to the only true source, where I expected to get a full report, which I said I wanted for a full discussion. Being denied my request, I took the only remedy left me, as a member of parliament, of putting on the paper the questions to which I wanted a reply. The Minister of Customs saw fit to tell me that he would not answer.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I said to move for a return.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It would be absurd to be satisfied with that after the hon. gentleman had told me that some of the papers he would not produce.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Would that have been covered by answers to questions?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, some of these questions relate to that, and there would have been no impropriety, though the document was not produced, in giving an answer as to the facts. On the contrary, there would be great impropriety in a member of the government attempting to shelter himself under any rule in order to refuse to answer. That is my contention. But, so far as this insinuation—or rather this bold statement made a moment ago, that I was acting for Lewis & Smellie, that I was acting for any individual, I utterly deny the statement as without foundation. This is submitted to me as a member of parliament for my own opinion, and I preferred to withhold any action in the matter until I could exhaust all sources of information.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Do not you think you should have waited a little longer till the matter was closed?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am perfectly free to deal with that point. The Minister of Customs intimated to me—though why I do not know, for Lewis & Smellie never told me that they proposed to file a petition of right, and it does not matter to me a tip of the finger whether they take one course or the other—the Minister of Customs has suggested in his letter in reply to my request for this full information, that there is a possibility that some one may be sued, and that therefore, this information should be withheld.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If there is an outrage, as the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) suggests, if these parties have been robbed—I think that was one of the expressions he used—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think so.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Well, that being so, and the courts being open to them, it is scarcely an unnatural supposition that they might look to the courts for their remedy. I am only a layman, but it does seem to me that that is not a very violent assumption.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does not the hon. minister understand that the question of whether they care to go into courts has nothing to do with it? They may be well or ill-advised, they may be the wisest fools in a case of that kind, but what have we to do with that?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. All I have to say is, I think the hon. gentleman should not use his position as a member of parliament to try to draw out in parliament something that will strengthen the case of men threatening a suit against the government.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I venture to say that the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), though he is much my senior in parliament, and though he is much my senior in years, never heard that miserable defence put forward by any responsible minister of the Crown in this House before. I challenge him to find, from 1867 down to this time, a minister so helpless, so fearful, so abject, as to put forward the excuse that it does not become a member of parliament to discuss a matter that may form the subject of a petition of right. This is the place for the airing of grievances, and when justice is denied by the government, the more imperative is the duty of the representatives of the people to ventilate these grievances on the floor of the House. The courts are the last resort. If you cannot by the good sense of parliament, and by the force of the facts, obtain justice, if the departments or the government cannot be purged either of understrappers or of responsible ministers who will not do their duty, your resort and your only resort, is the courts of law. There you can make your case on oath, and perhaps make it so strong that the minister will have to bow, if not the public opinion, to the authority of the court, and the judgment there obtained. But I am not to be precluded, no member of this House should be precluded from bringing forward a case of injustice, by the mere fact that there is a suit to be brought or a possibility of a suit being brought. But I am not going to deal with suits or with litigation, I merely wish to press on the attention of parliament the responsibility of the minister; I want to show the maladministration of the minister. I want to do full justice to the minister before proposing a resolution. But I will be frank with him and say that if I can get no more information than I am giving to the House from these papers, obtaining through the representation of this company, I will formulate a resolution and ask for the opinion of parliament upon it. I intimated to him that it was my aim, before discussing the matter, to be in possession of the fullest information. But, having failed, as he knows, I was driven to put that notice on the Order paper. Then the hon. Minister of Customs tried to brush the whole matter away, to postpone it, to keep back the information or to have me confined to such information as he saw fit to bring down. I was not content with that, and I am not content with it. What I wish to impress upon the minds of hon. members, as well as of the public, is the character of the case in which for the first time, at any rate for years, I have heard a minister of the Crown suggest that the report of the legal officer of the government should be suppressed and kept back from parliament. And, on the ground that there is a possibility of litigation, it is suggested that a member of the House should keep quiet. No matter what wrong had been done the wrong should remain unredressed and unconsidered, because the Minister of Customs himself had deemed it wise not to grant redress. I take full responsibility, however, in adopting this course I have, and I think I have made my object clear. In this report, this garbled report which does not pretend to be full, this statement is made by the officer who was pretending that there was a lien and it would have been lost if the ship got away. He says:

This 'ordinary legal procedure' was certainly not open to the master and mate, as there was no admiralty court here at the time. As the master and mate were driven from the steamer penniless, to deprive them of their lien—

Deprived them of their lien! If there was a lien, there was the ship in the jurisdiction of the court, in the jurisdiction of this officer who detained her and with the assistance of the mounted police, tied her up.

As the master and mate were driven from the steamer penniless, to deprive them of their lien and relegate them to a suit in Victoria, where the owner of the vessel resides and which is the port where the vessel is registered, would simply deprive them of every cent to which they were entitled.

The owner of the vessel does not reside in Victoria, the owner, as the hon. Minister of Customs is aware, from the correspondence, and as I am told, although I do not know, is a company composed of leading English capitalists. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) knows who they are—because I am told they waited on him—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have no idea who they are; they waited on me—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And they were courteously received. Little they thought that they would be told that their remedy would be, against some irresponsible officer in the Yukon district. Finally, in this laboured article, every line of which indicates that it was written for Mr. Davis, not by him, he says:

I have always understood that under the Merchants Shipping Act and the various Canadian Shipping Acts regulating the shipping of seamen as well in inland waters as elsewhere, the collector has the right to detain a vessel and withhold clearance until the wages are paid and the officers of the vessel are properly discharged before a shipping master.

That is the last stage on which he attempts to stand. After having explained that all he did in this matter he did on his personal responsibility, he makes this general reference to the laws relating to merchant shipping. Now, this is the significant sentence in this report: He has been furnished with that information that has been denied me, it was given to him, though it was not given to a member of this House. Referring to that, Mr. Newcombe, being Deputy Minister of Justice, he winds up that portion of his report before there is an elimination of it at the hands of the Department of Customs:

Perhaps Mr. Newcombe will be good enough to point out just where my conduct was high-handed and improper in this connection.

That is the position of this government towards the shipping interests. Having disclosed to them all they had ordered this man to do, having shown their inability to induce him to obey orders, they send that much of a letter with reference to a clash between the Department of Justice and a gentleman who is advised out in the Yukon by the Crown prosecutor, Mr. F. C. Wade, and the gentleman out in the Yukon, advised by Mr. Wade, wins the day as against the opinion of the Department of Justice, and the clearly-expressed views of the Department of Marine. On the 12th of April, 1900, the following letter is written to the Hon. William Paterson, Minister of Customs :

Re ss. 'Yukoner.'

Sir,—Herein we have the honour to acknowledge receipt to-day of a letter to the commissioner of customs of the 10th inst., (originally dated March 2), inclosing us copy of extracts from the reply of Collector D. W. Davis, of January 23 last (received by your department in February), in response to your department's letter of December 16, 1899, requiring Collector Davis, among other things, to arrange a settlement of this matter with the owners or representatives of the vessel at Dawson, in accordance with the opinion of the Department of Justice.

While regretting the long delay since the receipt by the department of Collector Davis' letter of January 23, we none the less desire to express our thanks for the courtesy hitherto extended to us in this matter by the commissioner and your department.

We take this occasion to point out that we have now been furnished with what seems to be an expurgated copy of the collector's latest letter, and we have the honour to request that a complete copy of his reply be furnished us.

In August last, on behalf of the English owners of the 'Yukoner,' we made specific charges against Mr. Davis and asked for redress. Mr. Davis in answer reported his version of the facts under date September 26 last. We then wrote the commissioner fully on November 4 last, asking for a refund of the $5,099.45 improperly exacted by Collector Davis from the owners of the vessel. On December 16 last, after due consideration of the facts as presented by both the vessel-owners and the collector (respecting which there was practically no dispute), your department took the opinion of the Department of Justice, which was adverse to the collector's contention, and you required Mr. Davis to settle. In reply to this letter of the commissioner to Mr. Davis, December 16 last, informing him of the decision of your department, Collector Davis has, it seems, now written to the department which employs him refusing to do so—

They infer, as I did, that there was contumacy on the part of Mr. Davis.

—notwithstanding the opinion of the Department of Justice, a copy of which was furnished to him for his information. Collector Davis further boldly suggests that the vessel-owners be left to their somewhat dubious recourse against him personally.

The future course of the department is plain ; and we accordingly look for such immediate action on your part as the gravity of the situation invites. The contumacy of Collector Davis—an officer of your department—if persisted in, suggests its obvious remedy.

We have now the honour to repeat our request that we be furnished with a complete copy of Mr. Davis' reply of January 23 last, and that you will take such immediate action in this serious matter as the occasion warrants.

We await the favour of your early reply, and remain your obedient servants,

LEWIS & SMELLIE,
For the Export Trading and Exploring Company.

Answering that, this is the concluding letter from the Department of Customs, dated April 21, 1900 :

Re ss. 'Yukoner.'

Gentlemen,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 12th inst. to the hon. Minister of Customs in the above matter. In reply, I am directed to point out that in your letter of November 4, 1899, you requested 'that the department, in justice to all concerned, should obtain from Collector Davis the minutes of the evidence taken by him under the alleged submission to arbitration, the detailed claims filed with him of the master and mate, and all other exhibits in question, the award he purported to make as an arbitrator, an itemized account of his disposal of the $5,099.45 paid by the Trading and Exploring Company, and details of the dates, manner and method of his payments and vouchers therefor—the whole without prejudice to the rights of the owners of the vessel.'

This information, as received from Mr. Davis, together with a copy of further statements submitted by him in relation to the matter, has been furnished to you (without prejudice).

I have shown that on the face of the letter paragraph after paragraph had absolutely been taken out of the letter of the collector.

Your request for a complete copy of the letter forwarded by Mr. Davis to this department, dated January 23, 1900, is not entertained. In reply to the suggestion as to arranging for a settlement between Mr. Davis and the owners of the 'Yukoner' or their representatives, Mr. Davis avers that he acted throughout with strict regard to his duties, and submits that a settlement of the dispute can be arranged through the courts if necessary. The liability of Mr. Davis in this matter appears to be a controverted question. This department does not admit its liability in any way for the payment or refund of any money in respect to this matter.

Now, let us suppose an example in order to bring out what the position of the Minister of Customs is. Supposing an officer in the Post Office Department, charged with the sale of stamps, exacts and obtains for a quantity of stamps $200 or $300 more than he had any right to do, and the purchaser complains of this injustice to the Postmaster General. Is it to be urged for a moment as a reasonable position that the Postmaster General should state that this officer took this money in his personal capacity, though he was clothed with authority to sell stamps? Is it pretended that the purchaser is to be told that he has his recourse against this individual to recover the money wrongfully taken from him? Yet, that is, shortly put, the position in which the hon. Minister of Customs leaves this matter. It is significant that the hon. minister, having obtained the opinion of the Department of Justice and having advised Lewis & Smellie of the effect of that opinion, being clearly in favour of the clients of Lewis & Smellie, does not pretend that the opinion of the Department of Justice was in favour of Davis, or in favour of the attitude of the government. It would have been exceedingly cruel in the case of an ordinary individual, although possibly not cruel in the case of a strong corporation, such as this, able to enforce its rights in a court of law, to tell him that such rights as he had against the department, or Mr. Davis, he could exercise, notwithstanding the fact that the conduct of that officer had been pronounced by the Department of Justice as high-handed and improper. To make good my statement, I will mention to the House that on the 27th of April, these papers that I have referred to, being in my hands, I wrote to the hon. Minister of Customs, as follows:

Ottawa, April 27, 1900.

Hon. W. Paterson,
Minister of Customs,
Re ss. 'Yukoner.'

Dear Sir,—May I have copies of the following:

1. Report of opinion of Department of Justice referred to in 2nd paragraph of Collector Davis's letter to commissioner of customs, January 23, 1900, made by Justice Department, in December, 1898?

2. Also a complete copy of Collector Davis's letter to commissioner of customs, January 23, 1900.

I desire to discuss this subject in the House and these papers would complete the series of documents now in my possession. If I am put to a motion the delay will throw the subject over to too late a date for consideration this session; and you will see that from all points of view the question can be more satisfactorily dealt with if I am placed in possession of these papers before I bring the question up.

Yours truly,

(Signed) CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Then, the hon. Minister of Customs replies on the 4th of May:

Ottawa, May 4, 1900.

Hon. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 27th ultimo, re the 'Yukoner' matter.

While I would be pleased to meet your wishes, I think that, as the question is a controverted one and inasmuch as it may be the subject of a law suit against this department, Messrs. Lewis & Smellie, the solicitors for the owners of the 'Yukoner' having in effect asked the Crown to account for the moneys in question,—production of the papers you refer to should not in the public interest be pressed for, at any rate at present.

Messrs. Lewis & Smellie were furnished with copies of all the papers and evidence in the case which it was deemed advisable to produce at this stage. I infer from a statement made in your letter that such papers are now in your possession.

Mr. Davis, the officer of this department whose action in respect to the 'Yukoner' is challenged—

I just stop to say that it is the conduct of the minister is challenged.

—has intimated that he is prepared to have his action tested in the courts, if necessary.

That he could not prevent.

In the circumstances, I trust you will agree with the view I have expressed that the production of the papers you refer to should not be pressed for now.

Yours truly,

(Signed) WM. PATERSON.

That was a letter of the 4th of May. To that I replied on May 5:

Ottawa, May 5, 1900.

Hon. W. Paterson,
Minister of Customs.

My dear Sir,—I have yours of the 4th instant for which I am obliged. Your letter compels me to take advantage of the motion for supply and to read to the House the papers I have in the ss. 'Yukoner' and discuss your refusal to let the House have the complete record for the purpose of considering your action in this case.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Then came the action of the hon. Minister of Customs, endorsed by his colleagues, apparently, to-day, in attempting to refuse the information that I desire in this case. I have referred to the hon. gentleman's attempt to-day, to invoke some rule of the House, a rule that has been honoured far more in its breach than in its observance, and that is in regard to the papers that a minister may withhold. In England, undoubtedly, the rule is very rigidly adhered to in regard to the withholding of the opinions of law officers of the Crown. In this country the reverse is practiced. Time and again ministers avail themselves of it for their own protection. When Sir Oliver Mowat was Minister of Justice we remember that one of the great arguments hon. gentlemen had was that there was the opinion of the Minister of Justice, that they had a right to do what they had done, and the opinion of the Minister of Justice was produced and read. Time and again these opinions are brought down and laid on the Table of the House. In a matter of this kind it does seem to me a most unreasonable, as well as an extraordinary thing, that a document should not be laid on the Table of the House. In Todd's Parliamentary Government in England, page 441, volume 1, the hon. minister will find on this subject the general principle under which government has acted here, regardless of any particular or technical reading, laid down :

But it must always be remembered that all public transactions of state are necessarily official ; and that no public officer would be justified in withholding from official record and access, any document, emanating from himself in his official capacity, in relation to public affairs.

That relates, of course, to the withholding of documents from the record in the departments, it is true. This is clearly in the records of the Department of Customs. It has been transmitted and referred to by the department in these despatches which I have mentioned. But, in regard to the practice, I want to show the hon. gentleman what practice obtained when he sat upon the opposition benches and when the Conservatives were in power. There was no such disinclination to grant these papers even though, under the rules, they might have been withheld, even in cases of litigation, and in cases involving claims against the Crown. I shall take a case from these volumes, although the number of cases is legion. Here is a motion made by Mr. Préfontaine which was carried on the 13th of July, 1891 :

Copies of all claims presented to the government since 1880 by Mr. Joseph Antoine Maurice, and Dame Julie Fournier for losses suffered by them in reference to lands purchased by them from the government in 1875.

And it enumerates the documents that are asked for. I am endeavouring to give the hon. Minister of Customs these references. The motion also calls for :

Copies of the opinions given on the subject by the hon. Minister of Public Works and of the opinion of the hon. Minister of Justice.

I have other references, but I do not think it is necessary to mention any more of them. The practice is well known, and I am sure it must have struck hon. members on both sides of this House as a matter of surprise that a minister of the Crown, for the first time, in years, should rise in his place to quote British authority and to say that he had a right to withhold and was going to exercise that right, the opinion of the Department of Justice. Now, I rose to move that this House do adjourn for the purpose, not merely of protesting against the unreasonable conduct of a minister of the Crown in attempting to keep back information in regard to the record concerning what appears to be the maladministration of his department and the maladministration of himself, but to protest against the answer that has been sent to the people who appeal to him to protect them against the high-handed and improper conduct of his officer. If I can obtain on this occasion or later on, in the way the minister has suggested, no better explanation of these facts, no other information from the public records, I will, on going into supply, put in your hands, Mr. Speaker, a motion such as will express the opinion that I think should be entertained of a government that is responsible for what seems to have been the admitted conduct of their officer in the Yukon Territory.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Mr. Speaker, this is another of the many cases we have had during this session, of the adjournment of the House being moved in order to discuss a question, the discussion of which has occupied what may be considered as a whole sitting of the House. Under the strict rules, the hon. member (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), is within his right, still he ought to admit that when a member takes up a whole day of parliament, which consists of 213 members, the question which he raises ought to be of considerable importance. What is the question that the hon. gentleman has been attempting to discuss with information in his possession that he himself says is not complete; information that he received from parties who acted as counsel on behalf of a company who allege that an officer of Her Majesty's Customs exceeded his duty. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), read to the House a letter that he himself addressed to me privately. I am not about to complain of that. He will, I think, bear me the testimony that in my relations with the members of this House, I have always recognized the fact that every member of parliament has the right to the utmost courtesy at the hands of a minister of the Crown. The hon. gentleman will, I hope, say, that my answer to his letter asking for certain papers was couched in courteous terms, while it conveyed my opinion to him as to what I thought was proper under the circumstances.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not mean the House to infer that there was anything discourteous in the correspondence between the minister and myself. I read it to show the decision of the minister as to what papers he would not allow me to have.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Very well. The House will observe that I pointed out that this was a case that was not yet settled by the Customs Department, and that the department was acting in this matter on the advice of the Department of Justice. It may be that there will be a further investigation made by a commissioner in reference to the matter, if the Department of Justice will advise it. It may be that the complainants will take steps in a court of justice to secure what they think are their rights and to redress what they consider are their wrongs. It seems to me as a layman, strange that a legal gentleman with the attainments of my hon. friend, an ex-Minister of Justice, should advocate the course he does in this matter. He blames me because I have not dismissed the collector of customs in Dawson, but it must be remembered that the collector alleges that he acted within his rights and that it was at the request of both parties to this contention that he consented to act as arbitrator, and to receive a certain sum of money and to disburse it. That officer contends that his position is right and legal, and that he is ready to leave it to the courts of the country to decide whether or not he has done these people injury. The hon. gentleman must see that if we had the decision of the courts and the whole facts brought out, the department would then be in a position to know whether this officer had exceeded his duty or not, and upon what grounds he had proceeded. It might be inferred from what the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has said, that I, as head of the Customs Department, had some object in screening this gentleman, or in hiding something about him. Those who are conversant with the matter know that the collector of customs whose character is arraigned sat for years in this House an unvarying supporter of the Conservative party. Mr. Davis was appointed to his present position by the Conservative government just at the close of the session of 1896. He had occupied the honourable position of a member of this House and was appointed to that position which he has since filled, by his Conservative friends. The department has not had any other than official communications with him. I have not seen him nor has he seen me, nor has he seen the commissioner of customs. We have been blamed by gentlemen on the other side of the House, because they thought that we had not sufficient warrant for removing from office certain persons who differed from us politically. But, now, the hon. member (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), tells me that it was my bounden duty to have dismissed this man, and that because of not dismissing him, I should be dismissed myself. Although this gentleman differed from the government politically, I do not regard the matter in that light at all. He has a right to his political views. It will be admitted that there is nothing in his politics, however, to draw me more to his side than I should be drawn, but is it not my duty as head of the department to see that this officer should have what is ordinarily considered to be fair-play. This gentleman says that he has done right, that he is willing to leave it to the courts of his country as to whether he has done wrong or not and to abide by their decision. We should at least do this officer the justice of carefully considering his side of the case.

Now, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked a number of questions to-day. He takes from Lewis & Smellie, of Ottawa, who are the counsel for the gentlemen who say, that this collector of customs acted in an improper manner towards them; he takes from Lewis & Smellie all the papers they see fit to give him, and then he puts a number of questions on the Order paper. I answered the hon. gentleman to-day with the usual courtesy, and I did not suppose that he would have objected to my answer. He put sixteen questions in all, as the House will see. I said:

In reply to these questions I would say that I think it would be better if the hon. gentleman would ask for a return copies of such of the documents in connection with this matter as may be properly called for and brought down, can be laid upon the Table in a short time.

That is, I did not ask, and the hon. gentleman knew I could not ask him, to move for this return. That would only be to mock hon. members of this House at this time, because on Mondays there would probably be no opportunity of reaching notices of motion; but, if he would ask for the return, I would then bring all the papers I could. The hon. gentleman was already aware that there were one or two papers which the department did not think it would be well for the present to bring down, and, therefore, I suggested such as might properly be brought down, so that he would not by and by complain that some were withheld which should be brought down. In answering questions of this kind, hon. gentlemen opposite will realize that it might be impossible to give the whole case fairly to both parties unless I were to read large portions of the papers. Hon. gentlemen know how important the context is in many statements that are made in order to bring out facts in all their fairness and truth; and I suggested to the hon. gentleman that if he would simply make that motion or ask for the return, I would gladly bring down all that the department thought that it would be in the public interest at the present time to bring down. There is no ulterior motive in the mind of the department or the head of the department in connection with this matter. The consideration has simply been the public interest and fairness to a public servant, who was and is, I believe, still opposed to us politically; and we are acting, and have all along been acting, under the advice of the Department of Justice.

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me one question? Was the last letter that was sent to Lewis & Smellie sent under the advice of the Department of Justice—the letter leaving them to their remedy in court?

THE MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It shows that the question is still going on—still a matter under consideration. In the Department of Customs there are hundreds of cases of all kinds coming up; and in the forenoon, when one has to accord interviews to gentlemen who seek them, and who have a right to be treated courteously, there is sometimes so little time that I have not been able to look at a letter before one o'clock; and, therefore, some little time must elapse before these cases can be reached. Here is a letter of April 5, addressed to E. L. Newcombe:

I send you above noted file together with copy of letters suggested to be sent to Messrs. Lewis & Smellie, acting for the owners in this matter.

Please advise if you see any objection to the proposed method to Messrs. Lewis & Smellie (with inclosures).

Please return inclosures with your reply.

This is signed by the Commissioner of Customs. I ask the hon. gentleman if he did not get these inclosures. My impression is that they were all the vouchers in detail. To this, on April 10, Mr. Newcombe replied:

Referring to your letter of the 5th instant, I have perused the draft letter which you propose to send to Messrs. Lewis & Smellie with the proposed inclosures, to which I see no objection.

The question as to how the claim of Messrs. Lewis & Smellie ought to be disposed of is, I think, for your decision rather than mine.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

E. L. NEWCOMBE,

Deputy Minister of Justice.

That shows that the question is going on and is being considered.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman factiously, or if he disapproves of it; but, the hon. gentleman says that the matter is going on, and is still under consideration. I read a letter from the Department of Customs, which he has, perhaps, overlooked, stating that the department does not admit its liability, and leaving the owners of the Yukoner for their remedy against the collector of customs at Dawson, Mr. Davis. Is not that final?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Not at all. Would the hon. gentleman ask me to compromise the case—to give up the case for the Crown before it is understood?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not to give up the case, but when he ordered that letter to be sent to the solicitors for the owners, did he not mean it to convey to them that the Department of Customs declined to entertain their claim, but left them for their recourse against Mr. Davis personally?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That letter was conveying to them the collector's reply to the charges, which we asked for. The hon. gentleman this afternoon complained that the department used the term 'without prejudice' in writing to these gentlemen who threatened to hold the department responsible for this claim. Was it an unusual thing—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS—when you are giving out papers, that you should guard yourself by saying 'without prejudice'?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Absolutely without precedent from a government department.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Well, I can only call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that when these people asked for certain things, they asked for them without prejudice; and the hon. gentleman says we are not at liberty to do the same. I want to ask the hon. gentleman if he will answer me a question as a lawyer and an ex-Minister of Justice. If I discharge Mr. Davis as collector now, in what position will these people stand with reference to the recovery of the money?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the Minister of Customs discharges Mr. Davis, it will not affect one single point of law involved in the case. I have several times said to the hon. gentleman that I am not pressing, or zealously pressing, for Mr. Davis's head or the head of any one else. I was endeavouring to point out to the hon. gentleman that by not dismissing him, but standing by him, he was assuming the responsibility that devolved upon him as the head of that department, and he was the man who should be dismissed.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman said distinctly that I should dismiss him. It is alleged by the hon. gentleman that the reason he should be dismissed is because he has taken some $5,000 of money from a certain company and paid out some of it to men who established their claims to a share of that money.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not say so.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, and the hon. gentleman says that the collector should be dismissed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If there has been a wrong done, that money should be paid back, but who is responsible for paying it back?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I told the hon. gentleman that from the correspondence before me, and the facts I have mentioned, Mr. Davis was guilty of conduct characterized by the Department of Justice as improper and high-handed, and of having declined to carry out the instructions which, under the advice of the Department of Justice, were sent to him, and that he ought to be dismissed. I then said that not having dismissed him, the hon. minister stood practically in Mr. Davis's shoes, so far as parliament is concerned, that the conduct of Davis was his conduct, so long as he retained confidence in that officer, and did not relieve himself of responsibility by dismissing him.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Who is to pay the money ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman wants my opinion, I certainly think that the Crown is liable for every dollar.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is the opinion of the hon. gentleman, and holding that view he has set up a series of questions to make the Crown's case, if possible, weaker than it might otherwise be, should a suit be entered against the Crown. That is what the hon. gentleman has been at all this afternoon, and I do not think that that is a position which ought to be taken by an ex-Minister of Justice.

Mr. QUINN. Why not ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Is he bound to make the case against the Crown stronger than it is naturally ?

Mr. QUINN. Why should not any member of parliament do all he can to make the government pay a just claim ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No court has determined that it is a just claim.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that he only pays such claims as are awarded by courts of law ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Not at all, but does the hon. gentleman assume the responsibility of saying that this is a claim the Crown ought to pay, although the Department of Justice has not said so to me. Will he not wait until the Department of Justice decides ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have nothing to do with the Department of Justice at present, I have not even been allowed to see its opinion.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman has been talking from three o'clock until nearly eleven o'clock to-night trying to have something to do with it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Standing on the opinion of the department.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, the hon. gentleman has not got an opinion from that department.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman's officers say that the department was of opinion that the conduct of Mr. Davis was improper and high-handed in connection with the handling of private money.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But the Department of Justice has not said that the Crown is liable for that money. If it would assume the responsibility of saying that we are responsible, the hon. gentleman would have something to go upon, but it has declined to say so and that is a question that will have to be considered, and on which its opinion will have to be obtained. The hon. gentleman takes his view from ex parte statements, but we have not yet the opinion of the Department of Justice, so far as I know, as to whether the Crown is liable or not.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. So far as the hon. gentleman knows, but he says he will not bring down to this House the opinion which the Department of Justice has given.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I believe that when that opinion was given by the Department of Justice, whatever it might be, it was given before that department had cognizance of all the facts which are in the possession of the Department of Customs now. I do not say whether the opinion of the department will be changed by the further information which the Department of Customs has received since the matter was submitted to the Department of Justice, but I have reason to believe that the Department of Justice was under one misconception to which the hon. gentleman himself has alluded, and that was that, as stated in the brief which Lewis & Smellie sent in to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Wade was acting as counsel for the collector of customs, and that the collector himself had admitted it. But as the hon. gentleman himself showed by a letter he read, both Mr. Wade and Mr. Davis denied that statement, so that the Department of Justice was acting on information which was subsequently denied, and which, if true, the hon. gentleman himself admitted would have placed the matter in a more serious light. Therefore, I think it would be better to get a decision from the Department of Justice with all the facts before it ; and if the Department of Justice should recommend any particular course to the Department of Customs, we will in all probability, as we have done in the past, follow its direction. But that opinion has not yet been given, and the hon. gentleman hurries forward with this motion based on incomplete papers. If he wants to act fairly between these parties and the Crown and the collector, why does he refuse to ask that the papers be brought down ? It is contrary to all experience I have had in this House that a gentleman should spring upon the House a discussion on an ex parte statement, and occupy the attention of the House for hours, and refuse positively to ask for all the documents. The papers could be brought down in a couple of days, but he refuses to move for them, and says that instead he will take the facts that Lewis & Smellie, the paid counsel for the men who are trying to get this money back, have given to him, and he refuses to ask the House to let all the papers come down. I suppose the hon. gentleman cannot object if I see fit to bring down the papers and make a motion for their presentation myself. If the hon. gentleman will not assume the responsibility, if he thinks it fairer and manlier to condemn an officer of Her Majesty's service, whom he himself was a party to appointing to office upon ex parte statements, he will not deny that it would be proper for me to bring down the documents.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Particularly will he not deny it, as he wrote a letter in April last, asking for the papers.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But when he was asked this afternoon to move for a return, he positively refused to do it. I suppose he will not prevent the papers being brought down, so far as they can be brought down in the case of a question that is not settled. Final action has not been taken on this case. Whether the House will consider it wise or prudent, whether it will lend its countenance to its time being taken up—I will not say wasted—by the discussion of such a case, I will not say. I will just read to the hon. gentleman one paper that might be brought down. He referred to the report from the chief inspector of customs. Mr. S. W. McMichael has been chief inspector of customs for many years. He was in office under Sir Mackenzie Bowell, under Hon. Clarke Wallace, under Hon. J. F. Wood, and occupies a very high position. I may explain that last year the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) called our attention to the statements that certain steamboats had been entered at valuation of values much below what they should have been entered at, for customs purposes. After we had written and got such information as we could, I thought it was in the interests of the Customs Department and the public service generally, that Mr. McMichael should proceed to the Yukon and investigate. It is a long distance, and, up to last year, before the construction of the White Horse Pass Railway, it was a very difficult place to reach. Mr. McMichael was instructed to proceed to the Yukon, and investigate the conduct of affairs in the passes and on the Yukon, and was given power to suspend any officer if he deemed it in the interest of the public service that it should be done. Mr. McMichael went to the Yukon, and inquired into affairs there. When he came back, after some of this correspondence had taken place and replies had been sent in to the Department of Customs, the commissioner of customs sent the file to Mr. McMichael and asked him if he had any knowledge of the case or any statements to make with regard to it. Mr. McMichael made a report to the department, which would probably be one of the papers to be brought down had the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), accepted my suggestion and moved for a return.

Mr. WALLACE. Was the file given to Mr. McMichael before he went up?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, after he came back.

Mr. WALLACE. Why was it not given to him before he went up, that he might investigate the matter?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That would have been better. It may be necessary to do that yet, perhaps not with Mr. McMichael, he having expressed an opinion, but some other gentleman. However, that is a matter for consideration. He had the case before him. He says:

Customs, Canada,
Toronto, Nov. 10, 1899.

John McDougald, Esq.,
Commissioner of Customs,
Ottawa.

Sir,—I have the honour to return departmental file 45,383, re steamer 'Yukoner,' and to state that when in Dawson, in August last, Mr. McCaul, Q.C., of Messrs. White & McCaul, barristers, called at the custom-house, and, in course of conversation with me, mentioned a difficulty which had arisen between certain clients of his, the Trading and Exploring Company, owners of the steamer 'Yukoner,' and Mr. Davis, the collector of customs. Mr. McCaul stated that the matter was one which his clients purposed laying before the department, and that he thought it would be well to explain to me. Mr. McCaul stated in general terms the nature of the matter in dispute, which arose out of a claim on the part of the captain and mate of the 'Yukoner' for wages alleged to be due to them and for moneys disbursed by them on the vessel's account. He said that the steamer had been detained by Mr. Davis, acting as collector of customs, because he claimed that the steamer's officers had not been satisfied and that the Trading and Exploring Company had consented under duress to accept Mr. Davis as arbitrator in the matter, depositing with him the full amount claimed; but that they had immediately afterwards withdrawn their consent to have the matter arbitrated by Mr. Davis. Mr. McCaul further said that notwithstanding this action on their part, Mr. Davis had gone on with his arbitration and made an award, which arbitration and award they, as solicitors of the owners of the vessel claimed to be unauthorized and illegal.

After having heard Mr. McCaul's statement, I requested him to put all the facts in writing and lay them before me. This he promised to do, but up to the time of my leaving Dawson, I heard nothing further from him on the subject.

Messrs. White & McCaul were the solicitors who had the case in hand. We asked them to put the case in writing. I cannot say how long he remained there, but I suppose a considerable time. That is the impression that would be left on my mind by the reading of the report, and yet he heard nothing from him. He heard their side of the question, and now he goes on to say:

Before I left Dawson, Mr. Davis, collector of customs, stated to me that he wished to explain the action taken by him in the matter. He said that in the early part of the present season, the steamer 'Yukoner' came to Dawson after there had been a mutiny on the part of her crew, as a result of which the captain and mate had been forcibly put off the vessel; that these officers claimed that wages due them by the owners had not been paid; that they each had contracts with the company, the captain for one year from September 30, 1898, at the rate of $3,000 per year, and the mate for one year from September 14, 1898, at the rate of $1,200 per year; and that as they had been removed without cause they were each entitled to a year's full wages.

I understood from Mr. Davis that he had advised the owners of the steamer 'Yukoner' of this claim, and notified them that he would not grant a clearance to the vessel until the matter was adjusted; that subsequently, understanding that the matter had been adjusted, he had granted a clearance, but on finding that he had been misinformed, he withdrew the clearance, and placed a police officer, acting in the capacity of a customs officer, in charge of the vessel; that thereupon the owners of the 'Yukoner,' finding that the vessel would not be allowed to leave port until the matters of the claims of the captain and mate were arranged, had deposited with Mr. Davis the full amount paid by the captain and mate, namely, $5,099.45, and had assented to an arbitration to be made by Mr. Davis acting in his individual capacity. Formal assent to this arbitration was given by Messrs. Wade & Aikman, solicitors for the captain and mate, by letter addressed to Mr. Davis, dated July 25, 1899, copy of which is attached to the file; and by Messrs. White & McCaul, solicitors for the owners of the steamer 'Yukoner,' in a letter addressed to the collector of customs, dated July 26, 1899, copy of which is also attached to the file.

Mr. Davis stated in explanation of his course in the matter, that in view of the fact that there was no admiralty court at Dawson, and therefore no means by which the rights of master and mate could be legally enforced, he felt it his duty to interfere in the matter to the extent of refusing to permit the vessel to depart until the parties had come to some satisfactory arrangement. He further said that in consenting to act as an arbitrator he considered that he was acting as a private individual, and not in his capacity as collector of customs. Mr. Davis further said that after the joint submission to arbitration had been made by the parties, he, as arbitrator, fixed a day for the hearing herein; and afterwards, acting in his capacity as collector of customs, permitted the vessel to depart. He further said that after the departure of the vessel he received from Messrs. White & McCaul, a letter dated July 26, in which they undertook to forbid him to proceed with the arbitration, which letter he disregarded, and after having once adjourned the hearing in the matter, and Messrs. Wade & Aikman appearing on both occasions for the master and mate, and no appearance being made on either occasions by the owners or their solicitors, he proceeded with the arbitration, made his award therein, and paid the amount thereof, namely $4,899.45 over to Messrs. Wade & Aikman, solicitors for the captain and mate. In this award was included a sum of $700, covering an account of Messrs. Wade & Aikman against the master of the steamer 'Yukoner' for services to said master in connection with certain legal proceedings growing out of the mutiny, which account was included in the captain's claim against the vessel. Mr. Davis stated he considered this a reasonable and proper fee for the services rendered.

I may state that it appeared by the papers shown me by Mr. Davis that the claims of the master and mate against the vessel were for wages and disbursements, and that the matters disputed by the owners of the 'Yukoner' were wages from May 27, 1899, the date of the mutiny, to September 13, 1899, the date of the termination of the period for which the officers were employed, and the legal expenses of the captain in the mutiny case. As I regarded the matter of the arbitration as in no wise within the scope of the official duties of the collector, I did not undertake to hold any formal inquiry in respect to Mr. Davis's action therein.

I would respectfully submit that the department has nothing to do with Mr. Davis's action in connection with this arbitration; and that if the parties have any claim against Mr. Davis in respect thereof, or desire to contest the legality of his action therein, they should do so by a legal procedure against him.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) S. W. McMICHAEL,

Chief Inspector.

The House will see that this chief inspector of the customs did not make a formal inquiry, but he heard the statements of both parties, and the conclusion he arrived at was that Mr. Davis was acting as arbitrator, for which purpose he had been chosen by both parties over their signature, to determine this matter. The collector says himself that under the laws of the Northwest Territories, which were made applicable to the Yukon, a person once appointed as an arbitrator cannot be set aside, except by order of the court—if I remember right, that is the position he takes. At any rate, they both consented to it. Then he released the vessel, and as soon as the vessel was released White & McCaul send a notice to him that they won't be bound by what they did before; though they had given over their own signature an engagement that they would leave the whole matter to be settled by him as arbitrator, when all had been done and the vessel had cleared, then they immediately notify him that they won't be bound by his award. The collector states that they had been given notice to appear and argue the case, but they did not appear; then he held another meeting, and they still not appearing, he went on and made the award. I speak subject to correction in these matters, because this matter came up when I was not expecting it, and some of the communications, I suppose, passed without coming under my own eye, though I accept all responsibility for the department in reference to that matter. But I am only speaking now from recollection; when the papers are brought down the matter will be fully known. But my impression is that the information asked him as to what he did with this money, as to how it was used, I think that is given—I speak.

now subject to correction—in the inclosures that are referred to as having been given to Lewis & Smellie in town here. If so, then I think the member for Pictou was hardly fair.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman, I hope, accepts my word, which I gave without any qualification whatever. But from the papers furnished to me it would appear these papers have never reached Lewis & Smellie, and I had no conversation with them on the subject.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I may be wrong, but I think these inclosures that were asked for in reference to that matter were furnished to them. Now, perhaps there is no good end to be served by going further into this matter at the present time. The hon. gentleman says he will feel it incumbent upon him to bring it up in a more formal manner at a later date. I will endeavour by that time to make myself conversant with the case, and, perhaps, the hon. gentleman also will be able to discuss it with fuller information and more satisfaction to himself than he seems to be able to do at the present time. All I can say is, again, that while the hon. gentleman seems to be severe on the head of the department for not summarily dismissing this officer, the head of the department can have no earthly object in maintaining a gentleman who was appointed by his political opponents, and who is a political opponent to-day, so far as I know. But whether an officer was appointed by the present government or by the previous government, what he has to say ought to receive fair consideration. I want the House to remember also that in that distant territory officers have to act under very difficult circumstances. It may be that mistakes are made, I do not say that he has made one, or that he has not. The hon. member for Pictou is a lawyer and he is able to give a positive opinion. I am not a lawyer, I have not the means of knowing, and therefore, as it is my bounden duty to do in controverted cases, we seek the advice of the Department of Justice, as we have done, and we should seek it further, and we act upon that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think it is my duty to take prompt advantage of this last remark of the hon. gentleman. He says that he has had an opinion of the Department of Justice in this matter, and has acted upon it. He is coming within the well known rule of this House that when a minister refers to a report of any character whatever and bases an argument upon it, he is bound, forthwith, to produce that report, and lay it on the table of the House. I rise now to claim my right. The most important part of his speech is contained in that one sentence that he had the opinion of the Department of Justice, and that he acted accordingly.

Mr. PATERSON.

I ask that the papers be laid on the table of the House. I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to page 409 of Sir John Bourinot's works :

It has been laid down by the highest authorities that 'when a minister of the Crown quotes a public document in the House, and founds upon it an argument or assertion, that document, if called for, ought to be produced.'

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What quotation did I make ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will explain that. Let me read the passage :

But it is allowable to repeat to the House information which is contained in a private communication when such private papers are quoted in the House there is no rule requiring them to be laid on the Table. The rule respecting the production of public papers, quoted by a minister of the Crown, is necessary to give the House the same information he possesses, and enable it to come to a correct conclusion on a question.

The only suggestion as to the hon. gentleman not coming within the rule that he did not quote—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Exactly.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.—Will, I think, not be held to be good. The reason for that rule is that no responsible minister of the Crown ought to be permitted to base an argument on a public document that he will not produce to the House. Therefore, the reason applies whether he quotes, or says that opinion contained such and such a statement, or whether he says : I obtained that opinion from the department, I acted upon it, it is my justification. It would be a most unfair thing and an obvious violation of the spirit of that rule if a minister of the Crown—and this is the point which is raised in connection with this matter—could establish his position by referring to reports in the possession of the government and decline to produce these reports so that the House might understand whether his conclusion from that report is reasonable or justifiable.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) does not raise that question seriously.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think that is very respectful to the Chair or to myself. I raised the question seriously, and I gave my reason for it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It was meant to be respectful to the hon. gentleman because embodied in that remark was the idea, in my own mind, that he had too much knowledge to think that it was a point that was well taken, or that it could possibly be well taken. I did not quote from any document, but, am I to be precluded, in the House, from making the simple statement of fact that, in controverted matters, in the department over which I preside for the time being, we seek advice from the Department of Justice, and, receiving advice, that we act upon it? Am I not to be at liberty to mention that without bringing down the advice that may have been given by the Department of Justice?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is the rule.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not so understand the rule, and I do not think it has ever been so applied. I do not think the words that the hon. gentleman read bear upon the question. However, if the hon. gentleman wants to bring up that question, I would suggest that he bring up his point of order not now, but by and by.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It was my duty to call attention to it at the time, because, if the hon. gentleman had passed from it, it might be answered by Mr. Speaker, that, not having asked for the production of this document at the time, the right of an hon. gentleman to obtain it was lost.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I asked for the hon. gentleman's papers.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no rule applicable in this House to a private member.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have just made the statement that if a minister cannot state to the House, that, in a controverted question he has had recourse to the advice of the Department of Justice in order that he might follow it, without being bound to bring down all the advice and statements given, I think it is pressing the rule beyond what Sir John Bourinot or any one else ever meant. It does not seem to me that this is a point which is worthy to be taken by the hon. gentleman. As I said I do not see—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have stated my point of order, Mr. Speaker, and I would ask your ruling upon it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What hon. gentleman is acting in this disorderly manner? What hon. gentleman is howling? I rise in my place, Mr. Speaker, and ask for your ruling on that point of order. I see that the hon. Minister of Customs has concluded his observations dealing with the point of order and is about to proceed with his speech.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) could have raised his point of order at the close of the speech of the hon. Minister of Customs instead of interrupting him. I submit that there is a total distinction between quoting from a public document and referring to one. No doubt, if the hon. Minister of Customs quoted from a public document he would be obliged to lay it on the table, but, surely, he may state that he is acting under the advice of the Minister of Justice, and it does not follow that he is bound to bring down the communication of the Minister of Justice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) did not say that he is acting under the advice of the Minister of Justice. He said that he had the opinion of the Department of Justice, and was acting accordingly.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Even so.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no opportunity to test any statement in this document until it is produced.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, might I be allowed to offer a suggestion in answer to what the hon. Minister of Finance has said? Of course, there are different ways of quoting. If the hon. Minister of Customs had said: I was advised so and so by the Department of Justice, and in consequence of that I did so and so, no one would deny that he quoted. But, instead of that when he says: I did so and so, and I did it on the advice of the Department of Justice, he is equally quoting, but he is doing it in a different way. He said exactly the same thing in one case as in the other. He would be quoting in one case and he would be fairly held to be quoting in the other.

Mr. SPEAKER. The statement to which the hon. member (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has referred at page 409 of Sir John Bourinot's work reads exactly in this way:

When a minister of the Crown quotes a public document in the House, and founds upon it an argument or assertion, that document, if called for, ought to be produced.

I did not hear the minister quote from a document nor did I hear him base an argument on it in so far as my observation goes.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The combined watchfulness of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), and the hon. member for Pictou, to have me come within the rule that would compel me to lay the paper on the table now, that I have already informed the hon. member for Pictou, it was not desirable that he should press for at the present time, has come to naught, Mr. Speaker, ruling, as I think, the whole House will agree was correct. I do not think anything further can be gained in reference to this matter. The hon. gentleman says that he proposes to bring it up in a more formal way. I think it will be my duty now, the hon. member for Pictou not being willing to have all the information that can be properly given on that subject before the House, before he discusses it, but, wishing to discuss it from an ex parte statement, comprising copies of official documents, which it has been thought well by the solicitors between the parties to be placed in his hands with the view of strengthening their case, in the event of its getting into the courts, to bring down all the information in reference to it. I do not know whether, in my whole experience I ever remember a member of parliament rising to discuss a question and to censure any member of a ministry in reference to a matter that was properly the subject of a motion for a return of the papers, but he preceded it with a motion for the papers that he might know the facts and that he might discuss it intelligently.

The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was not here in time to make that motion, but he had my word for it that if he made it to-morrow the papers would be laid on the Table before he could possibly move in the matter. He refused to do that, and a similar line of action by an hon. member I do not remember in my parliamentary experience. This is a case in which the Crown is threatened with damages, and it is very strange that a member of the House should be found refusing information that would bear in favour of the Crown, but seeking to get all possible information that would injure the Crown and favour the men who are acting for those who make this claim. I have not seen such a course followed in this House in my long parliamentary experience. I submit that the House is not in a position to pronounce a judgment upon this question at the present moment. I am sure hon. gentlemen will not be prepared to accept as conclusive what the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has told us is the information that has been placed in his hands by the Ottawa solicitor for the Yukon solicitor who has the case in hands for the owner of this steamer. The hon. gentleman characterized this transaction of the collector of customs at Dawson as scandalous, and, as if the collector had almost taken money by force from these men. Is it not strange that these same gentlemen who have been treated in this infamous way as described by him, are not willing to take the case into court and have it determined? The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) knows that they can go into court.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He knows the collector is a responsible man.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) goes so far as to say, in effect, that the collector at Dawson has gone to the extent of blackmailing money out of these men, and yet, these men will not go to the courts that are open to them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Who said they would not go there?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not know exactly the position the hon. gentleman took on that, but he said something to that effect.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not say anything of the kind. I do not know what they are going to do. That is none of my business, but this is.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. With the courts open to these men, are they afraid to appeal to the courts, or do they prefer that the hon. gentleman should come here with these ex parte statements.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will answer.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There is no answer required.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Very well.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman knows that there is nothing to prevent them going into court. The government will not put any obstacle in their way. If they want to sue the government in order to test the matter, then, if they ask for a petition of right, so far as I am concerned, they will have my consent to it at once. If they want to take action against the collector of customs, there is no power to prevent them doing so, and then all the facts will come out, and if this collector of customs has done that which warrants his dismissal, the hon. member for Pictou can depend upon it that there will be that regard paid to the duty of the government that is expected from every department of government. If, on the other hand, the courts should decide that this collector did not do what is wrong then the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) should not ask that the collector should be dismissed, but should permit him to have British fair-play. At any rate, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) should have waited until all the information which we can give in reference to this matter was before us, so that we might decide in the full light of the facts in reference to it. At any rate, he could wait for a few days, and if his clients, or the clients of the gentlemen who placed these papers in his hands, are willing to go into court, it can be done by them to-morrow. At any rate, another discussion is promised by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), and I suppose, as he would not ask for the papers himself, he will not bring that discussion on until there is an opportunity to lay on the Table of the House all the papers that may at this stage be brought down in connection with this matter.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I propose to bring up the question again.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I quoted from the inspector's report, and if the hon. gentleman wishes, I will lay it on the Table, but, it will be among the papers to be brought down.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). If the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) has no clearer idea of the position of affairs with respect to this collector than he has with regard to what the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was asking for this afternoon, then, I do not wonder that he has not dismissed him. The Minister of Customs seems to think that the hon. member (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has taken this course because he did not want information, but, as a matter of fact, a letter has been read in this House—and the Minister of Customs has not denied receiving it—in which the hon. member for Pictou asked the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) to bring down every paper in connection with this matter and lay it on the Table of the House, or furnish him a copy of it. Therefore, one fails to see the point of the minister in standing up for ten minutes and telling the House that the hon. member for Pictou did not want information, in face of the fact that he asked the minister in writing, something like a month ago, to lay all the papers on the Table of the House—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Certain papers.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). He asked for all the papers in connection with this matter.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. All I had not already.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). All the papers which he had not been furnished with by Lewis & Smellie, and by the Department of Marine and Fisheries; all these papers he asked the Minister of Customs to hand to him.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. When?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). By a letter which has been read in the hon. gentleman's hearing and in my hearing in this House.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No. I think he specifically mentioned two or three items.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I read the letter and I read the hon. gentleman's answer. I informed him that I had the whole series, except three letters, and for the information of this House, I wanted the three letters to make it complete, but the hon. gentleman would not give them to me.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There were three documents which the hon. gentleman wanted, but there were some he did not want. He did not ask for the inspector's report.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Lest the hon. gentleman should be under any misapprehension, we desire that every document should be presented, and presented at once, so that we may get ready for the discussion that is to take place in this House on this matter.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Can you get the hon. member for Pictou to agree to that?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). He has agreed to it by calling out 'Hear, hear.' I do not understand the position of the Minister of Customs in regard to this question.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Are you going to debate the question now?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I want to direct the attention of the Minister of Customs to one or two points, in view of the discussion that is going to take place. In the first place, he has taunted the hon. member for Pictou for asking for information in this House respecting a matter that may result in a claim against the government. I think I also correctly understood him to say that the government had nothing at all to do with it, that it was a private matter of the collector of customs at the port of Dawson. I would like to know which statement of the hon. gentleman we are to rely on? Are we to take the statement at one time in his speech, based on the report of the inspector, that this is entirely a private matter, in which the collector was acting as Mr. Davis, and not as the collector of customs at Dawson; or are we to take the statement in another part of his speech, in which he says that it is not a claim against Mr. Davis, but a claim against the government, by reason of the default of the collector of customs? We would like some information on that point when the hon. gentleman is prepared again to discuss this question before the House. There is another point that is significant, and on which the hon. gentleman might arm himself when he comes here again. I understand him to say that he regards it as a perfectly regular thing for the collector of customs at Dawson, to have refused a clearance to this vessel, because some person who had been its captain and another who had been its mate said they had a claim against this vessel.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I did not say that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Did the hon. gentleman not say that the collector of customs acted within the bounds of his duty in taking that position? Has he taken advice on that point?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What is your opinion?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am not going to tender my advice, because the hon. gentleman rather taunts us when we offer advice. I want to know whether he has been advised on that point by the Department of Justice, or by any one else?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Then you would call for the report?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Yes. I want to know what the position of this government is with regard to that. I want to know whether the government of this country is prepared to back up a collector of customs, who undertakes to stop a vessel, because some seaman or other person tells him that he has a claim against that vessel. I am entitled to know what the position of the department is with respect to a collector who takes that position. When I asked the hon. minister if he had taken any steps to inform himself on that point, the Minister of Marine asks me what is my opinion?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I wanted to see if you would commit yourself.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am asking for information, to see how the Department of Customs conducts the business of this country. There is another suggestion I would like to make to the hon. gentleman, it is this: He is very much concerned with respect to the sanctity of the opinions he receives from the Department of Justice. Are all opinions of the Department of Justice equally sacred, or will the government produce them only when it is convenient? It is not very many weeks since the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), in this House, sheltered himself, with regard to a payment to a certain Mr. Snettinger, by reading an opinion of the Department of Justice with regard to it, although the question did not call for such an opinion. It was convenient then to produce the opinion of the Department of Justice. It is not convenient now; and the hon. gentleman displayed considerable wariness all through his speech, lest he might quote that opinion of the Department of Justice, which he is afraid to bring down. The hon. gentleman taunts my hon. friend from Pictou for using strong language with regard to the conduct of the collector of customs at Dawson. Did not the hon. gentleman remember that it was not the hon. member for Pictou, but the Department of Justice which used the harshest language with regard to this collector of customs? The Department of Justice said that his conduct was high-handed and improper. How long does the hon. gentleman propose to retain in the service of his department, officials whose conduct is so described by the Department of Justice? In order to avoid the force of that, he tells us that the Department of Justice did not have all the facts before them at that time. Will the hon. gentleman venture to say that since he has got new light on the subject, he has asked for any further opinion from the Department of Justice? If he has not taken that step, how dare he stand up in his place as a minister of the Crown and present any such argument as that before this House? These are some of the matters on which we should like to have information from the hon. gentleman, when he undertakes again to give the House information on this subject. There is just one more suggestion I would like to make. He says that Mr. Davis has denied that Mr. F. C. Wade was advising him at the same time that the latter gentleman was advising the master and mate of this vessel. I heard a letter read in this House in which Mr. Davis explicitly stated that Mr. F. C. Wade was doing that very thing. It is true that afterwards he undertook to deny it, apparently not having regard to what he himself had stated in his previous letter. But I would like to ask the minister whether he has taken any steps to find out whether that was the case or not? If Mr. F. C. Wade, the Crown prosecutor in the Yukon, was not advising the collector of customs at Dawson, who was? Because no one could pay any attention to the facts which were disclosed by the correspondence and fail to come to the conclusion that some one was advising this gentleman. I would like to know where Mr. Davis got his ideas about the law with regard to stopping the vessel. Some one must have advised him, and he has said, if I understand the English language, that Mr. Wade was his adviser. If not, who was? Then there is another little incident we would like to have some light thrown upon, and it is this. The hon. gentleman has told us that Mr. Davis's theory of the situation now is, that although he admittedly received this money as collector of customs, nevertheless it was in his private capacity that he undertook to carry on this arbitration and pay out the award. Does the hon. gentleman mean that this is the position of affairs? That Mr. Davis, first, not in his private capacity, but as collector of customs, undertakes to stop the vessel and hold up the owners until they deposit with him $5,099; that then he departs from his position as collector of customs and proceeds to arbitrate this matter, and that while acting in his private capacity as arbitrator he awards a fee of $750 to Mr. F. C. Wade, the Crown prosecutor, for services which the owners of the vessel say they never authorized at all. Then, having done that, he resumes his role as collector of customs, and, acting as Mr. Davis in his private capacity, instructs himself in his capacity as collector of customs to pay over to Wade & Aikman, acting also as the solicitors of the captain and mate, the sum of $5,099, or whatever it was. Is that the tangle by means of which the Minister of Customs undertakes to justify to the House the conduct of this officer? Did any one ever listen to a justification of that kind put forward by any gentleman in the position of Minister of Customs, for the conduct of one of his officers. I certainly would suggest to the hon. gentleman that he had better look over the files. We acknowledge his ability as a business man. He says himself he is not a lawyer, and I would suggest that he should get some advice from the Department of Justice or some one else and ascertain whether or not conduct of that kind on the part of one of his officers can be regarded, by any stretch of imagination, as legal or justifiable, and whether an officer guilty of such conduct should be continued in the public service.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). If anything were wanted to show the inopportuneness of this debate, it is the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. He has undertaken, with very slight knowledge of the facts, and with very few papers before him, to pronounce judgment on a very complicated case. But the hon. gentleman was careful not to give an opinion on the legal aspect of the case. He undertook to cross-examine my hon. friend who is a layman, and ask his opinion on this or the other legal point, and I was very anxious to see whether he would commit himself to a legal opinion one way or the other. But I found that he ingeniously avoided expressing an opinion as to the legality of the position taken by the Minister of Customs.

The Minister of Customs did not appear here to-night to defend or to condemn the conduct of the collector. He stated distinctly in the hearing of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), who did not have the courtesy to acknowledge it, that he was perfectly willing to give every facility to the owners of the ship to sue the Crown if they thought they had a claim, or if they thought they had a claim against Mr. Davis personally, they could go on and sue him. And if the suits were brought, and it appeared from the evidence that the conduct of the collector was reprehensible, he would be the first man to recommend his dismissal. But on the facts before him at present, I do not see that the Minister of Customs would have been justified in dismissing the collector. From the facts, so far as we have them, and we have not got many, the whole day has been taken up on one ground. The hon. member for Pictou determined not to have all the papers placed before the House which would enable all the members to understand the case, but chose instead to put certain specific interrogations to the Minister of Customs, and when he got the answers he was going to debate the case. The Minister of Customs refused to place this case before the House in the shape of certain answers to certain questions, but offered to put the whole papers themselves on the Table.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Not all the papers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. So that all the members might have the opportunity of reading them before committing themselves to any opinion. That course is the more reasonable of the two, and the new practice of not asking for papers, but of asking specific questions as to whether the papers contain this fact or the other, or whether the minister thinks this or that, is not as fair and efficient a practice for enabling members to form a conclusion as the old customary practice of laying the papers themselves before the House.

The facts themselves are somewhat complicated. It appears that a mutiny broke out on board the vessel, and the captain and mate were discharged by the owner. They claimed a year's wages, and the collector of customs, righty or wrongly, acting under the statute, as he thought, detained the vessel. There was no admiralty court in which to get out an attachment in rem. and he detained the vessel and refused to give a clearance. But afterwards, on false representations, as claimed by the collector, the owners obtained clearance. When he learned that these representations were false, the collector withdrew the clearance. Whether he was right or wrong we are not in a position to judge; and having withdrawn the clearance, he put an officer on board to prevent the vessel being taken out. He said that unless the owners deposited the money which the two seamen were claiming he would not let the vessel go, as the seamen had a lien on the vessel under the statute. The owners deposited the money in the hands of the collector in his own name, under an agreement signed by themselves, by which they agreed that he should arbitrate between the parties. That agreement was signed, and they then obtained a clearance, and the vessel left. After they had got their ship away, the owners repudiated the agreement they had signed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is wrong in saying that the agreement was signed by both parties.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was signed by the solicitors acting for the owners, so it is said. I am only debating the question on the imperfect statement before the House, and this shows how utterly impossible it is for us to come to any conclusion without having all the facts. But the statement was made that the solicitors for the owners had signed this agreement. After they had signed an agreement to refer it to arbitration and had obtained a clearance of the vessel as a consequence of so signing and placing the money in the hands of the collector, they attempted to revoke their agreement. Whether they had not or had a right to revoke it is a question of law which the courts alone can decide. I am not going to pass an opinion upon it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Department of Justice seemed to be able to do so.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have not seen the opinion of the Department of Justice. But I did not hear it stated by anybody that their opinion was that such a submission could be revoked, and certainly no such opinion was read here. I have not heard the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), or the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), or any other hon. gentleman give the opinion that under the law of the Yukon, a man, having agreed to refer a case to arbitration and certain things having been done in consequence of that, can revoke—

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is entirely a question of statute. Under the common law a man can.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I know the common law; but I do not know whether there is a statute or not. The collector of customs went on to ignore their revocation and to act upon the arbitration. He divided the money and paid it out—and this is the point I wish the House to understand—before my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) had any cognizance or communication of the fact. Before anything had been received at Ottawa by the Minister, the money had been received, dealt with and paid out, and the Minister of Customs had no more to do with receiving or paying out that money than any other hon. gentleman in this House.

Mr. WALLACE. But if a wrong had been done—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know whether a wrong was done or not. I am not expressing an opinion. But, I say that if a wrong has been done by this officer for which the government is responsible, the minister (Mr. Paterson) says: Bring your suit and I will facilitate it, if you have a claim against the government; and if you have a claim against D. W. Davis personally, sue him; but what are you coming to this House for? There is nothing we can do at present. You are not in a position to say whether Mr. Davis is right or wrong. But I want to place the fact before the House, that, having referred the matter to Mr. Davis for arbitration, having paid the money, having got their clearance in consequence of it, they attempted to revoke that submission, but he acted upon it, paid out the money, rightly or wrongly, and this was done before the department was aware how the matter stood. It becomes a question of law whether Mr. Davis or the department is responsible, or whether either of them is responsible. The courts must determine that, and a political discussion here cannot aid the courts or further the ends of justice in the matter.

Mr. M. J. F. QUINN (Montreal, Ste. Anne's). Whatever may be the opinion of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or the members of the opposition on this question, there will certainly be but one opinion in the country and that is that the way in which the Crown prosecutor assumes the position of solicitor for private parties and adviser of the collector of customs at the same moment and can use his power as counsel for the collector to further the interests of a client, cannot conduce to the proper conduct of affairs in the Yukon. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has laid the case as he understands it before the House, but what are the real facts; what is the beginning of this case? The statement made by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) and agreed to by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) is that the trouble arose about the dismissal of the captain and mate of the steamship Yukoner. Mr. Wade, the government Crown prosecutor, appointed by this government to represent them in legal matters in the Yukon, we find is the representative of these two officers. They claim certain moneys amounting to $5,099. Mr. Wade applies to the owners of the vessels for payment, and they, for reasons known to themselves, refuse to pay the money. They have received a clearance from the collector of customs for their vessel and the vessel is about to leave port. But by some means or other it is not allowed to leave. The collector of customs who has already given them a clearance, refuses to allow them to leave and invokes the strong arm of the law, backed by his officers, ties the vessel up to the wharf and puts some of his own men in charge. Whatever the ministers may say, the general public in this country will say that the collector of customs at that port and Mr. Wade, the Crown prosecutor, were acting in collusion to tie up that vessel. The general public will say that Mr. Wade prostituted his office and his power as representative of this government in Dawson, and used the influence he possessed as advising counsel of the government there, and of Mr. Davis, whether legally or illegally, to detain the vessel at that port after he had given her a clearance. I do not think that any fair-minded citizen of Canada will come to any other conclusion. The question is not whether this company, which has been injured, is bound to seek redress from the government or from Mr. Davis, in his private capacity, the question is, whether the government of this country is to be known as guilty of conduct such as is abhorrent to the whole commercial community of Canada, and whether people who go there to do business are to be held up by land pirates in that manner acting under the authority of this government. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Minister of Customs say that these people have their recourse in the courts, that they have a right to take an action of damages against this man. But what confidence can they have in the administration of justice there, what confidence can they have even in a judge there, when they see that two of the most important officials can conspire together to deprive them of the clearance to which they were entitled and which was given them by the collector of customs? And when a question is asked about it, the Minister of Customs says: You should not ask such a question as that which is liable to bring an action of damages against the Crown. It was the first time that I ever knew that the Crown or the ministers of the Crown would refuse justice. I do not think they occupy their positions for the purpose of preventing people obtaining justice. Any member of parliament would badly misunderstand his position if he allowed himself to be hampered in any way in asking questions for fear an action of damages should be taken against the Crown. The right we have to ask these questions is consecrated by the fact that by that means very great benefits have been secured to the people wherever constitutional government is practised. Parliament is the highest court of the empire, and any evidence that can be adduced before any other court ought certainly to find its first place in parliament. Therefore, I think the Minister of Customs has taken a very poor position in refusing to answer questions which are put here for fear an action for damages may result against the Crown. I will say no more on this matter at present, as I believe we should have another opportunity of discussing it with fuller information than we now have. There can be but one conclusion to arrive at from what we have already heard, and that is that two officers of this government in the Yukon have acted in a most outrageous manner, have prostituted their positions and the power which they hold, in fact they have really acted as land pirates in the Yukon.

Mr. JAS. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford). The hon. gentleman from St. Ann's, Montreal (Mr. Quinn), admits that we have not full information in regard to this matter, and those of us who have listened to this discussion must realize that that is the case.

I am surprised to hear this strong attack on the collector of customs, in view of the very meagre information which we have. I think it is only fair that this gentleman should be given an investigation and a fair trial before his dismissal is called for in such vigorous terms. He is a gentleman whom many of us are well acquainted with, and in whose honour and character we have every reason to place confidence, and I regret that he has been attacked in this severe manner without being able to defend himself. As we have heard from the minister that he is asking for a full report in regard to the matter, when we receive that, we can form a proper opinion as to whether this officer has been guilty of malfeasance in office. I certainly think that before he is condemned he is entitled to a fair trial like any other citizen.

Motion (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), to adjourn negatived.

ADJOURNMENT—PERSONAL EXPLANATION (MR. McDOUGALL).

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I wish to bring to the notice of the House a statement which I find in a newspaper published in Sydney, Cape Breton, in reference to the speech made by the member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), a few days ago. -It reads as follows:

Mr. H. J. Logan, of Cumberland, was one of the speakers on the budget debate on Thursday night. He made the following apt reference to Mr. McDougall, one of the members of this county.

After proceeding to quote a part of the statement made by the member for Cumberland, the paper says, referring to what had taken place in reference to legislation that was passed in the local House of Nova Scotia some years ago for the organization of the Dominion Coal Company:

They went further, and the member for Cape Breton was one of them, and waited on the Governor General to endeavour to prevent the organization of the scheme.

I was not in the House when the hon. member for Cumberland made his speech, but I have looked it over in the Hansard, and I do not find any such statement in his speech. But I found on further search, that the correspondent of the Morning Chronicle, of Halifax, made a similar statement which reads as follows:

They went further, and the member for Cape Breton was one of them, and waited on the Governor General to endeavour to prevent the organization of the scheme.

I find the same statement in these papers. The Morning Chronicle of May 4 has it as a despatch from that paper's correspondent at Ottawa, and it is quoted in the editorial columns of the Daily Record, of Sydney, Cape Breton, on May 5, where it is credited to the member for Cumberland. I wish to inform the House that there is not the slightest foundation for the statement. I have never gone to the Governor General in regard to this question, nor to any one of his advisers, nor before the government of the day in regard to it. I do not blame the member for Cumberland for making this statement, because I do not find it in his reported speech; but whether he is responsible for it or the correspondent of the Chronicle, I say that the statement is absolutely untrue.

Motion agreed to. and House adjourned at 12.40 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, May 10, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CHAMPAGNE presented the third report of the select committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates of the House during the present session, as follows :

1. That Mr. Jeremiah Mullin, who was engaged for several days last session to assist the official reporters of the debates, be paid the sum of $50 for his services.

2. That the services of Messrs. J. A. Bernard and S. Gélinas, official translators of the debates, be dispensed with from the 15th instant, and they be paid for their services the proportion of salary allowance that the length of their service bears to the length of the session.

3. That Messrs. Achille Fortier, Flavien Moffet and Emile Tremblay be appointed to the staff, and that each of them be paid for the work to be performed by them during the balance of this session the proportionate amount that the length of their service will bear to the length of the session.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved :

That the rule of the House be suspended, and that the papers relating to the steamship 'John C. Barr,' referred to at page 431 of the Votes and Proceedings, being Nos. 63 and 63a, be printed forthwith for distribution.

Mr. McDOUGALL.

I have no doubt that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will concur in that.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would suggest to my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) that it would have been more regular to have had these papers referred back to the Committee on Printing, but, I have had a conference with the chairman of the committee, and, under these circumstances, I think the motion should pass. But, in future, if a similar case were to arise, I think I would insist upon the papers being sent to the Committee on Printing, and asking their judgment upon the matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no doubt that is quite a correct and proper mode of procedure, and it is merely as a matter of general consent that I can make the motion which I have made.

Motion agreed to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved :

That the papers referred to in paragraph 105, page 433, of the Votes and Proceedings, be printed forthwith for distribution, and that the rules of the House be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

MUNICIPALITY OF FRANKLIN, MANITOBA.

Mr. LaRIVIERE asked :

Has the following resolution adopted by the council of the rural municipality of Franklin, province of Manitoba, adopted at a regular meeting of that council, held at Dominion City on April 10, 1900, been communicated to the government:

'Whereas there is situated in the municipality of Franklin an Indian reservation comprising a portion of township 2, range 2 east, in the province of Manitoba, consisting of about 13,000 acres of good arable land, well adapted for agricultural purposes, and convenient to the market; and whereas the population of the band of Indians to whom the said land was allotted, is becoming depleted and the land in question almost deserted; and whereas the settlement of the said reservation by an agricultural population would add greatly to the prosperity of the municipality and materially aid in the liquidation and payment of the heavy bonded indebtedness with which the municipality is encumbered.

'Therefore, be it resolved that we, the council of the rural municipality of Franklin, in session assembled, do hereby recommend to the Governor General in Council that the government take the necessary steps compatible with honour to arrange with the Indians and secure an abandonment of the said land, and in the event of this being attained, to open up the said land for settlement in lots of 160 acres each, to be disposed of under the usual homestead regulations.—Carried.'

Is it the intention of the government to carry out the request of the municipal council of Franklin, as expressed in the foregoing resolution?

If so, when will this land be available for settlement, and upon what terms?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. No. 2. When the request is received it will be taken into consideration. 3. It is impossible to answer this question until the matter has been considered.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. I am not in a position to say that it is the intention to increase the wages of the lockmen on the Lachine Canal. 2. BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That from this date to the end of the session, government orders have precedence on Mondays after private Bills and questions to be put by members.

He said : I do not presume, Mr. Speaker, that there will be any objection on the part of my hon. friend opposite to this motion. I think the time has come in this session when the government should take Mondays, so as to advance as far as possible the legislation which we have to deal with. The House will, I think, all the more readily assent to this proposal in view of the fact that on Monday last we went through the whole paper, and every member having a Bill on the Order paper had an opportunity to deal with it. Most of the members were absent. One of the men who were ready to go on was my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), who was ready to proceed with his resolution on prohibition.

Mr. MILLS. He was not here at all.

The PRIME MINISTER. He was here, and was ready to proceed ; but as it was ten o'clock at the time, the government did not think it was advisable to take up such an important subject at that hour. I stated to my hon. friend from York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) the other day that if the hon. member for Yarmouth had not another opportunity of bringing the subject to the attention of the House, the government would be prepared to give a day for the consideration of that subject. Therefore, I give notice to the House generally that at an early day the government will ask the House to agree to a day for the discussion of the prohibition question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I think we are all very anxious at this stage of the session and at this period of the year to facilitate the business in every possible way. I do not see any objection at all to the motion.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth). Mr. Speaker, I should be very glad if the Prime Minister would allow this motion to come into effect after Monday next. I have an impression that very many members on both sides of the House would appreciate that, on the ground of the large number of public Bills introduced by private members still on the Order paper. It does, of course, appear superficially that private members having Bills of a public character have had a considerable opportunity of bringing them forward, and that before this period of the session those Bills should have been passed through some stages. But as a matter of fact they have not had that opportunity, because two or three resolutions, of an important character, of course, have taken up an enormous amount of the time assigned to private members. For instance, on the transportation problem we had a very interesting and very valuable debate ; but it took up the bulk of four private members' days. Then, there was the prohibition resolution, the resolution of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and several other resolutions, in addition to the time occupied in the discussion of various questions under motions to adjourn ; so that every minute at the disposal of private members has been practically exhausted. Hon. members interested in the prohibition resolution will remember that that was placed on the Order paper on the 13th of February, and was only reached for discussion on the 23rd of April ; and the discussion lasted until quite a late hour in the evening, when it was adjourned with the understanding that we should have another opportunity to discuss it. On Monday last the resolution was reached in due course at about 11 o'clock, but in accordance with an understanding with my hon. friend the Premier, it was not brought up at that late hour. I am pleading now not on behalf of that resolution, because we have the promise of a day for it ; but I am pleading on behalf of public Bills introduced by private members. Of course, I am interested principally in a Bill which stands in my name, and other members are interested in other Bills. The Bill in my name is one to amend the Canada Temperance Act, a Bill of a public character affecting fifteen or twenty districts. It is true, the Bill was reached at a very late hour on Monday, and I was not prepared to go on with it, because, it being No. 45 on the list, I did not expect it to be reached, and I was not prepared to go on with it, having left the Bill and the papers connected with it at my lodgings. I suppose that other members, having Bills far down on the list, between No. 30 and 60, had no idea that owing to the absence of so many members the list would be run through so rapidly as it was. Therefore, I would ask the leader of the House, on behalf of a public measure of some importance in my own name, and on behalf of other measures in the charge of other hon. members, if he could not manage to give us one more Monday to enable us to bring them forward. I think that would be only fair, considering that on several Mondays the time up to 8 o'clock at any rate, has been taken up by the discussion of matters not on the Order paper, on motions to adjourn, and private members having public Bills on the paper have not had a fair opportunity to pass them through their various stages. I think the time is coming when there should be some amendment made to the rules of the House in order to give members an opportunity to have Bills of this kind brought forward and discussed.

Mr. MULOCK.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). I would like to say one word in supplement of what the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) has said. There are some sixty orders on the paper under the head of Public Bills and Orders; and although we have reached a very advanced stage in the session, Public Bills and Orders have only been called once during the entire session, and that was last Monday. Let me, however, qualify that statement by saying that when motions have been undisposed of and the debate thereon has been adjourned, these have been placed at the head of Public Bills and Orders, with the result that on every day set apart for Public Bills and Orders, debates have been held on these undisposed of motions. The result has been that with the exception of last Monday the actual Public Bills and Orders have not been called. I think I am correct in saying that we only reached it after 8 or 9 o'clock in the evening. I myself have a Bill of the greatest importance affecting the North-west, standing among the Public Bills and Orders, and I would like very much indeed to have a full discussion of that Bill. Last Monday night it was only reached about 11 o'clock in the evening, when the House was so thin that I was satisfied I could not even get five members to stand up for a division; and the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), who was going to second my Bill was ill, and unable to be present. I felt, therefore, that in justice to myself and to the people of the North-west who were interested in it, I should not go on with that Bill under the circumstances. Now, I would be very much pleased if an opportunity were given me to move this Bill and present arguments in its favour. The idea is to secure the taxation of railway lands in the west, a matter of the greatest importance indeed to that country. If an opportunity were afforded me, I think I could present sufficient arguments to satisfy this House that the Bill is a righteous one and should become law. Unless I am able to get the Bill before the House in the regular way, I may be under the necessity of bringing the matter up in some other form.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am sorry I cannot agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), and in saying so I think I will be supported by the House. We have reached a period of the session, I believe, when everybody feels that all our energies should be bent towards reaching prorogation, and that from this day on we should take government business on Monday in order to get home as soon as we can. But I may tell my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) that we will make an exception in favour of the question of prohibition, and we will look into his Bill on the Canada Temperance Act which deals with the same subject, and see if we cannot take it up.

Motion agreed to.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION—CANADIAN EXHIBITS ON SUNDAY.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to bring before the government a matter which will engage to a large extent the interest of the country, and especially of the religious portion of the country. I find in a despatch from this city to the Toronto Mail, the following:

Mr. Tarte cabled that he has not succeeded in securing the closing of the Canadian exhibit at Paris on Sunday. The only country accorded this privilege is the United States.

I find in another journal this despatch:

The Canadian buildings at the Paris Exhibition will be kept open on Sunday, notwithstanding protests from the Canadian government and the Imperial authorities on the subject. The only buildings that will be closed on Sunday are those of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire what is the character of the protest that was entered by the authorities of the Dominion and by the Imperial authorities against the opening of their respective exhibits at Paris on Sunday; and I would like to be informed why these protests were necessarily ineffectual, and why the United States were able to close their exhibits. If the United States insisted upon closing their exhibit, and if the jurisdiction of the French authorities was the same in respect to other countries as in the case of Canada, and in the case of the Imperial exhibit, it strikes me that the same law ought necessarily to apply to each case. As a Canadian I feel hurt at the idea that the United States should alone enjoy the distinction among all Christian nations of observing the Sabbath at the Paris exposition. At the opening of that exposition it is well known that the ceremonies were of a character that indicated a studious avoidance of all recognition of divine authority or of religion of any kind; and it strikes me that under the circumstances there was a peculiar call for Canada and for other Christian nations to insist upon a recognition of the regulations, and usages, and rules which they deem to be essential and in the line of Christian morality and good government. I should feel, if we were not placed under duress and were not absolutely compelled to take the course which it seems has been taken, that this was an occasion where there was a loud call for the exhibition of firmness, for the vindication of principle, and for that reason I make this inquiry. I desire to know how and why it is that our own exhibit must be opened against protest of our authorities, in view of the fact that the President of the United States has said that the American exhibit must be closed on Sunday, and in consequence of taking that position the American exhibit is closed on Sunday. Where does the difference lie, and is it not possible for Canada to range herself alongside the United States in occupying this position, which would be in accordance with Christian principle, and the claim we make to be a Christian people and a Christian nation?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). In reply to the question of the hon. gentleman, I may say that when the Canadian commission first discussed the question of the Paris Exposition we took steps to find out whether it would be open on Sunday. The very first commissioner who went over to Paris went with instructions to obtain this information, and to convey to the Imperial commission, under whom and through whom only we had any power to act in connection with the authorities in Paris, that it was the desire of Canada that her exhibits should not be open to the public on Sunday. The reply from that commissioner was that he was doing what he could in that direction, and that the Imperial commission appeared to think that it was impossible to secure that end. I afterwards communicated again with the Imperial commission through Lord Strathcona, our representative on that commission, requesting that Canada's desire should be granted. I have only had a reply from Lord Strathcona acknowledging the receipt of that communication and saying that he was doing what he could. Just lately, I have received a communication from my colleague, the Hon. Mr. Tarte, saying that the Imperial commission had decided that the British exhibits should be open on Sunday, and that they could not undertake to make any difference in favour of Canadian exhibits. I think that my message to Mr. Tarte crossed his, urging him again to see what could be done. I have received since a letter from the Hon. Mr. Tarte in which he dealt fully with this question, saying that he had discussed it, but had failed to secure the object aimed at, all the other exhibits at the exposition being open on Sunday. I have no information which would lead me to believe that the American exhibit is to be closed on Sunday; in fact an expression in the letter of the Hon. Mr. Tarte which I received the day before yesterday, would lead me to believe that the American exhibits are to be open also, although it is not categorically so stated.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is a mistake.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It may be, but he stated distinctly that all the rest of the exhibition was going to be open on Sunday. Of course, I have no means of knowing how the American commissioners have secured the closing of their exhibits on Sunday, even if they have secured it. But I can assure the hon. member that I have done all I could through our commissioner in Paris, the only channel of communication which is open to us with the Paris commissioners, to secure that the

Mr. CHARLTON.

Canadian exhibit should be closed on Sunday; and the reply from the Imperial commissioners is that they cannot succeed in accomplishing that object.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). I am just in receipt of a letter of considerable importance particularly to Canadian workmen, which I would ask permission to read in order to have an explanation from the government. The letter is as follows:

Prescott, May 8, 1900.

Dear Sir,—I am mailing you under separate cover a Prescott 'Messenger' of May 4, 1900, marked on last page where one of our citizens was ordered back to Canada. I am well acquainted with Mr. White. He is one of our best men, and I had an interview with him to-day relative to this matter. He says that while at work in the store at Ogdensburg he was served with papers to return to Canada at once or be imprisoned. He had moved his wife and family to Ogdensburg, N.Y., and was practically a citizen of New York. There are now, and have been, citizens of Ogdensburg working in our town in defiance of the Alien Labour Law. Now, I am writing Dr. Ried, M.P., regarding this matter. I think it an opportune time now to make those howling Grits declare themselves on this matter, as they take lots of credit to themselves for being the labouring man's friend, when it always has been the Conservatives' aim to stand by the labour element. I thought I would call your attention to this particular case, as you are author of the alien labour clause. If I can be of any assistance to you at any time, you are at liberty to call on me.

I am, yours truly,

GEORGE McGOODKIN.

The Prescott paper published this article:

Turned Down.—John White, a Canadian, for several months employed in an Ogdensburg grocery store, was served with deportation papers last week, and returned immediately to his home in Prescott. White's employment here was in violation of the Alien Labour Law.

If we have an Alien Labour Law in force in Canada, it is time we should put it to some use. Not an American has been deported from this country under our law, while the Americans have shown no disinclination to put their's into force. Here is the case of a Canadian who went with his wife and family to Ogdensburg, and worked in the store in that place, and who was served with deportation papers and compelled to return to Canada or suffer imprisonment. And this despite the fact that there is an agreement or understanding between the two countries that owing to the fishery regulations and concessions made to the Americans from Ogdensburg to Cape Vincent, the Alien Labour Law would not be enforced at all. By an arrangement made by the International commission, matters were to stand in abeyance on both sides until the commission got through its work, yet the Americans are driving back Canadians every day who go to that country looking for work, and at the same time Americans are coming in here looking for work and this government does not raise a finger to assist our labouring element or protect them in their rights. We have on our statutes a law open, that is their affair, and if we should properly be styled an 'Alien Labour Fraud' because it is nothing else, and was intended to be nothing else from the first. As my correspondent says, I introduced a Bill, which, if it had been passed, would have been effective, but the government put up one of its supporters to forestall me and introduce a Bill which was ineffective and never was intended to be of any avail.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). I thought that my hon. friend was going to say something with regard to the question raised by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and consequently I did not rise on the moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McMULLEN. To put myself in order, I move the adjournment of the House. I consider the question exceedingly important which the hon. member for North Norfolk has brought up. I do not believe that the people of Canada will endorse for a moment the keeping open of our exhibit in Paris on the Lord's day. Our people would much prefer that we should withdraw our exhibit altogether, rather than be a party to the open desecration of the Lord's day in that country. I hope that the government will take steps to see that our exhibit is closed on that day. If the people of England are willing to keep their exhibition open, that is their affair, and if we should have to follow their course or withdraw our exhibit, I think that this government would be assuming a very grave responsibility if they should, under any circumstances, consent to a desecration of the Lord's day. I should be prepared to support a resolution to withdraw our exhibit altogether before I would be a party to keeping it open on the Lord's day. Let me tell the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, that the Christian professing people of this country will expect him to make every possible effort to have our exhibition closed on that day. If the hon. Minister of Public Works is in Paris, as the representative of the government and this country, he had better at once set about seeing that the religious convictions of our people are respected. I shall undoubtedly vote for any resolution to withdraw our exhibit altogether rather than allow it to be open on the Lord's day.

Motion (Mr. McMullen) to adjourn, negatived.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In answer to the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), I beg to say that the case he has brought to the attention of the House, judging from the letter he has read, is not a case of violation of the American Alien Labour Law. Mr. White had not gone from Canada to the United States in violation of that law, and if he was deported, that was an abuse of the law. This is the second instance of the kind, however, which has been brought to my attention. My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, brought to my attention the case of another Canadian who appears to have been deported from the United States under the pretense of a violation of the American Labour Law, when in fact there was none. This is a case which calls for diplomatic representation by this government to the American authorities that some of their officials, under colour of the Alien Labour Law, were going outside that law.

Mr. TAYLOR. What is a violation of the Alien Labour Law, if this case is not. This man went to the United States and hired in a grocery store and brought his family over, and they served him with deportation papers.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is not a violation of the Alien Labour Law.

Mr. McCEARY. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House. We have drifted into this habit of discussion, and the House will agree with me that there must be some limit put to it.

SEED GRAIN INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. JAMES SUTHERLAND (North Oxford) moved second reading of Bill (No. 143) to amend the Act respecting the securities ties for seed grain indebtedness.

He said: I promised to give a few explanations on the second reading of this Bill, and the Bill is so simple it will not require many. It is in the interests of the settlers of the North-west, whose titles are encumbered by previous legislation, under which they were compelled to give personal security for the seed grain issued to settlers from time to time in that country. I am of opinion that the country will not lose anything by this action. To be relieved of this liability, will be an encouragement to the settlers of that section of the country, and the increase in the value of land there will be of much greater benefit to the country than any loss that one might suppose would be incurred by relieving these bondsmen of the personal liability they incurred. I think further explanation is unnecessary, unless it is required by some hon. member. I am satisfied that it is in the interest of the people of the whole country that this Bill should be passed.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) has taken this step, a step which, with some others should have been taken as far back, at least, as 1897. When the hon. gentleman's principal in the office of the Department of the Interior came west, after having assumed office. I waited on him with a deputation and pressed on his attention the necessity of dealing at once with this question, and dealing with it, on the point touched by this Bill, in the way, in the main, the hon. gentleman is dealing with it now. But I urged him to go further and relieve abandoned homesteads from liens respecting seed grain, and also to give the principal debtor relief in respect to his indebtedness. So far as the point dealt with by this Bill goes, the Bill is complete; but, as I say, it is not the entire policy for which I contended. In the session of 1897, I brought the matter before the Minister of Interior, but the hon. minister did not see his way to even touch the question. I brought it before the House in 1898, and again in the beginning of the session of 1899. About the close of the session of 1899, although the Minister of Interior up to that time had very little hope, he came across the floor of the House to me and told me he was going to meet my views in regard to seed grain. Well, a Bill was passed, that ineffective Bill which led me to move for the bulky returns which have now been brought down, and which show how badly and clumsily and unsatisfactorily that Bill worked. The Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland), so far as the bondsmen are concerned, is complete, save for one phrase. But when we go into committee, I shall urge my hon. friend to change the form of the clause so as to avoid the amount of correspondence that may otherwise take place. The clause reads:

The Governor in Council may discharge from liability persons who are liable to the Crown are securities upon bonds given to secure repayment for seed grain furnished by the Crown to persons in the North-west Territories.

Now, I would ask my hon. friend, what is the necessity of providing that in each case where a man has gone security for seed grain there must be an application to the Department of the Interior? While going the full length—as he clearly intends to do from the speech he has made—the full length of relieving the bondsmen in the North-west Territories, he still leaves a vice in this Bill which will lead to any amount of correspondence. We have a pile of correspondence now brought down about a foot and a half high connected with getting rid of the liability of various bondsmen for a small sum running from ten to thirty dollars. In committee, I will urge him to change the form of the clause, so as to place the men who have given bonds in such a position that when they come to do business with a land agent they shall not be confronted with this liability which parliament is now called upon by my hon. friend to abrogate. If he is trying to relieve these men, what is the use of placing them in this position? For instance, a man goes into the land office and wants to get his patent. The land agent says: You cannot get your patent because you are bondsman for John Jones in regard to section 2, township 18, range 3. The man says: But the Bill that was passed in 1899, and the Bill of 1900 were to relieve the bondsmen. The agent answers: Oh, well, you must make an application to the Department of the Interior. The bondsman writes to the department. Perhaps Mr. Smart may put some extreme construction on this, as he has put on the Act of 1899. Then the man will go to a lawyer or to a member, and there is further correspondence, and the bondsman is worried and taken away from his business and from his farm. In committee, I shall urge my hon. friend to improve that. Then, I shall ask him to legislate in this respect not only for the North-west Territories, but also for Manitoba. There are bondsmen in Manitoba also, and I want to see them placed in precisely the same position as those in the North-west Territories. I will then suggest to him, when we go in committee—for I cannot move it, because it would be construed as being a burden on the revenue—to relieve the abandoned homesteads, that is homesteads that have been abandoned and that still have seed grain liens charged up against them. What happens in regard to these? A man goes to the North-west Territories and determines to homestead. He picks out a suitable homestead and goes to the land office to enter for it. But the agent says to him: There is a seed grain lien against this homestead; the man who was originally on this homestead borrowed seed grain, and that indebtedness belongs to the liabilities you will have to shoulder. I shall urge the hon. gentleman to relieve these abandoned homesteads. And then I shall bring up the clause—I cannot move this either, I suppose, that is, I cannot move it in a form to place it in the legislation—but I should like very much to see the principal debtors relieved in the manner I suggested last year, when I divided the House—namely, that the debt should be handed over to the local government with instructions to collect it directly or take it out in statute labour. Now, Sir, let me say that, in speaking on the motion for the second reading of this Bill, I could not illustrate better the work that may be done by a man, whether he is in opposition or whether he is on the ministerial side, who persistently presses on the attention of the House the claims of the people of the country and the claims of his constituents, than by pointing to what has been accomplished in regard to the second homestead, in regard to this seed grain indebtedness, and many other things. I might almost compare myself, in dealing with the hon. Minister of the Interior, and with previous Ministers of the Interior, to a robin on the lawn, outside here, while drawing a twelve-inch worm. First, he looks for the worm, then he gets hold of it, then he pulls it out a little way, then he pulls more, and then he pulls it all the way out, just as in this case, after having pulled the Minister of the Interior to a certain extent, at last, on this great question of the bonded indebtedness, I have drawn the worm completely. I congratulate my hon. friend, the acting Minister of the Interior, that he has come, on one of the most important features of my seed-grain policy, completely around to the views that I have advocated now ever since this question has arisen. I only hope that he will still further distinguish himself by taking the views that I have placed before him in regard to abandoned homesteads, and in regard to the principal debtor. I support the second reading of the Bill.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I would say to my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) that I do not think it is at all necessary to amend the Bill in the direction he suggests. The question of personal liability has been considered by the department, and in the cases to which he has referred of abandoned homesteads, there will be no liability against the land in the event of another settler, or another person, making an entry. That is perfectly clear. I am not prepared to go so far, and I do not understand the hon. gentleman asks it, as to say that the primary debtor should be relieved of his indebtedness, that the person who received grain himself and still owes the government for it should not pay the amount. I do not think that the hon. member asks for that, and I do not think it would be fair, or reasonable. While I agree that bondsmen, or sureties, might be relieved, I do not, for a moment, ask that the man who received the seed grain should not pay his own indebtedness. My hon. friend will see the necessity for this regulation when I point out that there are probably over a thousand bondsmen who were bondsmen only for other people, who had never received seed grain, and who will, by this Act, at once be relieved of their liability. As it is the intention that the primary debtor shall pay it is necessary that a formal application shall be made, so that the officers of the department shall know that there are no irregularities, or frauds, being committed. I think that the department has gone a long way in the interests of the settlers, and I think it will be found that this Bill will work out to the complete satisfaction of all concerned.

Mr. JOHN G. HAGGART (South Lanark). Mr. Chairman, I listened with a good deal of attention to the hon. Minister of the Interior when he was introducing the Bill, but I did not hear a single argument why these bondsmen should be discharged. I have no doubt that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), had, at some time previously, adduced some arguments in favour of it. How do you intend to treat the bondsmen who have paid under this Act? There are a lot of these bondsmen who have paid for this seed grain. You are making an invidious distinction between the man who pays and the man who does not. Are you going to recoup the bondsmen who have paid? I suppose this is the usual form in which an Act, empowering the Governor General to discharge an indebtedness to the Crown should be drawn. An argument was put forward by the hon. member for Western Assiniboia as to the language of the Bill. I think the language is perfectly correct. I was thoroughly convinced as to the proper language to be used by the argument of the hon. gentleman himself. I remember his discussing the subject of the difference between 'may' and 'shall,' and of his arguing that 'shall' should never be used when the Governor General, or the Crown, is mentioned in an Act of parliament, that 'may' was compulsory as much as 'shall,' and that it was the proper language to be used in reference to the Governor General. I would like the hon. acting Minister of the Interior to tell me why, after bondsmen have been compelled to pay, there should be this invidious distinction between those and bondsmen who have not paid at all, and whom it is proposed to discharge from their liability.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the hon. acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) replies to what my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) has said, I am quite sure that if my hon. friend behind me had been in this House and heard the arguments that have been addressed from time to time and year after year by the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) to this House, he would have been thoroughly satisfied as to the justice of this measure. Unfortunately, he has not had the opportunity of listening to these arguments that have convinced both sides of the House that it is a wise and judicious measure to relieve these people from this seed grain indebtedness. The very fact that parties were in the position that made it necessary that there should be advances made for seed grain carries, on the face of it, a justification for the relief that is now proposed. I do not intend to anticipate what the hon. gentleman who is acting for the Minister of the Interior will say upon the subject, but, it appears to me that the fact of certain parties being able promptly to discharge the liability while others have not been in a position to do that, would make a distinction between those who have already paid and those who have not paid.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In reply to the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), I would say that when this matter was brought to my attention, I took it for granted that, presumably, persons to whom seed-grain was given were in need of aid in this way. They are, probably, people, who would not have accepted assistance in any other way. My view was that the government, having agreed to furnish assistance to the early settlers, or the needy settlers at that time, they should not have been compelled to furnish personal bondsmen, or sureties. That is my view of it, and taking that view, I thought it was only proper and in the interest of the people and of the country, that these people should be relieved of that liability.

It is a reason that appeals to my mind in the interest of the setting of that country. A grievance exists now, because where a man after going through the hardships of early settlement pays his own indebtedness, it is unfair to ask him to pay for his neighbour for whom he was forced by an Act of parliament to become surety. In that view, I think it desirable that this Bill should pass. If there is any grievance in the matter referred to by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart), I will be glad to deal with it. If any person has paid for a neighbour who has abandoned his homestead and from whom he cannot collect, I will be glad to give it consideration, but I do not think there are any such cases. It must be remembered that all persons who receive grain will be asked to discharge their indebtedness. I anticipate but a very small direct loss to the country, and indirectly I believe the country will receive considerable benefit from it.

Mr. DAVIN. I know that you cannot use the word 'shall' in regard to a sovereign body, and that 'may' is quite right here. I would suggest to the minister, however, that the clause should read in this way :

The liabilities of persons who are liable to the Crown as sureties upon bonds given to secure repayment for seed grain furnished by the Crown to persons in the North-west Territories and Manitoba is, from and after the passing of this Act, discharged.

Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) object to put it in that form ?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I consulted with the Law Clerk of the department, who is familiar with all these matters, and upon whom I look as a very able man, and we had considerable difficulty in arriving at a conclusion as to the best action to take. This is rather a serious matter as it deals with a previous Act of parliament and having had the advice of the Law Clerk upon it, I would prefer to act on his decision. I will consider this suggestion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), and if it is found beneficial,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

I will be glad to consent to the change at a later stage or in the other House.

Mr. DAVIN. You are now abolishing the indebtedness of the bondsmen.

Mr. McMULLEN. No.

Mr. DAVIN. The meaning that the acting minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) attaches to the clause is that it is wiping out the liabilities of the bondsman. Is not that so ?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The liability of the bondsman or surety.

Mr. DAVIN. Then let us clearly understand that the intention of the acting minister (Mr. Sutherland) is to wipe away the liability of the bondsmen for seed grain.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). That cannot be so, because it may arise and has no doubt arisen, that some of those men who are bondsmen have had ample security from the principal debtor. The principal debtor in fact may have assigned any interest he had in the homestead to the bondsman as security, and in such a case, the minister certainly would not allow the bondsman to escape who had security from the principal debtor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We do not interfere with cases of that kind.

Mr. DAVIN. When a man applies for his patent, and says: I am bondsman for two others to the aggregate sum of twenty dollars, and I want to be relieved of that. Now suppose the other has given him some security, how is the minister to know unless it is filed in the Department of the Interior ?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If a settler applies for his patent, and there is a personal lien against him for seed grain, he would be asked to pay it before the patent was granted. But, if it was found he was bondsman for another person, he would be at once informed that he was relieved of that by this Act of parliament, and would look to the principal debtor himself.

Mr. DAVIN. I point out to the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), that the position he supposes is not understood by the acting minister to be the correct position. The minister (Mr. Sutherland) does not contemplate inquiring into these details, and he cannot do so unless it was filed in the department, and how could it be filed in the department unless it was some matter that the department had cognizance of. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) has fallen into an error in consequence of—he will excuse me for saying so, but I say it with all courtesy—in consequence of not knowing the exact conditions. The case that he supposes could not occur. The men who gave security were forced to do so by the government whether they liked it or not, and it was not necessary for the man whom they secured to induce them to do so by giving them security. I have never met with such a case in the length and breadth of the Territories, and I do not think that my hon. friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) has ever heard of a bondsman who had been secured by the principal debtor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No.

Mr. DAVIN. That difficulty does not arise then. Why does not the minister (Mr. Sutherland) consent to allow the clause to read as I have suggested. It is new to me that it is necessary that you have to go before council in this matter, and if you have not to go before council, what is the use of having the words 'Governor in Council' in the Bill. I want to get rid of this distressing and useless pile of correspondence which has arisen on the Act of last year. I have no doubt my hon. friend's legal adviser, Mr. Rothwell, is a very able man; but the first thing a lawyer does when asked to frame a clause is to ask what was done before; he is governed by precedents. In nine cases out of ten that is what we want; but there comes the tenth case, and the putting in of the Governor General in Council simply opens up a possibility of factious correspondence between the Department of the Interior and the bondsmen whom you now profess to want to set free.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend will excuse me. I am more conversant with the condition of things in the North-west Territories than are some hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. What does the lawyer of his department know about the condition of the settlers of the North-west Territories? We from Manitoba and the North-west know the condition of the settler; we know where the shoe pinches and where the difficulties arise. Therefore, I urge my hon. friend to have the clause read as I suggest. What objection has my hon. friend to put in Manitoba?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My recollection of the Act of 1899, which we are amending, is that it does not apply to Manitoba.

Mr. DAVIN. I grant that; but what objection would there be to so legislate as to bring in Manitoba?

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I am not quite sure as to the fact, but my opinion is that the seed grain liens in Manitoba have not got the bondsman clause in them at all.

Mr. DAVIN. I may be wrong about that. We will leave that. Will my hon. friend accept my amendment to the first part of the clause and drop the words 'Governor in Council'?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In my opinion it is of the utmost necessity that the clause should pass as it is, and I will tell you why. We adopt the principle in this Bill, and the discharge of the liability becomes a departmental matter. I can assure my hon. friend that the Governor in Council will pass such regulations as will make it very easy to carry out the intention of this Act and relieve those whom it is intended to relieve. The Governor in Council will be only too glad to carry out the intention of parliament in this respect; but if we were to adopt my hon. friend's suggestion, it might give rise to a great deal of difficulty which we cannot now foresee. I am satisfied that this will work to the full satisfaction of the settlers interested.

Mr. DAVIN. In order to test the matter, I move that the clause be amended to read as follows:

The liability of persons who are liable to the Crown as sureties upon bonds given to secure repayment for seed grain furnished by the Crown to persons in the North-west Territories is from and after the passing of this Act discharged.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). I think it would be an exceedingly imprudent thing on the part of this House to adopt any such amendment as the hon. gentleman has proposed. In my opinion, each case will require to be dealt with separately. If by one sweeping Act you relieve all bondsmen of responsibility, you will run the risk of not getting paid for a considerable amount of seed supplied. I question the prudence of passing this Act at all; but the statement of the acting Minister of the Interior, that a condition of things exists whereby some men have become bondsmen for others who are perfectly good for the indebtedness, and that the bond is a cloud on their title, is a good reason why the Governor in Council should relieve a man in that position. But each case has to be taken up by itself. The government are taking power by this Act, on a report of the Minister of the Interior, or by some other means, to relieve a bondsman under these circumstances; but it would be wrong by a sweeping Act to release all bondsmen, and thereby create a number of bad or doubtful debts. There is some force in the point raised by the ex-Minister of Railways, that if a man who has been a bondsman has paid the debt in order to remove a cloud upon his title, that man would have an equitable claim to be repaid the amount, if you passed an Act to relieve all the rest. I think the government should proceed very cautiously in this legislation.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend did not quite understand what the acting Minister of the Interior said, which was the very thing he aims at is to sweep away the bonded indebtedness.

Mr. McMULLEN. The acting Minister of the Interior means what the clause says and nothing else. My hon. friend is a lawyer; surely he knows enough to read the clause.

Mr. DAVIN. There is an Act on the statutes of last session which provides precisely what the hon. gentleman desires, and it is that Act which this Bill is intended to amend. The Act of last session provides:

The Governor General in Council may discharge from liability persons liable to the Crown as sureties upon bonds given to secure payment for seed grain furnished by the Crown to persons in the North-west Territories, in every case where, upon inquiry, it is shown to the satisfaction of the Minister of the Interior that the land owned by or entered as a homestead by the primary debtor is liable, and, in the opinion of the said minister, sufficient security for the sum owned by the primary debtor.

Under that law, whenever the Minister of the Interior is satisfied that the land against which the primary debt lies is good for the amount, he shall relieve the bondsmen. That is a condition of things which commends itself to my hon. friend's judgment, but that does not meet the case, and it is to get rid of the uncertainty and the annoyance that arise under that Act, that the present Bill has been introduced. The hon. member for North Wellington has probably read in the pages of Hansard, the memorial from the Agricultural Society of Moosejaw, composed of both Liberals and Conservatives, in which they express their regret that the government had not dealt in a more thorough manner with the seed-grain question, and urged that satisfactory legislation should be introduced. They even went to the length of saying that they regretted that the whole thing was not swept away.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What do you mean by the whole thing?

Mr. DAVIN. They regret that the indebtedness was not entirely swept away. The way the existing law has worked is this: Where a man had taken out a patent, it was held that the land was liable, and the bondsman, when he applied to the land office, was told that he was practically discharged. But where the principal debtor had not taken out his patent and the possession therefore, had never passed to him, it was held that the land was not liable, and in that case the bondsman was not discharged. We had a lot of troublesome correspondence in connection with this matter. Of course any correspondence I have done for my constituents did not cause them any expense, but where they were living at other places, and could not come to the member, they had to employ lawyers and pay fees, and in the return brought down to the House, you will see correspondence from leading firms of lawyers with the Department of the Interior on this matter. Many lawyers at first did not quite understand how any difficulty could arise, for on the face of it, it seemed as if the legislation of last year was intended to relieve the bondsman, and it is because I do not want to have the vagueness continue that gave rise to all this correspondence, that I desire to see this clause remodelled. If the intention is, as the acting Minister of the Interior says it is, absolutely to relieve the bonded indebtedness, then why will he not make the change? Why compel a man, who goes to the land office, to send an application to the Department of the Interior, and have Mr. Smart reply and possibly some hitch occur. If you want to do in good faith, what you profess, you will get rid of the introductory words in this section, and make it read in accordance with the amendment I have moved.

I hope the hon. member for Wellington will not oppose the amendment. I hope he will not array himself against the interests of the Territories. In other years, when the late government was in power, I often, in the interests of the North-west Territories, had to fight him and his colleagues sitting on these benches. In the end we got the better of them, as in the end we are getting the better now of those who stand in the way of good legislation for the North-west. There are friends of the hon. gentleman up there, strong supporters of mine, whom he knows well, and who know him well, and I ask him to rise above these petty views of antagonism to the farmers of the Territories, and in one generous moment, support legislation that is for the benefit of these vast areas on which the prosperity of this country so much depends.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am not taking the stand I do in opposition to the farmers of the North-west at all, but what I want to do, is to secure the repayment of the amount of indebtedness which these people justly owe to the Dominion. The amendment proposed by my hon. friend, would wipe out every bondsman at once. Even where the primary debtor was not worth a cent, his bondsmen would be relieved. That is not the intention of the Bill, but to provide an easy and simple way of relieving a bondsman, when it is found that the primary debtor is perfectly good. But to pass it in the way my hon. friend proposes to pass it, would produce a crop of bad debts that I do not think it is necessary the House should pass an Act to produce.

Mr. DAVIN. If my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) will excuse me, I would refer him to the Act.

Mr. McMULLEN. I understand the Act. The trouble with the Act was that a man had to go to the expense of getting out affidavits and to prove to the satisfaction of the Minister of the Interior that he was entitled, under the conditions that existed, to be relieved from his bonds. If a man was indebted for say $20 upon his farm, he had to go before a commissioner and get the affidavit of people to establish the facts—

Mr. DAVIN. Not at all.

Mr. McMULLEN—and the grounds upon which he asked that relief—

Mr. DAVIN. Not at all.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, that is the case. My hon. friend said that there was a large mass of correspondence on this very point. This Act will put a stop to that kind of thing. The Minister of the Interior has already stated that by a simple method, they will make it quite easy for the bondsmen to get relief, simply upon the evidence, possibly, of the land commissioner or of some man up there who is conversant with all the facts, and who will report that the primary debtor is good for the amount. In that case, the bondsman would be relieved. To pass the sweeping amendment proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) he says, would be in the interest of the North-west. But there are other farmers than those of the North-west. This debt is due to the people of the Dominion, and they have a right to expect it to be paid.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS (East Assiniboia). Two or three weeks ago, certain communications were read by me indicating a condition of things under the Act of last year, not at all desirable. For example, cases like this occurs. A settler who desired to have a lien removed and get his patent for his homestead, found that he was called upon to make an affidavit as to the financial ability of the bondsman who was security for him, and this became a very undesirable thing. And before he got through his affidavits with his lawyers the expense was more than the amount of the indebtedness. Again, under the Act of last year, a man who desired to be relieved, was asked simply to pay for two of his neighbours and to recover the amount in the civil courts. This seemed to me a state of things not desirable and liable to breed contention in any locality; so I called the attention of the government to it, and the acting Minister of the Interior agreed that he would bring in an Act at an early day that would do away with the liabilities of the bondsmen and holding only the primary debtor responsible for the indebtedness. This, I understand, is what the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) desires as much as I could possibly desire it—that our people should be relieved of this incumbrance. I had believed since 1896, that the double security was a mistake. It was wholly unnecessary, because the liability in each case was so small that a quarter section was ample security without calling in any further security. I feel disposed to support the second reading of this Bill, believing that it will cover the case. The difficulty that the hon. member for West Assiniboia sees in it is only the method of going about the work; but I believe that the same issue will be reached under the Bill as it now stands, though it may require, possibly, more correspondence than the method he proposes. Still, I desire to express my satisfaction with the Bill as it is now before the House. I hope it will give abundant relief to our people and remove this grievance under which they have laboured for so many years.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) drew a picture of what had to be done under the old Act, and I saw the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) nod to him when he said affidavits had to be filed and so on. All that the Act of last year provides for is this—that where the land of the primary debtor is liable, then the bondsmen shall not be held for that lien. The Minister of the Interior did not need an affidavit to know whether a patent was issued or not, because patents could not be issued without it being on record in his own department. Therefore, you need not be surprised, Mr. Chairman, if in this correspondence there is no affidavit—showing that the argument of my hon. friend from North Wellington is groundless. Now, I was pained, I confess, to find my hon. friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) content with this Bill as it is and not ready to support my amendment—as I gather he is not. For I know well that there is not a man at present under bonds in East Assiniboia, whence the hon. gentleman comes, who would not regard the passing of this Act in its present form as inadequate and would not regard the amendment that I propose as one to be desired. There can be no reason for not yielding to that amendment, if the object is, as my hon. friend the acting Minister of the Interior says 't is, and as I have no doubt it is, to absolutely relieve the bondsmen. For, as the hon. gentleman knows very well, and has stated very properly, there is no such risk of losing money as some persons wish to raise before his mind as a kind of bugaboo. I cannot see what the object can be of having 'Governor General in Council' here. This parliament is perfectly competent to pass the clause as I want it amended; and if you want to effect the purpose you say you want to effect, to get rid of vexatious correspondence, to enable every land agent to administer the Act, the proper thing is to accept my amendment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). It appears to me that if the position is as stated by my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), and as I understand the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) says it is, I think we are all in accord. If the acting minister says that in view of the difficulties connected with the Act of last year, he has arrived at the conclusion, and the government agrees with him that it is wise to wipe out this bonded indebtedness, I can readily see why it should be done. It seems to me there can be no possible objection to the amendment proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), which is that the Act shall have that effect without leading to another voluminous correspondence and a great deal of investigation, which does not seem to be desired by the government. I understand my hon. friend the acting minister to say that the object of this Act is to wipe out the bonded indebtedness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is not the intention of the government to relieve parties from their indebtedness.

Mr. DAVIN. It is the bondsmen.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Persons receiving grain should be called upon and asked to make good their indebtedness.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But the object, I understand, is to relieve the bondsmen.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My hon. friend, who has had a large experience as the head of a department, knows that where several different kinds of cases exist in dealing with a matter like this, it is necessary to establish certain conditions and regulations under which the department shall act. There is a large indebtedness still due, and which will be repaid by the primary debtor, there is no doubt about that. As I have already explained, if there is any loss at all, it will only be in the case of an abandoned homestead. In the interest of the settlers and in the interest of the country, I appeal to the House to support the Bill. I am sorry it receives the almost veiled opposition of my hon. friend.

Mr. DAVIN. No veiled opposition, but I want to have the North-west placed in a proper position.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have already explained that this Act goes to the full extent of meeting the requirements of the settlers, at least so far as I could ask the government and parliament to consent. It will be a great relief and satisfaction to the settlers, and will promote their interests. That is the reason that I have taken the matter up. I am sorry to find it meeting with so much criticism. When I explained to the leader of the opposition that there are a great many different classes of cases to be dealt with and that it is necessary that each application should be made—

Mr. DAVIN. Explain what they are.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have already explained several times, that the only loss that can possibly arise would be in cases where the settler had made an entry for a homestead and afterwards abandoned it. But I am sure that small loss would be more than made up by the satisfaction and encouragement given to the settlers, and the increased value given to the land still owned by the Crown, the quantity of which is very large in that district of the country. Under these circumstances, I would ask the Commons to support this Bill as it is. I am sure, if adopted, it will give the utmost satisfaction to the people interested, and if it does not, I shall be the first one to ask for any change that is necessary.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have entirely misunderstood the position taken by the hon. gentleman. We had a Bill last year which provides for everything this Bill will do, according to the position the hon. gentleman takes now. The object of this Bill is stated to be:

That the Governor in Council may discharge from liability persons who are liable to the Crown as sureties upon bonds given to secure the repayment of seed grain furnished by the Crown to persons in the North-west.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is the object.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understood the hon. gentleman to say the object was to get rid of this bonded indebtedness altogether, did I misunderstand him? If that is what he means, then there is no reason in the world for resisting the motion of my hon. friend. What do you gain by this Bill over the Bill of last year if the Governors in Council are to be the judges as to who the sureties are to be relieved and who shall not be relieved? You leave the case just where the law leaves it now, and you do no good whatever. By this you put it into the power of the Minister of the Interior to exercise a most unfair application of this Act, to relieve certain people and to refuse relief to certain other people. If that is the object of the Bill, I am entirely opposed to it. It would be better to let the law stand as it is than to pass this Bill with the understanding that it was to be optional for an individual member to say who shall be relieved and who shall not be relieved. If there ever was a time in the history of Canada when that power should not be given to the Minister of the Interior, that time is to-day. You may take this matter up a year hence and deal with it, perhaps; but to put the power into the hands of a gentleman, I care not who he is, to say to A: Yes, we will relieve you; and to say to B: No, we will not relieve you, is giving him a dangerous power. That is not what the acting Minister of the Interior said was the object of this Bill; he said the object was to get rid of this bonded indebtedness. Where people needed relief by giving them seed grain it was required that certain parties should come forward and become their sureties, and the government has arrived at a decision to relieve these sureties. It does not wipe out the indebtedness, but it relieves the sureties. I say if you are going to relieve the sureties, relieve them; but do not pass a Bill that is going to clothe anybody with power to exercise a most unfair favouritism, and just at a time when it is not desirable that anybody in this House on either side should be clothed with such power.

Mr. McMULLEN. The leader of the opposition evidently sees a nigger in the fence.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, I do.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman is measuring the corn of the Minister of the Interior in his own bushel. He thinks that during the 17 or 18 years the Conservatives were in power, that power might have been exercised. Now, the leader of the opposition is not correct in the opinion which he has given, because, before this Act can be brought into operation a certain condition of things must exist. There must first be evidence that the primary debtor is absolutely good for his debt.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman does not understand what we are dealing with.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, I think I do. The Minister of the Interior must be satisfied that the primary debtor is perfectly good for the debt.

Mr. DAVIN. Will you ask the minister whether that is his understanding?

Mr. McMULLEN. I am satisfied he understands it. He will not relieve the bondsman of a debt where the country is going to lose $20, $30, or $40 by it. He won't do it if it is going to produce a bad debt. I think it would be an imprudent thing to do unless the man is poor and struggling, and that relief will continue him as a settler: whereas if he was forced by the Crown to pay that money it might be the means of driving him out of his homestead. In a case of that kind I think the man ought to be relieved. But the primary debtor, as a rule, must be good for the debt before the bondsman is relieved. The old law provided for that, but the machinery to accomplish the relief was such that it took a very large amount of correspondence, as the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has already stated, and a long delay ensued and a great deal of trouble before you get relief. If this Act passes, supposing the Minister of the Interior orders a report from a homesteader, if there are homesteaders up there, and supposing he says to the homesteader: I want you to make a report upon every lot owned by the primary debtor for seed. That report comes in, and he finds that these men are all settled on their homesteads, improvements are made, houses and barns are built. Then under these circumstances the minister can wipe out all the liens on these places, there can be no objection to that. But if there are certain cases where no improvements are made, where the primary debtor cannot be found, where the country will have to lose the money if the bondsman is relieved, in such a case I would say that the Minister of the Interior would not be justified in relieving the bondsman. I am satisfied that if this amendment were to pass it would at one sweep clear all bondsmen and leave nothing but the primary debtor. Therefore, the country has a right to expect that these debts will be paid. Where the first debtor is absolutely good there can be no objection to relieving the bondsman.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The object that a bondsman had in giving bonds was to relieve a neighbour in distress. If he had not been in distress, or in a position that required him to receive assistance, in the form of seed grain, from the government, he would not have required any bondsman. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) takes the ground that if the parties for whom these bondsmen have secured this assistance are not able to make any recompense the bondsmen should not be relieved.

Mr. McMULLEN. I never said that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If there are any bondsmen entitled to be relieved by an Act of parliament they are the bondsmen who have generously and kindly come to the assistance of the poor settler and who is not able to pay anything, and it is in such a case that the hon. member for North Wellington says we should hold on to the bondsmen. That is not the object the House has in passing this Bill, it is not the object of the hon. acting Minister of the Interior, and I do not think it would commend itself to the sense of justice of the members of the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will not permit the hon. leader of the opposition to put words into my mouth that I did not use, or to represent me as saying that, in such a case, the hon. Minister of the Interior should demand his pound of flesh. I say that in the case where a bondsman was security for a man who was not upon his homestead and not to be found, it would be a question for the hon. Minister of the Interior to say whether he should exact the amount from the bondsmen or not, or allow him to be released. If the conditions are such that the Minister of the Interior considered that it would place that bondsman in a position that would hazard his continuing at his home, or prevent his progress at his home, the minister should have power to release him. But, the hon. leader of the opposition spoke of a case that I did not have in view, and he has attributed words to me that I did not use. You must give the Minister of the Interior certain discretionary power in the application of such an Act to all conditions that may exist. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) laughs. He thinks that if he had that power he would be able to elect himself again, because he will say: Unless you vote for me I will exact the last dollar of that bond. I will not say that he would be small enough, but, I have no doubt that he would do that kind of thing. The hon. Minister of the Interior does not live there, and I am satisfied that there is no intention of taking any such action as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) seems to suggest, but, there will be the best of evidence as to whether this would be a justifiable action or not. If the evidence is that he has released a bondsman where the primary debtor is no good, it will show that he has done it for a purpose, and there may be a charge brought against him, but, where he has released a bondsman, where the primary debtor is perfectly good, there can be no charge of wrong-doing brought against him. In one case he would be accused of wrong-doing, but, I do not think he could be so charged in the other case.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) has let the cat out of the bag. He has revealed the cloven hoof, and he has given away the object of the government. There is a rumour that the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who is now in Europe, despairing of again being elected in Brandon, afraid to face his own constituents, who regard him with abhorrence, as all Manitoba and the North-west Territories regard him, intends to try conclusions in some of the North-west constituencies, and this will be a first-rate machine to give into his hands for the purpose of buying votes. The hon. gentleman has unintentionally peached upon his friends. Unintentionally, he has blown the racket. Unintentionally, he has given us the clue to the objects of the principal cracksman in that ministry. I do not think he should ask parliament, in the face of having thus given it away, to give the jimmies and crowbars to the cracksman to accomplish what would be the dire end, even if, under any circumstances, he could accomplish it, even with a jimmy. With the aid of this Bill, and with the cracksman's tools that the administration would supply to him, I can tell him that there is no constituency in the North-west Territories, or Manitoba, where that discredited fugitive from the justice of this parliament can be elected.

Mr. J. GUNION RUTHERFORD (Macdonald). I regret very much that this discussion should have assumed a tone which I do not think is necessary or advisable, and I think the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) may, perhaps, realize, when he goes back to his constituency, that his farmer friends will pray to be delivered from their friends if this is the attitude he is going to take upon this question. I believe that the object of the Bill is expressed in the Bill, and I believe that it is an honest object. I believe that, if the hon. gentleman were as much concerned, as he claims he is, in the welfare of the farmers and in having this grievance remedied, instead of moving an amendment such as he has moved, and exhibiting factious opposition to the Bill, he would have been inclined to support a Bill in the form in which this one has come before the House. He has told us a great deal about how many years he had been like a robin. I do not know whether he spells it with one 'b' or two 'b's'. Some of the public accounts suggests that there might be two 'b's' in the robin that the hon. gentleman has been personating, or doing, during the last ten or twelve years.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order, or rather, two points of order. In the first place, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rutherford) is attributing dishonest conduct to a member of this House, and in the next place, he is founding that on the public accounts. Therefore, the public accounts that would show it should be produced. If he is referring to what has taken place in the public accounts committee, which would be out of order, I may say that I do not think he was present at the exhibition which his friends made of themselves the other morning or he would not make any illusion to it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw your attention to the fact that a moment ago the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) called the hon. Minister of the Interior a cracksman and a fugitive from justice. I would like to know if these expressions are in order?

Mr. RUTHERFORD. That is easily understood. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House consider where assertions of that kind come from, and they pay no attention to them. But, of course, when I used that expression—

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Chairman, I want a ruling on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Flint). I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rutherford) was a little out of order in using one word in his speech.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. What word was that?

The CHAIRMAN. The implication of robbing.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. There was no such language used. I asked the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) if he spelt robin with one 'b' or two 'b's'. I did not add any 'g' to the end of the word; consequently, there could be no such meaning as was attached by the hon. gentleman to the word.

Mr. McNEILL. Chair.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. There is no question that if I had put a 'g' at the end of the word, a point of order might have been taken, but, I did not do it, and, consequently, the point of order was not well taken. I regret to see that this discussion has assumed the character that it has. I am sure that the hon. gentleman's farmer friends in West Assiniboia will realize that, in opposing this Bill, which is brought in here honestly—

Mr. DAVIN. Who is opposing it? I am trying to make it an honest Bill.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Order, order, please, Mr. Chairman,—which is brought in with an honest desire to remedy the grievances of these people, he has not shown that he has been their friend. It is getting on towards six o'clock, and the hon. gentleman, in introducing a factious discussion of this kind, has not acted in the interest of the country or the constituency that he represents. I regret very much to see it, and I hope this will be the last of it, and that we will now be allowed to have a vote to decide whether the Bill as introduced or whether the amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) shall become law.

Mr. DAVIN. I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rutherford), coming from the constituency he does, and with his record in that constituency, attempting to lecture me. I stated once before in this House, that all my public and private life I laid open before any scrutiny, and I defy the most lynx-eyed—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, I defy the most lynx-eyed to point to a single spot of dishonour in my whole life. And, fancy the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rutherford), lecturing me. That man playing on the word 'rob' and 'robblin'; that man who thieved a newspaper, to try and get himself elected.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. I call the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), to order.

Mr. DAVIN. I withdraw.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling on this point.

Mr. DAVIN. I withdraw; I withdraw.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Ah.

Mr. DAVIN. I have to do it. I hear another hon. gentleman over there, cry 'Ah,' in a very loud way, but I tell him he had better sing a little small, because I can make some references that will astonish him.

Mr. COWAN. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), refers to me, he is at perfect liberty to make them here and now.

Mr. DAVIN. How does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan), know that I referred to him? Does the cap fit him?

Mr. COWAN. Because I said 'Ah.'

Mr. DAVIN. I have withdrawn the word 'thieve,' but will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rutherford), deny that he surreptitiously got hold of a newspaper, improperly, to help him in his election?

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Most certainly I deny it, and I deny it emphatically.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, Sir, his colleague in that matter is alive.

An hon. MEMBER. Bob Watson?

Mr. DAVIN. No, it was not. Bob Watson said it was good politics. The senator they have sent to the Upper House; that senator weighed down with political misconduct, looked on with approval at the thimble-rigging that took place in that election.

Mr. McMULLEN. I rise to a point of order. I want to know if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), is discussing the Bill before the House?

Mr. TAYLOR. He is answering a personal attack.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to know whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), is discussing the clauses of the Bill?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Flint). I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), is a little astray from the point under discussion.

Mr. DAVIN. I was replying, as I had a perfect right to do, to a personal attack, and with reference to this Bill, I say that if it is an honest Bill, and if it means that the acting minister (Mr. Sutherland) says it means, he will accept my amendment. If the Bill does what the hon. member for Wellington says it does, then, it is of no value. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen), is playing the part of the Minister of the Interior; thinking that the acting minister does not fill the part; or else he is playing the part of the Prime Minister, as the Prime Minister is absent. I do not know which he is playing, but whichever role it is, he plays it with infinite grace. The only thing lacking from the perfection of dignity and grace with which he discharges his duty, is that he does not understand anything about the question. I must say this, however, that his not understanding the question, would add to his efficiency in representing some of his leaders, for it would enable him to play the role a little more to perfection, because that point in his character and intellectual outfit would represent something which we occasionally see on the front benches. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), has been interpreting this Act. The acting minister (Mr. Sutherland), told us that the object of this Act was to wipe out completely the bonded indebtedness, and he nodded to me, when I asked him whether that was so or not. However, the minister remained quite silent and never interrupted the hon. member (Mr. McMullen), when on two occasions the hon. gentleman got up and gave an interpretation of the Act which was absolutely opposed to what the minister said was the correct interpretation.

Mr. McMULLEN. No.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes. The hon. member (Mr. McMullen), put a case where the primary debtor would not be able to pay, and would be undeserving, and he held that under these circumstances, the bondsmen should be held liable. Do I understand from the minister (Mr. Sutherland), that he would mean under these circumstances not to relieve the bondsmen? Not at all. If, therefore, he means that this relief shall be universal, why put in 'the Governor in Council?' Why arrange it so that it will lead to the mass of correspondence that we have had in connection with the Act of last year? The fact is as I have said, that the cloven hoof has appeared, and the design of the Act has been given away. If the acting minister (Mr. Sutherland), means to do the right thing, he will accept this amendment; if he does not mean to do the right thing, we understand him. The Bill even then, is some slight advance on last year's Bill, but if it is interpreted after the manner of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), then, Sir, I say, it would be no gain whatever. It is opening the door to misconduct on the part of politicians, and on the part of gentlemen connected with the Department of the Interior. And, we have plenty of evidence that we do not want an Act like that. I heard the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) in a theatrical aside, tell the acting Minister of the Interior, that he was about to 'give me a blow,' and now I will sit down to hear the great man from Wellington, rise up in all his intellectual power, to give me that blow.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to say, in reply to my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), that on every occasion he gets up to address the House on a question concerning the North-west, he claims that he, and nobody else, knows anything about it.

Mr. DAVIN. I know a great deal.

Mr. McMULLEN. He thinks that everybody else's brain in the House is green but his own.

Mr. DAVIN. I never should think you are green, you are yellow.

Mr. McMULLEN. Why, if my brain was as green as is the brain of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), instead of going around with a skating rink on the top of my head, as he does, I could grow hair for sale. Let me tell him, that I understand the question quite as well as he does. He must not fancy that when his hat is on, it covers all the brains we have in this parliament. Why, every one who has sat ten years with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) in this House, knows that he has more rooms to let in his upper story than any man in this parliament.

Mr. DAVIN.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend (Mr. McMullen), has told you, Mr. Speaker, that I have a skating rink on the top of my head. Well, there is no doubt about that. I certainly have a larger amount of forehead to show than the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen); but he did not tell you that there is a sort of similarity even now between us, because the curly locks that fell over whatever forehead he had twenty years ago, are no longer there. He did not, however, tell the House the difference between himself and myself, and the difference is: That though I am more bare-headed than he is, he is more bare-faced than I am.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman said that in my upper story there were a large number of rooms to let. Again, he did not tell us the difference between myself and himself. There may be rooms to let in my upper story, and there are rooms to let in the hon. gentleman's upper story; but the difference is this, that mine are furnished and his are unfurnished.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope that, after the able discussion we have had of the subject-matter of the Bill, the committee will now see that it is time that it should pass. My hon. friend thought well to call me some very hard names—a cracksman, and so forth. I may say to my hon. friend that perhaps I am not as sensitive as he is—

Mr. DAVIN. I never made a reference to you.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the hon. gentleman's reference was to the absent minister, it was very unfair and improper. He has no responsibility for this Bill in a way, because anything that has been done has been done since his absence from the country. I am fully responsible for this legislation. I am not as good as the hon. gentleman, and I do not want to have an inquiry into all my shortcomings; but I want to show how unfair the hon. gentleman is in insinuating that there is something political in this measure. Up to this stage the hon. gentleman has urged the necessity of this legislation. This Bill is not for the purpose of vesting any power in the government or in the minister in regard to this matter. The Act of 1899 provided that relief should be given when satisfactory to the Minister of the Interior, and so on. I do not admit that there would be any maladministration under that provision, but this Bill removes all that, so that the hon. gentleman has been unfair in trying to lead the House to believe that this Bill is for the purpose of putting any power in the hands of the government. Quite the contrary. This measure will, I believe, give satisfaction to the settlers, and I hope after this discussion that the Bill will be allowed to pass without further opposition.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very glad to see the leader of the government in his place, because I think I am justified in making an appeal to him which I hope will dispose of any difference with reference to this Bill. The hon. First Minister knows that a Bill was passed dealing with this question of seed grain indebtedness; and it involved, as has just been stated by the acting Minister of the Interior, a great deal of inquiry and discussion on the part of the Minister of the Interior, who was to report on the cases as they came up. After a great amount of discussion the acting Minister of the Interior has submitted a Bill, which provides:

The Governor in Council may discharge from liability persons who are liable to the Crown as sureties upon bonds given to secure repayment for seed grain furnished by the Crown to persons in the North-west Territories.

There is the whole question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask my hon. friend if he has the Bill of 1899 before him, and if he will read the first part of that?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, and I entirely concur in the view my hon. friend has expressed in reference to that. I also draw the attention of the First Minister to the statement of the acting Minister of the Interior, that one of the objects of this Bill is to remove the personal element involved in that measure. The acting minister has frankly, two or three times in this discussion, made a statement that it is eminently satisfactory, certainly to this side of the House; that is, that the object is to get rid of the whole of this question of bonded indebtedness. That is to say, parties who have become sureties for other persons who required to be assisted by the government, shall be relieved of their liability as bondsmen. There is the whole principle of the Bill. The acting minister has stated again and again to the House that his object in introducing this Bill is to sweep away the whole of this bonded indebtedness, and he has given a very satisfactory reason, that is, that these parties who gave assistance to their friends and neighbours in distress to enable them to obtain seed grain, are not to be held responsible.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will my hon. friend allow me to point out one thing? I know that he understands the Bill, but many might misunderstand it from the way he puts it. It is not to remove the indebtedness, but to relieve the bondsmen of their liability.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite so. It is not to touch the question of indebtedness at all. It discharges the bondsmen from their liability, as my hon. friend has stated. Under these circumstances my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), who has taken so much interest in this question, has suggested that if that be the object of the Bill, the words, 'Governor in Council' should be removed, and the Bill should ipso facto do that which it is proposed to do through the Governor General in Council. As we are all agreed with the acting Minister of the Interior, on this side of the House at any rate, in doing what he declares to be the intention of this Bill, I appeal to my hon. friend the First Minister whether it is worth while to lose time or have any difficulty or difference of opinion when the object is attained amply by the elimination of the words 'Governor in Council.'

The PRIME MINISTER. As my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has appealed to me, I must express my regret that other duties prevented me from being in my seat when this discussion took place. My hon. friend will understand that it is not possible for me, not having heard the discussion, to come to any conclusion just now. I may say, however, that if I were to give an opinion now, it would not be in accordance with the view of my hon. friend, because, having discussed the Bill to some extent, not with the acting Minister of the Interior, but with the minister himself, I would be disposed to accept the minister's view. The only thing I would suggest to my hon. friend would be to let the committee rise and report the Bill, and let the third reading stand till to-morrow, and in the meantime I will confer with the acting Minister of the Interior.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the suggestion of the First Minister is all we require.

Mr. DAVIN. There is something else. I now beg to move the following clause:

Liens for seed grain against abandoned homesteads in the North-west Territories from and after the passage of this Act are discharged.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The amendment is quite unnecessary.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the hon. gentleman explain how?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have already explained that there is no lien on an abandoned homestead. An abandoned homestead becomes Crown property, and the Crown can make a free grant of it or put any figure on it it likes. I have said already that whatever loss there might be, from time to time, to the country, through giving up any claim we might have against a person who had abandoned his homestead, that would be more than made up by the increase in value of the land that thus reverts to the Crown. There is no necessity at all for my hon. friend's amendment.

Mr. DAVIN. If we get the public statement from the minister that after the passing of this Act, in no case shall a settler, when taking land, be asked to pay up for the seed grain liens against the homestead, that is quite satisfactory.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly, that is what I have said.

Mr. DAVIN. Under those circumstances, I wish to formally withdraw the amendment.

Bill reported.

THE PILOTAGE ACT.

Bill (No. 11), to amend the Pilotage Act (Sir Louis Davies), was read the second time.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved that the House resolve itself into committee on the said Bill.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I know, Mr. Speaker, that there are gentlemen in the House who wish to speak on this Bill. Although I do not profess to know much of this question, I have seen in the newspaper supposed to be a supporter of the present government, the Montreal Witness, an article pointing out that this Bill was constructed under most dangerous suggestions. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine was accused of framing its clauses, not in the interests of the navigation of the St. Lawrence, but under terror of the pilots on that river and the votes they control. I do not know whether my hon. friend read the article, but it is one likely to lead to a general discussion of this question in the House by those gentlemen who thoroughly understand it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I may say to my hon. friend that his predecessor in office (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was obliged to go to Montreal to-day, that he takes a very great interest in this question, and I think he would be very glad to have an opportunity of discussing the Bill. Could not my hon. friend allow it to stand until another day?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is misled altogether about this Bill. It was not dictated by any motives suggested by the newspaper to which he referred. It is the outcome of a commission appointed to adjust the differences between the pilots on the River St. Lawrence, piloting between Montreal and Quebec, and the Pilotage Commission of Montreal. It does not extend to the district below Quebec. The pilots of that district were dealt with last session by a Bill on lines similar to the one before the House now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND.

The pilots of the Montreal district went on strike a year or two ago and seriously imperilled the commercial interests of Montreal. A large number of most valuable ships are leaving and arriving at that port almost daily, and it is absolutely essential that they should be provided with pilots. Owing to the strike, caused by what the pilots thought were harsh measures dealt out to them by the Pilotage Board, the safety of the steamers were imperilled, and breaches of the regulations almost had to be resorted to in order to obtain men to take charge of these vessels. After a great deal of negotiating the pilots consented to resume work on my undertaking to appoint a commission to inquire into their grievances. If the commission reported a reasonable and fair remedy, I promised to recommend it to the House for adoption. Mr. Justice Lavergne was appointed chairman of the commission, Commander Wakeham, of La Canadienne, who has great experience, was appointed second member of the commission, and the deputy minister of my department was appointed third member. That commission took a great deal of evidence. The shipping interests were represented by counsel, and so were the pilots. The Bill before the House is the adoption to a large extent of the report of that commission. A portion of its report can be carried out by amendments to the regulations themselves, but a portion required amendments to the law, and I have therefore introduced this Bill.

The provisions are these: At present the members of the Harbour Commission at Montreal is by law constituted a tribunal to hear and determine all complaints made against pilots for a breach of the law or any of the regulations. The result has been most unfortunate. Owing to lack of legal knowledge, the Harbour Commissioners did not carry out the different inquiries with that degree of technical or legal accuracy which the courts thought necessary, and in nearly every case for many years the pilots applied to the courts for a certiorari in order to remove the case into the courts. So no punishment can be inflicted at all.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Will the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) allow me to ask him a question? I suppose the Harbour Commissioners have a counsel appointed by themselves or by the government to see that their proceedings are carried on legally.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am speaking of the facts as they are. The Pilot Board are not lawyers, and as reported by the commission, and as I am told by the chairman of the harbour board, when a writ of certiorari is taken, the decision of the board becomes futile, in consequence of the delay that elapses before the court decides on the rule nisi, as the time has expired during which the pilot's branch is suspended—four or six months, or whatever it may be. What is needed is some simple tribunal which will hear charges or complaints against the pilot, and which will enforce punishment. It should be a tribunal which will give satisfaction not only to the pilot but to the shipping interest as well. The commissioners thought that three men might be appointed, one, the president of the tribunal or court, who should be appointed by the minister; another should be appointed by the Department of Marine on nomination of the pilots as a whole; and the third should be selected by the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, as representing the shipping interest, and the minister should appoint him. So, we should have a lawyer, the president of the court chosen by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; a pilot who would have technical skill and knowledge selected from the pilots, who during the time he acted in the court, would not act as a pilot, and who would bring the knowledge of an assessor to the court, and enable them better to decide on nautical matters; and you would have a gentleman representing more or less the shipping interest, selected and nominated by the Harbour Commissioners. The judgment of this court would be final and conclusive. The establishment of this court is only a temporary expedient, because it is proposed by the Bill that if and when the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court is either transferred from Quebec to Montreal, or—

Mr. CASGRAIN. Oh.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES—I do not contemplate that at present, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) will understand—or a separate court is established for the city of Montreal when the business justifies it, from that time the whole jurisdiction now vested in the pilot's court hereby created, shall be transferred to the Admiralty Court. So, the court to be established is a temporary court until the Admiralty Court is established. That is the sum and substance of the Bill; I cannot conceive any objection to it. It is not in the interest of the pilot more than it is in the interest of a business man. Justice should be done in a speedy manner; and the pilots should know that there is this tribunal that will punish them for wrongdoing; and the shipping interest should feel that they can appeal to the courts with every confidence that even-handed justice will be done. If my hon. friends are anxious that the Bill should stand over, it can be discussed in committee, and, at the end of the discussion, let it stand, and we will resume it another day.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

It being six o'clock, the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

(The House resumed in Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. SPROULE. Is there a pilotage court for Quebec?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). This is not for Quebec at all; this is a court to be established in the city of Montreal for the trial of complaints against pilots in the Montreal pilotage district. The Quebec pilotage district was dealt with last year. There was one in both the city of Quebec and the city of Montreal, and the one in Montreal heretofore has consisted of the Harbour Commissioners, and that has been found to be an inadequate and inefficient court. Neither the pilots have confidence in it, nor have the shipping interests confidence in it, nor do the commissioners themselves think they are competent to constitute an efficient court. The pilots below Quebec are a different body of men from the pilots above Quebec; they go from Quebec down to Father Point; they are two separate authorities altogether.

Mr. M. J. F. QUINN (St. Ann's, Montreal). The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) explained before dinner that the Act which is now introduced is the result of a report of commissioners appointed under an order in council of January 11, 1898, to inquire into alleged grievances of the pilots in the district of Montreal. The committee say that when this report was published copies were sent to the different interests concerned with the work, and one and all in the district of Montreal; in the city of Montreal, for example, the Harbour Commissioners, the board of trade, and the chambre de commerce all petitioned against following the suggestions of the commissioners, that is to say, that a special court should be established, consisting of three persons, for the trial of these offences. Any lawyer will see at once that there is great force to the objections made by these different bodies. Under the Pilotage Act, chap. 80, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, the pilotage authorities are given certain powers. The pilotage authority of Montreal is described in section 5 to be the Montreal Harbour Commissioners. Now, section 73 creates, so to speak, certain offences, that is, every licensed pilot who, either within or without the district for which he is licensed, commits any of the offences described in that Act, is to be subject to certain penalties. That section provides that in addition to any liability for damages, he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $200, and suspension or dismissal by the pilotage authorities. It then goes on to say how this amount is to be collected, that is, it can be collected by any competent court of the province. The penalty may be recovered:

Before any court having jurisdiction to the amount of the penalty, or in a summary manner before a stipendiary magistrate, a police magistrate or two justices of the peace.

This, of course, comes under the Criminal Code and would now be what is called a summary trial. But, the Bill does not provide any machinery at all for the trial of these offences. That is the first objection I have to it. It creates a court, but it does not provide any machinery whatever. It is quite true that section 3 of the Bill says :

The court shall have jurisdiction and be competent to hear and determine all offences under section 73 of the Pilotage Act.

But, it does not empower these men as magistrates, and it does not make them competent to try any offences.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn), has not read the seventh section of the Bill. I think he will find that it covers the point.

Mr. QUINN. It gives them the jurisdiction and powers of a stipendiary or police magistrate.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It extends the provisions of the Criminal Code, which was formerly known as the Summary Jurisdiction Act, to the proceedings.

Mr. QUINN. That is very true, but under section 73, in giving them the means of punishing, it only gives them the power to fine. The second objection is that the court is to be composed of one individual to be appointed by the minister, a second to be appointed by the Harbour Board, and a third to be appointed by the pilots. The Harbour Commissioners in their petition, speaking on this question, say :

A great grievance has been made of the fact that pilots are not represented on the commission, when it sits in pilotage matters, especially for the trial of pilots. It seems to be an extraordinary pretension that the person tried should be represented on the bench by one of his own class. We are not aware that this occurs anywhere in judicial systems. It would be strange if it did. No doubt it would suit many classes of the community to be tried and sentenced by those in the same calling as themselves. The professional burglar would, no doubt, thoroughly appreciate this, and would be certainly more satisfied than he is with the present system. It seems to be a very undesirable principle that the pilots should, in trials especially, have a representative of their body upon the board. It might very possibly happen that this pilot should have to try a relative of his own, one of his confrères serving the same line of steamers, or one with whom he was not upon good terms. It has been suggested that he might be appointed for three or five years; this would present a great danger, as he would then know that he would have to be placed himself, sooner or later, in the same position as his confrère that he was called upon to judge. The end sought seems to us to be very much more satisfactorily and easily attained under the system as it exists. The only practical utility in having a pilot upon the board would be his availability for technical questions. This, however, can equally, if not better, be explained by an expert witness. He is then under oath and open to cross-examination, and can have his evidence thoroughly tested and strengthened or weakened, as it deserves.

This seems to me to put the case in a nutshell as regards the appointment of one of the pilots as a member of this court. Why does not the government establish, in the district of Montreal, an Admiralty Court, where all these cases may be tried? That is what the Harbour Commissioners ask for, that is what the Board of Trade ask for, that is what the Corn Exchange Association ask for, that is what all the shipping interests ask for in their memorandum, and that is what all the commercial bodies in Montreal have been asking for during the last three or four years. They have been asking that an Admiralty Court shall be established for the trial of all these cases. The Board of Trade, for example, say that :

That, so far as your petitioners are aware, neither the Harbour Commissioners nor the shipping interests have been consulted as to the provisions of the Bill, although the former are by law the pilotage authority, and the latter represent the only employers of pilots, and the payers of all pilotage incomes.

That the Bill in no wise remedies any of the evils presently resting on the pilotage, but, on the contrary, provides further taxation on an already over-burdened interest; moreover, it is of partial application, being limited to the service between Montreal and Quebec, leaving the service between Quebec and the sea untouched.

What are the reasons urged by the Pilotage Commission for the establishment of this court? They say that heretofore all trials have taken place before the Harbour Commissioners. There is no complaint made as to the justice, or honesty, of the Harbour Commissioners in these trials. There is no complaint made against them individually, but it is said that their judgments have been appealed from, and that they have been upset by the Superior Courts. This is very easily obviated. Why is not the section, which gives an appeal, repealed? If it is found unjust, or if it is found that it affects in any way the administration of justice in this particular manner, why is it not repealed or remedied in some way in order that justice can be done in these cases, instead of putting it into the hands of a court which it is not pretended will be better qualified to adjudicate upon the questions which are brought before it than the Harbour Commissioners are? It is not because a writ of certiorari has been issued in Montreal that the commissioners complain, but in their complaint they say that the appeals have been so numerous that their work has been rendered absolutely useless. But, these gentlemen have legal advisers. I do not know anything about the particular cases in which appeals have been maintained against the judgments of the Harbour Commissioners, but I have no hesitation in venturing the opinion that, in nine cases out of ten in which these judgments by the Harbour Commissioners have been reversed, it has been because of some legal formality which had not been gone through, either before the trial, or during the trial, or at the time of judgment. It is, in all probability, owing to the want of some legal formality that these judgments have been reversed. That is not a ground for asking for the establishment of a new court. It is a ground, rather, for giving these men proper counsel so that they will be in a position to try cases properly and avoid such a possibility as a reversal of the judgment on mere matters of form. Notwithstanding the fact that they have read carefully the Bill which is now being considered they still say that they think the ends of justice will be better served by sticking to the conditions which exist at the present time than by the introduction of this new legislation. Now, I have in my hand, here, a copy of the report of the Commissioner on Transportation, adopted unanimously by the council of the Chambre de Commerce du District de Montreal. Under the heading of the 'Bill Amending the Pilotage Act,' they say in their memorandum:

Inasmuch as the chamber of commerce has, at different occasions, asked the government to establish a court of admiralty at Montreal; and

Considering that in the Bill now before the parliament to amend the Pilotage Act, the government expressed its desire to create, in the near future, a district of admiralty at Montreal,

Be it resolved, that the chamber of commerce does not favour the nomination of 'The Montreal Pilots Court,' but respectfully begs the government to institute at Montreal, as soon as possible, a Court of Admiralty constituted as per clause 8 of the said Bill amending the Pilotage Act, now before the parliament.

The whole difficulty would be gotten over if the minister would establish a branch of the Admiralty Court in the city of Montreal, where matters of this kind could be tried, and the judgment rendered by which court would, I feel confident, satisfy everybody interested. We have heard a great deal in the House about the deepening of the canals and the improvement of the St. Lawrence route, but from what I have learned from those deeply interested in our navigation, I have no hesitation in saying that the money spent in this direction will only accentuate the difficulties that exist between Montreal and the seaboard, owing to the condition of the channel, particularly between Montreal and Quebec, the insufficient lighting, and the difficulties in regard to the pilots. I was present when a deputation waited on the Minister of Marine some months ago, when men interested in all branches of trade submitted their views, and one and all agreed that until means were adopted to lessen the charges that are now placed upon shipping in Montreal; until means were adopted to regulate the power the pilots possessed; until measures were taken to light the channel between Montreal and the seaboard and to buoy it in proper fashion; that it would be utterly impossible to obtain anything like a fair living rate of insurance on cargoes and vessels leaving the port of Montreal. The consensus of opinion of these men was, that it would be utterly impossible to hope for a large increase in the number of vessels coming to Montreal until remedies were applied, amongst others to our pilotage system. They were not selfish enough to urge that the profession of pilot should be thrown open to everybody; but they did urge that the number of pilots should be increased as much as possible. I understand that there are fifty-five pilots at the present time, and that the intention is to allow none others to enter the profession until it has been reduced to forty-five.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That was a suggestion of the commission which we have not adopted.

Mr. QUINN. I know that the pilots are working in that direction.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The number will be left at fifty-five.

Mr. QUINN. The different interests will, I think, be satisfied if the number is left at fifty-five, and if stricter measures are adopted for the examination of these pilots.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think the more stringent regulations which are being adopted with regard to pilots will give satisfaction. These regulations are provided for by by-laws of the Pilots Board and not by statute.

Mr. QUINN. Another question that the shipping interests, the Board of Trade, the Harbour Commissioners, the Corn Exchange, the Chambre du Commerce, and in fact all concerned in shipping, urge, is that these pilots be subject to a rigorous examination at least once every year, as to their eye-sight, and their knowledge of the channel, because in some instances, though not in many, it has been found that even men who are considered very expert have met with misfortune in bringing large ships up the river. The examination of pilots is at present, I think, once every two years.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Once in three years.

Mr. QUINN. I believe that under the present regulation, when the pilots are examined as to their eye-sight once, that is the end of it until they retire from the service. I especially urge that the government will see the necessity of establishing at the earliest date possible an Admiralty Court in the city of Montreal. Great inconvenience is now experienced for the want of such a tribunal, and until it is established the people of that city feel they are not being fairly dealt with. I urge upon the minister the necessity of embodying in this Bill, or in some other which he may introduce, the amendments asked for by the Board of Trade and the Harbour Commissioners. There is one thing at least certain, and which ought weigh with the government, and that is, that the different bodies which I have mentioned, all agree upon what they think would be for the best interests of the port of Montreal. The only dissentient voice comes from the pilots who are possibly the greatest sinners in connection with the difficulties existing. The minister, in my opinion, should embody in a Bill the representations made by these different commercial bodies, and bring it before parliament at an early date.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We are already making provisions in the direction the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) indicates. The regulations of the Pilotage Board will provide that all candidates for pilot licenses must submit to examination and severe tests as regards eye-sight and colour blindness, similar to the examination passed by masters and mates. The regulations provide that the licensed pilots shall undergo every year the same tests as masters and mates have to undergo. The examination as regards eye-sight must be undergone by the pilots every third year. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) has very properly referred to the suggestions made to the department, but if he examines the petitions of the shipping interests of Montreal, he will see that it is not the form of this Bill that they complain about, but that their chief complaint is against having any system of compulsory pilotage. They want compulsory pilotage abolished, not only in the Montreal district, but in the Quebec pilotage district. Their petition is as follows :

That the amendment which your petitioners have so long and urgently prayed for, viz., that the pilotage service from Montreal to the sea be thrown open to all qualified candidates possessing the necessary qualifications, preference being given to those having several years' experience of ocean navigation as masters and mates.

My hon. friend will see at once that that is not a very easy thing to do. There are a large number of certificated pilots holding branches in the city of Quebec. They have been brought up to this business since childhood, they are not fitted for anything else, and it would be a cruel thing to throw these men open to competition with every one who might compete with them. The same is true of the Montreal pilots. The objects sought by this petition are very good in themselves, but there are difficulties in the way which are insuperable. I do not suppose my hon. friend himself would advocate this drastic measure being put into effect at once. It may come about in the future as the efficiency of the pilots is increased by thorough examinations ; but, to abolish pilotage boards and compulsory pilotage to-day would be a drastic measure which, I think, no minister would be prepared to recommend. Then, they ask that the compulsory payment of pilotage fees shall be abolished. If compulsory pilotage were abolished altogether, many pilots would lose their living altogether ; there would be no receipts. Then, they ask that complaints against pilots be tried before a Vice-Admiralty Court to be established at Montreal. My hon. friend sees that we cannot just at present transfer the Vice-Admiralty Court from the city of Quebec to the city of Montreal, and there is not enough business to justify the establishment of a Vice-Admiralty Court at Montreal as well as at Quebec. It would be a burlesque to establish a court at Montreal merely to try breaches of discipline on the part of pilots. But, I quite agree that with the future growth of commerce and shipping at Montreal, circumstances may justify the establishment of a branch Admiralty Court there, and breaches of discipline on the part of the pilots might be tried before such a court, instead of before this temporary pilots' court which we are creating by this Bill ; so that, we have in view the object which the petitioners pray for in their petition. We establish at as reasonably early a day as possible a branch of the Vice-Admiralty Court there, with the provision that when it is established it shall have not only the ordinary jurisdiction of a Court of Vice-Admiralty, but, also jurisdiction in these pilotage matters. I think I have satisfied my hon. friend that ample machinery is provided in the seventh clause of the Bill, which he overlooked, and which provides for the application to the proceedings of the fifty-eighth part of the Criminal Code, formerly known as the Summary Jurisdictions' Act, conferring upon this court the jurisdiction and powers of a stipendiary or police magistrate. The objection which my hon. friend took to the Bill was, that one of the three commissioners to be appointed was to be a man nominated in the first instance by the pilots. Here we have fifty-five pilots who have been discontented in the past with their court to such an extent that they have gone on strike and thrown the whole shipping interests of Montreal into jeopardy ; and it is quite desirable, I am sure every one will feel, that a court should be established that will not only do justice in itself, but in which those brought before it will have confidence. If we can establish a court in which they will have confidence, I am satisfied that we shall have taken a long step in the direction of preventing a repetition of that unfortunate strike which took place a couple of years ago. I think there can be no objection to the pilots nominating one of the three members of the court ; but, I want to suggest a small amendment in the fifth subsection of section 1, to the effect that the president of the court shall receive $10 a day, as he must be a lawyer, and more of his time must be taken up than that of the assessors who sit with him.

Mr. MARCOTTE (Champlain). (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I think it my duty to say a few words on the question which is now engaging the attention of the House, because quite a number of pilots reside in my constituency, and in the neighbouring county, Portneuf. I know that the pilots are deeply interested in the Bill now under consideration.

The hon. member for St. Ann's Division, Montreal (Mr. Quinn), who spoke before me, said that the court provided by this Bill, which is to consist of three members, could not be impartial and competent, on the ground that one of the members of that tribunal is to be selected from the pilots, on the nomination of the pilots as a whole, and that such a selection would be objectionable, as it is not fair that the persons tried and sentenced should be represented on the bench by one of the same calling as themselves. I think, Sir, that this is a very unfair insinuation. There are to be found in that corporation many honourable men who have more technical skill and knowledge than all the Harbour Commissioners who decide the questions affecting the pilots. It stands to reason that those pilots being practical men, who have spent their lives in navigating the St. Lawrence, are better qualified to sit on pilotage matters than the gentlemen who compose the Harbour Commission. Why, Sir, here are men who are perfectly acquainted with the dangers and difficulties of navigation; men who are familiar with the various accidents and misfortunes met with in bringing large ships up the river; men who have closely watched for years all pilotage matters; and surely nobody will pretend that such men are not more competent, from their knowledge and technical skill, to decide questions affecting the pilots than are those gentlemen of the Harbour Commission who know nothing about navigation.

As to the judgments of the Harbour Commission that have been appealed from, the hon. member (Mr. Quinn) said that nine out of ten cases had been reversed by the Superior Court, owing to some irregularities in the mode of procedure, for want of some legal formality, or for some excess of jurisdiction. I am not a legal man, and I am not in a position to form an opinion on those particular cases in which appeals have been maintained against the judgments of the Harbour Commissioner; but I say that means ought to be taken to avoid such a possibility as a reversal of the judgment on mere matters of form, or on irregularities as to the mode of procedure and the mere reception of the evidence.

I quite understand the reasons why the Harbour Commissioners take exception to this measure, but so far as I have been able to judge from what I have heard about the provisions of this Bill, I think it will meet the requirements of the case and materially aid in solving the difficulties existing. For, as I said, the members of the new tribunal which is created by this Bill, will form an impartial and competent tribunal. As to the Harbour Commissioners, I believe that, from the fact that they are business men, it does not follow that they are competent to constitute an official court and to deal with the various accidents in connection with the navigation of the St. Lawrence, such as collisions or grounding cases. They are, no doubt, actuated by the best motives, but they lack the necessary technical knowledge which experts alone, like the pilots, can master, from a long acquaintance with the difficulties and dangers of the navigation of the river. Everybody, therefore, understands the practical utility in having a pilot upon the board, by reason of his availability for technical questions in connection with accidents on the St. Lawrence.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) also referred to the desirability of increasing, as much as possible, the number of pilots and of throwing open the profession to everybody. I do not know whether that would prove a good means of remedying the grievances complained of as regards the pilots. I think that the pilots are numerous enough to meet the requirements of the shipping interests. The pilots employed by the ship owners between Montreal and Quebec are undoubtedly very efficient men, fully deserving the confidence of those who employ them. They are thoroughly familiar with the difficulties that exist in the navigation of the river, and, after all, accidents are not very numerous. That accidents, such as collisions and cases of grounding do occur, the responsibility for which falls upon the pilots. I do not attempt to deny; but, on the other hand, hon. gentlemen will agree with me that most accidents which occur to shipping are caused not by the bad steering of the ship, but by defects in the apparatus itself or by the insufficient lighting of the channel or similar causes. I would deprecate any attempt at throwing the responsibility for shipping that may come to grief upon men who are not in a position fully to protect themselves.

As to the examinations which all candidates for pilot licenses, and even certificated pilots have to submit to, as regards eyesight and colour-blindness, and the knowledge of the channel, I am of the opinion that such tests cannot be made too severe. Any man who is affected by colour-blindness cannot be looked upon as competent to steer a vessel. If he does, the vessel which he steers may come to grief, and he alone should be held responsible for such accidents. In this connection, I am happy to be able to say that my views coincide with those expressed by the hon. gentleman who spoke before me (Mr. Quinn).

Mr. QUINN. In reply to my hon. friend from Champlain (Mr. Marcotte), I may say that I was simply reading the report of the commissioners who state that it was rather a singular proceeding to appoint on a special tribunal formed to decide a question affecting the pilots, men belonging to that profession. They say that it is like naming a jury of burglars to try a burglar.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Rather an unfortunate analogy.

Mr. QUINN. Yes, but it is that used by the commissioners in their petition.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But my hon. friend will admit that it is rather unfortunate.

Mr. QUINN. Yes, but it is not mine. The hon. gentleman refers to section 3 of the petition of the shipping interests of Montreal, in which they say that the pilotage service from Montreal to the sea should be thrown open to all qualified candidates, possessing the necessary qualifications, preference being given to those who have served as masters and mates in ocean navigation. If we would be perfectly fair and honest and cast aside our political prejudices or our desire to serve possibly our own personal interests, we would see that the recommendation of the shipping interests is the best one in view of the interest of the navigation of the St. Lawrence. If you wish to make the St. Lawrence the great highway of transportation between Europe and America, you will not do so by establishing a close corporation at Montreal and another at Quebec in the form of pilots associations. It is not by having simply a limited number of pilots who, owing to their vocation, owing to the free open-air life which they enjoy, and their easy times, sixteen or seventeen hours a week, live to a very old age and when not able to perform their duties efficiently, on account of age or infirmity, still retain their positions to the exclusion of younger and better men. They are kept on the roll, although they do not do any work, and they receive out of the general fund the same proportion as men who are working all the time.

Mr. CASGRAIN. That is not correct.

Mr. QUINN. Such is the statement made here. Anybody will see at a glance that it is impossible, while the navigation of the St. Lawrence is saddled with such a condition of things, to make it the great highway between America and Europe. It is impossible, under such a system, to get the large shipping firms to send their vessels to Montreal. There are other difficulties that Mr. MARCOTTE.

I mentioned before. There is the difficulty that the channel is not sufficiently lighted, according to the views of the shipping interests.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think you will be able to establish that, and at any rate that is not under discussion.

Mr. QUINN. It is not, but I may mention that some of the most prominent members of shipping firms have told me, that one of the great difficulties is that the harbour from Montreal to the ocean is not under the charge of my hon. friend altogether, and that it ought to be under one department instead of under two.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Department of Public Works has to do with the dredging of the ship channel from Montreal to Quebec, and when that is done, the entire buoying and lighting of the channel is under the charge of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. QUINN. These gentlemen say that the work would be more effectively done if it were all under the control of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, because no time would then elapse between the clearing out of the channel and the placing therein of the necessary buoys and lights. But, as the hon. gentleman says, this is a matter which is not now under discussion. Referring to the third clause of this petition, I would earnestly press on the hon. gentleman that we should do everything to bring about in the near future the condition of things asked for in that section. Even if it were necessary to provide pensions for those pilots whose efficiency is impaired through age or infirmity, who have either lost their sight or have impaired eyesight, the shipping interests would rather pay a large sum of money to superannuate these men and then have the profession thrown open to all competitors. The shipping interests can best protect themselves by employing the men who they know are competent. They will not employ incompetent men, and according to the representations made to me by the shipping men, probably half a dozen of Montreal pilots are sought for by all the lines, and out of the 55 pilots I believe only thirteen are employed at present permanently. The other 42 get employment from the tramp steamers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think that the hon gentleman has understated the number.

Mr. QUINN. Of course the number 13 is rather familiar in disagreeable things, and that is probably why it impresses itself on one's mind in this connection. Thirteen was the number impressed on my memory, but admitting that the number is 20, that is a very small number out of 55. It is said that these men work sometimes only 16 or 17 hours per week and some of them make as high as $1,700 in the six months.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Very few.

Mr. QUINN. That may be, but I take my statement from the report of the commissioners. They earn that sum from the tariff they impose. Here is what the Harbour Commissioners say at page 28 of their report :

As to the question of reducing the number of pilots and apprentices, we think that it would be unreasonable on the part of the Harbour Commissioners to recommend, in the face of the unanimous evidence of our shipping interests and ship-owners, it would be a very dangerous principle to sanction. The pilots are a most estimable part of our people, but we do not think that they are entitled to any more privileges than any other class of our community. There are only a small number; they are earning good wages, and some of them are making as much as $1,700 in six months' work, and they can do something else during the remaining six months. Some are earning more than their confrères, but it is so in any other class of trade and profession.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend is quoting from one factum of the lawyers for the commission.

Mr. QUINN. Yes, but the Harbour Commissioners—I will say it to their credit—are selected not only on account of their political work but because they are men who occupy exalted positions in the commerce of this country. I am speaking of those appointed by the government. As to the others, they are the choice of the Board of Trade, and the Corn Exchange Association and the Chambre de Commerce and the business men of Montreal. So that if it is possible to get unprejudiced men, these men must be credited with that quality. I think that a great deal of attention ought to be paid to their representation—more than we would even pay those who are speaking for the shipping interest, even the Corn Exchange Association or any other association that comes into conflict with the pilots. And, certainly, more attention ought to be paid to their representations than to those of the pilots, so that when the commissioners make these statements, I take it for granted that they are speaking authoritatively—I do not think that any one acquainted with any of these gentlemen will say differently—from facts within their own personal knowledge.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman would turn to pages 18 and 19 of the commissioners' report, he will find that the number of pilots he spoke of—the thirteen pilots—are those not employed by the regular lines. All the other pilots except thirteen are employed on different lines, and the thirteen are on what is called tour de role. And, in the last column, it gives the names of the steamship lines that employ them, with the earnings of each pilot for a year or two. I make the correction, because I suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) desires to state the case as it is.

Mr. QUINN. I would not call the Dominion Coal Company, for instance, a line. What we were referring to particularly, was ocean navigation. I think that the number employed on the ocean steamships of which I spoke, will be found to be very few.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, my hon. friend (Mr. Quinn), is wrong.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask the minister, what difficulties have arisen in connection with the present authority? I understood that, in several instances, their proceedings have been quashed—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Irregularities as to the mode of procedure and the reception of evidence. There are no legal gentlemen on the Board of Harbour Commissioners.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is it possible to remove our proceedings by writ of certiorari on the ground that evidence was wrongly received?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It seems so. I have no other knowledge than what is given me by the Harbour Commissioners. They say that all the cases have been removed by certiorari.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). For irregularities?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. For irregularities, or, it may be for excess of jurisdiction in some cases.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is only on account of excess or want of jurisdiction that certiorari can be used for that purpose?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In the English provinces, yes. I am informed that that is the fact, that it is done.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think it quite possible, under this Act, as some of its provisions are rather bald, that there may be writs of certiorari to remove the proceedings taken under it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I hope not; it was drawn with some care by the Department of Justice.

Mr. T. DIXON CRAIG (East Durham). I was a member of the Private Bills Committee when the Bill for the incorporation of the pilots came up, and took part in the discussion. Since that time, I have watched what has been said by the newspapers on the question. However, I do not need to apologize for taking part in this discussion, because this is not a question for Montreal or Quebec alone, or even for the river St.

Lawrence, but for the whole of the Dominion west of Montreal. I noticed, about a month or so ago, a very strong article opposing this Bill in the Montreal Witness. If I had seen such an article in the Montreal Gazette, I might have paid no attention to it, thinking that perhaps it was done on political grounds. But when I find it in such a strong supporter of the government as the Montreal Witness almost invariably is, I was constrained to read it. I found, to my surprise, that it was strongly opposed to the Bill; and I came to the conclusion that if the Montreal Witness opposed a Bill proposed by this government, it must be very bad indeed, and that I had better oppose it too.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I hope the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig), will always follow the Witness as obediently as that.

Mr. CRAIG. I think I will always follow the Witness in opposing the government. But if I never follow it, except on such occasions, I do not think I shall have to follow it often. But, speaking seriously, this Bill is a very important one. We find that there is strong feeling in shipping and commercial circles against this Bill. I would like to know from the hon. minister, why the present state of affairs cannot continue?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am told by the Harbour Commissioners, that, as a matter of fact, they do not succeed in obtaining judgment against any of the pilots for breaches of discipline, or for acts of omission of commission on the part of the pilots, that their proceedings are set aside by the courts, being removed by certiorari.

Mr. CASGRAIN. That is exaggerated.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I state the case as it was stated to me.

Mr. CRAIG. I am glad the minister answered that, as it gives me a chance to reply. I find the following in the Witness, which I suppose the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies), will accept:

The Harbour Commissioners yesterday voted against Sir Louis Davies' new Pilotage Bill, and recommended the continuance of the status quo until the establishment of Montreal as an admiralty district. The same action was taken at the Marine Underwriters' Association.

Here it would appear that the Harbour Commissioners are quite satisfied with the present conditions. But the hon. minister says they are not.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They are not satisfied; they want an Admiralty Court established.

Mr. CRAIG. But, until they get that, they want matters left as they are. They do not want a pilotage court. Now, in what I have to say, I will quote the Witness as my authority. The minister says the reason the present state of affairs cannot continue, is that the Harbour Commissioners cannot enforce discipline. The Witness of March 2, refers to the fact that in 1897 a proposed Bill of incorporation was brought into the House, and that it was passed in this House, after strong opposition, but was thrown out by the Private Bills Committee of the Senate. It goes on:

The day this was done—June 18—the fifty-two pilots in active service went on strike, and after six o'clock that evening not one could be had for the many vessels requiring pilots, until Saturday afternoon, June 26. During this week the Harbour Commissioners held almost daily sessions to deal with the difficulty and to try pilots for refusal to do their duty. The result of the trials was that eight pilots were found guilty of refusing service. Four of these were dismissed, and at the request of the minister sentence was suspended on the other four.

Now, I come to the point referred to by the hon. minister:

A writ of certiorari was applied for in each of these cases, and the conviction of six of the eight was quashed by the Superior Court, on the ground that the bailiff's return of the service of the summons was irregular. In the other two cases, the conviction was maintained; one pilot was tried, but acquitted, while complaints were laid against several other pilots on the same ground, but, owing to the minister's request, summonses were not issued.

So, the minister interfered.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, that is not true; the minister has never interfered.

Mr. CRAIG. Does the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) say that this is not true?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is not true. The minister has not interfered directly or indirectly, in the prosecution of any of these parties.

Mr. CRAIG. I am very glad to hear that. I think it is a good thing I read this, to give the minister a chance to deny it:

The net result, therefore, of these trials was that two pilots were punished by dismissal and that the others got off scot free, through ministerial interference with the law made and provided for the protection of commerce.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig), is reading—

Mr. CRAIG. I am reading from the Montreal Witness, of March 2.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But I do not know who is the authority for the statement. So far as the allegation that ministerial influence was used, directly or indirectly, in the prosecution against any pilot, is concerned, the statement is without any foundation whatever.

An hon. MEMBER. It may have been some officer of the department.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, they would not dare to do such a thing.

Mr. CRAIG. Then, I hope the Montreal Witness will apologize. I am not making the statement on my own authority—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I understand that; I am simply correcting the statement where it was wrong.

Mr. CRAIG. Now, I will read a little further:

Nor was this the whole of the interference, for in April of the next year—1898—on a petition from the pilots, transmitted through the department, the dismissed pilots were reinstated, so that none of them were allowed to suffer very much from an attempt to paralyze the trade of the port by persons enjoying privileges in view of duties they bound themselves to perform.

Now, there is another statement. It blames the government for reinstating the pilots. The article goes on a little further:

The above brief narration brings out very prominently the difficulties the commissioners have always been subjected to in dealing with the trials of pilots, and emphasizes the need for an admiralty court, which shall be supreme, and from which (as supremacy implies) there shall be no appeal, and with whose procedure and decisions there shall be no political interference. The difficulties have been pointed out very strongly by the commissioners themselves, the trials must of necessity be held promptly and disposed of speedily, otherwise it would be impossible to secure in many cases the evidence of essential witnesses. . . . In the few cases where they are not maintained—

That is, where writs of certiorari are not maintained.

--as we have seen, the minister steps in and nullifies the power of the commissioners.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman understands that that is entirely denied.

Mr. CRAIG. Then, I am very glad that I brought it to his notice.

Thus are the disciplinary powers of the commissioners over the pilot greatly diminished, and it is almost impossible for them to inflict and enforce punishment even for grave offences. . . . If Sir Louis Davies and his colleagues are wise and have the interests of the port of Montreal and the trade and commerce of the Dominion at heart, they will abandon the Bill forthwith.

It winds up by saying:

It has been suggested that this court would be strengthened by the addition of a member representing the Marine Underwriters' Association, and by one representing the shipping interests, and such is the opinion of a majority of the Harbour Commissioners.

Now, I have read that in answer to what the minister said, that the Harbour Commission was not able to enforce discipline. The Montreal Witness takes the strong ground that the Harbour Commissioners have not been able to enforce discipline because they have been interfered with by the government. Of course, that is denied. We are told, and, I suppose, that is not denied, that these men who were dismissed for going on strike were reinstated. Now, I know that no member of this House has any feeling against the pilots as a body of men, we have the very opposite feeling; but, at the same time we hold that other parties have rights as well as pilots, and I believe in giving them their rights. I think the suggestion made by the member for Montreal (Mr. Quinn) is a very good one, that if it is found advisable, as there are pilots who are too old to perform their duties, there might be some system of pension provided for them. But, there is no doubt that if there are pilots who are incompetent, they should not be forced on men who have such large interests at stake as the vessel and shipping owners. We should not only consider the interests of the pilots in this matter, but we should consider the interests of the shippers and of the great mercantile trade of Montreal. I know that men who have large mercantile interests are opposed to this Bill. Now, who wants the Bill? Has anybody asked for it? Perhaps the minister could tell us that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have told the hon. gentleman that this Bill is the result of a report made by a commission appointed to investigate into the grievances of the pilots, and the differences between the pilots and the Harbour Commissioners. That commission sat in Montreal and heard a large number of witnesses, heard counsel for the shipping interests, for the Harbour Commissioners and for the pilots. It made a report to the government, which report has been on the hon. gentleman's table for over a year. They recommended the establishment of this pilotage court. The hon. gentleman is going on hearsay in assuming that the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal opposed the establishment of this court and want the present status continued. The Harbour Commissioners of Montreal have submitted in their petition, which the hon. member from St. Ann's, Montreal, had from me, that in place of the pilotage court proposed in the Bill, they desire that a vice-admiralty court, as it now exists in Quebec, should be established in Montreal. They want transferred the vice-admiralty court from Quebec to Montreal, and they want it given jurisdiction to hear these cases.

Mr. FOSTER. Not to transfer?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This is what they say: 'That the vice-admiralty court, as it exists in Quebec, should be established in Montreal.' You can either transfer it or establish another court. The member for St. Ann's was present when the Harbour Com-misioners waited upon me, and he knows the first statement that they made was a clear declaration that the existing court is entirely insufficient.

Mr. QUINN. I agree with what the minister says there, but, the Harbour Commissioners were acting under a misapprehension; they did not understand what remedies could be afforded by the government. For example, a remedy could be afforded by a declaration in the Pilotage Act that there shall be no writ of certiorari from the Harbour Commissioners.

Mr. CRAIG. I asked the question, Who asked for this Bill, and the answer was, that this Bill is the result of the report of a commission. I might go further and ask, Who asked to have the commission appointed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The commission was appointed as the result of the great strike which imperilled so seriously the shipping interests of the city of Montreal, and in order to effect a compromise or settlement of that strike, and to induce the pilots to return to work, I gave them the pledge that if they would return to work and end the strike and would allow ships to sail to and fro from that big commercial centre, a commission would be appointed to inquire into their grievances, and in so far as they reported that these grievances required to be remedied, and in so far as the report recommended itself to the government, we would introduce legislation to carry out the report.

Mr. CRAIG. That answer really says that this commission was appointed at the request of the pilots, and I infer that this Bill is really made in the interests of the pilots.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In the interests of the pilots and, I hope, in the interest of Montreal and the shippers.

Mr. CRAIG. They do not seem to think so.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The only difference is this: They prefer the establishment of a vice-admiralty court, and this court that is now being established is to take the place of the existing Harbour Commissioners until a vice-admiralty court is established in Montreal, when it takes charge.

Mr. CRAIG. That is all right, and I take this position, that they would rather continue the present system than have this Bill.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, they do not say that.

Mr. CRAIG. The Witness says that distinctly.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Well, here is the petition, here is the representation of the Harbour Commissioners:

That in place of the pilotage court proposed in said Bill, the council desires that the vice-admiralty court as it now exists in Quebec should be established in Montreal, and that all shipping cases and charges against pilots should be tried before it, the judge thereof having the right to appoint the necessary expert assistants, so that he would select such as were suited to the particular case before the courts; for instance, it might be advisable to call in a different expert for a collision than for a grounding case.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, yes.

Mr. CRAIG. I have not heard of any grievances, but the result of this is that the pilots hold the shipping interests in their own hands, and if they choose to go on strike they paralyze everything. The Montreal Witness says:

If the Bill and amendments to the by-law were passed, the port would be bound overhand and foot to the pilots.

I suppose that this article is written by some one who knows something about the question.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That may be or it may not be.

Mr. CRAIG. I know that when a minister fathers a Bill and introduces it, he does not like to admit that there is anything wrong about it. I agree with the Witness that the government would be wise if they would drop this Bill. I have another little article that I wish to read.

Mr. CLARKE. What paper is that from?

Mr. CRAIG. I am reading from the Montreal Witness.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am glad you have so much faith in it.

Mr. CRAIG. I am reading from the Montreal Witness, because it is an authority with the hon. minister. In the issue of February 28, I find an article headed 'Canadian Statesmanship':

The hon. the Minister of Marine has added himself to the number of Canadian politicians who trample on statesmanship.

I have come to the conclusion that this is a very bad Bill indeed. The Montreal Witness mentions several of the ministers who have displayed poor statesmanship, and it goes on to say:

And now the Minister of Marine has brought in a pilotage Bill to fortify the river pilots in their combination to take toll of the river commerce. To make the great commerce of Canada pay tribute to a close corporation of rivermen, most of whom never sailed the high seas at all, is in keeping with the ideas of the days when a baron who had his castle on the mountain pass accounted all the business that passed that way as belonging to him, and taxed it just enough to drive it all away. . . . In the legislation on this subject, it is the demands of the pilots and their interests that get the first consideration.

I want the House to remember that I am reading from the Montreal Witness.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think you have said that more than once.

Mr. CRAIG. It is the only thing that has any weight with the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What is the name of the paper?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Where is it published?

Mr. CRAIG. I think the hon. minister knows where it is published.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, it is a good paper.

Mr. CRAIG. It is published on Craig Street, Montreal, I believe. I do not know that I could persuade the hon. minister to drop this Bill, but I wish I could. Perhaps the Montreal Witness may persuade him to do so. It may have another article pointing out a few more of the imperfections of this Bill, and as the Bill will not be passed to-night, perhaps we will learn something more about it from this paper. I do not know but what the Witness may change its opinion when it finds out that the hon. minister is determined to pass the Bill. However, I think the Witness is honest in its opinions, in this matter. I do not think that we can accuse the Witness of introducing politics into this matter, and I hope that the hon. minister will consider the objections that have been urged against the Bill, and that he will drop it.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorcency). Mr. Chairman, I am sure that we are all agreed that equal justice should be meted out to the pilots and to the great commercial interests of this country. It seems to me that the statements which have been made about the appeals from the judgments rendered by the pilotage authority have been grossly exaggerated. It has been said that almost all the decisions arrived at by the pilotage authority in the city of Montreal have been removed on writs of certiorari to another court, and that the judgments have been stayed in such a manner that any offences of which these pilots were accused have not been punished. It seems to me that there must be some exaggeration in this statement, because, according to the Code of Civil Procedure of the province of Quebec, only certain cases pending before the Harbour Commissioners can be removed to another court.

The cases are specified in article 1293, in the following words:

The remedy lies, nevertheless, only in the following cases:

1. When there is want or excess of jurisdiction.

Of course, that question would not arise very often, because the jurisdiction is so well defined in the statute that no one would take before this court any case in which the Harbour Commissioners had no jurisdiction.

2. When the regulations upon which a complaint is brought or the judgment rendered, are null or of no effect.

3. When the proceedings contain gross irregularities and there is reason to believe that justice has not been or will not be done.

I have some knowledge of the matter in which such proceedings are carried on under the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, and I know that the commissioners there have always been provided with an excellent counsel who has directed their proceedings.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is in Quebec.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes. There is an appeal given by section 74 or 75, of the statute—I do not recollect which—to the Superior Court, but it is a matter which is well known in Quebec that such appeals as are given are very seldom taken, and that the court, as constituted in Quebec, has given general satisfaction. That court is the pilotage authority for the harbour of Quebec and below Quebec, and it is composed of the Harbour Commissioners. It seems to me that instead of amending the law, as the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries proposes to amend it by appointing three men to constitute a court, provision should be made so as to have the pilotage authority in Montreal exercise the same powers under the same legal restrictions and dispositions as the pilotage authority in Quebec does. Of course, on the one hand, everybody knows that the commercial community, the great trade interests of the country have to be protected, but, on the other hand, these pilots have rights and they quite reasonably seek the protection of the law also, and the law should be placed in such a position that their rights should be protected. It is a serious thing for a pilot, for instance, to be brought before a pilotage authority under an accusation of having, by his negligence or otherwise, caused a collision in the river or grounded his steamer, and in such a case, to be punished by having his license removed for his lifetime, thereby depriving him of the means by which he is earning his livelihood. Instead of introducing the provisions of this Bill, why not simply allow, until an Admiralty Court is established in Montreal, the Harbour Commissioners to judge of these matters as they do in Quebec, but with the warning that they should provide themselves with a counsel learned in the law so as to direct their proceedings, and so that they shall not come under article 1293 of the Code of Civil Procedure. I cannot understand why it is that there are so many cases as have been stated in the city of Montreal in which the proceedings have been set aside for gross irregularity. It seems to me that there must be some negligence on the part of somebody. I do not know whether the counsel are not wide enough awake to see that these proceedings are properly carried on, or whether the commission have not given sufficient consideration to the opinions given them by their counsel. There is something wrong somewhere, but it is matter of detail which can be remedied without bringing in this statute or without the court which the hon. minister proposes to establish. It seems to me that you will not have anything better than the harbour board, because if you propose to appoint a man learned in the law as president, what kind of a man learned in the law are you going to get for $10 a day. I do not know any man in Montreal of experience, or whose advice is worth anything, whom you would be able to secure for $10 a day. You will have probably an inferior man, who will lead this court into all kinds of mistakes, into the grossest kinds of irregularities, which will defeat the object which you have in view. Now, as to the establishment of a branch of the Exchequer Court having jurisdiction in admiralty, in Montreal, it would not be anything very costly to the country. In Quebec, the Hon. Mr. Justice Routhier, of the Superior Court, was appointed at $1,000 a year, and I take it that one of the justices of the Superior Court in Montreal would be willing to act as judge of the Exchequer Court having jurisdiction in admiralty, if the government gave him a similar salary. Indeed it is publicly known that a gentleman of the Superior Court is going to be appointed in a short time, if a certain Bill which is before this House is passed. There may be some gentlemen in Quebec who think that the Admiralty Court should not be established elsewhere than in that city, but I believe that the lawyers of Quebec are sufficiently patriotic and have a sufficiently high conception of the duties of government towards the people, not to raise any such objection. The public opinion of Montreal demands that in that commercial centre, that great port at which almost all sea-going vessels now congregate, a Vice-Admiralty Court should be established with the same jurisdiction as the court in Quebec. In view of the probable establishment of a Vice-Admiralty Court in Montreal it seems to me that the clause in the Bill which relates to the new pilotage court, might be struck out.

Mr. CASGRAIN.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). I speak with a good deal of diffidence in a matter of this kind, and I take it for granted that the minister would not introduce the Bill unless something has come to his knowledge which makes it necessary. To satisfy my own mind, however, I rise to get some information. It seems a little singular to me—perhaps it is because of my inexperience—that it is the Governor in Council that is to create this court, and yet that the personnel of the court shall be on the nomination of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) alone. That perhaps is usual, but I do not know that I have met with it before in any of the Acts I happen to have read. The next point is as to whether the court is required to be unanimous or not. It is composed of three members, and I suppose in the absence of anything in the Act, which would permit the decision of two to be the decision of the court, there would have to be a unanimous decision. That might sometimes result in a miscarriage of justice because, of course, men will differ on these points. There are pilotage districts about which I know very little, but I take it that chapter 20, Revised Statutes, applies to all these pilotage districts, and I assume that the provision for recovering penalties is that found in section 101, which defines how these penalties are to be recovered and which makes special provision for the pilotage of Quebec and gives jurisdiction to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners. As to all other districts the first part of this section must apply, and the question arises in my mind whether it is the intention of this Act to give concurrent jurisdiction, or whether it is the intention to take away as to the pilotage district of Montreal, the jurisdiction of those persons who are mentioned in the first part of section 101. Then as to the application of Part LVIII. of the Criminal Code, I would think that the general application of so large a part of the Code would be rather dangerous, and that the particular sections of Part LVIII. should be defined. These are criticisms which occurred to me ought to be made on the Bill.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There is something further which deserves the attention of the minister. The point as to the necessity of the court being unanimous had occurred to me, and it is perfectly clear that unless that statute is governed by something in the Interpretation Act the court would require to be unanimous.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is a clause in the Interpretation Act.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I know, but I was going to point out that that seems to put this Act in a worse condition if it does apply. It says that when any Act or thing is required to be done by more than two persons, the majority of them may do it. The minister constitutes a court consisting of three members, and he says 'the court shall hear and determine. There is a great deal of doubt as to whether the court must not be unanimous, even in view of the language of the Interpretation Act. This Bill says:

The Governor in Council may create a pilotage court. . . . Such court shall consist of three members, at least two of whom shall possess nautical or pilotage experience . . . and the court shall hear and determine all charges.

It is not very plain to say the least, that unanimity on the part of this court is not required. Suppose it is not required, in what position is the minister. He says that you are to have a professional gentleman, who is to be a member of the court so as to keep the court from making mistakes into which the pilotage authority has fallen in the past. If this particular part of the Interpretation Act applies, it is not necessary that this professional gentleman shall be a member of the court. Two members who have only nautical experience will be a quorum and will deal with all these matters, although the professional gentleman is not there, and this Bill will not meet the difficulty which the minister says it is intended to remedy. Therefore, it seems to me that it would be necessary to amend the Act in one or two ways. You will have to provide that a quorum of the court shall include the legal gentleman who is to be appointed, or that it shall consist on all occasions of all three persons mentioned in the Act. Of course, if this provision of the Interpretation Act does not apply, it will be necessary in all cases that the court shall consist of all three persons; and if in any case any one of these persons should happen to be disqualified by relationship or interest, the court would be powerless to deal with a matter over which otherwise it would have jurisdiction.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is perfectly obvious that the hon. gentleman's criticism applies to any court that could possibly be established. If any member of the court were interested, he would be disqualified.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In the province of Nova Scotia it is provided that in some cases where a court consists of one person interest or relationship shall not affect the jurisdiction.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Department of Justice holds that the Interpretation Act governs and controls, and that if three persons are appointed to do certain things, two of them can act; so that, there is no use of repeating here the words of the Interpretation Act. With regard to the criticism of the hon. member for Kingston, I do not quite understand what he means. The Governor in Council creates the court, and when it is created the Minister of Marine appoints the persons to act. What other mode of constituting the court can be suggested? If you provide that the Governor General in Council shall appoint the members of the court instead of the Minister of Marine, what difference does that make? So far as this jurisdiction of the court is concerned, there are several courts which have concurrent jurisdiction, and before which penalties could be recovered, and this court is added to them. The powers of a stipendiary magistrate are vested in this court, and the fifty-eighth part of the Criminal Code is made applicable. I do not see what else could be done. The Bill was rough-drafted by myself, and submitted to the Department of Justice, and this is the form in which they think it should be drawn. I know that there are always difficulties in constituting a new court, both as to jurisdiction and as to procedure. It is very difficult to constitute a court with absolute completeness so as to avoid all the pitfalls on every side; but, it appears to me, with the exception of one or two changes of phraseology which I intend to propose, that the Bill meets the case very well.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to see any opinion of the Department of Justice that that clause of the Interpretation Act applies to this Act.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was the opinion of the gentleman who drafted the Bill. It was my opinion also, and the opinion of my legal colleagues with whom I consulted.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). We have the words of the statute, and the words of this Bill, before us, and I do not think it is so plain a matter as the hon. gentleman would suggest.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It struck me, after looking carefully over it, that it was sufficient. I may be wrong.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The language of the statute is that the court should do this, not these three gentlemen; and in the Interpretation Act you have merely a clause like this:

When any act or thing is required to be done by more than two persons, a majority of them may do it.

Whether or not a court, the president of which must have special qualifications, is to be governed by that—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I shall be glad to consider the hon. gentleman's point with great care, because it is a very important one.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). One reason why the Interpretation Act might not apply is, the very reason which the hon. minister has given for the introduction of this Act, namely, the necessity that the president of the court must be a person of professional qualifications. If the clause of the Interpretation Act applies, it will do away altogether with that safeguard. The hon. gentleman has not dealt with that particular point at all. If that applies, the court will have jurisdiction, although the professional gentleman is not sitting, and it would be open to every objection which this Act is intended to remedy. I would suggest that as a reason why the Interpretation Act would not apply.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The very fact that the hon. gentleman and the other gentleman sitting around him have raised that point makes it necessary that I should consider it with great care, and I will do so. Before the Bill comes up again, I will again consult the Department of Justice, and if there is any doubt on that point, there will be no difficulty in inserting a few words to remove the doubt.

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). I would ask the hon. gentleman to consider that he has not done away with the old court, but is simply conferring powers on a new body, so that it seems to me that, as the Act stands, the two courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction. You have to denude the old authority of its powers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I see the hon. gentleman's point, and I will consider it.

Mr. QUINN. The Harbour Commissioners, in their report, say :

It has not been shown that there has been at any time a disposition on the part of the Harbour Commissioners to take an unfair advantage of pilots when brought before them for trial. Pilots have been at such trials, assisted by counsel, and the Harbour Commissioners have, when they considered it necessary, taken the expert evidence and opinions of pilots and others regarding the matter under inquiry. Notwithstanding these facts, your commissioners are of opinion that the present method of dealing with charges brought against pilots is not the best.

That is all the distance the commissioners go until they come to their concluding remark, and recommend a certain court, such as is established by this Act. The minister certainly overlooked these words when he said they were in favour of this Act; and, as I said before, I attach more importance to the opinion of the Harbour Commissioners than possibly to the opinion of any other body in Montreal.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me, if he understood me to say they were in favour of this Act. They are in favour of a Vice-Admiralty Court.

Mr. QUINN. It was in answer to the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) that

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

I understood the hon. gentleman to say they were in favour of it. The commissioners say :

The end sought seems to us to be satisfactory and easily obtained under the system as it exists.

In view of the difficulties that have been suggested by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), which struck me, but which I neglected to refer to in my remarks on the subject, why should we do that about which there is so much doubt?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no doubt.

Mr. QUINN. There is great doubt as to the jurisdiction of this court. If the object is to have a lawyer to preside over that court, and the Interpretation Act applies to it, and two members of the court will form a quorum, the court may be held without having the lawyer there at all. The two other members of the court may sit, subject to all kinds of irregularities and tumbling into irregularities. When you find a court established consisting of some of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, falling into irregularities, even when advised by counsel, it becomes absolutely necessary to have the whole three present in court. But what certainty is there that you would have representatives of the pilots present when some gross case of infraction is brought up? The man who is to represent the pilots on this court is to be selected by them and be appointed either for three or five years, or we will say for life. Supposing a gross case of flagrant violation of the law arises, supposing a man has been drunk, the three members of the court must sit, in order that the court may be properly constituted. Therefore, to prevent this man losing his certificate before the winter season comes around, all that is necessary is not to have the representatives of the pilots in court. Supposing that the court could not be properly constituted until the month of November, then it would not be able to try this man's case and take away his branch or license for six months, until the season of navigation had terminated. The court could only take away his branch and prevent his acting as pilot between the months of December and May. That would be a punishment farcical in the extreme, and the object for which the court is established would be defeated. Under these circumstances, and particularly as the hon. gentleman said he is not anxious to force the Bill through to-night, perhaps the committee might rise.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, we will go through the Bill as far as we can. I promise to consider all the suggestions most carefully, but propose to do some work.

Mr. POWELL. The point raised by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) at first blush might seem to be met by the clause in the Interpretation Act to which the hon. minister has referred. But I remember an almost parallel case in our own province. A court known under the old common law of England as the 'Commissioners of Sewers,' was brought under statutory jurisdiction in the province of New Brunswick. The court held, under language very similar to this contained in our local Act, that the Interpretation Act controlled the case, and no less an eminent jurist than Chief Justice Ritchie decided that an Act authorized to be done by the commissioners could be done by a majority of them. But in this particular case before the House, notwithstanding that decision, it does appear to me the Bill is capable of the construction the hon. minister puts upon it. The Interpretation Act, if he has it before him, he will see, provides as follows in its seventh section:

In every Act of the parliament of Canada, unless the context otherwise requires—

Then follows, among other provisions, the provision quoted by the hon. member for Halifax. Now, the question is: Does the context otherwise require it? Let us look at this Bill. Take the first, second and third sections:

The Governor in Council may constitute or create a pilotage court for the pilotage district of Montreal, to be known as the Montreal Pilots' Court, and hereinafter called 'the court.'

This is not conclusive, because it simply creates a court, and I do not attach much importance to that section as far as it goes, but Such court shall consist of three members, at least two of whom shall possess nautical or pilotage experience.

Now, supposing that the men who did not possess such experience undertook to sit with one only of the men who did, the court is not the court constituted under that section. The context requires 'two men of nautical experience' to constitute the court. That is the very idea which the draughtsman had in his mind. If we go a little further, we will find that one of these men has to be nominated by the Minister of Marine. The context requires that a nominee of the Minister of Marine shall be a portion of that court. He is the independent man, and sits in the capacity of umpire. The other two represent interested individuals, and one of them is to be nominated by the pilots and the other by the pilotage authorities. That means that the specific individuals are essential portions of the court. It is different entirely from the case in which three men are simply elected to a certain position exactly on the same principle. This court cannot be constituted, or cannot fulfil the idea of the draughtsman, unless the three people representing those three interests are there. The context, I submit, is such that the words of the subsection of the Interpretation Act, which the hon. member for Halifax quoted from, and which the hon. minister relied upon, do not apply.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I promise that this subject will receive my best attention in conjunction with the Department of Justice, and if a clause is necessary, we will put one in.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I see that there is no express provision, though there may be one in the Interpretation Act, for the further appointment of any one of the members of this court in case he should die or resign. The Bill seems to contemplate only one appointment. It provides for one appointment in express terms. It is usual in many statutes of a similar character, to provide that the authority which appointed a particular member shall, in case of death or resignation, appoint another in his place. I do not know whether the hon. minister thinks that necessary, but I would be inclined to think it is, unless provided in the Interpretation Act.

On section 2,

The courts shall hear and determine all charges or complaints made against any pilot in connection with any accidents happening to or caused by vessels in charge of such pilot.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I want to recast section 2 by a small amendment, so as to make it read a little plainer, and be more comprehensive than it is in the Bill.

The court shall hear and determine all charges and complaints made against any pilot in connection with any accidents happening to or caused by vessels in charge of such pilot.

That is the way the clause reads now. I propose that it shall read that the courts shall hear and determine charges made against any pilot:

For offences committed against the Pilotage Act or any regulation thereunder which can now be heard or determined by the pilotage authorities, whether in connection with any accidents happening to or caused by vessels in charge of such pilot or otherwise.

The hon. gentleman asks a question as to clause 3, but I did not understand his question.

Mr. POWELL. I cannot understand the clause.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is to provide that the court may make an order for payment against the pilot, or against the person making the charge, if they find the charge unfounded, or out of the pilotage fund, if they think the circumstances justify it.

Mr. POWELL. It reads:

The court may make such order for the payment of the costs of the inquiry by any pilot in fault or by any person making the charge of complaint against any pilot, or otherwise, out of the funds of the pilotage authority for the said district, as the court deems just.

The word 'otherwise,' is ridiculous there.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would hardly use that term—

Mr. POWELL. Then we will say it is entirely meaningless.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Strike out 'otherwise,' if you like.

Mr. POWELL. Very well, strike it out.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In subsection 2, I propose to strike out the words 'under sections 75, 98 and 99, of the Pilotage Act.' I desire to give them all the powers of the Montreal pilotage authority.

Mr. POWELL. I desire to call the minister's special attention to one point. I trust I am not wrong. I have not had the opportunity to consider it as fully as had the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies), but, I think, in the limited time I have had, I have grasped the meaning pretty fully. The power of the pilotage authority as such is very limited. Section 101 of the Pilotage Act. lays down the procedure. The Harbour Commissioners has no jurisdiction over the penalties at all, as a court. But they have certain powers. If a pilot gets drunk, or neglects his duty, and, owing to that, under section 74, his act tends to the immediate loss, destruction or damage of the ship, or he refuses to do any lawful act to prevent such loss, in these two cases they have jurisdiction. Now, if you will pass to section 99:

Whenever any ship sustains damage through the fault of any branch pilot for and above the harbour of Quebec, the pilotage authority of the pilotage district of Montreal may, in its discretion, and upon such information as it deems expedient, and with or without complaint by any person, investigate the matter and declare the branch of such pilot forfeited.

The only jurisdiction they have is to declare the branch of the pilot forfeited under section 99, or, under section 95, to suspend a man, or dismiss him for being drunk, or causing damage to a vessel. Now you are creating a number of offences and penalties, and you confer jurisdiction on these people to the extent that the commissioners of the Pilotage Commissioners in Montreal, but they have no jurisdiction except such as I have stated. So, the operation of the amendment is to bring it back to where it previously stood. That is going to muddle the matter very much.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Powell), quite understands the statute. If he will turn to section 73, he will find that: Every licensed pilot who, either with-in or without the district, for which he is licensed, commits any of the offences in this list down to 'K':

—shall, for each offence, in addition for any liability for damages, be liable to a penalty not exceeding $200, and suspension or dismissal by the pilotage authority of the district for which he is licensed.

The object of this Bill is not to give them power or create any offences. We do not create new offences, but simply transfer to the new court the powers the Pilotage Board now has as regards pilotage offences, and also power equal to that of the court under the Summary Jurisdiction Act. So, they will have the authority to punish by imposing a penalty, and the power to collect the penalty under the Summary Jurisdiction Act.

Mr. POWELL. If you are going to put in an additional clause to secure that, it is all right.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is under clause 7, we will come to it.

Mr. QUINN. If I understand the hon. minister correctly, the section with which we are dealing now, simply refers to the offences under section 73.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. And sections 98 and 99. Another offence is referred to under section 75, but in order not to repeat the sections, I struck it out, and provided for the offences under the Pilotage Act generally.

Mr. POWELL. Under subsection 2, it is provided that the court shall have power to 'hear and determine all charges of complaints,' and so on. That means complaints made before them. But, under section 99, I think it is, the pilotage authority under the old Act, had power to act on their own motion without complaint being made. Are their powers to be limited?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They are not to initiate charges. That is the idea.

On section 6,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would like to add to the end of that section: 'And may also, if necessary, and subject to the approval of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, appoint a clerk of the court who shall be paid by fees.'

Mr. QUINN. I am afraid that is making this court too expensive.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is only to be paid by fees, you see.

Mr. QUINN. But all these fees, no matter from whom they are collected, have eventually to come out of the shipping in the port. There is already a heavy tax upon the shipping at that port.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not propose by this addition to increase the cost one iota. If the clerk is not appointed to do it, somebody else must draw out the papers, and the regulations provided for here provide that fees shall be paid to that person. It must be some one, whether the president who does the actual manual work himself, or some one else, and that some one must be paid for it. I propose that if the work is found to be heavy the clerk shall be appointed and paid by fees, but only in case the work requires it.

Mr. QUINN. We are now establishing a court consisting of three members. We hope they will sit only a few days in the year, but I do not think that will be the experience of the government. I think you will find, if you get a man to work for $10 a day at all, if he is a lawyer—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). In the winter he will be glad to get it.

Mr. QUINN. But the members of that court who are working for $10 and $5 a day respectively, will see that that court sits every juridical day of the year, even if they do not sit for more than half an hour, and that is simply in consequence of paying $10 a day and $5 a day to the judges who will sit there; whereas, if you created a branch of the Vice-Admiralty Court in Montreal and gave one of the judges of the Superior Court $1,000 a year extra to sit as judge of that court, as you do in the city of Quebec, you would have the affairs properly administered.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. What about your registrar, what about your marshal?

Mr. QUINN. All these officers could be taken from the officers of the court in Montreal to-day at a very slight addition. I venture to say that before this court is in operation a year it will be found to cost over $7,000 a year to the port of Montreal; and I venture to say that with an expenditure to-day of $2,000 a year, you could have a judge of the Superior Court, a registrar, a marshal, and everybody in connection with it. This heavy expenses will operate to the injury, not only to the city and port of Montreal, but to the national highway between Europe and America.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The intention of this Act is simply to amend the condition of things that exist now at Montreal. At the present time the pilotage authority of the River St. Lawrence, between the harbour of Quebec and the port of Montreal, is the Montreal Harbour Commission. This commission is a body consisting of five gentlemen, I think, appointed by the government, one appointed by the Board of Trade, another appointed by the shipping interests, another by the Corn Exchange, and another by the Chambre de Commerce. Now, these gentlemen have to try offences charged against pilots, and they are naturally interested in the shipping trade as against the pilots. Can this court be said to be absolutely impartial when it is composed largely of those who are interested in shipping that may come to grief? What is desired is a competent and impartial court, and I say it is not possible that they can be absolutely impartial, and it is not possible that they can be competent. I know from my own experience in Quebec, where we have shipping men with as extensive shipping knowledge as exist at Montreal, when the Harbour Commissioners are sitting with pilotage authority they associate with themselves the chairman of the Board of Pilots. The Harbour Commissioners of Quebec never sit as they do in Montreal without having the assistance of this competent person who represents the pilots. It seems to me that elementary justice requires that this should be done; in order that you may have a competent court, you should have a man with special technical knowledge of these matters. Moreover, the presence of that man on the board is an additional security in so far as he gives additional satisfaction to the pilots themselves. Now, what the Bill proposes is to have something different from that which exists at present in Montreal, and to come closer to the condition of things existing at Quebec. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that what is required in Montreal is a branch of the Admiralty Court. Now, who, with any experience of an Admiralty Court, will pretend to justify the existence of two Admiralty Courts for the St. Lawrence River between Quebec and Montreal? We have had an Admiralty Court in Quebec from the time of the conquest up to the present. At the present time, I say, speaking from my own experience, there is not enough business done in the Admiralty Court at Quebec, notwithstanding that it has jurisdiction over the harbour of Montreal as well as over the river down to the gulf—there is not enough work there to keep a judge going for a month in the whole year.

Mr. CASGRAIN. That is because, in Montreal, all the suits arising from the shipping contracts which come under the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court in Quebec, are taken before the Superior Court.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am speaking of the conditions existing. The Admiralty Court may sit for suits taken in Montreal, and if they desire to proceed in the Admiralty Court there is nothing to prevent their doing so. All that is necessary is to have the writs issued by the registrar because there is a deputy registrar of the Admiralty Court in Montreal. All that is necessary is to go to the court and issue the writ there. The judge of the Admiralty Court, although located in Quebec, may come and sit in Montreal. There is nothing to prevent his doing so. How many Admiralty Courts are there in Great Britain? You have not got this subdivision of admiralty jurisdiction all over Great Britain that you are seeking to impose upon us here. You now have a judge sitting at Quebec. Ships are passing to and fro at Quebec. If it is necessary to libel any ship there is nothing more convenient than to do it at Quebec. If it is necessary to examine any man on board, there is nothing more convenient than to do it as the ships pass up and down. This is a condition that has existed for years, ever since the time of the conquest, and no inconvenience resulted from that condition sufficient to justify the change. Assuming that you had an Admiralty Court in Montreal, what would be the difference, in so far as these cases are concerned in the conditions which would be brought into existence by this Bill. Everybody who has practised in the Admiralty Court, and knows anything about what goes on there, knows that this Bill is based on the idea of the Admiralty Court. The Admiralty Court consists of a judge, of a man learned in the law, who, in technical cases, brings assessors into that court. Here you have a man learned in the law who is to preside over the court, and then you have assessors sitting with him, a man representing the shipping interests, being one assessor, and another man representing the pilots being another assessor.

Mr. QUINN. But, under this Bill, the assessor is as much a part of the court as the man learned in the law.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In the Admiralty Court the judge is not obliged to observe the opinion of the assessor, while in this court he is.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am quite aware of that, but if the hon. gentleman will look at the case he will find that frequently the judge says that: Notwithstanding that my opinion is somewhat different from that of the assessors, in view of the fact that they are more competent to determine technical questions of navigation, I accept their opinion in preference to my own.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I might mention to the hon. gentleman that in England the judges would not look at the opinion of the assessor at all.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not think that any judge of the Admiralty Court who had felt himself called upon to call in assessors would overrule, without very grave reasons, the opinions of the assessors.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). So little influence has the opinion of the assessor upon the court that the English Court of Appeal refused to order the opinion of the assessor to be brought up so that it could be used in the Court of Appeal as part of the judgment of the court below.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is the opinion of the assessor that guides the judge, and it is the opinion of the judge that goes to the Court of Appeal. That is what is intended here. With this man learned in the law there will be these two men—the assessors—who are competent to advise him, one representing the shipping interest and another representing the pilots.

Mr. QUINN. The difference between these two men and the assessors called into an Admiralty Court is, that, in this instance, they are just as much a part of the court as he is, and if the Interpretation Act is correct, if the two of them agree against his opinion, their opinion will be the judgment of the court.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In that respect I have my own opinion as to what constitutes the court. I do not agree that the court is a body, as constituted by the law, consisting of three members. I say that the court is composed of the counsel learned in the law who acts with the assistance of his two assistants. I say, of course, that in a court of that description it would be necessary that they should be unanimous, but, it must be the opinion of the court unless the law says something to the contrary. In reference to the question of expense, I would appeal to the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), who has had some experience in these matters, as I have had myself, to say what would be the result of taking these cases to the Admiralty Court? I venture to say the costs in one case in the Admiralty Court would be equal to the cost of this whole court for a year.

Mr. CASGRAIN. But, you will have a special provision in the case of pilots.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not at all.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If you had a court you would have to apply the tariff to that court.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Surely you would make a special tariff for such cases as these! What strikes me about the court is this: If a decision shall not be arrived at unless the court is unanimous how will the decision be given in a case supposing that one of the members of the court is incompetent or disqualified from sitting?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The point is to be considered by the Department of Justice and myself as to whether the interpretation clause applies to the Act. If it does not, or there is any reasonable doubt about it, we will draft a clause settling the question. I would ask the committee to dispose of the clause which we are now considering as to whether we will appoint a clerk and pay him by fees.

Mr. QUINN. The objection I have has brought up a very interesting discussion and has resulted in a particularly interesting speech from the hon. Solicitor General. I quite agree with him as to the constitution of the court, and holding that opinion, it forces me to the conclusion that this Bill will be perfectly inoperative. This Bill is framed for the purpose of trying cases, as far as this court is established, against pilots. If three members are necessary to constitute that court, I venture to say that there never will be a complaint tried against a pilot in the city of Montreal until the season of navigation closes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We may meet that by putting in a special clause.

Mr. QUINN. Now, then referring to the cost of the court and the appointment of a clerk, what I fear about this is that not only will we have the appointment of a clerk but we will have a permanent clerk appointed, we will then have to provide an office for him, with all the trappings and paraphernalia of a prothonotary's office, we will have to have a room for the judges, and they will have a sitting every day in the year. It will involve a cost of $7,000 a year.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. How do you make that out?

Mr. QUINN. There are three men at $20 a day—$10 for one and $5 apiece for the two others. They will sit every juridical day in the year. They will have offices in Montreal, they will have a court in Montreal, and they will sit every day in the year from January 1 to December 31. They may sit only half an hour a day, but they will sit and draw their $10 or $5 a day. And this will have to come out of the shipping interests—every dollar of it. It is all very well for the Solicitor General to say that the trial of one large case before the Admiralty Court would involve more than the whole cost of this court. That may be true, but the amount involved would be so large in the admiralty case that the whole cost of the court would be relatively insignificant. This extra expense is not for the purpose of trying cases that come regularly before the vice-admiralty court, but it is for the purpose of trying petty cases against pilots, the cost of which must in the long run come upon the pilots or the shipping interests. In the end it will come out of the shipping trade of the port, because if a pilot is fined $200 he will make it up in some way out of the shipping interests; he is not going to lose it. That is why I fear the expenditure of even such a small sum as the salary of a clerk.

On clause 7,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I propose to recast this clause so as to make it express more clearly what the draughtsman meant. I move to make it read:

The provisions of paragraph lviii of the Criminal Code, 1892, shall apply to this Act for the recovery and enforcement of all fines, penalties and costs imposed under the authority of the Pilotage Act, and the court shall, for such purposes, have all the powers.

Amendment agreed to.

On clause 8,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have recast this clause slightly so as to make it read:

8. Upon the establishment of an admiralty district at Montreal under the Admiralty Act, 1891, with a registry and a local judge in admiralty of the Exchequer Court in and for such district, the members and clerk of the Montreal pilots' court shall thereupon cease to hold office, and all the powers and jurisdiction of the Montreal pilots' court shall thereupon be transferred to the Exchequer Court of Canada, admiralty side, and the local judge in admiralty in and for the admiralty district of Montreal shall have and exercise all the powers, jurisdiction and authority conferred upon the Montreal pilots' court by this Act.

Provided always, that in the hearing and determination of any matter brought before him such judge shall have power to call in the aid of one or more specially qualified assessors and hear and determine such matter either wholly or partially with the assistance of such assessor or assessors. And such judge shall have power to make all necessary rules and orders for the more effectually carrying out the provisions of this Act and also of the Pilotage Act, so far as it relates to any proceedings which may be brought before the said judge.

Mr. QUINN. I understand the hon. gentleman will let this Bill stand.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not propose to take it out of the committee.

On section 9,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Paragraph (c), section 59, of the Pilotage Act, allows the pilotage authorities to exempt vessels trading between certain ports from pilotage dues, but, strangely enough, Newfoundland has been omitted from the clause. Inasmuch as a large trade is growing up with Newfoundland, it is desirable that the pilotage authorities should have power to exempt vessels trading between Newfoundland and Canada, and I propose to amend the clause by adding 'Newfoundland.'

Motion agreed to.

The committee rose and reported progress.

EXPERIMENTAL FARM STATION ACT.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher) moved second reading of Bill (No. 135) to amend the Experimental Farm Station Act.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. This Act is introduced in consequence of views expressed by the Auditor General, who holds that the Experimental Farm Act provides that even men employed as labourers for a few days shall be appointed by order in council. That has never been acted upon since the passage of the Act. The chief officers have been appointed by order in council, but the labourers have been employed from day to day, as is absolutely necessary, without order in council. Last year the Auditor General drew the attention of the director of farms to this, and made a formal request in his report that this practice should cease or that the Act should be amended. This Bill provides that while the chief officers are appointed by order in council, the other employees on the farm can be employed by the minister without the formality of an order in council.

Mr. WALLACE. This clause seems to go further than the appointment of labourers.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. At present the director and chief officers are appointed by order in council, and under the second clause that shall continue. But, the third clause provides that the minister may employ such other officers and employees as are necessary for each farm station.

LIVE STOCK ASSOCIATIONS ACT.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher) moved second reading of Bill (No. 134), respecting the incorporation of Live Stock Associations.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Perhaps I ought to give a slight explanation of the purposes and objects of this Bill.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). Would the minister, before he gives that explanation, tell us how it is going to affect the organizations at present in existence authorized by the local governments?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It will not affect them at all; it does not interfere in any way with them. It simply provides that a group of gentlemen engaged in live stock operations, whose area of operations extends beyond one province, as in the case of the Holstein-Frisian Association, which made application to me last year for this purpose, may incorporate under a Dominion Act. The Holstein-Frisian Association of Canada, in November, 1898, passed a resolution which was forwarded to me, asking for an opportunity to incorporate under a Dominion statute. I then thought they could incorporate under what is known as the Joint Stock Companies' Act, and discussed the matter with them. They thought, at first, that they could do so; but afterwards they found that that Act did not serve their purpose at all, and later they asked me again to take up the matter and provide an Act under which live stock associations for the Dominion could incorporate, and form a pedigree book, for the purpose of registering live stock all over the Dominion. I may say that their request was much reinforced by communications which came to me explaining the difficulties which our exporters of thoroughbred stock have experienced in getting their stock admitted into the United States. The customs authorities of the United States will not recognize the provincial organizations of Canada, and we have not been able to remove that disability, when exporting thoroughbred live stock to the United States, so that duties have to be paid on it, notwithstanding the fact that the laws of the United States permit thoroughbred live stock to be imported free of duty. The consequence has been that many of our people have had to register their stock in United States associations. From correspondence which I have had with the department at Washington, I believe that associations chartered under a Dominion law, might obtain that recognition which the provincial organizations have not been able to obtain. These two arguments have appealed to me, so that I have tried to draw up an Act which would accomplish the object aimed at, and enable these live stock associations to be incorporated under a Dominion law without any expense to them.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). This seems to be entirely new. I notice the application is to the Minister of Agriculture. Why do you invest him with the authority to establish an association?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The application for incorporation has to be made to somebody in authority, and it was thought best that it should be made to the Minister of Agriculture, whose department deals with the work of such associations.

That was thought more appropriate than to have the application made to the Secretary of State.

Mr. SPROULE. I would think it would be more appropriate to have the application made to the Secretary of State, to whom all applications for letters of incorporation are usually made.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman will see that these associations have to comply with certain rules and regulations before incorporation is permitted, and it is the Department of Agriculture which should have to take cognizance of these things and deal with them.

Mr. SPROULE. The same thing would apply to the incorporation of any other association, such as a mining company; but heretofore all such applications have been made to the Secretary of State. In Ontario, all applications under the Joint Stock Companies' Act, are made to one individual.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. In Ontario, the applications for the formation of the different breeders' associations, are made to the Department of Agriculture, and in Quebec, all applications for organizations of an agricultural character, such as dairymen's associations, exhibition associations and certificates for the exhibition of butter and cheese, are made to the Minister of Agriculture. Were this application made to the Secretary of State, it would have to be referred to the Department of Agriculture to be dealt with.

Mr. SPROULE. I admit that, but in looking them up, it would be much more convenient if all these applications were made to one department. I do not see that there is any special objection to it.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). May I ask the minister how many of these associations would he permit to be incorporated? It would seem to me that one might be organized in every county or every township?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If the hon. gentleman will look further down the Bill, he will see that only one organization in the Dominion can be allowed at any one time for a particular breed.

On section 4,

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose that the first come will be first served, and that the first application will be the one entertained?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The application has to be in certain form and approved of by the minister, before granted. If a certain group of gentlemen apply for an Act of incorporation, unless there was some objection, their application will be granted, and others who came afterwards could not obtain incorporation. But anybody may join the association, so that it can not be exclusive.

Mr. SPROULE. But they might be obliged to join it under rules or by-laws they would not endorse, and they would have no redress.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The rules and regulations have to be submitted to the minister before incorporation is granted.

On section 5,

Mr. HENDERSON. How many of these branch offices would be permitted? Suppose an application were made in British Columbia for the incorporation of a live stock association, then no other association could be organized in any other part of the Dominion. How many branch offices would be permitted to work under the association?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That would be determined by its needs. There would be only one association, and it would be for it to decide whether the whole business should be done in one particular centre or distributed through branch offices.

Mr. HENDERSON. It seems to me that in order to give value to a certificate of the association, it would be essential that the whole thing should be worked under one association.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. And that it should have its head office here at the seat of government, and all certificates issued from that. The value of the certificates would be then very much greater.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I agree with the hon. gentleman. It was not the intention that certificates should issue from the branch office, but that simply branch offices might be established as a matter of convenience.

On section 6,

Mr. SPROULE. There ought to be reasonable notice given of changes.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Clause d of section 5, regulates the mode of convening annual general and special meetings, and any changes would have to be made at a special meeting.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER. When shall this Bill be read the third time?

The PRIME MINISTER. Now.

Mr. SPROULE. I think it is too much to expect it to be read a third time to-night, as this is the first opportunity we have had to consider it in any way.

The PRIME MINISTER. Very well, to-morrow.

ADMIRALTY ACT AMENDMENT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 138)—from the Senate—to amend 'The Admiralty Act, 1891.'

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself in committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. FOSTER. Maybe it would be better, in the first place, to have a little explanation of this Bill.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The amendments are of trifling importance. Section 5, as it appears in this Bill, corresponds almost entirely with section 5 of the Act, except subsection b. Section 5 of the existing Act reads:

5. The Governor in Council may from time to time

(a) constitute any part of Canada an admiralty district for the purposes of this Act;

Up to that point, the amendment reads exactly the same. But, at this point there is a change:

(b) assign a name to any such district and change such name as he may think proper, and—

That is not in the old Act.

—and provide for the establishment of some place therein of a registry of the Exchequer Court on its admiralty side.

That is in this amendment also. Subsection 2 of this section also provides that the Governor General may:

(b) Divide the territory comprised in any admiralty district into two or more registry divisions, and establish a registry of the Exchequer Court on its admiralty side at some place in each of such divisions.

So, there is no real difference in the amending section, except so far as it permits the subdividing of admiralty districts into two or more registry divisions.

Mr. FOSTER. Why is the change made?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It enables us to divide the admiralty districts into divisions.

Mr. FOSTER. But, you can make that change without these others?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. These changes are necessary in consequence of the first.

Mr. SPROULE. It may be necessary to have these divisions made, but, it looks more like a Bill to divide up districts for the purpose of having more officers appointed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We cannot provide for the subdivision of a district into divisions without providing machinery to operate a court in the new division.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency). But, we have not had the object explained to us.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The object is so that we may divide—

Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes, but with what object—why divide?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We can, for instance, take the admiralty district of Quebec and divide it into subdivisions.

Mr. CASGRAIN. But, what for?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. To enable my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) to get what he asked for a moment ago with reference to Montreal.

On section 2,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The only change is that, whereas the Act provides that the Governor in Council may appoint for any district a registrar, a marshal, and such other officers and clerks as are necessary, the amendment authorizes the appointment of such officers, not only for any district, but for any division.

Mr. CASGRAIN. But, this does not agree very well with what my hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) has just been saying, that there should be but one admiralty district for the whole of Canada.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Not for the whole of Canada, but for the province of Quebec. I believe that one is quite sufficient. But, if it is necessary to have admiralty divisions, this provides for their creation. Of course, if it is deemed necessary to establish other districts, my opinion will not prevent it.

Mr. CASGRAIN. If a judge is appointed, I hope he will be appointed on his merits, and because he knows something about the law which governs in such cases, and not because he has rendered certain services to the government in the school question.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not know that my hon. and learned friend (Mr. Casgrain) is as fair as he generally is when he makes that remark. The judge to whom he refers was appointed by his own party.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Not to the admiralty.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. But, he was appointed by them originally to the bench.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The assistant judge was one who knew all about these admiralty matters. That is Mr. Justice Andrews. And the government went out of its way to appoint Mr. Justice Routhier because of certain services he is supposed to have rendered in connection with the school question.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) knows what I think about Mr. Justice Andrews. I have as good reason to know him and appreciate him as my hon. friend. As to Mr. Justice Routhier, I know no reason why such an attack should be made upon him. I feel confident it is not made because of his connection with the school question, but for some other reason.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). The government, under this Act, might establish registry divisions in every district in the province and appoint a number of officials. Suppose you establish one in Toronto, one in the county of Grey, another at Simcoe, where there are large shipping interests—what is to prevent you from establishing one in every county?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Nothing except our sense of common decency.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Can the Solicitor General tell us what makes it necessary to amend this Act. I would like to have some explanation as to what the government propose to do after it gets the powers which this Bill gives to it. I would like to know what a registry means?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In view of the discussion which took place in connection with the Pilotage Act, it is quite apparent that a strong desire exists in Montreal among the mercantile community to have an admiralty court in the city of Montreal. That would be met by this amendment to the law. There is but one admiralty district in our province, which is called the admiralty district of Quebec, but the Governor in Council might subdivide that admiralty district so as to make an admiralty division within the district, and that would be called the admiralty district of Montreal, which would still be within the limits of the admiralty district of Quebec.

Mr. FOSTER. You have an Admiralty Court judge in Quebec, and he would be the Admiralty Court judge for the registry district in Montreal?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If we had an admiralty judge for the registry district of Quebec he would have a right to sit all through that admiralty district, including the subdivision which would be called the Admiralty Court division of Montreal. The registrar is the clerk of the Admiralty Court, and issues the writs and takes evidence.

Mr. FOSTER. He would have to be a competent man, and how much would be his salary?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. As a rule, I think, with the exception of Quebec—and it may be that applies also to Halifax—marshals and registrars are paid by fees. In the Act which was passed in 1891, called the Admiralty Act of Canada, the registrar of the registration division of Quebec having been appointed by the Imperial authorities, it was decided to continue his salary at the old remuneration. But now all other registrars are paid by fees.

Mr. FOSTER. If this registrar comes up to Montreal would he have a valid claim for an increase of salary? Do these fees come out of litigants entirely?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The judge would get no fees, he would have nothing except the allowance which would be paid him for travelling expenses, and which is now provided for under the Exchequer Court Act.

Mr. FOSTER. Then this marshal, registrar and bailiff would be paid out of fees which come out of the litigants?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Out of the litigants.

Mr. QUINN. Inasmuch as the government is taking this power, I hope they will act upon it as soon as possible.

Mr. SPROULE. Would the hon. gentleman tell us whether it is the intention of the government to establish these registration districts all over the country?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not able to say what the intention of the government is. The hon. gentleman will remember that last year or the year before, a Bill was introduced by the member for Richmond, N.S., (Mr. Gillies) which had for its object to provide that such an admiralty division as is provided for by this Act, should be established in his county; and I think the same thing was asked for by the member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). The object here is to do in regard to the admiralty what we have done in regard to county courts in Ontario, that is to localize the jurisdiction of the courts in such a way that they may be able to act expeditiously and promptly. Now, take the navigation on the St. Lawrence. You have an admiralty district for the province of Quebec, you have an Admiralty Court at Quebec, and there is a vessel down at Chicoutimi, or at St. Thomas, many miles from Quebec. It may be necessary to take out a writ to attach a vessel at one of these distant ports, and before that writ reaches the vessel it may be forty miles away.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I think the way to deal with that matter in the province of Nova Scotia would be to appoint the prothonotaries in the different counties, deputy registrars in Admiralty or Exchequer Courts, and to appoint the sheriffs in the different counties deputy marshals, just the same as commissioners in Nova Scotia are commissioners in the Exchequer Court of Canada and in the Supreme Court of Canada. In that case, without increase of cost, you would give litigants an opportunity of getting their writs issued at once and save much expense.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Dealing with that suggestion, what would be the difference to the litigant between the appointment of a prothonotary as registrar and the appointment of a registrar who may or may not be a prothonotary? Both would have to be paid by fees. There can be no reason why a prothonotary should not be appointed registrar, as it would be idle to hope to obtain a man to perform the duties of registrar that has no other duties to perform. It may be that in many instances we shall have to take officers of courts already in existence.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In the way I suggest there would be no need of creating new divisions at all. You would simply appoint deputy registrars throughout the admiralty district of Nova Scotia. The sheriff of Halifax is marshal of the Exchequer Court in Admiralty in Nova Scotia. The sheriffs of the other counties would be simply the deputy marshals, and they would have the same authority that the marshal has, when they would act in his absence. It is practically the same thing.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not know if the hon. gentleman has looked up the statute recently. I have not. What would be the power of a deputy marshal? I am not quite sure if the powers of the deputy marshal and the deputy registrar are co-extensive with the powers of the marshal or of the registrar.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I took it for granted that the deputy marshal had the same powers as a marshal, but I am not sure. If he has not it could easily be remedied by amending the Act.

Bill reported.

MARKING AND INSPECTION OF FRUIT FOR EXPORT.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 127), to provide for the marking and inspection of packages containing apples and pears for export.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). Mr. Chairman, does the hon. minister (Mr. Fisher) think that until the 1st of July is sufficient notice? It seems to me that this is a very short notice to give the packers of this country to become familiar with the provisions of the Act.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) perhaps does not quite appreciate the scope of the Bill. The Bill applies only to the export trade, and it does not apply to the sale of fruit within the country. That, I think, had better be borne in mind in dealing with the Bill all through. The export trade in apples and pears, practically, will not commence until the end of August, and the great bulk of the trade does not come until September and October. The date of the 1st of July was simply put in as the middle of the season when the Bill would come into force, but the real effect of the Bill on the trade of the country will not take place until the export trade begins. I might say, in elucidation of this Bill, before we go on to discuss it section by section, that its introduction has been undertaken by myself in response to a very large demand on the part of a number of people who have been interested in our export fruit trade. The unfortunate occurrences which have been known and spoken of in connection with the export trade have created a desire that something should be done to try and put that trade upon a firmer footing than it has been on in the recent past. There have been a great many complaints, both by shippers themselves and by the public, and the reputation of our fruit in the foreign market, the old country market, which is practically the largest and nearly the only foreign market we have for apples and pears, has been such that our people have felt that something must be done to improve the condition of affairs. I have, in my hand, here, a large number of resolutions which have been passed by various organizations connected with the fruit trade of the country, fruit-growers' associations and others, asking that a Bill of this character should be introduced and that legislation of this kind should be passed through parliament. The reports which have been presented to the Committee on Agriculture of this House for the last two years have indicated the necessity of something of this kind. The Bill which I am introducing does not go, perhaps, as far as many people would like to see it go, but I felt that it was a difficult problem to deal with and that the difficulties were so great that I would like to take a short step before taking a longer one. I think, perhaps, it is more prudent in the interest of the trade that a short step should be taken while we are comparatively inexperienced in the working of such an Act, and that we may benefit by the experience gained in this short step so as to be enabled to take a longer step with assurance and security in the future if it is found necessary that a longer step should be taken. I would like to say a few words, just shortly, to explain the main provisions of this Bill. I have pointed out that it applies only to the export trade. I may say also that it only applies to apples and pears. The more perishable fruits could hardly be dealt with by an Act of this kind. The inspection of the perishable fruits of this country would hardly be of service, or of value, on the other side of the Atlantic, because we could not be sure that such fruit would arrive there in the same condition as when it was inspected here. The reason that the Bill has been made to apply to pears as well as apples is, that, in the last two years, the experimental shipments of pears have been so successful and the growth of pears in this country appears to be so large and so likely to increase that I believe, and those who have been discussing the matter with me believe, that the trade in pears from Canada to the old country is likely to very largely increase in the near future if it is carried on under a good business system. Therefore, it is that this Act had better apply to pears as well as to apples. The difficulties which have arisen in the past have been found almost entirely in connection with the apple trade, and the Bill consequently applies to our export trade in apples. One of the main features of the Bill is, that all of the closed packages for export shall be marked with the name of the packer, his address, the size of the fruit it contains, the name of the variety, and the grade of the fruit.

Mr. SPROULE. How will you measure it?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There is a definition which says that the size shall be the size in diameter across the core of the fruit.

Mr. SPROULE. Would you be obliged to measure all the fruit?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The definition of size would mean the smallest size in the barrel. If it was marked 2 inches, all fruit in the barrel should measure 2 inches across the core, and so on. The Bill goes on to describe what shall be considered the specification of the grade, and it provides a penalty against any one who puts in the package, fruit that does not come up to the grade marked upon the package. There is a final clause which authorizes the Governor in Council to make regulations for carrying out the provisions of the Act. I would impress upon the committee that there is no intention nor expectation that all and every package of our export fruit shall be inspected. I frankly say that I think that would be impossible at the present time. Of course nothing is impossible, I suppose, if sufficient money and sufficient men are employed, but practically it would be impossible. It would be impossible, because the inspection itself would be liable to injure the fruit, if we undertook to inspect every individual package, and the work would so delay the transportation that, I think, it would be impossible to carry it on. If any package is improperly marked as to grade, there shall be a penalty for the infraction, and any person who does pack fruit in that way and tries to export it, shall be liable to prosecution. His fruit will be open to inspection, by any inspector appointed by the government, who will have authority under this Act to inspect any fruit marked for export. These regulations will be made by order in council.

Mr. SPROULE. Where will the inspection be made?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I trust that those who have knowledge of this trade will take sufficient interest in this Bill to aid in perfecting it. As to where the inspection will be made, I am open to receive suggestions. The channels of our export trade are pretty well defined. Nearly all the export fruit from Ontario and Quebec goes by the St. Lawrence route from Montreal, some goes from Portland and St. John and Halifax, after navigation has closed. The maritime province fruit goes from St. John, Halifax, Charlottetown (P.E.I.), Yarmouth, and some smaller ports in Nova Scotia. The idea is, that an inspector shall be appointed at the points of export, but I think also, it would be in the interests of the trade, if certain inspectors should be distributed through the larger provinces, especially Ontario, who could be called on by exporters to inspect the fruit at the point of shipment, so as to facilitate the trade. I am not wedded to any particular part of these details, and I would like to hear the opinions of hon. gentlemen conversant with the trade, upon them. In drawing up this Act, I have tried as closely as possible to follow two lines. One is the series of resolutions passed by the Fruit Growers' Association, and the other is to try and assimilate these with the General Inspection Act, now in force. The Bill is based upon the two ideas, and, I think, it harmonizes the slight difference that existed between the resolutions of the Fruit Growers' Association, and the General Inspection Act, so as to make the Bill meet as fully as possible the object aimed at. I do not expect that the Bill will go through all its stages at this hour, but, I think, we can spend time profitably in discussing it to-night, and I shall be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). The House is pretty thin now, and I would suggest that it is not advisable to go on with a Bill of this character. There are present three or four monopolists, the Finance Minister, the Premier, some cattle dealers, and other useful members, but our farmers are not very many, especially on the government side, and this is essentially a farmers' Bill. I do think the House is altogether too much stripped of its proper representation, to go on with this Bill to-night. Any discussion which would take place would be a discussion amongst a dozen of us. I suggest to the minister that as he has opened up his Bill, he had better leave it till the House is fuller.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I thought perhaps some questions might be asked by some gentlemen who are here.

Mr. FOSTER. The whole discussion would have to be gone over again.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). I would like to bring forward one phase of this question that has not hitherto been before this House, so that the minister and others who take an interest in it may consider the matter before the Bill comes up again. The hon. gentleman opposite has noticed that there are not many farmers here, which is true. Although the Bill as at present drafted is altogether in the interest of the growers, there are other people in Canada who are also very much interested in this matter of apple inspection and proper apple packing, and I would urge the minister to give very careful consideration to the recommendation that this Bill be extended beyond the export trade. Practically the apple trade with the Canadian North-west can be dealt with in exactly the same manner as the export trade. The subject of apples is a very interesting one to us in the North-west. We do not grow apples at all, but we use them very largely, and we have been very much injured financially and otherwise through bad packing of apples and through a want of proper inspection of them. The Winnipeg Produce Exchange, before they knew that this Bill was going to be introduced, were moving in the direction of getting a Bill introduced, not for the export trade, but to regulate the shipping of apples to the North-west. Although the Bill will be of some use to the trade on the British side, it is otherwise altogether in favour of the grower. It was said in the House the other day that our goods were of that superior quality that when they reached the British market they were often sold for British goods, which in a good many cases is true; but anybody who knows the English market knows that inferior goods get a name, and all inferior goods are apt to be sold under that name; and I imagine after the way the apple market was treated in Great Britain last year that almost any sort of apples will be apt to be sold as Canadian apples. Now, Canadian apples are worthy of a good reputation, although a bad year may occur sometimes, and an act like this will prevent Canadian apples being injured by a year like last year. The minister says he prefers to confine the Bill to the export trade at present because it is a new thing, and his department will have a good deal of trouble in getting it started and getting the machinery at work. But I submit, while that is being done, that it would not entail much more work to apply it to the North-west trade as well. If that is not done now, we shall have very little chance afterwards of having it done; because a trade will naturally grow up there independently of this inspection, and those packers who do not want to be bothered with the export trade when it is put under these regulations will work up a trade with the west, and we shall be that much worse off. Last year was the worst year we had for some time, and the loss in the west was something tremendous. The apple trade there is very large in proportion to the population. The Winnipeg wholesale men lost heavily; but that with them was a matter of trade, and they may be expected to look after themselves in that respect. But the consumers all through the country lost heavily on their winter stock of apples. The honesty of the packer was not evident when you came to open the barrel. The middle of the barrel would often contain fruit that would spoil all the good apples in it. There is a trade in the North-west which is all the while extending, and if it is put under regulations, it will be for the good of the consumer there and also for the good of the grower in Ontario. I hope the minister will take this matter under consideration, and put our western apple trade under this Inspection Act.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that there would be a good deal of difficulty in working out this Act successfully, although there is no doubt a great need for some such law. You could put a good deal on the head of the barrel, but what you propose would tax its limit. The first thing that is referred to is the name and address of the packer, say W. H. Fisher; next, the size of the apples; next, the variety, say the Baldwin; next, the grade, say 'A. No. 1 Canadian.' All this will pretty well fill up the head of the barrel. I do not know that that will be a serious objection; but I think there should be something done beyond that. If you want to establish a reputation for any apples coming from a particular locality, such as the Annapolis valley or northern Ontario, which sometimes established a reputation for themselves, you should add the name of the locality. As to the variety, it often happens in packing apples that you find a barrel containing two varieties, half of one and half of another; and the two varieties, say Baldwins and Pippins, should be designated.

Mr. BURNETT. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that the packers pack them in that way?

Mr. SPROULE. I more than pretend it; I know it.

Mr. BURNETT. To ship?

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, to ship, as well as for the local market. I have seen it done over and over again. Then, a matter of great importance is where the apples are inspected. If you inspect Ontario apples at Montreal, must they grade as 'A. No. 1 Canadian,' and be sound, of nearly uniform size, of good colour, of normal shape, and not less than 90 per cent free from scab, worm holes, bruises and other defects, and properly packed? I may say that in some years it would be almost impossible to have any large quantity of apples for shipment if 90 per cent of them had to be free from scab, worm holes, bruises and other defects. Then, the very act of packing apples bruises them, as the head must be pressed down in order to prevent the apples shaking. If these apples are carried any distance by wagon or train, you will find that when they arrive at their destination they will not be in the good condition they were in when packed. Apples that might be found in proper condition, when inspected at the orchard, would not necessarily be in that condition on arrival at Montreal. I have seen apples that were sent a hundred miles into Toronto arrive in very bad condition, although they were in splendid condition when they left the orchard.

The Bill provides for grades A. No. 1 Canadian and No. 1 Canadian. I think it will be found that the grading of apples will be very much like the grading of grain, you will have to be guided a good deal by the quality that generally prevails throughout the particular year. In a very wet year, the apples would not be as good as in a dry year. In some years you will have apples generally tainted by scab, while in other years, they will be free from that taint, and if you try to apply exactly the same brand every year, in some years you would have very few apples for export.

With regard to false marking, the Bill provides that any inspector may efface such false marks and mark on the package 'falsely marked.' It would be much better, I think, for the inspector to put on the proper mark, as by branding the package with these words, he may render the fruit unsaleable.

I have no doubt that the hon. minister was moved by the very best intentions, but, it appears to me, that the Bill, if it should become law, will be unworkable. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg, that it ought to apply to apples going to the North-west or any other portion of the country as well as to apples exported to England. There are many parts of our country where the people do not raise apples, and they require good fruit just as well as the people in England.

Mr. HENDERSON. The hon. minister mentioned a moment ago that, perhaps, I had not observed the scope of the Act, and said that it was limited to apples for export. Well, Mr. Chairman, I desire to endorse what the hon. member for Winnipeg has said. To my mind, the Bill should be made to apply to apples for sale or export.

In this I am not simply expressing my own opinion, for I do not claim to be a practical apple-shipper or packer myself, although I have been engaged to some extent in that business, but, I have the opinion of a man in my county who packs a very large quantity of apples, and who is very strongly impressed by the conviction that the Bill ought to apply to apples for sale as well as for export. I would be happy to give the hon. minister the name of this gentleman at any time. He is a man of very considerable experience in shipping apples, and whose opinion is entitled to a great deal of weight in a matter of this kind.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Does the hon. gentleman mean that the Bill should apply to all sales or exchange of apples in the country or only to apples for sale for export?

Mr. HENDERSON. I take it that he meant that it should apply to apples for sale in this country, for instance, to apples sent to the North-west, or to Montreal, to be sold there.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Or to the next village?

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, apples sent to the next village are not usually packed and headed up in the way that apples are which are shipped to a distance.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They must be headed if sent by rail or steamer.

Mr. HENDERSON. No doubt, but a farmer driving to a village, a distance of a mile or two, would not head and pack his apples as if he were sending them by rail. This apple dealer to whom I refer is of the opinion that the wording should be changed, and I think that that is worthy of the hon. minister's consideration.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. In the Bill, clauses 5 and 6 allow 10 per cent of inferior fruit in one grade, and 20 per cent in another, which will leave the door open for fraud and cause endless trouble in the inspection. My correspondent advises that a better definition should be given of the various grades. Let me quote what he says:

I have had several communications from members of the trade on this Bill. The opinion is that it would be necessary to distinctly define Grade A. No. 1, and No. 1, and also Grade A. No. 2. I thoroughly approve of the idea of each shipper putting his full name on the package, and not a fictitious name as heretofore.

When the Bill comes up again, I hope that these suggestions will receive the consideration of the hon. minister.

Mr. J. GUNION RUTHERFORD (Macdonald). I beg to endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Halton (Mr.

Henderson), and the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee). With regard to the remarks of the last speaker, there would be some difficulty if the Bill were made to apply to all apples for sale in the Dominion, but I cannot see that the same objection would hold in the case of its being made applicable to apples exported from eastern Canada to that portion of Canada lying west of the great lakes. We have, as the hon. member for Winnipeg has said, a very great grievance in regard to the quality of fruit shipped from Ontario. As we do not grow large fruit to any extent, we are dependent for our supply on that province, and I may say that it is no credit at all to the fruit-growers and packers of Ontario that the fruit should be so packed as to arrive in the condition in which it does in our part of the country.

It is not unusual for carloads of fruit to come into that country which is not worth 25 cents a barrel, so, anything that can be done to insure for the people of Manitoba and the North-west a fair deal in this matter will receive their hearty approval. While I take the ground that the Bill should be made to apply to apples sent to that country, perhaps, the evil may work its own cure. Even if this law only applies to apples for export, I suppose there will be no provision or understanding that apples marked for export shall not be sold in the Dominion. If that is so, our people, if they wish to buy the higher grade of apples can buy those branded as provided in the Bill. I ask the House to pass such a law as will put it out of the power of unprincipled shippers and packers in Ontario to victimize the people of the North-west as they have done in the past.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). I am glad that the hon. minister (Mr. Fisher) has agreed not to go on with the consideration of this Bill to-night, as many hon. members who are interested in it are not present. I would mention particularly my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills). He remained until a pretty late hour, but being convinced that the Bill would not come up to-night, he went home. In my opinion, the Bill in its present shape will be unworkable, and its principle result will be the appointment of a number of officials who will have to be paid by the producers or by parliament. Every person who packs apples should be his own inspector. The law should provide that every person who packs apples, no matter where they may be sold, shall brand upon the package his name and the kind and quality of apples. Regulations can provide that apples shall be known according to the quality as A, B and C, or 1, 2, and 3, as you prefer, and the character of each kind can be fixed. You make a size here of two and a half inches in diameter. Say you, make that No. 1, a smaller size No. 2, and a still smaller size No. 3. If a person buys apples that do not conform with the regulations, penalties can be exacted from those who are responsible. As my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) has said, it is impossible to inspect apples. They may be packed here and sent by steamer to Montreal and sold in the market. Some will be repacked for export and the rest sold on the market there. No difficulty would arise if the apples were branded so that they could be traced to the packer. Of course, if they were damaged in transit, that is not the fault of the packer. As my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) says, you can provide that not more than a certain percentage shall have scab. This kind of legislation has already been passed in the case of wheat and other things. To follow this course would avoid the appointment of a number of useless officials.

Mr. ROGERS. Would you have the packer's post office address branded?

Mr. TAYLOR. That might be difficult. But, if this question is dealt with in the simple practical way, the law will prove efficient. If it is weighted down with all these conditions, however, it will not amount to anything. As the matter has been discussed, I would suggest that it might lie over for another year, and let the apple growers and dealers discuss it and make representations as to what will be the best practical course.

Mr. R. HOLMES (West Huron). I happen to represent a county which produces a large quantity of apples. Judging by the remarks even of those who are opposed to the Bill, I infer that there is a very general opinion that there should be legislation along this line. I take it that the Bill is of an experimental character. The Minister of Agriculture tells us that he has not gone quite so far as he would like to go, but he wanted to make sure of his ground. I am not an apple packer, and know nothing about it except what they tell me; but I am intimate with the packers. I know that there has been much dissatisfaction in the old country with the way our apples have been packed. I think that the suggestions thrown out by the western members are not practical. Every packer who is not able to find a ready export market, will probably send to Winnipeg or elsewhere as the case may be.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Wind falls.

Mr. HOLMES. Very often wind-falls, I admit. Of course, if you follow that course you will have to make the Bill applicable to all apples. I think it would be well to brand on the province as well as the fact of the apples being Canadian.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The full address of the packer is required; that would include the province.

Mr. HOLMES. It is generally regarded as a fact that one province, possibly produces better apples than another. It is easily to create or anticipate difficulties in connection with a Bill of this nature, but I think that in connection with the growing export business that we have in the apple trade, some such Bill as this should be upon the statute-book. This Bill, to use a phrase often used in newspaper circles, will fill a long-felt want. I do not know that it is altogether in the line of the desire of the packers.

Mr. CLARKE. May I ask the hon. gentlemen (Mr. Holmes) whether the packers in his constituency are in favour of it?

Mr. HOLMES. The apple packers in my constituency are divided on the subject, some are favourable and some are opposed. I think the apple growers are more favourable to it than the packers are. If the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) happened to be in a rural section, he would know that a good many difficulties were encountered in connection with the Bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. Has the hon. gentleman (Mr. Holmes) taken means to find out the opinion of the packers?

Mr. HOLMES. I am stating a matter of fact. I have talked the matter over with the packers, and some were in favour of such legislation as this, while others were willing, as the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) said, to be their own inspectors.

Mr. TAYLOR. I said, let every man be his own inspector, and let there be a law passed that he cannot put apples in a barrel under a certain size.

Mr. HOLMES. It means that every packer is practically his own inspector to-day, so far as his business is concerned.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not wish the hon. gentleman to give the House to understand that I am opposing this measure. My only desire is to see a measure that will satisfy my own constituents.

Mr. GEORGE GUILLET (West Northumberland). I have had some conversation with apple packers in my riding, and I find they are unanimously opposed to this Bill; they seem to think it is an impracticable measure to carry out. They object to inspection which involves the opening of the barrel, and taking the apples out, and re-packing them again, as they say they cannot be put back in the same satisfactory condition for shipment. One man, the largest apple packer in my neighbourhood, says that if the law is passed in its present shape, he will go out of the business. I will read a portion of a letter that he sent me on the subject:

On reading the copy of the Bill, I have come to the conclusion that it is impracticable. It would be impossible to inspect the large quantities going forward in some seasons of the year. Moreover, it would spoil the package, because it cannot be got back in as good shape again for shipping after being opened up. Unless apples are re-packed at shipping points, no inspector could put the government stamp on them. If my apples have to be unpacked at shipping points, I, for one will go out of the business. I admit that something should be done to compel the shipper to put his name and address on every barrel, marking the barrels No. 1, 2, 3, as the case may be. I would compel every shipper to sign an affidavit that his apples are truly marked according to quality, as marked on the barrel, and that the name on the barrel is the true name of the shipper. I would have a copy of this document go forward with each bill of lading to the man to whom the apples are consigned.

Under the present system, every apple packer ships his best apples under his own name, and he ships his inferior apples under a sham name, under the name of a firm which has no existence, and this is what is bringing discredit on the trade. I have the views of the other packers, which are in accord with those which I have just read. The leading firm in my riding, has a large cold storage in Cobourg, and purchases extensively from apple growers in the county of Northumberland. I understand that the minister had strong representations made to him of this character, when he was in Toronto, and that he left an impression upon the apple packers, that he would carry out their representations. I know that in my county, great care is taken in the packing of apples. They are gathered in large quantities, and taken to storehouses, where a large number of young people are employed in picking them over, and separating them into different grades, before they are packed. The existing evils have arisen from the practice of shipping the inferior grades under assumed names.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). Through the courtesy of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), the apple packers of the city of Toronto, had an opportunity of meeting him a couple of weeks ago, and those of them who had received copies of the Bill, have pointed out many difficulties as likely to occur in its operation. I think the apple growers, too, will be materially injured in many ways, if this Bill becomes law. But the minister is seized with the objections they have urged, and I understood from him that he would give the packers the opportunity of sending a deputation down here to discuss the matter again, before the Bill finally passed the House. I may say to the hon. member for West Northumberland (Mr. Guillet), that I am advised by some of the large apple packers in the city of Toronto, that it is the practice to send their agents and representatives through the different portions of the province to buy the orchards and the apples, after they have been taken from the trees by the farmers, are put into barrels by local packers, and sent direct to the port of shipment, so that they cannot exercise that personal supervision over them that they would do if all the apples were brought to their warehouses and selected and repacked there.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am glad that I asked the committee to take up the Bill this evening, in order to have a preliminary discussion upon it. I fully appreciate that it could not go through in a sitting like this; but I wished to obtain the views of those members who are interested in the matter. I will say a word before moving that the committee rise and report progress.

In reference to what the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee) and the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) have said in regard to the western views of this Bill I may say that I sympathise very much with the people in Manitoba and the Northwest Territories in what I cannot help calling the frauds committed upon them from which they have suffered so much. I shall be very glad if any provision can be put into the Bill by which that condition can be remedied. I am not at all wedded to the provisions of the Bill. I have drawn them in accordance with the best information I can obtain after consulting with the different interests engaged in the fruit trade, and I have tried as much as possible to meet the necessities of the case and as little as possible to interfere with the ordinary channels of trade. If there is any way by which the home trade can be protected successfully, I am just as much interested in doing that as in protecting the export trade, but I felt that the protection of the home trade to the same extent as I have undertaken the protection of the export trade would be undertaking upon myself too much in starting a new departure. It is possible some provision may be made in the Bill by which the home trade can be protected. I am quite willing to discuss that subject, and, if possible, to introduce such amendments to the Bill as may be considered necessary to achieve that object.

Mr. SPROULE. Would it not be a good plan to send this Bill to the agricultural committee, then give notice through the press and let anybody come before the committee and make representations there? We can have a freer discussion before the committee than in this House.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It might be worth while, but it was felt to be of such importance, and there are so many interests affected that I thought it would be better to have it discussed on the floor of parliament, in committee, where everything would go on record and where the members of the House could give their views in a more regular manner than they could, perhaps, in the committee of agriculture. But, it is a matter well worthy of consideration. I would like to remark that the suggestions made by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), are practically those embodied in this Bill, first that the packages should be marked. The Bill provides for just about the manner in which he suggested that the penalties should be imposed for fraudulent marking, and it provides that the people should be liable to these penalties for improperly marking the character of the fruit contained in their packages. It does not provide for the inspectors; it simply provides that the Governor in Council may make regulations for carrying out the law as passed. I do not say that I agree with the hon. member for South Leeds that in the home trade inspectors may not be very much needed because the party who purchases a barrel of apples can easily, himself, take action to impose the penalty.

Mr. TAYLOR. Why not the foreigner, also?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, he cannot practically do it at all. A barrel of apples goes abroad, it is sold upon the market abroad, and the buyer there has no recourse, practically. I grant that in the theory of the law he has full recourse.

Mr. TAYLOR. He does not pay for those apples in Canada, but he pays for them when they are received, and if, upon inspection, they are found not to be up to the brand, he keeps back the money.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. At the same time the reputation of our fruit abroad suffers. This is the condition of affairs that obtains to-day. A man here has recourse because the hon. gentleman says he does not pay for the fruit, but the result is that practically he does not pay anything at all, but the buyer has the bill sent back to him for the carriage of the fruit. We want to avoid that kind of thing. We want to prevent people from trying to send fraudulently packed fruit abroad and from injuring the reputation of our Canadian fruit. It is not that we, or those who have demanded this legislation, are particularly concerned in protecting the English buyer. What we want to protect is the reputation of our productions abroad, what we want to do is to improve that reputation that we have in that market so that our products, when sent there, will get an immediate sale at profitable prices, and we cannot do that if we allow people to continue to send bad fruit such as they have been sending. Without some kind of inspection in this country the provisions of the Act cannot be applied to the export trade at all, because there is nobody in this country who is interested in putting the provisions of the Act into force against the person who is exporting improperly marked fruit. In this country in the home trade, there are people who buy fruit and they, therefore, would be able to take action to enforce the penalty. I think it has been generally found that, in that respect an official whose duty it is to do this work is much more likely to take such action than the ordinary purchaser. As a matter of fact the purchaser would rather take his loss and gnash his teeth than take action against the man who sells a barrel of apples. I would like to say a word in regard to one or two other points. The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Clarke), and the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Guillet), referred to the apple packers. I have received communications from a number of apple packers. They differ in their opinions and in their representations to me. Some of them have said that they thoroughly endorse this Bill in its general principles and scope. Perhaps there may be some of the details of the Bill which they do not think are practicable. I opened my remarks by saying that the framing of such a Bill as this is an extremely difficult matter, and I appreciate perhaps more fully these difficulties the more we discuss the Bill. Last year I appeared before the committee on agriculture and pointed out to the committee the conditions as they existed, and after discussing the question many of the members were anxious that we should have legislation on this matter. I shrunk from undertaking this difficult task, but it is only because of the evident and absolute necessity for legislation of this kind to protect the reputation of the fruit trade abroad that I have undertaken to introduce this Bill, and if it is passed I shall undertake to try and enforce it. But, as I have already said, the fruit growers are divided in their opinions. Some of them believe that there should be no legislation to control them. On the other hand, one gentleman remarked at a meeting at Toronto, which was referred to a few moments ago, and the suggestions from which I was very glad to have: We know perfectly well that we have been at fault, and that if the reputation of our fruit trade has suffered it has suffered through our own fault. He acknowledged the corn, and other gentlemen there agreed with him, while some of those present deprecated a little the strong language used, although none of them denied the facts. There is no doubt that a great deal of imperfect and improper packing has been done in this country, and while I think this Bill may and will interfere with that kind of thing to a very large extent, I believe that the packers themselves are really desirous of having something which will aid them—I will not say keep them straight—but will aid them to do their business in a way that is honest and straight, and which will aid them in increasing and improving the reputation of our fruit abroad. If one packer finds that his neighbours are packing improperly it is hard for him not to do the same thing, and the difficulties in which the packers now find themselves will be removed to a large extent by the provisions of the Bill. I am not going to go into the details of the interview with the fruit men. I have a memorandum of what occurred. When the House goes into the discussion of this matter again we may go into these points.

The committee rose and reported progress.

ENGLISH TRUST FUNDS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I beg to move for leave to lay on the Table of the House certain papers connected with the investment of English trust funds in Canadian securities. These papers comprise two orders in council passed on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, one dated February 23, 1899, and the other dated March 22, 1900.

Mr. FOSTER. This is rather a technical question, and it would be well to have these papers printed.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Quite so.

DEPARTMENTAL REPORT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I beg to lay on the Table of the House the report of the North-west Mounted Police for the year ending June 30.

Mr. SPROULE. When may we expect the report of the Minister of Agriculture?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). It has been in the hands of the printer for a long time. I shall inquire to-morrow and let the hon. gentleman know.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister told us some time ago that he expected it in a few days.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I do not remember saying that.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. What business will the government take up to-morrow?

The PRIME MINISTER. We will exhaust all the Bills on the paper.

Mr. FOSTER. Exhaust them?

The PRIME MINISTER. If we are allowed to.

Mr. FOSTER. You will exhaust us first.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not think you are overworked so far.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.40 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, May 11, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. L. N. CHAMPAGNE (Wright). I beg to move, seconded by Mr. LaRivière, that the fifth report of the select committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates of the House during the present session be now concurred in.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would ask that that motion stand until Monday.

Mr. CHAMPAGNE. There is no objection, I understand, to the first part of the report, which provides for the payment of $50 to one of the officials, and I would move that that first part be concurred in.

Mr. A. A. C. LaRIVIERE (Provencher). If there is any objection to the whole report being concurred in, it might as well be left over altogether. The first portion is only a minor affair.

Mr. CHAMPAGNE. Very well.

RAILS FOR INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I draw the attention of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) to the following paragraph which appears in the Cape Breton Advocate:

The 'Advocate' is reliably informed that six miles of second-hand 67-pound rails have arrived to be used in repairing the Intercolonial Railway in Cape Breton. Forty-five miles of 80-pound rails are to come later, and the only section to be repaired is that from Sydney to Grand Narrows. Something better than this is wanted. There should be no tinkering. It is dangerous to run an express train over certain sections of the road. It will be rather late to adopt a proper policy when a serious accident has occurred.

The minister is, no doubt, aware of the very great strain that rails are now subjected to, especially in that part of the Island of Cape Breton, and I hope that instead of using old rails to repair the road he will be able, at an early date, to substitute the very best and heaviest rails where such a large amount of traffic is required. Especially will that be necessary in connection with the suggestion that there will be danger to the express trains unless the road is in thorough repair.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). It was not in contemplation, on my part at all events, to put down any old rails on that line at all, and,

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

I believe, in fact I know, that the information contained in that paragraph must be incorrect.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 135) to amend the Experimental Farm Station Act.—(Mr. Fisher.)

Bill (No. 134) respecting the incorporation of Live Stock Associations.—(Mr. Fisher.)

MARKING AND INSPECTION OF FRUIT FOR EXPORT.

The House again resolved into committee on Bill (No. 127) to provide for the marking and inspection of packages containing apples and pears for export.—(Mr. Fisher.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 8,

Mr. J. B. MILLS (Annapolis). It was with some surprise that we heard that this Bill was being put through its different stages, as it was understood that the minister (Mr. Fisher) agreed to let it stand so that some persons who desired to might be heard upon it. I went away from the House last night resting assured that such was the case, and what was my surprise to find that the Bill was being pushed through.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). No.

Mr. MILLS. I understood that the minister had agreed with the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) to allow this Bill to remain over. I may say that, so far as I am concerned, and so far as my constituents are concerned, some sort of Bill such as this is necessary, but I do not believe in a great many of the sections of this Bill. We ought to have some sort of inspection for apples, but I do not believe in experimental legislation. I believe in having legislation thoroughly looked into before it is made law, so that we will not stultify ourselves by passing an Act one session and coming back the next session to repeal it, as has been done in more instances than one, two or three, since 1896. This is a very serious matter. This is legislation that should be gone into for the purpose of doing good, not only to the speculator and buyers of apples, but also to the farmers and producers of apples. Their interest should be guarded. I do not think it would be wise to put this Bill through at the present stage. I know of a number of members of parliament who are not here, and who went home last night little dreaming that this Bill would be brought up. I make the suggestion that the committee rise and report progress on the Bill, and ask leave to sit again.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman is, I think, somewhat mistaken in what he has said. It is quite true, the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr.

Montague), asked me not to take up this Bill last evening. I did not do so until quite late, and I then explained to the House that I did not propose to put it through, but that as we had a little time at the end of the sitting. I thought it would be well to bring it before the House, so that a preliminary canter, as it were, should take place upon it. I have no desire now, as I had no desire last night, to rush this Bill. I think, however, it is important that it should be discussed. While I believe it is absolutely necessary in the interest of our fruit trade that some such measure should become law. I do not wish to tie myself or the House down to the minor details of this Bill. I have given a good deal of consideration to the Bill in conjunction with the various interests concerned in the trade, and the Bill as it stands, is about the best I could see my way to drawing up, with the exception of one or two points, which I explained last night, and which, perhaps, I ought to explain now. In the first place, the Bill is demanded, not merely by one portion of those engaged in the fruit trade, but by all parts of that trade. The fruit growers represented by the Fruit Growers' Associations of the different provinces of Canada, have urged it very strongly. I have under my hand the resolutions passed by a large number of the Fruit Growers' Associations of this country, asking for a Bill of this kind, and for a good many of the details embodied in this Bill. I have also letters from packers in the same direction. These letters have not gone into detail, to the same extent as the resolutions of the Fruit Growers' Associations, but some of them have suggested details which are included in this Bill. In addition, I had the advantage of the recommendations and reports of the officers of my department, who have been watching the fruit trade. The Bill is founded on all this information. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), says himself that something of this kind is needed, and I am sure that the fruit-growers of his county and of Nova Scotia generally, are desirous of something of the kind. There is one point in regard to the Bill as drawn, on which I have myself, some doubts. The Bill as drawn applies only to the export trade. I have no hesitation at all in saying that it would be well if we could have some system of branding and inspecting for the interior trade as well; but I did not include that trade in the Bill, because I felt that this whole movement was a new movement, in which I thought it would be well to move slowly and gradually. Therefore, I thought it would be better to try to deal with that portion of the trade which seemed to be more within our powers than to attempt to deal with what seemed to be a much more intricate problem. The channels of our export trade are pretty well defined, and there would be no great difficulty in having an inspection of that trade of the character intended by this Bill; but it would be practically impossible to have a thorough inspection of all the fruit sold locally or shipped from one point to another in the country. However, I have felt, and I feel still, that the appeal made by representatives of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and also by the people there, ought to be very carefully considered, and, if possible, met. It is possible that it might be met, and I shall be very ready for suggestions on that point. In fact, thinking the matter over since the Bill was first drawn up, a suggestion occurred to myself, which will, perhaps, meet the case of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. It is this: That the Bill, so far as the branding and the penalties for improper branding are concerned, should apply to all the trade, interior, as well as export; but that the inspection, and the rights of the inspectors to open and examine fruit, should only apply to the export trade. The reason I make this condition, is that I feel how utterly impossible it would be for any number of inspectors we could possibly appoint, to follow up and deal with the varied channels of trade inside of the country. If my suggestion were carried out—I have not yet prepared an amendment in that direction—it would put upon the packers the responsibility of marking everything they sold in a closed package, as one or other of the grades indicated in this Bill; and if they did that improperly and wrongfully, they would be liable to the penalties of the Bill. But there would be no machinery for the detection of their wrong-doing, and the enforcement of the law. I think this could be permitted for the interior trade, because the purchaser would be near enough, and in close enough touch with the packer, to see to the imposition of the penalty. But, when we come to the export trade, I feel that it is necessary that the fruit should be inspected in this country. If the fruit once gets abroad, and is there found to be improperly branded, recourse against the fraudulent packer may not be possible; whereas, if we have inspectors on this side of the Atlantic whose duty it will be to inspect as much as they can, the packer, understanding that their fruit is liable to be inspected—

Mr. COCHRANE. Has the minister decided where the inspection shall take place?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, not definitely, although I had in my mind the idea of having some inspectors at ports of shipment and others in the country, who would be on call for shippers desiring to have their fruit inspected at the point of shipment. This matter, however, is subject to organization. It is not provided for in the Bill, but is left to the Governor in Council to make rules and regulations for the carrying out of the Act; and I would be only too glad if hon. gentlemen would aid me with their suggestions and advice as to how the system of inspection might be carried on and improved upon.

Mr. ALEX. McNEILL (North Bruce). Has the minister explained what the system of inspection is to be?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not gone into that detail at all. The inspection of fruit would be arranged for, I suppose, in somewhat the same way as the inspection of other products. Suppose there was a shipment of a hundred barrels of apples. I suppose the inspector would pick out ten barrels and inspect them, and if he found them right, he might pass the lot; but if he found any defective ones, he would probably go on and inspect more, and if he found more defective ones, he would probably condemn the whole lot. But I have not gone into the details of that matter.

Mr. McNEILL. The difficulty is, in handling the fruit itself. It cannot be inspected without turning it out of the barrel, and if you turn it out, it has to be very carefully handled and repacked.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There is no doubt that the inspectors will have to form a judgment as to the quality of the fruit in any particular lot, and that is one of the most difficult problems in connection with the whole question. I quite realize that if a barrel of apples is once emptied, it is almost impossible to fill it again and repack it properly, and therefore, it will be absolutely necessary that the inspectors be men well qualified in the packing of fruit, and allowed full time and all the aid necessary to do that as well as it can be done. But while there must be sufficient number of inspectors to carry out a fairly effective inspection, the object of the law will be largely gained by its being a deterrent, owing to the fear of inspection on the part of the packer, who know that any shipment of their fruit is liable to be opened and inspected. At present there is no such deterrent at all. The packers know that once their fruit leaves their hands it is not seen until it reaches the auction markets of the old country.

Mr. MILLS. If every barrel is properly marked with the packers name, would not that be a deterrent?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, and the hon. gentleman will see by the Bill that that is one of the first points as a deterrent. But even that is not sufficient to guard our fruit trading interests, and we have provided for the inspection in this country, so that the packers know that they are liable to penalties if the fruit is not properly packed.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). Would it be practical to have the inspection made before the barrels are marked, and make the inspector responsible for the grading stamped on the barrel?

Mr. FISHER.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is largely a matter of administration. It was not my intention to charge anything for the inspection of the fruit. The inspectors would be there as policemen to look after the fruit, but I do think that if anybody wishes to have the inspection done at the orchard, he should pay a small fee. The inspector then would be called on to go to the orchard and mark the fruit according as he grades it.

Mr. J. G. HAGGART (South Lanark). There is no provision in this Bill for anything of the kind.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. My hon. friend will see that section 17 provides that the Governor in Council may make provision for the enforcement of this Act, and the suggestion I have thrown out could be made a portion of the regulations provided for under that section.

Mr. HAGGART. But the Bill only gives power to make regulations in accord with the Act, and does not give the power of official inspection and grading by the inspector at the orchard.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The inspector could not himself grade the fruit, but when the packer has packed it, the inspector could be authorized to go to the packers point of shipment and see whether the grading or packing was correct or not, and that is all I suggest.

The point I wish to bring out in reply to the hon. member for Toronto is, that if the inspection is made at the point of shipment or the orchard, at the request of the packer, the packer should then pay a fee; but if made after the packer has put his wares upon the market or expedited them from his home station, then the inspection ought to be done at the expense of the government for the protection of the trade generally.

Mr. E. COCHRANE (East Northumberland). A very extensive exporter in my riding has drawn my attention to the clause providing that the informant, in the case of improperly packed apples, should get half the fine. He thought that a very dangerous clause, because one can readily understand that that where the exporter employed a man to pack 2,000 or 3,000 barrels of apples, and some difficulty arose between them, this man might put up a job on his employer and have him fined when he was not responsible for the bad packing at all. That appears to me to have a good deal of force, especially in view of the hon. minister's suggestion that the inspector may inspect the apples where they are packed, in which case the provision is quite unnecessary.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am rather inclined to agree with the suggestion of the hon. gentleman. That clause was put in as it has been put into other Acts. When in Toronto the other day, I had the interview alluded to by my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Clarke) with a number of fruit packers, and the point referred to was one to which they drew my attention, and they asked to have that clause 16 eliminated. I would be disposed to fall in with that suggestion unless something comes out in the discussion to the contrary.

I would like to just refer to the interview which I had with certain packers in Toronto about ten days ago. I took careful notes of that interview, and one of the points brought to my notice was the one I have just alluded to. Another was the request that this Bill should apply to the home as well as the export trade, and there may be a way, as I have already pointed out, in which that can be accomplished without too great difficulty or expenditure.

Mr. COCHRANE. I would like to draw attention to this fact, as showing the difference between the home market and the British market. The farmers in our section do not pack any apples at all. The dealers buy the crops of the orchards and send their men in to pack. But in the case of the home trade, the circumstances are different. The farmer may pack his apples himself and may not have them packed just up to the standard, because he would not be getting the price for them that he would for apples packed for export. I do not think it would be fair to apply the same rule to the home market as to the export trade, except in the case of Manitoba, the North-west and British Columbia. The people there, I think, should be protected the same as if we were sending the fruit to Great Britain.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The question of the home trade is a very large question, one upon which, before the Bill leaves the committee, I hope, we can get the consensus of opinion of the House. My only reason for not including it originally was that I feared the great difficulties that would arise; but, I think that, perhaps, the suggestions I have made this afternoon will, to a large extent, overcome the difficulties. If those difficulties can be overcome, nobody would be more delighted than myself to give protection to the home consumers as much as to the consumers abroad.

There were a number of small points brought up in the meeting of the packers which I need not go into in detail. They were almost entirely matters that would be decided upon under the regulations, but, not under the Act itself. There were, however, two points on which I wish to touch. One was that, under clause 5, the proportion of sound fruit was too high—that was their objection.

Mr. McNEILL. I was just going to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Fisher) if it was not too low. Twenty-one per cent of inferior fruit in No. 1 apples is a very large proportion.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is the second grade. I confess that I thought the packers were a little unreasonable in that demand, and the clause, I think, gives them quite enough latitude. But, I did sympathize with some of the complaints they made, and hope to remedy some of the matters of which they complain. Another point they made, with regard to which I think a good deal may be done to meet their views, was that they wished not only the principal of the packing firm to be liable, but also the labourer who does the packing. As to that, I would like the opinion of the lawyers who are members of the House before expressing an opinion. If it can be done consistently with placing the responsibility where it really belongs, I would have no objection.

Mr. McNEILL. There seems to be a clerical error in clause 6. It speaks of No. 2 grade where it apparently means No. 1.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, that is right.

Mr. McNEILL. But, clause 5 refers to No. 1.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Clause 5 refers to A. 1, clause 6 to No. 1, and clause 7 to No. 2.

Mr. McNEILL. Does not the hon. minister think it a pity to have an A. 1 and No. 1? Would it not be better to have the grades known as No. 1, No. 2 and No. 3?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I thought so myself, but, those engaged in the trade tell me that the description A. 1 is one known in the English market, and if we were to grade our apples 1, 2 and 3, they would appear in the English market to be of lower grade than they really are.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). I understood last evening that the government were anxious to get through with a number of Bills to-day, and I thought that this Bill would not come down until there was a full attendance of the members who are interested. This morning, the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) told me that he did not expect that the Bill would possibly come up to-day, and the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary) was of the same opinion. These gentlemen represent two of the largest fruit-growing districts in Ontario, and both have representations to make with reference to this Bill. I made the suggestion that this Bill should be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and that a day should be fixed for hearing both the growers and packers. If the hon. minister is bound to crowd the Bill through to-day, we shall waste all day on it, and then not get through.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have told the House that I have no expectation of getting it through to-day.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, it seems to me we are wasting time, because it will all have to be gone over when the hon. member's interested return. Better take it up some other day than Friday, a day when many members from Ontario are absent. The best course would be to refer the Bill to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. C. E. KAULBACH (Lunenburg). I am sure that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) will see from the discussion that has arisen that it would be admitted in its present stage. I wrote to some fruit-growers in my own county on the subject, but have not received an answer. The other evening, when this matter came up, the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) spoke on the advisability of delay, and was told that delay would take place in order to give an opportunity to hon. members to correspond with those in their constituencies who were interested in the matter. The county that I represent grows fruit very largely, and the growers there would feel very much disappointed if this Bill were to be put through in this hurried manner. There are a number of clauses which I would like to discuss in detail. I think the hon. minister should allow the matter to go over until another day, affording time to hear from party correspondents on the subject.

Mr. MILLS. I agree with what has just been said. I think the government had better go slow with this Bill. I can say that the people of Annapolis county are better prepared to have the government introduce a Bill for the prohibition of spirituous liquors than such a Bill as this. I have representations from some portions of the valley, and not only from my own county, but also from King's county, in regard to the matter. I have a letter here from a gentleman who takes a deep interest in these matters. He is a member of the Nova Scotia Fruit-Growers Association. I refer to the late manager of the Dominion Atlantic Railway, Mr. P. Innes. He writes me, under date April 22, as follows, among other things :

I submitted the Bill with the comments you sent me to a number of prominent apple-growers, such as R. S. Eaton, John E. Starr, Robert Starr and others—

Well known to the Minister of Agriculture.

Their opinion, as well as that of the meeting, is that the Bill should not be proceeded with this year, as its provisions are not generally known, and time is required for its discussion.

That is one. Now, I have a resolution that was passed at the meeting of the King's County Board of Trade, April 25, 1900 :

Whereas, the Bill for the inspection and marking of barrels filled with apples and pears intended for sale contains two clauses which this board deems objectionable to the growers and shippers of these commodities in Nova Scotia, namely, the clauses referring to the marking of the diameter of the fruit which the packed barrel contains, and the clause requiring the barrels containing the fruit to be marked No. 1 Canadian, the latter clause being objected to because of the feeling that Nova Scotia apples have a better reputation in the English market than Ontario apples, which are commonly called Canadian.

As a matter of sentiment I do not agree with that resolution, for I believe in having the word Canadian brought prominently before every one. But as a matter of business, and as a matter of fact, Nova Scotia apples do have a better reputation, and do obtain a better price in the English market than any apples that are marked Canadian, or any other apples in the world, for that matter. That is the reason the people of the valley are a little anxious to have their welfare safeguarded in that respect. The resolution ends up with this clause :

Therefore resolved, that the board recommends that the passing of said Bill be held over for the present.

This resolution comes direct from the place where the Nova Scotia Fruit Growers' Association has full swing, and these names I have mentioned are prominent men in that association. I have also, like my hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach), written to a number of persons in the Annapolis valley, and a number of them have written to me, asking for the Bill, which I have sent to them, and as yet I have had no reply. But knowing the people of the county as I do, they prefer to have the legislation which has been impliedly promised to them enacted by this House, than to have this Bill go through. Therefore, I would advise the government, if they want to get along speedily with the business of the session, to go a little slowly with this Bill.

Mr. GUILLET. I would also remind the minister that the apple-growers of the county of Northumberland desire further opportunity to consider the Bill before it is pushed through.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. As I said at the opening of the discussion, I did not expect to push the Bill through its final stages this afternoon. It cannot be said that the government is proceeding hastily with this Bill. It was introduced on the 29th of March, some forty days ago. The Bill has been before the House ever since, and hon. members have had it in their desks and have been able to discuss it, and make up their minds in regard to it, and to have such communication with their constituents as they desired. But putting that entirely aside, I have no desire unduly to press the measure. I do want, however, that the House should come to a decision so that we will know where we are. I want the hon. members freely to express their views in regard to it, and I shall be only too glad to receive suggestions which may improve the form and the machinery of the Bill. I have already received some suggestions in the House since the Bill has been on the Order paper. In reply to the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), I can only say that the Fruit Growers' Association of the province of Nova Scotia passed a resolution and embodied it in the annual report of their president, which says:

Careless and fraudulent packing of apples in Canada has become such a menace to this important trade that some inspection law seems imperative, and the Minister of Agriculture requests us to outline some form of an Act which will not entail any individual loss to the honest packer. You will find this a difficult task.

He says to the association:

I have had communication with the Ontario Fruit Growers' Association, and they have passed the following resolution, which you will please consider carefully and adopt, unless some Act more desirable can be formulated.

Then he goes on to quote the Ontario Fruit Growers' Association's resolution, which were adopted by the Nova Scotia Fruit Growers' Association with some slight modifications, and which are contained in a letter written by Mr. Bigelow to me, but which did not practically change the form of these recommendations. The Bill has been founded largely on the recommendation of the Fruit Growers' Association. The changes which have been made in it have been made with a view to bring the Act as nearly as possible in line with the General Inspection Act, and not with any intent of changing the aim of the Act from what was intended. I can understand that there are some conflicting interests in the fruit trade. That, perhaps, as my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Guillet) intimates, a great many fruit-growers do not pack their own product, and the result is that there may be a conflict of interests between the fruit-growers and the fruit packers. But still I am satisfied that the interests of each of them is the interest of all, and that if the trade is not protected by some such legislation as this, the result will be even more disastrous in the future than in the past; and that not only the fruit-growers may suffer, but that the fruit shippers and everybody connected with the trade will suffer. It is not likely that any Act which we may put upon the statute-book, to be effective, will not tread upon the toes of somebody. In fact if it were not necessary to tread upon the toes of somebody we would not require an Act at all. I would regret if this Act did not become law, or was not put through in some form or shape this session. During the last three years we have suffered severely in the English market in the reputation of our fruit, and if we go on in the same line we are going to suffer still more. Our fruit is going to be still further injured in reputation in England, and the state of affairs which was found there last fall will be intensified instead of improved. I am satisfied it is only by such legislation as this that we can relieve the present situation, and I think the House and parliament would be recreant to its duty to the people interested in this trade, if some such legislation as this were not passed at this session. However, in view of the remarks which have been made by hon. gentlemen who are interested in this matter, I will not proceed further with the Bill, and I will move that the committee rise and report progress. But I warn the House that I shall take the earliest opportunity possible to push this measure along.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). The minister has intimated some of the difficulties surrounding an Act of this kind, such as inspection and the danger of conflict between producers of apples and apple packers. The discussion of the question seems only to have brought out the possible defects of the Act, and the conclusion that if passed in this shape it would be entirely unworkable and worse than useless. That being the case I would suggest that the wisest plan we can follow would be not to push the Bill this year but to publish a number of copies of it and send them around to the Fruit Growers' Associations and the Farmers' Institutes through the country so that at their meeting, this coming fall, they can discuss the Bill and make such representations to the government as they see fit. There is no doubt that all see the necessity for some kind of an Act, but those interested should have the Bill which it is proposed to crystallize into law, before them so that they can discuss it and point out its defects or recommend its virtues. If they have this Bill before them they can discuss it more intelligently than they could otherwise and decide as to whether such a Bill as this is needed, or not needed. The hon. Minister of Agriculture says that a great deal of harm will be done without this legislation, but I submit that much greater harm will be done to the fruit trade if we pass a law that is unworkable. I agree with what the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) said about proceeding slowly in this matter. My suggestion last night was that we should send this Bill to the Agricultural Committee and invite the Fruit Growers' Associations to send representatives here to offer such opinions upon the Bill as they desire to give. I did not understand that the minister intended to proceed with the Bill to-day; I understood the minister to intimate that he might possibly concur in my suggestion, but I assume that he has since changed his mind and decided to push the Bill through. I think this is an unwise step. I think it would meet with the approval of all those interested in the trade all over the country much more readily if he would allow the Bill to drop at the present stage, have a number of copies sent out to the Fruit Growers' Associations all over the country, and in the province of Ontario, to the Farmers' Institutes which hold their meetings in the fall of the year, when they will discuss the Bill, and I am sure the result will be that the hon. minister will have information before him which he has not in his possession at the present time.

Mr. COCHRANE. Mr. Chairman, I want to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Agriculture to the fact that although a number of gentlemen represent constituencies that are largely interested in this Bill we are not as practical in our information as men who are interested in the shipping trade of this country. Although I suppose I represent as large a fruit-growing section as there is in Canada, I would not pretend to offer advice to the hon. minister from a practical point of view such as shippers would be able to give him. I would suggest that he should not make the mistake that some Finance Ministers have made in this country by adopting regulations that would be very injurious to the country from the fact that, perhaps, they have not had the practical information that they should have had before such legislation took place. I would not want to suggest anything that would be derogatory to the hon. gentleman in his position as Minister of Agriculture, but I would respectfully suggest to him the propriety of referring this Bill to the Committee on Agriculture before the fruit gentlemen interested in the fruit trade could come. We could notify these gentlemen that this question would be discussed on a certain day, and those who pack apples and are interested in the trade would have an opportunity of submitting their opinions. I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman is very anxious, for his own reputation, that the Bill should be a perfect one and it would be better to adopt this suggestion than to find out after we have spent a great deal of time and given a great deal of attention to the measure that it would not be satisfactory to those interested in the trade. I am as much interested as any other hon. gentleman in seeing that our fruit shall sustain the high reputation that it had at one time, and in order to achieve that result we should have a Bill that will be workable when it passes parliament. I do not want to object to the Bill becoming law if it is necessary to have it passed this year. If it is going to do us any good the sooner we have it the better, but I am anxious that we shall have a Bill that will accomplish the end we have in view.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). I do not think there is a member of this House but will admit that there should be the strictest possible care taken that no apples should be shipped except apples which are good. The English market is the best in the world, they want the best article there, they are willing to pay for it, and one can easily conceive that one or two years more of dereliction will have the result that they will not take our apples at all. They are exceedingly sensitive in England; they want us to send a good article. As to the details of the Bill, I would not offer any practical advice, like the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane), but I would say that I believe it is necessary, as quickly as possible, that the men interested should be brought here. I see no reason why, in a week or two all who are interested should not be brought here. I can see that there is only one interest, the packers having no particular interest and the fruit-growers having no particular interest. It is one interest. The man who sells the fruit to the packer is anxious that the packer should come next year and purchase his fruit for even a better price, and the packer is anxious that the fruit should be so packed that he will get the greatest return. These two should be brought together, and I think they should be brought together very quickly, and that this Bill should pass. I can say more; it will be but a short time when one of the largest trades in Canada will be the fruit trade, and it is going on increasing immensely. In the Annapolis valley I do not think there is more than 3 per cent of the land that could be utilized for raising the best apples in the world under cultivation, not certainly more than 5 per cent. I stand here and make the statement, that for the world's market, particularly the English market, the Nova Scotian is beyond comparison the best apple that is raised in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS. It is true.

Mr. FRASER. And it is because I fear the loose way in which they are packed in Ontario may recoil on the Nova Scotian apples that I am anxious that this Bill should pass.

Mr. CLARKE. Gentlemen who are engaged in the fruit business in the city of Toronto do not desire, so far as I can ascertain their opinions, to offer any factious opposition to this measure. They desire to co-operate with the hon. Minister of Agriculture in making the measure as perfect and as workable as it can be made. The merchants engaged in this trade in the city of Toronto, I understand, export from 30,000 to 40,000 barrels of apples annually, and they seem to think that unless the imposition of the penalty is altered in some way it will be unworkable, and it will have the effect of driving them out of the business.

The hon. minister, as I said last night, very courteously interviewed a number of these gentlemen in Toronto a couple of weeks ago, and he seems to have left them with the impression that before the Bill was passed, or read a second time, they would be given an opportunity of meeting him again if they desired to do so. If the hon. minister would adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and send the Bill to the Committee on Agriculture, or if he would name a day when the Bill would be taken up again in committee, in the House, so that I might notify these parties who are interested, or if we gave them a reasonable time to come and interview the minister again, I think we would get over the difficulty. Practically, as the hon. minister says, the one objection taken by the fruit packers was in regard to the imposition of the penalty, and that was urged by them as a strong objection.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Which point is that?

Mr. CLARKE. In regard to the imposition of the penalty. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the fruit packers represented to him that it was not unreasonable to impose a penalty on the local packer, but if the hon. minister will agree to name a day and send a telegram to any of these parties notifying them that they will have an opportunity of being heard before the Agricultural Committee, they will be able to state their opinions and the hon. minister will then see what is best to be done.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I understand from a report of Prof. Robertson, which I saw, that apples from my province are sold in London as Nova Scotia apples, whereas, apples from elsewhere in Canada are sold as Canadian apples. I do not know whether the hon. minister is aware of that, or whether it is a fact. I think that the apples from the province of Nova Scotia usually sell for a somewhat higher price, as Nova Scotian apples, than do apples which are called Canadian. I do not know how the distinction arose, or whether it is important, but I believe it does exist. If you stamp these apples as Canadian and sell them as such, you may do financial injury to the fruit-growers of the Annapolis valley.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The Bill provides that the name and address of the packer shall be upon the barrel, and that, of course, will include Nova Scotia as part of the address. The English law provides that all foodstuffs, including apples, coming from abroad, shall be marked with the country from which they come; and unless I am very much mistaken, I think that Nova Scotia apples have to have the name 'Canada' marked upon them also. It would be rather unfortunate if in any Dominion legislation, we did not use the word 'Canada' or 'Canadian,' in connection with the articles that are sent to the old country. I would not like to see a Bill passed in this parliament which would seem to indicate that we were afraid to have the name 'Canadian' stamped on our food products. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden), is right in saying that Nova Scotia apples have a better reputation in the English market than have the apples that are sold as Canadian. In the port, of course, they are all entered as Canadian, but in the market, and at auction sales, one is known as 'Nova Scotian' and the other as 'Canadian.' I am not prejudiced, because I do not come from either Nova Scotia or Ontario, but I must say that for the last two years the Nova Scotia apples have enjoyed a better reputation in the English market than have the apples coming from Ontario and Quebec, and sold as Canadian. The Nova Scotia apples have a special reputation, and I venture to say that that reputation is due to the fact that the Nova Scotian packers and shippers have been doing an honest business, and that the apples in their barrels are exactly what they purport to be. It is because I hope that state of things will be found all over Canada through the instrumentality of this law, that I want this Bill to pass. I know that in Ontario and Quebec there are a large number of men who pack and ship honestly, but unfortunately, there have been others who by the system adopted by them, have hurt the reputation of apples marked and sold as Canadian, in the English market.

Mr. CLARKE. What about giving the parties interested in this Bill an opportunity to be heard?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think it would delay the Bill, if it were referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and I imagine we could accomplish our object by fixing a day, say next Tuesday morning, when myself and any members of the House who wished, could meet the representatives of the various interests who want to lay their views before us.

Mr. SPROULE. It would be impossible to have the parties here by that time.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am quite willing to make it a later day.

Mr. TAYLOR. A week from next Tuesday?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am afraid that would be too long, say next Wednesday or Thursday, if you like.

Mr. SPROULE. It would be impossible inside of ten days to get the parties interested here. In the meantime, there will be an opportunity to communicate with these gentlemen, and if they like to send representatives here, they can do so. I think myself, a great many would come.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am willing to give hon. gentlemen ample opportunity to consult their constituents, and I shall be only too glad to facilitate the parties interested in representing their views to the House. I would not like to postpone the Bill for any great length of time, because I trust that the session is drawing towards its close.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh no.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I know the session is not getting along very fast, but still we hope that say two months from now—

Mr. TAYLOR. Two or three months.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. We hope that about two months from now the session may come to a close, and I would not like this Bill to be delayed.

Mr. McNEILL. I sincerely hope that the Bill will pass this session, because I believe it is of the utmost importance. There is no doubt that we are losing rapidly our trade for apples in the English market. There was a terrible falling off in the English importation of apples from Canada the year before last.

Mr. TAYLOR. Because they did not grow.

Mr. McNEILL. Last fall I had a conversation with a gentleman, whose word I have no reason to doubt, who told me that he had been informed by a man who boasted to him that he had packed some thousands of barrels for shipment to the United Kingdom, and put good apples on the top and bottom, but the greater part of the contents of the barrels were mere rubbish. If that kind of thing goes on, we will soon lose our trade altogether. The very fact that it is known in England that we have adopted measures to endeavour to secure an honest packing of our fruit, will in itself, have an immense effect for good.

Mr. JOHN McMILLAN (South Huron). I come from a county where a large quantity of apples are packed and shipped to the old country, and for a number of years, I do not know of a single farmer who has packed his own apples. Under one system, the farmer pulls the apples, and the buyer sends his men to pack them, and he takes only what is fit for the English market, the refuse going to the farmer. There is another system which, I believe, has done the trade a great deal of harm, and that is that the buyers go around, purchase the whole orchard, pull and pack the apples, and all the farmer has to do is to drive them to the station. That has acted injuriously on the trade. Last year was exceptional in the province of Ontario. It was dry in my locality, and the apples were small on the trees until near the end of August, when the rain came and they took a second growth. That was one of the reasons why our apples were not good on the English market, because they were soft and did not keep. I am in favour of a Bill being put through, as I believe it is in the interests of the farmers and the honest packer; but I want to see clause 16 expunged, because it would place even an honest packer in this position, that if he had a dishonest man in a gang, this man might, in spite, pack a barrel of apples in such a way as to render his employer liable to be fined and then go and give information against him. I hope action will be taken on this subject this session, for the sooner we get our apple trade placed on a solid basis, the better for both the producer and the shipper of apples in Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it understood that this Bill will be allowed to stand ten or twelve days until we can have an opportunity of communicating with the people interested and ascertaining their views?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I would not like to say how many days the Bill will be allowed to stand, but it will be allowed to stand for some time.

Mr. SPROULE. It must be allowed to stand long enough to enable us to hear from the people. Then we could send a copy of the Bill to prominent men among both apple growers and exporters, and learn their views. It would be little use doing that unless the Bill stood long enough for us to hear from them.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). While it is perfectly proper that care should be taken to make this a perfect Bill, I hope hon. gentlemen will avoid factious opposition, and will to the utmost of their ability facilitate the passage of the Bill.

Mr. MILLS. There is every desire on this side to help the Bill along.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. MILLS. Why should you use the term 'factious opposition'?

Mr. CHARLTON. I said I hoped the Bill will not get it, and if the hon. gentleman does not give it, my remarks do not apply to him. It is a matter of the greatest importance that Canada should maintain the character of her goods—her butter, her cheese, her bacon, her apples, and all her goods exported to Great Britain. We have been rapidly building up a large export trade; the increase has been enormous in the last two or three years. In consequence of this increase we have been able to dispense to a great extent with the market of the United States, which we thought so important to us, and therefore we want always to hold in view the importance of maintaining the character of the wares we send to the English market. The Americans lost the English market for cheese through laxity in inspection and dishonesty in manufacture. They embarked in the business of sending to England what is known as filled cheese—half cured and half lard. The consequence is that we have taken the market from them. We want to bear in mind this instance of the results that follow the sending of bad products of the farm to the English market, and to keep in sight the great principle that it is of the last importance to Canada that we should maintain the character of all classes of farm products exported from this country to England for the purpose of going on in the course we have entered upon of rapidly increasing our exports to that country, and making England what she is more and more becoming, our largest and best customer.

Mr. COCHRANE. You have changed your views.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I would like to point out to hon. gentlemen that while this question has been before the House in the shape of a Bill for some forty days, this Bill is the result of discussions which took place at a large number of meetings all through the past year, and that very earnest representations with regard to this question were made to the Committee on Agriculture last year, and discussions arose in that committee in which different members expressed their views. Every fruit-growers' meeting held last winter discussed the question and passed resolutions upon it, and these resolutions are under my hand to-day. Therefore, this question has not been lightly considered or ill-considered in the form in which it is brought before the House. I am quite sure that hon. gentlemen opposite, as well as those on this side, wish to remedy the evil. I regret that one or two hon. gentlemen opposite think that this Bill should not pass this session. I cannot agree with them. I think the Bill ought to pass this session in the interest of our people and our apple trade, and I hope the House will take that view. In the meantime, as the House is not ready to proceed to-day with the Bill, and as some members desire to consult the interests involved, I accede to their wish to have the Bill stand for further consideration. I, therefore, move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. MILLS. I read a portion of a letter which I received and a resolution passed by the Board of Trade of Kentville, to the effect that this Bill should not pass this year. I did that, not because I agreed with what was in the letter or the resolution, for I agree that some such Bill as this should pass; but I did it for the purpose of showing that it should pass slowly, because that resolution came from the very men who asked the Minister of Agriculture to introduce such a Bill as this.

Mr. McNEILL. There is no desire on this side of the House to obstruct the Bill in any way. We want the Bill to pass, but in such a form as to be most valuable. That is the only desire we have.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

SEED GRAIN INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved third reading of Bill (No. 143) to amend the Act respecting securities for seed grain indebtedness.

Mr. DAVIN. I beg to move :

That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be re-committed to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of substituting for the clause in the Bill the following :

The liability of persons who are liable to the Crown as sureties upon bonds given to secure repayment for seed grain furnished by the Crown to persons in the North-west Territories is, from and after the passing of this Act, discharged.

On the question being put,

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yeas and nays.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Call in the members.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Contrary to agreement.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I call the attention of the leader of the House to the question whether it is possible for a private member of this House to move to discharge a liability due to the Crown.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It is too late now. I am against the amendment, at any rate.

Amendment (Mr. Davin) negatived.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The motion now before the House is, that the Bill be read the third time.

Mr. DAVIN. Before this passes, I wish to state what my hon. friend the acting Minister of the Interior stated to the leader of the opposition in my presence this afternoon, namely, that when this Bill is passed, he will have an order in council relieving these liabilities. I understand the hon. gentleman to be bound by that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is no question as to the effect of the Bill and as to its being carried out in good faith, as I stated to the right hon. leader of the opposition.

Mr. FOSTER. What do you mean by good faith?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Relieving all the bondsmen and sureties.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the Bill very unjust. I voted against the amendment because I did not think it was fair. The Bill it not yet passed, and I hope that attention having been called to the injustice of it, the government will not press it, or that if they do press it, they will previously modify it in the way indicated by my hon. friend from West Assiniboia. It looks to me like an improper exercise of power by the government. The Bill provides that the Governor in Council may discharge from liability persons who are liable to the Crown. Why should such a power be placed in the hands of the Governor in Council? If the government laid down a principle upon which any and every person coming under the terms of the Act can be free from liability, that would be something we could understand, but, under this Bill, power is placed in the hands of the government before an election, which is most unfair. The Governor in Council may discharge from liability. Why, the Minister of the Interior, or any one having power and authority, can go to the electors interested and say: I represent the Governor in Council, and I say to you that if you vote for the government candidate, the Governor in Council will discharge you from liability. That is the power placed in the hands of the government. The First Minister may tell us that they are too good and virtuous to exercise such a power wrongly.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. And that they will do everything fairly. But, why the necessity of giving them the power to do wrong? There is no reason why such power should be granted the government. Let them lay down a principle by which they must be guided, so that every one who comes under the terms of this measure may have the advantage of it; but, to say that the Governor in Council may relieve one man from the surety he has undertaken and not another, leaves to the government the exercise of a personal or political preference, and, therefore, I am opposed to this Bill becoming law. I intended making some remarks on the amendment, but it has been declared lost, and these remarks would be out of order, but, at any rate, I hope that this Bill will not pass.

Bill read the third time and passed.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 138)—from the Senate—to amend the Admiralty Act.—(Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

THE PILOTAGE ACT.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 11) to amend the Pilotage Act.—(Sir Louis Davies.)

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). When the committee rose last night, I promised that I would consider certain questions regarding the necessity of having a clause determining whether the court should be unanimous in its decision or not. After considering the matter, in deference to the doubts expressed by my hon. friends opposite, I determined that it will be better to reconstruct the clause by making the court consist of one legal gentleman, with power to appoint assessors. The court will, therefore, consist of a commissioner, with assessors, and I propose that subsections 2, 3, 4 and 5 of section No. 1 shall be amended so as to read as follows:

2. Such court shall consist of a commissioner who shall be a barrister of the province of Quebec of not less than seven years' standing, and who shall be appointed by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and sworn in before a judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec.

3. The court shall, in the hearing and determination of any charge or complaint against any pilot, and also in any inquiry in connection with any accident or damage happening to or caused by a vessel in charge of any pilot, have power to call in the aid of one or more especially qualified assessors, selected and appointed by the Montreal pilotage authority and the licensed pilots respectively, as herein provided.

4. The licensed pilots shall, annually, under regulations to be made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, appoint one or more qualified pilots to act as such assessors, and the Montreal pilotage authority shall also annually select one or more persons qualified to act as such assessors.

5. The commissioner shall be entitled to receive from the person or fund from which the costs of any inquiry or proceeding are directed to be paid for each day actually occupied in the hearing of any case the sum of $10, and each assessor, acting as such, the sum of $5 for each day so actually occupied, and such remuneration shall be included to and collected as part of such costs.

6. From and after the creation of the court and the appointment of the commissioner as aforesaid, the power of the Montreal pilots authority to hear any matter which the court has power to hear and determine shall cease.

That is in deference to the suggestion of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). The sections are in substance as they are now, with the exception that two of the commissioners are made assessors instead of forming part of the court. The Bill will conform to the practice prescribed in the eighth clause, providing that after the establishment of an Admiralty Court in Montreal, the local judge in admiralty of the Exchequer Court will assume jurisdiction, and all inquiries be held before him, assisted by two nautical assessors.

Mr. BERGERON. Is that all clause 1?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have substituted other sections for subsections 3, 4 and 5, and am making two of those, who were members of the court in the original Bill, assessors.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) In other words, the hon. gentleman has really remodelled his whole Bill and is proposing six new sections instead of the four in the Bill. He has made a generic change, and introduced a lot of details which it is impossible to follow.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that he leave that section, and have the Bill reprinted—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It will all come up on the third reading.

Mr. FOSTER. But we cannot discuss a clause of that kind on the third reading. Not only is this an important Bill, but the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) has made an absolute change in the nature of the Bill—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They are the same sections as here.

Mr. FOSTER. No, there are six new sections.

Mr. BERGERON. And ten dollars is put in in place of five dollars.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, that was amended yesterday.

Mr. FOSTER. It is impossible for the House to catch the force of what the hon. gentleman proposes—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not propose to go to the third reading to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, we will stay in committee that we may have an opportunity of discussing these questions.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Why not discuss it now?

Mr. FOSTER. How can you discuss it in the written amendment?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The same as any other.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman must treat the committee fairly, and he will not lose time by adopting the suggestion I make.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. When we discussed the Bill last, certain legal questions were raised, as to the power of the court to act unless it was unanimous. The question was raised whether the Interpretation Act, which provides that where two persons have power to do anything, a majority of them can do it, would apply to a case of this kind. Some doubts were expressed, and upon considering the whole question, I thought it would be better to relegate two of the commissioners to the position of assessors, as in 8th section of the Act respecting the Admiralty Court, under which two of the assistants are called assessors. That is the only change. We are anxious to get the Bill before the Senate, and the change proposed is one easily understood.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). As I was not here during the whole of yesterday's discussion, will the hon. minister be kind enough to give me a little information. I understand that this court is to take the place of the commission against which so much has been said.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. BERGERON. And, as I gather from what the hon. gentleman said, the question has been raised whether a majority of the court should be able to give a decision.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes; I propose to settle that by making the two assistants assessors, as in the case of the admiralty.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) has not stated, but I suppose we can infer that one of these assistants will be the representative of the shipping interest, and the other representative of the pilots?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. BERGERON. And, in case of a difference of opinion, the legal authority in the court will give a decision, as in the Court of Review?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. BERGERON. One of the points brought forward by the hon. minister, while I was here yesterday afternoon, and on another occasion, was that up to the present the difficulty has been that there has been an appeal from the decision of the commission by certiorari to the Superior Court, and in nearly every case the decision of the commission was reversed, and when the rule nisi was passed, the time of punishment inflicted was over. Is the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) providing for this?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. BERGERON. There will be no appeal?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, unless they exceed their jurisdiction. There is a common law right of appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench from any inferior court, if it goes beyond its jurisdiction.

Mr. BERGERON. Will the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—or, I suppose we should say the Governor in Council—appoint the man to represent the pilots?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, but the pilots will nominate him.

Mr. BERGERON. I suppose he is not obliged to accept their nominee, but he may appoint him. Then, as to the other, representing the navigation interests—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Will be nominated by the Harbour Commissioners.

Mr. BERGERON. But the Harbour Commissioners do not represent altogether the navigation interests.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is the only constituted authority that we could get at.

Mr. BERGERON. Have the navigation companies been consulted, and are they satisfied?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They are all satisfied with that part of it.

Mr. BERGERON. So, the pilots will suggest a man, the Harbour Commissioners will suggest a man, and my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) will appoint a lawyer of not less than seven years' practice to act as judge; and from the decision of this court there will be no appeal, except where they go beyond their jurisdiction. I was not here last night, but I believe it was said, and I have often heard the opinion expressed, that it would be more in the interest of the pilots, the navigation companies and the public, that such a court should be simply an ordinary court of justice appointed to hear these particular cases and sitting in Montreal, from whose decision there should be no appeal, except as in the case spoken of. That would involve no additional expenditure of money, and, I believe, it would give more satisfaction. I am very much afraid that this tribunal will not give satisfaction to either parties. The pilot judge and the harbour commissioner judge will be at loggerheads all the time; and the lawyer of seven years' practice, who will sit for ten dollars a day, will not be like Cæsar's wife. I am afraid that, instead of doing good, we are passing a law which will involve the government in a great deal of trouble. It would have been a great deal better to establish an ordinary court. There are courts in Montreal sitting every day; and we have lots of judges, though we have a Bill here to authorize the appointment of more. No doubt the suggestion I make has already been made. I have spoken to a great many people in Montreal on this subject since the Bill was placed on the Order paper; and the consensus of opinion, as I have found it, is that the best way to secure justice and to give satisfaction to all concerned is to follow the course I have indicated. I believe that the law as propounded by my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) will be little, if any, better than the one we now have.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). My hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) has alluded to the frequent appeals that have been taken and the upsetting of the decision of the commission in cases of complaints against pilots. I think that one of the reasons was that the pilots were not represented before this commission empowered to try them. Here is a provision by which they will have a fair chance to make themselves heard. I do not think that any set of men are more anxious for the reputation and good name of the pilots than the pilots themselves; and if they are allowed to choose a representative of their body to sit as assessor and make more clear, perhaps than could otherwise be done, the different features of the case from their point of view, I feel certain that the complaints of frequent appeals and upsetting of decisions will cease. We must acknowledge that among the pilots there are some men who are respected by the whole shipping community, and who deserve the greatest consideration, and whose opinion will be valuable and can be relied upon; such as Mr. Cleophas Auger, the president of the Pilots' Association, and in cases where they feel that the pilot is guilty of neglect or is answerable for any accident that happens, they will be the first to declare against him. So, instead of being at loggerheads as my hon. friend appears to apprehend, I think that the two assessors, if the shipping community make as good a choice of their representative, as the pilots will, will be generally in accord. We cannot condemn them beforehand, and suppose that they will be carried away by personal or professional feeling. I think we ought to have a better opinion of the man whom the class he represents will select, and we must hope that the choice they will make will be such as to give satisfaction to all concerned.

Mr. BERGERON. I know my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue is very honest in the expression of his convictions. Now, the pilots will suggest to the government the name of the man to be appointed to represent them, they will probably propose their best man. Now, what will be done by the other side? The Harbour Commissioners will also propose a man, and my hon. friend will admit that they will propose one of their own political creed. A Liberal will probably be the man proposed, and the lawyer who will be appointed by the government, I am convinced, will also be a Liberal. Now, when a case comes up, the lawyer and the representative of the Harbour Commissioners will politically stand by one another; and unless the poor pilot has a very strong case, or becomes a strong party man, the chances are ninety out of a hundred that he will lose his case, whether he is right or not. There is this danger with regard to that court. I say it frankly, I can see politics at the bottom of this project. It may be the Minister of Marine and Fisheries never entertained that idea, I take it for granted that he is acting for the best; but, I am only bringing to his notice some things that are likely to occur. On the other hand, we have a right to send such cases either to the Circuit Court of Montreal, or before a judge of the Superior Court. We have a right here to create a court, we can do anything we wish.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is very questionable.

Mr. BERGERON. I think we can do anything we please in this matter. I think it would give more satisfaction and better guarantees, both to the pilots and to the shipping interests, if we sent these cases before an existing court. I am convinced that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is doing what he believes to be best for all parties concerned. I know he has been greatly bothered about this, he must have received piles of correspondence and given many interviews; because I know that for the last three months this matter has been agitated in Montreal. I am only drawing his attention to the danger there is that we may have the same troubles in the future that we have had in the past.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The county which I have the honour to represent is really the home of the pilots; out of the fifty-four pilots, there are forty-six or forty-seven who live in the county of Portneuf, and naturally I take a deep interest in the settlement of this question. As for the political feelings of the pilot who may be chosen, I may say that nearly all the pilots in my county have been steadily Conservatives. I am afraid I have not been able to change their political opinions. But, I must say, as I said a moment ago, that when we discussed the proposal of my hon. friend, it never entered my mind that there was any political object in view in framing this Bill. I know how anxious my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is to settle this question so as to give satisfaction both to the pilots and to the shipping interests. I have had occasion to call upon him with many deputations, both from the Harbour Commissioners and from the pilots, and I know the trouble he has taken to settle this question. I feel morally certain that there is no intention whatever of gaining any political advantage in the proposal he makes.

Mr. FOSTER. I am getting more and more confused, as I have been looking first at the Solicitor General and then at the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and thinking over the Bill that the Solicitor General pushed through last night, to which a third reading was given to-day, and now of the change made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I am inclined to believe that it is a contest between these two gentlemen as to the survival of the fittest, and at this moment the odds are in favour of the Solicitor General. What was the basis of the Bill of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries? There were several ways in which this thing might be done. There was the old way, but, there was dissatisfaction with it. Then, there was another way proposed, to take these cases before an Admiralty Court, to establish a branch of the Admiralty Court in Montreal, with a judge and all the necessary paraphernalia. My hon. friend was disposed to do something better for himself than that. He did not believe the old system was the proper system, he did not believe an Admiralty Court would do the work, and so, he introduced another proposition on the basis that he would make a fair tribunal of three judges, each of whom would be equal with the others, and each of whom should represent one of the three great interests. The distinguishing feature of this Bill was to have a triple bench on which the pilots should have one equal representative, the pilotage authorities should have another, and the government should have a third. Now, there was some reason in that from the hon. gentleman's standpoint, and so, he based his Bill on that principle. We discussed his Bill last night, and while we were discussing it, there was another one being forwarded by the Solicitor General: the government, having carefully thought over the matter in council, had authorized the Solicitor General to introduce and carry through a Bill to establish a branch of the Admiralty Court in the city of Montreal. It was not theoretical legislation that the Solicitor General was putting through. When he was asked the question, he said it was the intention of the government to establish a registry division in the city of Montreal, in which division the admiralty judge for the province of Quebec would perform the duties of judge in admiralty in the city of Montreal; and he declared that it was the intention of the government to erect that registry branch, and that in future, in the city of Montreal, there should be a judge in admiralty with all the powers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The Solicitor General did not say there should be a judge in Montreal with all the powers.

Mr. FOSTER. The purport was that the judge in admiralty now in the province of Quebec, shall, by the formation of a registry division in the city of Montreal, become judge in admiralty in the city of Montreal. If I did not understand the Bill aright, then I am mistaken. But, what other effect has the Bill? I asked the question as to what would be the cost, and the hon. gentleman said there would be no addition to the judge's salary, because the admiralty judge in Quebec would be admiralty judge in Montreal; but, he said there would be travelling expenses, there would be a marshal, and so forth, but all that was covered by fees. The Solicitor General's Bill provides for a judge in admiralty with all the powers, and all the appurtenances of a court in the city of Montreal. And what else have you? At the tail end of this Bill the hon. Minister of Marine places these words:

8. Notwithstanding anything in this Act, after the establishment at Montreal of an admiralty district with a registry and a local judge in admiralty of the Exchequer Court, such local judge shall ex-officio be the president of the Montreal pilots' court.

This is the court that up to the present time this Bill contemplates the formation of. The hon. Solicitor General's Bill is through, it has passed this House, it gets its third reading, and it will become law. The moment it becomes law, what becomes of this Bill? Why do we have two hon. gentlemen striving to put two measures on the statute-book and taking up the time of the House and the time of the country, when the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries says at the end of this Bill: This does not amount to anything, because the Solicitor General's Bill is already through? The registry office is actually established 'in esse' and the moment it is established all this falls to the ground. Now, my hon. friend has made another change. He has abandoned the only distinctive feature of his Bill, which was to have a tripartite bench so that all the different interests might be represented. He has changed all that, and he gives the pilots no representation. He is not giving anybody any representation. There is one judge. He constitutes a court, the pilots' representative may be there in a subordinate capacity, but he does not give any judgment. He simply gives advice, or if he is asked a question, he gives an answer to that question, or if he is asked to give values he gives values. But, while the pilots thought that when this measure was brought down the minister was giving them a judge who would be one of three to adjudicate upon their own cases, now the hon. gentleman has turned around and has given them a Bill which gives no power to their man at all. What is the good of his Bill? With the hon. Solicitor General's Bill passed he declares that it shall provide for the dominant and actual court just as soon as the registry office is established so that this Bill, as changed, has no raison d'être. He had begun with the position that he would give representation to all the different interests, whereas he is providing for only one judge, and he is appointing a judge it may be for a day, because as soon as the registry branch is formed in the city of Montreal this judge ceases to exist and all the work which this judge has to do and which this court is to adjudicate upon goes over to the Admiralty Court. So that, after this long round we have got back to where the advocates of the admiralty system started in the first place, and we will just have a judge in admiralty and two nautical assessors and this Bill will be just worth so much waste paper.

Mr. A. F. MARCOTTE (Champlain). (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that now that the hon. Solicitor General's Bill providing for an admiralty judge in the city of Montreal has passed the House and is about to become law, the Bill under consideration has no longer any raison d'être. But the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has made several important changes; he has abandoned the fundamental idea of his Bill, which was that the three members of that board, representing the different interests should each have the right of voting and giving their judgment. The minister has changed all that, and the representative of the pilots, and the representative of the harbour commissioners as well are no longer there as judges merely to adjudicate upon their own cases, but merely as assessors to give advice. I would like to know from the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue whether he thinks the pilots will agree to play in that new court the mere part of assessors; while in the Bill as it stood yesterday, they were to be judges.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Under this Bill, which follows the practice in England, the pilots will have representatives in the court in the form of assessors who will advise the judge upon all nautical questions, and by their advice the judge will be largely guided. This is all the pilots want, and that is what they will have under the Bill. The hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) was astray, because, I suppose, he did not understand the proper construction of the Admiralty Court. The admiralty judge in the city of Quebec now has jurisdiction at Montreal, all over the River St. Lawrence and all over the province of Quebec. There is no extension of his jurisdiction to Montreal by the Bill of the hon. Solicitor General. All that the Bill of the Solicitor General does is to establish a local district where a local registrar will be appointed who will have power to issue writs and facilitate the carrying on of business at Montreal, instead of going to Quebec, to issue a writ.

Mr. FOSTER. Will there not be a judge in Montreal?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend mean to say that a judge in admiralty will not sit in the city of Montreal?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He may go to Montreal and sit if he desires to for the sake of convenience.

Mr. BERGERON. But he may sit in Montreal?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He may.

Mr. FOSTER. He has to sit in Montreal, because the hon. Solicitor General gave as the reason for putting his Bill through last night, that in order to facilitate the trial of cases arising in Montreal the judge was to go to Montreal and sit there.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He can sit there now.

Mr. FOSTER. But not without a registrar's office and the proper officers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Then what is the reason of having the Bill?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. So as to facilitate the issue of writs in Montreal.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend does not know what he is talking about.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Considering that I have been practising for thirty years in that court, I think I know more about it than the hon. gentleman does.

Mr. HAGGART. The Bill says that he shall sit in Montreal.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, he shall sit in Montreal to hear cases which originate in Montreal. At the present time cases do not originate in Montreal, but they must originate in Quebec. Under the Bill they may originate in Montreal. The hon. gentleman does not propose to assign to a judge who lives in Quebec the duty of hearing all these disputes between pilots whose conduct is complained about and to bring him to Montreal every time a complaint is to be heard. But, when we get a local judge in Montreal the jurisdiction will be transferred to him because he is in the city.

Mr. FOSTER. What does your last clause do, then?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is what it does.

Mr. FOSTER. The Solicitor General told us last night that he was giving a judge in admiralty to Montreal.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is why this Bill is necessary.

Mr. BERGERON. Then the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies), does not intend to bring the admiralty judge from Quebec to try these cases in Montreal.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, yes.

Mr. BERGERON. There seems to be a great deal more than we imagine in this clause 8, in connection with the Admiralty Court. I see now, from what has fallen from the Minister (Sir Louis Davies), that a judge will be specially appointed later on in Montreal as admiralty judge. That is what it means.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, we have no authority to do that.

Mr. BERGERON. Then what is the meaning of clause 8 here. It is clear there will be a judge of the Superior Court in Montreal who will have a special commission as admiralty judge.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Why?

Mr. BERGERON. For my part I would prefer that to the commission established by this Bill.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Some day you may reach it.

Mr. BERGERON. Why do you not do it openly and honestly now and not be leading us by dark passages to that result. I foresee the appointment of a judge in Montreal to that position.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The law does not provide for it.

Mr. BERGERON. Why create this court composed of a pilot, of a political heeler of the Harbour Commissioners, and of a young lawyer of seven years practice who will be on the stump day and night in political clubs in Montreal, lauding the glories of the present government, and who may be tempted to lean one way or the other without authority of law. Why not say at once that a judge shall be appointed. If the government is not prepared to appoint the judge just now, let them appoint one pro tem before making a permanent appointment. I call the attention of the minister to the fact that this Bill will leave him and his department in a worse position than they are now.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). (Translation.) I was just rising to reply to the question put by my hon. friend (Mr. Marcotte), but I put off my answer in order to give way to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), who had risen at the same time as myself.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Does the hon. gentleman know whether the pilots are willing to accept the change contemplated here?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. (Translation.) The ambition of the pilots is not so much to have the privilege of being represented on the bench and to sit on pilotage matters as to have a chance of making themselves heard.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) And to obtain justice.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. (Translation.) They wish to have a hearing and, of course, to obtain justice—

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) But especially to obtain justice of the courts.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. (Translation.) I may say further that, for many years, I have given my best attention to this matter and that I am thoroughly conversant with it. Over the four-fifths of the pilots live in the county of Portneuf, which I have the honour of representing here, and I think it would be impossible to find a more honourable and respectable man than the president of the Pilot's Association, Mr. Cleophas Auger.

Whenever a pilot is prosecuted on the charge of breach of duty, naturally he is very anxious that his judges should be enlightened as to certain technical details which the most eminent members of the bar and the Harbour Commissioners themselves cannot always grasp, as they do not belong to the profession and have no special technical knowledge of these matters. The result is that the judgments rendered against the pilots are often appealed from, and those appeals are nearly always maintained. I am aware that the pilots have asked that one of their profession should be appointed by them to sit with the members of the harbour commission for the trial of pilots; and this, not because they hoped, by that vote, to exert any influence on the judgments of that board, but in the hope of placing such cases in a proper light.

I have frequently heard them remarking, and there was the ring of sincerity in these remarks: 'We do not wish to shield our comrades, if they are guilty, as when a pilot gets drunk or neglects his duty, and he causes a collision in the river or grounds a steamer; but we merely wish to be heard before the tribunal and to explain, with a thorough knowledge of the matter the reasons which may have contributed to such accidents; we wish to show either that such accident was the result of some uncontrollable force or honestly admit that it was the result of negligence or some other fault. Nobody is more anxious for the reputation and good name of the pilots than the pilots themselves, and they are perfectly aware of it.'

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I feel certain that the pilots would not do anything wrong to screen one of their class; but, on the other hand, I think the change made by the minister in his Bill alters the main feature of it, as the pilot who represents the pilot associations is no longer a judge but merely an assessor.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. (Translation.) The pilots want at least to make themselves heard.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Undoubtedly, under this new Bill, they will have a chance of making themselves heard, and that is certainly an improvement over the former state of things. Everybody knows that the pilots have had to suffer hardships in the past.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. (Translation.) At any rate, they have been made to suffer from errors.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) But now that the Solicitor General's Bill is through, and that it has passed this House, could the minister tell me how long that new court under contemplation is going to last, and what is the object which the Solicitor General has in view, in pushing this Bill through?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. (Translation.) The Bill of the hon. Solicitor

General concerning the admiralty does not apply to these pilotage differences, which do not come under the control of the admiralty at all. Let me read to the House the action of various causes of action which come under the control of the admiralty court; and I am going to quote from the English copy, as I think my hon. friend is conversant enough with the English language to follow me:

13. Any suit may be instituted in any registry when—

(a) the ship or property, the subject of the suit, is at the time of the institution of the suit within the district or division of such registry;

(b) the owner or owners of the ship or property, or the owner or owners of the larger number of shares in the ship, or the managing owner, or the ship's husband reside at the time of the institution of the suit within the district or division of such registry;

(c) the port of registry of the ship is within the district or division of such registry; or

(d) the parties so agree by a memorandum signed by them or by their attorneys or agents.

As will be seen from the above, the jurisdiction of the admiralty court is quite different from that of the court which is going to be established to try those cases.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the clause is adopted I want to be clear on this matter. Has the government now any legislative authority for appointing a local judge of admiralty in the city of Montreal.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No.

Mr. FOSTER. They have not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I want to ask the minister (Sir Louis Davies) what is the point of section 8?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The point of section 8 is simply this: If hereafter parliament vests in the government power to appoint such a judge, then when they vest in the government that power, the local judge will take the jurisdiction which is now given to the commissioner to discipline these pilots and to try their cases. There shall not exist a local judge in admiralty and a commissioner appointed under this Act. In the meantime the commissioner will be appointed under this Act to hear complaints against the pilots, and the moment the local judge in admiralty is appointed, if parliament ever appoints him, then he assumes this jurisdiction.

Mr. FOSTER. It is usual to define the duties of a judge before you have any authority to appoint him or apparently any intention of appointing him. Whenever the government comes to the conclusion that it is necessary to have a local judge in admiralty in Montreal, they have to bring in a Bill, and I should think it would be that Bill which would confer the jurisdiction upon the judge. You do not say you are ever going to appoint a judge; you have no authority to do so nor have you introduced a Bill looking towards it, and yet you have a complete myth here and propose to legislate that if the world turns upside down some day, such and such will take place.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) reflects he will see that when you do appoint a local judge in admiralty, he could have no jurisdiction over these cases by virtue of his appointment. A special Act would have to be passed, not to amend the Admiralty Act, but to confer on the admiralty judge certain special jurisdiction. We do that in this case in advance.

Mr. FOSTER. Why?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Because there is no necessity of having another Act passed. If a judge is appointed, he assumes the jurisdiction by virtue of this Act.

Mr. FOSTER. If the government were contemplating the appointment of a local judge of admiralty in the city of Montreal what was the use of the Solicitor General coming down and spending the time of the House, in putting through a Bill which expressly declared that there should be no local judge of admiralty, but a registrar in Montreal, and that the judge of admiralty in Quebec should hear cases there?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The appointment of a local judge of admiralty is not at present contemplated by the government. The Bill of the Solicitor General, is simply to facilitate the procedure and practice of the Admiralty Court. If this registrar is appointed, and a case is initiated in Montreal, the judge can come there and try it; but he has no jurisdiction to discipline the pilots or to try any matter arising out of the Pilotage Act. That would have to be conferred upon him by express statute. But we put a concluding paragraph in this Bill, providing that if a local judge of admiralty is appointed, he shall have jurisdiction in this case.

Mr. FOSTER. What my hon. friend has done is to take everybody into a family council to decide what is to be the name of the baby, years before it is born. Would it not be time enough to give the baby a name when it is in sight? My hon. friend has brought down an ill-considered Bill. He has cut the heart out of it, and now he has to admit that the tail of the Bill is of no use at all.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend stated a little while ago, that as at present constituted, the judge of the Admiralty Court in Quebec, would have jurisdiction to sit in Montreal.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He has power all over the province.

Mr. BERGERON. That is what I understood my hon. friend to say. What you are doing now is furnishing the house before the man brings in the bride. Between the two Acts, the one passed last night and the one before us now, the one coming from the Department of Justice, and the other from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, there seems to be a conflict; and there is a preparation for war in the last clause of the Bill of my hon. friend. By clause 8, a judge of the Superior Court at Montreal, will be made a judge of admiralty, sitting in the city of Montreal, with an additional salary, I suppose?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No; unless parliament passes a law authorizing that to be done, it cannot be done.

Mr. BERGERON. As soon as that is done, the present Bill of my hon. friend, falls to the ground.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. All but the last clause.

Mr. BERGERON. The only difference in the court will be, that the young lawyer who is to be appointed now, will give place to the judge. Why not bring the judge of admiralty from Quebec to try these cases?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You would not bring him to Montreal to try a case of discipline. It would cost more than it would be worth.

Mr. BERGERON. When a man is appointed at $1,000 a year, and is surrounded by marshals and messengers, and all the paraphernalia of a court, I think that will cost more than to bring the judge from Quebec. There might be some matters which would not need his attendance at Montreal; but I am speaking generally. What was the use of passing the Bill passed last night?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In the case of an action in the city of Montreal, say an action for salvage, under the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, it would be necessary for the complainant to go to Quebec to take out his warrant and have it served on the ship at Montreal; but under this Act a registrar can be appointed in the city of Montreal, who will issue the writ, and when the case is ready, the judge will come from Quebec to try it.

Mr. BERGERON. Where will the registry office be placed?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), last night made a very good suggestion, that we should appoint the prothonotaries of the courts to act as registrars, because as the registrar is paid by fees, these are not likely to be sufficient to allow of the appointment of a man to that office, who is not otherwise engaged; and I suppose the registry office will be wherever the official is who is to be appointed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Of course, the judge in admiralty now presiding at Quebec, is a local judge all over the province of Quebec. In looking over the Admiralty Act of 1891, I have not found anything in it which would prevent the government appointing a local judge in admiralty to sit in Montreal. The Governor in Council may appoint any judge of a Superior Court or County Court to be a local judge in admiralty for a particular district. Suppose he should appoint 'A' to be a local judge for a particular district, that does not take away his power also to appoint 'B' to be a local judge in that particular district. He will have that power unless we find some restriction, by reason of which he can only appoint one judge in each district.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a very important point, and we would like to have an answer. In answer to a question I put, I was informed that the government had not the power to appoint a local judge in admiralty, but, that there would have to be an Act of parliament passed. That was absolutely stated by two ministers of the Crown. Now, the point is raised, that under this section they had a perfect right to appoint any existing judge to be a local judge in admiralty. That opens up a vista. I can quite see what may be on the tapis now. They may want to add to the perquisites of some local judge in Montreal, and have the power to do it by giving him this appointment. We want to know if they have the power or not.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick.) Reading the statute as I do, its intention clearly is that the Governor in Council has the right to appoint a judge for an admiralty district.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It says 'may appoint any person to be local judge for a district.'

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My view is that where there is an admiralty district, for that district the Governor in Council has the right to appoint a judge, a registrar and a marshal, and has no more power than that. Under the law, as it stands, the Governor in Council has the right to appoint a judge for the admiralty district of Quebec, with the registrar at the city of Quebec. That is the exclusive power now vested in the Governor in Council. Provision is made in this Bill, that if at some future time an Admiralty Court is created at Montreal, a local judge may be appointed to that court, and a registrar. I am clearly of the opinion that the law provides merely for the appointment of one judge for that district, as it does for the appointment of one marshal and one registrar. Taking section 6 in conjunction with section 17 of the Admiralty Act, and the general scope of the Act, I cannot come to any other conclusion.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). With all deference to the opinion of my hon. friend, I simply suggest that you do not find in the language of section 6 of the Admiralty Act, which contains the enabling power, any restriction at all. That section provides that the Governor in Council may, from time to time, appoint any judge of a Superior Court or County Court, or any barrister of not less than seven years standing, to be a local judge in admiralty of the Exchequer Court in and for any admiralty district. I do not think there is any restriction there. My hon. friend refers to section 17, but, all that does is to constitute the districts, and that does not limit section 6. It is possible that I may be mistaken.

Mr. HAGGART. In the province of Ontario, a lot of County Court judges are given admiralty jurisdiction. The districts may be set apart, but I doubt it very much. I think that these judges are simply given admiralty jurisdiction over the whole province of Ontario. There is, perhaps, half a dozen judges who have that jurisdiction.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would suggest to the hon. Minister of Marine that it would be better to have the changes printed, and reconsidered again in committee.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I hope my hon. friend will not press that suggestion. We will have the Bill reprinted, and, on the third reading, we can have a full discussion. The First Minister is anxious to have the Bill put through as early as possible, and it has been pretty well threshed out last night and to-day. I am anxious to facilitate the passage of the Bill, so as to have it reach the Senate in good time.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Do you think that by pressing it through committee now you will facilitate its passage?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, we can discuss it again on the third reading.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You cannot go into all these details. A very important point has been raised, on which two very eminent leading gentlemen in this House, for whose opinions we have great respect, do not agree.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If this Bill be reprinted, it will be just as it is before the House now.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend will not lose a day by acceding to our request. The Bill can be reprinted, and be before the House on Monday. We do not want to delay the third reading, but, we do not want to go out of committee before we have settled all these details.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Let us then adopt this clause and have it printed, and we will then go into committee again.

Mr. FOSTER. We can discuss, then, the clause again.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We can discuss the whole Bill in committee.

Section agreed to, and the committee rose and reported progress.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 114) respecting the Toronto Hotel Company.—(Mr. Osler.)

Bill (No. 109) to incorporate the Manitoba and North Shore Railway Company.—(Mr. Dymont.)

Bill (No. 101) respecting the Nipissing and James Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Klock.)

Bill (No. 83) respecting the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company.—(Mr. Flint.)

RELIEF OF J. W. ANDERSON.

On the motion to go into committee on Bill (No. 108), to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of J. W. Anderson.—(Mr. Cargill.)

Mr. JOHN McALISTER (Restigouche). Mr. Speaker, this Bill is for the purpose of granting a continuation of the term of Letters Patent which were issued to one James Anderson, and which were allowed to lapse through the fact that Mr. Anderson had inadvertently failed to make certain payments to the Commissioner of Patents within the time limited by law. It was shown by evidence, when the Bill was before the committee, however, that a man by the name of Sheldon acquired certain rights in this patent from the fact that he manufactured the article which was the subject of the patent during the time of the lapse thereof and up to the present time. When the Bill was before the committee, as hon. gentlemen who were present remember, an important discussion took place as to the exact meaning of section 2 of the Bill. It was thought by some, that, notwithstanding the passing of this Bill, certain rights which were acquired by Mr. Sheldon from the fact of his having manufactured, or sold the pump, for which the patent mentioned was granted, remained, and that it was not competent for Mr. Anderson to prevent him manufacturing and selling the same hereafter, notwithstanding the passing of this Act. I have looked carefully into this section since then, and I must say that I have grave doubts as to the power of Anderson to prevent Sheldon from manufacturing this article, and a number of legal gentlemen whom I have consulted on the point, have expressed the same doubts that I entertain myself. In order to remove those doubts I think it is better to have this Bill referred back to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills. I therefore beg to move :

That the order be discharged and that Bill (No. 108) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of J. W. Anderson be referred back to the special standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Mr. Speaker, I do not think this is fair. This clause, to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. McAlister) refers, is a protective clause to protect the rights of those who have acquired certain rights under the old patent after the patent has expired. The Bill before the House is one introduced on behalf of a patentee, asking that rights which he once had and which have elapsed should be revived. But, in the meantime, after his rights had lapsed by his own negligence, certain parties acquired certain rights. There is a clause which has always been adopted by committees and by this House protecting those who have acquired these lapsed rights, which clause is in this Bill. There have been many Bills, I am told, at least twenty, within my own knowledge, passed with identically the same clause in them, and the same phraseology protecting the rights of those who have acquired rights, the rights having been acquired during the time that the patent did not exist. Now, the hon. gentleman moves to refer this Bill back to the committee for the purpose of taking away the rights—

Mr. McALISTER. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES—which a man may have acquired when the patent was not in existence and bringing the old patent into existence. In respect to bringing the old patent into existence again there was no very serious division in the committee, because after hearing the evidence the committee determined that they would be disposed to bring the patent into existence again. They brought it into existence again. I do not understand why the ordinary form protecting the rights of those who had used the patent during the interregnum between the time of the expiration of the patent and the bringing of it into force again should be altered. The majority of the committee thought we had better keep to the old form which had been used.

Mr. McALISTER. But these are extraordinary circumstances.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is nothing extraordinary in this case.

Mr. McALISTER. It is unusual ; the evidence shows it.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is not a thing extraordinary about it. The patentee had certain rights, he had allowed them to lapse by reason of his own negligence, he came to the committee and said : Through inadvertence I should not be deprived of my rights ; I ought to have my patent revived, and the committee said : All right, we will revive it, but, those who have acquired rights in the meantime by reason of your negligence must not be prejudiced, and there is a certain form which has always been used by the House and by the committee protecting these rights. The hon. gentleman seeks to refer this Bill back to the committee in order that that form may be altered and that the rights acquired by a private person shall be taken away.

Mr. McALISTER. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is very unfair. I cannot for the life of me see why this patentee should seek a special privilege or right which any other patentee has not got.

Mr. PRIOR. What difference does this clause make to the original patentee ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. For instance, suppose that the patent expired on the 25th of September, then there was no patent in existence. On the 26th of September a man began to manufacture and he manufactured for five months, as in this case. The patentee who had lost his patent by reason of his own negligence comes and asks parliament to revive his patent. Parliament says : We will revive your patent, but we must not prejudice the rights of those who have, by manufacture or user, acquired any rights, and we must protect their rights. I will not say what these rights are. This has been the form used in every Bill of this kind which has come before this House, but the hon. gentleman says : I will modify that form and say that this party shall not have any rights. If the law gives him rights in that patent, by reason of his user or manufacture, are you going to take them away by law ? I say it is most unfair, and I submit to the House that it is better for us to continue granting him the privilege and the concession which he asks for in the same way and subject to the same conditions as similar favours have been granted to every other man who has applied to this House for the last—I do not know how many years. Now, if you introduce a new principle and amend that protective clause by the insertion of words which take away from those who have acquired a right, you have to do it in all other cases, for those who have had Bills passed will immediately come in and say : Give us this clause and take away rights from those who have acquired them, the same as you did in this case. I do not think that is good policy. I think we had better adhere to the language that we have always used. If A, B or C has acquired, in the meantime when the patent did not exist, any rights large or small, leave them to him, and do not take them away.

Mr. FOSTER. What kind of rights?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. When the patent expired A begins to sell the patented article, he begins to manufacture it for one month or two months, or, as in this case, for five months, until the original patentee applies to renew his patent. Then his right may lapse or it may not. I do not know what the law may be. He may have acquired a personal right to continue to use that patent. As regards the rest of the public they cannot use it when the patent is revived. Now, the proposal of my hon. friend is not only that the general public shall be excluded from using this patent, but that the man who may have been a user for five months, and has acquired a right shall be deprived of that right. I say that is what we have never done before, it is an entirely novel principle, and if you adopt it here you will have to adopt it in regard to all patents in the past which you have revived, and in regard to all which you may revive hereafter. I think this gentleman ought to be satisfied with the language which has been used in the Patent Extension Acts that have been passed heretofore.

Mr. BERGERON. Does the hon. gentleman know whether the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. McAlister) has any better argument to bring out than was brought out in committee when this Bill was discussed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think it would be unfair to say the matter was discussed in committee, because it was only mentioned in committee towards the close, when somebody asked: What is the meaning and effect of that proviso? Does it prohibit a man who has used the patent for five months from continuing to use it? Some thought it might, and some thought it might not. What I was concerned with was to preserve the legal rights which both parties had just as they were. If a man by user, by manufacture, by sale, has acquired certain rights, don't take them away from him. The public who have not acquired them of course has no ground of complaint when the patent was continued, and they are prohibited from using it in the future. But if a man has acquired a right, it does not seem to me fair to take it away from him.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe.) I understood at the time that the object of the petitioner was to be placed in the same position he would have occupied had not his patent expired on the 9th of September last. Now, the clause referred to reads this way:

That any person who has, within the period between the 9th day of September, 1899, and the extension hereunder of the said letters patent, acquired by assignment, user, manufacture or otherwise, any interest or right in respect of such improvement or invention, shall continue to enjoy the same as if this Act had not been passed.

To my mind the word 'assignment' is perfectly in place, because if the patentee made any assignment of his rights after the 9th of September last to any person, it would be unfair that the person to whom he had sold such rights by assignment should lose them. Let us take the words 'user, manufacture or otherwise.' Now, I submit that those words mean that if, after the 9th of September, the date of the expiry of the patent, by failure to renew, any person has been manufacturing articles under this patent of the kind intended, or has been enjoying any rights otherwise than by an assignment, he would be in this position, that he shall continue to enjoy the same as if this Act had not been passed, that is, that he shall enjoy those rights from the passage of this Act for all time provided he can show that he was manufacturing the article between the 9th of September and the present date. I suggest that the following words be added:

But such user or manufacture of rights otherwise possessed, save under assignment, shall not prevail after the passage of this Act.

If these words were added to the clause, the patentee would have a perfect right as against the whole world, except as to any person to whom he might give the right by assignment in writing during that period.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I think if that is a proper interpretation the clause should be left as it is. I recollect where a great deal of trouble arose in a case something of this nature, where the patent was allowed to lapse after a certain length of time and another party commenced manufacturing. It was in connection with mill machinery, and many people purchased it under the conviction that they had a perfect right to do so. But, after the patent being revived and litigation taking place over it, the question was finally decided in favour of the original patentee. Then he notified the people all over the country who were using this particular piece of machinery, and made them pay large sums for using it, when they were innocent purchasers of what they had a perfect right to purchase. That will practically be the result in this case.

Mr. J. G. HAGGART (South Lanark). The clause as passed by the committee has a far greater scope than has been mentioned. According to these words, 'extension hereunder of the said letters patent acquired by assignment, user, manufacture or otherwise,' the whole general public, after the 9th of September, have acquired the right of manufacture and user of the patent. If you leave in the words 'or otherwise' there is no use whatever in giving him a renewal of his patent.

Mr. B. RUSSELL (Halifax). My impression is that the committee did not pass this Bill in the shape in which they intended to pass it, and it is only for that reason that I would agree to the motion of my hon. friend to refer it back to the Private Bills Committee. I think it is possible that if the argument that has been addressed to this Committee by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, were addressed to the Private Bills Committee, I might find myself in accord with that argument. But I think the majority of that committee were not in accord with those views, and that they intended that the party who was now manufacturing this article, should, after the passing of this measure, be obliged to pay a royalty to the inventor of the machine. The probabilities are that the way in which that section is at present drafted will prevent the former owner of the patent from charging or collecting any royalty from the present manufacturer of the article, for the machines that he will hereafter make. It is a debatable question whether he ought to collect any royalty: it is a debatable question whether the man who is now manufacturing ought not to continue to have the right to manufacture. But my conviction is that the majority of that committee did not take that view, and were not of that opinion, and that they thought that if this manufacturer escaped being called upon to pay royalty for the five or six months during which the patent had lapsed, he would be very fortunate. For the reason that the Bill at present does not embody the feelings of the majority of the committee, I am of the opinion that it ought to be re-considered by the committee. When the clause was being read at the close of the sitting of the committee, I asked several times for my own information, what it meant and nobody could tell what it meant, and I gave expression to the mild suggestion that it would be desirable that we should understand the meaning of the clause we were adopting.

Mr. SPROULE. If I understand the hon. gentleman, he would compel the party to pay a royalty after the patent is revived.

Mr. RUSSELL. For any machines he makes after that, but not for any at present made.

Mr. SPROULE. What would the hon. gentleman do with an innocent purchaser, who had purchased these machines?

Mr. RUSSELL. Do you mean purchased the right to manufacture?

Mr. SPROULE. No, the machines.

Mr. HAGGART.

Mr. RUSSELL. He could sell the article, but he could not sell the right. There was no invention, and, therefore, no invention could be sold after the patent lapsed, but he could sell the article after manufacture. No one pretends that there should be any royalty paid for any of these machines that have been manufactured during the period which the patent had lapsed.

Mr. SPROULE. That is what happened in the case I cited.

Mr. RUSSELL. That would be a monstrous result to follow and I assume that no one would ever assent to that. The question is whether it is intended by this provision to absolutely take away with one hand, what was given with the other in the first section of the Bill. I am confident that the Bill, as it stands, does not express the opinion of the majority of the committee, and that is why I wish it to go back. It may be that the majority will think that the views of the minister (Sir Louis Davies) are right, when they are heard, but they have not been passed upon by the committee.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). I assume that the committee knew what they were doing and if that be the case, I do not see why they should have the chance of looking into it again. My own view of the matter is, that it is a revival of a patent so as to put the owner back in the position he was, before it lapsed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). But if a man finding that the patent had lapsed, innocently went into the manufacture of the article, built a large factory and acquired property as he had a perfect right to do, will it be contended that the passing of this Act would put the owner of the patent in a position to clear him out.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). If rights that had been recognized in law had been acquired by any parties, then when this Act is passed, it puts the owner of the patent in a position against the whole world who did not acquire rights, but as against the man who did acquire rights the owner never ought to have an opportunity of collecting tolls from him for all time to come. It is because of that that I will vote that we do not go back to committee.

Mr. FOSTER. Judging from the discussion, I think our wisest course is to send it back to the committee, who would debate this matter, and this time, I hope, fix the clause as they mean it.

Motion (Mr. McAllister) agreed to.

QUEBEC AND LAKE HURON RAILWAY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 112) to incorporate the Quebec and Lake Huron Railway Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) I suppose the Minister of Railways knows something about this proposal. It seems to be rather an ambitious railway that is projected, extending from the city of Quebec to French River on the Georgian Bay, with a capital stock of $10,000,000. Has the Minister of Railways satisfied himself that this is a bona fide company, which intends to build the railway and has sufficient capital to carry out the undertaking? Or is this simply a franchise granted for the purpose of speculation? I read over the names of the incorporators; I do not know whether they are substantial men or not; but I would like to have the opinion of the Minister of Railways, who must have looked into this project, as to the necessity for the road and the probability of its being built.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Bill was discussed before the Railway Committee, and gentlemen of reputation and standing appeared there and stated that these people desired the charter for the purpose of constructing the railway. We did not get them to turn out their pockets to see whether there was anything in them.

Mr. FOSTER. No, they will turn those out later.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We had assurances which satisfied the committee. It is not proposed to confer any rights on this company which will infringe on other rights. We limit the time within which the charter shall continue unless the work is proceeded with and carried to completion. I think every real public interest was thoroughly safeguarded, and no objection occurred to any member of the committee. We had a large committee when the Bill went through, and I think all were satisfied of the propriety of giving these gentlemen the charter they asked for, and I confess that I did not think there was any objection to our doing so. These gentlemen were represented to us as persons of standing and means. It was stated to the committee that some of them were gentlemen of very strong financial standing. One of them was the president, or a very prominent member, of the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago. There were three or four American gentlemen of reputation and wealth, whose names are mentioned here. One gentleman was present at the meeting of the committee, and he impressed the committee to such an extent that there was no objection to the passing of the Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Have any surveys been made of this road at all?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think not.

Mr. FOSTER. That is, there is no line mapped out at all.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, they had a map.

Mr. FOSTER. They had a map of the country with a line drawn across it, I suppose; but there were no surveys?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We do not require surveys before granting charters.

Mr. FOSTER. I see that they have a bonding power of $30,000 a mile for the railway and its branches.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes. If it is built, it will be a very costly road.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course, the committee has passed the Bill, but I would like to dissent from the doctrine stated by the Minister of Railways, that he did not think there was any reason for an objection to these franchises being given by this House, provided only they were asked for, and that the very fact that a number of gentlemen come and ask for a franchise to build a railway anywhere in this country, so long as it does not take up the ground of any other railway, is a sufficient reason why it should be granted. It seems to me that these railway franchises are worth something; if they are not, they would not be sought after; and the Minister of Railways as the head of the railway interests of the country ought to satisfy himself, when a franchise is asked for, that there is some ground for believing that the work will be gone on with, that there is a necessity for it, that there is something in the way of a survey or information which will prove to his satisfaction that it is a feasible as well as a desirable work. If we go on the principle of simply granting a franchise because it is asked for, and put into the hands of irresponsible men, charter-mongers, as we have done in the past, and as I dare say we shall do in the future, if we continue to act on this principle, I certainly think it is not a good principle. Here is a band of road which traverses the whole province of Quebec, and a part of the province of Ontario; and so far as I can learn not a scrap of information has come to the minister in the way of survey, topographical or otherwise, or to show the bona fide of the company. He simply says that inasmuch as these people apply for this franchise, and it does not interfere with anybody else's franchise, it ought to be granted. I think the country is in a mood to ask that a little more care be exercised in the granting of great public franchises, especially to railway promoters. I think it is right that the country should grow into that mood more and more. The older the country grows, the more careful we ought to be in this parliament not to give great public franchises in the hands of persons who simply intend to sell them out and pocket the money, entirely oblivious of the country's interests. That sentiment is growing, and ought to grow in the country, and this parliament is old enough now to be more careful as to the way it grants indiscriminately these great railway franchises.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman has woken up very late in the day to the necessity of having all these matters looked into and studied so closely. The principle he now advocates, is one which he had ample opportunity in times past, to ventilate in this House, when he was in the position of exercising greater influence on its legislation. I am not prepared to say that gentlemen who, we have reason to believe, from statements made to us by responsible persons, members of parliament, are men of standing, means and character in the communities where they reside, when they come before us, asking for a charter, are solely actuated by speculative purposes. I think, on the contrary, that we are fairly entitled to assume that they have some intention of prosecuting the work they undertake to perform, and I think we would scarcely be acting prudently or fairly if we were to conclude that they were not intending to act in good faith in the matter. I do not know of any reason why we should particularly select this application and try it upon the principle the hon. gentleman suggests, while treating all other Bills that come before us on a different principle. I would like to suggest to the hon. gentleman that the Railway Committee do not recognize me as having absolute authority to dictate what they should do.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. gentleman has had ample experience, that they do not.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I grant it. At every meeting of the Railway Committee, I take occasion, when I think it is proper, to express a decided opinion upon any Bill that may happen to be before it, on which I feel warranted in expressing such an opinion, but it does not follow, by any means, that my opinion shall be accepted by the committee. Other people have just as much right to their opinion, as I have to mine, and are as well entitled to express it. But what the hon. gentleman is doing is trying to discover some ground on which he can find fault with my action and select me to bear the weight of his ponderous condemnation. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman, who is a member of that committee, that he should attend its meetings, and try to what extent he can succeed in impressing on it this mode of dealing with the applications before it for charters, which he has now awakened to the conviction is the proper mode, and see how far his opinions will prevail. I do not think he will get very far. I do not see any reason why, when responsible gentlemen come to us and ask for a charter to build a railway through a portion of country which is entirely unoccupied, which is practically without railways, and the granting of which charter will not interfere in the slightest degree with any existing privilege—I see no reason why we may not assume, from the character of the applicants, that they intend to act in good faith, or why we should treat them in a different way from all other applicants. I am told that the name of the gentleman who was here before the committee, is Mr. Nichol. I believe that he is a gentleman from Detroit of very large means, and he made a very fair statement. I am reminded now by my hon. friend to my left, that he was prepared to have given a much more elaborate statement, but the committee were satisfied on all sides and they passed the Bill without dissent. I have not said that it is not the privilege of hon. members to find fault with the action of the Railway Committee, but I think that members of the committee, at all events, who hold the views which the hon. gentleman at this time of the day holds, ought to make it a point to attend the meetings of the committee and impress, if they can, those views upon it. I do not know a single individual whose name is incorporated in this charter. I am only going on representation made in the committee at that time, and am not disposed, though I do not know these gentlemen, to treat them any differently than the committee has treated in times past, other gentlemen in the same position, who were asking for similar charters.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not intend to assent to the principle laid down, and the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs and the Railway Committee in which he has any influence, will never grow much better on these matters, so long as he takes the peculiar line of advocacy that he does.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is your opinion?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has come out boldly and strongly and said in so many words, that he does not consider any care ought to be taken at all, when we are disposing of the great franchises of the country. I think, on the contrary, that great care should be taken. The hon. gentleman says that I should attend the meetings of the committee and look after these matters there. So I should; I should be everywhere at once, although it is difficult to be in more than one place at the same time. But whether I was there or not, I have not forfelted my right to make objections when the matter comes before the House.

Anybody knows that these great public franchises are sought on one or two considerations. Either for the legitimate purpose of building railways and other transport systems and working them, or for the purposes of speculation. Either they are sought by persons who intend in good faith to carry out their undertaking, or by others who have some scheme or other, by which they think they can make money. What is it that gives the latter the position of making money? Simply by the Railway Committee and this parliament giving to them an immense franchise, large bonding powers, and a corporate capacity, so that they may hold what they may consider a fairly good speculative position and be enabled to raise money in one or two ways—either by going on with the construction to a certain extent, or what is better, by simply selling out their franchise to some people willing to construct the road. We had an instance of this last year, and that is what gives point to my criticism. Last year we had a somewhat warm discussion over a road which was chartered from Edmonton to the Pacific Ocean, and over a subsidy which was given to some sixty miles of that road. The ground I took on that occasion was, that all the facts in the case pointed to this, that the gentlemen who were getting the franchise—a very important one, a franchise to build a road to cross the Yellow Head Pass, the only available route from Edmonton to the Pacific Ocean—were not gentlemen who intended to construct or operate that road after it was constructed, but gentlemen reputable enough in themselves in every way, who saw a good opportunity to make some money, if they could persuade the Minister of Railways, and then the Railway Committee, and then this House to give them this franchise, in the first place, and then to bonus a certain portion of the road afterwards. My representations were scouted by the hon. Minister of Railways, who declared that these men were undertaking, in good faith, a great railway enterprise, and would, no doubt, carry it through. Well, parliament had not been long out of session, when it was said in the Toronto Globe—I do not know with what truth, but the statement has never been denied—that these gentlemen who got that franchise, and who stood, therefore, in the gateway of a great undertaking, which all of us believed would be ultimately carried out, making another transcontinental railway, had sold out that franchise to the very men who were constructing the other part of that transcontinental railway. Well, now, if it is true—and it has not been denied, but, of course, you can get no information from the Minister of Railways and Canals about it, because he would not give the information about who were the proprietors or directors of the company when we were giving them a subsidy last year, and I have never found out from him or the government whether the franchises had been sold or not. He may say that we have no responsibility, that these people have a right to make as much money as they can, by our aid, and we have a right, without much criticism, to give them the choice places for railway construction, and give them subsidies in order that they may be in a better position to cry 'stand and deliver,' and sell the franchise they get for nothing for a large amount of money. I do not expect to get the information. But, I say that if it is true that the gentlemen who were treated in that way by the minister and the government last year have stood there and collected the toll of hundreds of thousands from the men who are bona fide going to build the line, then, this parliament did what it should not have done with a public franchise, which should have been kept for the public good and not handed over for the private advantage of a few individuals. It looks as if this were something of a similar kind. The minister has not a scrap of information as to this road, as to the topography of the country through which it is to be built, or as to the possibility of building it. He was satisfied simply when reputable gentlemen came and asked him for a franchise. I do not think that public franchises should be dealt out in that way. When men come asking for franchises of this kind, they ought to reasonably satisfy those who can grant these powers that they are bona fide asking powers which they are going to use. We have had instances in the past, and we shall have instances in the future, if we keep on in this way, the bad results of which become apparent afterwards and load this country with costly franchises, which do not tend to the better development of our transport facilities. Hon. gentlemen may think I am hypercritical, that I have broken out in a new spot all at once. But, I have stated these things before, and I expect to state them again. I believe that hon. gentlemen are finding that the people of this country are beginning to look with a jealous eye upon the indiscriminate bestowal of these great franchises with reference to our transport system. I have great faith in the Committee on Railways and Canals, because I am a member of it myself, and because the Minister of Railways and Canals is a member of it, and others. But, I have no hesitation in saying, to my own condemnation and that of the committee, that the carelessness displayed in the bestowal of these franchises is not at all creditable to the committee. That is largely because the committee is too unwieldy; it is largely because they have no system in their work; it is largely because, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the members go into the committee without a shred of information on a given Bill, and cannot get it—they work in the dark and have to work in the dark. What we want is a committee of experts who shall report upon every application that is made for a great public franchise, not only as to the feasibility of the enterprise which is about to be undertaken, but, also as to the bona fides of the parties and the probable cost of the work, and so, give that committee information which can actually put it in a position to give a proper franchise when it is reasonable to give it. I am not charging anything for my criticism of the Minister of Railways and Canals, or the government, or the House. I am condemning myself as a member of that Railway Committee, just as I am condemning others. But, I acknowledge my faults here this night, and I think that hon. members on both sides may well acknowledge their faults in this respect.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I am glad that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has been driven, at last, to acknowledge his faults. One would think, from his ordinary speech, that he was absolute perfection. He has been in the House for eighteen or twenty years; and now, for the first time since I have been in the House and a member of the Railway Committee, he formulates these views and lays down this very excellent rule for the guidance of the committee. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that he devote a little more thought to this question. Judging from his style of addressing the House, it is a much larger question than he has any suspicion of. He is in the habit of rushing to conclusions, of jumping to his feet and delivering himself ex cathedra, laying down philosophical principles, and speaking as though he himself were the sum of all the virtues. Let him just apply that penetrating, analytical mind, that gigantic intellect of his, to this question, and let him tell the committee the next time they meet how they shall work out the propositions he makes, how he would propose that the committee should assure itself of the bona fides of respectable gentlemen who come and ask for a charter. Shall we require an affidavit from each of them that they intend to prosecute the work? Or will a statutory declaration satisfy the hon. gentleman? Or does he wish a certificate of character from the mayor of the town in which they reside? What class of evidence would satisfy the hon. gentleman, in the present condition of his mind, as to the bona fides of these people? There are a large number of things he would have to think of pretty well before he could dispose haphazard of the various applications that come before the committee from time to time. I am convinced that the committee might use a little more care and be a little more rigid in enforcing its own rules in regard to charters generally. I have endeavoured, in my inefficient and humble way, to suggest to the committee, from time to time, things that I thought might be done; I have endeavoured to impress my views upon them on many occasions, but, often without effect. But, I am satisfied the committee have rules enough to assure a satisfactory degree of safety in dealing with charters that are applied for. It is because the committee often does not insist upon the observance of its own rules, perhaps, that we lay ourselves open to criticism. But, I do not think it lies in the mouth of any member of the committee to sit in judgment and assume an attitude of criticism with respect to his fellow-members on the committee. I think all have sinned in that regard, and often with a good deal of excuse, because they are satisfied that things are all right, and, in the urgency of business, they desire to facilitate rather than delay these Bills.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I am pleased to know that, even at this late hour, some hon. members of the House have waked up to what I have always regarded as their duty. As a member of the Railway Committee for several years, I have brought up the same question and pointed to the rules, which provided that before a Bill should be concluded in the committee. According to the rules, there must be a map of a certain size put up showing the way the railway proposes to run, its relation to other railways, and some kind of cursory survey of the country through which it would pass, and satisfactory evidence to the committee that there was a desire to build the railway, and, also, that the parties who had it in charge were able to finance the scheme. These were conditions absolutely necessary, in the judgment of those who revised the rules. But, I regret to say, that I got very little assistance from the members of the committee, including the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). I can only say that among several members it got to be a standing joke that I should ask to have the rules followed as closely as possible. I think we have fallen into a lax way of dealing with Bills in that committee. For years we have been giving charters without rhyme or reason, and putting them into the hands of people who held up other corporations afterwards, and used them for the purpose of making money. I have thought that we have been very derelict in our action in that committee, and I am in favour, as far as possible, of enforcing the rules. But I regret to say that I have not received that assistance which I think I am entitled to get from older members of the committee.

The hour for private Bills having expired, the committee rose.

THE CRIMINAL CODE.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 137)—from the Senate—further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.—(Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

(In the Committee).

Mr. FOSTER. I have to say that two of my colleagues, the hon. member for St. Ann's, Montreal (Mr. Quinn) and the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) were obliged to leave town this morning, and before going they asked me to prevail on the good nature of the Solicitor General not to go on with the Bill to-day, as they desire to be present to discuss it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

LAND TITLES ACT.

Mr. JAMES SUTHERLAND (North Oxford) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 139), to amend the Land Titles Act, 1894.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The reason for this amendment is that at present the records in each of the land titles offices contain entries of all writs that have been filed in the office since the 1st of January, 1887, the date of the adoption of the Torrens system of registration in the North-west Territories. This causes unnecessary trouble and expense to those who have to search the records of the office. The legal gentlemen in the House will understand that in searching the title the sheriff is not required to notify the registrar appointed under that system of the release by payment or otherwise of any execution against the land. For that reason the registrar is unable to give a clear certificate of title to the parties interested. This amendment provides that the sheriff shall furnish to the registrar a record of all executions, writs or claims that may stand against the land, so that on examination of the title the registrar shall be able to tell just what liens or claims there are against the lands. It is for the purpose of expediting the search and avoiding the expense, delay and trouble that now exists when people have occasion to transfer property.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). This amendment has been made at the desire of the profession in the North-west Territories. They have long wished to have this amendment which simplifies procedure and at the same time curtails expense.

Mr. J. G. HAGGART (South Lanark). I would like to ask the hon. acting Minister of the Interior if the word 'writ' means a judgment registered against the land.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand that it does. When a writ has been issued and filed in the registry office it is a lien against the land. I may mention that these are the same words as were used in the previous Act.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not think that the word 'writ' used in the phrase 'every writ shall cease to bind or affect land' would mean a judgment registered against the land.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). The only writ that would have an effect on land would be a writ of attachment, which is sometimes issued for the purpose of binding land owing to a person absconding from the province. There may be some provision in the North-west Territories that I do not know about.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the old Act this language is used. The hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is quite right in saying that the registrars, judges and members of the profession have requested this amendment to be made.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the interpretation of 'writ'?

Mr. HAGGART. The interpretation in the general Act would give the meaning of the word 'writ.'

Mr. B. RUSSELL (Halifax). The section of the Act which this clause amends says that there may be a writ of execution, or other writ, put upon the land. I infer that there must be some such procedure in the North-west Territories as the hon. acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) refers to. We cannot go wrong if we use, in amending a section, the same expression as is used in the Act that we are amending.

Mr. DAVIN. If the attention of the committee is directed to the clause which it is intended to amend, hon. gentlemen will see at once that the amendment is desirable. The clause reads as follows:

The sheriff, or other duly qualified officer, after delivery to him of any execution or other writ affecting land, if a copy of such writ has not already been delivered or transmitted to the registrar, shall, on payment to him of 50 cents by the execution creditor named therein, provided the said writ is in force, forthwith deliver or transmit by registered letter to the registrar a copy of the writ and of all endorsements thereon certified under his hand and seal of office, if any; and no land shall be bound by any such writ until the receipt by the registrar for the registration district in which such land is situated, of a copy thereof, either prior to this Act, under the law then in force or subsequent hereto; but from and after the receipt by him of such copy no certificate of title shall be granted, and no transfer, mortgage, encumbrance, lease or other instrument executed by the execution debtor of such land, shall be effectual except subject to the rights of the execution creditor, under the writ, while the same is legally in force; and the registrar on granting a certificate of title, and on registering any transfer, mortgage or other instrument executed by the execution debtor affecting such land, shall be memoranda upon the certificate of title in the registrar and on the duplicate issued by him, express that such certificate, transfer, mortgage or other instrument is subject to such rights.

Then the subsection runs as follows :

The registrar shall keep a book in convenient form in which shall be entered according to the dates when respectively received, a record of all copies of writs received by him from the sheriff or other officer as aforesaid, whether so received prior to this Act or subsequent thereto; and such book shall be kept indexed, showing, in alphabetical order, the names of the persons whose lands are affected by such writs, with the day and hour and minute of such receipt.

Then the proposed amendment follows :

Provided that every writ shall cease to bind or affect land at the expiration of two years from the date of the receipt thereof by the registrar of the district in which the land is situated, unless before the expiration of such period of two years a renewal of such writ is filed with the registrar in the same manner as the original is required to be filed with him.

The object is to prevent writs that are obsolete encumbering land that really ought to be free.

On section 2,

Mr. DAVIN. I would ask you to read the section, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Sections 1 and 2 are really for the same object.

Mr. DAVIN. I know that, but I would like to have the Chairman read the clause.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The object of that is to compel the sheriff to notify the registrar.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, that is all right.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know what this phrase means :

Thenceforth such land or portion of land shall be deemed to be absolutely released and discharged from the writ.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Whenever the land is released the sheriff notifies the registrar.

Mr. DAVIN. What the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) has just referred to is in the old Act.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, but it seems a curious thing that on the expiration of the writ the land shall be absolutely discharged. Could you, by a renewal of the writ, bring the same land under the operation of a judgment.

Mr. DAVIN. Of course the object of the Land Titles Act is to simplify the transfer of real estate and also to place you in the position that you can go to the registry office and find out absolutely how real estate stands. Having got the certificate of the registrar as to the exact condition of that real estate, once it has passed from one party to another, there is no danger of any further litigation.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) mistakes my meaning. Suppose there is a writ in the sheriff's hands against land in the North-west Territories. The writ expires by law at the end of two years. It has to be renewed at the end of two years. Suppose it is not renewed at the end of two years can a party, in the absence of any renewal bind this land ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Not after the memorandum has been filed. After the memorandum has been filed, under this section, thenceforth the land is to be absolutely released.

Mr. HAGGART. Then there is no possible renewal of the claim of the judgment creditor against the land except proceedings be begun de novo. From the time it is withdrawn until the renewal, I should say the land should be absolutely discharged. Has the judgment creditor no remedy at all of enforcing a claim against the land even by a renewal after the expiration of the writ ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In the ordinary course the writ would have to be renewed before the expiration.

On section 3,

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand there is no municipal system in the Territories, and I propose to amend the section by striking out the words 'mayor or reeve' and inserting the words 'officer of the school district or municipality by whom said sale was authorized or his successor in office.' I would also strike out the word 'municipalities' and substitute 'schools or an ordnance respecting municipalities respectively.' This amendment was suggested by Judge McGuire since the Bill has been before the House who pointed out that there is no municipal organization there as in the other provinces.

Mr. HAGGART. Suppose the sheriff sold lands worth $10,000, and there were only five or six persons at the place, and they agreed to divide it among themselves for the taxes, how would this clause provide against collusion at such a sale ?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This is to obviate the difficulty and expense in the present law in furnishing to the judge proof which he must have before he can grant an order confirming the sale for taxes. This amendment has been suggested by the judges and by the profession and is considered quite sufficient to protect all parties. Previously certain unnecessary details had to be proved, and which only could be procured at very great expense. This amendment requires notice and such evidence as would satisfy the judge that no unfairness can be done to the owner of the land.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This is not so much confirming the sale of land for taxes as enabling the judge when notice is given to the opposite party calling on him to show cause why it should not be concurred in. The owner must be notified to show anything against the sale confirmed.

Mr. HAGGART. What is the object of confirming it if all the proceedings are irregular.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The object is plain to any lawyer, because if you went into court you would have to prove your title and a number of other things. Under this you must give notice to the owner to show cause why it should not be confirmed.

Mr. HAGGART. I understand the Act with reference to titles in land, and that all particulars must be given to a judge before a clear title is issued. But this is a special case and this Act evidently enables the judge to confirm the title, notwithstanding any irregularity in the proceedings.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is in default of the owner showing no cause after having received notice.

On section 4,

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the Land Titles Act of 1894, no saving clause was inserted to provide for actions which were taken previous to the time the Torrens system came into force; and this is to provide for those cases.

Mr. HAGGART. It is not to affect suits pending?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is it.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 154), to amend the Loan Companies Act, Canada, 1899.

Mr. DAVIN. What is the character of this Bill?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is designed merely to make a verbal alteration in the Loan Companies Act of last session. The word 'franchise' is used frequently in that Act, and it is proposed to strike out that word. For instance, the Act of last session provides that a company to be incorporated under it may acquire the franchises and assets of any existing company. It has been ascertained that a provincial company cannot transfer its franchise; therefore this amendment is to strike out the word 'franchise' wherever it occurs. The Bill is for no other purpose.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. HAGGART. Under the Dominion Act it is doubtful whether a company has power to mortgage its franchise. Under this Act you give to provincial companies the right to mortgage and transfer their franchises. I intended at one time to ask the hon. Minister of Finance to introduce a short Bill to give to Dominion companies, like electric companies, the power to mortgage their franchises as well as their other property. As you are now giving that power to provincial companies, why not extend it to all?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That might be done later. It is not touched by this Bill.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—BROCKVILLE AND WEST HURON ELECTIONS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). It may be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that early in the present session I had a notice upon the Order paper with reference to the report of the committee of last year, to which had been referred the matter of an inquiry into the West Huron and Brockville elections.

In order that I may make it clear to the House that I lost no opportunity of bringing this matter to the attention of the House, I may refer to the facts that this session of parliament opened on the 1st of February, that the Committee on Privileges and Elections was appointed on the 9th of February—that was on Friday; that on the following Tuesday, I gave notice in the House that I would move the next day to have this matter brought up and dealt with as a matter of privilege. On Wednesday, the 14th of February, I took that course. I brought this matter up, as a question of privilege, and asked to have the report of the committee and the evidence taken during the previous session referred again to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. On that occasion, you declared Sir, that it would be necessary to give a formal notice of motion, and that the matter at that time could not be dealt with as a matter of privilege, although it had been dealt with as such during the previous session. Accordingly, on the same day, the 14th of February, I placed a notice on the Order paper in the ordinary way. The Committee on Privileges and Elections had not then been organized or a chairman appointed, and it was not organized or a chairman appointed until the following Tuesday, the 20th of February. On the 26th of February, motions were called, and when I proposed to deal with this matter as an unopposed motion, the right hon. the leader of the House insisted that it should stand, and it did stand as an opposed motion. On that same day, on the motion to adjourn, I brought the matter to the attention of the leader of the government, and asked that this particular motion should be expedited. On the 27th of February, the following day, the right hon. gentleman moved that government business should have precedence on Thursdays, and I then made a further request that before such a motion passed, we should have some understanding that an important motion of this character should be expedited. Nothing further was done or said with regard to my proposed motion until the 14th of March, which was on Wednesday, when the right hon. the leader of the House declined to take up unopposed motions first, for the reason that he thought unfair criticism had been made with respect to his action on the 26th of February. On the 19th of March, which was Monday, unopposed motions were taken first by consent, and the right hon. gentleman again insisted that this motion should stand as an opposed motion, and I accordingly dropped it. After that, on Thursday, 22nd of March, the House, instead of going into Committee of Supply, was occupied with a motion brought on by the hon. Postmaster General respecting workmen's wages on government contracts. On the following day, the 23rd of March, Friday, the hon. the Minister of Finance made his budget speech, and the debate upon his motion on that occasion was not concluded until Friday, the 4th of May, one week ago. Since that time the House has not gone into supply, and I therefore have had no opportunity of bringing forward this matter in any effective way. I now take this, Sir, as the first opportunity of doing so, and I only regret that I have to do so at so late an hour and before so thin a House. However, the presentment which I have to make of the case is not a long one. In the first place, I may very briefly refer to what took place when I made a somewhat similar motion in regard to this matter last year. On that occasion, I submitted to this House certain propositions with respect to the powers of this House to deal with returning officers and deputy returning officers. I submitted to the House the language of Mr. Blake used in 1875, when he said :

He would be sorry to believe that the House had been deprived by the passing of the Controverted Elections Act of its power over returning officers and deputy returning officers, of its power to investigate complaints made against them and to punish them for improper conduct.

Mr. FIELDING.

I also referred to the language of the late Sir John Macdonald on the same occasion, in which he gave his view as follows :

He was glad the hon. member did not propose to ask the House to consider the point raised in the petition, that the election case was before another tribunal. At the same time, it was not to be supposed that the House had abandoned its right to control, censure and, if need be, punish returning and deputy returning officers.

I also referred to the language of the late Sir John Thompson, used in 1887, on the occasion when matters in connection with the Queen's County, N.B., election were brought before the House. Sir John Thompson on that occasion used the following language :

Notwithstanding the general operation of the principle that a man ought not to be punished twice for the same offence, it is a well-recognized principle that the enactment of various penalties sometimes has merely the effect of establishing cumulative penalties against the offender, and not substitutive penalties. The effect of that would be, in this instance, that a returning officer who offended against a provision of the Elections Act, would be, in the first instance, liable to the public for the wrong done to the public by indictment, or by any other suitable procedure, for an offence against the Elections Act, and he would, in addition to that, be liable for the pecuniary penalties which the Act declares may be recovered by any individual aggrieved, and notwithstanding the establishment of those penalties he might still be liable at the hands of parliament for contempt committed against its privileges. I might illustrate my view of this question by changing for a moment the offence for which the person at the Bar is charged, by supposing it was a case of libel, in order to give an illustration more familiar to the House. Assuming that you, Mr. Speaker, or any individual member of this House acting as such, had been libelled, it would be quite clear that the offender would be liable, first, to criminal prosecution for libel; second, to a civil suit, at the instance of the person aggrieved; and, third, the offender could be summoned for contempt against the privileges of this House. Under these circumstances, I, as one member of this House, entertain this view: that this House should persevere in the question proposed; and I only presume to express these opinions now because it may be convenient on both sides of the House, according as questions of law arise, that those conversant with such questions should express their opinions, and consequently, lead the House more clearly to a decision.

And I also referred to the language of the late Mr. Weldon, who for a number of years represented the constituency of St. John in this House, and who was a very eminent constitutional lawyer. On that occasion, referring to the matter then before the House, he said :

We are not trying Mr. Dunn at the Bar for penalties, but he is here simply for the purpose of interrogating him with respect to matters connected with the privileges of this House, and I fail to see that by the statute respecting election trials this House has divested itself of its ancient rights and privileges in that respect. While the judges are entrusted with the power of trying election petitions, a power conferred on them by parliament, parliament has not divested itself of the right to investigate into any subject. We find, not only by the cases referred to before the Committee on Elections, which are on the Journals of the House, but we are also aware that in many cases to which the learned counsel has alluded, the House of Commons of England has investigated election matters ever since the Election Act came into force. The person at the Bar is not being cited on any criminal charge. That is a fallacy on the part of the counsel.

And on the same occasion, the same hon. gentleman, later on in his speech, said :

In this case Mr. Dunn stands here as a witness, as a servant and officer of this House, for the purpose of offering explanations to this House for its information with respect, not merely to what took place in that particular election, but with regard to the public policy of retaining and maintaining in its efficiency, and in purity, honesty and uprightness, the election law of the land. It is not, therefore, a matter of this particular election, simply, but it is a matter affecting the public at large and the rights of the people, and, therefore, it seems to me that when it is put forth that this person is standing here subject to penalties, or that there is a second charge for a particular offence, I maintain that he does not stand charged with any offence, but that under the direction of the House he is brought to its Bar to give explanations as to his conduct.

And, on the same occasion, my hon. friend, the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), took the same view. He said :

The other point the learned counsel suggested was, that because certain penalties attached to an act of malfeasance on the part of a returning officer he may be punished for that act in the courts of the land, and that, therefore, parliament should not try his action at all here, is an argument which I think is unfounded, and for this reason : The penalties which the law prescribes for any act of misfeasance on the part of its officers, are penalties which are payable to any person who is individually damaged, and they can only be recovered by the person who alleged that he suffers that damage. If the gentleman who, we think, ought to have been returned in place of Mr. Baird, brought an action, it would be necessary for him first to institute a suit before the judges of the court, and only after we have a declaration by that court of his right to be returned could he maintain an action for damages. That action is one personal and peculiar to himself ; it does not affect the rights of the people, and it does not in any sense affect the privileges of the House, and, therefore, so far as Mr. Dunn is concerned, if Mr. Dunn was liable to damages at all, at any time, those damages cannot be recovered against him now, because the time for filing a petition has expired. I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind as to the jurisdiction of the House.

Now, Sir, on the occasion when I brought this matter before the House last year, the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), in dealing with my motion, used the following language :

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) has brought to the attention of the House one of the most important questions which can engage its attention. We have always held, in years past, and we are prepared to hold now, of course, that the purity of elections must be guarded at all costs and all hazards. It was our duty while we were sitting on the other side of the House, on more than one occasion, to bring delinquencies which had taken place in elections to the attention of the House, as to which, we thought, that the House, possibly in its action, did not always do itself the justice which it should have done. The question which has been brought up by the hon. gentleman involves one of facts. It refers to two elections, the Brockville election and the West Huron election. With regard to the West Huron election I am free to say, at once, that having heard the statement that the hon. gentleman has made, and which I understand he is prepared to substantiate upon his standing as a member of this House, he has made a prima facie case which, I say, without any hesitation, must go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. With regard to the Brockville election I must say that, in my estimation, the case which he has made out is very, very weak, if indeed he has made a case at all. But such is the sanctity of the ballot, such is the sanctity of the rights of the people which they must exercise, whenever they are called upon at the polls, that though, in my opinion, speaking here in behalf of the government, the case made out in regard to Brockville is more than weak, still the government will not offer any objection to the case also being referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I call attention to this for the reason that it does not seem to me that the right hon. leader of the House has had the same regard to the sanctity of the people's ballots and the sanctity of the people's rights during the present session, which he expressed on that occasion. I say that because, having regard to the procedure in similar matters which I shall bring to the attention of the House later, having regard to what I stated I could prove, and to what was proved before the Committee on Privileges and Elections during last session, I think it was the duty of the right hon. gentleman, as leader of the House and guardian of its rights and its honour, to have himself, on the earliest possible occasion, moved that this matter, which had been partly investigated before the Committee on Privileges and Elections last session, should be immediately referred to the committee this session, in order that the partially completed investigation might be proceeded with and completed. And, if the right hon. gentleman would enlighten the House as to the reasons which have induced him, during the present session, from time to time, to use the procedure of this House for the purpose of preventing me from making this motion, he will confer a favour upon a great many gentlemen in the House, who are somewhat curious as to what explanation he may have with regard to that matter. The right hon. gentleman did not content himself with using the language which I have already quoted, but he went on as follows :

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that there is no question which can to better advantage occupy the time of this House, than that we should guard and watch carefully over the rights of the people at the polls.

And yet, during the present session, when I was willing to have this motion go, as a matter of course, as an unopposed motion, in order that the investigation might be proceeded with promptly, before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I have witnessed, with astonishment, the right hon. gentleman, from time to time, in his place, take a course which, to my mind, could only be adopted with the intention of preventing this motion being brought on promptly, and at the proper time. Then he goes on, in the same speech last session, to say :

If wrong has been done in these elections nobody ought to be shielded. If any one has contravened the law, it is fair and right that this should be investigated, and that we should know now henceforth and for ever, that the will of the people must be expressed as the people wish to express it, however severe the consequences may be on one side or the other.

I may be mistaken, of course, as to the right hon. gentleman's views during the present session, but looking at the action he has taken, I would not regard him as now entertaining quite the same views as those expressed in the quotation I have just read. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), on the same occasion, was equally emphatic. He said, referring to myself, and to the speech which I delivered in this House on that occasion, and referring to it for the purpose of criticism :

I think it would have become him far better had he made a simple statement of the case and on its merits asked what he would have unquestionably have obtained at once, a full and complete reference of this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I fully subscribe to the doctrine that, even if you do not choose to go to the courts, this House has not divested itself, and should not divest itself, of control over its own officers. Sir, the government invite investigation.

That was the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on that occasion ; yet, nevertheless, the conduct of his leader, in which he has participated, does not seem to have invited, very promptly at least, any investigation during the present session. Now, it seems to me that for the purpose of having this motion adopted by the House, I need only do two things : In the first place, to read the last report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of last session ; and in the next place, to show that it is competent to again refer this matter to that committee, that there is authority for that course. It is possible, however, that in view of the opposition which, apparently, has been developed among gentlemen on the other side of the House, and particularly on the part of the leader of the House, I shall be obliged to go a little further and point out to the House some portions, at least, of the evidence which was adduced before the Committee on Privileges and Elections during the past session. The unanimous report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, made on August 8, 1899, is in the following words :

The Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections beg leave to present the following as their third report :

Your committee, under the order of reference made on the 9th day of July, 1899, have partially inquired into and investigated the conduct of the returning officer and of certain of the deputy returning officers at the last election for the electoral district of the west riding of the county of Huron.

That in so doing they have heard the testimony of ninety-nine witnesses, and have submitted interrogatories for the examination by the county court judge of the county of Huron of four witnesses ; that twenty-five sittings have been held for the purpose of taking evidence, covering seventeen days and comprising seventeen morning sessions and eight afternoon sessions ; that the committee determined to hold the last session for the examination of witnesses on Monday, the 7th day of August, 1899, and for that reason nine witnesses then in attendance for the purpose of giving evidence were discharged without examination ; twelve witnesses also failed to attend, and the attendance of three was countermanded. The proceedings of the committee being thus incomplete the committee do not feel warranted in reporting any conclusions.

Your committee therefore report herewith the evidence given by the witnesses who were examined, that the House may take such action thereon and as to continuing and completing the inquiry and investigation as may be deemed best, and they recommend that the said evidence and exhibits be printed for the use of the members of the House.

That indicates clearly that, with respect to the West Huron election, the investigation was only partially completed, and that the nine witnesses who were in attendance at the time when the committee ceased their work were sent home without being examined. It also indicates that, so far as the Brockville election is concerned, the committee were not able, at the close of the session, to take up that matter at all. The result, therefore, is that the investigation as to the West Huron election has not been completed, that witnesses have been called before the committee but not examined, and that other witnesses will be required to attend before the committee for the purpose of examination ; and that, so far as Brockville is concerned, the entire investigation still remains to be held.

Now, with regard to the course which is usually adopted in cases of this kind, there can be no doubt. I have references to some authorities on that point which I will lay before the House for the purpose of supporting my contention in that respect. In the first place, Sir John Bourinot, in his book on Parliamentary Procedure, at page 515, lays it down that this can be done. He says :

To place a committee in possession of all information necessary for inquiry, the House will order that reports and papers of a previous session be referred to the committee.

He also says :

Neither can a committee report the evidence taken before a similar committee in a previous session, except as a paper in the appendix, unless it receives authority from the House to consider it.

In volume 107 of the English Commons Journals, at page 177, there is a precedent which is very much to the point. It was there ordered in two cases, as follows :

That the minutes of the evidence taken before the select committee appointed in the last session of parliament to inquire into the present mode of assessing and collecting the income and property tax, and to consider whether any other system of levying the same, so as to render the tax more equitable, can be adopted, which were presented upon the 23rd day of this instant April, be referred to the Select Committee on Income and Property Tax.

The proceedings of a committee of the previous session were on that occasion referred to a committee of the then present session. In volume 129 of the English Commons Journals, at page 129, there is a similar precedent. It was there ordered :

That the minutes of the evidence taken before the Select Committee on Public Departments (purchases, &c.) in session 1873, be referred to the committee.

In the same volume, page 237, there is a similar case, where it was ordered :

That the report from Select Committee on Anchors, &c. (merchant service), in session 1860, and the report from the Select Committee on Chain Cables and Anchors Bill, in session 1864, be referred to the Select Committee on the Chain Cables and Anchors Bill.

In the Journals of the Senate of Canada of 1878, page 59, the same course was adopted. In that case, on motion of the Hon. Mr. Girouard, it was ordered :

That the minutes of evidence taken before the select committee appointed in the last session of parliament to inquire, amongst other matters, into all the questions relating to the purchase of the property at Fort William for a terminus to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses under oath, which were presented on April 27 last, with the report of said committee, be referred to a select committee composed of the Hon. Messrs. Scott and others, to continue the investigation and to inquire into all the questions relating to the purchase of the property at Fort William for a terminus to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to send for persons, papers and records, and examine witnesses under oath, and to report thereon with all convenient speed this session.

During the last session of this House, in 1899, at page 2480 of Hansard, we find that this House passed a resolution, on motion of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) :

That the evidence and proceedings before the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts during the last session of this House respecting certain prosecutions in the province of Manitoba, be referred to the said committee appointed for the present session for further consideration.

Therefore, we have these three precedents from the English House of Commons, the precedent from the Senate in 1878, and the precedent of this House in 1899, which are direct authorities for the action which I am asking this House to take in regard to this matter at the present stage.

Now, the next question is : What did I undertake to prove when I made this motion before this House during last session, and what did I prove ? I undertook to prove, in respect to one polling section, No. 4 Colborne, that 43 or 44 electors had deposited their ballots in favour of Robert McLean, and that at the conclusion of the polling, when the ballots were counted, only 30 ballots for Robert McLean were to be found. I proved by distinct evidence before the Privileges and Elections Committee, that at that particular polling subdivision, No. 4 Colborne, 98 ballots were cast, that none of them were spoiled, that at the conclusion of the polling 68 ballots were found to be marked for Robert Holmes, and 30 were found to be marked for Robert McLean. I brought before the committee 43 men who distinctly and unequivocally swore that they had marked their ballots for Robert McLean at that election, that they had handed their ballots to the deputy returning officer, and that they believed he had deposited them in the ballot box. I also showed that 125 ballots had been delivered in the first instance to the deputy returning officer, Donald Cummings, and that twenty-seven were unused. I need not go into the various minor irregularities of the appointment of four scrutineers for Mr. Holmes at that polling place, and the disregard of the provisions of the election law in regard to giving information during the holding of the poll as to what electors had voted and what electors had not voted. These are minor things, mere irregularities, but I do wish to invite the attention of the House to the evidence which Mr. Donald Cummings, the deputy returning officer at that poll, gave in regard to this extraordinary result, namely, that 43 men marked their ballots for Mr. Robert McLean, that they believed that they were deposited in the ballot box, and that only 30 came out. At page 15 of the evidence, Mr. Donald Cummings was examined and gave the following evidence :—

Q. Were you a member of any committee?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What committee were you a member of?—A. Of the Reform committee, that is, for the division. I was chairman.

Q. You were chairman of the division?—A. Yes.

Q. That is for what district?—A. No. 4. The same district in which he was deputy returning officer. At page 18 he gives the following evidence :

Q. Mr. McManus told us that instead of destroying the counterfoils you put them into your pocket?—A. Yes.

It must be borne in mind in this connection that there is a clear and distinct provision of the election law, a copy of which was furnished to this officer, that he should detach and destroy the counterfoils. That provision is contained in section 46 of the Dominion Elections Act, and is in the following words :

The elector, on receiving the ballot paper, shall forthwith proceed into one of the compartments of the polling station, and there mark his ballot paper, marking a cross or crosses with a pencil on the white circular space or spaces opposite to the name or names of the candidate or candidates for whom he intends to vote, and shall then fold up such ballot paper so that the initials on the back can be seen without opening it, and hand it to the deputy returning officer, who shall, without unfolding it, ascertain by examining his initials and the number upon the counterfoil, that it is the same which he furnished to the elector, and shall first detach and destroy the counterfoil, and shall then immediately, and in the presence of the elector, place the ballot paper in the ballot box.

These were the printed instructions furnished to this deputy returning officer. Previously to Mr. Cummings's examination the committee had been made aware by the evidence of one of the scrutineers, James McManus, that the deputy returning officer on this occasion had not destroyed the counterfoils, but that he had put every one of them into his pocket instead. Mr. Cummings is being examined at page 18 in regard to that, and he gave the evidence which I have just quoted. On the same page his examination continues :

Q. You didn't destroy them because you didn't want the litter upon the floor?—A. That is one reason.

Q. And the rest of the reasons?—A. There is no other reasons.

Q. This one of them is the only one you've got. What kind of building was this poll held in?—A. Temperance hall.

Q. Temperance hall?—A. Yes.

Q. Was the floor in very good condition?—A. Yes.

Q. Quite clean?—A. Yes.

Q. What is it used for, what is this building used for?—A. It is not used for anything in particular now, excepting for public meetings or anything of that kind.

Q. Had the floor been recently washed?—A. It was clean.

Q. Very clean?—A. No answer.

Q. Was there any one smoking there?—A. Yes.

Q. Any one spitting over the floor?—A. I expect so.

Q. Were you smoking yourself?—A. Yes.

Q. Where did you expectorate?—A. On the floor, I suppose.

Q. You thought the floor would be more soiled by the counterfoils than by the expectoration, is that the idea?—A. No.

Q. What was the idea, why were you more particular about the counterfoils than about spitting on the floor?—A. I will tell you the reason why. I have seen these counterfoils spread on the floor before when I was acting as scrutineer, and I thought it littered the whole floor up, and I took another plan.

Q. That was on a previous occasion?—A. Yes.

Q. And what had been the result of that?—A. I cannot tell you.

Q. Anything serious in consequence?—A. I do not think it.

Q. No serious consequences has resulted. You did not understand that it was your duty to destroy these counterfoils?—A. I certainly destroyed them when I tore them off.

Q. I beg pardon?—A. I destroyed them when I tore them off the ballots.

Q. You did not destroy them when you put them in your pocket?—A. I did not put them in the fire.

Q. Now, you tore off the counterfoil with which hand?—A. With the right hand.

Q. What did you do with it then?—A. I put it into my pocket.

I merely quote this evidence in justice to the deputy returning officer to see whether it is possible to gather from his evidence any reasonable explanation as to why he had not fulfilled the requirement of the law and destroyed these counterfoils on tearing them off instead of putting them in his pocket. At page 20, another attempt is made to get some explanation from him and with this result :

Q. You say that you took these counterfoils home with you?—A. Yes.

Q. And how long after you got them home did you destroy them?—A. That same night.

Q. You didn't litter up your floor with them, I suppose?—A. I put them in the stove.

Q. There was not any stove at the polling place, I suppose?—A. Yes.

Q. There was a stove there?—A. Yes.

Q. There was no particular difficulty about putting them in the stove at the polling place?—A. No.

Q. No difficulty?—A. No.

Q. That never occurred to you?—A. No.

Q. You did not understand it was your duty to destroy the counterfoils?—

I direct the particular attention of the House to his answer volunteered to this question :

—A. There was no fire in the stove, that was all.

Q. There was no fire there at all?—A. No, not that day.

Q. On the 21st of February?—A. Oh, yes, I suppose there was a fire.

Q. And there would be no difficulty in burning them?—A. No, I don't think there was any trouble to burn them there; I could have burned them there as well as at home.

Q. You are satisfied there was a fire there?—A. Yes.

Q. Why did you say there was not; you just thought it a good answer?—A. No, I don't know.

Q. Did you understand it was your duty to destroy these counterfoils?—A. Yes.

Q. And you didn't destroy them?—A. I certainly destroyed them.

Q. You didn't destroy them when you tore them off?—A. In that way.

Q. You didn't destroy them?—A. I tore them off the ballot.

Q. You didn't destroy them?—A. That was destroying them to that extent.

Q. You consider that tearing the counterfoil is destroying them?—A. I do.

Q. I thought you said you destroyed them at home?—A. I burned them at home.

Q. Then your conclusion is that you destroyed them at the polling booth and burned them at home?—A. No, not at all.

Q. And do you persist in your assertion that taking them off the ballot is destroying them?—A. I don't understand that.

What I suggest in regard to that is, that the witness does not seem to have given any very reasonable explanation of his conduct in not destroying these ballots, although he admits he understood it was his duty to do so. Now, the next portion of the evidence of this witness to which I will direct the attention of the House is, that the thirty ballots which were marked for Robert McLean were issued by Donald Cummings, the deputy returning officer, according to his sworn statement, and were initialled by him in pencil. His evidence with regard to that is to be found on page 31, and also on pages 29 and 30. I read from page 31, where counsel in dealing with the witness, sums up the result of the examination to be found on pages 29 and 30. My hon. friend (Mr. Powell) examines the witness as follows :

Q. Now, each and every one of these initials 'D. C.' on the back of these ballots I have now shown you of series 4 is in your handwriting?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And, of course, placed by you on the back of these ballots by yourself?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. These thirty ballots I have just shown you are all for McLean, are they not?—A. I did not look at that.

Q. Well, look, please, series 4, 1 to 30 inclusive. You have looked over them?—A. I have. I find them all marked for McLean.

There you have thirty ballots of that series which are all the ballots found marked for Mr. McLean. You have this witness admitting that his signature 'D. C.' on the back of them is in his handwriting and in pencil. On pages 32 and 33, you have the evidence of the witness with regard to fourteen somewhat peculiar ballots, which were marked for Mr. Holmes, which are initialled in ink, and which are somewhat plainly distinguishable from the others. I will have to trouble the House to listen to a little of the evidence with respect to these fourteen ballots. The witness is at first taken over each one of these ballots, and his attention is called to their appearance of certain ballots, and his evidence on this point is as follows :

Q. Now, will you look over these fourteen ballots and see if that is not true of every ballot of these fourteen, that that line to the right hand of the name of Holmes is straight and not jagged, clear and well defined?—A. Square.

Q. That line to the right of the name of 'Holmes'?—A. That is straight.

Q. Now, I will go over them. That is perfectly straight, nothing jagged in that line to the right of 'Holmes' (No. 14)?—A. Nothing.

Then he is taken over the other remaining eighty-four ballots. The House will remember that there were ninety-eight ballots which were marked; thirty being found marked for McLean and sixty-eight being marked for Holmes. Counsel has dealt with fourteen of these ballots, and has pointed out certain peculiarities connected with them, and the witness is taken over the remaining eighty-four ballots, and he is asked about them in this way :

Q. Then, from 1 to 14, inclusive, of series 3 of Holmes' ballots the line to the right of Holmes' space is straight and definite, and not jagged?—A. Yes.

Q. Now, sir, I ask you to take the remaining eighty-four ballots and see if you can find any that are not jagged in various places. Now, sir, we take this, that is jagged, is it not?—A. Yes.

Counsel takes the witness over every one of these ballots and sums up the result of his examination by this question :

Q. Then, every ballot there which is deposited for Mr. Holmes, with the exception of these fourteen that are marked in ink, are jagged so far as the line to the right of the name 'Holmes' is concerned. Is that true?—A. Yes.

Q. And the fourteen are not ragged or jagged, but the line is clear, definite, straight and distinct?—A. Yes, so far as I could judge.

Therefore, you have fourteen ballots of these found in the box which are plainly distinguished in this respect, but not in this respect alone, as I will point out further on. They are plainly distinguished with regard to the appearance of the line near the printed name, from the eighty-four which constitute the remainder of the entire ninety-eight. Further than that, the attention of this same witness was directed to the twenty-seven unused ballots, and this question was put to him in summing up the result of the examination :

Q. Now, there is not an unused ballot but has also the edge to the right of 'Holmes' ragged?—A. No, not that I can see.

Therefore, the result is that fourteen ballots are found in this box which are entirely distinct in appearance in the respects which I have mentioned from the remaining eighty-four ballots, and are entirely distinct from the twenty-seven unused ballots which in every respect conform to the eighty-four ballots constituting the remainder of the ninety-eight ballots. In other words we have the twenty-seven unused ballots and eighty-four of the ballots in the box exactly alike, and corresponding with each other in every respect. We have fourteen ballots marked in ink, not in pencil, which did not correspond in appearance at all with either the twenty-seven unused ballots or with the remaining eighty-four ballots which were found marked in the box. Counsel had dealt in the same way with the thirty ballots, which were found marked for McLean, and had showed that these corresponded exactly with the unused ballots, and with these which we regard as ballots legitimately cast for Mr. Holmes; and did not at all correspond with the fourteen exceptional ballots to which I have already referred. The examination continues as follows at page 34 :

Q. Then, sir, of all the votes, of all the ballots that you got, the only ones in which the line is unbroken and clear and distinct are these fourteen that are endorsed by you in ink?—A. Yes, as far as I can see.

Q. Sir, doesn't it strike you as a peculiar thing that of all the ballots in the box the only ones different from the others should be marked for Mr. Holmes and should be of the few that are endorsed by you in ink?—A. I cannot account for it.

Q. You cannot account for this?—A. No.

Q. Now, on your oath can't you account for it?—A. No, sir.

Then counsel proceeds to point out to witness another very significant fact; an extraordinary fact in connection with these fourteen ballots, namely: not only are they distinguishable from the remaining eighty-four which were marked, and from the twenty-seven unused ballots, by the printing, but they are also of absolutely distinct and different paper—a fact which was not only proved by the evidence of an expert, but was admitted over and over again by the evidence of Mr. Cummings himself, which I now propose to read. My friend Mr. Powell proceeds with the witness as follows:—

Q. Now, I will call your attention to another thing. I will just call your attention to these fourteen ballots now. Now, sir, Mr. Cummings, will you please look at these as I place them out before you. (Series 3). Mr. Cummings, just leave them down there. Now, I call your attention to these. These are Mr. Holmes's ballots. I will take some of the Holmes's ballots of series 3. Now, I will take them at random and I just want you to see them. Now, sir, I have taken these at random. There should be fourteen there. Now, sir, I call your attention to this. Don't you see that these are different papers, that the fourteen ballots are of different paper entirely from the others? Now, sir?—A. Yes.

Q. Yes, they are. The witness says: yes, they are. That is in your judgment, of course?—A. Yes.

Q. In your judgment the fourteen papers that I have called your attention to as being endorsed in ink, that you have sworn practically are endorsed in ink, are on different paper from the rest of them deposited for Mr. McLean and Mr. Holmes and the unused ballots?—A. Yes.

Q. Different paper and lighter coloured?—A. Lighter paper. They don't show through so much.

Q. Different and lighter—the 14, the 14 numbered from 1 to 14;—3-1 to 3-14 inclusive. Now just tell me, Mr. Cummings, you say these 14 numbered 'series 3, 1 to 14,' are lighter and on heavier paper than the rest, in your eyes?—A. Yes, in my judgment.

Q. Lighter and heavier?—A. Yes, whiter and heavier.

Q. That is your judgment and there is no question about that?—A. No.

Then, counsel proceeds with an examination on a further point of difference, and he sums up the result of that examination in this way:

Q. Then on each one of these 14 ballots of series 3, numbered from 1 to 14 inclusive, you can detect a mark, a line rather, near the bottom of the disc opposite Holmes' name, extending on each side of the disc, but not running through it; that is correct, is it not?—A. Yes.

Q. Now, I would ask you if you can see the same mark on any of these others?—A. No.

The result of that evidence seems to be perfectly clear and distinct, that this witness, when the fourteen ballots are placed before him, admits that these fourteen ballots are different from the eighty-four marked ballots and the twenty-seven unused ballots, in respect to certain peculiarities in the printing and the paper. The paper on which these fourteen ballots is printed is of a different texture and colour from the paper of the other ballots. Certain other marks to which counsel calls the attention of the witness, are apparent on the fourteen ballots, and not on the others. On page 36, the witness gives this evidence in reply to further questions of my hon. friend, Mr. Powell:

Q. Then you are satisfied in your own mind, are you not, that all the ballots of series 3, from Nos. 1 to 14 inclusive, are different paper to the rest of the ballots?—A. In my judgment.

Q. I suppose you are no judge of paper to go into these stubs?—A. No.

Q. Now Mr. Cummings, you have already sworn that these initials on the back of all these ballots are in your handwriting?—A. Yes.

Q. There is no question about that?—A. No question.

Q. And how do you account for that fact, sir, that 14 of these ballots, marked for Mr. Holmes are endorsed in ink when none of Mr. McLean's are initialled in ink, and that these 14 are on different paper and apparently printed with a different machine? How do you account for that?—A. I cannot tell you.

Then, on page 37, the witness gives practically the same evidence. As it is short, I may trouble the House to listen to it:

Q. Now I put this question to you, Mr. Cummings, in view of all the facts that you have given to us only this morning, about these ballots: will you swear, sir, that a single one of these 14 ballots were taken by you from that parcel of ballots that was given to you, and the remnants of which are here?—A. I cannot positively swear.

It must be borne in mind that he says the initials on the back are his, and that he counted these ballots for Mr. Holmes, and yet he says he cannot say that a single one of these fourteen ballots was taken from the pad which was delivered to him. The fourteen ballots taken from that pad must have been disposed of in some way, and they are unaccounted for unless these are the identical ones; but he says he cannot undertake to swear that a single one of these fourteen ballots was taken by him from that pad of 125 ballots delivered to him by the returning officer. His evidence goes on:

Q. You cannot swear?—A. No.

Q. You won't swear a single one of these fourteen ballots was taken by you from that bundle?—A. I cannot distinguish one ballot from the other. I cannot swear that.

Q. You cannot swear that?—A. No, I cannot swear that.

Q. Even the fact of the initials being on the back of them does not convince you that one of these 14 was taken from that bundle?—A. It must have been so. It must have come off the ballots.

Q. Will you swear it did, sir?—A. I would not swear either ways.

Q. You would not swear either way?—A. No.

Q. Reflect again. Are you prepared to swear, sir, from your initials on the back of the ballots, of those ballots, that a single one of these 14 ballots were received by you from the returning officer?—A. Well, I can swear it, because they must have been taken off the bundle I got in the ballot box. It appears to me from the difference in the paper and the lines you are showing to me that is the only difference, a very slight difference in some cases. I cannot swear positively.

Q. I will put the question at greater length. Considering the fact that each and every one of these 14 ballot papers is marked for Mr. Holmes, that it is endorsed in ink, that the ballot is on different paper and that the printing of it is apparently different on account of the jagged line, in view of these circumstances, sir, are you prepared to say that you got a solitary one of these 14 ballots from the returning officer?—A. I cannot swear that.

Q. You cannot swear that?—A. No.

Q. Cannot swear it. Now, sir, if you are not prepared to swear that you did get them from the returning officer, would you please tell me where you might have got them?—A. I cannot tell you.

Q. You cannot tell me?—A. No, I must have got them from the returning officer. That is my judgment in my respect.

Q. Are you not satisfied in your own mind that these are not the ballot papers that you gave the voters that went in to vote?—A. They would appear to be the ballots, I gave them.

Q. Don't you think the appearances are all the other way?—A. As far as my judgment is concerned.

Q. You have sworn these are your signatures?—A. Yes.

Then, at the bottom of page 38, his attention is directed to another very extraordinary matter in connection with these ballots. The fourteen ballots which were not only on different paper, but printed by a different machine were all marked with crosses practically in the same place and in the same way. There was no divergence as to the place or character of the mark. They bore the appearance of ballots which had been all marked by the same person at the same time, and the witness practically admits that. His evidence with regard to it is as follows:

Q. The crosses opposite Holmes's name in the 14 ballots of series 3 from 1 to 14 are pretty nearly uniform?—A. Yes.

Q. Apparently made by the one person, are they not, apparently?—A. Not much difference.

Q. And these 14 others, taken at random from Holmes's ballots, vary, big and little?—A. Some of them vary, but some not; there is one.

Q. And here is another, and here are some big and more little?—A. Yes, there is a little variation in some of them.

Then, further down he says:

Q. Then all of the ballots, and I have them all here, that are endorsed by you in ink, the fourteen from 1 to 14 inclusive, are marked very uniformly with 'X'?—A. Yes.

Then, further on in the same page he says:

Q. In view of that fact, of that additional fact, are you not of the belief that the ballots that you have returned here are not the ballots given you by the returning officer, so far as numbers 1 to 14 in series 3 go?—A. Yes, they appear to be different.

Any yet they bear his own initials:

Q. They appear to be different, and you do not believe now that these are the same ballots that the returning officer gave you?—A. I cannot swear to it.

Any yet they bear his own initials:

Q. That is your belief?—A. Yes.

Q. Now, sir, if it is your belief that these are not the ballots that the returning officer gave you, how do you account for their being changed?—A. I cannot tell you.

Q. You cannot tell me?—A. No.

Then, on page 40 he is examined further with regard to the identity of these ballots with those which he received from the returning officer:

Q. Now, sir, are you not absolutely satisfied that those fourteen ballots never came from the returning officer in that block?—A. I do not know.

And yet they bear his own initials:

Q. Are you not satisfied?—A. They appear to be different.

Q. Are you not now satisfied?—A. Yes, I am.

Q. That these fourteen ballots did not come from the returning officer, and are you not satisfied that you never tore the fourteen ballots out of that book?—A. I am not.

Q. You see how evenly that is trimmed there?—A. Yes.

Q. And you see how even the other end is trimmed?—A. Yes.

Q. Now, if these were removed from these stubs, can you conceive how it is possible for them to be wider than the stub, being in a book, fastened together, and trimmed with a machine?—A. I could not tell.

Q. No doubt of that; are you not satisfied that these fourteen ballots never were taken by you out of that book?—A. It would appear so.

Q. Are you not satisfied, sir, in your own mind they never were taken out of that book?—A. I could not swear to it.

Q. You would not like to swear positively to it, but I want your best judgment on it?—A. My judgment is that they vary.

Q. That they are different and could not come out of that book?—A. They are different.

Q. You are satisfied of that?—A. Yes.

Q. You are satisfied they could not have come out of that book, there is no question about that; now, Mr. Cummings, if you are satisfied as to that, I want you to explain to the committee how these fourteen ballots have your initials on the back?—A. I cannot explain it.

Q. You are satisfied they never came out of that book?—A. To my judgment.

Q. You have told me you are satisfied these fourteen ballots did not come out of that book; had you any other source of getting ballots than that book?—A. No.

Q. Then, sir, how are you prepared to explain, if you are satisfied they did not come out of that book and you had no other way to get ballots, how are you prepared to explain that your initials are on the back?—A. I cannot explain it.

Q. You have no explanation?—A. No.

Q. You are satisfied they didn't come out of the book?—A. According to my judgment.

Q. You have sworn positively these are your initials on the back?—A. They appear to be.

Q. And still you can't give this committee any explanation as to how your initials come to be on the back of the illegitimate ballots?—A. No.

That is all of the evidence of Mr. Cummings, to which I think I need refer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Does the hon. gentleman leave the House on that point under the impression that his conclusion is that those were Cummings's initials?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). He swore they were.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is the conclusion the hon. gentleman draws?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If my hon. friend will point out to me any portion of the evidence—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I just wanted to know if that is your conclusion?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Yes, that to the best of his knowledge and belief, those are his initials on the back of the ballots. I have read his evidence and am not discussing it, or saying what conclusion shall be gathered from it. I only point out that I undertook to prove certain matters in connection with this particular polling booth last year, and I am pointing to some evidence, on direct examination at least, which the deputy returning officer himself gave.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I was not calling that in question, but I was only drawing attention to the single point on which the hon. gentleman dwelt, to show that Cummings admitted that the initials were his. My recollection is that that was not his final conclusion.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think that the hon. gentleman is under a misapprehension as to what I have been doing. I have not been stating the effect of the witness's evidence, but quoting his language as taken from the evidence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman interlarded comments of his own. I am not saying that I object to that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I interlarded nothing, except this, that I said that these are his own initials, and in support of that I read his own language. It may possibly be that at some place in his examination by Dr. Russell, or the hon. gentleman himself, Cummings qualified that in some way. But, if so, it does not, in the slightest degree affect the point I am making.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

I also wish to draw the attention of the House to the evidence of Mr. James Harvey. I cannot do better than read the evidence itself, so far as it is relevant to this. It is very brief. It will be found at page 318:

Q. Will you tell us what your occupation is?—A. I am a papermaker.

Q. A papermaker, yes, and in whose employ?—A. Mr. E. B. Eddy's.

Q. Who are the foremen of the papermaking works?—A. My father, Mr. Thomas Harvey, sr., and myself.

Q. Mr. Thomas Harvey, sr., your father, and yourself are the foremen, and who has to do with the making of the paper of the requisite thickness and weight and quality and everything else?—A. I do.

Q. Then, orders will come in to you with a sample, a piece of paper, and you have to make paper of the same weight and thickness?—A. Yes. Some orders require only weight, some only thickness, and some require both.

Q. And the thickness of paper, then, is a thing that comes frequently under your notice?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Very frequently?—A. Every day.

Q. Have you any means of judging infallibly the thickness of paper?—A. I have.

Q. Have you any instrument for that purpose?—A. I have.

Q. What is that instrument known as?—A. As a micrometer.

Q. And have you got that instrument with you?—A. I have.

Q. Produce it, please?—A. I have one, we have two different kinds. We have one that is more sensitive than this, that we use on very highly finished paper, but on rough paper you cannot use that; on rough paper we use this.

Q. I will just show you this. Now, sir, will you tell us, here are fourteen ballots; I would like to know the thickness of the paper in that ballot. That is No. 3-10?—A. That is four one-thousandths thick?

Q. Four one-thousandths of an inch?—A. This micrometer is graduated to one one-thousandth of an inch, thus each one mark makes one one-thousandth, two makes two one-thousandths. Here is the paper where there is no printing, and I screw it right down here and you see there is just four points.

Then he goes over these fourteen ballots, and he shows that practically, I think with one exception, they are all 4-1,000ths and that one exception is 3-1,000ths of an inch. And then he takes the remaining eighty-four ballots that were marked, and the twenty-seven ballots that were unused, and he takes the stubs of the ninety-eight ballots that were used, and he measures every one of these, and he finds that each one of them is 2.1,000ths of an inch. So that you have this expert proving by an instrument, which he himself, in his uncontradicted evidence, declares to be infallible, that these fourteen ballots are double the thickness, not only of the remaining eighty-four, and of the twenty-seven unused ballots, but also of the ninety-eight stubs, from some fourteen of which these fourteen ballots were supposed to have been taken, making it as clear and distinct as evidence can make it, that these fourteen ballots never did come off any fourteen of these ninety-eight stubs. The witness was recalled for cross-examination at page 466, and his cross-examination amounted to very little. My learned colleague (Mr. Russell), asked him these questions :

Q. Are these machines you use for testing the thickness of paper not susceptible to mistake on account of the wearing of the thread?—A. No, because there is an arrangement for adjusting them. I always prove them to see if they are right before using them.

Q. How do you prove them?—A. By seeing that that '0' comes to the mark. I see that there is nothing in there before I use them—no dust or anything, and if the thread does, by any chance, get worn, you can see it and adjust it by the screw. They are infallible to the one-thousandth part of an inch.

It seems to me that the evidence of this expert, which only corroborates in that respect the evidence of Cummings himself, reveals a most extraordinary state of affairs, and one which may well demand further investigation at the hands of the committee. You have 125 ballots given this deputy returning officer, Mr. Cummings; you have ninety-eight of those used; you have sixty-eight ballots found at the close of the poll, marked for Mr. Holmes; you have thirty at the close of the poll found marked for Mr. McLean; you have forty-three men coming before the committee and swearing that they marked their ballots for Mr. McLean. Thirteen of those ballots have in some way disappeared; fourteen of those found in the box differ from the remaining eighty-four ballots, and from the twenty-seven unused ballots, and from the stubs, in colour, thickness and appearance. And it is proved by the uncontradicted testimony of an expert witness that these fourteen ballots so different in appearance, never came off any of the ninety-eight stubs which were produced before the committee and examined by this expert. Now, if, as the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads the House, told us last year, the sanctity of the ballot and the rights of the people are matters of grave concern, surely, a circumstance such as that I have detailed demands further investigation by a committee of this House.

Now, I pass from that to poll No. 3 in the town of Goderich, where even a more peculiar condition of affairs is found to exist. In that poll, 118 men voted and 123 ballots came out of the box.

Mr. FOSTER. This is the growing time.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Seventy-two of these ballots were marked for Holmes, 40 were marked for McLean, 10 were not marked at all, 1 was rejected by the deputy returning officer, 2 were destroyed, and 53 ballots were unused, making a total of 178, the number delivered to the deputy returning officer in the first instance. Of the 123 ballots which came out of the box, 72 were marked for Holmes, 40 for McLean, 10 were not marked at all, and 1 was rejected, making a total of 123. Now, 35 men appeared before the committee and swore that they had marked their ballots for McLean and delivered them to the deputy returning officer, James Farr. Nine more men were in attendance to give evidence on that point, when the committee decided that it would hear no more evidence. Some 10 other men have made declarations, which were in my hands before the committee, to the effect that they marked their ballots also for Robert McLean. So you have from 53 to 55 men, who have either sworn or made solemn declaration that they had marked their ballots for Robert McLean and delivered them to the deputy returning officer James Farr, whereas only 40 ballots marked for McLean were found in the box at the close of the poll. Now, a subpoena was issued for Farr on the very first day when subpoenas were called for before the committee. It was found impossible to effect service upon him. There has been a discussion about that in the newspapers, into which I do not intend to enter. It is sufficient for me to say that he could not be found, and some evidence was given as to the reason why he could not be found. With reference to what took place at the poll in that polling subdivision, I would like to refer, very briefly, to the evidence of Henry R. Armstrong at page 321. He was the poll clerk and he swears that none of the agents for either candidates were sworn before the polling began, though an entry was made in the poll book by the deputy returning officer that they had been sworn. Now, at page 322, he produces the official record, and he is asked how many electors voted at the polling division, and he answers as I have stated, 118. And at page 323, he is asked how many ballots came out of the box :

Q. How many were marked for McLean that were counted?—A. Forty.

Q. How many for Holmes that were counted?—A. Seventy-two.

Q. How many ballots do you say that had no mark on them that came out?—A. Ten.

Q. And how many ballots came out that were rejected?—A. One.

Q. Now, would you please just total that up for me. It is 123, the Chairman says, but I want you to make sure of it yourself. Forty for McLean, seventy-two for Holmes, ten not marked, one rejected?—A. Fifty-three.

Q. The fifty-three did not come out of the box?—A. One rejected.

Q. That is 123, is it not?—A. That is 123.

Q. Yes, then, sir, you state that 123 ballots came out of that box?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, how many went in, from your record, turn back here?—A. One hundred and eighteen.

So that 5 ballots, at least, got into that ballot box which were, apparently, not delivered to the deputy returning officer by any of the voters. Then the witness gives evidence at pages 324-5, with regard to certain marks on the ballots to which I need not direct the attention of the House. But at page

326, the following evidence is given—the Farr referred to being the deputy returning officer :

Q. Did you see, sir, Mr. Farr have any ballots on the window-sill in the room at any time during that day?—A. About four o'clock in the afternoon he got up from his seat, walked out towards the stove, and then from there he went over towards one of the windows on the south side of the building, and he stood there. I was busy reading the paper, there was nothing doing, and the voters slackened up for the afternoon, and I was reading the paper and just happened to see him at the window-sill; he had a lot of papers on the window-sill. I cannot say what they were, but I think they were stubs; I cannot say. I paid no attention to that because I did not think there was anything wrong at the time.

Q. You paid no attention to it?—A. No, I did not.

Q. Didn't you tell your wife that Farr told you he made thirteen or fourteen ballots during the afternoon for Mr. Holmes.

Question objected to by Mr. Russell.

Q. Did Mr. Farr tell you anything to that effect?—A. At half-past one that day my dinner was brought down, and about half-past one I got off the chair and went over to a small table in the rear where I was sitting. I put the basket upon the table and commenced to take my dinner, and made the remark to Farr, 'I guess they have forgotten to bring your dinner.' I said, 'I guess you had better come and have some with me.'

Q. What did he say?—A. He came over and sat beside me.

Q. Did he say anything?—A. He made the remark to me.

Q. What was it, now?—A. 'There were thirteen damn good ballots in that box for Holmes.'

By the Chairman:

Q. There were thirteen?—A. Thirteen; I didn't understand what he meant by it at the time.

Q. You didn't understand what he meant by it at the time?—A. No, I didn't understand.

Then Mr. R. W. Clark gives evidence, at page 339-40. He says that he was one of the representatives or agents of Robert McLean at the poll, and he observed Farr at the window during the afternoon :

Q. During the day did you observe Mr. Farr at any of the windows?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Which window was it?—A. It was the south-east window.

Q. What did you observe while he was at the window?—A. Well, I noticed that he had some papers out on the window-sill, and I noticed that in the lot there was ballots among them.

Q. What you saw was that he had those papers on the window-sill?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did he seem to be doing with them, or what was he doing with them?—A. I don't know, unless he was examining them.

Q. How far was he away from you?—A. He was pretty near the width of this room, I should judge.

Q. Had he his back or his face towards you?—A. His back.

Q. How could you see the ballots in that case?—A. I could see them from the side, as it were.

Q. He had his back directly towards you?—A. No, there was room to see the window-sill at the side.

Q. Was he there any length of time?—A. Oh, for a few minutes. I could not say how long.

Q. Were you out in the hall at any time during the day?—A. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Q. The hall is represented here (showing sketch)?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was any one else there while you were in the hall?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who were they?—A. Mr. Farr and Mr. Yates.

I omit such portions of the evidence as are immaterial :

Q. Did anything take place while you were in that hall with regard to the ballots?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What took place?—A. I picked up a ballot marked for Holmes with Farr's initials on, as I supposed. I stooped down and picked up the ballot, and said, 'Here, Farr, what does this mean?' He grabbed the ballot out of my fingers before I had time to do anything myself, and he tore it up and threw the pieces down. I said, 'What does that mean?' and he said, 'Oh, hell, there was lots of them round town yesterday,' and Yates said, 'Yes, I seen them, too,' that is the expression he used.

Q. The ballot which you picked up was lying on the floor?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You saw it had initials on it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. His initials on it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you say from observation—had you seen him write, had you seen him make his initials?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you observe the initials on this ballot sufficiently to say, to enable you to say whether in your belief they were his initials?—A. Well, I would not say that, they were his initials all right, but I would not say it was his writing.

Q. And the ballot was marked on front for McLean, you say?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You said Holmes all right?—A. Well, it was a mistake then.

Q. Was the ballot marked for McLean or Holmes?—A. For McLean.

He also gives evidence on page 340 with regard to the counting of the ballots at the close of the polls, but I do not think that I need trouble the House with that. Now, some evidence was given before the committee as to the reasons which prevented the service of a subpoena upon Mr. Farr and prevented his attendance before the committee. The evidence, in brief, is that on the day after this matter was brought up in the House last year, Mr. Farr, who was then employed in a fairly lucrative position in Toronto, threw up his situation and left Toronto for a time, and for some weeks after that he practically kept in hiding for the avowed purpose of evading the service of a subpoena which would bring him before this committee. It is also clear from the evidence that during that same time he was in communication with a gentleman named James Vance, who was said to be a political organizer in the interest of the party of which the hon. gentlemen opposite are exponents; in fact, I think one witness goes so far as to state that Mr. Vance is assistant organizer to Mr. Alexander Smith, the chief organizer of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario. But I am not particularly concerned with that, I am only concerned with the fact that there should be a further opportunity given of securing the evidence of Mr. Farr and Mr. James Vance before this committee. To indicate that Mr. Farr's evidence before that committee would probably be more or less pertinent, in fact I may say very pertinent, to the matters as to which the committee is to inquire, I refer to the evidence of Mr. Joseph Kidd, on page 336. He was acquainted with Mr. Farr and had some conversation with him respecting his conduct at this election as deputy returning officer. Joseph Kidd is in the employ of D. W. Thompson & Co., of Toronto. He says he knows James Farr, he says that James Farr was in the employ for some time of that same firm, D. W. Thompson & Co. Then he goes on to testify :

Q. Do you remember about what time he left ?
—A. It was some time in July.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him before he left in regard to his going ?—A. Yes.

Q. What was it ?—A. Oh, I saw him—he had left about a week before that and came back to get his pay—I saw him ; I asked him where he was going ; oh, he said, he was knocking around the country ; had been in Ottawa and had been in Goderich, and I told him he had got himself into a nice box, there was crooked work up in West Huron. Then, oh, let me see now—he, of course, denied doing anything wrong ; I asked him what he was going to do, and he said he had a ticket for North Dakota, at any rate he took it from his pocket, showed it to me, it was for North Dakota. I didn't examine it ; said he had a cheque for $500, and I think that is about all the conversation that took place between us.

Q. Said he had a cheque for $500 ?—A. Yes.

Q. Did he tell you where he got the cheque for $500 ?—A. No.

Q. From whom he got it ?—A. No.

Q. Did he say anything to you as to the cause of his leaving the employ of Thompson & Company and going away ?—A. Well, not at that time ; I had a conversation with him before he left, the morning that I read in the paper of the matter being brought up in the House here at Ottawa. I went in and twitted him with it, and he, of course, denied then doing anything wrong ; but he did not at any time say anything to me about the cause of his going away ; he simply quit next day and came back on Saturday to get his pay when I had the other conversation with him.

Further down, the same witness says :

Q. The next time you talked with him he told you he had been in Ottawa and Goderich ?—A. Yes.

Q. And told you he had a cheque for $500 and a ticket for somewhere in Dakota ?—A. North Dakota.

Q. Did you see it ?—A. He pulled the ticket out of his pocket.

Q. Did you see the cheque ?—A. No.

Another witness, James Nelson, gave evidence to be found at page 472. This witness also knew Farr, and had some conversation with him respecting the same matter. He gives this evidence :

He (Mr. Farr) went home on the 14th. It was the 14th he was talking about going home, he went home on the Thursday and then he came back on Friday.

Q. Did you see him on Friday ?—A. I saw him on Friday at supper time.

Q. Did you have any talk with him ?—A. Not just then, but after supper we went up to the bedroom and he showed me a ticket which he said a man by the name of Vance gave him. First he had said that his brother gave it to him ; then he said Vance gave it to him, and he said it was for North Dakota, but it was not. It was from St. Paul, Minnesota, to Chicago, and from Chicago to Hamilton, and from Hamilton to Toronto. Some said the ticket was no good. Of course, I don't know that, and he had a check on his trunk for Hamilton, North Dakota. He said his trunk was there.

At page 473 he gives evidence as follows :

Q. Did you have any conversation with him ?—A. Yes, I had a conversation with him then. I says, 'the papers claim that you are all to blame for this affair.' 'Well,' he says, 'I ain't all to blame.' He says, 'If I go down to Ottawa I will give different evidence altogether.'

Further on the same page :

Q. He didn't tell you anything else that night ?—A. No sir.

Q. Did he tell you any other night ?—A. The next night ; I didn't see him all that day. This was Saturday night. He told me about meeting his friend, and Sunday I didn't see him because I had went out with Mr. Martin to the half-way house. He was going to Brooklyn. I came back that night and Mr. Vance came down to the house.

Q. What Mr. Vance ?—A. Mr. Vance that I just mentioned.

Q. Do you know what his first name is ?—A. I don't know what his first name is.

Q. What sort of a looking man is he ?—A. A medium-sized man ; I think he has a sandy mustache. I seen him at night, between ten and eleven o'clock at night, I think he wore a straw hat.

Q. What height is he ?—A. He must be between 5 ft. 6 and 5 ft. 8, I think it is.

Q. Have you ever seen Mr. Vance before ?—A. Not before this Sunday night.

Q. Was he present at the conversation with Farr ?—A. No, sir.

Q. What did Mr. Vance do ?—A. He came down for Farr, to see if he could see Farr. He had told Farr to call on him Sunday. Vance had asked me if Farr was in, and I told him, 'No,' he had went out, but if he had a message to leave I would tell Farr when he came back. He told me, he says, 'Well, I will give you my address' and he gave me his address and said: 'When Farr comes send him up here to my house.'

Q. What address ?—A. 95 Howard Street, Toronto.

If any gentleman has a curiosity to turn up the Toronto Directory he will find that at 95 Howard Street, Toronto, Mr. James Vance resides.

I marked down the address, and when Farr came home at 12.30 I told him Vance had been down and wanted to see him and was going away that morning and wanted to see him that night, and Farr asked me if I would not take a walk up there with him and I put on my clothes and went up there with him.

Q. Up to his place ?—A. Up to his place.

Q. 95 Howard Street ?—A. 95 Howard Street.

Q. A house or office ?—A. A house, a residence and we talked about different things on the way up. I asked him about the election, and he says—I asked him, if this election was run straight would Holmes be elected, and he said 'Not on your life.'

By Mr. Russell :

Q. Who said this ?—A. Farr.

By Mr. Borden :

Q. Did he say anything else on the way up ?—

A. He didn't say anything else about it, but he went into the house and must have stayed about 20 minutes in the house.

Q. Did you go in ?—A. No, sir, he told me not to go in. He said, 'You can't go in this house with me, you had better stay out and wait till I am through.' On the way down he was speaking about the election and I said, 'That will queer you. You won't be able to get returning officer there again,' and he said, 'Oh yes, I will get to be returning officer,' and that is all I remember going down. We went to bed as soon as we got home. I seen him Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, and Wednesday Vance called again.

Then on page 475 the witness gives the following evidence. He is asked about a conversation with Farr on his return from a trip though the country :

Q. Well, did you have any conversation with him about the election ?—A. No, nothing only that he said Vance had a telegram from Ottawa telling Vance to keep his man low.

And further on :

Q. Did he say anything further to you on this occasion that you remember of ?—A. No, except that he had a rough time keeping out of the way in Brooklin, Oshawa and Whitby.

Q. Now, he said he had a rough time in Oshawa, Whitby and Brooklin, keeping out of the way?—A. Yes, keeping out of the way.

Q. And was that all that took place at that conversation—was that the same day he came back, Saturday?—A. Saturday evening.

Then later on, at page 477, this witness details that at a subsequent interview Farr changed his story and told him that he had been guilty of no misconduct in connection with this election, that the ballots were very thin and that a greater number must have got in by mistake. At page 477 he gives the following evidence :

Q. As I understand you, he told you he was keeping out of the way, and had a hard time?—A. Yes.

Q. What did you think he was keeping out of the way for?—A. I thought it was Vance.

Q. You understood it was on account of Vance he was keeping out of the way?—A. Yes.

Then, a witness by the name of Harry Ross was also examined in respect to the same matter, and he gave evidence at page 394. He says that he knows Farr, and this question is put to him :

Q. Did he talk to you about it more than once?—A. Oh, yes, I was with him two or three times after he left D. W. Thompson's.

Q. You spoke of it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he give you any idea as to the reason he left?—A. Well, no he didn't, but he knew I knew, you know, and didn't say anything about the reason he left.

Q. He knew that you knew? How do you know?—A. He talked to me that way.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Q. What did he say that indicated that you knew?—A. Well, he asked me if I knew the reason why; I told him I thought I did. I heard all about it, of course I saw it in the paper, you know.

Q. Yes; did he speak at all of what appeared in the papers to you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. He spoke of what appeared in the papers?—A. Yes.

Q. Respecting what?—A. The West Huron election.

Q. And told you that he supposed you knew why he was leaving?—A. Yes.

Q. Did this occur more than once?—A. Well, no.

Q. Did he refer to it more than once?—A. No, he didn't refer to it more than once.

Q. Not more than once?—A. No.

Q. And you told him in reply that you did understand why he was leaving?—A. Yes.

And then further down on the same page the witness said that Farr told him he had somewhere about $500, and he would get more if he could get it. At the bottom of page 395 the witness gives evidence as to a conversation with this same man Farr subsequently when he returned to Toronto, after being away for some days :

Q. Do you know where he was living in Toronto at the time that you saw him on Church Street?—A. Yes.

Q. Where was he living in Toronto then?—A. 414 Church St.

Q. What is the number?—A. 414 Church St.

Q. And you say that was how long ago?—A. That was about the latter part of July.

Q. The latter part of July?—A. Yes.

Q. Yes, were you aware at that time that a summons had been issued for his appearance before this committee?—A. That is what he told me.

Q. He told you that a summons had been issued?—A. Yes.

Q. And what did he say about that?—A. Oh, he said he was keeping hiding. He didn't want to be served with this summons. Of course, I don't know anything about that, you know.

Q. He told you he knew a summons had been issued for his appearance here, and he was keeping out of the way and evading it?—A. I said that I didn't think he was, because he was staying in this house, and he and I went out walking.

Q. He told you that he was hiding?—A. Yes.

Then, at page 397, evidence of the same kind is given :

A. He told me he was in a bad fix, and told me it was just like being in jail, and a few things like that. You know, of course, he didn't tell me any particulars of the case that night.

Q. Well, just give it to us as definitely as you can; he told you he was in a bad fix and about the same as being in jail?—A. Yes.

Q. And what else?—A. I asked him the reason why, and he said there was a summons out for him, and he was trying to keep hid; and that was all happened that noon hour.

Q. And that he was keeping hid for what reason?—A. In case he would get the summons.

Q. So the summons would not be served on him?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When you left him he asked you to come around at night?—A. Yes.

Then, he gives evidence of the same kind of conversation that night, and we have further evidence which I will briefly quote:

Q. What did he say he had done?—A. Well, he told me he was returning officer at the election in Goderich, and told me he voted twenty-two times himself; that is about all he could tell me.

Q. He told you he had voted twenty-two times himself?—A. Yes.

Q. That was all?—A. Said he was in a bad fix, that was about all he told me.

Q. Did he give you any information as to how he voted twenty-two times himself, how he had done it?—A. No.

Q. In the conversation in the evening at his boarding-house he referred distinctly to the West Huron election, as I understand?—A. Yes.

Then, in cross-examination, at page 399, he gives exactly the same kind of evidence as to his desire to evade service of the summons. In cross-examination, at page 401, in answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Britton), he gives the following evidence:

Q. When was this conversation?—A. The first was that night. He told me that night he had voted twenty-two times. That is all I have to say.

Further down in the same page, in answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Britton), he said:

A. He told me he was in a bad fix.

Q. I would like if you would give me his words as near as you can?—A. I am doing so; he said he voted twenty-two times in the one day.

Another witness, Thomas Marshall, pages 484 to 486, gives very similar evidence which I need quote only very shortly. It is evidence of a conversation with Farr. Farr told him that he had a sum of money and a ticket for North Dakota, and that he was going away on account of his action in the West Huron election. He makes some reference to Vance at page 486:

Q. In any conversation you had with him did he make any reference to Mr. Vance?—A. Only about this ticket.

Q. What did he say about the ticket?—A. First he told me his brother gave it to him, and then on another occasion he made a remark that Vance gave it to him.

Q. Did he say anything to you about having money or expecting to get money?—A. Yes, several times.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a portion of the evidence which was advanced at the investigation before the committee last session in respect to the proceedings of the deputy returning officers at No. 4 Colborne and at No. 3 in the town of Goderich. The committee has reported that the investigation is incomplete, and I take it that the facts proved by these witnesses are an ample warrant in themselves for a continuation of that investigation and for further inquiry in respect to the matters, which, according to the report of the committee, have been clearly left in an unfinished and incomplete state. In respect to Brockville, I may further say that the case which I made out last year was pronounced by the right hon. Premier to be a weak case, but, nevertheless, his high regard for the sanctity of the ballot, and for the honour of the House, induced him to send it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I presume that his regard for the sanctity of the ballot, the honour of the House and the rights of the people, is not less pronounced this year than it was last year, and that therefore, it would be unnecessary for me to adduce any further evidence or to make out any better case this year than last year for the purpose of obtaining a similar resolution of the House in regard to this inquiry. But, I may say, that, in addition to what was before the House last year, I have a sworn statement which I will not read to the House at present, because I do not think it is necessary, but I will state what the purport of it is. I have a sworn statement to this effect: That an expert was employed and paid to train deputy returning officers to steal ballots and substitute forged ballots in their place at that election.

That eleven deputy returning officers, whose names are given, were so trained by that expert, and that they received 161 forged ballots for the purposes of such substitution.

That the amount to be paid to these men for each ballot which they would so substitute was, in most cases, the sum of $5 per ballot.

That the method by which these 161 forged ballots were to be substituted for good ballots was as follows—this is the only clause of the sworn statement which I think it necessary to read, and I read it only because it corresponds so strongly, it seems to me, with the evidence I have read.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Whose affidavit is that?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). This is a sworn statement.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What date is it?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Of quite a late date.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would say whose affidavit it is.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is the sworn statement of a man named Pritchett.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He is being investigated now.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). With regard to this matter?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. With regard to criminal proceedings.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Well, that is very good. The date of this is December 29. I give it for what it is worth. I give it as an inducement why this matter should be investigated before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I do not vouch for it. I say it is a sworn statement which this man has made, and if his sworn statement is untrue, it is right and proper that he should be prosecuted and punished severely for making such a statement. If, on the other hand, his sworn statement is true, and these men were trained to substitute ballots at the Brockville, or any other election, it is right and proper that the men who are concerned in that should also be tried and punished for their conduct in that respect.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). This is what this sworn statement says :

The deputy returning officer would keep the false ballots so that he could readily take one in his left hand when he wished to work it. When a known Conservative voter would be in the act of handing his ballot to the deputy the latter would place his left hand upon the table with a false ballot under the hand, but no counterfoil. At the same moment he could accept from the voter, with his right hand, the genuine ballot and counterfoil. He then would place the genuine ballot under the left hand fingers, as if for the purpose of tearing off the counterfoil, and with a quick motion of the right hand he would remove both genuine ballot and counterfoil, at the same moment raising the left hand and leaving on the table a ballot from which the counterfoil had apparently been just removed. He would put what he had in his right hand in his coat pocket, and then put in the box the ballot lying upon the table. This ballot, so put in the box, would be one of those previously furnished by me to the deputy, and on which I had put a cross in favour of Comstock.

Whether or not the statement in that affidavit is true, I do not know. I know that he has sworn to that statement, and I venture to make this remark in regard to his statement: That it seems to offer an explanation, which has not been previously given, of the reason why counterfoils were on so many occasions put into the pockets of deputy returning officers, during the West Huron and Brockville elections, in defiance of the plain requirements of the law; and put into the pockets of officers who on previous occasions had never seen fit to adopt any such course. I have read to this House the evidence of Mr. Cummings with regard to the reasons which induced him not to destroy the counterfoils, to refrain from destroying the counterfoils and to put them in his pocket. I venture to submit to the judgment of any reasonable man in this House: That the reasons which Mr. Cummings adduced for his conduct in that respect are absolutely inadequate and unsatisfactory. He gave as a reason in the first place: That he did not want to litter up the floor upon which men were treading with their boots coming in from the public streets; upon which they were expectorating; a floor for which you would not imagine he had any particular regard, as he himself admits he was expectorating over it. He gave, in the next place, the reason, that he supposed he was destroying the counterfoils when it tore them off, and in the next breath he says, he destroyed them when he went home. He gave, in the next place, the reason, that he burned them at home because he had a stove there and a fire in it, and he could not destroy them by burning in the polling booth because there was no fire in the stove. Upon his attention being directed to the fact that it was February 21, he admitted there was fire in the stove in the booth, and withdrew that reason, but gave no other reason. So, from first to last throughout his evidence, I cannot find any satisfactory or adequate reason advanced by him or any one else for his conduct in putting these counterfoils in his pocket instead of destroying them, and if my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who devoted a good deal of attention to this matter during the last session, can suggest any reason when he comes to deal with this subject, I think he would do a great service to this House. It must be borne in mind that this deputy returning officer admits, in his evidence, that the printed law was placed in his hands requiring him to destroy these counterfoils, and that he understood it was his duty to destroy them. Now, he did not destroy them, and he put them in his pocket. I read his evidence to-night in which he said that he understood it was his duty to destroy them.

Now, Sir, having regard to the report of the committee, having regard to the evidence, with which I fear I have wearied the House, and having regard to the further sworn statement, to which I have directed the attention of the House, I think I have every reason for moving: That the evidence and papers in connection with this matter should be again referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I regret that, for reasons which are not in any way due to me, and which I mentioned at the commencement of my remarks, that I have been unable to make this motion at an earlier date. I therefore move:

That all the words after the word 'that' be left out, and the following added instead thereof:—

'The poll books, voters' lists, and all other papers, letters and documents and memoranda relating to the last election for the electoral district of Brockville and the last election for the electoral district of the West Riding of the county of Huron, which were referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections during the last session of this House, and also all proceedings and evidence had, given, taken, or received, by or before the said Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections during the last session of this House, respecting the matters aforesaid, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections appointed during the present session of this House, for further consideration, and for the purpose of inquiring into and investigating the conduct of the respective returning officers and of the several deputy returning and other officers at and in connection with the said several elections respectively, and of reporting thereon with all convenient speed.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Mr. Speaker, at this late hour, on the stroke of twelve, I think no useful purpose would be served by continuing the debate, and I therefore move its adjournment.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, May 14, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SUPPLIES FOR THE NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, the 10th instant, I asked a question of the right hon. leader of the government relating to supplies for the North-west Mounted Police, and he was good enough to say that if I would move for the papers, they would be brought down. I therefore beg to move:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of the schedule calling for tenders for supplies for the North-west Mounted Police for the years 1897-8, 1898-9 and 1899-1900, the tenders accepted, the contracts awarded when tenders were called for, and the contracts awarded when tenders were not called for.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. N. CHAMPAGNE (Wright) moved:

That the fifth report of the select standing committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates of the House during the present session be concurred in.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I think the House is entitled to have some explanations before this report is concurred in. I am not conversant with the facts myself, but I would like to present them to the House as I understand them, because if they are as they have been represented to me, an injustice seems to have been done to an old employee of this House, Mr. Gélinas. Mr. Gélinas has been in the service of the House as a translator for some sixteen or seventeen years. A new appointment had to be made during this year to replace Mr. Dansereau, who died recently. All the applicants for the office were subjected to a competitive examination; and all the present members of the staff, with the exception of three—Mr. Beaulieu, formerly the chief of the staff, Mr. Larose, the present chief, and another gentleman who was appointed last year after a competitive examination—were also required to pass an examination. I understand that the gentlemen who are now recommended for appointment—Messrs. Achille Fortier, Flavien Moffet and Emile Tremblay—came out first in the competition. The result is the appointment of these three gentlemen by the committee. I find no fault with their appointment; it seems to be quite proper; but, I understand that it involves the removal of Mr. Gélinas, who is an old employee. If I am credibly informed, Mr. Gélinas was also found to be a competent translator, though not so competent as the three gentlemen now named for appointment. I am told that the competition was divided into three classes: Class A, representing supreme merit; Class B, a shade under, and Class C, a shade still under; but, that any one who came within any of these classes was held to be a competent translator. If Mr. Gélinas were a new man, coming up for a fresh competition, and were a degree inferior to the men who have been selected, I would have nothing to say in his favour; but, if it be true that Mr. Gélinas, though, perhaps, not so well qualified according to this examination as the three gentlemen now named for appointment, yet passed his examination successfully, and has been found to be a competent translator, I submit that in justice to an old employee, he should not be set aside in favour of another man. That is the suggestion I offer to the House, and if these representations are true, it seems to me that the sense of justice of the House will be in favour of keeping an old employee who is competent to discharge the duties of his office. These facts I have from hearsay. I have not spoken to any member of the committee in regard to the matter, but some friends of Mr. Gélinas have come to me and have presented these facts to me, and I would ask for some explanations from the members of the committee before we come to the conclusion embodied in this report.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Mr. Speaker, I happen to know some of the history of the matter referred to by the right hon. gentleman, being a member of the committee. I may say that we have had a great deal of trouble with the French Hansard for many years. When that committee was formed some nineteen or twenty years ago, I believe, there was no politics in the selection of the translators. In fact, though the committee was formed by a Conservative government, there were, I think, three or four translators appointed who were Liberals; but, we were looking for competent men. Unfortunately, in 1887, I believe, something happened which led a minister of the Crown to complain of some of the translators, and three of them were dismissed for political reasons. Since then politics have had something to do with these appointments. The consequence was that when the Liberals came into power in 1896, there was a great move made for friends of hon. gentlemen opposite to oust the present translators and replace them by some of their friends. I need not say that strong opposition was made to that in the committee, and it was prevented in some measure. Some of the old translators were kept, and new ones were appointed or brought in, recommended purely and simply on political grounds; and we found that a gentleman that had been recommended by the chairman of the committee knew so little about translating that for two years he never translated one line, but gave out the work to others right and left, paying them out of his own pocket, and drew his pay from the paymaster here. As complaints were coming to our committee nearly every week, we came to the conclusion that we should do something to improve the competency of that bureau. I need not say here that the French Hansard has not been what it should be. First of all, it is to-day over a month behind time.

Mr. MORIN. Thirty-five days.

Mr. BERGERON. With regard to the subject under discussion, I may tell the House that the translation in some cases, of the debates, has been done so badly, that we have had to get some of the speeches retranslated, about three weeks or a month after they appeared on the revised Hansard. We have had to get the whole translation made over again. Matters came to such a climax, that we brought before us the head of the staff, Mr. Larose, who was appointed last year, after going through a thorough examination, and who is a very competent translator, and asked him whether his men were competent to do the work. And, I may say to the House, that both sides of that committee were then united in having the business carried on independent of politics altogether. Mr. Larose came before us and it was a sad sight to see the position in which he found himself. It seemed to us that he was afraid to speak out, because some of the translators under him are brothers-in-law of members of this House, on the opposite benches. Mr. Gélinas is a brother-in-law of the hon. member for St. James Division, Montreal (Mr. Desmarais). When we saw the position in which Mr. Larose felt himself to be, we decided that the best was to have these translators undergo a thorough examination before two gentlemen, who would act as judges, and we appointed Mr. Decelles, librarian, and Mr. Coursolles, an old translator in this House, of, I think, thirty or forty years standing, to find out the fitness of these men, irrespective of any political bias. We had these men brought into this House, and each of them was given over two pages of the debates of the Senate to translate. They were under the surveillance of our most trusted clerk, and were given two hours to do their work. Their work was then examined by two judges, during the Easter recess, and the results of these examinations were then submitted to the committee by these judges after recess. Very few passed a very good examination. The report of the judges was that they were not as satisfied as they would like to be with the work of these men, who were appointed to translate the debates, and whose work, when the volumes were bound, are sent to Paris and Brussels, and other places where the French language is spoken. We then made a scale of fitness. The best translation we called A 1, without knowing the name of the individual who did the work. In no case did we know the name, but each translator signed his work with a nom de plume. The next best translation we graded as A, and I believe there were one A 1, and two A, and four B, and then we had a scale D, &c. We put aside, altogether about seven or eight, some of whom had not finished their work, and others who had translated as if they did not understand what they were translating. We did not submit the chief translator to an examination, because last year he had passed his examination before the same judges, very favourably. Nor did we ask Mr. Labine, because he had been accepted already this year, after undergoing a very thorough examination, and we also left out Mr. Beau-lieu, who has been the head of the bureau for the last eighteen years, and who was one of the examiners last year.

In the committee, one of the members, who belongs to the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, contended that we should first know the names before coming to any decision; but we took a division on his suggestion, and by eight votes to one, we decided that in order to avoid any political bias, we would not see the names, but would accept the report of the judges.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Did the judges know the names ?

Mr. BERGERON. No, the examination was carried on in a most impartial way. I do not want to say anything about Mr. Gélinas, but I may tell my hon. friend that if he pushes this thing too far, he will do Mr. Gélinas very great harm, because we have had some reports already before the committee about Mr. Gélinas, which might be brought up, and would do him more harm than good.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Better bring them out than say that.

Mr. BERGERON. No, I have said enough. Of all those who underwent an examination, Mr. Lasalle, one of the oldest translators, passed the best. There was no surprise at that. The members of the committee came to the conclusion that the examination had been carried on in a most impartial and honest way, and made their recommendation which, I think, should be accepted. If my right hon. friend knew all that we do, he would be satisfied to accept this report which was carried by a majority of his friends on the committee, and which is the only good and impartial report we could bring before the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not know Mr. Gélinas, or what his politics are. I do not know if I ever saw him, or whether he is qualified or not. I simply have stated to the House, the report which was brought to me. What was reported to me is that Mr. Gélinas is competent to do the work, though perhaps he was a degree inferior to those favourably reported on. The report to me was that while his work was not equal to that of the three gentlemen in the competitive examination, still it showed he was qualified. If Mr. Gélinas is qualified, I submit to the House that we ought to keep on an old employee who can do his work, and do it well, rather than take in another man from the outside, who may perhaps do it a little better. If Mr. Gélinas were a new employee, or one of the applicants, and came in the scale he did, I would not have a word to say, but if he was sufficiently competent, I think that in justice, he ought to be kept in his position.

Mr. BERGERON. I am under the impression, although I did not know it at the time, that Mr. Gélinas' work was amongst those which were purely and simply discarded. I speak subject to correction, but I believe he did not translate half the work given him. I may say further, it was understood that he would be kept at work until the 15th, but I believe he did not do any work since the examination. I asked the translator how that happened, and he said that this was not the first time it had occurred. I would like to put my right hon. friend's conscience at ease, by assuring him that if Mr. Gélinas had passed the examination, he would have been kept in his position.

Mr. JAMES SOMERVILLE (North Wentworth and Brant). As I am a member of that committee, I think it my duty to say something with regard to this matter. I entirely agree in everything that has been said by my hon. friend from Beauharnois with regard to the fairness and impartiality of the examination. If the members of this House were conversant with the trouble we have had in this committee for the last twelve or fifteen years in keeping the translating staff in order and seeing that their work was done, they would sympathize largely with us in our efforts to perform the duties entrusted to us, and they would sympathize with us in our present endeavour to secure good translators. In the first place, the one great difficulty with regard to the translating is that the men are working in a room outside of this building, a room down on Sussex Street. We have tried year after year to get a room in this building, so that the translating staff might be under the supervision not only of the chief of that staff, but of the chief of the reporting staff, and that the members of the committee might have some supervision over the men also. But we have failed, so far, to get a room here. I do not believe that the staff will be thoroughly efficient until they work in a room in this building, where we can see that they attend to their work and that they are here to perform it during certain hours. That is one great difficulty we have had to contend with. As to politics being considered in the matter of this appointment, I can say that that is not the case. I do not think there was the slightest desire on the part of any Liberal, but one, to know the names of the men who had passed their examination. We were willing to accept the report of the examiners to us as being a correct report, and one upon which we should make the appointments. Not only that, but we were satisfied that the examiners were competent men. They had discharged similar duties a year ago. We acted in the most impartial manner, and we appointed the men whom the examiners declared to be the most competent. I do not see for my part, on what ground the members of the House can overrule the report of the committee, if they want a good translation of the debates. We acted conscientiously and faithfully in the discharge of our duties, doing what we thought to be the best; and I am satisfied that the House will agree with us that no better system of examination could have been adopted than that followed in this case. We did not know the names of the men who had been examined. As to the man Gélinas, I do not think it would be well to state to the House—as one of the hon. members who preceded me remarked—all that came before the committee concerning him. But I may say there was a little trouble about the adoption of the committee's report. I went to the clerk of the committee, and got him to translate the report upon this man's examination; and I can say here that he did not pass an examination which would indicate that he was qualified to be one of the translators. He skipped all the hard sentences in the translation which he made; he did not translate half of the speech that was given him to translate. I am not going to say anything at all about the remarks made with reference to other matters in connection with this translator and his work in the translating bureau; but I am convinced from the examination he underwent that he is not qualified to be a translator of the debates of this House; I am satisfied that the committee recommended the men who were best qualified.

I know that it has been stated that, in the past, politics entered into the appointment of the translating staff. It will be remembered that in 1887, a minister of the Crown in the late administration had two or three of the most competent translators discharged on the ground that they had interfered in politics in the province of Quebec. That started the trouble. In making the appointments to the translating staff, the English-speaking members naturally took the advice of the French-speaking members as to the men best qualified for this office. The year before last, we had to make an appointment, and we naturally relied upon the chairman of the committee, who was one of the French-speaking members, and who lived in the city of Montreal, and ought to have known who were competent men for this work. But he actually recommended to the committee and secured the appointment of a man who could not translate, and who never did translate a line all the time he was drawing his salary as a member of the staff. After such an experience as that with the most important man in the committee, the chairman, we have had some hesitation in accepting the recommendation made by the French members of the committee. Consequently, this year we adopted the plan we did, in order that we might secure the appointment of efficient and reliable men to the staff. I think we have succeeded in getting good men—that has to be proven by their work—but, at all events, we acted honestly and conscientiously. I do not see what better method could have been followed, in order to promote the efficiency of the translation of Hansard. I think the report ought to be adopted. And, the less said about Mr. Gélinas as a translator as a member of the staff, the better for him, as he may have to make his living outside of the public service after this.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). I heartily concur in what has been said by the hon. member for North Wentworth and Brant (Mr. Somerville). I would like to add one word, and that is with reference to the presentation of the case by the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The right hon. gentleman said we had certain grades with reference to those who passed an examination. We had; and I hold in my hand a memorandum that I made at the time. There were one graded A 1; two graded A; four B; two C; and two D. When the committee decided to adopt that method of making grades as the reports were read, there was no understanding, so far as the committee was concerned, as to whether A, B, C, D, or any other grade should be considered competent. That matter was not discussed; but, no doubt, the view that the committee held was that those of the best grades should be given the appointment. There were some twelve, I think, who submitted themselves to examination, concerning whom the report was so bad that we decided not to consider them at all. We left the balance, some ten or twelve, to be considered, and this was the report when they were considered. I am perfectly satisfied that no member of the committee, when the decision was reached, understood then, and I am disposed to believe that no member of the committee except the hon. member for North Wentworth and Brant knows now what the report in regard to Mr. Gélinas' examination was. We simply decided then, that inasmuch as we had called for an examination of all the members of the translating staff, and all the candidates for the vacant positions, the logical sequence was that we should only appoint those who were best qualified, the men who passed the best examination. And when, in the committee, the real names were called for, there was an immediate protest on the part of almost all the members of the committee that that was just the information the committee did not desire—that if we were in earnest in securing the appointment of those best qualified, it was particularly desirable that we should not know their real names. When they underwent examination, each wrote his name on a slip of paper and also a non de plume; and these were sealed and placed in the hands of the clerk. The examiners did not know, in any case, who were passing the examination, and they made the report regardless of the personality of those whose papers they examined. Then, when the political question was brought up by one of the members of the committee, the feeling, apart from him, seemed to be unanimous that the question of politics should not enter into the case. One member of the committee had previously made a statement to the committee that the translation of his speech was wholly unfit for circulation, and the consequence was that the country was put to the expense of securing an additional translation of that speech. The committee felt, and I am sure the House will agree with it, that, in view of the frequent complaints that had been made it was our bounden duty to secure the appointment of only the best available translators, and that is the only motive that actuated us. Now, with regard to the statement made by the hon. member for Wentworth and Brant (Mr. Somerville), that the chairman of a year or two ago had appointed a man wholly incompetent, who had never translated a single sentence submitted to him, I may say that the moment that fact reached the ears of the committee we immediately moved for the dismissal of that man, and although there was unanimity in the committee on the question, the chairman of that day actually declined to put the motion and left the chair, with the result that a temporary chairman was appointed and the motion was passed, and an effort was then made to bring the matter before the House in order to prevent the adoption of the report. The members of this House have no conception of the constant worry to which members of the Debates Committee are subjected in connection with the translation of the debates. You, Mr. Speaker, will bear witness of the fact that day after day I have sought interviews with you in order to see if it were not possible to get the members of the translating staff transferred from their quarters on Sussex Street to a room in this House. I made the life of your predecessor burdensome by my frequent visits to him in order to secure the same result, but it seemed to be impossible. The difficulty is that members of the translating staff are allowed to go away and to remain away for days and sometimes for weeks, with the result that the member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) is able to say that the French translation is over a month behind. Now, the members of that committee are quite satisfied that ten translators are quite sufficient to do that work efficiently and to keep it right up to the mark. I believe myself that if we had a proper head for that staff, and if these translators were working in this building where they could be under the supervision of the chairman of the committee, the work would be properly performed. As we are near the end of the present parliament, I would ask that the matter be effectively regulated in order that we may not bequeath to our successors the unpleasant legacy that we have had to endure. I do not suppose that it is necessary to make any further appeal to the members of the House to adopt this report, for a more righteous conclusion never was arrived at than was arrived at on that occasion, and all the members of the committee, with one exception, were in favour of that report.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). From the point of view of the English Hansard, this act is also important. I went down to the Printing Bureau to-day and found that the French Hansard is 735 pages or columns behind, and the revised edition of the English Hansard is 324 pages or columns behind. A gentleman at the Bureau explained to me that when a member makes a speech in French in a big debate, and it is of considerable length, if the translating staff is in any way inefficient, it throws the English revised edition back. Of course, from the point of view of our French Canadian members, a backwardness of 735 pages is a very serious thing. With regard to the suggestion of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) as to rooms, I am told that there are Hansard rooms in this building never used for any purpose. If that be the case, it would be an easy thing to fit up two or three of those rooms for the translators. I quite agree with the member for Lisgar, that as long as these gentlemen hang loose, as it were, on Ottawa, and can go away when they like, having no official habitation here, the work is likely to be inefficiently accomplished. I suggest to you, Sir, that we have an inquiry as to whether there are not Hansard rooms in this building available for this purpose.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). I thoroughly commend the action of the committee; I am very glad that we have a committee that has taken the matter up in this way and pressing it energetically, and I am sure the House will support them. But I think with the speakers who have just addressed the Chamber, that we are not doing our duty by the House nor by these translators unless we bring them more within the purview of the House and closer to their work. There are plenty of rooms in this House that could be got. There is no necessity for renting a room for the translators and putting them away down where they are free from supervision. It is impossible for this committee to supervise them when they are beyond the precincts of the House. I do not think you will ever give the men a fair chance until you bring them under the official supervision of this committee. I think if the acting Minister of Public Works (Mr. Mulock) will put his mind to it—it may be difficult to make the change just now while this session is going on—he will be able to procure rooms in this House that ought to be at the disposal of the officials of the House such as this staff are. We have no rooms in this House for people to rent, that may be sources of income for any official of the House, no matter who he may be. The rooms in this House are for the official work of this parliament, and whatever other accommodation can be given to the members of the House, the officials of the House should first be provided for. I am sure that the Minister of Public Works will find that he could get sufficient roomy quarters for the ten Hansard translators, so that they will be within the purview of the committee. My own experience goes to show that these rooms could be had, they could have been had, I think, in our time. As I said before, I think the paramount claim on those rooms in the House belongs unquestionably, to the official work of the House, and when that is done, whatever we can do for the convenience of members it will be proper to do.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Are there any rooms being rented to any one?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend who is an aspiring cabinet minister, I hear, might direct his intellect towards the solution of that problem himself.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). With reference to the suggestion of the hon. member for York, (Mr. Foster), that the Department of Public Works should set apart rooms in this building, perhaps the first step in that direction would be for the committee to make a recommendation, if they think that is a desirable arrangement. I think there is a good deal in the suggestion, and if such a report were made by the committee I am sure every respect would be given to it.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. If the hon. the minister will look back he will find on record half a dozen recommendations in that direction during the past five or six years.

Mr. BERGERON. It has been done in writing and it has been done verbally, on many occasions. I may say to the Minister of Public Works, that his predecessors have never been able to do it, because the rooms in this building are supposed to belong to the Speaker. At any time when the Minister of Public Works in the old days of the Conservative government wanted to do anything, His Honour the Speaker would not allow him to have any rooms in this House because they belonged to him for his own staff. I am mentioning this because if my hon. friend wants to do anything of that sort, he will find that it will be advisable to confer with His Honour the Speaker. We do not know to whom these rooms belong, the hon. Minister of Public Works or the Speaker.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I may mention that I was chairman of a committee appointed to go into this important question, and we selected a large room downstairs that at one time was used as a restaurant. It was decided that that room would just fill the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. How would room 16 do?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It would be all right. There were about ten members who had gone down there and secured desks, and I was met with a difficulty. I had to go around among the members, and after I had worked patiently amongst them for about two weeks trying to persuade them to give up this room, I succeeded in persuading all of them but one. I think that the late Speaker would have given us that room had he not been unfortunately cut off. On the day on which you were appointed, Mr. Speaker, I went to see you in connection with the same matter, and I would again urge that you give us the use of that room. The House and the country have a right to it, and you would save $600 a year rent, which we now pay for the rooms on Sussex street. I think that it would be perfectly satisfactory and it would be large enough for the purpose.

Motion (Mr. Champagne) agreed to, and report adopted.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 155) further to amend the Militia Act.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) to explain briefly the purport of the Bill.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The purport of the Bill is simply to amend the law in such a way as to give power to appoint colonels in addition to lieutenant-colonels, and officers below the rank of lieutenant-colonels. At the present time there is no power to appoint any officer senior to the rank of lieutenant-colonel except in two cases where the Act provides that the quartermaster general and the adjutant-general may be full colonels. But, there is no power beyond that. We think that now the country has grown to a state of sufficient importance to take power to give commissions to colonels.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would be glad if my hon. friend would go a step further and explain the necessity for altering the law so as to enable the government to appoint colonels.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There is no authority under the law now to appoint colonels.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What is the change required for?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. A great many gentlemen—I think I have heard the hon. gentleman's name mentioned—I am not sure that he has accepted the position yet—but a great many gentlemen have consented to be honorary lieutenant-colonels of regiments, and it is thought only proper when appointing, as has been done in the case of several English noblemen, gentlemen of high rank, to positions of that kind, we should have power, under the law, to give them the rank of colonel. Besides that it is thought, and believed, that we have officers now in the militia of Canada who are quite deserving of, and quite competent to fill, the position of colonel in the militia. I may say, in addition, that this change has been recommended by the Imperial officers whom we have had here. Last year it was proposed to bring down an amendment of this kind, but we were not able to reach it. I am quite satisfied that the whole of the militia of the country would approve of it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Was this recommended by the General Officer Commanding?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. PRIOR. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) has omitted one matter. I see that in the last clause of this new Bill the government take power to appoint a major-general under certain conditions.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The last clause states:

In time of peace no person except the Officer Commanding the Militia shall hold higher rank in the militia than that of colonel; but Her Majesty may, whenever the militia is called out for active service in the field, appoint therein other officers of rank superior to that of colonel, but not higher in any case than that of major-general.

Clause No. 47 in the Act, as it now stands, limits the power to colonels. There is power, under the existing Act, in time of war, to appoint colonels. It is now proposed that we shall take one step above that, and that we shall take the power, during time of peace, to appoint colonels, and during time of war, to appoint to the next higher grade a major-general.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia if this recommendation of the Major-General Commanding is in the report which we have before us.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I think it is in last year's report.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no doubt that some hon. members in this House remember that when Max O'Rell commenced his lecture on the United States, on one occasion, he said:

The United States of America has a population of about 70,000,000, mostly colonels.

I do not know whether my hon. friend intends to emulate the republic in that or not.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 156) to amend the Civil Service Act. He said: Mr. Speaker, the chief purpose of this Bill is to provide for a class of officials to be known as junior second-class clerks. Some years ago we had a class of officials corresponding to this, and also a class known as third-class clerks. Both of these ranks have been abolished, and it has been found, at times, to be very inconvenient that there should be no class of clerks between a temporary clerk who begins at $400 and a second-class clerk who begins at $1,100 a year. Many cases have arisen in which it is desirable to appoint an official whose services we can hardly expect to obtain for $400 a year, and at the same time we might not wish to pay him $1,100 a year at the beginning of his official career. It seems desirable that there should be an intermediate class. We propose to create this class of clerks to be known as junior second-class clerks at a minimum salary of $600 and a maximum salary of $1,000. We provide that under exceptional circumstances the salary may be $700 a year where a candidate has, in addition to the regular examination, been able to pass in two optional subjects. There is a further provision, that, in case of a special character, a person may begin his services at $800 a year where he is a graduate of a university, or of the Royal Military College. Six hundred dollars a year is to be the ordinary minimum salary, $700 a year when he passes a special examination, and $800 in such cases as, in the judgment of the minister, may be proper ones where the candidate is a graduate of a university or of the Royal Military College. We think it will be found that these changes will be sufficient to meet the necessities that have arisen in this respect. There is another provision that in the Post Office Department the salary of a packer or sorter, the maximum of which is at present $500, may be increased to $600. These are the chief provisions of the Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is there anything in this Bill that curtails the rights of existing members of the civil service as at present enjoyed?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Nothing whatever. It simply fills in this blank between the temporary clerks and the second-class clerks.

Mr. HAGGART. How many do you propose to take power to appoint?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is a general provision, but we cannot appoint any until parliament has voted the money.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). A month ago I referred to the incompleteness of the return ordered in the case of the John C. Barr. In the revised Hansard, April 18, 3761, it will appear that precise questions were put in regard to the return, and the Minister of Customs stated that the papers not brought down were being prepared and would be laid on the Table of the House. I referred to the matter on several occasions since. On May 7, I pointed out that an important document was not brought down, and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) promised to give it his attention. The document I referred to was an answer of Mr. Ogilvie to a special instruction sent him to inquire into, among other things, the charge of attempting to obtain a British register where the ship was really owned by United States citizens. On May 10, a further supplementary return was brought down purporting to be in compliance with the order of the House of February 12. But, in that return there is no reference to the John C. Barr, although there is to several other vessels, probably in answer to a communication forwarded by Mr. Maitland Kersey. I call the attention of the government to the fact that the document I mentioned as being specially wanted has not yet been brought down.

The PRIME MINISTER. If the hon. gentleman sends me a note, I will send it to the Customs Department.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). On May 10, a return was brought down to an order of April 28, in reference to correspondence between any persons and the Department of Marine and Fisheries regarding the prohibition of the exportation of fish from Lakes Winnipegosis and Manitoba. The return is comprised entirely of one letter from a gentleman in Selkirk, and one from a firm in Montreal. It appears to me that there surely ought to be more correspondence than that. Were there no replies to those letters?

Mr. FIELDING.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The same idea occurred to me when the return was sent to me, and I wrote to the officer in charge, who informed me that the practice of the department is to bring down all returns up to the date they were moved for. Those were all the papers up to the date of the motion. There is some correspondence later than that, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Roche) desires to make a motion, I will bring it down.

Mr. ROCHE. Why not bring it down without a motion?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The supposition is that when an hon. gentleman makes a motion, he has some correspondence in his mind which he wants to get, and the correspondence up to that date has been brought down.

MONTREAL HARBOUR AND CONNERS SYNDICATE.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). I ask the acting Minister of Public Works (Mr. Mulock) if he has any information as to the negotiations carried on between the Montreal Harbour Commissioners and the Connors Syndicate. I put a similar question some time ago. I also ask if the hon. minister is aware that the floating elevators in Montreal have increased their rates by 20 per cent. If that be the case, it is calculated to do a great deal of harm to the port of Montreal, because the consensus of opinion is that the cheaper that port is made the better it is, not only for Montreal, but for all Canada.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) asked me two weeks ago if the arrangements between the Connors Syndicate and the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal had fallen through. I at once telegraphed to Mr. Mackay, chairman, for an answer, and the next day I received a communication from him informing me that they had not fallen through. My hon. friend was not in the House the following day or I would have given him the answer. However, that is the substance of the reply I received from Mr. Mackay.

Mr. BERGERON. Has my hon. friend got the details?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have not the reply with me at the moment, but I have given the tenor of it. Mr. Mackay intimated that there were some communications passing between the Harbour Commissioners and the Conners Syndicate, but negotiations had not fallen through.

Mr. BERGERON. Of course, this is a private company, but I would point out to the minister that the floating elevators are taking advantage of the lack of promptness on the part of the Conners Syndicate, and they are charging 20 per cent more than formerly.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I presume the only thing I can do is to communicate that information to the Harbour Commissioners, in the hope that it may stimulate them to greater efforts.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). As a matter of personal explanation, I would like to say, that on page 5357 of the unrevised Hansard, I am reported as quoting from page 473 of the evidence in the West Huron case. I did quote some of the evidence there, but only as far as the word 'altogether.' The reporter has added to the quotation further than that, quoting a reference to a conversation with Mr. Holmes; but, as Mr. Holmes denied that that conversation had ever taken place, I did not really quote it. The error probably arose through the reporter copying from my report of the evidence, in which I had marked the whole answer, although I read to the House only a portion of it, for the reason above mentioned. I have made the necessary correction for the revised edition.

ROYAL MINT FOR CANADA.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) I wish to call the attention of the government to an item which appeared in the New York Tribune, on the 13th instant, and which has been copied in all the Canadian newspapers. It is as follows:

Imperial interests have taken the place of all foreign questions, and despatches in the London journals from European capitals have not been so meagre for many years. Imperialism is the thing which interests every reader; even the smallest details are discussed, such as the establishment of a branch of the royal mint in Canada. A request is expected from Ottawa that Canada shall be placed on terms of equality in this respect with India, Australia and South Africa, and it will be granted at once.

In view of the fact, that there is a very strong feeling all over the country, and especially amongst the business men of British Columbia as to the advisability of a mint being established in Canada, I think it is only right that I should ask the right hon. the Premier whether there has been any communication between this government and the Imperial government, in regard to the establishment of a branch of the royal mint in Canada. There is no doubt that would be of great advantage to the people of British Columbia as well as to the whole of Canada, if a mint were established. Large amounts of gold are now being brought from the Yukon, and from other parts of the North-west to the Pacific coast, most of which goes to Seattle. I am perfectly certain that if a mint were established in British Columbia, a great deal of this gold would come there, and the men who brought it, and who could sell it, to the banks or to the mint direct, would buy supplies with the proceeds in British Columbia, instead of buying them in the United States. If the government have not already taken this matter into consideration, I would urge upon them the necessity of, at once, opening up negotiations with the Imperial government in regard to it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Mr. Speaker, this matter has engaged the attention of the Department of Finance, though there have been no official negotiations of the character indicated by the hon. gentleman. It is by no means clear that the establishment of a royal mint, under the same terms and conditions as in the case of Australia, would serve the interest of Canada. It would perhaps not be appropriate to enter into a discussion of the subject now; but I may say that there are difficulties arising out of the fact that the Australian sovereign corresponds with the English sovereign, whereas our five dollar piece does not. However, a way may be found to overcome those difficulties. The desirability of possibly having something done in the direction the hon. gentleman indicates, has engaged the attention of the government, and will continue to engage its attention, though I am not in a position at present to make any further statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask if the government have consulted the leading banks of the country on the subject?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not very recently. The Bankers' Association, by resolutions, have occasionally expressed their opinion. The bankers are somewhat divided on the subject. The president of the Bankers' Association on one occasion expressed a strong opinion in favour of a mint, but the majority, I believe, dissented from that view. The government has not had any recent communication with the bankers on the subject.

YUKON ROYAL COMMISSION.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked:

1. When was the following document, now on the Table of this House, received by the government:

(a) 'Commissioner's Office, Y.T.,
' Dawson, Feb. 20, 1899.

'Sir,—I regret to inform you that the Royal Commission for the investigation of the charges against officials has, to an extent, fallen through.

'Mr. Armstrong, chairman of the miners' committee, who drew up the memorial which led to the issuance of the commission, and Dr. McDougall, the secretary of the committee, withdrew from the investigation when they learned that the scope of the commission only included what occurred previous to August 25, the date of the memorial.

'I would have been quite willing to have gone on taking cognizance of everything up to date, but the question was raised and could not be avoided. There is no doubt, from the wording of the document, that only such things as were related to or come within the scope of the memorial, could be investigated under the commission. The "Nugget" newspaper, which has been advertising and publishing the corruption of the officials, that is, the former officials, and publishing very wild statements with reference thereto, has also withdrawn on the same ground. This the public may take as an admission that they do not consider the charges very serious. They each submitted for investigation some seven or eight malfeasances of office, of which only one or two took place since August 25. They may be perfectly honourable in their motive in withdrawing, but when you recollect that there was a great deal which could be taken up and investigated within the scope of the commission and that they have withdrawn, it looks like an admission that they were not very serious in drawing up the memorial.

'I do not wish to anticipate the report in any way, but will simply state that as far as the investigation has gone, with the exception of an ignorant half-breed doorkeeper, they have not proven any fraud against any official.

'We are going on as fast as possible, but you can understand that it takes time to investigate these matters. The witnesses are reluctant to come forward, and very often it is very difficult to find them. The charges that have already been made will be investigated, and any others that come to my knowledge definitely enough to assume form, I will also investigate. I suppose you will feel averse to granting another commission, but I do not think it would do any harm, and possibly might do a lot of good, and stop the mouths of a lot of disgruntled individuals here if you would issue me another commission under chap. 115, instead of chap. 114, authorizing me to take cognizance of all charges against officials up to, say, July 1 next.

'No good might come of this, but it might be perhaps productive of one advantage, and that would be to for ever stop the mouths of those who are now grumbling.

'You will probably see a copy of the "Nugget" of last Saturday, which treats of the affair in a most inflammatory and serious way. This sheet is run by Americans, with an Englishman for editor. It appears these people have never had any newspaper experience heretofore, and have not learned that many of the stories they hear are simply emanations of frenzied individuals who imagine they have lost a fortune because they cannot get the claim they wish, or some similar idea. As fast as I can, I will prepare a report on each special charge and transmit it to you, summing up at conclusion the general report on the whole question.

Mr. FIELDING.

'The question of the withholding of McDonald's royalty has been brought up, and we will have to investigate it. At the same time, this matter is a serious one; McDonald presumably owed the government some $70,000 for royalty due, out of which only about $2,000 was paid. Under ordinary circumstances, the man would lose all his claims, but, as this was authorized by the late commissioner, of course McDonald could not be made to suffer for his acts; but it will have a very bad effect on the minds of the public when it becomes known that such was done.

'If you can see your way clear to renewing the commission and extending it, please do so at the earliest possible date. I think that it would be politic to do it, and I would urge you, as far as lies in my power, to grant it for reasons I have above stated.

'I have the honour to be, sir,

'Your obedient servant,

'(Sgd.) WILLIAM OGILVIE,

'Commissioner.'

(b) Were the members of government other than the Minister of the Interior, aware of the receipt of this communication when, on May 15 and 29, 1899, the following questions were put and answered, May 15, 1899:

'Yukon—The commission to Mr. Ogilvie—May 15, 1899.

'Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper asked:

'1. Has any communication respecting the commission of inquiry been received by the government from Mr. Ogilvie?

'2. If so, what is the purport of such communication or communications?

'3. Has Mr. Ogilvie asked for an extension of his powers in the commission of inquiry?

'4. If so, what is the date of the request?

'5. Has any reply been sent to a communication of February 27, 1899, from the committee of miners of the Yukon, referred to by the hon. the Minister of the Interior on May 1, 1899 (Hansard, page 2329)?'

'The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton).—1 and 2. There has been no official communication on the subject. 3. Mr. Ogilvie has not asked for an extension of his powers, but in a private letter to the minister suggested that it might be desirable to extend the period to be covered by his investigation. 5. No.'

'The Yukon Investigation—May 29, 1899.

'Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper asked:

'1. Has any official or unofficial or other communication been received by the government from Mr. Ogilvie respecting the commission of inquiry?

'2. If so, what is its purport?

'3. Will the hon. the Minister of the Interior lay upon the Table of the House that portion of the private letter from Mr. Ogilvie referring to the subject to which the minister alluded on May 15, 1899, in the House of Commons?'

'The Minister of the Interior.—I have said Yes. 2. The report has been received. 3. Inasmuch as the remarks in reference to the subject are intermingled with references of an unofficial and private character, it is not considered proper to lay a copy of them upon the Table of the House.'

'Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.—The hon. gentleman has not replied to the second part of the question.'

'The Minister of the Interior.—I have said that a report has been received which indicates that it is a report from Mr. Ogilvie. The hon. gentleman does not expect me to read the report.'

(c) To whom is the document set out above (a) addressed? Was it marked private or personal? Is it complete as it stands, or have 'private and unofficial references' been eliminated?

(d) With this document before parliament, does the government now consider that the answer given on May 15 and May 29, 1899, was accurate?

(e) Why was the document of February 20, 1899 (a), withheld from parliament until the year 1900?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I beg to reply: (a) It was received by the Minister of the Interior on the 3rd of April, 1899. (b.) The Minister of the Interior at that time regarded the communication as a personal one. Whether it was at that time submitted to the government the ministers cannot recollect. (c.) 1. To Hon. Clifford Sifton, Minister of the Interior. 2. No; but as the letter was unofficial in its character the minister evidently regarded it as such. (d.) As the minister regarded the letter as a personal one, he was correct in stating that he had no official communication. (e.) Because before action was finally decided on, the minister received the commissioner's letter of the 14th of April, from which the following is an extract:

I have already intimated to you the nature of the evidence in a previous communication. A day or so after the parties who brought the charges had abandoned them, I wrote asking you to extend the commission, or issue a new one for the satisfaction of these people, thoroughly believing that they would not take advantage of it, but that the issuance of it would stop their mouths. Since that time I have come to the conclusion that the issuance of another commission, or the extension of the present one, would serve no useful purpose.

This letter of the 14th of April being a revocation of that of February 20th, there seemed no occasion for producing the latter. But when it was found that in the evidence taken at the inquiry such letter was referred to, it was produced to make the record complete.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked:

1. With reference to a statement of the hon. the Minister of Interior, made to this House on April 4, 1899, as follows:—'I have no report as yet of the result. The newspapers contain some reports, more or less reliable. I have a preliminary note from Mr. Ogilvie, saying that the report would be forwarded in a short time;' and to a return in answer to information asked for by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, Thursday, May 25, 1899, Sessional Papers No. 63d, stating that this note was 'Private,' is the document dated February 28, 1899, brought down in answer to an order of this House in 1900, Sessional Papers No. 69, the note referred to, or was there another communication on this subject not brought down?

2. Was the government aware, on the date of the above statement, that Mr. Ogilvie had reported to Mr. Sifton, privately or otherwise, as follows:—'I regret to have to inform you that the Royal Commission for the investigation of charges against officials has, to an extent, fallen through.'

* * * * *
 'The question of the withholding of McDonald's royalty has been brought up and we will have to investigate it. At the same time, this matter is a serious one; McDonald presumably owed the government some $70,000 for royalty dues, out of which only about $2,000 was paid. Under ordinary circumstances, the man would lose all his claims, but as this was authorized by the late commissioner, of course McDonald could not be made to suffer for his act; but it will have a very bad effect on the minds of the public when it becomes known that such was done.'

3. Were the documents communicated to any of the members of this House, who on April 13, 1899, were asked to support the following resolution:—

'That we have observed with pleasure that on receipt of complaints against some of the officials in the Yukon district, His Excellency's government took prompt action to inquire into the matter of such complaints by appointing Mr. William Ogilvie as a commissioner for that purpose. Having entire confidence in the integrity and ability of Mr. Ogilvie, we are satisfied that his inquiry will be impartial and thorough, and that it will place His Excellency's advisers in possession of all the information necessary to enable them to do justice to all parties concerned?'

4. Was the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries aware of the above report or letter from Mr. Ogilvie, when he said, on the 14th April, 1899, in the debate on the said resolution:

'What did Mr. Ogilvie do? He opened his court and said: I shall not apply the strict rules of evidence which obtain in the ordinary courts of law, but I invite any man to come forward, who has any evidence whatever to give against any one of these officials, and to give that evidence without fear. He published circulars throughout the whole of the Yukon, he issued subpoenas to compel the attendance of every man whose name was given him as a possible witness, and he added that, under the power conferred upon him by the statute and his Royal Commission, everybody could give evidence without fear that that evidence would ever be used against him. He quoted the section of the statute providing that no man could be prejudiced because the evidence he gave could never be used against him in court afterwards, and the newspapers which were clamouring for investigation out there published editorial after editorial, imploring the men who said they had evidence to give to come forward and give it to this tribunal. Now is the time, they said. The government has granted your request; Mr. Ogilvie has come out to investigate; you have the protection of the law and can give your evidence without the fear of its ever afterwards being brought up against you, your evidence will go before the parliament of Canada, and you cannot be prejudiced in any way. Come forward, therefore, and give it. I will not say what the result has been, because I have only gathered that result from the public press, but we have not heard from any honourable gentleman in this House that any very damning evidence has been given. But let me say this: When that report comes down before this House, if there is any body of men in this House who believe that the investigation should be prosecuted further, who think it should be continued so as to embrace charges after the 25th August, who believe that any special charge has been left without thorough investigation, the government will see that the fullest investigation is given. We are determined that not a stone shall be left unturned to get to the bottom of every charge which has been made against any government official in that territory.

'And if this commission, by reason of any limitation in its power or in the construction put upon it by the lawyers, cannot attain that end, this government will enlarge the commission and will see that justice is done. There will be no skulking behind any law points, there will be no attempt to evade the investigation on the ground that the commission has not authority. If that commission does not give authority another commission can; and if there is any witness who will forward to the government a statement that he can prove a charge of wrong-doing against the officials there which is beyond Mr. Ogilvie's power to investigate, he may rely upon it that an investigation will be held. Sir, what reason under heaven can this government have to shrink from the amplest and fullest investigation.'

5. Referring to the following extracts from the report of proceedings before Mr. Ogilvie laid on the Table of this House, what representations, if any, for a further commission, not included in the above return, was made by him?

On the 22nd day of February, being the second day of the inquiry:—

'The Commissioner—Suppose you take up those charges that occurred before the 25th August and go on with them until the question is settled. Personally I want to make the commission as full and general as possible, I am stopped, though, through a legal technicality'; and afterwards:—

'Mr. Tabor.—Have we had your ruling, sir, regarding the point as to whether you will admit evidence on charges subsequent to August 25?

'The Commissioner.—Do you want it now? I have consulted with the legal adviser here and have come to the conclusion that I can only hear charges under that commission that occurred before August 25. If there is any way in which I can go on and hear others, I am quite willing to do so.—if there is any legal method—and further, I intend to refer the matter to the minister and ask for another commission or an enlargement of this.

'Mr. Tabor.—As I read the commission, Mr. Commissioner—

'The Commissioner.—It is clear in the commission. I cannot legally administer an oath to witnesses giving evidence on charges after that date, neither can I subpoena witnesses.

'Mr. McDougal.—Is there no appeal from the decision of that legal point? Can we bring before Judge Dugas the legal points involved in that decision?

'Mr. Clement.—No. The wording of the commission is perfectly clear. There is not a scintilla of doubt about it. You can't get over it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

'Mr. McDougal.—There is no appeal?

'Mr. Clement.—No.

'Mr. McDougal.—I know little of law, but it doesn't appear to me that the meaning of that document excludes the examination of evidence as to misconduct that occurred after August 25. Now these charges were made in the letter; have been made since; are still made; and made every day, and the examination should be made into matters into which the commission refers. There is nothing referred to as to time at all. The document does not say that the charges prior to that shall be examined, but that an examination shall be made into the statements and complaints. They refer to certain actions made from day to day, and made still, and it is utterly impossible to read it any other way than that this investigation should consider charges up to the present time.

'The Commissioner.—Unfortunately it is otherwise.

* * * * *

'The Commissioner.—My legal adviser has advised me that I cannot legally administer an oath in any transaction that occurred after that date; and if I do I might get into trouble.

'Colonel McGregor.—I have no desire to induce you to go beyond your power.

'The Commissioner.—If there is any other legal way to take the investigation up, I will do so and will urge the minister by the next mail to extend this commission, or have a new one. Regarding the letter that was read yesterday, by Mr. Armstrong—that is only the deputy minister's opinion, and perhaps under the instructions of the minister. Even the minister doesn't always utter the law. Even the minister cannot override the law. I am sorry I am stopped.

'Colonel McGregor.—I have never had any desire that charges should be proved against the officials; but to give general satisfaction. I am speaking on behalf of the committee, of which I was one. All I can say is that that order does not satisfy the committee.

'The Commissioner.—I regret that as much as you do, and perhaps more.

'Mr. McDougal.—Can you be surprised that any one cannot carry on a prosecution which commences say February 25, before which no matters can be brought up which occurred after August 25.

'The Commissioner.—It may be surprising, but all I can say is I am quite as much surprised and disappointed as you are. I regret it, but I will take such steps by any legal method I can to go on with the investigation, and if you wish I shall ask for an enlargement of the commission, or a new one to end on such a date so that everybody will be satisfied. I cannot override the commission; there is no use. I will write the minister at once and urge him strongly to give another commission or to have this one enlarged. One is as easy as the other.

* * * * *

'The Commissioner.—It is only a one-sided investigation; some of the people are here and some in Ottawa.'

6. Referring to the above assurances of Mr. Ogilvie and to the above communication from Mr. Ogilvie, dated February 28, 1899, wherein he says:—

'I suppose you will feel adverse to granting another commission, but I do not think it would do any harm, and possibly it might do a lot of good and stop the mouths of a lot of dis-grunted individuals here if you would issue me another commission under chapter 115, instead of chapter 114, authorizing me to take cognizance of all charges against officials up to say the 1st of July next'; and to the report of the Minister of the Interior, October 7, 1898, preceding the Royal Commission limited as above, wherein 'the minister represents that in his opinion it is highly important that a full investigation should be made into the charges and complaints set forth in the said communication, and into any others that may be preferred.' 'The minister, therefore, recommends that under the authority of chapter 114, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, entitled: "An Act respecting Inquiries concerning Public Matters," a commission do issue, appointing William Ogilvie, Esquire, the Commissioner of the Yukon Territory, a commissioner under the said Act, to inquire into the charges and complaints set forth in the said communication and into any other charges or complaints that any person in the Yukon Territory may desire to prefer against the officials of the government of Canada in that territory, and to report thereon and upon all other matters incidental thereto.'

What communication, private or official, if any, passed between the said minister and the said Mr. Ogilvie before the private letter of April 14, 1899, brought down, wherein the latter wrote:—

'I have already intimated to you the nature of the evidence in a previous communication. A day or so after the parties who brought the charges abandoned them. I wrote asking you to extend the commission or issue a new one for the satisfaction of these people, thoroughly believing that they would not take advantage of it, but that the issuance of it would stop their mouths. Since then I have come to the conclusion that the issuance of another commission or the extension of the present one would serve no useful purpose.'

7. Did Mr. Ogilvie ever advise the parties to whom he give the assurances of the above that he had written the said letter of April 14, the substance of which is contained in this private letter?

8. Having regard to the statement of Mr. Ogilvie that he was stopped from making the inquiry full and general, through a legal technicality, what did the hon. the Minister of the Interior mean when he informed this House on June 29, 1899:—

'Mr. Ogilvie was determined that the investigation would be thorough, and he was not going to allow any lawyer to dictate to him in regard to technicalities or the rules of evidence.'

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In reply to questions 1, 2, 3, 4, there do not appear to be any letters in regard to the extension of the commission other than those included in the return, so that the letter in question is probably the one which was referred to by the Minister of the Interior. Ministers are unable to state when the letter of Mr. Ogilvie was first brought to their attention. 5. None. 6. Neither the records of the department nor the minister's private files, show that any correspondence took place other than the letter of the 28th of February, 1899, between the minister and Mr. Ogilvie, on the subject prior to the letter of the 14th of April, 1899. 7. The government is not aware as to whether Mr. Ogilvie did so or not. 8. I understood that the Minister of the Interior meant that Mr. Ogilvie was determined that within the scope of the commission the investigation would be thorough, and that he was not going to allow any lawyer to dictate to him in regard to technicalities or rules of evidence. It was well understood that the policy of the government was that no formal inquiry could properly be held in respect to vague newspaper rumours and anonymous statements as to irregularities in the administration of affairs in the Yukon, but that the moment a charge was made on the responsibility of some person prepared to give evidence in support of it a commission would issue. The first charges which could properly be made the basis of an inquiry were formulated on the 25th of August, and the commission issued. It, of course, could not go beyond that date, but in going to that date it covered the time of the alleged occurrences which were made the subject of the hon. gentleman's first complaints, and the report shows that Mr. Ogilvie's conduct of the inquiry was such as to justify the minister's statement.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked:

1. Has the government considered the subject referred to in the papers brought down to this House as follows:—

Private (?) letter of February 28, 1899, from Mr. Ogilvie to the Minister of the Interior:—

'The question of the withholding of McDonald's royalty has been brought up and we will have to investigate it at the same time. This matter is a serious one. McDonald presumably owed the government some $70,000 for royalty dues, out of which only about $2,000 was paid. Under ordinary circumstances the man would lose all his claims, but, as this was authorized by the late commissioner, of course McDonald could not be made to suffer for his act; but it will have a very bad effect on the minds of the public, when it becomes known that such was done.'

(Confidential.)

'Dawson City, Y.T., July 20, 1898.

'Alexander McDonald, Esq.,

'Dawson City, Y.T.

'Dear Sir,—I have just received your letter of to-day with regard to the royalty and the manner in which it would affect your interests if collected at once. I fully realize the value of all your mining interests and of the work you have devoted to their development, and also appreciate the fact that besides expending large sums of money in this way, you have also re-invested largely in this territory, instead of simply removing the gold from the mines and sending it outside.

'I believe from what you say, and from what I have learned from other sources, that to insist on the payment of the royalty on your total output at once might be embarrassing to you.

'I am sure the Canadian government recognize the value of your services in developing the country. I would not care to do anything which might seriously interfere with you.

'I do not see anything unreasonable in your proposition to pay one-half of the royalty in September next and the other half in May, 1899. I will write the gold commissioner instructing him that you are to have the time mentioned in which to make your payments.

'I am yours truly,

'J. M. WALSH,
'Commissioner of the Yukon.'

(Confidential.)

'Commissioner's Office,
'Dawson, July 22, 1898.

'Thomas Fawcett, Esq.,
'Gold Commissioner, Dawson.

'Dear Sir,—I inclose a copy of a letter I am forwarding to Mr. Alexander McDonald, in reply to a communication from him applying for an extension of time for the payment of royalties due by him this season. You will please be guided in accordance therewith, and give the necessary instructions to the inspectors of mines.

'I have the honour to be, sir,

'Your obedient servant,

'J. M. WALSH,
'Commissioner, Yukon District.'

'Dawson, July 22, 1898.

'Hon. J. Morrow Walsh,
'Commissioner of the Yukon District,
'Dawson.

'Sir,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of your favour of to-day, inclosing copy of a letter forwarded by you to Mr. Alex. McDonald. I have noted the contents of said inclosed copy and will govern myself accordingly.

'I have the honour to be, sir,

'Your obedient servant,

'THOMAS FAWCETT,
'Gold Commissioner.'

The report of April 27, 1899, of Mr. Ogilvie, which says:—

'You will also see that some inquiry was made into the laying over of Mr. Alex. McDonald's royalty, and an explanation furnished for the same. All the evidence submitted in this connection was that furnished in the letters between Major Walsh, Mr. McDonald and Mr. Fawcett.

'There appears to have been no wrong-doing in this, at least none was made manifest, Major Walsh taking the view that it would be impolitic to exact Mr. McDonald's royalty, as it would put him to considerable hardship if he was compelled to pay it, and later on, his paying it would benefit the country as much as if he had paid it last spring.'

2. Has the government ever examined Mr. Alexander McDonald's letter of July 20, 1898, to which Mr. Walsh refers in his letter of that date? Is it in his possession or under the control of the government?

3. Is the government aware that notwithstanding Mr. Ogilvie's report as above the following evidence was given before him:—

'Mr. Fawcett.—For a moment I would like to ask Mr. Calder about the Alex. McDonald royalty question. I want to ask him a question.

'The Commissioner.—You are still under oath, Mr. Calder.

'By Mr. Fawcett:

'Q. Do you know that Alex. McDonald's royalty was laid over for a time; the payments of it?—A. I have no positive knowledge.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

'Q. Do you believe it was laid over?—A. Yes.

'Q. Have you any knowledge of any other person's royalty being laid over?—A. No, I have not. The only question of laying over the royalty was this letter.

'Q. You have no knowledge of any other case?—A. No, none whatever.

'Mr. Fawcett.—That is all.'

And again, that Mr. Fawcett, the gold commissioner, testified that Mr. Wade decided the question of giving this water front to Alexander McDonald, and 'Water Front Case.

'Mr. George being called and sworn, testified as follows:—

'By Dr. Bourke:

'Q. Will you be good enough to tell us what you know about the water front; you are conversant with everything. Tell the court all you know. I think that is the best way?—A. I should judge that any information at my disposal which you would be interested in would be that regarding an interview I had with Mr. Wade regarding the water front. He was very frank in a great many matters, and, as is my wont, I put many impertinent questions. I remember one question distinctly: "Mr. Wade, what part of this money did you get of this water front?" He said: "I got no share of it." I waited a while and repeated the question again: "Is there any of this money coming to you?" He replied (by the way, I would like to preface my remarks by saying that this was a public interview; it was for the press; I had my note-book and pencil in my hand at the time). He replied, none, unless a certain fee he had received from Mr. Alexander McDonald could be considered in that light of a division of the profits. I got him to make me a statement of what that fee consisted. He said he had immediately after his decision which gave Morrison and McDonald the water front, he had been retained by Alexander McDonald for his attorney for one year, and had been given a handsome bonus as a retainer fee.'

And that Mr. Wade, after leasing in April, 1898, the water front to Messrs. Morrison and Alexander McDonald, testified as follows:—

'As to the question of a retainer, Mr. Commissioner, I admit that I was retained by Morrison & McDonald to look after their legal business. That was the result of negotiations after the leasing of the water front. The retainer was purely for my legal services. At the same time I received a retainer or yearly salary from Morrison & McDonald, I received numerous retainers—really yearly salaries—from other prominent people in business here, including the N. A. T., Mr. Patrick Calvin, the A. C. Company, at or about the same time, just showing what practice was then; besides, there was Engellman, Col. Bowie and others. And I need not mention them all. The retainers which I received for my legal services would look large in the east; but, at any rate, they were the current retainers here; and I received them from all these people; and I was no more to give legal services to McDonald & Morrison than to any other of the people I have mentioned. Such a thing never entered my mind, nor the minds, I am sure, of Morrison & McDonald. Never dreamt of such a thing. Considering the volume of law business of McDonald & Morrison—the largest in the Yukon, the retainer was reasonable and was for legal services only.'

4. What information has the government in support of Mr. Ogilvie's statement in his private letter above that 'McDonald presumably owed the government some $70,000 for royalty dues, out of which only about $2,000 was paid'?

5. What are the actual facts as to the amounts due, the dates when due, the date when paid, respecting which the above indulgence was ordered?

6. Referring to the following statement of the hon. Minister of the Interior on June 29, 1899:

'I wish to say to the House what the position of the government, in connection with these charges, is. The position is this: So soon as charges were made against our officers, we sent a commission to Mr. Ogilvie—the only man who was in a position to investigate them, because at that time we could not have sent a judge in over the ice—to make an examination. We had complete confidence in Mr. Ogilvie's integrity and in his desire to make a thorough and complete investigation. He has made an investigation; we have not yet received his full report; but what we say in regard to it is, that when we get the remainder of Mr. Ogilvie's report, we will give this whole subject, and the evidence that is contained in it, our fullest and most careful consideration. We will give every fact, every alleged fact, that is brought before the government and brought before parliament, our fullest and most careful consideration. And if there is the least ground for finding that there should be any further or more complete investigation, we will provide that that further and more complete investigation shall take place.'

Will there be further or more complete investigation into the matter? If yes, by what means and when? If not, why not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I beg to reply: 1. The subject-matter of the correspondence quoted was not submitted to council. It was disposed of by the Department of the Interior on the report of the comptroller of the Yukon Territory. 2. No. The letter was never forwarded to headquarters. 3. Yes. 4. None; the official report of the comptroller goes to show the amount to have been overstated. 5. The amount due was $36,128.13, for the output for the year 1898; $2,100 was paid on the 26th of August, 1898, and $34,028.13 on the 20th of June, 1899. The government are not aware of any facts which call for further investigation.

MR. CHAS. A. GASS.

Mr. DAVIN asked:

1. Did the Postmaster General receive a petition or petitions against his taking the course of dismissing Mr. Chas. A. Gass from the postmastership of Moosejaw?

2. Was one of the petitions professedly signed exclusively by Liberals?

3. Will the Postmaster General place on the Table the report made by the inspector as to the manner in which Mr. Gass discharged his duty?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. Yes. 2. Yes. 3. Yes, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) desires it.

Mr. DAVIN. I shall be glad if my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) would do that.

YUKON—DREDGING LICENSES, TESLIN RIVER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked:

Referring to the following letters now on the Table of this House:

Ottawa, January 12, 1898.

To the Honourable
The Minister of the Interior,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—I desire to apply for a dredging license for that part of the Teslin River commencing at the upper boundary of application Reference No. 54079, and from thence extending up stream a distance of thirty miles.

Yours truly,
A. E. PHILP,
(For Frank Barrett),
Vancouver, B.C.

Ottawa, March 4, 1898.

Hon. Minister of the Interior,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I beg to apply for dredging lease on Teslin River for thirty miles, applied for under Reference No. 54299.

FRANK BARRETT,
Per his Attorney,
A. E. Philp.

(a) Was Mr. Philp or Mr. Barrett, care of A. E. Philp, Esq., on or about March 11, 1898, informed that as to the application for permission to dredge for minerals other than coal in thirty miles of the submerged bed of the Teslin River formerly applied for by you, and which you were informed would be leased to you upon payment of the rental on or before February 15 (or words to that effect), the whole stretch of the river had been covered by other applicants?

(b) If so, did the regulations then in force warrant an assurance of a lease covering thirty miles?

(c) Was the whole or any part of the river stretch referred to in paragraph (a) covered by other applicants between February 15 and March 11, 1898?

(d) If it was, by whose application was it and each part of said river, respectively, covered, and how many miles were covered by each applicant, and for what time did each application so cover?

(e) Has any lease been granted of the whole or any portion of the stretch of river referred to in paragraph (a)?

(f) If the answer to paragraph (e) be in the affirmative, what is the date of each lease, what is the name of each lessee, and how much rental has each lessee paid?

(g) If no lease has been granted, when did the last option for a lease expire?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. (a) Mr. Burnett was advised in care of Mr. A. E. Philp on March 11, 1898, as follows:

I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th instant, applying for permission to dredge for minerals other than coal in thirty miles of the submerged bed of the Teslin River, formerly applied for by you, and which you were informed would be leased to you upon payment of the rental on or before the 15th ultimo.

In reply I am to say that the whole of this river stretch has, since the above date, been covered by other applications, and the applicants have been given a certain period within which to pay the rental thereof.

(b) Yes, but at a later date Mr. Burnett applied for 10 miles elsewhere, so that he could only be allowed 20 miles on the Teslin River. (c) The whole was covered. (d) 1. E. H. Smith, 85 to 90 miles from mouth of river. To March 28, 1898; 2. John Dunlop, 65 to 85 miles, from mouth of river. To March 31, 1898; 3. Geo. Sutherland, 60 to 65 miles, from mouth of river. To March 28, 1898. (e) Yes. (f) W. L. Parrish, 60 to 70 miles, March 8, 1898, $1,000; D. C. Catlin, 70 to 75 miles, January 19, 1900, $500. (g) May 3, 1900, for 75 to 99 miles from mouth of river.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—STORES FOR FORCES IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

Has the Canadian government, or any member thereof, or any officer acting under the government, been requested by the Imperial government to act for them in providing in Canada stores, in the shape of uniforms, boots and other military equipments, for the supply of the forces operating in South Africa? If so, what are the conditions under which has the government of Canada, or officer thereof, undertaken to provide these equipments? If the Canadian government, or officer thereof, have acted as above stated, did the government of Canada call for tenders to provide these equipments at the lowest prices to the Imperial government, as would have been done had these equipments been required by the Canadian government?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The answer to the question is : No.

YUKON TERRITORY—LANDS UNDER LICENSE.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

1. What is the number of acres of land under license in the Yukon Territory?
2. The amount paid, per square mile, to secure such licenses?
3. The amount charged for the right of cutting on each cord of wood cut, and on the cutting of the logs per thousand feet, board measure?
4. The amount of yearly rental for each square mile?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. 129,920 acres. 2. The first nine berths granted in the Yukon Territory, were disposed of at public competition, the average bonus, per square mile received, being $172.35. A bonus at the rate of $250 per square mile has been paid for each berth subsequently granted. 3. Cordwood, 50 cents per cord. Logs, $2 per thousand feet, B. M. 4. No rental is charged for timber berths in the Yukon Territory—held under permit or license.

Mr. SUTHERLAND.

SOLICITOR GENERAL AND ADMINISTRATION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

Is the government aware that Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick is one of the counsel defending Mrs. Mooney, who is being prosecuted at the Quebec Criminal Assizes for the murder of her husband? Is this Mr. Charles Fitzpatrick who is defending the accused against the Crown, the same Mr. Fitzpatrick who holds in the Laurier government the position of an officer of the Crown, namely, that of Solicitor General? Does he hold this two-fold position of defender of the Crown and defender of criminals against the Crown, with the knowledge and authorization of the government?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The administration of criminal justice in each province is under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities, and the prosecution of persons charged with crime, rests with the law officers of the Crown in the province, and not with the law officers of the Crown of the Dominion. The Solicitor General has no official status before any provincial court in the prosecution of persons accused of crime.

MOLOCANI AND STUNDISTS.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

1. Is it true that certain people called Molocani and Stundists are about to come to this country?
2. What race and what country do they belong to?
3. What is their social condition?
4. What is their means of subsistence?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The department is not in possession of any information to answer the question.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE—HARDWARE SUPPLIES.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. On May 7 the right hon. the Prime Minister stated that the last time tenders for supplying hardware to the Mounted Police of the North-west Territories was in December, 1895 (that is, in the last current year of the late Liberal-Conservative government); that since then no tenders have been called for; that lists of articles required were sent to responsible firms; that the prices of J. H. Ashdown, Winnipeg, were found to be the most favourable; that hardware has been principally supplied by the Gurney Stove Company, Winnipeg, and J. H. Ashdown. To what firms, besides these two, were lists of articles sent?
2. To what percentage, if any, were the prices of J. H. Ashdown and the Gurney firm more favourable than those of the other (if any) firms?
3. How much has been paid to J. H. Ashdown since June 30, 1896?
4. How much to the Gurney firm?
5. What are the names of all the firms who have been paid for supplying hardware to the amount of $1,000 and over?
6. How much has been paid to each?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier. 1. The Commissioner of the Mounted Police reported that he had sent schedules to the leading Winnipeg firms, and to local firms in the Territories; and that those who responded were: J. H. Ashdown, Winnipeg; Miller, Morse & Co., Winnipeg; The Hudson's Bay Co., Winnipeg; A. F. Grady, Macleod, for part only. 2. Comparison of the quotations of the three complete tenders—on the basis of approximate quantities—produced the following results:

Miller, Morse & Co.....	$7,492 60
J. H. Ashdown.....	6,759 04
Hudson's Bay Co.....	6,724 20

The prices of J. H. Ashdown and the Hudson's Bay Company, being so nearly the same, preference was given to the former, whose business is exclusively hardware, and who understands exactly what is required for police purposes. 3, 4, 5, and 6. Are answered by the annexed statement:

2. Is there a report to that effect before the department?

3. Is the government aware that the said Mr. Ouellette declared, under oath, at the last revision of the voters' list, that he was the proprietor of the said barber's shop?

4. Is it the intention of the government to allow this state of things to continue?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Mr. Agapit Ouellette is not mail clerk. 2. The Post Office Department is not aware that Mr. Agapit Ouellette keeps a barber shop at Lévis, nor is it concerned in ascertaining whether such be the case, as Mr. Ouellette is not an employee of the department, but a contractor under agreement to do certain specific work, and so long as that work is done in accordance with the requirements of the contract, the department does not feel warranted in inquiring how Mr. Ouellette employs the remainder of his time.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES AS INSURANCE AGENTS.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Bergeron) asked:

Have the government compelled an employee of the immigration department to resign an insurance agency, giving as their reason for so doing that the government employees must apply themselves to their official duties only?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No.

I.C.R.—Mr. AGAPIT OUELLETTE.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Mr. Bergeron) asked:

1. Does Mr. Agapit Ouellette, mail clerk at Lévis station of the Intercolonial Railway, keep a barber's shop at Lévis?

RAILWAY SLEEPERS ON INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. POWELL asked:

How many railway sleepers were supplied to the Intercolonial Railway extension from the Chaudière Junction to Ste. Rosalie, during the year ending June 30, 1899, and charged to maintenance of line?

What was the total cost of said sleepers?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The number of sleepers, 17,289, charged to maintenance on that section. Total cost, $3,081.06.

4. Was this information open to the public as a matter of course?

5. Do the same rules in this connection prevail as obtain in respect to applications for timber leases?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. The public, including Mr. Philp, were informed, upon making application, of the portions of the rivers applied for and granted. The names of the lessees were furnished, but not the names of applicants. 2. Yes. 3. The chief clerk of the Timber and Mines Branch. 4. Yes. 5. Yes.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—LIST OF CASUALTIES.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to inform the House of the substance of a cablegram received on Saturday night from South Africa, reporting the following casualties on the 10th instant :

Killed—No. 7193, Private F. G. W. Floyd, 7th Fusiliers.

Wounded—No. 7018, Pte. E. Armstrong, R.C.A. (slight); No. 7208, Pte. G. W. Leonard, 22nd Regiment, 'Oxford Rifles' (dangerous); No. 7221, Pte. A. R. McLean, 38th Regiment, 'Dufferin Rifles' (severe).

I also desire, Mr. Speaker, to refer again to a matter which has been before the House on two occasions. It was brought up by the hon. leader of the opposition in reference to proofs of death which the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation has been endeavouring to obtain. In order to make the statement of the case complete, I would like to read further communications just received, copies of which have been forwarded to the company. They are as follows :

My Lord,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your despatch No. 88 of March 26 respecting the evidence of death required by the Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation in the case of members of the first Canadian contingent killed in South Africa, and in reply to transmit to you, for the information of your ministers, copy of a correspondence with the War Office on the subject.

I have, &c.,

2. I am also to request that the statement required by the corporation in the case of Granville Johnston may, if possible, be supplied.

SUPPLIES FOR THE HALIFAX GARRISON.

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). There was a question on the paper the other day which was partially answered in the absence of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), and I see that the question has been removed from the Order paper instead of being allowed to stand. It is as respects the prices that were paid for meat by the Department of Militia and Defence at Halifax for the garrison. If my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) has the information I would be glad to receive it.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I stated that the prices are the contract prices paid by the Imperial authorities. I will see that all the information is given.

PRINCE OF WALES FUSILIERS.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.). On the last day for questions the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden) promised to let me know the amount of money that was paid the Prince of Wales Fusiliers for new uniforms. Has the hon. gentleman that information?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). No, I have not, but I will get it.

OCEAN STEAMSHIP SUBSIDIES.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 151) to amend the Act relating to ocean steamship subsidies. He said: Hon. gentlemen will remember the resolution that we passed the other day. This Bill is a facsimile of the resolution.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported and read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE, 1892, AMENDMENT.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 137) further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.—(Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) why he does not proceed with the motion that is before the House in amendment to going into Committee of Supply. I think the usual procedure is that such cases take precedence of a motion of that kind. I hope my right hon. friend does not intend to prevent this House any longer from dealing with one of the most important questions which has ever been under its consideration and which it is absolutely necessary should be dealt with now.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The reason is that the other day, when this Bill was called, at the request of the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) who stated that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) wanted to be here to discuss it, the Bill was postponed and we took up this other motion, and for the further reason that we want to clear the paper of these Bills.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). I suppose the Speaker has left the Chair. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) knows that when I made that request, there was no motion by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to go into Committee of Supply, and consequently this motion by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) had not been moved. It was quite within the power of the hon. gentleman who had charge of the Bill to say whether we should go on with the Bill at a future occasion, which he very graciously did in order to have the presence and aid of legal gentlemen from his own province when he took up the Bill. After that had been done then comes the hon. Minister of Finance's motion to go into Committee of Supply, and then this resolution is moved. I do not think the precedent was ever before broken that when we had a motion made, involving a want of confidence in the government, if they do not accede to the proposition, they take up other business before they know whether they have the confidence of the House or not. I do not feel like going on and taking up these other Bills until we have disposed of this motion and certainly I doubt very much if my right hon. friend makes much progress by that means.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I be permitted to ask my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), if this procedure is for the purpose of enabling the government to give further consideration to the very important question, as to whether they will accept the motion of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden), in reference to the Huron and Brockville elections. If that is the case, it will furnish a reason, but otherwise the House is bound to an answer from the Prime Minister as to the ground on which he violates the established precedent of the House, in reference to the manner in which public business is conducted.

On section 332,

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read the clause.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). Mr. Chairman, in view of what has been said by the leader of the opposition, I do not think it would be fitting for hon. gentlemen to allow the Prime Minister to escape his responsibility in silence. I as a member of this committee, object to being dragooned into this business, and this way of doing business. I object to be met simply by the sheer strength of numbers—for there is no show or pretense of reason given—and being thrust into a discussion of this Criminal Code when there is another important matter before the House, which according to precedent, should be disposed of. I protest against this intervention on the part of the government in a motion challenging their right to go into supply. Until that motion is disposed of, we should not proceed with this other business. I wish to see whether the House is willing to be dragooned on the mere caprice of the government—for they have given no reason, but remained silent—into considering this Bill, before the Prime Minister or some member on the Treasury benches speaking for the government, gives a reason for this unusual procedure. I beg to move that this committee do now rise.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend knows—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have made a motion, and I think it should be put.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Campbell) having put the motion that the committee do now rise.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), and the leader of the opposition, and every gentleman opposite knows, that the debate which has now arisen is out of order. The moment that the Speaker left the Chair no member had a right to speak on any other subject than that before the House. It was through courtesy that I allowed my hon. friend to put an observation to which I gave an answer, and when the answer was given, I took it that the incident should have been closed for the day. The government has no intention whatever of avoiding the responsibility of the motion moved by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), but the government would remind the hon. gentlemen opposite that there are such things as courtesies extended from one side of the House to the other. We knew that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) would move his amendment the moment we proposed to go into supply. When the present item, in reference to the Criminal Code was before the House the other day, the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) asked that it should not be proceeded with further, as several gentlemen, notably the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain)—wished to be present. The Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) yielded readily to the request made, and this afternoon when the hon. gentleman from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) is in his seat, we propose to proceed with the discussion of this Bill which was postponed the other night. My hon. friend says there is an important motion before the House. There is indeed, and I am surprised that gentlemen opposite should insist on taking this motion on a Monday in a thin House, and decide to wait until another day when we could have a full House to discuss it. This Criminal Code Bill was postponed at the request of gentlemen opposite to allow certain members to be present; and when we resume the discussion at the earliest possible date, and with the member for Montmorency in the House—or he was in the House until a few moments ago—I am surprised that these gentlemen opposite should object to it. The hon. the leader of the opposition was not in the House on Friday evening when this took place. I ask him this: When certain procedure is consented to for the mutual convenience of members, and when one order is postponed and another taken up, does he think that the amenities of the House are to be preserved by making this objection under such circumstances. Is that the way that engagements entered into, whether formally or tacitly, between both sides are to be carried out. Does he think it fair between party and party that when the government propose to resume this order, postponed at the request of gentlemen opposite, that such objection should now be interposed. This is a Bill which is purely technical, and the discussion of which will be confined chiefly to the legal members of this House, and does not the hon. gentleman think that it would be more convenient to every one that we should proceed with it. My hon. friend must know that upon this motion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Borden), there are certain members absent who want to speak on it, and even if there was no other reason than the general convenience, I think we should proceed with this order now before us. Mr. Chairman, I speak feelingly on this matter. I want to ask hon. gentlemen opposite, whether we are to have a regular understanding between both sides carried out or not. I am quite prepared to take the motion of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden), but I ask that we should, this afternoon, dispose of the order which we were proceeding with the other day, and which we simply laid aside at the request of hon. gentlemen opposite and for their convenience. For the same convenience, I ask that this order be proceeded with, and we shall then be quite prepared to take up the motion of my hon. friend from Halifax. But I am surprised, I say frankly to the hon. leader of the opposition, and I venture to say that if he had been here on Friday afternoon, and knew what took place then, he would not now ask what he has asked, but would allow us to proceed with this order. I ask that an engagement made in that way should be respected.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) My hon. friend is rather surprising in this new mood of his. Perhaps he will go back a little further than Friday; perhaps he will go back to Thursday night, when I asked the question, as to the business for Friday, in order that we might be prepared to go on with the motion of my hon. friend from Halifax, and the right hon. gentleman said that he would exhaust the Bills in the government orders. Therefore, my hon. friend from Halifax, had really made all preparations for going to New York, with the idea that there would not be any supply asked for on Friday. By a piece of good luck, if we may so term it, for some reason or other, my hon. friend from Halifax did not go to New York, and he happened to be here. But, Sir, it was a very great surprise to us on this side of the House, when there were not more than eighteen or twenty members in the House, that the hon. gentleman should go on with supply, without exhausting the government Bills, and force my hon. friend in so small a House, to open up his case. That was the important period for a debate of this kind: It was the laying down of the whole case, when, if ever we ought to have a full representation of the members in this House. But we were forced, against the government's promise of Thursday night, before the government Bills were exhausted, and with a very thin House, to go into the discussion of this subject; and so my hon. friend made his opening address. Now, Sir, what happened in the course of the various government Bills being called up? This Bill to amend the Criminal Code, was called up, and it was postponed, that was not done as a favour for myself or for the party. If it was anything, it was a favour to the whole House and to the Bill, because when we discuss a Bill to amend the Criminal Code, I suppose we need our legal members on both sides of the House to be here to as great a number as possible. So when this Bill came up, I suggested what I think had already been talked over with the Solicitor General, that in the unavoidable absence of some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, the Solicitor General should postpone it, and the Solicitor General agreed to postpone it. The government had other orders; what were they? There was the House again in committee on a Bill to amend the Weights and Measures Act; that was not exhausted. There was the House again in committee on the Bill to amend the Pilotage Act. That had been discussed and laid over, and that was out of the road.

The PRIME MINISTER. At the request of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. FOSTER. What does my hon. friend mean to say? Does he mean to say that gentlemen on this side of the House are not to exercise their judgment at all, with reference to a Bill—are to make no criticism of it? This Bill had been brought down in a certain shape and printed. Then the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries came down with a written amendment of six different sections, entirely altering the Bill; and we requested that these should be printed before the Bill finally passed out of the committee. Was that a fair request? Does my hon. friend say that that should be put on the line of courtesy, and that he is gracious and we are crabbed and ill-natured, because we did not go on with that Bill, but asked, under these circumstances, that it should be put off? It is no courtesy to this side of the House; but it is a fair right of every member of this House to have printed and before him, five or six amendments, which entirely alter a Bill, in order that every man may make up his mind on the Bill as affected by those amendments. There was also on the paper, a Bill to provide for the marking and inspection of packages containing apples and pears for export; that was not exhausted; there was another to amend the Act respecting the safety of ships, by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He was in his seat, and that item was not brought up. There was a most important order, if there is any meaning in it at all—a resolution introduced by the Postmaster General and partly discussed in this House, with reference to the letting of government contracts. That was not exhausted, and it was open to the government to have gone on with that. There was the second reading of a Bill to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members of the House of Commons, in the hands of the Solicitor General; and the Solicitor General was here. He is always prepared, semper paratus is his motto; and he was prepared to go on with that; but it was not called up. Then, there was the second reading of a Bill respecting the grain trade, in the inspection district of Manitoba; it was not gone on with. Another was the Bill standing in the name of the Finance Minister, who was present—a Bill respecting inscribed stock in Canada in the United Kingdom. Another one standing for its second reading was a Bill to amend the Act relating to ocean steamship subsidies. Another was a very important one with reference to contracts with certain steamship companies for cold storage accommodation. These were all on the government Order paper, and the hon. leader of the government promised to exhaust them before calling supply, but he did not do so. The very moment the government called for supply, they gave my hon. friend from Halifax, an opportunity to move his motion, a most important motion; and I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were on this side of the House, argue that until motions of this kind were definitely settled and passed upon by the House, the government had no right to proceed with other business; nor did the government of the Liberal-Conservative party, in my experience ever ask the House to deviate from an important motion, involving the standing of the government, until it had been decided by the House. So that my right hon. friend has no right to lecture us on lack of courtesy. He has no right to put an implied agreement forward, that because they gave way on this Bill, to amend the Criminal Code, and this important motion afterwards intervened, thereafter this motion could be set aside, until a Bill of less importance should be disposed of. I think my right hon. friend is entirely wrong in that position; and I do not like to see the leader of the government getting out of temper because of what he styles lack of courtesy. They are simply acts of right between different members in this House, which we exercise every session, when gentlemen, who want to be present at the discussion of an important subject and have unavoidably to be absent, ask that it should be laid over until they return. But there is no implied agreement that the very moment they return, no matter what other business may have come up in the interval, we must go on with that particular measure. The request is simply that the measure should not be gone on with in their absence. But what do we find? We find that a most important motion, one on which the government have to make their election as to what they propose to do, one which the right hon. gentleman has been endeavouring to burk since the first day of session until now, has come up before the House. It is a question with regard to a demand which last year the right hon. gentleman declared to be so reasonable, both in the case of the West Huron election and the Brockville election, that he would accede to it and send these matters immediately to be dealt with by the Privileges and Elections Committee. It is a motion with regard to the West Huron election, which was taken before the committee last session, and which, in that committee, was made to appear by actual evidence more important than it did upon the prima facie statement of the case in this House, and which prima facie evidence the right hon. gentleman thought was sufficient to warrant him in sending the matter before the Privileges and Elections Committee. When this session opened, the right hon. gentleman forgot his promise of last year, he forgot his moderate and statesmanlike statement of last year, that all matters affecting the independence of the electoral vote, affecting a member's standing in this House, even by implication, were so important that they should take precedence of all others and be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, when there was a fairly prima facie case made out. This year the right hon. gentleman forgot that statement; and when my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) made his motion at the first available opportunity, he was met by a technical point of order and forced to defer it. He then tried to bring it up at the very next opportunity, after he had given formal notice of it. My hon. friend from Halifax was not anxious to display his rhetoric, he was not anxious to make in this House a case against the government, he was willing to let his motion pass without discussion, and have the matter sent at once to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, entirely devoid of all partisan appeals in this House before it got to that tribunal. Why was he not allowed to bring it before that tribunal? Nobody knows. But the right hon. gentleman was nervous about it, and he took good care that the hon. gentleman's motion should not be passed. Time and time again the right hon. gentleman hung it up, and hung it up advisedly, and behind him his supporters rose and gave out the statement whether authorized or not, that altogether too much importance had been given that thing last year, and that this year they did not propose to allow anything of the kind. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) gave us that view, and so certainly did the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey), and I am not sure that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) did not. These gentlemen stand high in the councils of the government, they are the lieutenants of the government, not one of them would be gratified or complimented if told that he was not in the confidence of the government, or that he did not know what the government was going to do. Not a frown crossed the ministerial brow when these independent supporters of the government flatly told the House and the country that no such opportunity should be given for the investigation of the case this year as were given last year. So that up to Friday night last my hon. friend from Halifax had no opportunity at all to press his motion. Supply has been before this House for two and a half months, or nearly so, and had been kept back, and would have been still kept back on Friday night, if these hon. gentlemen had been ready with their Bills, and they are keeping it back now. Why? Is it to weary out the House? Is it to weary out the country and get the people into that state of mind that they will say that this thing has been going on at Ottawa three months or more and we do not want any more of it. Is it their object to put it off until the last possible hour, when, in the heat of the dog days, it will not get the discussion it should. It has been the intention of my hon. friend from Halifax to get this on at the earliest moment. Now it is on, what is the government going to do? Is the right hon. gentleman going to swallow himself in this as he has done in many other matters? Is he going, after his declaration of last year, to deny my hon. friend the right to take this matter before the Privileges and Elections Committee this session. The case of West Huron was weak last year compared with what it is to-day, in the light of the evidence brought out last session, but it was strong enough at the beginning of last session to bring forth the statement of my right hon. friend that it should be sent to the committee. Is he going back on that statement, and if so, in whose interest? Not in the interests of electoral purity, not in the interests of the sacredness of the ballot of this country, but in the interests of men who sit in this parliament under the very strong suspicion that if straight ballots had been honestly counted they would not have seats in this House. He is going to the country with a smirch upon his record and career if he takes the responsibility of telling the electorate of this country: You may read whatever affidavits you like, you may make whatever prima facie case you like, we are not going to give you the opportunity of having these cases brought before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. If he takes that ground, I have no hesitation in telling him that this government is on its trial right here in this parliament to-day; and if it takes that ground in this parliament, it ought not to have the confidence of the members, and in this country I believe it will not deserve the confidence of the electors. So that it is a much more important question than my hon. friend thinks. Or is he going now to send it to the committee? If he is, then, in the name of a fair investigation, let him send it there as soon as possible. We have now reached the 14th May, when parliament ought to close, and the hon. gentleman is still fighting for delay until it will be too late to give this matter the full investigation it ought to have. Not one moment, therefore, should be lost if my hon. friend is going to send it to the committee, and if he is not he should be tried by this House before he goes a step further in the conduct of business.

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I do not propose to discuss the West Huron election case, because that will be discussed very shortly when we reach it, and it cannot be discussed when the matter before the House is a Bill to amend the Criminal Code. My hon. friend has ingeniously evaded the charge of want of good faith brought against him. It would have been much more to his credit had he confined his remarks to that charge, but instead he went into a tirade on the West Huron and Brockville elections, although he knows these matters will be thoroughly discussed when the motion of the hon. member for Halifax comes before the House, as it will very shortly. What have these to do with the Criminal Code?

Mr. BENNETT. The Criminal Code has a good deal to do with them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) knows that the government have been trying for days and days to press forward the Bills which have been on the Order paper and which require action on the part of this House before they go to the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. Why did you not press them Friday night?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We did. The hon. gentleman talks about the Weights and Measures Act. This was postponed by my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) at the express request of the members of the opposition. They wished to consult people in their own constituencies. Of course, the matter was important, and he yielded. Then, the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) wanted to go on with the Bill for the marking and inspection of packages of apples and pears for export. But some hon. gentlemen opposite asked him to postpone the consideration of this Bill until they had had time to consult with those in their own locality who were interested. The Criminal Code Bill was brought up, but, the hon. gentleman who was leading the opposition appealed to the good-nature of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick)—that was the way he put it—not to go on with the Bill, because the hon. member for St. Ann's, Montreal (Mr. Quinn), and the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) were absent. The Solicitor General yielded that point. So, after all the Bills that were ready—

Mr. FOSTER.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No. There were other Bills.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There was one other Bill, one of great importance, one that we considered of too great importance to bring it forward at that hour of the night—the Dominion Elections Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. There were others.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was not present on Friday night, as the hon. gentleman knows, and, therefore, his Bill could not be gone on with. The Bill respecting the safety of ships is a very small Bill, merely to correct an error in the Act of last year. It was a matter that need not occupy a moment. But, the main Bills before the House, those that I have mentioned, were postponed at the request of members of the opposition. We did not know, when we moved supply at ten o'clock, that they were going to spring the West Huron election upon us.

Mr. FOSTER. Spring! The hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says that every member of the government knew that the moment you went into supply that would be brought up.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No notice was given. Of course, hon. gentlemen opposite were not bound to give notice. But, what I am contending is that all the main Bills that we were ready and anxious to go on with were postponed at the instance of hon. gentlemen opposite, except the Dominion Elections Bill, which was too important to be gone on with at that hour of the night.

Mr. FOSTER. What about item 16, the Bill respecting the grain trade, and 17, respecting inscribed stock of Canada in the United Kingdom, and 19, the cold storage Bill?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I can answer for No. 17. Some papers which were important in the discussion of this Bill were laid on the Table, and my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) asked that they should be printed. If I had persisted in going on with that Bill, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) would have, properly, taken exception.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. So, all the Bills were kept back at the instance of the opposition. We went into supply late on Friday night, with a thin House, and I never dreamed that this motion respecting the West Huron election would be made at that time.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I may explain that I informed half a dozen members on the other side of the House that I would make this motion the first time the motion for supply was made. I mentioned it also in writing to the Solicitor General not later than a week ago last Saturday, in answer to a request from him that I should let the matter stand.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would appeal again to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper). On Thursday evening, the hon. gentleman asked me what business would be taken up the following day, and I told him. We took up the Pilotage Bill; but, for reasons against which I have nothing to say, the hon. gentleman then leading the opposition asked that the Bill should stand, because he wanted to have my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) present. We did not take up the Weights and Measures Bill because there was a general consensus of opinion that it should not be gone on with before hon. members had an opportunity of discussing it with their constituents. The Bill respecting the packing of apples was taken up, but, at the solicitation of several members on both sides, it was postponed that they might have an opportunity of discussing it with their constituents. There remained then the Elections Bill. Nobody expected that that would be taken up at eleven o'clock Friday night. Of course, there was the Bill respecting the inspection of grain, but that also was too important to be taken up at that time. There were two small Bills, one of which we have taken up to-day, and the other we could not take up in the absence of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher). We thought to go on with the Criminal Code Bill. But, it did not suit hon. gentlemen opposite to go on with this measure, and so we yielded and allowed the consideration of it to be postponed. I appeal to the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) that, under these circumstances, it is only fair that we should go on with this business. For my part, I did not expect that we should be called upon to take up the motion of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) in such a thin House as we usually have on Monday afternoon, when many hon. gentlemen, who desire to take part in the debate, are absent.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No one is more disposed to help forward anything that will promote the courtesies of the House than I am, and no one attaches more importance than I do to the carrying out of an understanding across the floor. After hearing this discussion and the statement made, I can only say that I regard it as a mere pretext to avoid going on with this discussion. But, if my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will say that he only wants until to-morrow to decide whether they will accept this motion or whether they will oppose it, I am ready to agree, for my part, that he should have that time. I appreciate the gravity of the case. I feel that the character of parliament and of parliamentary institutions are at stake in this matter. I feel that the character of my right hon. friend and his colleagues are at stake—

The PRIME MINISTER. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) may think that a small matter, but I do not agree with him. The character and standing of the government of Canada, whoever may compose it, is a matter of vital consequence to parliament and the country. So, under the circumstances, if my right hon. friend says: I want, then, until to-morrow to decide what course we shall take in this matter. I am quite ready to wait.

The PRIME MINISTER. I will give an answer to my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper).

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, I will wait for it.

The PRIME MINISTER. I told my hon. friend that the government did not want a minute to come to a conclusion on this matter. We are ready to meet it. I appreciate the charity of my hon. friend; it speaks well for the kindness of his heart. But, I do not think I need it, and am not ready to accept it. The hon. gentleman knows the condition of things in this House on Monday and on Friday. Now that we have such facilities for communication with Ottawa, he knows that Friday and Monday are days when it is difficult to take up important business. Therefore, we do not want to take up this important business to-day, but to take it up to-morrow, when we shall have a full House, and when hon. members, who desire to take part in the debate, will be present. But, we wanted to take this Monday to clear off the paper and put through as many Bills as we could.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Now that the hon. gentleman has been good enough to answer the question that I asked him before, I will ask him another: Will this question be the first Order of the Day to-morrow?

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly, that has been my intention from the start.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Under these circumstances, I will give way to my right hon. friend.

Motion negatived.

On section 32,

Mr. POWELL. I would like to ask the Solicitor General, why, when he is recon- sidering this section, he draws the purely arbitrary and, let me say with humility, ab- surd distinction between personal property in animals, and other personal property. For instance, why should a man who steals a sheep valued, we will say, at $15, be in a different position, before the eyes of the criminal law, to a man who steals $15 worth of boots and shoes? I could understand why a distinction should be made between wild animals that are kept in confinement, and animals which are kept for domestic pur- poses. But I can see no distinction in prin- ciple between these two classes of property in this section. When we are legislating in the matter, why not place the criminal law on some philosophic principle, instead of drawing this arbitrary distinction?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitz- patrick). There is a great deal of good sense in what the hon. gentleman has said, but if we were to endeavour to base the crimin- al law on philosophic principles, I think, we would have to begin by destroying the pres- ent code, and making a new one. That may be done in the future, possibly in the near future; but for the present we are trying as far as we can, to amend the code that we have before us. But with regard to the distinction between property in animals and other personal property, it seems to me that a man is entitled to more protection when we are dealing with property, which is not under his immediate control, property which of necessity must be placed out of his reach. There is a great difference between the man who steals a pair of boots, which would naturally be under the immediate control and supervision of the man who owns them, and the man who steals a sheep, which would, naturally, be in the field, and not under the immediate control of the owner.

Mr. POWELL. That distinction struck me, but why not limit the Act to that class of cases? Why make the Act so general as to include the stealing of animals from the owners' inclosure or barnyard?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not prepared to say this is a proper distinction. But to adopt the suggestion of the hon. gen- tleman, you would have to take a number of these articles dealing with theft in the Criminal Code, and reconstruct the whole of them; you would have to enact one clause which would practically take the place of all these various clauses which we have had in the Criminal Code from time im- memorial, so to speak.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). I do not share the opinion of my hon. friend who desires to see this Code all changed. In 1892, when the House dealt with the

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Criminal Code, we studied it thoroughly. This was the old English Act, which had not been put in force in England, but was re- cognized as having been the subject of a great deal of careful study by some of the strongest jurists in England. In 1892 it passed under the careful supervision of Sir John Thompson, a gentleman admittedly of great legal attainments. If it has been found necessary to change clause 322 in this way, I do not see any reason why we should change any other clause. There have al- ready been so many changes that we can hardly recognize the old law. I do not see any material difference between section 332 of the Act, and the one which is brought down by this Bill.

Mr. DAVIN. It seems to me that this clause provides a very severe penalty. I confess I cannot see any advantage in the change.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The clause which it is intended to substitute provides for a more expensive class of animal, mak- ing it a higher offence in proportion as the animal may be more valuable. That is the only object of the change. The section was introduced in the Senate where they appear to have given very great consideration to the Bill. I feel that I am obliged to main- tain the clause, but if my hon. friend sees that there is any serious objection to it we might reserve it, although I do not see any reason why it should stand.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Campbell). Car- ried.

Mr. BERGERON. No, I understand my hon. friend, the Solicitor General, will allow it to stand for further consideration.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We have several others that we have allowed to stand, but I would not like to let it stand unless it is necessary.

It being six o'clock, the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

(The House resumed in committee.)

On section 410,

Mr. A. F. MacLAREN (North Perth). Mr. Chairman, before going any further with this clause, I would like to ask the hon. Solicitor General what he is going to do in regard to my Bill, No. 62 on the Order paper, to amend the Criminal Code.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The sug- gestion that is contained in Bill No. 62, to amend the Criminal Code, introduced by my hon. friend (Mr. MacLaren) is valuable, but it is somewhat of an important departure from the rules that have hitherto guided us in criminal matters, and I would like the hon. gentleman to allow it to remain in abeyance until the Department of Justice has examined it further so as to determine whether or not we can incorporate the suggestion in the Criminal Code. The matter will receive serious consideration and if it is possible to adopt the suggestion, which is a valuable one, it certainly will be adopted.

Mr. MacLAREN. Very well; I hope it will receive the very serious consideration of the Department of Justice.

On section 520,

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). Mr. Chairman, when the Bill was introduced there was a subsection 2 following that section and I notice that it has now been dropped. By reference to the Senate Debates, I see that it was lost by a very small majority in the Senate. It was a section exempting trades union organizations from the operation of that clause, and I wish the hon. Solicitor General would tell us if he has considered the matter, and whether subsection 2, which was in the original Bill, should not be included here. The hon. Minister of Justice in the Senate said that this main clause, in its present shape, would leave the trades organizations of this country at the mercy of any person who wished to set the machinery in motion. I think we should take some steps to protect that body.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have the Bill as it was reported from the Senate and the Bill, as reported from the Senate, contains the second subsection, as follows:—

Nothing in this section should be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

I do not exactly see the point of the objection urged by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee). The section is not applicable to combinations of workmen or employees who, it is provided, shall have reasonable protection.

Mr. PUTTEE. Subsection 2 is not in here at all.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, it is. Subsection 2 is there, is it not?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). No, it is not here.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is in the Bill as I have it. Subsection 2 is in the copy of the Bill which has been sent to me from the Senate. I am willing that it should be inserted in the Bill here.

Mr. PUTTEE. This is a very important clause, and I trust the Solicitor General will make sure that it is reinserted.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not hear what my hon. friend (Mr. Puttee) says, but if he wants the clause inserted, and moves that it be reinserted, I agree.

Mr. PUTTEE. If it was the intention to have this clause in the Bill, it certainly should be there, and I will move that it be reinserted as follows:

Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection, as such workmen or employees.

Mr. BRITTON. I will second that.

Mr. BERGERON. What does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Puttee) mean by that clause?

Mr. PUTTEE. It means exactly what it states there, to exempt labour organizations and trades unions from the operation of this clause. The Minister of Justice said in the Senate that if the clause were passed in its present shape, without the amendment I have moved, it would place the trades organizations of this country at the mercy of any one who liked to set the law in operation. Therefore, you would take away a most distinct right they have at the present time. By reading clause 520, it will be apparent that the idea is, if possible, to prevent the organization of trade combinations for the raising of prices. I presume this House does not expect it will be operative, but the clause most certainly also gives power to disband any organization of labouring men formed for their own protection. In view of the opinion of the Minister of Justice, which I have quoted, and the statement of the Solicitor General, that he had intended to have this subsection 2, included in the Bill, I think there should be no objection to it.

Mr. BERGERON. Does not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Puttee) think that the Minister of Justice left it out on purpose?

Mr. PUTTEE. It was left out by mistake we have been told.

On section 520,

Mr. BERGERON. Under the law as it stands to-day, has not the judge the right to clear the court if he wishes to? What is the explanation of this clause?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Under the general law, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) is aware, the courts are open to the general public, but by section 550, the trials of all persons under the age of sixteen years shall, so far as practicable, take place without publicity. Our intention is to extend substantially the provisions of section 550, to the cases provided for in 558. In the trial of charges for indecent offences and things of that kind, we leave it discretionary with the judge to declare that for the purpose of such trials the court shall not be a public court, and that he shall have power to determine who shall have access.

Mr. BERGERON. I have seen the judges exercise that right already in Montreal. Has not the judge power to do so now.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not think he has. I have in my mind a very well-known case in Quebec, in which the judge restricted the area of the court room which was left open to the public, and I think he had power to do that, but the judge said he could not go beyond that, and I am quite sure he was right.

Mr. BERGERON. The clause will do no harm anyway, because it leaves it in the discretion of the judge.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think it is rather wise.

On section 589,

Mr. BERGERON. What is the object of this change ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This is a change suggested by the Attorney General's office in the province of British Columbia, to meet difficulties which exist there. In effect, the change assimilates the procedure in cases of this description to the procedure in cases of summary conviction, provided for in section 878 of the Criminal Code, which provides an easy and effective mode of disposing of recognizances.

On section 601,

Mr. BRITTON. Whether this section is necessary or not, I think I can see how it comes to be suggested. No harm, so far as my experience goes, has ever resulted from the law as it stands, and I cannot say that any particular harm is going to result if this amendment is adopted. But the point is this: I think this amendment is in the interest of the officers of the court, who sometimes want a person charged with an offence which is not very serious, to be held over for trial to the general sessions of the peace. I speak now of the province of Ontario, where the Crown prosecutors are sent to attend the assizes. Sometimes they have very few cases, sometimes none at all, because the county judge's criminal court takes from the assizes the trial of all who are willing to be tried by a judge without a jury. This section is proposed to meet such a case, so that, instead of being sent in the natural order of things, to the next court of competent jurisdiction, for trial, which is the assizes, which are to meet in October or November, the county attorney asks the judge to postpone the trial to the sessions, which will come on in December. I do not think that is necessary, as I think the law works very well as it is. This amendment seems to be introduced at the instance of the county attorneys; and the point is, whether the judge should have the power in such cases, to traverse the case, by changing the recognizance to the sessions which are further off, instead of to the assizes which are near by.

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Mr. BERGERON. What is the object of doing that ?

Mr. BRITTON. It seems to me that the object is that the county attorney prefers to have the handling of the case, because of the fees connected with it.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not think that should be countenanced by parliament.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My hon. friend is reading into this section an interpretation which, I fear, I have not been able to see in it. At the present time it is open to some question whether or not a magistrate can commit to the court of sessions, instead of to the assizes, and this is for the purpose of enabling him do so. Any one who knows the practice of the province of Quebec, will see the reasonableness of this. If you commit to the quarter sessions, you have a trial without a jury, whereas if you commit to the assizes, you entail upon the province the additional expense of a jury trial.

Mr. BERGERON. In the province of Quebec, if an accused person prefers to be tried by a jury, his desire is granted, and then he will have to wait for the criminal court; but the case mentioned by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton), is one in which the assizes meet first, and the case is put off to the sessions. There would seem to be a lack of justice in doing that.

Mr. BRITTON. So far as Ontario is concerned, both at the assizes and the sessions, criminal cases come before juries. If a man is tried without a jury, he is tried neither at the assizes nor the sessions, but before the county judges criminal court, or before a judge or magistrate having criminal jurisdiction.

Mr. BERGERON. A magistrate ?

Mr. BRITTON. When a man is brought before a magistrate for a preliminary hearing, he elects whether he will be tried by jury or not. If he elects to be tried by a jury, he would be at present committed for trial to the next court of competent jurisdiction, and would have to remain in custody unless he gave bail. This section allows the magistrate to take bail for the sessions, although the sittings of the sessions may be two or more months further away than the next court of competent jurisdiction, which would be the assizes. The case would naturally come before the nearest court, so that it would be disposed of quickly unless delay were required. The clause reads :

Section 601. By adding thereto the following subsection:

'3. Where the offence is one triable by the court of general or quarter sessions of the peace and the justice is of opinion that it may better or more conveniently be so tried, the condition of the recognizance may be for the appearance of the accused at the next sittings of that court, notwithstanding that a sittings of a superior court of criminal jurisdiction capable of trying the offence intervenes.'

The section seems to me unnecessary, as I can see no great advantage in it, although perhaps there is no harm.

Mr. BERGERON. It is loading our Criminal Code with new clauses.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My information is—and I submit it with all deference to the opinion of the hon. member for Kingston—that it is a great convenience in the administration of criminal justice, to have this power vested in a magistrate to determine whether a case will be tried at the assizes or the sessions. There is an advantage in having it tried at the sessions, because that is the most expeditious and cheapest mode. The section cannot do any harm.

Mr. BRITTON. There are some cases which the high court would not take up time in trying, but will hold over for the sessions.

On section 641.

Mr. BRITTON. I want to take a little credit for this. The section is simply amended by the insertion of subsection 2.

2. The counsel acting on behalf of the Crown at any court of criminal jurisdiction may prefer against any person who has been committed for trial at such court a bill of indictment for the charge on which the accused has been so committed or for any charge founded on the facts or evidence disclosed in the depositions taken before the justice.

And I call attention to that fact that this was in each of the Bills I introduced each session, since I have had the honour of being a member of this House, but I was unable to carry it through.

Mr. BERGERON. Then you are the father of it?

Mr. BRITTON. I claim to be, though there may be others who have made suggestions to the Minister of Justice with reference to it. The omission of this clause was a slip in the code when first enacted. The strict interpretation is, that unless a prosecutor in every case submitted himself to be bound over to prosecute, there was no power to lay an indictment except by the written consent of the judge.

Mr. POWELL. What about the common law right?

Mr. BRITTON. The judges did not act on it, and they gave their order or consent as a matter of course. This provides that the indictment may be laid as of right, whereas previously the prosecutor ran the risk of having his indictment quashed unless he took the precaution of having a judge's order or consent before he went to the grand jury.

Mr. BERGERON. Does a case like that happen often?

Mr. BRITTON. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred where the complaint is laid before a magistrate, and the magistrate finds a prima facie case, the prosecutor is not asked and does not submit himself to be bound over to prosecute, nor are the witnesses in all cases bound over to attend. As the law was interpreted, an indictment could not be laid in such a case without a judge's order or consent.

On section 678a,

Mr. BERGERON. Does not the law provide for that already? The judge has a right to hold witnesses in court as long as he wishes. I see this is not for the case of an absconding witness.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The committing magistrate commits a prisoner for trial, and then he binds over any witnesses who may appear before him at the assizes, to give evidence. But, there may be other witnesses knowledge of whom may come to the accused or to the Crown, but who were not known before the committing magistrate. If it is proved to the satisfaction of the judge that these witnesses may not be forthcoming, it is optional with him to issue a warrant and bind them over to appear, as a committing magistrate might do. That is the object.

On section 680,

Mr. BERGERON. What is the object of this? I see that the additions are paragraph b, and also the words 'or any chairman of general sessions.'

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It seems to me that it is only proper that the chairman of general sessions, who has authority to deal with the prisoners, should have authority to summon the witnesses under these conditions. Subsection b is intended to meet the cases that occur, especially in British Columbia, and may occur in any province, especially where they have to travel long distances. Under subsection a of the existing law, the judge issues a warrant for the person in custody to appear. The warden of the penitentiary, or other person who has the witness in custody, or hands him over to the person named in the judge's order, and that person produces him before the court. So, it is necessary that the person named should go to where the witness is confined and bring him back to the place where he is to be examined. Under subsection b, instead of having the double trip, an order may be given directing the custodian of the prisoner to bring him to the place where he is intended to be examined. This avoids a double journey and thus saves expense.

Mr. BRITTON. As to the words 'or chairman of the general sessions,' is that necessary in the province of Quebec or elsewhere? With us there is no chairman of general sessions, except the judge of the court of criminal jurisdiction.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It cannot do any harm anyway.

On section 687,

Mr. POWELL. Is that section intended to allow, for instance, depositions which may be given on another charge, but which may be pertinent in the matter before the court, to be admitted in evidence? It is sufficiently general to cover that, but it might be held by strict interpretation not to cover it. Would it not be better to restrict this?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Is that necessary? However, I am willing to consider that.

Mr. POWELL. It is well known that, carrying on a defence, for instance, is very much like playing a hand at cards—you make the best use that you have at your disposal. In the trial of one charge, the counsel for defence may think it will not do to enter into cross-examination, but to accept the facts in the direct examination. But, in another charge or trial, the case might be different, and, if the deposition were admitted, he would be prejudiced by the game he had felt it desirable to play in the first place. I think it should be limited to the trial of that charge or a similar charge.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think the suggestion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) is a reasonable one and should be acted upon.

Mr. BERGERON. It does not seem to me that there is danger, under the clause, of a deposition in one trial being brought in in another.

Mr. BRITTON. If the language of the section does not clearly mean that, it is in reference to the same charge, then it ought to be made so, because it is evident that it should be in the same case.

Mr. BERGERON. Would a judge hear a deposition of that sort?

Mr. BRITTON. I do not think he would. But it is better to put it beyond question. You will see in the note, a reference to an article from the Canada Law Journal, giving the date. I know something about that article in the Law Journal. That same section has been introduced two or three times in Bills that have not passed, but this subsection 2, appears now for the first time. It is, to my knowledge, that in a criminal trial, where the jury disagree, the evidence given by one of the witnesses was offered at a subsequent trial, because the witness was out of the country, and that evidence was not allowed.

Mr. BRITTON.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It could not be allowed under the law as it is now.

Mr. BRITTON. It is evident that if a deposition taken in a preliminary inquiry ought to be allowed where the witness is dead or absent, much more ought it to be allowed where there have been all the formalities of a trial in the presence of a judge.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. But under this clause the doubt which the hon. gentleman is pointing out, would exist. Under clause 2, I should imagine that that evidence could be imported from one trial into another. I agree with the hon. gentleman that it should be made so clear that there could be no possibility of such evidence being used, except in the same trial, and in case of the death of the witness, or the impossibility of getting the witness to come up and make his deposition personally. That evidence should be admissible in the same trial, but it should not be transferred from that trial into another one.

Mr. BERGERON. I think the clause as it stands, is as good as we can make it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think we had better not adopt that clause without some amendment. The intention is to make the deposition given at a former trial for the same offence available, on a new trial; and I would suggest that these words be added: 'In this section the word deposition includes the evidence of a witness given in a trial before the same court for the same offence.'

Mr. BERGERON. Why do you say the same court?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is the same court with us. If the jury disagreed, and you tried the man over again before another jury, his evidence given before the same court would be admissible. I think, perhaps, I had better leave this and consult with my hon. friend, and get him to make an amendment which would meet the views of the committee; and when this clause comes up again, we can consider how far he has met their objection. I understand the intention is to make the evidence given in the same trial between the same parties available on a new trial.

On section 687,

Mr. BERGERON. Is that introduced for our new population of Doukhobors and Galicians? Surely this is not made for Canadian-born children?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In the case of some children coming from abroad, there are no registers of birth possible, and in order to establish the age of a child, recourse is had to a record made by any incorporated society, such as the Children's Aid Society.

On section 702,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This is to make the evidence now available on a charge made under section 198, available on a charge, made under the next section, 199.

On section 729,

Mr. POWELL. I would like to ask the hon. Solicitor General in what case has doubt arisen in regard to the words 'or on any other holiday.' It has been decided in the maritime provinces time and again that no day is a dies non except Sunday.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is not so with us. A bank holiday is a dies non for almost all civil procedure. Of course we could not make it a dies non in matters affecting criminal procedure; but to avoid doubt we provide that a holiday shall be the same as Sunday.

Mr. POWELL. Does that express it?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I understand so, but, how there can be any doubt, I cannot understand.

Mr. BRITTON. I have known courts to sit frequently on Good Friday to receive verdicts the same as other days.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Coming as I do from a law-abiding province, it would be a matter of impossibility to conceive that a judge would sit on Good Friday with us.

On section 765,

Mr. POWELL. Why not allow it to a party where he gives bail. It is a very inexpensive and expeditious mode of trial. I know that the judges in our counties have found trouble in that matter, and that they have really stretched the law, and tried fellows under a kind of fictitious imprisonment. As I take it, the great object of speedy trials in small matters is to save expense. Why should it be made contingent on the defendant being actually in custody?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I know that what my hon. friend speaks of has occurred in Montreal. I know of a case where a judge formally took a man into custody so as to give him an opportunity to have his case disposed of. It seems to me that it is an idle formality that ought to be dispensed with, and that we ought to get down to the substance. If my hon. friend (Mr. Powell) would prepare an amendment that he thinks would meet this difficulty when this matter comes up again, we could consider it.

Mr. POWELL. They evade it with us, as they do in Montreal.

On section 766,

Mr. BRITTON. I do think that this is really unnecessary. I do not know of any case of a judge who does not reside in the county or union of counties, but if there is such a case, I do not think that the sheriff ought to be relieved of that part of his duty, which is to bring the matter to the attention of the judge. The judge is the person to cause the prisoner to be brought before him. Of course, it is the duty of the prosecuting officer, or of the county crown attorney, who is the person to do that in a sense, but why change the law? I do not know of any such case existing. If any such case exists why change the law and allow the sheriff simply to bring the matter before the prosecuting officer instead of going to where the judge is and giving him notice.

Mr. BERGERON. Who has asked for this?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not quite sure that there is any case in Ontario where a judge lives at a great distance from the jail, and whether it would be necessary for him. Under the section, as it is now, it is necessary for the judge to receive notice for the purpose of going to where the prisoner is to call the prisoner before him, and he is obliged to go back another day for the purpose of having the trial. By the amendment, it is provided that notice shall be given to the prosecuting officer. He will then notify the judge and the judge will come on the day fixed for the trial, so that he will not be obliged to make two trips for the purpose of holding the trial.

Mr. POWELL. Do the words 'before him' mean before the judge?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes. This is the difficulty which exists now, and this section is to remove it.

Mr. POWELL. It is a grievance in the maritime provinces, where we have judges whose jurisdiction extends over three or four counties, sometimes.

Mr. BRITTON. I apologize, because I did not know what the government were providing for.

On section 789,

Mr. BRITTON. Suppose a person is charged with an attempt to steal an amount not exceeding $10? I think that you have not the provisions in this section which are applicable; and that, while a magistrate may not exercise summary jurisdiction in the case of an actual theft, he can exercise summary jurisdiction in the case of an attempt to commit a theft. That, of course, is an anomaly. The attempt, of course, is less than the actual theft, yet, if I recollect right, and I think I do, if this clause is adopted, the magistrate cannot try summarily the actual theft of an amount exceeding $10, yet he can try an attempt to commit the theft of any amount.

Mr. POWELL. You want to cover the attempt as well?

Mr. BRITTON. Yes.

Mr. POWELL. I would suggest, in pursuance of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kingston, that the case could be met by inserting the words, 'or with inciting to theft or with attempt at theft, or with having obtained or attempted to obtain property by false pretenses.'

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. With the consent of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), I will submit his suggestion to the draftsman with the view of having a clause drafted in that sense.

Mr. BRITTON. If I am not out of order, I would like to move that section 783, subsection b, be amended by adding after the word 'theft' the following words:

Where the value of the property with reference to which the alleged attempt was made does not, in the judgment of the magistrate, exceed $10.

Mr. POWELL. That is another quality of offence altogether.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is very difficult for a magistrate, if the charge is merely that the man has attempted to commit theft, to decide how far his attempt was intended to extend.

Mr. POWELL. Section 768 deals with another subject. This is the Speedy Trials Act; the other is the Summary Trials Act. The first one is not limited to $10.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is the case of summary trials by consent.

Mr. POWELL. The technical term is 'speedy trial,' and the other is 'summary trial.'

Mr. RUSSELL. The speedy trials comes before a judge, and the summary trial comes before a magistrate.

Mr. BRITTON. In this case, in section 783, a magistrate may, subject to the provisions hereinafter made, hear and determine the charge in a summary way. This practically is unlimited as to the amount. If a man attempts to steal $100,000 from a bank, he may, under this section, where it is only an attempt, be tried in a summary way before a magistrate.

Mr. POWELL. You are not speaking of the section before the House?

Mr. BRITTON. No, I am speaking of section 783, and I only ask the committee if this is not the proper time to move such an amendment. Section 783 deals entirely with different cases, but among the cases it deals with is a charge of having attempted to commit theft, and that we limit in no way as to amount. I submit that before you give a magistrate power to deal in a summary way with such a case, you ought to limit the amount. I say the limit should be $10, because it is only intended to deal with minor cases of theft.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would like to consider that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Might I ask attention with regard to section 683?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. All the sections are opened for discussion now.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If my hon. friend will look at subsection 2 of section 683, he will observe that reference is made to the use of depositions as evidence at the trial. The section itself deals with the taking of evidence under commission out of Canada, and it seems to me that the section should permit such evidence to be read before the grand jury, if it does not do it already. In the case of Regina vs. Chetwynd in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, the judge decided that this evidence could not be read before the grand jury. The evidence was taken in Boston, after the man was committed for trial, and after due notice had been given to the prisoner of the time and place of taking it and he attended in person and by his counsel. Nevertheless, although the evidence could be read at the trial, it was held that it could not be read before the grand jury.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is another difficulty that has occurred to me in connection with this section, and one that ought to be dealt with by an amendment. Assuming that no rule of practice exists in the criminal court, you have to fall back on the procedure of our ordinary civil courts. In the province of Quebec, in our civil procedure, it is necessary to appoint three commissioners, unless the parties consent otherwise, and you have three commissioners travelling all over the country for the purpose of examining witnesses. I am glad of the suggestion. I think we ought to consider 683 so as to meet not only the difficulty in Nova Scotia, but also the difficulty constantly occurring in the province of Quebec. I am anxious to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Powell), which meets the existing difficulty, but I would like to have the whole clause reprinted embodying his suggestion, so that we might see that nothing is omitted or that we are not overstepping the mark.

On section 790,

Mr. POWELL. There is a matter I desire to bring to the attention of my hon. friend the Solicitor General. Though it may not be strictly pertinent now, I do not know of a better time. One of the numerous faults in the Criminal Code is a ridiculous provision with respect to a common assault. The matter came to my notice when one of the students in my office appeared before a magistrate, and, to my utter astonishment came back and announced that the prosecutor had refused to allow the magistrate to go on to conviction in a case of common assault. The law, as it stood before the code was enacted, provided that a magistrate could dispose summarily of any case of common assault. But, under the code as at present, either the complainant or the party complained against can refuse the magistrate the right to proceed, and the case must go before the grand jury and the party be indicted. In the case I speak of, the action was taken by the prosecutor maliciously. The defendant was a respectable man; but his name was banded about in the newspapers of the province of New Brunswick as that of a man brought before the grand jury on a criminal charge. In the case of the serious charges referred to in this section, the defendant alone can have a summary decision, without any discussion on the part of the prosecutor. But, under the law as it stands, a man who wishes to injure the reputation of an enemy can trump up a charge of common assault, refuse the magistrate the right to determine the matter finally, and have the accused prosecuted before the grand jury as any common criminal would be.

Mr. BRITTON.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I admit at once that this is a crying grievance in the administration of the criminal law. A case of common assault that might be settled by the infliction of a fine of fifty cents—

Mr. POWELL. Or dismissal.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Or dismissal altogether—may be sent to the grand jury and then the party committed. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) will take section 864 of the code and suggest the change that will effect what he desires, I will agree to its adoption. While we are on that, I might call attention to section 843, under which, in the case of hearing before a magistrate, at the request of either party, a stenographer shall be employed to take the evidence.

Mr. POWELL. Section 864 reads:

Whenever any person unlawfully assaults or beats any other person, any justice may summarily hear and determine the charge, unless at the time of entering upon the investigation, the person aggrieved or the person accused objects thereto.

If we simply strike out the words:

—unless at the time of entering upon the investigation the person aggrieved or the person accused objects thereto.

I think that will effect all that is necessary.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Very well. I take it for granted that we shall find in Hansard a note of all the proposed amendments, so that when the time comes to reconsider the Bill, I shall have the whole matter before me.

Mr. RUSSELL. If in the case of common assault, the defendant requires a jury, why should he not have one?

Mr. POWELL. I may mention that an appeal lies to the county court judge, where the whole case is retried and where new testimony may be adduced.

Mr. RUSSELL. But he might prefer to have a jury.

Mr. POWELL. But how are you going to do that?

Mr. RUSSELL. Just as you do under the existing law—let him have a jury.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The defendant gets the benefit of a jury. The case is first disposed of summarily before a judge. If the defendant is convicted, he can appeal to the High Court, and there, he gets the benefit of a trial before a jury. I speak with hesitation concerning the law as applicable to any other province but my own. There is no doubt, however, of the appeal. In my own province, the case of an appeal goes before the court of Queen's Bench and is heard absolutely de novo, as if nothing had taken place in the lower court, but there is the advantage that, where there is no appeal, the case is disposed of. Take trifling assaults in the seaport towns such as Quebec. A man may say: I want to have my case go before a jury. He gives bail and that is the last you see of him. When the case comes up he is beyond the jurisdiction. But, even if he was in attendance, why have all this expense without a preliminary trial, at all events?

Mr. POWELL. Especially where the law will send him to jail for a year for a trivial offence.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In Nova Scotia I think he would be tried by a county court judge without a jury. There is something to be said for the view of my learned colleague, that a man should have the opportunity of being tried by jury if he prefers it. There may be peculiar circumstances, matters of public opinion, an offence of this kind may be committed under special circumstances where a man should have the right to be tried by jury if he so elects.

Mr. RUSSELL. In many such cases the prosecutor elects his own judge, and he may hale a man up before a judge who is predetermined to convict him, and the defendant may know that. I am not sure but that if he chooses to have a jury he should not have it. That is a right which is inherent under Magna Charta. If the plaintiff chooses to ask for a summary trial, he should have the right of doing it, as he always had before the code was passed.

Mr. POWELL. The history of this right to have a trial by jury on appeal, as near as I can remember, is as follows:

Mr. RUSSELL. I mean in the first instance.

Mr. POWELL. He never had the right in the first instance, in common assault, since confederation. Before 1869, throughout Canada, the man accused of common assault had the right of trial before two magistrates. In 1869 the law was changed, and he could be convicted before one magistrate, and if convicted the right of appeal lay to a higher body, but he had a right to the higher body if he saw fit to be tried by jury.

Mr. RUSSELL. He has got that now.

Mr. POWELL. The law was afterwards changed denying him the right to go before a county court judge. I think he was again sent back to his previous status, and the code came in and denied him the right to go before a county court judge and a jury, and it substituted for that this cumbersome procedure. There is no reason why it should pass into the region of indictable offences. There is no appeal in matters of evidence, he is simply put on his trial de novo, as if nothing had taken place, except that if the conviction is bad, he may move to have it quashed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If he is sent before the assizes he would have all the paraphernalia of the assize court, the grand jury, the petty jury, the witnesses summoned, and all this to try a case of assault where the penalty would probably be 50 cents or $1. This seems to have been an innovation introduced at the time the Criminal Code was enacted, without reflection; because certainly from the time of confederation up to the time the Criminal Code was enacted, assaults were tried before a magistrate. The complaining party came and made his complaint, and the defendant made option, and that option was conclusive.

Mr. POWELL. He had no right to make option, he was precluded from having a trial before a jury.

Mr. BRITTON. What is the change there?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The change there is to be found in the ninth line, in these words:

And the court or judge may include in the amount to be paid such moderate allowance for loss of time as the court or judge, by affidavit, or other inquiry and examination, ascertains to be reasonable.

This provides that in addition to the costs incurred by the person complaining, he shall receive, or be allowed, in the discretion of the court, an amount for such loss as may be fixed.

Mr. COWAN. This is re-enacting 49 Vic., chapter 174. Forty-nine Vic., section 248, applied to common assault, in these terms:

When any person is convicted on any indictment of any assault, whether with or without battery and wounding, or either of them, such person may, if the court thinks fit, in addition to any sentence which the court deems proper for the offence, be adjudged to pay to the prosecutor his actual and necessary costs and expenses of the prosecution, and such moderate allowance for loss of time as the court, by affidavit or other inquiry and examination, ascertains to be reasonable; and unless the sums so awarded are sooner paid, the offender shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months, in addition to the term of imprisonment, if any, to which the offender is sentenced for the offence.

It seems that in the preparation of the Criminal Code, that portion has been left out. Section 834, of the Criminal Code, deals with costs only as follows:—

If a person convicted on an indictment for assault, whether with or without battery and wounding is ordered to pay costs as provided in section 832, he shall be liable unless the said costs are sooner paid, to three months' imprisonment in addition to the term of imprisonment, if any, to which he is sentenced for the offence, and the court may, by warrant in writing—

And so on. In this amendment, as in the Criminal Code, the words are omitted:

—and such moderate allowance for loss of time as the court, by affidavit or other inquiry and examination, ascertains to be reasonable.

Under section 834, as it now stands, one man may make a violent assault upon another, may injure him, and lay him up for weeks, and there is no jurisdiction under which the court can grant him any moderate allowance, or any allowance whatever for the loss of time, and he would be relegated to his civil rights.

Mr. POWELL. That is where he should be.

Mr. COWAN. Why should he not be relegated to his civil rights in connection with costs as well? It makes an exception of the costs. He does not pay the costs.

Mr. POWELL. But these costs are due to the Crown.

Mr. COWAN. Just so; I admit that. Why should the Crown stand upon any higher right than the individual?

Mr. POWELL. One is a matter of civil procedure and the other is a matter of criminal jurisdiction.

Mr. COWAN. In nine cases out of ten, so far as pursuing by civil process is concerned, you might as well proceed against a vacuum, because these parties are generally not worth anything.

Mr. POWELL. If you cannot get it in one way, you cannot get it in another.

Mr. COWAN. It seems to me that the Criminal Code should be extended, so that a person in addition to being kept in custody for three months, should be required to make some additional recompense.

Mr. POWELL. I think the line has been drawn very closely in respect to assaults already. There is a provision in the Criminal Code, re-enacting a provision of the Act of 1869, which is re-enacting the old Ontario Act to the effect that if a man is convicted of common assault, and pays the fine thereafter, there shall be no civil remedy for trespass of the person. This Act is clearly ultra vires, and I do not know why Sir John Thompson allowed it to crawl in.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. A case has been decided.

Mr. POWELL. I know that Judge Palmer has decided the point in a case I brought before him myself.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We are coming very close to the line now.

Mr. POWELL. I think it is bad legislation in the old law to compel a man to pay the costs at all.

On section 838,

Mr. POWELL. This is a logical consequence of the first part.

Mr. COWAN. Is not that rather an extraordinary provision?

Mr. FLINT. I would like to ask the hon. Solicitor General what the changes are here, whether they are formal changes in the wording of the clause, or is there a substantial change in the meaning?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Section 838 deals with the restitution of stolen property, and I must confess to the committee that I entertain grave doubts as to our right to enact this clause at all. I would like if hon. gentlemen would consider this question. It seems to me that when we are proceeding to determine the conditions upon which property is to be restored to the owner, we are dealing with a question affecting property which is within the limits of the provinces. Take the case where property is disposed of to a buyer, who purchases in good faith. He acquires an indefeasible title, which title would be good as against a person from whom this property is stolen, but we are here enacting that that property shall be restored. How can we proceed to do it? In this connection I would like to state to the committee, that, at the Department of Justice, we have received a letter from a young gentleman in Regina, which, I think is worth communicating to the committee. This young gentleman is named Grimmitt, and he is evidently of a very serious turn of mind, and a student.

Mr. DAVIN. What is his name?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. His name is Grimmitt, and he is a student in the office of Hamilton & Jones. He says:

Dear Sir,—I am a student-at-law, and have been studying lately the question of title to goods. I saw in the 'Globe' recently that you had introduced an amendment to the Criminal Code, whereby the provision of enabling the owner of stolen property to recover possession of his goods upon conviction of the thief should be extended to cover the case of goods obtained under false pretenses. Vilmont vs. Bentley (1887), in England, decided that this was the English law, but this decision has been over-ridden by the English Sale of Goods Act, 1893, section 24, and this section has been reproduced in the North-west Territories Sale of Goods Ordinance, in section 24 of that ordinance. Now, if the amendment introduced by you becomes law, will there not be a repugnancy between it and section 24 of the North-west Sale of Goods Ordinance? And if so, which will be ultra vires. I am anxious as a student to get a little light on this question, and should consider it a personal favour to send me a line in reply.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) T. T. GRIMMETT.

This gentleman whoever he may happen to be, is evidently of a very original turn of mind and a very studious young man. I think it due to him to make mention of this letter and to say that the attention of the Department of Justice having been drawn to the letter of this young gentleman, we have come to the conclusion that the young gentleman is right, and that the department and parliament have been wrong in making this legislation for years.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. Is that a sample of the North-west Territories?

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, yes, in all respects, original and right.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think we will drop that section altogether, but for the moment, I shall be content with dropping the amendment.

Mr. POWELL. Take this case. A thief steals a moderately large sum of money we will say, and comes into court. He has the money in his pocket and he probably takes enough out of it to pay his counsel.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. POWELL. I may say that I have not taken such money myself. A man who took the money knowingly would be guilty of a criminal offence himself. The thief puts the balance of the money back in his pocket. He is in the penitentiary and what is the good of suing him? In a case like that there is a great hardship. I do not mean this parliament should enact a law interfering with civil rights; but I think we have a right to deal with this matter as proposed as being a matter of criminal law and procedure. This money, of course, usually goes into the hands of some person who is certainly not a criminal, and out of him there is a better chance of getting it by civil process. I think we had better let the section stand.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think we ought to be able to meet the difficulty pointed out by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). Under the circumstances it would perhaps be wise to drop the suggested amendment, and then we can deal with the original section.

Mr. BRITTON. I confess that the young gentleman whose letter was read showed himself studious and a gentleman of ability. However, the difficulty suggested by the Solicitor General does not strike me as very strong; because it seems to me we are not determining the right between the actual owner and any one else. We are determining simply that property or money found in the hands of a prisoner who was convicted, shall be handed over to somebody who, according to the result of that trial, is better entitled to it than the person convicted.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It does not conclude a title.

Mr. BRITTON. No. It does not in any way prevent the real owner recovering it from the man to whom the property is handed. That right could be enforced according to the law of the particular province. If we permit property that prima facie, according to the result of the trial, is not the property of the person in custody to remain with him, there is a hardship in letting that property remain with him and saying to the man who is prosecuting: You must get it by civil process or in some other way.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is a difficulty. Take the case of a man who receives stolen goods, and he has disposed of them to a purchaser in good faith who has paid the price. What is the position of the person who acquired the goods under these conditions. He surely had acquired a title.

Mr. BRITTON. Not in Ontario.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He has under the civil law of our province.

Mr. COWAN. Not with us.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If he has acquired under the civil law a title to that movable property, how could you defeat that title by reason of an enactment which we may make here?

Mr. BRITTON. You cannot.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is my difficulty.

Mr. POWELL. I imagine that case is covered by the concluding words of the section.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not think so.

Mr. FLINT. Can we not enact that property found on the person convicted of theft, should be in some way impounded by the court, in order that the civil trial as to the right to the property would proceed. I was always under the impression that the court did have power to impound.

Mr. POWELL. If I mistake not under the common law the goods of a felon would be forfeited to the Crown; hence we would have a right to deal with it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think the Acts says: 'In respect to which the offence has been committed.' With us such goods would remain under the control of the clerk of the peace after the conviction, and then the person who is entitled to the property makes application before a judge of the civil court to have the goods restored to him, and on the order of the judge, the clerk of the peace hands these goods over to the person from whom these goods have been taken.

Mr. POWELL. Suppose the court made what we will call an order of restitution. That order would only be given as a matter of procedure. It could do no harm. The civil right could be tried in the civil case afterwards, and I do not think the law would be ultra vires at all on the ground of interference with civil rights.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We may be able to re-enact a provision which would obviate all the difficulty.

Mr. RUSSELL. As a matter of criminal law and procedure, it strikes me that we have the right to say what shall become of property which has been the subject of a crime, and which is in the custody of the law at the time. Then, the question is simply this: As we certainly would have a right to legislate for forfeiting stolen property to the Crown, the question is whether we have not a right to grant a title of the property to another. We certainly have been legislating on the supposition that we have a right to control not merely the custody of stolen property, but the title.

Mr. POWELL. This goes no further than the custody.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is a very difficult question, whether we have or have not that right. My impression at first blush is, that we have, having the power to legislate in regard to property which has been the subject of a criminal offence, and which, by common law, would be forfeited to the Crown. Of course, I admit the difficulty of the question, and it is well worthy of consideration.

On section 872,

Mr. FLINT. Until the case of the Queen vs. Horton was decided in Nova Scotia, the law was supposed by all practitioners to be as it is in this section; but, in that case, the court held that while it might be possible to punish a criminal with hard labour for certain petty offences, upon his not paying a fine, you could not punish him with hard labour for not paying the distress in default of the original punishment; and this clause has been drafted as suggested as meeting the case, by the stipendiary magistrate of Yarmouth, who is a very able practitioner. It has been before the Department of Justice, and at one time I had a very careful plea on the subject.

Mr. RUSSELL. Where imprisonment is mentioned without hard labour, of course, hard labour cannot be attached, and there is no mention of hard labour in the imprisonment which is imposed as an alternative to not having the property for distress. Therefore, it is necessary to mention it.

Mr. BRITTON. I think it has been decided in two or three cases in Ontario that there was no power to imprison with hard labour in default of paying a fine with costs, and the object of this clause is that hard labour may follow as part of the punishment in default of paying a fine or in default of distress.

Mr. POWELL. This is a matter which requires more consideration than appears on the face of it. Take the case of a man who is convicted of an assault. The justice has the power to impose a penalty, not exceeding two months imprisonment, with hard labour. In addition he has the right to award, and adjudge that the defendant shall also pay to the prosecutor the sum of $20 for his costs, and in the case of default to pay the costs within twenty days, the same shall be levied by distress, and sale of the defendant's goods, and in case of insufficient distress, it is ordered and awarded that the defendant be confined in the common jail for three months. The court, in the first place, has the power to impose a penalty of imprisonment, with hard labour. Then the latter part of the section is followed, because there is an award of distress and imprisonment in case of default. True it is with respect to costs, but I am speaking of the inclusiveness of the words. The man would be imprisoned for two months, and if, at the expiration of that term, he had not the money to pay the costs, he would be subject, under the amended section, to possibly three months' hard labour, on account of his poverty. I do not think we should treat a man as a convict because he is poor and cannot pay his costs.

Mr. BRITTON. Does not my hon. friend think that this applies only to such a case as this. Section 782 has reference to all the Acts under which a conviction may take place. Under one Act, a conviction has taken place, and the offence is punishable either by imprisonment, with hard labour, not exceeding six months, or by fine, not exceeding a certain amount and costs, and the usual adjudication follows that for non-payment of fine and costs, he would be subject to further imprisonment. The magistrate or the court, instead of awarding punishment, in the first instance, by imprisonment, with hard labour, simply imposes a fine and costs. Then there is a default in payment of the fine, and by reason of that, the punishment is imprisonment. In that case, as I understand this amendment, there is power to impose hard labour with imprisonment.

Mr. POWELL. It is all right in that case.

Mr. BRITTON. I do not think it applies to any other.

Mr. POWELL. Why does it not apply to the case I have mentioned, where you condemn a man to imprisonment for assault and then order him to pay the costs?

Mr. BRITTON. If, on conviction for assault, there was a power to imprison to apply at hard labour, I think that would apply in that case.

Mr. POWELL. And a man should be imprisoned on account of his inability to pay costs?

Mr. FLINT. It only gives a magistrate power and does not say that he must imprison at hard labour.

Mr. POWELL. I do not think a magistrate should have power to do what is an outrage. No man should be imprisoned as a convict on account of his poverty. It is bad enough in this enlightened age, to have him in jail, without treating him as a convict. Instead of becoming more lenient in our criminal law, I am afraid we are going back to the days before Bentham.

Mr. RUSSELL. When you punish him for not paying costs, why not punish him with hard labour. If it were simply a case of imprisonment for non-payment of debt, in our province he would swear out of jail, as they call it, in a few hours. But, if he is imprisoned as part of the punishment because he does not pay costs, it seems to me he might as well be at hard labour.

Mr. FLINT. My hon. friend (Mr. Powell's) arguments sound well. At the first blush, it seems that a man punished in this way is punished for his poverty. But this poverty may not be actual. A man may be able to pay, but there may be a certain amount of obstinacy about paying the costs, and discretion in the magistrate to punish with hard labour may be in the interest of justice. It must be remembered that we are dealing with a criminal who has committed a very serious offence, and, as the costs are part of the injury done to the prosecutor or to the community, he must make up what is necessary to vindicate the law in his case.

Mr. M. K. COWAN (South Essex). I agree with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) as I understand him. I agree also with the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) as far as he goes. The criminal law should not be used as a punishment for poverty. But, if a man is not able to pay costs, he should not only not be imprisoned at hard labour, but he should not be imprisoned at all.

Mr. POWELL. He ought to be able to swear out.

Mr. COWAN. Yes, there ought to be some provision by which he could do that.

Mr. POWELL. Take another case. Suppose a man has been guilty of common assault, and is mulcted in a sum of $20, with the alternative of imprisonment for two months at hard labour. The costs are $15. The man may have money enough to pay the $20 fine, but not enough to pay the $15 costs. Then, the magistrate may put him in jail for three months at hard labour, because his money does not hold out to pay the costs. My hon. friend from Halifax speaks about it being part of the punishment. I do not agree with that. Whether the costs are large or small is a matter of accident. If the people who witnessed the assault are from a distance, the expenses will be higher than if they are near at hand. It is more like a civil suit, where the costs are not sued for, but are simply incidental. I do not regard them as a substantive punishment at all.

Mr. COWAN. The question is asked as to the case of Regina vs. Colson, 24 Ontario Reports 247. That was a case arising on a summary conviction in the city of Toronto for illegally practising medicine, the section of which is as follows :

It shall not be lawful for any person not registered to practice medicine, surgery or midwifery for hire, gain or hope of reward; and if any person not registered pursuant to this Act, for hire, gain or hope of reward, practises or professes to practise medicine, surgery or midwifery, or advertises to give advice in medicine, surgery or midwifery, he shall, upon summary conviction thereof, for any and every such offence, pay a penalty not exceeding $100 nor less than $25.

That case came before a magistrate and he was fined on appeal. Chief Justice Armour says :

We think we cannot uphold the conviction. We do not proceed upon the ground that there was no evidence of an offence. Where the conviction is valid on its face we are not to look at the evidence for the purpose of determining whether an offence is established by it. That is a matter for the magistrate and for the appellate court, where there is an appeal. The conviction here is bad, because it does not specify the particular act or acts which constituted the alleged practising of medicine. We had no statute such as they have in England, saying that the word of the statute shall be sufficient.

On section 927,

Mr. BERGERON. What is the object of this clause ?

Mr. COWAN.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is a general provision covering all the fines, penalties and forfeitures in respect of any of the laws of Canada. These all go to the Dominion government. This section makes one general clause having application to the whole of these fines. Instead of having to go over all these statutes and each man's offence to see how they are to be disposed of—because it is only in the absence of any other provision in the general law that the fines should belong to the Crown—this disposes of the whole matter so that we shall not have to refer to any other statutes.

On section 955,

Mr. BERGERON. This is to add to clause 955.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, under the general law you cannot condemn a man to imprisonment in the penitentiary for less than two years. This provision is intended to provide for a case of escape so that a person may be condemned to imprisonment in the same penitentiary even if the imprisonment does not exceed two years, or six months or one year, as the case may be.

Mr. BERGERON. If a man was condemned for seven years he may be condemned to six months more, or a year more.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. POWELL. If a man attempts to escape he may be punished by two years in the penitentiary. It may be by less, but it must not exceed that.

Mr. BRITTON. I know that this has been a difficulty in the law that for escape you could not really punish a man by an extension of his term, but you had either to abandon the sentence, or the sentence would not take effect until the original sentence had expired after which you had to bring the convict to a jail and put him in there as punishment for the escape.

On section 957,

Mr. BERGERON. In regard to this clause, I would like to ask the hon. Solicitor General if, under the new Bill presented to the House this year in providing for a reprieve from jails or reformatories, the hon. Minister of Justice would be able to prevent whipping if it were asked for in a proper way ? I see that it has to be done not less than ten days before the expiration of a sentence. If the Minister of Justice can remit a sentence, can he also prevent a whipping if it is asked for ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Would he have the right to commute a sentence in so far as a whipping is concerned ?

Mr. BERGERON. Yes. Suppose a young man or an adult is condemned to be whipped : if there seems to be doubt about the case and if a demand was made on the Minister of Justice, could the condemned obtain a reprieve from that castigation?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He can now relieve him from a part of the sentence, as well as from the sentence itself. I am not prepared to answer the question as to whether the prisoner could be relieved while being incarcerated simply of the punishment, in so far as whipping is concerned.

Mr. BERGERON. That is what I want to know. I would like to know if a demand to that effect were brought before the Minister of Justice he could be relieved of that portion of the punishment although he would not have any time taken off his sentence.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is to say, that the sentence would be allowed to remain, but that the man would be relieved of that part of the sentence in respect to whipping. I would not like to answer that off-hand. It seems to me to be only reasonable that it should be within the power of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. BERGERON. If he could do the more, he could do the less.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would fancy so; if he could commute the sentence he should be able to relieve the man from any portion of it. If my hon. friend will bring that point up again I will consider it and perhaps be able to give him an answer.

On section 958.

Mr. BERGERON. The last part of that applies to the Yukon Territory. I think that has been asked for by the judge.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. POWELL. What is the object of subsection 2?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It has been designed specially to meet the case of the Yukon country where men are detained for considerable lengths of time at considerable expense. It is proper that the judge should be, at the exercise of his discretion, in a position to fine a man who is able to pay an amount sufficient to provide, if not entirely, at least, in part, for his maintenance in prison.

On section 971,

Mr. COWAN. Judges have the power now to suspend sentence.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Not when the offender incurs a penalty exceeding two years. This law is intended to apply to minor offences in which the punishment is less than two years, but if the punishment exceeds two years there is no provision. In order to meet this case the section has been introduced.

Mr. BERGERON. That is left to the discretion of the judge entirely.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Left to the discretion of the court and the judge. In a case in which the penalty is imprisonment exceeding two years, the judge must have the concurrence of the officer representing the Crown.

Mr. RUSSELL. With the permission of the House, I would like to offer an amendment to section 449. A number of sections to be substituted for that are put in my hand by a very skilful practitioner, who says:

These sections are designed to protect manufacturers and bottlers whose business is now injured by the action of unscrupulous persons, who procure bottles from second-hand dealers, junk stores, &c., and fill them with inferior soda water, ginger ale, &c., and by merely covering up the manufacturer's name on the bottle, and covering up his trade mark, sell the inferior ginger ale, &c., and although it is impossible to show that there is any fraudulent representation or deception practised on the public in the first instance (as the name and trade mark are covered up), still the use of the bottles in this way eventually injures the manufacturer, as the new cover sometimes slips off, and his reputation becomes injured in some cases thereby. He might have a civil remedy against a person so using his bottles now, but a civil remedy is tedious and expensive. What is wanted is statutory power to have such offenders convicted. Such power is given under United States statutes, and there is no reason why it should not be given in Canada. The bottles are not sold, they are only loaned, and their contents sold; but notwithstanding that it is a condition of each sale that the bottle shall be returned, it frequently happens that people are mean enough to sell the bottles, although not their property, and eventually the bottles find their way into the hands of unprincipled bottlers via the junk shop, &c. It is therefore not unreasonable to provide that any one covering up or concealing the trade mark or name on a bottle for the purpose of selling again, or any person trafficking in such bottles or filling the same again with mineral water, &c., without consent of actual owner shall be subject to a penalty.

There was a prosecution here last year which failed because it was impossible to show that an actual deception and injury occurred to the public. The public are not the only parties to be protected. The manufacturer is entitled to be protected in the way I have mentioned, and I hope that you will take this matter in hand.

I therefore propose the following should be substituted for section 449:

449. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence who—

(a) wilfully defaces, conceals or removes the duly filed trade mark or name of another person upon any cask, keg, bottle, siphon, vessel, can, case or other package with intent to defraud the proprietor thereof without the consent of the proprietor, or unless such package has been purchased from the proprietor;

(b) being a partnership, corporation, dealer, manufacturer or bottler, without the written consent of the proprietor, trades or traffics in any bottle or siphon which has upon it the duly filed trade mark or name of the proprietor, or fills such bottle or siphon with any beverage for the purpose of sale or traffic.

2. The using by any manufacturer, dealer, partnership or corporation other than the lawful owner thereof, without the written permission of such owner, of any bottle or siphon for the sale therein of any beverage, or the buying, selling or trafficking in any such bottle or siphon by any dealer or manufacturer other than the owner, without such written permission, or the fact that any junk dealer has in his possession any such bottle or siphon so marked or stamped, without such written permission, shall be prima facie evidence that such use, buying, selling or trafficking or possession is unlawful within the meaning of this section.

I will leave this proposed amendment with the Solicitor General, and his draughtsman can go over it and see if it is in proper form.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend does not want to press it to-night?

Mr. RUSSELL. Not at all.

Mr. BERGERON. If there are any other amendments, I would ask that the Solicitor General should look over them and have his officers look into them also.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is another question which I would like my hon. friends to consider. That is an amendment which would enable us to meet this difficulty with reference to bucket shops. The existence of these bucket shops is a very serious menace in Montreal especially, and unfortunately up to the present time we have not been able to draft an amendment to the law which would enable us to deal with these institutions. Sir John Abbott drew a Bill, as hon. gentlemen are aware, but unfortunately in a case decided in Ontario, it was held that this law did not meet the difficulty as they have it in Toronto. I would like my hon. friends to give the question some attention, to see how far we can draft a clause which would meet what is certainly a serious difficulty in Montreal at present.

Mr. POWELL. Has section 205 been passed?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Everything is open. I look upon this as a measure that we are all interested in to make it as perfect as possible, and everything is open.

Mr. BRITTON. I would call attention to two amendments which I have from time to time advocated, and I would ask that they be taken into consideration by the Solicitor General and be introduced into this Bill. One is with regard to section 744. At present the accused person has got to have the consent in writing of the Attorney General before he can take the first step towards having a question reserved if the judge at the trial refuses to reserve it. That seems to me to be unfair. I do not think that any Attorney General will act on caprice, or will take so strong a view of it, that in any ordinary case he would not be willing to grant that. But I submit that the principle is not fair, and I suggest the following amendment, which I think ought to be accepted:

Mr. RUSSELL.

6. Section 744 of the said code is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

744. If the court refuses to reserve the question, the party applying may move the Court of Appeal as hereinafter provided.

2. The Attorney General or any person who has applied to the court to reserve any such question of law, may, on notice of motion to be given to the accused or prosecutor, as the case may be, move the Court of Appeal for leave to appeal. The Court of Appeal may, upon the motion and upon considering such evidence, if any, as they think fit to require, grant or refuse such leave.

3. If leave to appeal is granted, a case shall be stated for the opinion of the Court of Appeal, as if the question had been reserved.

4. If the sentence is alleged to be one which could not by law be passed, either party may, without leave, upon giving notice of motion to the other side, move the Court of Appeal to pass a proper sentence.

5. If the court has arrested judgment and refused to pass any sentence, the prosecutor may, without leave, make such a motion.

My other suggestion is a repeal of section 748. This section gives the Minister of Justice power to grant a new trial. I will not discuss that at this late hour, but I intend to say a few words on it at a later stage. I understand that the Minister of Justice is opposed to the repeal of this section, and, therefore, it is perhaps useless for me to ask to have it repealed. But I think the argument is in favour of repeal. I do not think that the power of pardon, or the granting of a new trial should rest with any Minister of Justice.

Mr. BERGERON. I suppose my hon. friend has read all of his amendment, so that we may see it in Hansard to-morrow. I think there is a very strong point in that, and when it is discussed, I want to bring to the attention of my hon. friend, something within my own knowledge, in reference to some very awkward things which the amendment of my hon. friend might obviate.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, May 15, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

UNOPPOSED MOTION.

Copies of all correspondence, reports and papers relating to the prohibition of the exportation of fish caught in Lakes Winnipegosis and Manitoba since date of return moved for April 23, 1900, to the present time.—(Mr. Roche.)

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 159)—from the Senate—for the relief of Gustavus A. Kobold.—(Mr. Bennett.) On division.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). My attention has been called to the fact that the supplies voted for the legislative service are exhausted, and it is necessary to make immediate provision to supply the deficiency. Therefore, in anticipation of the regular supplementary estimates, I present the following Message from His Excellency the Governor General, signed by his own hand :

MINTO.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons further supplementary estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ended June 30, 1900, and in accordance with the provisions of 'The British North America Act, 1867, the Governor General recommends these estimates to the House of Commons.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved that His Excellency's Message, together with the accompanying estimates, be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I take the opportunity of asking my hon. friend when he expects to favour the House with the remaining supplementary estimates ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The supplementary estimates for the current year will be brought down in two or three days, and those for the coming year very shortly afterwards.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—BROCKVILLE AND WEST HURON ELECTIONS.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Supply, and the motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I am sure that every member of this House will recognize the importance and gravity of the subject we are discussing. We all admit that no discussion can take place in this House as to the right of the people, freely and without any restriction, to record their votes for the man of their choice. much less could any decision of this House on that subject be looked upon in any other light than as being of the utmost importance. I myself would be the last one to minimize the importance of the present discussion. I desire that we should approach it carefully and prudently, and with the sole object of reaching just and permanent conclusions, on the important question now before us—conclusions which can be defended now and hereafter on good solid and substantial grounds, and which will constitute a precedent not only for this but succeeding parliaments. Every one of us recognizes that the ballot box is the basis on which an honest government is dependent, and I trust that there will not be a man on either side who will not be determined on every occasion to do everything possible, by voice and vote, and if need be, by force, to protect that ballot box. No one can condemn more than I do the man who interferes with the free expression of the will of the honest elector in depositing his ballot at the polls. Some hon. gentlemen, during the course of some desultory conversations or discussion which took place on this matter, went so far as to designate such men as scoundrels, and I am not here to challenge the use of that vigorous language. I admit that the officer or the man, whether an officer or not, who interferes with the free expression of the opinion of the electorate at the polls and his choice of a candidate, is a man who cannot be punished too severely. The crime of tampering with the ballot box, or the expression of the will of the people as contained in that ballot box, is one that cannot be punished too severely. But, while we are unanimous on that point, we must be careful that in the punishment of offenders against the law we should proceed according to well-recognized rules which the law has provided, so that the punishment of such ill-doers will take place according to just and well-recognized rules of procedure.

We had an election investigation last session into the West Huron election case. The reference of that case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections was made on a motion proposed by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), that both the West Huron and Brockville cases should be referred to that committee, and I desire to say that, perhaps, the House acted a little hastily, at least, with respect to that resolution. Whether it did or not will appear before this discussion closes; but, at present, I am merely concerned in calling the attention of the House to the conclusion I have personally reached, and which has been reached by men much more eminent than I in this and preceding parliaments, namely, that the most inefficient body to which can be referred the decision of questions of fact is the Privileges and Elections Committee. I recognize very fully that that committee is an excellent body to which could be referred fairly and safely all questions of law. It is composed, as a rule, of lawyers from the different provinces, who have seats in this House, men well versed, most of them, in the laws of the several provinces, and many of them besides having very great parliamentary experience. They have had all these advantages; and therefore, I say, that so far as that committee is concerned, I consider them a peculiarly well qualified committee to deal with all questions of law. But I do not consider them a well qualified body to deal with questions of fact. That was recognized, of course, many years ago. The British parliament, and, I think, every colonial parliament, so far as I know—at any rate those possessing the privileges of responsible government have, after much experience withdrawn from that committee all questions of fact regarding elections. And why, Sir? Because it was felt that it was a body to which such important questions could not be fairly trusted; it was felt that partisan feelings would creep into that committee and override all other considerations which should control the committee's decision. And I believe it is with the general assent, not only of the parliament of Great Britain and the colonies, but of the people whom those parliaments represent, that, many years ago, all questions relating to controverted elections were withdrawn from this Privileges and Elections Committee and transferred to the courts. Then, again, it is found that this committee is an ever-changing committee. One day you will have a dozen members present, the next day eight, the next day eight different members, and so on. With rare exceptions the same men do not attend the committee every day. You have not the privilege of having before you counsel to conduct the inquiry; one for the prosecution and one for the defence; one to examine witnesses and one to cross-examine them. All the guards and safeguards that the law throws around the ordinary proceedings for the investigation of fact in criminal matters are absent from this committee. The organization of the committee, and its being an ever-changing committee, make it about as inefficient a body to investigate and decide complicated questions of fact as any court I know of. Therefore, as a result of experience in this matter, the examination into questions of fact, political and legal, and politico-legal, which rise out of elections have been withdrawn from that committee and vested in controverted elections courts constituted for that express purpose.

Now, I say so much because it will be my duty to comment, very shortly I hope, upon the manner in which this committee did deal or was permitted to deal with some questions of fact which came before it. But, for a moment, let me call attention to the speech with which my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) moved the resolution before the House. I have nothing to complain of in the tone of that speech or the manner in which it was delivered; nor have I anything to complain of in the matter of it—that is, the hon. gentleman had a right to put in what he did and to leave out what he did. But I do not agree with the conclusion that he reached. I think he divided his speech into two or three parts. The first part was devoted to a somewhat ingenious apology for or explanation of his conduct in bringing forward this motion at this particular time. The House has been in session for about three months and a half, and, prima facie, the hon. gentleman did appear to be acting with very great negligence in bringing forward a motion of this kind, to resume an investigation before the Privileges and Elections Committee, at the end of three months and a half. But he undertook to explain that he was not to blame. He intimated that some thirteen days after the House met, he gave notice of his intention to move in this matter and attempted to move it the fourteenth day after the House met, treating the question as one of privilege, when he was informed by the Speaker that he was out of order and must put his notice on the paper. In the beginning, I want to say, in my opinion, the hon. gentleman is chiefly to blame for the position in which this question stands to-day. Every one knows, who has had experience in parliament—and my hon. friend is not without some experience at least—and those around him have had great experience—that the time to put a notice on the Order paper for debate, if you wish to reach it early in the session, is the first week of the session. Everybody knows that after the first fortnight, the paper is so filled with notices that resolutions put on after the time can hardly be reached until late in the session, if they are reached at all. So, instead of letting day after day go by after the meeting of this House on the first of February, without putting his notice on the Order paper—that is, if he really desired to have this referred to the committee, if he did not mean merely to play a game of political battledore and shuttlecock with it—he should have put his notice on the Order paper during the first days of the session. For reasons of his own, which I have not to quarrel with, he allowed day after day to go by; and when he came to put his notice on the Order paper, he found that there were many notices ahead of him, and he could not get at it as early as he expressed the wish to do. Who was to blame for that?

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

An hon. MEMBER. The government.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. 'The government' says one hon. member. Why, the government does not control the Order paper, it does not dictate the order in which motions shall be put. We are not responsible for the negligence of the hon. gentleman, if it was negligence, in not putting his notice on the Order paper until fourteen days had elapsed and until the paper was filled. The government had no more control in such matters than any member of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. The motion was reached and the government said it should stand.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor), the whip of the party, sees the fix he is in, and pleads another excuse. I suppose he refers to the practice which has grown up in this parliament—and a very good practice it is—of having motions about which nobody desires to express an opinion of any kind pass as unopposed motions. There seems to be a most extraordinary idea in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite as to what these unopposed motions are; and my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) is not free from that heresy. That hon. gentleman seemed to think that because, when this motion came up, the leader of the House, having notice from one or more members of the House that they desired to speak upon it, called it to stand, the leader of the House was obstructing the motion. The leader of the House had no option in the matter; he has no more power to further discussion on any one of these motions than any member of the House; he cannot say that one motion shall be gone on with and adopted and another left on one side. Before a motion can be called out of its place and adopted, there must be the unanimous consent of the members of the House; and if one member of the House expresses his desire to speak to the motion, it is not an unopposed motion and cannot be treated as one. So, when this motion came up, it was pronounced an opposed motion by several hon. members.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I beg the hon. gentleman's (Sir Louis Davies') pardon; he is absolutely inaccurate. The only member who called out that the motion should stand, in my hearing, was the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). And the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) misunderstands my point altogether. The point I made about this was, that having regard to the duty of the leader of the House with respect to the honour of the House, it was his duty, at the first opportunity this session, to have made this motion himself.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is an entirely different point; the hon. gentleman must not get away from the point that we are discussing. The hon. gentleman has ventured to say, with a great deal of assurance, and, I think, after a little while that he will hesitate to repeat it, that no hon. member in this House called out 'stand,' because he did not hear him. Now, he is wrong. There were several hon. members who called out 'stand.'

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Name them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and several hon. members intimated their desire to express their opinion on this question. So the hon. gentleman is entirely wrong in his facts. The leader of the government is not responsible in any way whatever for calling 'stand,' when that question was called up by the Speaker, but he was bound to call 'stand' when any hon. member supporting him, or opposed to him, intimated a desire to discuss the question.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I repeat that on both occasions no member of the House, to my knowledge, said 'stand' except the right hon. leader of the House, and he did say 'stand.'

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. member has qualified it now very properly with his knowledge of hearing. Well, his hearing does not appear to be very acute, because there were many who did hear numbers of hon. gentlemen around us asking that the matter should stand. Therefore, I have put this matter plainly and squarely. The hon. gentleman, in speaking the other night, reflected not once, but several times, upon the leader of the government, for his conduct in that regard. I venture to say that his reflections on that occasion were without any foundation, and that he himself would be the first to admit it when he comes to understand what the true meaning of an unopposed motion is. Now, the hon. gentleman, if he accepts that view of the situation, will see that the question comes before the House to-day because of his negligence, or the negligence of his friends in not having placed the motion, for purposes of their own, upon the Order paper, within the first fourteen days of the session.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That seems to irritate and annoy some hon. gentlemen opposite. But, I may be entirely mistaken, I do not think it does irritate them, for I have a strong opinion that the hon. gentlemen who are saying 'oh,' never intended that question to go upon the Order paper. It was intended to be kept for the purpose of political discussion, political sensational discussion, and not to be referred, because, as I humbly believe, a reference could do no possible good, or achieve more results than has been achieved by the evidence which has been submitted. It, therefore, appears to me that when an hon. gentleman brings forward his motion at the present day, in the shape of a want of confidence motion in the government, in a shape that it cannot be in any sense amended or altered, he does so for the purpose of having it defeated, he challenges defeat. If the hon. gentleman had brought forward his motion as a substantive motion in the ordinary way in which motions are made in this House, it would have been open to amendment; one part of it might have been accepted and the other part rejected. The hon. gentleman knows, he knew long ago, he was told in this House long ago, that a good many members were not prepared to refer the Brockville election to a committee of inquiry, because they thought there were no grounds for that reference whatever; while the same gentlemen might have been prepared to refer the West Huron election. The hon. gentleman knew that; but he did not move his resolution so that these gentlemen could vote for a reference of the West Huron election and reject the reference to the Brockville election. Oh, no. He says: I will move it in a way that you cannot amend it, you must swallow every part of it; West Huron and Brockville must go together, you cannot separate them. You may think one should be referred and the other should not; but I will not permit you to vote that way; I will not permit you to vote for one reference and not for the other; I will make you vote for both, whether you think both should be referred or not. Well, the hon. gentleman is perfectly within his rights. He can make his amendment in this way, in a way that was stated yesterday to be a want of confidence motion in this government, on a motion to go into supply, and precluding any amendment whatever.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask a question? If this is a want of confidence motion, was the motion of my hon. colleague from Halifax (Mr. Russell), on a similar motion to go into supply, also a want of confidence motion? And that was carried.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman had listened to me just now, he would have heard me refer to it as a motion which was yesterday described by the member for York (Mr. Foster), as a want of confidence motion in this government, unless the government chose to accept it holus bolus without amendment.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is not that the case with regard to the other?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The other did not require any amendment, the other was a resolution which the government was prepared to accept.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to suggest that if there was any confidence to be placed in the pledges of the First Minister and other members of the government with reference to this same question, this motion would not require any amendment either.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman and I differ entirely upon that point, and I think a majority of the House will differ from him. The hon. gentleman, as an old parliamentarian, understands that this motion should be moved in a form which left it open to members of the House to move an amendment, if they so desired, and to refer one of the counties to the Election Committee without being compelled to refer the other, because there may have been grounds in one case, and not in the other. It does not necessarily follow that every motion that is made for a reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, must carry.

Now I propose for a moment calling the attention of the House, before making some slight reference to the evidence, to the jurisdiction which has been retained by this parliament. I stated a moment ago that we had relegated to a court constituted by the Controverted Elections Act, the trial of all election petitions, and we have explicitly stated that no election petition should be contested or tried in any other way, than by this Elections Act. Before calling the attention of the House to the identical words of the section, I would like to call its attention to one decision, at least, which has been given by this House upon that Act, and upon the jurisdiction which this House now possesses, since it has relegated to the election courts the trial of these controverted elections. Everybody remembers well the Queen's County election case in New Brunswick; everybody remembers that that was a case in which the returning officer, Dunn, on his own motion, contrary to law, in violation of his duty, in opposition to all the facts, chose to return the minority candidate, Mr. Baird, to this parliament, his opponent having obtained some sixty-one votes more than Mr. Baird had. There was no excuse for such conduct except the paltry and trivial excuse put forward by the returning officer, that as Mr. King's deposit money had not been paid by an agent, but by himself, it was illegally paid. Every one knew that the mode of paying the deposit adopted by Mr. King was the proper mode of paying it; every one knew that there could not be a legally constituted agent until the candidate was nominated, every one knew that the excuse, or apology, offered by the returning officer was the veriest farce, that it was an insult to the House of Commons, and that the returning officer was guilty of contempt. The matter was brought before the House and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the Committee on Privileges and Elections, from whose report I am quoting, after discussing the matter at great length, reported to the House:

That in the opinion of this committee, the House ought not to declare that the said George

F. Baird is not entitled to sit in the House, but should leave the case to be disposed of under the provisions of the Controverted Elections Act, it being the intention, spirit and policy of parliament that all questions as to the validity of the election of members to the House of Commons should be decided by the ordinary legal tribunals of the country instead of by the House of Commons.

That was the decision given by the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the year 1887, in the matter of the Queen's county election, and that decision was brought before this House on a motion made by Sir John Thompson, that :

The House adopts the report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections on the case of the election for Queen's County, N.B.

I moved in amendment to it, that, instead of adopting the report, the returning officer should be summoned to the Bar, and made to amend his return so as to make that return conform to the expressed wish of the people at the polls. The decision of the House was that no matter how flagrant the case was, if the returning officer returned a man to this House and his opponent felt himself aggrieved by it he must go to the election court under the Controverted Elections Act to get his remedy, because, they said that it was :

The intention, spirit and policy of parliament that all questions as to the validity of the election of members to the House of Commons should be decided by the ordinary legal tribunals of the country instead of by the House of Commons.

The section of the Controverted Elections Act to which they referred, was section 68, and it is as follows :

All elections shall be subject to the provisions of this Act, and shall not be questioned otherwise than in accordance herewith.

Now, we have the section and we have the decision of the parliament of Canada upon it, and I suppose if that was to be treated as a precedent it was to have some authority with respect to subsequent applications of a similar or like kind. Sir John Thompson, in moving the House to adopt the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which I have called attention, made one exception, and one only, which he thought it was proper to interpolate into the section, and that was that where one of the candidates was a disqualified candidate, the House would have the right to act, and to declare that the other candidate had been elected. With that one exception, I think his language was broad enough, strong enough and clear enough to show, that, in his opinion, at least, there was no other way in which, under the present law, an election return could be affected than under the Controverted Elections Act. I take the liberty of quoting from Hansard what he said. Referring to the change in the jurisdiction over election petitions from this House, or a committee of this House, to the courts of the land, he said :

Since the change which I have referred to, and by which parliament has renounced its rights to deal with the matter of controverted elections, there has been fully recognized in the various discussions that have taken place in the Imperial House of Commons this principle that everything has been transferred to the judiciary in connection with controverted elections, excepting the one question of the disqualification of persons who have been returned to parliament. As was said by Sir Henry James in 1882, in the case of Michael Davitt, the only question which parliament has reserved to itself to deal with, is the question whether a proper person has been returned in obedience to the writ. As was explained by Lord Coleridge and Lord Selborne in a previous debate in 1870, that reservation is not in conflict with the statute which says that the election shall only be contested by an election petition, because the House has to consider whether the writ has been obeyed which commanded the electors of the shire, or the county, to return a suitable person (one of the 'magis idoneos et discretas') to sit in that House. The House, therefore, is still seized of the right to decide whether the writ has been obeyed by the election of a person who is fit and proper to sit in that House. But as soon as the question has been decided as to the qualification of the person so returned, the conduct of the returning officer, or the number of votes which were received, the conduct of the candidates, and every other question connected with the election, or with the conduct of the returning officer, has been relegated to the judiciary, and the House has always declined to exercise its functions and its power to interfere.

So that, there can be no possible doubt if Sir John Thompson's exposition of the law was accepted by this House, as was the resolution which he moved after making this speech, that this House was bereft of every jurisdiction in reference to the election of members of the power to make examinations affecting the conduct of officers, who had conducted elections, or the number of votes received by the different candidates, and of every other question, excepting one, and that was simply where one or other of the candidates was disqualified. I did not hold that view. I was sitting in opposition at that time, and I voted against the hon. gentleman's resolution. I held a different view. I held, in common with such great men as Edward Blake and Sir John Macdonald, that the House had not denuded itself of the authority over these officers—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But that was not the opinion of hon. gentlemen who are cheering. They voted in accordance with this speech, and the resolution I have read, that, under the Controverted Elections Act, all these questions had been withdrawn from the jurisdiction of this House, and that there was no question left to this House at all except one question, and that was whether the candidates were disqualified or not.

They held that view, and they voted for it every one of them. No, there was one who voted the other way, a gentleman who received great honour for it, the present Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. He stood out of his party, but he stood alone. He voted against the resolution, but he voted alone. Every other member of the Conservative party did as Sir John Thompson desired him to do; he declared that this House had no jurisdiction in election matters at all. On that occasion I took the opportunity to say wherein I differed from Sir John Thompson, and I would not ask the House to listen to an extract from anything I said myself, were it not that I have been challenged in the newspaper press and in this House also for having expressed upon that occasion, in 1887, different opinions from those I entertain now on this important question. I have made no change in my opinions on this question. I entertained the opinion then that the House had the right and the power to punish officers for contempt in all cases where the facts were brought properly before them. I will ask the House to allow me to read from Hansard, page 678, the argument that I addressed to the House on that point:

Sir, I contend, as a matter of law, that the rights which this House can exercise respecting the election of its members have not been in any degree minimized by the passage of the Controverted Elections Act. I state that as a clear principle of constitutional law, and I think I have the authority, not only of the leader of the opposition, but of the leader of the government, for that position—that the same rights which this House retained to itself when in former days it relegated the trial of election petitions to the election committees of the House, these same rights the House continues to retain after it has relegated the trial of election petitions to the judges of the land. There has been no change. Almost the same words which were used in the old Controverted Elections Act, for referring the trial of controverted elections to the Election Committees of the House are used now in the Controverted Elections Act; and the hon. gentleman knows well that the principle is this: that while the House will not entertain any petition questioning the return of a member, having relegated to the courts of the land the right to receive and determine upon such petitions, at the same time the House has never failed, of its own motion and in its own right, when the facts are brought before it, to consider all the facts set forth in the return of a returning officer: and if it believes he has returned the wrong man, to make him amend his return accordingly.

I pointed out in that case that as it appeared clearly before the House that the minority candidate had received sixty-one votes less than his opponent, and as there was no disqualification attaching to his opponent, (his election being conducted in every respect properly), that every principle of law and justice and common sense dictated that the returning officer who had made a false return should be made to amend that return at the Bar of the House, and that the amended return should entitle the majority candidate to take his seat. That was the only principle I contended for then.

Hon. gentlemen know that before these cases were referred to the courts of the land under the Controverted Elections Act, there were courts established in this House, with rules and regulations providing for petitions and other particulars and for a trial, in almost every respect the same as the rules which provide for a petition and evidence in a trial under the election Act. There was a court here constituted by law, then called the Privileges and Elections Committee. That court could not receive a petition on a mere motion made in this House by a member. It required a petition filed within a certain number of days after the House met, containing allegations of facts. That petition must be accompanied with a certain sum of money as a deposit. That petition had to be followed by particulars of the offences and so on, just the same as the proceedings before a controverted elections court. So I contended then, and it is my humble judgment that I was right; that the transference of the jurisdiction of the Elections Committee here, to the ordinary courts of the land did not oust this House of the jurisdiction it had before to punish the returning officers or deputy returning officers, if they were guilty of violating the law which had been entrusted to them to be carried out.

I say here that we stand to-day in this position: That we have a Controverted Elections Act providing for the trial of election petitions and everything that could arise out of election petitions, with a declaration in the statute, that no election shall be questioned otherwise than in accordance therewith. And then in addition to that we have another statute. The prior statute was passed many years ago and remained in force for many years, but it was felt by some hon. members to be ineffective in reaching corruption which was widespread throughout certain electoral districts, for the reason that frequently—I might almost say always or nearly always—when an act of corruption had been proved on the part of a candidate or his agent sufficient to void the election, the judges rested there and went no further. And no matter what evidence a man had behind that, to show corruption and corrupt conditions throughout the constituency, the judges thought that the moment they found a corrupt act had been committed, the election should be voided and so they stayed the proceedings. We had then a most important statute passed in the year 1886. For the purpose of remedying that condition of matters, for the purpose of enabling any twenty-five electors who thought there was a general system of corruption extending throughout the electoral district, and wanted, not to disqualify the man elected, but wanted to bring home the fact of the existence of that corruption in a constituency to parliament and to the country; an Act was introduced in 1886, for the purpose of enabling them to do so. In my humble opinion that Act is a most important one, because it affords machinery whereby in every county in the Dominion; if there has been corruption or wrong-doing, if there has been wrong doing on the part of the officers who had charge of the ballot boxes; if there has been ballot stuffing on the part of others who had not charge of these ballot boxes if there has been fraud or corruption of any kind which stood between the wishes of the people and their choice as expressed in the ballot box; if there has been any attempt to thwart or prevent the return of the candidate of their choice; this Act provides a means whereby a thorough and exhaustive inquiry should be made by those desiring to make it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
What Act is that?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I shall quote it in a moment. I desire to call the attention of hon. gentlemen who follow the debate to the fact, that we had on one hand the Controverted Elections Act as it stood, providing for fullest inquiry into an election to determine as to which candidate ought to be returned, and for the punishment of all cases wherein evidence of wrong-doing happened to be brought out at the trial. On the other hand we had this other Act providing for inquiries as to corrupt practices at elections; and with these two, in my humble judgment, machinery was provided by law for the fullest and most thorough inquiry by the courts of the land into every conceivable condition of corruption and wrong-doing which could exist in any community. I am sorry to be obliged to trouble the House by reading at length the first section of this Act, but my argument would be ineffective and incomplete unless I did so, and therefore, I have to ask the House to pardon me if I take a few minutes to read the first provision of this law. It says:

1. Whenever the House of Commons, by address, represents to the Governor General that a judge in his report on the trial of an election petition under the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, states that corrupt practices have, or that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the election, or that he is of opinion that the inquiry into the circumstances of the election has been rendered incomplete by the action of any of the parties to the petition, and that further inquiry as to whether corrupt practices have extensively prevailed is desirable—

That provides in the first part of the section for one condition of affairs. Whenever the Controverted Elections Act falls short of ascertaining the entire truth or exposing all the corruption, this Act may be brought into operation:

—or whenever the House of Commons, by address, represents to the Governor General that a petition has been, within sixty days after the publication in the 'Canada Gazette' of the receipt of the return to a writ of election, by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery (if parliament is sitting at the expiration of the period of sixty days, or, if parliament is not then sitting, within fourteen days after the then next meeting of parliament), presented to the House of Commons, signed by any twenty-five or more electors of the district, stating that no petition charging the existence of corrupt practices has been presented under the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, and that corrupt practices have, or that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the election, and having annexed thereto a solemn declaration under the statute in that behalf, signed by the petitioners, stating that they are such electors, and that the allegations of the petitions are true to the best of their knowledge and belief—and when the House of Commons, by such address, prays the Governor General to cause inquiry to be made under this Act by one or more judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, or by one or more judges competent under the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, to try an election petition in the province within which the district in question is situate, or by one or more persons named in such address—such persons being county court judges, or being barristers-at-law, or advocates of not less than seven years' standing, and not holding any office or place of profit under the Crown—the Governor General may appoint one or more of such judges or such persons, as the case may be, to be a commissioner or commissioners for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of such corrupt practices; and if any of the commissioners so appointed die, resign or become incapable to act, the surviving or continuing commissioners or commissioner may act in such inquiry as if they or he had been solely appointed to be commissioners or a commissioner for the purpose of such inquiry; and all the provisions of this Act concerning the commissioners appointed to make any such inquiry shall be taken to apply to such surviving or continuing commissioners or commissioner, and in case a sole commissioner is originally appointed, then to such sole commissioner.

Mr. HAGGART. Does that apply to frauds?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, that is just what it does apply to—a fraud of any kind or description, or any act which is a corrupt practice under the Dominion Elections Act. The whole gamut of fraud and wrong-doing is provided for by that statute. It provides for either contingency—where a petition has been filed under the Controverted Elections Act and the judge reports that for some reason or other he has not been able to get to the bottom of the facts; and, also where no petition has been filed, if twenty-five electors of a constituency sign a petition to this House, that in their opinion corrupt practices have extensively prevailed, and ask for an inquiry. I say that statute covers the whole ground, and in any constituency in this Dominion, where there is reason to believe that any wrong-doing or corrupt practices have prevailed, this Act brings it within the power of twenty-five electors of that constituency to have a judicial inquiry by an address of this House to the Governor General.

Mr. POWELL. Might I ask the hon. gentleman if he has considered the effect of the late Franchise Act, which renders it absolutely impossible to work the Weldon Act, so called ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Franchise Act has nothing to do with inquiries into corrupt practices.

Mr. POWELL. That is very true, but the wording of the Weldon Act is such that the passing of the Franchise Act absolutely cut away its power.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not understand the hon. gentleman ; but, he will have an opportunity of elaborating and maintaining his position when he comes to speak later. I have read to the House every word of the first section, which defines the conditions and circumstances under which a writ may issue authorizing the judges to hold this inquiry ; and, as far as I can see—I say it, of course, subject to any new facts which the hon. gentleman may bring out—the Controverted Elections Act and this Act together cover the whole ground.

Mr. POWELL. I thought the hon. gentleman was referring to the Weldon Act.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am referring to the Controverted Elections Act and to the Inquiries into Corrupt Practices at Elections Act, and I say that, so far as I can see, the section which I have read does cover every possible case. And so we stood in this position, that after the last or the preceding election, twenty-five electors in any county or riding of the Dominion, where there was no election petition filed, had a right to come to this parliament, declaring that in their opinion corruption had extensively prevailed, and parliament was then bound to vote an address to the Governor General, praying that a commission should issue, either to the judges of the Supreme Court or to the judges of the Superior Courts of the provinces, directing them to sit and hold a thorough and exhaustive inquiry, and report whether those corrupt practices existed or not. Then follow all the sections, some seventeen in number, necessary to enable This Act to be properly carried out, prescribing the manner in which the inquiry should be conducted, providing for the remuneration of the witnesses and for bringing them before the court, and enabling the court thoroughly and effectively to carry out the purpose which parliament had in view. So, I repeat the proposition which I laid down before. I humbly submit for the consideration of this House, that with these two statutes before it, there was no wrong-doing in either the riding of West Huron or the county of Brockville which could not have been made the subject of a thorough judicial investigation at the instance of any twenty-five electors in either of those constituencies, if they had so desired ; and in every case where corruption was proved, the inquiry would be at the expense of the public, and not of the petitioners. Therefore, it does appear to me that parliament, having made this provision for a full and exhaustive judicial inquiry at the hands of independent judges, against whose impartiality not a word can be charged, and for proper means of carrying on the inquiry and punishing those who might be proved guilty of wrong-doing, it would be an act of usurpation on the part of parliament to come and say, we will not leave an inquiry to be carried on under these petitions, under either the Controverted Elections Act or the Inquiries as to Corrupt Practices at Elections Act, and even if no petition is presented to us, we will relegate the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I do not think that was the intention ; I do not think my hon. friend who moved this resolution originally ever dreamed that that was the intention, and he was careful to guard the resolution which he introduced last year so as to confine the inquiry to the conduct of the respective returning officers and the several deputy returning officers in connection with the elections in question.

Mr. HAGGART. Suppose there was no knowledge of these frauds until a year after the event, would there be no remedy ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Act provides for an inquiry long after the time has expired within which an election petition can be filed. There is no trouble about that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If I understand the hon. gentleman correctly, he is not arguing that parliament is ousted of any jurisdiction over this subject, but that parliament has constituted tribunals with sufficient powers to deal with this subject outside of parliament. Am I right in my understanding of the hon. gentleman's argument, so far that he is not arguing that parliament cannot inquire into these matters ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did argue that parliament had, in my opinion, divested itself of all jurisdiction to inquire into election matters, except into the conduct of its officers. I argued that in 1887 ; but I argued in 1887, and against Sir John Thompson's argument, that parliament had not parted with its jurisdiction over its officers, and had a right to bring its returning officer to the Bar to answer for his conduct, or to punish the deputy returning officers for misconduct. But, apart from that, I confessed that the argument was irresistible that we had no power to inquire into election petitions at all. But, the reason I am bringing this up now and trying to lay before the House the exact jurisdiction which parliament in my opinion retains is this, that there has gone abroad through the country, sedulously cultivated by the Conservative press, the idea that this House has jurisdiction to inquire into the West Huron and the Brockville elections, and into the question of corrupt practices at either of those elections, and that we have not done so. There never was a more false idea in the world. In my humble judgment, parliament had not jurisdiction to inquire into corrupt practices in either of those elections. Further, parliament did not attempt to usurp such power, and did not refer to the Elections Committee any such practices. The power of reference to the select committee is a limited and defined and a very limited power, and that power is merely to inquire into the conduct of the returning officer or the deputy returning officers and not to go beyond that. The result was this, that when we got a certain distance in that inquiry, and it was found that possibly some wrong-doing might have been done, either by the returning officer, or some third party outside, our hands were tied, and we could not inquire whether the third party did the thing or not, or whether it was the returning officer who had done it. I am pointing out that if the House desires a very exhaustive and complete inquiry, that inquiry must take place under that statute provided by parliament, for the purpose of making an inquiry thorough, exhaustive and complete. The question, therefore, is one which I desire to press home, even at the risk of one little repetition. I would venture to say that from the articles that appeared in the public press, from time to time, five out of six readers would believe that the whole question of the West Huron election and the Brockville election had been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that the question before that committee was whether there had been bribery or corruption. But nothing of the kind was before the committee. I deny that the seat of either member could be or would be affected by the finding of that committee. No such question was submitted to the committee. The seats of these members were not, and could not be affected by any finding that committee could make, for the good reason that the members were not summoned before it, nor were their interests referred to it for inquiry at all. The one thing, and the one only, which, by the terms of the resolution, were referred to the committee, and which parliament had the power to refer to it, was the conduct of the returning and deputy returning officers. So that, whether these men were properly elected or not, whether outside parties had stuffed the ballots or not, whether there had been on either side of politics a widespread system of corruption or not, neither this House nor the committee had the slightest power to investigate.

I call attention to the singular fact that if, as these hon. gentlemen opposite allege, there was widespread corruption in either or both of those constituencies, they had full knowledge of that corruption within a month after the election had taken place. It was proved in the evidence submitted to the committee that that knowledge was all in their hands within one month after the election; but for reasons of their own they chose neither to inquire into that corruption, under the Controverted Elections Act, nor under the other Act, providing for investigations into all matters of fraud at elections. Why they did not, I am not going to inquire. They apparently had their own reasons. But there is this to be always borne in mind, that when investigations of that kind are brought before the courts, the conduct of the parties on both sides can be investigated, and I am not questioning the prudence which dictated to my hon. friends to refrain from instituting any inquiry of the kind. Now they come before the House, some sixteen months after the election has taken place, and we are face to face with the proposition that these cases should be referred back to the same committee as last year, because the committee's action of last year was not conclusive. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden), devoted some time to showing that the House had power to take this course if it chose. I am not here to question that dictum. I would not raise a doubt as to the power of the House to refer this evidence back to the committee again, if it thought it right and proper in the public interest to do so. I do not think that there can be any reasonable argument made against such a proposition. But I want to refer the House to one or two facts, which convince my mind at least, that it would not be in the public interest to refer the West Huron election back again to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I call the attention of the House, Sir, to the fact that in sending these cases to the committee last year, we acted with very great, and I venture to say, undue haste.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, and I venture to say that my hon. friend will agree with me when I submit my reasons. Assuming that this House has jurisdiction to enter upon matters of this kind, I would ask any hon. gentleman whether, he thinks, we ought to exercise such jurisdiction, unless the facts are brought before us in the proper manner. I ask, has there been a petition filed before this House by any one of the candidates at either of these elections, or by any elector in the electoral districts of West Huron or Brockville, asking this House to interfere and refer the matter to the Elections Committee? Sir, not a single petition has come to us from either one of the defeated candidates, or any elector in either riding, setting forth any wrong-doing which he desired this House to investigate. That is my point number one, and I think it is a most important point. I do not think that this House has the right—using the word in its proper sense, as distinct from power, for while I acknowledge the power, I deny the right—to refer, of its own initiative, such matters to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, for investigation, unless there are prima facie grounds laid before it to justify such action. What have we here? We have an outside member who states openly: I have no knowledge of the facts, I do not live in that part of the country, I do not live even in the province where the elections took place. I am amongst those members who are the farthest removed from the counties in question, and, perhaps, I was selected for that reason. I have no personal knowledge of the facts alleged, and no petition has been presented from any elector in either of the counties, charging any wrong-doing. I have no mandate from any one—not a man in either county has presented a petition, asking me to move in the matter—but I come forward simply on my own initiative, and move to refer the conduct of the deputy returning officers to the committee for investigation. I submit that that is not the proper course to take. I submit that these are not the proper conditions under which this House can accept jurisdiction and take action. I say that there should be a proper petition presented from responsible electors, setting forth certain facts, which would in the first place, convince the House that there was wrong-doing on the part of the returning or deputy returning officer before the House made any such reference.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the hon. gentleman permit me, as part of my justification, to read what the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has said?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will permit the hon. gentleman to ask me any question, but not to argue the question in the middle of my speech.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I desire to ask a question, whether or not this declaration of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is not a sufficient justification?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have heard that statement already. The hon. gentleman read it the other night in his speech, so that we have had the advantage of hearing from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce himself, what he said a year ago, and having had it repeated by the hon. gentleman from Halifax the other night, but that does not alter the argument in the slightest degree. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), was not touching the question—

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) shouted before he was out of the woods, before he heard what I had to say. The Minister of Trade and Commerce did not touch the question of procedure. Now, secondly, having shown that there was no proper procedure in the matter, in my humble judgment, I say there were no specific charges made against any returning officer of any kind or against any deputy returning officer. And I wish here to call the attention of the House to this material fact, that neither against the returning officer in West Huron nor against the returning officer in Brockville was there ever a charge made, direct or indirect. And no charges were made against the deputy returning officers before the case was referred; but certain declarations were read, and these were all that were brought before the House by the hon. member for Halifax—declarations of certain electors who said that they had voted one way—and there were more of these declarations in his hands than there were votes for that candidate found in the ballot box. Now, whether the House should have referred the West Huron election to the committee or not, I am not going to argue; the House did refer it, and the House had some case to go upon—there were some statements made and some affidavits; and the House thought for the time being that there was a prima facie case which called for investigation.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Did not the Prime Minister say that the strongest case was that of West Huron, and that Brockville was the weaker?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is what he said.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) said that the Brockville case had been spoken of as the stronger.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If so, it was a slip of the tongue. I say that there was no petition, no formal allegation before the House from any elector or any candidate from either county. Still, there were these affidavits in the West Huron case which the House accepted as making a case worthy of reference to the committee. But, whatever case there may have been prima facie in the case of West Huron, there was no case made or attempted to be made in the case of Brockville. There was no specific charge made, even by the member who moved the resolution, against the returning officers or any deputy returning officer in Brockville. Though the motion had for its object to refer the conduct of the deputy returning officers in Brockville to an investigating committee, there was no petition against them, no affidavit against them, nor was there a statement made by a member of the House on his responsibility that one of them had committed any specific offence. There never was a more utterly baseless case presented to the House against any man in whose case an investigation was sought than was presented to the House in the Brockville case. The Prime Minister said it was a very, very weak case, if there was any case at all. He might have said that there was no case. I repeat, even at the risk of wearying the House, that there was no petition, there was no affidavit, nor was there an allegation which any member dared to make on his responsibility, of any specific act of wrong-doing on the part of any deputy returning officer in Brockville. When it went to the committee, what had we? The committee did not know what was referred to them, and the whole field was open for any member to take up what he liked. I will read every word on this subject that was uttered by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) when he presented the case of Brockville to the House; and I am prepared to ask the House, after hearing that statement of the most ingenious member on the opposition side, if they can discover one single charge of wrong-doing made against any of these officers.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) refer to what was said this year or last year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Last year. I think it fairer to take last year, because the statement was fuller. Before I read what the hon. gentleman said, let me give the substance of it as I understand it. The first statement was that the day before the election ballots were in the hands of electors of the same appearance as the official ballots, and one was found by a boy who saw a man throw it away. Was there ever a more flimsy statement to refer to the Committee on Privileges and Elections? The man who threw away the ballot, the boy who saw him throw it away, and the man who afterwards received it, were not officers of this House, and we had no power to inquire into their conduct or to punish them. Therefore, the reference of this statement about the boy and these men to a committee for examination was utterly futile. Next, it was stated that a Liberal voter gave a marked ballot to a man who did not use that marked ballot, but was ready to produce it. Supposing that to be true, and supposing you argue from it corruption, what jurisdiction had the committee to which we referred this case? The Liberal voter who was alleged to have given that ballot was not an officer of this House, and we had no jurisdiction over him. Our excellent committee could not examine or bring him before us or punish him if he had done wrong. Therefore, the inquiry so far as these cases were concerned would necessarily result in a farce. Then it was stated that ballots marked for Comstock, and so folded that the upper part of the cross would be visible to the deputy returning officer were found in No. 4 poll of Elizabethtown. Well, suppose they were. Who put them there? Is there a charge there, direct or indirect, that our officers were guilty? What were you going to inquire into? No charge was formulated, no name was given, nothing specific was charged. Therefore, the reference was utterly futile and useless.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) mean what he said, or was it a slip of the tongue—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am asking a question for the purposes of debate.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly; I want to hear it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) said that in such a case as he was putting, the committee would have no power to examine, and that the witnesses could disobey any summons to attend before the committee?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) misunderstood me. I say that so far as this reference is made to wrong-doing by parties not being officers of the House, such as deputy returning officers, that we had no power to investigate, the reference would be ultra vires.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In that case, does the hon. gentleman go so far as to say, supposing we were travelling outside our functions in referring the matter to the committee, and that committee summoned the witnesses before them, that the courts would protect the witnesses in disobeying the summons?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the argument advanced by Sir John Thompson and ratified by a majority of this House is correct, that this House has divested itself of all jurisdiction except in relation to the conduct of its own officers, then, if we attempted to exercise jurisdiction in such matters from which we have withdrawn ourselves, I think the court would stop it. I may be wrong. I think that nine-tenths of the House assented most of the way to the proposition that this House has divested itself of all jurisdiction except in matters relating to the conduct of its officers.

If that is correct, and if we attempt still to exercise jurisdiction in matters that we have by statute withdrawn from ourselves. I think the courts would stop us. But I may be wrong. Then, the next charge in substance was that the deputy returning officer at No. 1 poll refused to destroy the counterfoils. Well, that is not an offence, and I do not know why we should refer it to the Elections Committee. Supposing it were proved ten times over, there is no offence in it, there is no corrupt act for which a man can be punished. I do not know what the hon. gentleman understands by destroying counterfoils, but I rather gather from his statement last night that he considered the counterfoil was not destroyed by the deputy returning officer putting it in his pocket, but he did consider it to be destroyed if the deputy returning officer threw it on the floor. I do not see the distinction myself; but however, we will not squabble about matters of that kind. The last charge was that the deputy returning officer at poll No. 2 refused to seal the ballot box. He was very wrong in refusing to seal the ballot box, but if he was guilty of any offence he could be fined or imprisoned, and he would be fined or imprisoned under the Dominion Elections Act. But I do not think hon. gentlemen would contend that for that offence he could be either fined or imprisoned. Now, having stated substantially the charges made by the hon. gentleman, I will ask the House to refer to his speech last year, and let me read exactly what the hon. gentleman said at page 6730 of the Hansard :

Now, in the case of Brockville, I have in my possession a report of an investigation made in regard to certain matters concerning the deputy returning officer of that election. I state that it can be established, as I believe, before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that ballots of exactly the same character in every respect as the official ballots—in fact official ballots—were in plentiful use in the hands of the workers for the Liberal party in that constituency. I have now in my possession a ballot which was picked up in the street. It was found by a boy who saw a man throw it away. It was picked up and brought to two gentlemen, who placed their initials upon it. It has been compared with the official ballot which were used and found to have the same marking upon it, the same little defects, the same little irregularities as the official ballots. We also find on this ballot a cross neatly marked opposite the name of Mr. Comstock. It is supposed that, for some reason or other, it had been secured but was not used; some other ballot was used in its place, or the person for whom it was designed did not see fit to use it.

That is one charge. Now the House will see there is no charge made that any deputy returning officer or any officer of the government has been guilty of an offence. Somebody on the street had a ballot which he says was like, and could be called an official ballot. Perhaps it was cut out of a newspaper, as newspapers are in the habit of publishing forms of ballots at the time of an election. I do not care what it was, all I am concerned about is that there is no offence alleged in the statement made by the hon. gentleman of which the privileges and elections committee could take cognizance. He goes on :

We also find that another ballot, duly marked, was presented by a Liberal worker to a voter in the constituency, who was asked to vote by depositing that ballot, and who did not see fit to do so, but placed the ballot in the hands of gentlemen who are prepared to produce it before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Perhaps I had better make my statement on that point a little more explicit and give the circumstances a little more in detail. I forgot to say that certain gentlemen in that constituency came to this voter after the ballot had been handed to him and desired very much to get it back, and, as I understand, offered a very considerable sum of money to get it back; but the voter did not see fit to give it back, but retained it and placed it in the hands of the gentlemen to whom I have first referred. I say, Sir, it can also be established, as I believe from the report of the investigation which has been made, and which I hold in my hand, that official ballots were in the hands of the Liberal workers in about every polling division in that constituency, and were used. And I say further that in polling district No. 4, Elizabethtown, a large number of ballots marked for Comstock in identically the same way and so folded that the upper part of the cross would be visible to the deputy returning officer, were found in the ballot box at the close of the day. Now, it is a somewhat suspicious circumstance, to say the least of it, that you find a large number of ballots folded and marked exactly the same way, and so folded and marked that it was easy for the deputy returning officer to ascertain exactly for whom the voter voted. I say that points to collusion between the deputy returning officer and those who are working for the Liberal candidate. It can be shown, as I believe, that the deputy returning officer of No. 1, east ward, Brockville, refused to destroy the counterfoils of the ballots and insisted on keeping them in his pocket. He also kept putting his hands in his pocket when parties went into the compartment to vote. He was asked by the scrutineer, Mr. W. W. Richardson, to destroy the counterfoils as directed by the Act. This he refused to do. Mr. Richardson says that he is satisfied that the deputy returning officer substituted a ballot for one given by a Conservative voter. When the ballots were counted at the recount, two that were marked for Mr. Comstock were rejected by the judge, owing to the fact that there were some distinguishing marks on the backs of them made by the deputy returning officer. It appears from the report of this investigation that the deputy returning officer at No. 3, Kitley, Mr. W. D. Livingston, was seen conferring with a Liberal worker with a ballot in his possession; and that is a circumstance that requires some explanation.

I say, further, that another deputy returning officer, the one for No. 2, Elizabethtown, also was guilty of a very grave irregularity in connection with this election. He was Mr. J. B. Truesdel. This man refused to seal the ballot box, and has since said that he would be damned if he would give them satisfaction for doing so. He was asked by Mr. Foster to seal the ballot box, in accordance with the provisions of the law, and he distinctly refused to do so. Now, there was either a motive or there was not a motive on that occasion. Judging this circumstance and the other circumstances I have mentioned in the light of a certain document which I propose to read, hon. gentlemen will see the significance of some of these things. I also understand—I do not see the statement before me at this moment—that one of the deputy returning officers at Brockville—I desire to be corrected if I am wrong—was an accountant in the employ of Mr. Comstock, the sitting member, who was a candidate at that election.

I do not care whether that last statement is correct or not. Now we find an allegation made by the hon. member which I did not notice before, that a man named Richardson says that he saw the deputy returning officer substitute a ballot for one given by a Conservative voter. We have not got a statement in that whole case which in any way affects directly or indirectly the conduct of the returning officer.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Would the hon. gentleman say that Liberal workers throughout the riding having official ballots in their possession, outside the polls, is not a circumstance that points to some collusion, to some wrong action, of the returning officer or the deputy? Does he regard it as a perfectly proper thing that these official ballots should be in the hands of the workers?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not say that would be a proper thing, on the contrary, I would condemn it; but I have yet to see where the hon. gentleman takes the responsibility of making that statement.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman has just read it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I did not read anything of the kind. The statement I read was this:

That it can be established, as I believe, before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that ballots of exactly the same character in every respect as the official ballots.

Which is a very different thing. He says that official ballots were in the hands of the outside public. But that does not point to the guilt of any single deputy returning officer, or any official of the government that ballots similar or like official ballots were in the hands of the outside public. The hon. gentleman knows that the Elections Act was passed for the exact purpose of inquiring into charges of that kind.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Let me read another thing I said last year:

I say, Sir, it can also be established, as I believe from the report of the investigation which has been made, and which I hold in my hand, that official ballots were in the hands of the Liberal workers in about every polling division in that constituency, and were used.

That is what the hon. gentleman has read within the last ten minutes, and then states that he did not read it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not say I did not read it, I have just read it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I also stated:

It can be established, as I believe, before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that ballots of exactly the same character in every respect as the official ballots—in fact official ballots—were in plentiful use in the hands of the workers for the Liberal party in that constituency.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman knows well what I am talking about, I am not talking about Liberal workers, but I am talking about offences which could be referred for investigation to the Privileges and Elections Committee, about officers of this House, deputy returning officers; and the hon. gentleman is now seeking to evade that legal point.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will read it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No; I do not want the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) to make an argument. It is quite impossible for me to get on at all. If I did not read that—

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is not what I mean.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If I have not read it, the hon. gentleman will find it at page 6730. I have read every word that the hon. gentleman can find in that speech. If the hon. gentleman can find any other paragraph I have not read he can bring it up later. But, I say that the hon. gentleman knows that we must have, in this House, some distinct and positive statement of wrong-doing before we can be justified in referring a case of that kind to a committee, and I allege that we have not got it. I allege that most positively, and if I am wrong the hon. gentleman can read it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Read it now.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have read all that. The hon. gentleman sends me over to read what I have read twice.

Mr. FOSTER. No, that is what you could not find.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This is what I have read twice. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was not in his place, but he is perfectly prepared to back up anything that is said on the other side.

Mr. DAVIN. Read what is marked there.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have read it. I say that the mere statement of a member of parliament, however strong he may make that statement, cannot take the place of proper legal information which should be furnished to this House in a proper way. Not only did I state to this House what the hon. gentleman says, but I undertook to read his speech, which is in Hansard and before every hon. member, so that every hon. member can see whether I have overstated or understated the charge made by the hon. gentleman. I have stated it correctly and substantially, and I say that neither directly nor indirectly are there any charges made by the hon. gentleman against the officers in Brockville which ought or could be referred to the Privileges and Elections Committee. Since that time a good deal has taken place. We do not stand to-day in the position that we stood in a year ago.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. When the hon. gentleman is done cheering what he thinks to be a very pertinent remark, and I am glad he approves of it, I will go on and enforce still further what I have just said. We have had parties in that district who have endeavoured to do what they should have done at first—prosecute any man that they thought guilty of wrong-doing. We have had two cases of that kind. They made an attempt against one Liberal working. They arrested him, brought him before the court, and they made a charge against him. So far from complaining of this, I am not at all complaining, if they thought that they were justified in this action. They tried him and they failed to convict him. They brought up another man, brought him before stipendiary magistrates, brought him before the court, dragged him before the court from day to day, and then discharged him without trial. They did not dare to bring up any other man or attempt to try him. What is the fair inference that can be drawn from these circumstances? After they had attempted to convict two men, after they had tried one and did not even dare try another, is it not clear that if there were anything against any other worker, if there was a scintilla of evidence, they would have brought him up? I will point out to the hon. gentlemen who cheered my statement of a moment ago, that we are in a different position to-day from that in which we were in then, because, although it was open to these gentlemen to do this then, it was not done then, and it has been done now. The criminal law has been invoked, attempts have been made to punish these men, and they have failed. To attempt to place these people in jeopardy a second time is to violate one of the first principles of criminal law. A man is not to be put in jeopardy a second time, and after he is discharged it would be unjust for this House to put him on his trial a second time. I ask the House: What charge are hon. gentleman asking us to refer to the committee? Has a single name been mentioned in this House of a deputy returning officer who has been guilty of wrong-doing? I press that home. What is the name of the officer who has been guilty of wrong-doing? There is no affidavit, or petition, or statement. Therefore, I say, there is no specific charge, and, therefore, it could not be referred. Then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) introduced a statement that he had not introduced before in regard to Brockville. The newspapers say that he read an affidavit. He did nothing of the kind. I am not going to question the hon. gentleman's conduct of his case, but, if the newspapers report that he read an affidavit in this House, I deny it.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Mr. DAVIN. He read an extract from an affidavit.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know whether he did or not. He read a paragraph from a document which he had in his hands, but he did not file it or lay it on the Table of the House. He did not place it before the House so that the man who makes it could be charged with perjury if he has sworn to what is false. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) stated that it was an affidavit, and I am not going to question his statement, because I am sure he would not say that it was if it was not. He read a single paragraph from the affidavit, but he did not read the whole of it, or lay it on the Table of the House, and the section which he read does not refer to any specific act of wrong-doing. The substance of the affidavit which the hon. gentleman did not read was, as I gathered from his statement, that there had been a conspiracy on the part of some Liberal workers, and a man named Pritchett, to commit a crime when the election came off, not that anything was done, but that there had been a conspiracy to do it. If there was a conspiracy, and he had knowledge of it, what was his duty under the criminal law? What was the duty of those who drew that affidavit? If they had that information in their possession last December, and they believed a single word of it, why did they not go into the court and prosecute the parties to this conspiracy? They did not do it. Oh, no: but they say that they have an affidavit. They kept it locked up from December to May and then they attempt to read it in the House. But, they do not lay it on the Table, but they put it back into their own pockets again. Yet, they ask the House to act upon that. Why, Sir, it is an insult to the House to ask them to act upon alleged statements of that kind. Who is this man Pritchett? I do not know, and I do not care. I see that he was the subject-matter of an inquiry before a commission the other day, and that Judge Morgan denounced him as a self-convicted liar. I do not know anything about him. The judge who heard his evidence may, perhaps, be best qualified to express an opinion.

Mr. BENNETT. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) if he knows what the press say about Judge Morgan?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not. I do not know Judge Morgan. I never saw him.

Mr. COWAN. Judge Morgan is the junior judge of the county of York, appointed by the Conservative party, and a straight-line Conservative.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Whatever he may have been, I assume that on the bench he has no politics at all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says that he is a politician still.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I do not.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan) to say that he is a straight-line Conservative.

Mr. COWAN. I said that he was a straight-line Conservative prior to his appointment. If he had not been he would not have been appointed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Let us come back to the point. The point I am trying to make is, that, weak as the case was that was presented by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) last year, it has not been strengthened in the slightest degree by the extract he produced, or read, or the affidavit which he did not file, because the extract which he did read does not refer to any specific offence alleged to have been committed, but refers to a conspiracy alleged by Pritchett to have existed before the election came on at all. Now let us see how the matter stands, in my judgment. I will leave the Brockville case for a moment, and I now come to the evidence given before the committee in the West Huron case, and I say there was no direct evidence to impugn the conduct of the two deputy returning officers who were charged with malfeasance in the West Huron case, and so it was attempted by indirect evidence from those who had voted, to show that a larger number had voted for McLean than were represented by ballots in the box at the close of the poll. It was sought to be inferred from that, that the returning officer must necessarily have been guilty, but I watched my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) very closely, and he did not say that this proved the deputy returning officer was guilty, and I ask him now, whether as a lawyer, he would draw that conclusion? Did it follow that because in Colborne, thirteen more men swore they voted for McLean than ballots were found in the box for McLean; that, therefore, the deputy returning officer was guilty of wrong-doing? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden), did not express any opinion on that, and I do not blame him for it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does the hon. minister wish me to answer?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not wish an answer. I am commenting upon what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) did say. I know the hon. gentleman is capable of expressing his opinion and making another speech upon it, and what I am saying now is, that he expressed no opinion on it when he moved the resolution. He had a perfect right to an opinion, and I would ask him before the debate closes, whether he would express an opinion on that?

Mr. WALLACE. What is the opinion of the minister?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace), I have no hesitation in giving my opinion directly. I say it by no means follows that, because thirteen men more than the thirty ballots found for McLean swore they voted for McLean and their ballots were not found in the box; it by no means follows that the deputy returning officer did wrong. They may not have put them in the box. They may have for reasons of their own, promised to vote for McLean, and afterwards determined for corrupt reasons or otherwise, to vote for Holmes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They may have got ballots from parties to whom they sold their votes, as has frequently been proved in election courts to have been done, and they may have gone in and put in a ballot for Holmes and led McLean to believe they were voting for him, and that is perfectly consistent with the facts as proved.

Mr. DAVIN. They swore they did not do that.

Mr. TAYLOR. The returning officer put them in the box.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will answer one at a time please. I undertake to say that if a man is capable of selling his vote, he is equally capable of swearing to a falsehood when he comes into court. I am only arguing this now. There are two things which may be open to you to conclude: One is that either the returning officer or some other person abstracted the ballots and put in wrong ones, and the other is that these men themselves, sold their votes outside for a consideration, or for some other purpose, and put in the ballots themselves.

Mr. DAVIN. As my hon. friend has appealed to me—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not appeal to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), at all. The hon. gentleman interrupted me, and I answered him.

Mr. DAVIN. May I ask the hon. gentleman this question? He says that a man who would sell his vote would also swear falsely?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Might.

Mr. DAVIN. Would the man who thus behaved improperly in regard to voting, kick up a row about it, as these men did?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is a new phase of the case to me. I never heard of these men kicking up a row. On the contrary, from the evidence, which lasted a great many days, and which came from the mouths of a great many witnesses, I gather that it was only after infinite toil and trouble, that McLean and his two coadjutors, were able to get these declarations out of the men at all. I will tell my hon. friend this: My recollection is perfectly plain with regard to at least two of these men, that they were induced to give their declarations under false pretenses. They were told the document they were signing, was not an affidavit at all, but a mere statement to know how they voted, and on that false representation, they were induced to sign a paper, and instead of kicking up a row, they were lying just as low as they could. I do not deny that there were many honest, straightforward, good men, who voted for McLean, and came forward to swear to it in the Election Committee. Nobody questions how they voted. There were thirty of them. The ballot boxes show they voted and they swore they voted, and I have no doubt they were honest, upright men. They had no hesitation in coming forward and may have been anxious to come.

Mr. DAVIN. And they expressed their surprise.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But, how about the thirteen others, whose ballots were not in the box, and who said they voted for McLean, and one or two of whom broke down utterly in cross-examination?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, irretrievably broke down. One of them was very little removed from an imbecile, if he was removed at all, and never should have voted.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Mr. DAVIN. We should hear his opinion about the counsel.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), who interrupts me, was examining him at the time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I took no part in it whatever; it was the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I was leading up to the point that there was no direct evidence, and perhaps in the nature of things, there could hardly be direct evidence of tampering with the ballots, and so the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden), had to resort to indirect evidence, and how did he do it? He did it by producing electors who voted, and questioning them as to the person for whom they had voted. But no such evidence could possibly affect the seat of the member. Why, Sir, if you turn to the law, you will find that when these gentlemen were allowed to come up and give their evidence as to how they voted, that was directly contrary to the law. The law says that no man shall be allowed to tell how he voted in an election, but these men were allowed to tell it, and why? Simply because the inquiry on which we were engaged, was in our opinion, one which could not, no matter how it resulted, affect the seat of the member. The law says:

No person who has voted at an election shall, in any legal proceeding questioning the election or return, be required to state for whom he voted.

And Chief Justice Strong (then Mr. Justice Strong), in giving his opinion upon that law, declared that not only could the voter not be required, but that it was not open to him even if he were willing, to state for whom he voted. I will quote the words of Mr. Justice Strong:

It is no answer to this to say that secrecy is imposed for the benefit of the voter and that he can waive it, for I hold secrecy to be imposed as an absolute rule of public policy, and that it cannot be waived. The whole purview of the law is different from the English Act and from the Ontario Act. I am of opinion, therefore, that the learned judge rightly rejected the evidence, though I may not be able to agree with the grounds he put it upon.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What year was that?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Haldimand election case of 1887. I quoted from 15 Canada Supreme Court Reports, page 515. So I say, we not only allowed the evidence to be given, but we allowed the evidence to be given because in our opinion, in the opinion of the committee, the inquiry could not in any way affect the result of the election; and yet, ever since that, we have heard hon. gentlemen opposite, rising in this House and appealing to the galleries, and saying that the result of that inquiry already has shown that morally the member who sits for West Huron ought not to be a member for West Huron, and that he should resign his seat.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Globe said so.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Globe did not say so.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes it did.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It did not make use of any such language as that. But, hon. gentlemen in this House have said so and the hon. gentleman opposite, who is laughing, for some reason or other, has repeated it more than once, without having any foundation for it. I say that it is perfectly clear that if the result of the inquiry could have affected the election, in view of the express words of the statute, and the construction put upon it by Justice Strong, it was not open to a court to permit of one of those voters giving this evidence which we permitted them to give. I say, secondly, that every facility was given in that committee to further the object of the inquiry. Charges have been made in the irresponsible newspaper press that I myself and some of my colleagues were there obstructing the inquiry. There never was anything further from the truth. I remember the time when the question came up whether or not these gentlemen were to be permitted to say for whom they had voted. We asked for time to consider—one day and one night; and the party press throughout the country then charged that we were burking the inquiry. Some of my legal friends, legal friends for whose opinion I feel the highest respect, were never convinced that we should have allowed those men to state for whom they had voted—that the secrecy of the ballot should have been abandoned as it was by the majority. But I, for one, thought differently, and I voted that way, because I believed that the result of no inquiry we could make, under the reference made to us, could affect the result of the election. I say the government afforded every facility to the inquiry and to the hon. gentleman in getting his witnesses here. He summoned whom he liked; he spent money like water; $13,000 or $14,000 of the people's money was spent in bringing witnesses. I do not complain of that if any good resulted from it—if any wrong-doing on the part of any officers of the election could be shown. But, summing all up, what was the result? So far as the Colborne poll was concerned, the deputy returning officer, Donald Cummings, did not try to escape, but was examined time and again and as often as the members of the committee desired to examine him, but gave his evidence openly, fairly, and, I believe, honestly. I rose from that committee with the conviction on my mind at least that Donald Cummings had told the plain, unvarnished truth, and that he was an innocent man, and not a party, directly or indirectly, to the packing of the ballot box. I did not believe it possible that an old and respectable farmer as he was, with the character given him by every one of his neighbours who were called before the committee—a character for uprightness, honesty and integrity during the sixty-five years that he has lived on this earth—looking at him and looking at his large, horny hands, I did not believe it was possible for him to commit the sleight-of-hand tricks imputed to him on that occasion. A regular professor of legerdemain could not act as deftly as it was alleged this man had acted in order to hide those ballots and substitute others. Donald Cummings swore time and again that the identical ballot papers which he had received from the voters, one and all, as they came up, were taken by him, and after he had torn off the counterfoil, were put by him in the box—the identical ballot papers and no other. I appeal to the gentlemen who were on that committee if not only the evidence of Donald Cummings himself, but the evidence of the scrutineers, those on behalf of McLean and those on behalf of Holmes, did not unite in the conclusion that from beginning to end, as far as they could see or as far as any one could see, the whole proceedings were conducted, with perfect propriety, perfect accuracy and perfect legality. At the close of the poll, what did we find? We found that there were 68 ballots for Mr. Holmes and 30 for Mr. McLean, and it is alleged now that 13 more voted for McLean than there were ballots in the box, and that 15 more voted for McLean at the Goderich poll than appeared in the box. This would make 28 ballots, and if they were all counted as the other side allege they ought to have been counted, and if the fraud was proved and the fraudulent ballots were taken out and counted rightly, there would be a difference of 58, which would still leave the hon. member for West Huron with the large majority of 84. I am merely pointing out in passing that the number of ballots impugned here could not by any possibility affect the result of the election. The only two polls questioned were Colborne and Goderich. So far as Colborne is concerned, I am sure that I am within the judgment of the majority of the committee when I say that those who were there and saw Donald Cummings give his evidence came to the conclusion that he was an innocent man.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Well, gentlemen may differ, but that is the conclusion I reached. Then we take the other poll, the Goderich poll.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the hon. gentleman leaves that, will he allow me to ask him how he explains the fact that the 13 ballots were of different paper from the paper of the stubs?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is a perfectly legitimate question. I say there are two theories which can be advanced, assuming that the hon. gentleman's proposition is correct. One is that these men did vote for McLean and that other ballots were substituted by the returning officer for the ballots they attempted to use. Of that I say there is no proof, and my opinion is the contrary. The other theory is that the 13 men who alleged that they voted for McLean did not vote for McLean, but for Holmes, and got their ballots outside. They would not put in the ballots they got from the deputy returning officer at all, but the improper and illegal ballots which they got outside the poll. That answers the whole argument about the 13 ballots in the box being of different paper from that of the stubs. Assuming the argument, which the hon. gentleman put with a great degree of force, that the 13 ballots found in the box marked for Holmes were marked on the back in ink with the initials of the deputy returning officer, and were of different texture and of different print from the official ballots, it would only go to show that these men got the 13 ballots outside, got them marked outside, and put them into the box; and if that is true, the charge that the deputy returning officer was guilty of wrong-doing falls to the ground.

Mr. DAVIN. What about Cummings's initials which were on those ballots?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman knows that it was not sworn that they were Cummings's initials.

Mr. POWELL. He swore himself that they were.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I beg pardon. He did not swear anything of the kind. He swore that they looked like his initials; he supposed the ballots were genuine; but afterwards, on cross-examination, when the differences were pointed out to him and the committee between the ballots which were initialled in ink and those which were initialled in pencil, which were undoubtedly genuine—

Mr. POWELL. Where does the hon. gentleman get that in the evidence?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If I have not got it under my hand, I will promise to get it for the hon. gentleman and read it to him. I read it only last night in the evidence of Cummings.

Mr. POWELL. You must be mistaken.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Take the other poll, the Goderich poll. Here we have a man who is not of the same character as Donald Cummings—the man Farr. It was proved that he was a drunkard, and he refused to obey the summons of the committee. For that kind of man I have no sympathy. He was a Conservative.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It does not follow that because he was a drunkard he was a Conservative, and I am not connecting the two at all. But he was a Conservative, and voted for Mr. McLean at that election. The evidence on that point is clear and distinct. If the hon. gentleman will turn up the evidence of Mr. Mitchell, page 417, he will find the following:

By Mr. Russell:

Q. Mr. Mitchell, I just want to ask you if you know how Mr. Farr voted at the last election?—A. He voted for Mr. McLean.

By Mr. Borden:

Q. You saw him mark the ballot, did you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And how did that happen?—A. Well, it occurred just as I got through my own voting. Farr saw me and called me back and said, 'I want you to see how I am going to vote for Holmes; they have got it all over the town; I am going to vote for McLean.' And he marked the ballot for McLean.

Q. And he showed you that?—A. Yes. I told him, 'I don't want to see how you vote,' but he insisted on showing me.

Q. Did you believe, as a matter of fact, that he had voted for McLean?—A. I did, certainly.

Q. You did believe it?—A. Yes.

Q. That he put a ballot in for McLean?—A. Yes, for the reason I saw him mark a ballot and put it in the box.

Could there be anything plainer than that? Do any hon. gentlemen opposite now deny it? It was proven that Farr was a Conservative and had voted for McLean, and the presumption is that if he did any stuffing of the ballot boxes, he must have stuffed them in favour of McLean.

Then my hon. friend, when he referred to this man's evidence the other night, quoted some evidence to show that there was a probability of Farr having received $500. I thought that that was hardly fair. I did not find fault with many of the quotations which the hon. gentleman read, but I thought he was distinctly unfair and unjust in reading that quotation. The reason I say so is this, that he knew that James Nelson had distinctly sworn—a witness called by himself—at that investigation that that story of Farr having received $500 was all 'poppycock,' to use the expression of Nelson himself. Perhaps I had better read that evidence. I think that my hon. friend did not deal with the House as fairly as he did in other matters when he quoted evidence, and rather gave us to understand that there was reasonable ground for believing that Farr had received $500.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I read the evidence both ways on that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We will see whether my hon. friend read all the evidence both ways on that point. James Nelson was examined, and part of his evidence is quoted by the hon. gentleman, but not the part which I am about to quote, and that is what I complain of. I find on page 476, that Nelson testified as follows:

Q. Now, did he say anything to you in any of these conversations with respect to getting any money?—A. Well, the first time after he came home from Goderich he said: 'I got a ticket and cheque for $500, and more, too, if I wanted to,' but he didn't have any cheque for $500; I know he hadn't, because Saturday night he went over with Marshall for his pay to the factory where he was working, and he had sent me in to his coat pocket, to his inside pocket, for some address which he wanted me to make out, and there was nothing but the address there.

Q. And on that occasion you say there was no cheque?—A. Yes.

Q. It was Saturday night he went for his pay?—A. Saturday morning, that is what I heard from Marshall afterwards.

Q. You don't know from your own knowledge?—A. No.

Q. You heard this from Marshall afterwards?—A. Yes.

Q. Marshall lives at 414 Church Street, does he?—A. Yes.

By Sir Louis Davies:

Q. As a matter of fact, then, Mr. Farr was in Toronto last Friday?—A. Last Friday.

Q. And being in Toronto he could not be away in North Dakota or anywhere else, eh?—A. No, sir.

Q. No secrecy about that; it was publicly on the street?—A. Yes.

Q. Publicly on the street corner you saw him?—A. On the street corner.

Q. I suppose he was well known in Toronto among the workmen he mixed with?—A. I don't know his acquaintances.

Q. The men he worked with knew him?—A. I suppose so.

Q. Was he working among a large number of men?—A. I don't know.

Q. I thought you were one of the men working at the same factory?—A. No, sir.

Q. You said you were satisfied that he had no $500 cheque at all?—A. He had no $500 cheque at all.

Q. You seem very positive about that?—A. I am positive.

Q. This was a kind of bluff game?—A. Yes.

Q. The fact is, he was out of money?—A. Yes.

Q. The fact is, he was out of money?—A. He was out Monday.

Q. Out of money, I say?—A. Well, he was out of money Monday.

Q. You satisfied yourself he had no $500 cheque?—A. He had no $500 cheque.

Q. Or any other hundred dollars?—A. I don't believe he did.

Q. He seems to have satisfied you pretty well by previous statements he had done nothing wrong?—A. Not on his account.

Q. According to his account he had done nothing wrong?—A. Nothing wrong.

Q. And was firm in this as a matter of fact?—A. He was firm in th's.

Q. He didn't stuff the ballots?—A. That is my conversation with him.

And further down, Nelson said:

Q. Well, as a matter of fact, in his conversations he denied he had done anything wrong, denied he had stuffed the ballot box, and told you as a matter of fact that it could not be done?—A. That is what he said?

Q. And denied he had done anything else wrong in the election?—A. Yes.

By Mr. Russell:

Q. The conversation that you had with Mr. Farr in regard to ballot-stuffing which you called his attention, as I understand you, was to the effect that the ballots were very thin, and that he might have given two to a voter at one time; is that what you said?—A. That is what he said.

Q. And he disclaimed having done anything crooked?—A. That is what he said.

Q. This cheque that he told you he had for $500, that is all poppycock, you think?—A. That is all poppycock, I guess. He didn't have any cheque. He said he could get money.

Q. He said he did have the money?—A. He said he could get the money.

Q. He said he did have the cheque?—A. No, he said first he had the cheque for $500, and then afterwards the next day when he sobered up—

Q. But that day he said that he had a cheque for $500?—A. He said when he came back from Goderich, 'I have a ticket for North Dakota and a cheque for $500.'

Q. And now you say that was not true?—A. That was not true. The next day he said he could get the $500.

Q. That may have been equally untrue?—A. I don't know anything about that, of course.

So that, in so far as the $500 are concerned, the very gentleman called to prove that Farr had received $500 from some person, proved that the story was false, and that the man had not received $500, or any other $100, and had no money at all. I am not concerned to defend Farr in any way. When he refused to come before the committee, my sympathy at any rate did not extend to him. If he has done wrong, let him be punished with all the rigour the law imposes on returning and deputy returning officers who break their oath and infringe the law, and commit wrong on the electorate.

I say that McLean, the defeated candidate, had all the evidence against Farr which he produced against him during last session, within a month after the election was over. That fact is established beyond controversy by the evidence given on pages 285, 388, 382 and many other places in the evidence. If he knew or believed that Farr had been guilty of any wrongdoing in relation to the poll where he was deputy returning officer, it was McLean's duty to have prosecuted him under the Election Act. Look at sections 100 to 105 of that Act, and you will find that its provisions are very stringent for the punishment of those who violate the law as deputy returning officers or otherwise:

Every one who—

(a) forges, counterfeits, fraudulently alters, defaces or fraudulently destroys any ballot paper or the initials of the deputy returning officer signed thereon, or

(b) without authority supplies any ballot paper to any person, or

(c) fraudulently puts into any ballot box any paper other than the ballot paper which he is authorized by law to put in, or

(d) fraudulently takes out of the polling place any ballot paper, or

(e) without due authority destroys, takes, opens or otherwise interferes with any ballot box or packet of ballot papers then in use for the purpose of the election, or

(f) attempts to commit any offence specified in this section,—

Is guilty of a misdemeanour, and shall, if he is a returning officer, deputy returning officer, or other officer engaged at the election, be liable to a fine not exceeding $1,000, or to imprisonment for any term less than two years, with or without hard labour, in default of paying such fine; and if he is any other person, to a fine not exceeding $500, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months, with or without hard labour, in default of paying such fine.

I say the law provides for the very case which it is insisted has occurred here, both at Goderich and Colborne. If there is guilt, the law provides punishment for that guilt, and a means for bringing that punishment about. The evidence which Mr. McLean and his friends say they have now they had in their possession a month after the election; and if they desired, not to play to the political gallery, but simply to punish the wrong-doers, it was not only their right but their duty to bring action against these men and punish them. I ask: Has there been a charge of any kind or description brought by Mr. McLean or one of his friends against the deputy returning officer in West Huron? Not one. Has there been a criminal action brought by them against anybody for breach of the election law on the allegation which forms a basis of their complaint? So far as I have been able to ascertain, not one. They have 'laid low': they have brought no action under the Dominion Elections Act; they have filed no controverted elections petition; they have not attempted to have the case investigated before a judge; they would not file their petitions under the Dominion Elections Inquiries Act, under which the matter could be investigated by a commission of judges, free from bias, and the guilty parties punished at the expense of the country. They prefer to come here to have the case referred to the Privileges and Elections Committee, where the reports that get in the press will not be the reports of what took place in the committee, but garbled reports, put there for the partisan purposes of the partisans who published them. The hon. gentleman knew that if he went into a properly qualified court and the newspapers published garbled reports, they would be punished for contempt. They avoided the judicial tribunal where impartiality could be had and justice secured; they come here where politics can be dished up with justice, and so dished up with it that justice can be perverted. Under these circumstances, and seeing that the seats of hon. gentlemen are not affected, I have come to the conclusion that it would be in the public interest that these matters should not again be referred to the Privileges and Elections Committee for further investigation. And my reasons for that conclusion have been given, perhaps at greater length than they ought to have been given; but I propose to sum them up in a few words.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

That the law provides full, ample and complete remedies for the discovery and punishment of electoral frauds: 1st. In the Controverted Elections Act, chap. 9; 2nd. In the Corrupt Practices at Elections Inquiries Act, chap. 10.

That under either one or both of these, the fullest and most effective inquiries could have been made, and the facts probed to the bottom—under the latter Act, in every proper case, not at the expense of the party, but of the government.

That the jurisdiction of this House as regards these inquiries is now limited to inquiries into the conduct of its election officers and their punishment for wrongdoing.

That there is not the slightest ground submitted justifying the reference of the Brockville case, no deputy returning officer being charged with any offence, and the reference of that case under the evidence would establish a dangerous precedent, and one which could be used by an unfair majority to defeat the intention, spirit and policy of parliament with respect to inquiries into wrongdoing or irregularities at elections.

That if any one has any good ground of complaint against any of these deputy returning officers at Brockville, he could have prosecuted him under the Dominion Elections Act, or if he complained of general corruption, he could have proceeded either under the Controverted Elections Act or the Inquiries into Corrupt Practices at Elections Act—and no one having done so, and no petition having been presented to this House by the defeated candidate or by any elector of Brockville, or any one else complaining of the conduct of any of the deputy returning officers, it is not in the public interest that we should, at the mere invitation of a member of the House, not pretending to speak from personal knowledge, unsupported by any sworn statements of electors or others, enter upon an inquiry such as that proposed.

That the inquiry into the conduct of the deputy returning officers of West Huron, embracing as it did the examination and evidence of over one hundred witnesses in the polls where irregularities are charged, was, for all essential purposes, ample and complete.

That with respect to Deputy Returning Officer Cummings, this evidence satisfies me he was not guilty of the charges preferred against him, and while Deputy Returning Officer Farr's conduct in avoiding service of summons and refusing to attend to give evidence would justify the committee in making every presumption against him, the proper, if not the only effective way, to punish him is by prosecution and indictment under the Dominion Elections Act.

That the coupling of the demand for a reference of the cases of West Huron and Brockville in one resolution, presented so that it cannot be amended, is most unfair to the House, and prevents a proper consideration of the question, whether it is desirable in the public interest to reopen at this stage of the session the inquiry in the West Huron case.

Under these circumstances, I feel that I am acting in the public interest in relegating all parties who think there has been wrong-doing or corruption at either or both of these elections, to the courts provided by law for inquiry into and punishment of those acts when proved; and I am strongly of opinion that while the Privileges and Elections Committee may be a most excellent tribunal for the elucidation of all points of law having reference to the election of members to this House, and one well qualified to determine upon the legality of returns which a returning officer may make of the votes received, it is a most inefficient tribunal from its frequently changing members, the absence of counsel to conduct either prosecution or defence, and the impossibility of properly examining and cross-examining the witnesses, of reaching conclusions on disputed questions of fact.

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). The hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) who has just taken his seat, I am sure, has convinced the House that he has lost none of his usual positiveness and none of his usual courage. I confess that I feel some astonishment that a gentleman with his powers of memory should have charged before this House, whose members were witnesses of what took place, that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) had endeavoured to evade the obligation that rested upon him of bringing this matter before the House at the earliest opportunity. Is not the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) aware that at the opening of this session the government delayed—if I were given to the same methods of insinuation as the hon. gentleman, I would say purposely delayed—the appointment of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. No sooner was that committee struck than at the very earliest opportunity, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), brought this matter to the attention of the House. He brought it forward in the same manner that it had been brought last year, the steps were identically the same, he brought it up as a matter of privilege. The previous year no objection was taken on the ground that his course was not in accordance with the technical procedure of the House. The leader of the House on that occasion yielded a ready consent to the passage without discussion of the motion that this matter be referred to the committee; but on this occasion we were confronted with a technical rule of procedure. Whether the Speaker was right or wrong in his ruling, is not my province now to discuss, the occasion for discussing it has gone by. Suffice it to say that, debarred from the privilege of bringing it up in the way which the precedent of last year affirmed to be the proper course, the hon. member for Halifax was compelled to resort to the usual practice of putting the motion upon the paper. What reception did the member for Halifax meet with at the hands of the government then? The Minister of Marine and Fisheries says that there were gentlemen on the other side of the House who desired to discuss it, and that prevented it passing as an unopposed motion. I would like the hon. gentleman to tell me how it is, that, according to the records of this House, on every occasion in which that motion was given the go-by, the Speaker used these words, 'Stands at the request of the government.' Did it stand at the request of a private member? According to statement of the ministers and the official declaration of the Speaker, it stood at the request of the government. However, there is no use wasting time in discussing this question, it is well understood by this House, and it is well understood, I have no doubt, by the country. I shall pass, therefore, to the discussion of another matter that is raised by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

The hon. gentleman says that this House, according to his view, has denuded itself of the power of investigating the legality of the return of members to this House except under one set of circumstances. I know not what pertinence any hon. gentleman can see that has to the discussion of this question. But I am sure that there is not a member in the House besides himself who ventures the opinion that it has the slightest connection with the matter that we are discussing. If the object of the hon. member for Halifax was to refer this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for the purpose of contesting the legality of the election of the hon. gentleman who sits for West Huron and of the hon. gentleman who sits for Brockville, then this argument might be pertinent; but there is no such attempt on the part of the hon. member for Halifax, and there is no such intention on the part of the hon. gentlemen who are associated with him on this side of the House. The object of this investigation is entirely foreign to the matter which is raised by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the simple object of this investigation is to investigate the conduct of the returning officers and what I may call the condition of politics in the country generally. Now, the hon. gentleman is too good a lawyer to deny, and bold as he is, he will scarcely dare to deny, that this House has ample power to investigate the conduct of these officers. That is what we might call parliamentary common law. It requires no statute, the House has never attempted to denude itself of that power in any way. What, then, is the pertinence of his reference to the Revised Statutes, chap. 10, where provision is made for the investigation into corrupt practice? Parliament has never declared itself against the policy of trying these matters itself; it has only declared itself against the policy of trying election petitions before the House. But this court of parliament is seized of this matter, not only as having collateral jurisdiction, but as having primary jurisdiction to inquire into it.

The hon. gentleman asks, again, if there was any petition before the House asking the House to proceed. Why, does he imagine that hon. gentlemen on this side are so green as to consider that question for a moment? I would ask the hon. gentleman whether in a more weighty matter affecting the parliamentary status of members, the case of the county of Queen's, there was any petition before the House? The only petition was the charge of the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and he was backed by no affidavits, he was backed by no statement of wronged electors. It was simply the promptings of the pure breast of the hon. gentleman himself. I refer to this matter for the purpose of showing the difference between the course of the hon. gentleman and the course of—I will not say of his leader in this House, although the course of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is a direct want of confidence in the course of his leader. Everything that he has said from his seat in parliament reflecting upon the intelligence of gentlemen on this side of the House, reflects with double force upon the conduct, the judgment, and the sincerity of his leader in this respect. But between the course of the Minister of Marine and what was done by the Conservative party when this Queen's case came before the House? Did Sir John Thompson, the Minister of Justice at that time, the first lieutenant of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, then leading the House—did he attempt to shield himself behind a technical plea? Did he attempt to say to the House: I refuse an investigation into this matter, the government will not tolerate an investigation for the reason that this matter has been relegated to the law courts? No. What was his course? So far from pursuing the course which the hon. gentleman intimates to this House, and which he would have the country believe through the newspapers, he pursued, Sir John Thompson took the course of referring the matter to a parliamentary committee, said it was the proper thing to do, in order to have it thoroughly ventilated before the committee. And a thorough ventilation was had, evidence was gone into, and a report was made by the committee, and the solemn adjudication of that committee was confirmed by this House. Concerning election petitions, the report of that committee was to this effect, that the relegation of these matters by parliament to the courts of this country was a matter of wholesome political policy that should not be departed from in any individual case, but the integrity of the Act should be preserved, and it was preserved on that occasion. All that committee had a right to do was to make a full inquiry into the facts, and this it did.

Now, the hon. gentleman comes forward to-day and says there was no case in Brockville. When did this dawn upon him? Last year the leader of the government and the House were given notice by the hon. member for Halifax that this matter was to be brought before the House. Regular notice was given, and the considered course was taken, the matured opinion was given by the hon. leader of the government, and what was that? He rose in this House and, like any gentleman who felt his responsibility as leader of the government, he said: I appreciate the principle of the purity of politics, by all means let the investigation go ahead. Sir, there is a precedent that we have for our action in this case. But to-day, what are we treated to? The government are now burking the very policy they laid down last year. Last year they committed this House and the country to this policy. They allowed the Committee on Privileges and Elections to conduct this investigation half way through the West Huron case. Now, finding that the investigation has gone against them, that there has been unearthed a mass of corruption, and that there is a likelihood of these gentlemen being placed in the position of the Athenian gentlemen who lived on the labour of the brigands in Thessalonian Hills, they change their tactics, knowing that a further investigation will place them in a more discreditable position than they are in to-day they prevent a full inquiry into the facts.

Let us look for one moment at how this matter stands. I will proceed to the discussion particularly of the question that is before the House. Let us look at the requirements of the law in respect to the purity of elections and to the ritual which is laid down for the conduct of elections. The law lays down very distinctly certain things. The object, Sir, of the ballot is to secure the purity of elections, and to secure independence on the part of the elector. To accomplish these, from the experience of parliament, and the experience of statesmen, it was found necessary to protect the ballot by certain safeguards, which were incorporated in the statute. In the first place parliament in the most emphatic manner said that elections shall be conducted by officials under the sanctity of an oath which is a guarantee that the people of this country should have. It said that not only shall this oath be administered to the returning officer himself, but to the election clerk, to the deputy returning officer, to the poll clerks, and to the agents who represent the different candidates at the polling booths. They must furnish and secure honesty and independence, certain other enactments were put upon the statute-book. In the first place, it said that the ballot shall be printed under the direction of the returning officer to secure immunity from fraud, that the ballot must be printed on paper of a certain colour, that it shall be white paper, and of a certain thickness, evidently for the purpose of preventing the marking showing through on the opposite side, disclosing how an elector had voted. Then, in addition the statute impliedly, not expressly, made the provision that the returning officer shall keep an account of the official ballots that are printed. He, himself, shall allot these in the necessary quantities for the different deputy returning officers, at the different election booths throughout the electoral division. The law went further and prescribed that the deputy returning officer and his clerk shall keep an accurate account of what is done with these ballots. If any were to be destroyed they had to be given an account of, if any were by mistake marked wrongly, they had to be given an account of, if any were rejected by the deputy returning officer, they had to be given an account of, if they were polled they had to be given an account of, if any remained over after the election was held, they had to be given an account of, so that there was a guarantee against fraud in respect to the ballot papers in connection with the election. Now, about this election: What do we find? It is an established fact that every requirement of the law, from the first step to the last step, was generally ignored. In the first place, I do not know whether the returning officer himself—we did not have him before the committee, as he was sick—was sworn to the performance of his duty, or not.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There was no charge made in respect to him at all.

Mr. POWELL. No, he was not before us; but, we know that the oath was administered, but to only one of the deputy returning officers, whose conduct was inquired into before the committee. Therefore, as far as these polls are concerned, there was no sanctity of an oath, and the guarantee which should be given to the electorate was entirely denied them. Not only was the deputy returning officer not sworn, but his poll clerk was not sworn, and as if to add infamy to injury—and it is known to no one better than it is to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries—every one of these gentlemen signed a false certificate, they subscribed a false statement in a matter of record, and that false record is among the records in the possession of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, if it has been taken back to his office from the committee room, and is to be found an enduring false record that these gentlemen were sworn to the performance of their duty when they were not sworn.

As respects the printing of the ballots, they handed over to Mr. McGillicuddy, who is, as he himself says, a mugwump, a gentleman upon whom has been bestowed a good deal of political pap—

Mr. BERGERON. He has a contract for $60,000.

Mr. POWELL. Yes, but we will not go into that just now. Mr. McGillicuddy was given the work of printing the ballots, and he goes upon the stand himself, and has the effrontery to state, that while he was ordered to print 6,150 ballots, he printed no less than 6,500 odd ballots, or 350 more ballots than he should have printed. Mr. McGillicuddy coolly brought down before the Committee on Elections, two bunches of ballots amounting to 300, which he had no business to keep at all, which it should be made a criminal offence to keep, as in the province of Quebec it is made a criminal offence. He put the ballots in packages and on nearly every one of these packages there was a false entry. On the back of one there was an entry of 150, when there was almost 200 ballots in it. What were these extra ballots put in there for? Had any hon. gentleman in this House any doubt that it was done designedly and for the purpose of giving to these gentlemen who were not conducting the election under the sanctity of an oath, the means of handing fraudulent ballots to the manipulators and workers of the election in the interest of the Liberal party?

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. POWELL. Before recess, Mr. Speaker, I was directing the attention of the House to the action of Mr. McGillicuddy, the printer of the ballots, and to the improper distribution that had been made of these ballots. Mr. McGillicuddy, through his agent and through his clerk, had purported to send out to the deputy returning officers, 6,175 ballots. After whatever legitimate use had been made, and after whatever abstractions may have been made, there were returned by the deputy returning officers, not 6,175, but 6,301; or they accounted for 126 more ballots than Mr. McGillicuddy said they had received. To illustrate the careless manner in which Mr. McGillicuddy attended to his duties—and I use the euphonistic term 'careless manner'—it will be seen on page 310 of the evidence before the committee, that Mr. McGillicuddy said, that so far as any knowledge he had and so far as any check he had taken in respect to the ballots, there may have been 10,000 or 50,000 printed. Then, the foreman of his printing office, who was placed upon the stand, swore, that only in the case of two polls had there been an actual count, and that the remaining ballots had not been counted before being sent out. This, Mr. Speaker, was done for a purpose. The duty of Mr. McGillicuddy was clear; the duty of the returning officer was clear—to secure the purity of election the strictest account should have been kept of the ballots against the deputy returning officers. To show what advantage was taken of this condition of affairs by the deputy returning officers, I will direct the attention of the House to poll No. 4 at Colborne. There, as was proved by a witness who gave testimony before the committee, the ordinary majority for the Liberals in past elections was from 8 to 12, and you can imagine how the Conservatives of the county were startled to find that the majority at this election in this particular polling division where party feeling ran high, where men were well set in their political sentiments; the Liberal majority had increased from 8 to 12 to no less than 38. It was this fact that aroused public indignation, and when the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—who I regret to see is not in his place—professes to this House that he was of the opinion that these gentlemen were dragooned into making affidavits and solemn declarations; that hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies)—and I speak advisedly—makes a statement which he knows or should know is not substantiated by the evidence adduced before the committee. Sir, these parties voluntarily rose to assert their rights. They knew that some trick had been played upon them, that some deep fraud had been perpetrated, and voluntarily they made these solemn declarations which were read by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden). Now, Sir, 43 Conservatives in that district made solemn declarations (which are equivalent to an oath so far as sacredness is concerned and so far as punishment for fraud is concerned) 43 Conservatives made solemn declarations that they had voted for Mr. McLean while only 30 ballots for Mr. McLean were deposited in the box. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) followed up his statement in the House by producing forty-one witnesses before the committee, and these forty-one witnesses made solemn oath that they had voted one and all for Mr. McLean. In addition to that, there were two gentlemen who voted in that polling booth who made solemn oath before the county court judge of Huron, that they had also voted for Mr. McLean. Only thirty votes appeared in the ballot box in favour of Mr. McLean, the Conservative candidate, while 43 men upon their solemn oath declared they had voted for him.

But, the case does not rest with that. Mr. Cummings, deputy returning officer, was produced upon the stand. I leave it to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) to extract whatever comfort he can from the testimony of Mr. Cummings. He thinks Mr. Cummings was an honest man. Sir I know the responsibility that should attach to any gentleman who represents a constituency in this House. I know how mean and cowardly it is to make an insinuation in this House to which there is not attached that responsibility that would be attached in a law court, to a statement made upon the public platform. With full knowledge of this, and knowing how guarded I should be, I make this statement to the House: That on no hypothesis whatever, can the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) or any other gentleman on the ministerial side, free Mr. Cummings from deliberate perjury. Now, I conducted the examination of Mr. Cummings so far as the ballots are concerned. I was bound that Mr. Cummings should deliberately and with full knowledge of the situation make every statement on oath that he should have. I asked him generally about the ballots, as to the initials upon them, and he swore generally that they were in his handwriting. In order that he might not be deceived I took each specific ballot deposited in the box, laid it in Mr. Cummings hands, cautioned him to look carefully and see whether the initials were in his handwriting or not, and that gentleman swore and swore again and again and again—because I was bound there should be no question, or uncertainty about his statement—he swore again and again and again, that these initials were in his handwriting. The hon. the Minister of Marine says that Mr. Cummings on cross-examination took that back. I cannot understand what the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) means by that. I was conducting the cross-examination and Mr. Cummings certainly did not take it back to me. If the minister has made a slip of the tongue and refers to re-examination, I can tell the minister that the record of the re-examination will give him no more comfort than the cross-examination, because Cummings did not take back one iota of his statement. Let us look at this matter for a moment. Cummings put his initials upon the back of these fourteen bogus ballots. There are only two hypothesis that are possible under the circumstances. Either Mr. Cummings deliberately gave these ballots to people outside to help along bribery or corruption by connivance, and put his initials illegitimately upon them; he either did that to aid fraud perpetrated by people outside with his knowledge and consent and with his connivance—or else, Cummings deliberately stole fourteen genuine ballots that had been deposited there by electors and made a substitution of fourteen bogus ballots for them. The minister is on the horns of a dilemma. No amount of logical acumen, no powers of an advocate can possibly denude that transaction of the character of theft and the grossest fraud. I am astonished that a minister of the Crown—and, Sir, upon these ministers of the Crown rests the good government of the country; upon them rests the guardianship more than upon any one else of the sacred traditions of the English race—I am astonished that the Minister of Marine should place himself in the position of an apologist for thieves and perjurers. I now pass to the poll of district No. 3, Goderich, presided over by that illustrious gentleman, Mr. Farr. It pleased the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to insinuate that Mr. Farr was drunk, that he was not accountable, that he was a gentleman of Conservative leanings. If he was a gentleman of Conservative leanings, so much the worse was it that any man should have seduced him by bribes for infamous purposes from his political fidelity. Not only was that done, as I shall show by an affidavit, but this gentleman, the agent of the Liberal party, undertook to hoodwink the Conservatives of the country by making the assertion that he had voted for the Liberal-Conservative candidate in that election. Now, Sir, we find that Mr. Farr's poll was held on one side of the street, while another poll in Goderich was held on the opposite side of the street. The gentleman on the other side of the street was billed with 200 ballots, and on the last ballot in the pile was written by Mr. McGillicuddy's clerk, '200 for Goderich No. 3,' or No. 2, as the case may be. The testimony produced proved that the last of these 200 ballots had been abstracted, and that in place of it had been put a forged ballot endorsed, not with the No. 200, but the No. 178, and that at least twenty-two ballots had been removed or stolen. At the poll on the opposite side of the street where Farr presided we find that Farr had fraudulently perpetrated the infamy of stealing not less than twenty-two good ballots and substituting for them twenty-two bogus ballots; and this mysterious coincidence occurred, that the ballots which had been substituted were entirely different in general character from the rest of the ballots at that poll. There were well-defined marks of distinction between them. Across the road, the 178 ballots correspond exactly in appearance with the twenty-two bogus ballots in Farr's poll. In case of both of these polling certificates professing to be under oath were subscribed and returned as matter of record. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries attempted to show that Mr. Farr had not been as bad a man as he had been depicted, and—would hon. gentlemen believe it?—the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in professing to read the testimony of Mr. Farr on page 476—I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not here—deliberately omitted the following lines from the evidence, showing that Farr had perpetrated this iniquity deliberately and of collusion. The evidence he omitted was this:

Q. He didn't stuff the ballots?—A. That is my conversation with him.

Q. And that he had a conversation with two men the night before the election, and decided that it would not and could not be done?—A. No, he said it could not be done; he didn't say it would not.

Mr. Speaker, we have arrived at this stage of the discussion in which I think I can fairly make the assertion that there was a deep-laid plot in respect to these elections; and, Sir, I will draw from the hidden position they occupy some men of more importance in the Liberal ranks. For years back it has been known that Conservative majorities in constituencies and portions of constituencies pronouncedly Conservative have been mysteriously changed into minorities or mysteriously lessened. This had made an impression on the minds of the Conservative leaders, and the electorate of Canada was shocked by the disclosures made in the McNish case. I will read the confession of Mr. McNish for the purpose of showing that there is a deep-laid and widespread conspiracy to steal the elections.

Mr. BRITTON. That is good evidence in this case, of course.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. POWELL. On page 6733 of Hansard of last year will be found Mr. McNish's confession. I start with that as the first public disclosure of this infamy, and I will follow it up with some statements showing why the Conservative party did not move in this matter earlier than they did move. They were waiting for the full disclosure of the iniquity of the plot:

St. Thomas, June 26, 1899.

Messrs. Crothers & Price, Barristers, &c., St. Thomas.

Dear Sirs,—We beg to advise you that Mr. McNish has discussed at length with his solicitors the charges contained in the petition which has been filed against his return as member of the legislative assembly of Ontario for West Elgin, and that they have to a considerable extent investigated the charges contained therein and other matters which have come to their knowledge in connection with the election. And the subscribers hereto make the following statements and admissions respecting the same:

1. That a large number of persons were specially sent into the constituency by men working on behalf of the Liberal party for the express purpose of taking part on Mr. McNish's behalf in the election held January 12, 1899, and we believe that fraudulent and corrupt means were used by some such persons to secure his election.

2. That several of the said persons illegally and without authority acted as deputy returning officers at the said election, and in at least three cases so acted in the names of reputable local men, having, under assumed names, been introduced to the returning officer by local agents of Mr. McNish.

Exactly the same game as was attempted to be played in West Huron. ●

Mr. BRITTON. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question. You say exactly the same game. Will you name any outsider?

Mr. POWELL. I say exactly the same game was attempted as was played in West Huron, and I will give you the evidence later.

3. That in many of the polling subdivisions of the riding there were grave irregularities connected with the return of the ballot-boxes and their contents, the voting, and the counting of the ballots thereat.

4. That there were large numbers of persons brought into the riding for the express purpose of personating legitimate voters, and assisted by some of Mr. McNish's local supporters, such persons did personate qualified voters in voting for Mr. McNish.

5. That the declared number of votes for Mr. McNish largely exceeded the number of bona fide votes cast for him.

6. That a large number of ballots cast for Mr. MacDiarmid were in some nefarious and corrupt manner manipulated, whereby the result of the election was rendered doubtful, and that in this connection the voting at Shedden and Middlemarch, and in the several divisions in St. Thomas where said strangers so acted as deputy returning officers, merits special mention.

7. That there are good reasons to believe that there are many specific and well-authenticated cases where agents of Mr. McNish concealed at their homes some of the strangers, who there paid large sums of money to electors to induce them to vote for him.

8. That Mr. McNish will forthwith deliver to the Speaker of the legislative assembly his resignation as a member thereof for the said electoral district.

Now, here is proof, not out of the mouth of some enemy, but of the man himself, who confesses to one of the most iniquitous conspiracies that the political history of any country affords. The same personnel of the gang that operated there to a large extent were present in West Huron. Does the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) imagine that some great conversion had been wrought in these people in the meantime? Does he think that they were not, in all probability, the same kind of men, when operating in West Huron, that they were when operating in West Elgin. Here they are: Cap Sullivan, Bill Malloy, Dan Ferguson, John O'Gorman, John G. Pritchett, Thomas Lewis, and a man by the name of Horton, with the organizers, Smith and Vance. In addition to those were two prominent members of this House, Mr. Mulock and Mr. Tarte.

I am addressing men, I know, of common sense, and I ask any man of common sense to conjure up in his mind the purpose for which Cap Sullivan, Bill Malloy, Dan Ferguson, John O'Gorman, John G. Pritchett and Thomas Lewis could be in any constituency? If the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) were here, I would ask him what he supposed they were doing there. Not one of them had the slightest political influence in either constituency or the slightest financial influence. Not one of them spoke in the campaign. They were introduced for what purpose? Was it not for the same purpose that they served in West Elgin, that is, for stealing the elections.

In confirmation of that I will read here the affidavit of Mr. Pritchett, but, before reading it, I may say that it would have been more in keeping with the character of a member of the government of this, the leading colony of the British Empire, if the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, instead of decrying John G. Pritchett as he has done, in this debate, had let the weight of his denunciation fall upon him when this government was participating in his plunder. After Pritchett had served his day and generation and they had no further use for him, and he was politically dead, they pitched him overboard. But I challenge the right hon. the leader of the government to proceed against Pritchett. Pritchett is in the Dominion to-day. He gave evidence before the Ontario commission for the investigation of election frauds the other day; and if his evidence is false, he is a perjurer. I challenge the government, now that they have the power, to arraign this man before the courts of this country and have him indicted for perjury. I will go further and give them further incitement to inaugurate a prosecution. It is reliably reported to me Pritchett says they dare not. He says it is the last thing on earth they would dream of. He told Conservative gentlemen to whom he spoke about coming back: If you fellows do not prosecute me, I am not a bit afraid of the others, for I know too much about them for them to attempt any prosecution of me. Here is his affidavit:

State of Michigan.

City of Detroit.

To wit:

I, John G. Pritchett, of the city of London, in the province of Ontario, contractor, at present of the city of Detroit, make oath and say:

1. I have for several years taken part in municipal affairs and in politics in the said city of London, and have acted as deputy returning officer in municipal elections, and also in the elections for the legislative assembly. I always acted with and on behalf of the Liberal party. In 1898, I was elected an alderman for ward No. 6, in said city of London.

2. In the general election for the legislative assembly of 1898 I took an active part as a canvasser for votes on behalf of Colonel Leys, and was appointed by Sheriff Cameron his deputy returning officer for the said election at polling division No. 3 in the sixth ward of the said city of London.

3. From my experience in the various elections, I formed the opinion that elections could be more easily and surely won by the manipulation of ballots than by buying votes; and after the said general election I, in conversation with friends, used words to that effect.

4. Thereafter, at the request of John O'Gorman, of London, I took part on behalf of the Liberals in by-elections, my special duty being to instruct deputy returning officers in the method of manipulating the ballots so as to win the election whatever the vote might really be.

Just imagine, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal leaders in any constituency sitting down to such cold-blooded infamy as that, and these are the men from whose circle of acquaintance they may attempt to disassociate themselves to-day, but the fruits of whose iniquities and labours they are enjoying. These are the men whose aid they asked for in the hour of their political need.

5. At the request of the said John O'Gorman, I went from London to Goderich in the spring of 1899 to take part on behalf of the Liberals in the federal by-elections then about to be held. I arrived in Goderich on Thursday or Friday between the nomination and the election, and went to Craig's Hotel, where I registered. The first person I met after my arrival—

Tell it not in Gath, proclaim it not in Askelon.

—was Alexander Smith, the chief organizer for the Liberal party.

Is it not a most mysterious coincidence that Smith pops up ready to meet Pritchett at this particular time. The coincidence alone might be regarded as exceptional and having nothing peculiar about it, but when it was one of a thousand mysterious coincidences, no law of mathematical probabilities would exclude these people from a share in the infamy.

I asked him where the boys were.

The well known men of the brigade.

He said, 'Oh, about town'. Shortly afterwards O'Gorman came in. He said there would be nothing for me to do for a little while, as they were not in shape. He also said that he wanted me to act as a deputy returning officer.

The hon. member for Kingston can have his curiosity gratified now.

I said all right I will act. In the afternoon of the following day O'Gorman asked me to drive out to see a person whose name I cannot now recall. This man lives about four miles from Goderich, and was a carpenter and pump-maker, and had some other business as well.

This might have been our friend Cummings, I do not know.

He was to be a deputy returning officer, and O'Gorman asked me to see him and instruct him how to do the work. I drove out, but when I met the man and talked to him, I did not think it wise to use him. I therefore returned to Goderich without disclosing my mission. On Saturday a man named Grant, a school teacher of Goderich, began to bring deputies to me. He brought a man named Farr, who, he said, was to be a deputy returning officer. He went away, leaving Farr with me. I talked with Farr, but did not consider him safe. I suspected him of having a leaning towards the Conservatives, and he looked like a man who drank. I reported to Grant that I did not think Farr a safe man, and that I would not have anything to do with him.

An hon. MEMBER. Who was Grant?

Mr. POWELL. He was a school teacher, training the young idea in the advanced Liberalism of England.

After my report, Grant and a Mr. Horton talked about Farr in my presence, and they decided to get back from him his authority to act as deputy. That was on Saturday afternoon. After that Grant came to me again and said they had to let Farr go through, and that he would be all right. I replied, 'Well, if you are willing to risk it, I am willing.' Grant brought Farr to me again on Sunday afternoon, and went away at once, leaving Farr with me. I then talked to Farr. I instructed him how to substitute ballots, and showed him how to work it. He did not seem to understand how I could do it, and made me do it very slowly for him. Then he tried it, and got quite handy with it, though rather clumsy. I told him to keep on practising. He had been drinking some. He seemed amused and quite delighted with the thing. He said, 'By kripes, I will take them all. There will not be a vote in the box but Grits.' I said, 'Do good work and you will be well paid for it.' He said, 'How much.' I said I would give him $10 if he worked five ballots, and $15 for twenty. He said, 'All right.' I gave Farr twenty ballots and he put his initials upon them. I tore off the counterfoils and made the twenty ballots up in a parcel and gave them to him to use. On the night of the election he came to me terribly excited, and asked where he was to get his money. He said he had fixed twenty-three ballots. I had only given him twenty, but he said he had sent out and got more. I told him to take his good ballots over to Horton, who would pay him. Either Grant or O'Gorman had told me to say that if there was any question about payment of money. I saw no more of Farr.

6. On Sunday night Grant also brought me an elderly man with a grey beard, slight in build and rather tall. I think Grant said the man's name was Cummings, but I am not at all sure about that. I would recognize the man if I should see him. Grant said he was to be deputy returning officer. He left the man with me. I instructed him how to manipulate the ballots, and showed him how to do it. I made him the same offer of money as I had made to Farr. He did not try to work the ballot in my presence, but said he would see what he could do. I tore the counterfoils off fifteen or twenty ballots and folded up the ballots and gave them to him. He did not initial them while with me. He took the ballots away with him, and I did not see him again.

7. O'Gorman asked me to go out seven miles from Goderich to see a man named Young, who was to be a deputy returning officer. I saw Young and talked to him. I hinted that certain things could be done with ballots and said that if he wished to change a few votes, I could show him how it might be done. He refused very positively, and said if he had to do that he would give up the ballot box. I returned and so reported to O'Gorman.

There seems to have been one conscientious man.

8. I was not made a deputy, as Horton said local people insisted upon the positions.

9. At the hotel I did my work at O'Gorman's room, as my bedroom was on the third floor. When I went into his room on Sunday morning no person was there. On the table under some writing paper, there were some packages of ballots—four packages, I think. I knew they were for me, to be distributed among such deputies as I should arrange with. I took the ballots and gave some of them to Farr and to the man I supposed to be Cummings, as I have stated. The others I burnt on the night of the election.

I pause here. Where did these ballots come from? All the ballots were printed with the blocks of McGillicuddy. McGillicuddy or McGillicuddy's agent must have been fraudulent abettors of this scheme.

10. On the day before the election day, O'Gorman paid me $25 for my services and $15 for my expenses. I left Goderich on the morning after the election.

11. On the night of the election, I took part in the procession celebrating the Liberal victory. D. McGillicuddy, Tom Lewis and I occupied one carriage.

I think Grant was in our carriage also, but I am not sure about him.

12. The method of substituting a false ballot for the genuine one which the deputies which I have mentioned were to use, is as follows: He would keep the false ballots so that he could readily take one in his left hand when he wished to work it. When a known Conservative voter would be in the act of handing his ballot to the deputy, the latter would place his left hand upon the table with a false ballot, without a counterfoil, under the hand. At the same moment he would accept from the voter, with the right hand, the genuine ballot and counterfoil. He then would place the genuine ballot under the left hand fingers, as if for the purpose of tearing off the counterfoil, and, with a quick movement of the right hand, he would remove both genuine ballot and counterfoil, at the same moment raising the left hand and leaving on the table a ballot from which the counterfoil had apparently been just removed. He would put what he had in his right hand in his coat pocket, and then put in the box the ballot lying on the table. This ballot, so put in the box, would be one of these previously furnished by me to the deputy, and on which I had put a cross opposite the name of the Liberal candidate. I made an exception in my practice of making the cross myself in the case of the ballots given to Cummings, as he objected to putting his initials upon them in my presence, and therefore I concluded not to put the cross on them.

13. When it was settled that I was not to be a deputy, O'Gorman spoke to me, and Grant did also, about acting as scrutineer, and it was arranged that I should act in that capacity at a poll about seven miles from Goderich, where a deputy sheriff was to act as deputy returning officer. Grant brought this deputy, a small, thin man, whose name I cannot now recall, to me at the hotel and introduced him. Grant then left. I talked to him for some time, and finally explained to him how to substitute false ballots. He practised it in my presence, and agreed to work it. I gave him only ten false ballots, as his division was known to be a very close one. I took off the counterfoils and he initialled the ballots. I put the crosses on opposite Mr. Holmes' name, and gave the false ballots to the deputy. We drove out to the polling place together. He called at the hotel for me. I acted as scrutineer. I saw the deputy substitute three false ballots, but I do not know how many he succeeded in working. The other side watched him very closely. After the counting was finished and the totals given, I heard a Conservative scrutineer say: I wonder who the three traitors are; we will find it out. They seemed to know exactly how many votes they ought to have had. I had, as scrutineer, a list of the voters marked as to how they had promised to vote, and I had arranged with the deputy that when I wanted to give him a hint to substitute a ballot, I would press his leg with my foot. I gave him the signal for more than three men, but I saw the deputy was nervous and was not working it well, so I stopped. On our way home he told me they watched him very closely. I never spoke to this deputy about money.

14. On the Sunday before the election I told Grant a scrutineer could give us help if he wished to try, and that I could show him something. Nothing more was said to Grant about that, but on the afternoon and evening before the election he brought to me from seven to nine young men, bringing only one at a time and leaving him with me. I told each man that by inserting a bit of lead under his thumb nail and securing it with mucilage or bicycle cement, he could be able, when assisting the deputy to open and lay out the ballots for counting after five o'clock, to spoil Conservative ballots by making a mark on the paper. All of them said they would try it. Their names may have been mentioned in my presence, but I have no recollection of it. One of them told me he was a student in Mr. Garrow's office, and I understood him to say he had just come from Toronto. He is a tall, slim young fellow, and I would recognize him again.

The above-named deponent, John G. Pritchett, being duly sworn, says that he has read the foregoing affidavit by him signed, and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true in substance and in fact of his own knowledge.

Subscribed and sworn to at the city of Detroit, in the state of Michigan, one of the United States of America, this 29th day of December, 1899, before me.

(Sgd.) WILLIAM L. CARPENTER,
Circuit Judge, Third Judicial Circuit,
Michigan.

Probably, that is sufficiently definite for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Now, passing from South Huron, I will read another affidavit of Pritchett bearing on the Brockville election:

State of Michigan,
City of Detroit.

To wit:

I, John G. Pritchett, of the city of London, in the province of Ontario, contractor, at present of the city of Detroit, make oath and say:

1. For several years I have taken part in municipal affairs and in politics in the said city of London, and I have acted as deputy returning officer in municipal elections and also in the elections for the legislative assembly. I always acted with and on behalf of the Liberal party. In 1893 I was elected an alderman for ward No. 6, in the said city of London.

2. In the general election of 1898 for the legislative assembly, I took an active part as a canvasser for votes on behalf of Colonel Leys; and was appointed by Sheriff Cameron his deputy returning officer for said election at polling division No. 3, in the Sixth ward of the said city of London.

3. From my experience in the various elections, I formed the opinion that elections could be more easily and surely won by the manipulation of ballots than by buying votes, and after the said general election I, in conversation with friends, used words to that effect.

4. Thereafter, at the request of John O'Gorman, of London, I took part on behalf of the Liberals in by-elections, my special duty being to instruct deputy returning officers in the methods of manipulating the ballots so as to win the election whatever the vote might really be.

5. On Saturday, the 8th of April, A. D. 1899, O'Gorman came to my shop in London, and asked me to go to Toronto by the afternoon train of next day. He said there was to be a pretty tight election at Brockville, and he wished me to go there, leaving Toronto for Brockville early on Monday morning. He said he would meet me at the Walker House, Toronto. I asked him what was in it. He said $50 and expenses. I said that was small. He replied that much was sure, and there might be more. I missed the Sunday train, as my wife arrived too late for it. We went to Toronto by the very early train on Monday, and my wife remained in Toronto with her sister. I met O'Gorman at the Walker House. We went into a private room, off the sitting-room, and there he told me I was wanted to instruct the deputy returning officers, and do the best I could. He told me to stay at a hotel in Brockville, which he described. It was kept by a German. I started for Brockville that Monday morning by the Grand Trunk Railway. Tom Lewis, of London, was with me.

6. We arrived at Brockville on the afternoon of Monday, April 10, and went to the hotel as directed by O'Gorman. We did not like the hotel, and after supper changed our quarters to the St. Lawrence Hall. On the 11th, O'Gorman came to the St. Lawrence Hall, and on seeing us said, 'Oh, you are here, are you?' We said, 'Yes, we are going to live like other people or go home.' Lewis went out into the country. I did nothing for a few days. On the day after the nomination I talked to O'Gorman at the hotel about handling the deputies. I said, 'What am I to do if they talk money.' He told me to use my own judgment, but not to offer more than $5 for each ballot substituted.

7. On Friday or Saturday, April 14 or 15, O'Gorman brought to my room a Mr. Robinson. He introduced him and said that Mr. Robinson was to act as a deputy returning officer, that I could have a talk with him and post him as to his duties. O'Gorman then left the room. I talked with Robinson, but did not think he was a suitable man to undertake the work we wanted. I therefore confined my remarks to the ordinary work or duty of a deputy.

Mr. BRITTON. Does it say where Upham was deputy returning officer for?

Mr. POWELL. I did not notice that. But the lessee of the opera house is sufficiently definitive.

8. On the afternoon of Sunday, the 16th of April, O'Gorman brought to me a Mr. Upham. He was lessee of the opera house and was to be one of the deputy returning officers. O'Gorman withdrew after introducing him. I found Upham anxious to have Mr. Comstock elected and inclined to help. I asked him was he willing to take any chances. He asked the nature of them. I explained fully the method of substituting ballots in the federal elections and said it was better than paying money for votes you were not sure of getting. He agreed that my plan was a good idea and safer than buying. I said it was safer to pay a deputy in whom we had confidence, $5 for every substituted ballot than to pay money to a voter on whom we could not rely and who might be suspected of taking money. I showed him how the manipulation could be done. He asked if it had ever been done in other elections. I said, yes, and successfully. He asked, had any one been caught. I said, had he ever heard of such a thing—that if it had ever leaked out it would have been in every paper in the land. With a piece of paper I showed him how to do it. He tried it and did it fairly well, but I told him to practice and become expert. He said he would have another talk with me and I would have to make final arrangements with him. He then left the room. On Wednesday, the 19th, the day before the election Upham came again to me. He came of his own accord. I was in the hotel sitting-room when he came in. He made a sign and went up the front stairs. I went up by the back stairs. My room was on the third floor and we went there. I asked him how he was getting along. He said pretty well. We had another trial and he worked it very well. I then told him that for every ballot he substituted and brought the genuine one to me he could get $5. He was satisfied and agreed to do the work. I handed him 15 ballots and asked him to initial them. He did so. I tore off the counterfoils, marked the ballots for Comstock, folded them, put an elastic band around them, and handed them to Upham. I cautioned him not to allow any person to see them. He said he would take care.

9. The thing to be worked was as follows: The deputy returning officer would keep the false ballots so that he could readily take one in his left hand when he wished to work it. When a known Conservative voter would be in the act of handing his ballot to the deputy, the latter would place his left hand upon the table with a false ballot under the hand, but no counterfoil. At the same moment he could accept from the voter, with his right hand, the genuine ballot and counterfoil. He then would place the genuine ballot under the left hand fingers as if for the purposes of tearing off the counterfoil, and with a quick motion of the right hand he would remove both the genuine ballot and counterfoil, at the same moment raising the left hand and leaving on the table a ballot from which the counterfoil had apparently been just removed. He would put what he had in his right in his coat pocket and then put in the box the ballot lying on the table. This ballot so put in the box would be one of those previously furnished by me to the deputy and on which I had put a cross in favour of Comstock. This Upham had practised and was expert at it and he agreed to work in 15 ballots at $5 each.

10. After the close of the poll Upham brought to me at the hotel 15 genuine ballots for White with counterfoils attached and told me he had worked in the whole of his false ballots and could have done more. I took him to O'Gorman's room, ushered him in, told O'Gorman the amount and left them together. I do not recollect whether Upham showed me the genuine ballots they were for O'Gorman to settle upon, but about 5 minutes afterwards I saw Upham down stairs. I asked him if all was right. He said, yes, they had carried out what I promised to the letter.

11. On Saturday the 15th, a man named Cowan, a butcher, who was to be a deputy, was brought to me and introduced by O'Gorman, who then left us. I talked to Cowan about taking some risks to win the election. He said if there was risk he ought to be well paid. Not much more was said on that day. I reported to O'Gorman what Cowan said. O'Gorman said leave that to us we will arrange with him, and he said something about Cowan's owing Comstock. Cowan came again on Sunday. Nothing more was said about money. I explained the method of substituting ballots and showed him how to work it. He tried it and promised to practise. He came again on Tuesday evening. He had another lesson then and did fairly well. I got him to initial 20 ballots, took off the counterfoils, marked the ballots for Comstock, folded them and gave them to Cowan. I saw no more of him. He did not come to me for a settlement.

12. O'Gorman brought to me a young lawyer named Jones, of Brockville, who was to be a deputy returning officer. I explained to him the method of substituting ballots as I had done with the others. I showed him how it worked on the first occasion that he came to me. He said it was a grand thing. He tried it and at first was not very expert. He did not stay long and I said nothing about money. He came again next evening and practised it again in my presence. He had improved. He said he had been trying it in his office. I do not think I talked money to him then. He came again the evening before the election I gave him 25 ballots and he initialled them. I tore off the counterfoils, marked the ballots for Comstock, folded them up, put an elastic band around them and handed them to him. I told him he would get $5 for every one of those he worked in. He said he would get some of it. I acted as scrutineer for Mr. Comstock at Jones's polling place. I saw him work several of the false ballots. A man named Lee voted. Jones fumbled his ballot. I thought he was trying to work in a false one. A ballot fell on the floor. The Conservative scrutineer was very sharp and vigilant. He tried to stand up to see what was going on. I obstructed him by getting up at the same moment. He seemed very angry. Some time later he said he would not give much for Lee's vote. I said why? He replied, you know why. I said I do not see how I should know. He replied: Oh, you are not so slow. In the course of the day Jones made an excuse to go upstairs. I went also. I told him he was doing first rate but to be more cautious as the Conservative scrutineer was watching very close, much more so than was usual with scrutineers. Just before 5 o'clock everything was quiet and Jones went upstairs again and I went also. Jones told me he had got in 12. I did not believe him. After the polls closed I told O'Gorman what Jones said, and that I had seen him work 7 and did not think he got in as many as 12. O'Gorman settled with him. He told me he paid Jones for 12 as he did not want to kick with him. He said Jones did not produce the genuine ballots and claimed he had destroyed all the papers. I saw Jones that night coming from O'Gorman's room.

Mr. POWELL.

He told me that O'Gorman had settled with him.

13. O'Gorman also brought to me a Mr. King who, as I understood, was a bookkeeper in Mr. Comstock's employment. He was to act as a deputy returning officer. O'Gorman introduced him and left. I had only one interview with King. I instructed King how to substitute false ballots and showed him four or five times how it was done. He did not try it in my presence. I gave him 15 false ballots. He initialled them in my presence. I removed the counterfoil, marked the ballots for Comstock, folded them up, and gave them to King. I did not mention money to King and did not see him again.

14. A man named Smith, who was to act as deputy, in Elizabethtown, was brought to me by O'Gorman. I instructed Smith as I had done with the others. He practised the work in my presence and agreed to do all he could. I agreed that he should be paid $5 for every ballot he substituted. He asked for 20 ballots and initialled them. I took off the counterfoils, marked the ballots for Comstock, folded them and handed them to Smith. The night of the election he returned the whole of them to me. I was so busy that I had no time to get his explanation. He promised to see me again. I have not seen him since.

15. A man named Truesdale, said to be a farmer, and who was to act as a deputy, was brought to me by O'Gorman. I, on two occasions, gave him instructions and showed him how to work in the false ballots. He practised in my presence and I agreed with him that he should have $5 for each one he used and I gave him 13 ballots. I treated them as I did the others. He was to act at some distant polling place and I do not remember seeing him again.

16. O'Gorman also brought to me a man named James Kelly who was to act as a deputy. Kelly told me he was a clerk in a dry goods store at Brockville. On two occasions I instructed him and he practised in my presence working the false ballots. He was very smart in picking it up and I agreed with him that he should have $5 for each false ballot he worked in. I gave him 13 which he initialled and I treated them as I did the others and handed them to Kelly. On the night of the election he gave me back 5 false ballots and he said he had 8 genuine ones. I took him to O'Gorman to be settled with. Upham happened to go up at the same time and O'Gorman saw the two men. He was very abusive to me for bringing, as he alleged, two men at the same time. They must have heard him. Upham went in first, and I left Kelly waiting. I saw no more of him. I was very angry with O'Gorman and told him to run his own show, that I would have no more to do with him.

17. O'Gorman also brought to me a man named Neelson who was to act as deputy in one of the townships. I instructed him once and showed him how to work the false ballots. He practised in my presence. He was very nervous and did not do well, but said he would keep on practising though he was afraid he could not manage it. He said they would be on to him. I agreed that he should have $5 for every false ballot he used. I gave him 8, he initialled them and I dealt with them as I did with the others. I saw no more of him.

18. O'Gorman also brought to me a man named Bates, another named Field, and another named Boull, all of whom were to act as deputy returning officers. I instructed each of them, they all practised, and I agreed with each that he should have $5 for every false ballot he worked in. Bates got 7 ballots, Field 10 and Boull 15. Each initialled his lot and I dealt with the ballots as I had done with the others. They came to me separately. I do not know who settled with these men. I did not.

19. On the Tuesday before the election day O'Gorman gave me 4 packages of ballots out of which I obtained those I gave to the several deputy returning officers. Those not so used I destroyed. Previous to Tuesday I had been asking O'Gorman for the ballots as they would have been better for practise than ordinary pieces of paper. He could not give them to me. He said: 'I can't get them from the printer.' On Tuesday he handed me the packages of ballots without any remark.

20. When I was acting as scrutineer, the Conservative scrutineer objected strongly to Mr. Jones putting counterfoils in his pocket. He said they should be destroyed. I argued that the deputy had a right to do so or to eat them if he saw fit.

Mr. Jones agrees with the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. Jones decided that he had a right to put them in his pocket. Shortly afterwards the sheriff came in, and I brought the point to his attention. He said the deputy could do as he liked with them; he might put them in his pocket, or anywhere else, and destroy them after the close of the poll.

Alexander Smith and James Vance were at Brockville all the time I was there. O'Gorman, Tom Lewis and I left for Toronto at two o'clock in the morning after the election. When nearing Toronto O'Gorman settled with me. He really gave me $70, but claimed he gave me $75. I suppose there was some mistake in the counting.

The above-named deponent, John G. Pritchett, being duly sworn, says that he has read the foregoing affidavit, by him signed, and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true in substance and in fact of his own knowledge. Subscribed and sworn to at the city of Detroit, in the state of Michigan, one of the United States of America, this 29th day of December, 1899, before me,

(Sgd.) WILLIAM L. CARPENTER,

Circuit Judge, Third Judicial Circuit,
Michigan.

(Seal of the Court.)

State of Michigan,
City of Detroit.

To wit:

I, John T. Pritchett, in the city of London, province of Ontario, contractor, at present of the city of Detroit, make oath and say:

1. That on the 26th or 27th day of September, A.D. 1899, I met Thomas Lewis, of London, by appointment with him at his residence in said city of London, Ontario, when he produced an affidavit already prepared and said, 'They want you to sign this;' and I said, 'What is it? What do you want me to sign?' and he then said it was to the effect that I had nothing to do with the Brockville election. In reply to him I said that I could not make any such affidavit, and would not sign anything to that effect.

2. The said Thomas Lewis when urging me to sign the said affidavit, offered me $100, which he said he would pay me as soon as I would sign it, which I refused to do.

3. The Thomas Lewis, who so requested me to make such affidavit, is the Thomas Lewis, of London, Ontario, with whom I went from Toronto to the said town of Brockville on the 10th day of April, A.D. 1899, to take part in the election there; and with whom, and in company with John O'Gorman, I returned from Brockville to Toronto on the night after the said election. The said Lewis, the said O'Gorman and Alexander Smith, the organizer of the Liberal party in Ontario, all know that I was in Brockville at the time aforesaid for about twelve days for purposes connected with the said election.

4. On the 23th day of February, A.D. 1900, the said Thomas Lewis called me up by telephone at Detroit, Michigan, and requested me to meet him at Carolon's saloon at the corner of Abbott's Street and First Street, in the said city of Detroit. I went immediately to meet him at said saloon at three o'clock in the afternoon. We met in the bar-room, and he asked me to one side, and opened the conversation by asking me how I was getting along.

5. In this interview the said Thomas Lewis told me that the commission to investigate the West Elgin election would commence work at St. Thomas on the next day, the 1st day of March, and that no doubt I would be examined the last of that week or the beginning of the next week, and that if I would give evidence the commissioners would come to Detroit to take it. He did not say whether or not the commissioners had said that they would come to Detroit, but asserted that they would come if I would testify, and that all I would have to say was that so far as my division was concerned, everything was regular. I said to him that I did not want to be investigated.

6. I further said to him that if I were investigated I would tell the whole thing; Lewis argued with me that I would be wise to do what he asked of me, and promised that if I did so everything would be fixed up shortly. He wished and offered to pay me all arrears under the agreement made with me when I was obliged to leave London ten months ago to avoid arrest in connection with the West Elgin election, and said he would guarantee all further payments promptly until the whole matter should be fixed up. I replied that I did not want his money. He persisted in urging me to give the testimony he wanted, but as I refused to do so, he finally said it would not be necessary for the commissioner to come to Detroit.

(Sgd.) J. G. PRITCHETT.

The above-named deponent, John G. Pritchett, being duly sworn, says that he has read the foregoing affidavit, by him signed, and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true in substance and in fact of his own knowledge.

Subscribed and sworn to at the city of Detroit, in the state of Michigan, one of the United States of America, this 9th day of March, A.D. 1900, before me,

(Sgd.) WILLIAM J. CARPENTER,

Judge, Third Judicial Circuit, Michigan.

(Seal of the Court.)

Now, Mr. Speaker, having read these affidavits what is the inference fairly to be drawn from them? Whether these affidavits are true or false this much is certain, that grave charges have been made and been sworn to, and if the right hon. leader of the government has not changed his political opinions within the last twelve months it is absolutely impossible for him to resist this application for a full and complete investigation. We have this fact unquestionably, that the gentleman who was elected for West Huron was Mr. McLean, and not Mr. Holmes. If there is truth in the affidavit of Pritchett, the deduction that cannot be overcome is that the gentleman who was elected for the constituency of Brockville was not Mr. Comstock but the ex-Speaker of this House, Peter White. These are the facts, Sir, that have been adduced before the committee and that have been sworn to in these affidavits. They afford food for serious thought. As I said before: Who was Pritchett, who was O'Gorman, who was Lewis, who was Sullivan? Who were the rest of the gang? Gentlemen who, when they heard the tocsin sound alarm of battle in any constituency, rushed immediately to the fight. The leaders of the government, the officials, their representatives, the party organizers in the province must have known exactly what kind of men these were. They saw them there; they must have known, or had a belief as to what they were doing. They must have known or believed that they were perpetrating frauds, that they were stealing ballots. If gentlemen, members of the government, were not actively engaged as supporters or abettors, and I will not suggest, or insinuate that they were, they closed their eyes conveniently, at least, to the crime which, in their own hearts, they must have believed was being perpetrated and contented themselves with enjoying the fruits of the crime. They cannot maintain their self-respect as a government, and hon. gentlemen who sit behind them cannot conscientiously support them until the government are cleansed of the dark aspersions that are put upon them by these affidavits.

Mr. WOOD. If they were true they would be all right.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) is a dealer in hardware. What evidence have we of collusion? In the first place, take the West Huron election. These frauds could not have been perpetrated without ballots. McGillicuddy was just the man to be used. He provided the means for the frauds being accomplished. He printed several hundred more ballots than he was ordered to print. Did he take care of these ballots? No, he gave them out to the parties who are to conduct these frauds. It is a most mysterious thing that Pritchett and these others could get command of these ballots. Hundreds of them were distributed for what other than fraudulent purposes? They are given out to the different deputy returning officers, to be used where these were needed doubtless. The Liberal organizer was there. He was organizing the whole plan of the battle. He knew what work is allotted to this individual and to that. He must have known that these frauds were perpetrated. The hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) was there. He was in Brockville also. He saw these men in West Huron, and he saw them in Brockville. He knew they were in for the by-election. Must he not be intellectually as well as morally obtuse if he did not believe in his heart that these people were engaged, as footpads, in an attempt to steal from the Conservative party and from the electorate the representation of that constituency on the floor of this House? The inference is, to my mind, perfectly unanswerable. If this hon. gentleman and the recognized political agents and party organizers of the Liberals, had no suspicion of it, if they were so innocent as not to have it cross their minds that these men were engaged in nefarious schemes, they are too innocent to occupy the Treasury benches or to conduct election campaigns. They must be of the capacity of children. They have not yet grown to the full maturity of manhood and an acquaintance with the ways of the world. I was astonished at the action of some members of the government before the election committee. When it was made as clear as noonday that Cummings was engaged either in stealing ballots, by way of substitution, or, violating his oath, if he did take the oath, and I believe he is one of those who did take the oath, by not conducting the election properly, by putting ballots into the box which he had not given voters, when that man was convicted out of his own mouth, by his own evidence, what was the part played by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries? I say it to the credit of the representative in the government of the province of New Brunswick, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), that he sufficiently appreciated the position that he would not allow his reputation to be aspersed; he withdrew from the committee, and he said in tones that every one heard, that he needed no further evidence to be convinced that fraud was perpetrated. But, Sir, it was left to the hon. Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies), to throw out all kinds of aspersions as to the motives of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden), to throw out all kinds of aspersions on the members of the opposition, collectively and individually; it was left to him to stand as godfather to this clique, to stand as godfather to Farr; to stand as godfather to Cummings; to stand as godfather to O'Gorman. Sir, we see that minister (Sir Louis Davies), standing up in this House to-day, and exercising all the ability that God has given him, in a vain attempt to hoodwink the people of this country, and to protect these men in their felony; because, forsooth, he and his party have shared in the fruits of their iniquity.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have only a word to say, and I am done. It is this: Under British rule, wherever British institutions extend, it is the glory of the British subject, that his empire is a pure empire. Let but for a moment fraud eat its way into the vitals of the body politic, and the empire is gone. There never has been a state from the dawn of civilization to the present time, but which if it fell when corruption was rampant and because of that corruption. Against it prophet has thundered and philosopher has reasoned, and poet directed his withering fire. Let us be worthy of our British traditions. Let us stand one and all for a pure electorate and clean elections. If fraud does prevail in the country, if both sides in politics engage more or less in fraud; let us not get lower than the standard of morality that prevails among a band of thieves; let us at least have honour between ourselves. Let us give each other a fair show in the conduct of polls, let justice prevail, let law prevail there. If public opinion winks at doings of a shady character let them not be done by those guardians of the state who preside over the ballot boxes. Sir, I say no more. My position upon the committee was technically that of a judge, but really every man on the committee endeavoured to bring out all the facts he could. Especially is it the province of the opposition to bring out facts against the government, and especially is it the province of the followers of the government to bring out facts against the opposition. We did that as well as we could, as far as we went. I regret that this government after having put their hand to the plough, now turn back. One would have expected gentlemen like the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), a man who has not lost all his original glory; man although he may be a fallen angel, possess some marks of the old manliness, that characterized him—I wonder what the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), thinks about this matter. Is he willing to sit in his position, and notwithstanding his oath of office of fealty to the British Crown; and allow his party and himself to enjoy the fruits of political felony? Is the leader of the government, whose one great ideal is British tradition and British statesmanship, who glories that he is an Englishman of the advanced Liberal school; is he going to sit there and allow these tactics to prevail, tactics that are worse than the tactics of any semi-civilized community? And when corruption and fraud is rampant in this country, he is to whom has been committed the honour and integrity of this state, to silently sit by, while his friends and associates aid these debauchers, not having the courage to grapple firmly with the men of his party, who are desirous of protecting these malefactors in their evil-doing.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). Mr. Speaker, I may say that during my short experience as a member of this House, I never heard a more unfair speech than the one which has just been delivered. Considering all the circumstances of this case; considering what is fact and what is fiction; considering that the gentleman (Mr. Powell) who addressed the House is a lawyer of standing, I repeat that I have never, in my experience, heard a more unfair speech—attacking persons who are absent, producing affidavits such as he has, from men of no character against men of reputation and standing in the country; producing these affidavits without notice or warning and under the privileges of parliament—I say again, that I never heard a more unfair speech made in any deliberative assembly. Now, I shall say at the outset and without fear of successful contradiction—I have not the slightest doubt that gentlemen opposite will contradict it—but I say it from my place here and I say it as a matter of truth: That I, for one, declare that I am as anxious to have purity in elections as any member of this House. When the matter is brought before the proper tribunal, where there can be a fair investigation, I will go as far as any gentleman in this House in endeavouring to get at the truth, to find out the guilty, and to punish the criminals, if they can be found. In saying that, I believe that I am saying what every member of the Liberal party, so far as I know, will say, and what every member of the government will say. This matter that we have in hand, is something that we have got to consider in itself, and to see whether what is proposed to be done, is the proper course to get at the truth in matters of this kind. As was said by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), this afternoon, the popular opinion in the country is that this whole matter of the West Huron and Brockville elections was referred to this committee. Every one that talks of it in the country—unless their attention has been particularly directed to the order of reference to the committee—think that a roving commission, a sort of general mandate was given to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to go into the whole matter, and investigate alleged frauds, no matter by whomsoever committed, and bring any one from anywhere, who may have at all participated in the elections. Now, nothing of the kind was done. The order of reference was simply as to the conduct of the returning officers and the deputy returning officers in these constituencies. It will be necessary to go a little into the history of the case, to answer the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Powell). Upon the statement of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), this matter was referred to the committee for the purpose of inquiring into the conduct of returning officers and the deputy returning officers in these two constituencies, and the committee took up the West Huron case, the evidence with regard to which is now before the House. The report of the committee is dated August 9, and it shows that there were twenty-five sittings of the committee, covering seventeen sessions in the morning and eight in the afternoon. It shows also that we had the evidence of 99 witnesses orally heard before the committee and 4 witnesses examined by interrogatory—103 in all; that 12 witnesses failed to attend; and that 9 additional witnesses attended, but were discharged without examination. After the most careful examination—so careful that a good deal of fault was found by some of the members of the committee with what they considered the smallness of the questions asked, the minuteness of the testimony with the view to testing the credibility of the witnesses—the investigation was closed with reference to polling division No. 4, where Mr. Cummings was the returning officer. The nine additional witnesses were to be examined only with reference to the polling division in Goderich, where Mr. Farr was returning officer. I think I shall be able to prove—I hope to the satisfaction of hon. gentlemen opposite, although perhaps that is hoping against hope—that nothing was found that would point to the guilt of Mr. Cummings, notwithstanding what has been said by the last speaker. Now, this committee have made their report. They do not recommend anything. They simply report the evidence which they found, and they leave it to the House to say what should be done—to do as it deems best or as it may be advised in the matter. Here we are, then, with this matter before us to deal with, unless there is abundant reason to show why the House should send it back.

Now, as to No. 4 polling division. Bear in mind that of all the polls in West Huron, only three polls were in any way referred to. At poll No. 4, where Mr. Cummings was returning officer, James Chisholm and John Lawson were scrutineers for Mr. Holmes, and a man named John McAvoy and another named Dancy, for a part of the time assisted in counting or otherwise. The men who acted for Mr. McLean were James McManus and Edward Shaw, both respectable men, shrewd and intelligent, not men who would not detect fraud if perpetrated in any ordinary way or by sleight-of-hand, as has been suggested here. There were 98 votes polled—68 for Holmes and 30 for McLean; there were 125 ballots, and 27 remained, so that every ballot was accounted for. One thing seemed to be clear to every person present at that subdivision, and it was this, that Mr. Cummings actually put in the ballot that was handed to him by the voter in each case. I am not speaking now of the Liberals, but of the Conservative scrutineers who were there and whose names I have given. Every one at that poll thought, as Mr. Cummings swore, that he had put in the actual ballots received from the voters. After the election, when these men on the Conservative side compared the results with the canvass which they had made, they found that in some way or other there were not as many votes for the

Mr. BRITTON.

Conservative candidate at that polling place as they had expected. My hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) says that the men felt that they were outraged, and they came forward and voluntarily gave their declarations in regard to it. The hon. gentleman is not quoting the evidence when he says that. He is so saturated with this matter that he may think he is quoting it when he is not. The men who made the declarations and who were present when they were taken said that Mr. Hays went to these men at their places of residence and asked them for these declarations. Being Conservatives, they stated that they had voted for Mr. McLean, and that they were willing to say that they had so voted; and so we got these declarations. The inquiry being set on foot, instead of having it carried on in the election courts, the men who got the declarations put them in their pockets, and they were not seen again until they were produced in the House of Commons and before the Privileges and Elections Committee. The men who made these declarations were unquestionably Conservatives, and when they came here they were allowed to swear and did swear as a matter of fact that they had voted on that occasion for Mr. McLean. Now, Mr. Cummings was examined before the committee. I do not know how his evidence comes to have struck the hon. member for Westmoreland in such a way that he is very much prejudiced against it: but every unprejudiced person who heard Mr. Cummings's evidence regarded him as a candid man; and Mr. Cummings swears—and in this he is not contradicted by the others, according to their belief—that he actually put into the box the very ballots he received from the different voters. My hon. friend says you cannot conceive of fraudulent ballots being produced in any other way than by fraud on the part of the deputy returning officer. Let us see. His case, as I understood it, depended on this, that the ballots that were put into the box were not the ones that were received from Mr. Cummings. If that is so, Mr. Cummings, according to the evidence, is no party to the giving out of those ballots, which did not come from his pad. The voters must have got them in some other way. So he is not a party to that; and if it is true that he actually put into the box the ballots he received from the different voters, then, assuming them to be fraudulent, some other way must be found to account for them than to blame Mr. Cummings. That seems to me to be perfectly clear. There is one other way, and I only suggest it. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) was angered on one occasion, and gave me some uncomplimentary notice, because I ventured to suggest that there was a possibility of some of those 43 voters having committed perjury. I will not suggest that, but I will say this, that I do not know, and the committee does not know, this House does not know, that any one of these 43 persons stands any better in the county of Huron than does Mr. Cummings, according to the sworn statements of the Conservatives who came before the committee; and Mr. Cummings swore that he actually put into the ballot box the identical ballots which he had received from the voters. Now, one oath is as good as another.

Mr. MILLS. Forty-three others?

Mr. BRITTON. Just as good as 43 others, because, mind you, 30 of these 43 swore to the truth, because their votes are there, and it left only 13 of these men on the other side. And it is not the cumulative evidence of 13 against 1, but it is each man's evidence of a particular thing against another man's evidence of a particular thing. It is not thirteen against one in any such sense as that, and there is a reason why these men, if they were either bought by persons depraved enough to buy them, or if they changed their minds in any way, which may account for their voting one way and talking the other.

Cummings was shown these ballots alleged to be fraudulent, and on looking at them, not suspecting forgery or fraud, he thought that the initials on the back were his. I am assuming that these were fraudulent ballots and am asking that Mr. Cummings be not found guilty on the evidence here, but be found to have told the truth when, not suspecting fraud or forgery, and finding that the initials on the backs of these ballots resembled his, he said naturally and in good faith: Yes, these are my initials. But, when the points of difference in the ballots themselves, as compared with the others, were pointed out to him, he then began to doubt, and would not say positively that the initials had been put on by him. So that, I think the conclusion to be drawn from the evidence is that Mr. Cummings gave candid and honest testimony.

I will deal with Pritchett's affidavit later on, and I wish first to discuss the general question of the possibility of Mr. Cummings being able to do such sleight-of-hand work as it is alleged he did on that occasion. If this were not a political matter, if there were not such a wide cleavage between us, if it were any ordinary matter, I could ask and expect a fair answer from hon. gentlemen opposite when I put to them the question, whether, in view of the fact that Cummings was an elderly and a clumsy man, a man who all his life had been accustomed to hard work on a farm, he was likely to be one who could, with any amount of teaching and practice, be able to do such clever sleight-of-hand work as to deceive all those present in the room, namely, first the voter himself, and, secondly, the scrutineers. Is it credible that a man of his training could do successfully, under the scrutiny of so many people, the sleight-of-hand work described by Pritchett, namely, accept from the voter, with his right hand, the genuine ballot and counterfoil, then place the genuine ballot under the left hand finger, as if for the purpose of tearing off the counterfoil, then, with a quick motion of the right hand, remove both genuine ballot and counterfoil, and at the same moment raise the left hand and leave on the table a ballot from which the counterfoil had apparently been just removed, then put what he had in his right hand in his coat pocket and put in the box the ballot lying upon the table. I do not believe that any unprejudiced person present at the committee and hearing the evidence would believe that Cummings could have been capable of doing anything of the kind.

There may have been some suspicion of Dancy with reference to these fourteen ballots. Supposing we acknowledge, for the sake of argument, that these ballots were forged or fraudulent, and supposing the deputy at that polling booth put the stubs in his pocket, is not that often done by reputable returning officers? I do not pretend that it is right. I do not pretend that that is destroying the stubs in the proper sense of the word, so that they could not be identified as even the counterfoil of ballots, but, we know that that is often done, and we can readily conceive that Cummings honestly considered, when he tore the counterfoil from a ballot and put it in his pocket, that he had destroyed it, just as if he had thrown it on the floor. And we know that the practice has obtained of throwing these counterfoils on the floor, where they are no more destroyed than if put in the pocket. It is simply one of these mistakes that a man may honestly make, and which do not render him open to the imputation of fraud.

Well, we have got all the evidence we can get, except of course, this affidavit of Pritchett, which I will deal with later. Apart from that affidavit, which was sprung on the House to-night for the first time, every one will admit that all the evidence that could be given with reference to Cummings and what took place at his poll, has been obtained. If we have all the evidence, what then do hon. gentlemen opposite suggest? Even supposing that it is a question of oath against oath with regard to him—and it is not even that—all the evidence that can be had with reference to Cummings has been obtained, and what more can be done about it? I would like to know what hon. gentlemen opposite would have us do, dealing simply with Cummings? Let them tell me what object there is in sending this matter back to the committee, apart from Pritchett's evidence. Admitting that we have all the evidence that can be offered with reference to Cummings, what object could there be in sending this matter back to the committee? Could they make a report that Cummings is guilty? Would this House accept such a report? And if they did, what is there to be done in a matter of that kind? So, with reference to Cummings, apart from what I would say with reference to Pritchett, there is no ground for sending this matter back to the committee for any further investigation. No judge or magistrate or jury, no honest, fair-minded man, would say that Cummings was guilty. The most they could say would be that they were in doubt, but, under any circumstances, the accused must be given the benefit of the doubt.

Having said that much, I will leave the matter, so far as that polling place is concerned. Some evidence was given with reference to No. 2 poll, where Herbert Morris was the deputy returning officer, and the hon. gentlemen opposite attacked him at first with just as much ferocity as they did Cummings. But, when the investigation was made, it was found that in the case of that polling booth there were 125 ballots. Of these eighty-seven were polled and thirty-eight returned. Forty-nine were cast for McLean and thirty-seven for Holmes, and one was rejected. That one was rejected by the deputy returning officer as a forgery, and we must take it for granted that his decision was acquiesced in by those who were present. On the recount, one other ballot was thrown out, but it was admitted by every member of the committee that the deputy returning officer had acted in a most fair and impartial manner. The committee could not go in pursuit of the forger of that one ballot in order to find out who he was.

With reference to poll No. 3, Goderich, I do not stand here to question the statement that Farr was a bad character. I do not know or care what his antecedents were. He seems to have been at that time a man thoroughly in disrepute, but he was endeavouring to reform. He had been deputy returning officer in many elections before this. He had been appointed by the Conservatives and by the municipal councillors, and, apart from his character, Farr was just the kind of man who would be selected as deputy. It is within the knowledge of hon. members that usually the same deputy returning officers are selected over and over again to fill that office. Sheriffs and registrars who are appointed returning officers look to these men who are familiar with this kind of work; and it was the most natural thing in the world that Mr. Sands, knowing Farr, or having Farr's name suggested to him, should select him—because apart from the one thing, his bad habits, he was a man who would be available where there was no fraud suggested or thought of, and would be one of the most likely to be appointed. We have this state of things—that in that case there were 118 votes polled, while 123 ballots actually came out of the box on its being opened, and of this 123 ten were blank, so that only left 113 persons whose votes were counted for anybody, and so five voters lost their votes at the poll. This is a state of things that one cannot readily understand, except from the fact that this man was in a state of intoxication or semi-intoxication. He acted like a foolish man both on that day and afterwards. We have all the evidence we can get with regard to him. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) says this is an unfinished investigation, we have nine more witnesses to be examined. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax), tells us frankly that they have reference to the poll where Farr was deputy returning officer. Admit that they are ready to declare that they voted for McLean; admit that they did vote for him. I am willing to admit that for the sake of argument. What more are you going to get? These men, we are told, made declarations. That is evidence of the kind we had before the committee, and we will take it as evidence. So, here are nine more men to give evidence as to what took place at Farr's poll. But what more evidence do we want? There is the evidence, and there is Farr, such as he is; and here is the result of his poll; and that result is that five men have lost their votes, for McLean or for Holmes as the case may be. Can Farr be punished? If so, I would like the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax), to make a motion that would be parliamentary that would bring him within the law, if this evidence points to his guilt. But, so far as that poll is concerned, no further evidence can be given, and there is no use sending the case for investigation. That is the whole case of the West Huron election, except what we got in the Pritchett affidavit.

My hon. friend for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) said the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) did not quote all the evidence, or did not quote the evidence correctly regarding what Mr. Farr said. I do not know that it is worth while to lumber up Hansard with the evidence that is before the House in book form. But I followed the speech of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries very carefully, and I say that any one can read the evidence for himself, and he will see that anything that was omitted in reference to Farr does not help the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) one particle. The fact is, that Farr did make statements in regard to having received money that he did not receive, and there is no evidence that he did. He lied from first to last, when the truth would have answered him best, a foolish sort of lying that showed that he was not in a condition in which he was able to continue fraud even if he desired to perpetrate one. And now, in regard to Donald Cummings, we send that back to the committee without any suggestion that there is a single witness who can say more than has been said. The hon. member for Halifax said in his speech the other night that the nine witnesses were in reference to another poll and to show that they had voted for McLean. So that is the whole case in reference to that. The hon. member for Westmoreland developed a new cause of complaint to-night. This is the first we have heard of it. We had cross-examination of the witnesses, these declarants who said they had voted for McLean as to whether they knew it was a declaration they signed, and whether they swore to it or not. The cross-examination was at some length, and that led to the cross-examination of the deputy returning officers as to the oath taken by them. Now, that brought out the fact, which, I suppose, will be paraded as something wrong, that these deputy returning officers did not take the oaths prescribed by law. I can only say that when the books were looked at, here were these oaths properly signed by the deputy returning officers. And, if they did not remember actually taking their oath, by taking the Bible in their hands or raising their hands and declaring it to be true in the sight of God, as it comes before the committee it is perfectly regular. I do not think that, with any show of reason, persons now will say in this House that because some little irregularity is alleged—is alleged, let it be understood—with regard to the taking of the oaths—

Mr. DAVIN. Little irregularity!

Mr. BRITTON. It is only an irregularity, an irregularity I have no doubt, which is very often perpetrated. No harm has come of it in regard to this particular matter, because you had an investigation of the ballots themselves. There have been two investigations of the ballots. First by recount, and second by the ballots of all being here before the committee of the House and in custody of the clerk of the committee. So that no harm is pretended to have occurred. So, if there was an irregularity, and I do not say there was not reason to think there was, it was not a matter for parliamentary inquiry, as it seems to me. The next point the hon. gentleman raises is as to the printing of the ballots. He said Mr. McGillicuddy made a statement in regard to the matter, which shows that you can fairly conclude that some fraud was perpetrated in reference to these ballots, and he read the evidence of Mr. McGillicuddy. Now, I want to read the evidence of Mr. McGillicuddy, and I will leave it to hon. gentlemen who heard the hon. member for Westmoreland read it, omitting some parts of it, to say whether there is anything suspicious in reference to that or not. This is the evidence as found on pages 299 and 301.

Q. You might explain how it is done?—A. The two blocks were put side by side and printed on one forme, and when a thousand impressions had been taken off it represents two thousand ballots.

Q. What is the purpose of having two dies instead of only one, to save time and save press work is it?—A. Yes, to get them off in a hurry.

Q. Then after they were printed, the method was?—A. To put them, the ballots, under the knife, the guillotine.

Q. You were going on to describe the method; after the imprint was taken from the die or off the die. What was done with it?—A. What, the ballots?

Q. Mr. Sands himself that is?—A. Yes.

Q. Well, go on?—A. When the paper was cut we went on and printed them.

Q. Well, as to the parcels he gave you a list and the numbers that would be required for each polling subdivision?—A. Yes.

Q. Were these parcels put up by you?—A. None of these were put up by me.

Q. These were put up in your office?—A. Yes.

Q. By your workmen?—A. Yes.

Q. They were put up in parcels for the deputy returning officers?—A. No, for the returning officer and he passed them on to the deputies.

Q. They passed from your office directly into the hands of the returning officer?—A. Yes, he called for them.

Q. And parcelled them out to the different subdivisions?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have some conversation with him about the ballots?—A. When he was going away finally I said: 'Are you sure that you are going to have enough ballots, because the hundred and fifty that you have ordered there over the six thousand represent 25 cents per hundred, and that is 37½ cents, and if you want more of them we won't do it for 25 cents per hundred, we will want 37½ cents as we can do them in quantities at that price but not if we have to put them on the press again.' He said he thought he had enough.

Q. You had some conversation about the price?—A. Yes. He said you can put down 38 cents if you like and that is all about that.

Q. He would allow you 38 cents, he was going to be handsome. Well, now there were more ballots of course which he did not take?—A. Yes.

Q. Have you those with you?—A. Yes.

Q. Will you give them to me?—A. Yes.

Ballots produced by witness.

Q. These are the three parcels which were left over after you had made the delivery to the returning officer?—A. Yes.

Q. Are those all the ballots that were left over?—A. All that I got that were left over.

Q. How many are there, there?—A. I think they are marked one hundred each, they were given to me as hundreds.

Q. That would represent three hundred?—A. Yes.

Q. And your men were supposed to have delivered six thousand one hundred and fifty?—A. Yes.

Q. And they actually did deliver that number; that would leave a difference of fifty?—A. There is always a certain amount of waste in anything of that kind and one per cent of six thousand one hundred and fifty would represent sixty-one and that would compensate for the difference.

Now, that is the evidence with reference to the ballots, and if it is true that there were only fifty ballots printed that were unaccounted for, this man who gives evidence, swears that they would all be more than accounted for by the waste that ordinarily exists. So the attack that is made upon

Mr. McGillicuddy by the hon. gentleman to-night for the first time, seems not to be fair. The committee's attention was not specially directed to this point made to-night for the first time, as something that is really important in the investigation. These are the only three points that are involved in regard to West Huron. When this investigation was going on, every attempt that was made by anybody to get at the truth, was declared by some of the Conservative press, to be obstruction, and an attempt to cover up fraud. They spoke then as they have spoken to-night, of a gang, they spoke of the machine; and the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), said that Bowles was there, and Linklater was there, and the friends of the government supplied the money. Now there is not one tittle of evidence for those statements.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not say that in committee.

Mr. BRITTON. Then you said it somewhere else.

Mr. SPROULE. I am willing to say it now.

Mr. BRITTON. You are willing to say it now. That is the beauty of it; you are willing to make the charge, but you have no evidence to sustain it.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the hon. gentleman deny that the gang was in West Huron?

Mr. BRITTON. I deny that this gang was there at the instance of the government. I say there is no evidence that what the hon. gentleman calls a gang was there, except so far as appears by the evidence that is given to-night for the first time. We will have to deal with that by itself.

Mr. SPROULE. I saw some of them there myself, and I speak from knowledge.

Mr. BRITTON. Then the hon. gentleman's friends were there. Perhaps he could tell us who constituted the other gang, and what was the other gang doing. Have the friends of the government not as good a right to be represented there, as the party to which the member for East Grey belongs?

Mr. SPROULE. I was speaking of O'Gorman and Lewis, both of whom I saw there.

Mr. BRITTON. An attack was made to-night on the Postmaster-General, for being there, and on the Minister of Public Works for being there. Cannot hon. gentlemen conceive of men being there for an honest purpose?

Mr. QUINN. The attack on the Postmaster General was made for being in West Huron.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What for?

Mr. QUINN. For associating with these men.

Mr. BRITTON.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I was not here when such a reference was made to myself. May I ask the hon. gentleman to what he alludes?

Mr. QUINN. It was not I who made the statement; I was simply correcting the member for Kingston.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Well, I will see who made the statement before this debate closes.

Mr. BRITTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope we have not got down so low in politics that men cannot attend a political meeting, that they cannot go into a constituency to express their views on the policy of the government, without members of this House getting up and saying that they are either associating with a gang, or that they are there for fraudulent purposes, or are themselves guilty of fraud. There is such a thing as honesty and honour left yet, notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen opposite have said in regard to this case.

Now, with regard to Brockville. The member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), has introduced that subject this session, and given reasons why he asks for an investigation in Brockville. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has quoted his exact words of last session and I will not weary the House by quoting them again. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has called attention to the trivial character of the charges that are made. Now, the hon. gentleman says that all this information in regard to Brockville is the result of the investigation of the committee. A committee appointed by whom? If the committee was a fair and impartial one, I suppose he ought to be satisfied with the result of its investigation. One would suppose that if the committee had found anything like fraud, there would be an investigation before the courts instead of hon. gentlemen limiting their investigation into the conduct of a deputy returning officer, before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. But, he says, a boy picked up a ballot that he saw a man throw away. Now, if that man had the ballot for a fraudulent purpose, do you suppose he would throw it away where a boy could pick it up? Is that a likely story? Therefore, you are driven to the conclusion that the man had something which appeared to be a ballot, which was not a ballot, and that he was throwing it away, not for a fraudulent purpose, but for the purpose of destroying it, not dreaming that anybody would pick it up on the street and take it to anybody else. We also find that he says that he took another ballot presented by a Liberal worker to a voter who was asked to deposit that ballot, that he did not see fit to do so and that he placed the ballot in the hands of gentlemen who are prepared to produce it before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. There was a specific thing done by somebody which, if it had been for a fraudulent purpose could have been dealt with very easily on that occasion. There was no necessity that this thing should be produced before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and if it was a lawyer who had it he would know that there was an easy way under the law to deal with it instead of being willing to produce it before the committee. Then he states also in regard to the polling subdivision of Elizabethtown that there was a large number of ballots marked for Comstock identically in the same way, that they were so folded as to show part of the cross, and that they were found in that position in the ballot box. Any one who will infer fraud from finding certain ballots in a certain position in the ballot box is going a long way indeed. It is impossible to tell how ballots are in the ballot box before they are turned out. Every person who has acted as a scrutineer in any election knows that. But, the person who tells us that the ballots are folded in a certain way in the ballot box, of necessity, cannot know that if the ballots are folded up as they generally are. I shall not go on with these particular matters in reference to Brockville that were dealt with by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, but shall come to a conclusion, so far as Brockville is concerned, and then deal with the Pritchett affidavits. I may say here, and emphasize it, as part of the defence of myself in reference to the vote that I want to give in this matter, that it is a most material circumstance in this whole case that two persons in Brockville have been dealt with in a way that they ought to be dealt with, but, I may mention that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries was a little mistaken in thinking that these were deputy returning officers. It was one of these deputy returning officers, who, it is suggested, was trained by Pritchett, who was so keen and observant that he thought he detected a forged ballot that had been produced by a man named Gordon Empey, and he practically put Empey under arrest for producing what this deputy returning officer thought was a forged ballot. This man, Gordon Empey, who was said to have possession of a forged ballot was tried and was acquitted. My hon. friend thought to minimize the acquittal of this man by mentioning the fact that there were only two Conservatives on the jury, although I thought there were more. There were two honest Conservatives; that is all. These two men did not deal with the case as Conservatives, and the other ten men as Liberals, but they dealt with it according to the evidence, not according to the speeches made by hon. gentlemen in this House, or according to the suggestions and innuendoes of hon. gentlemen, but according to the evidence. They said that this was not a forged ballot, but that it was the actual ballot that the deputy returning officer had given him. The judge said, on a recount that he would have counted that ballot as a good ballot. Another man named Wendling was charged with the possession of forged ballots, and placed under arrest, but afterwards the charge was withdrawn, and this is the position that we are in, concerning this matter. Now, then, I want to refer to what my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden), who is here now, did when he introduced this matter to the House. Having given this statement in regard to what he was prepared to prove, of what he alleged in regard to Brockville, as was read from Hansard to-day, he asked: What do these things mean? He proceeded to state what they meant and would prove it by reading the confession that Mr. McNish gave up in West Elgin as proof of something that was done in Brockville, a confession that was given in a provincial election trial, the confession of a man who makes it in a suit for the purpose of terminating this suit. We know that a man will often make a confession of this kind, for the purpose of terminating a suit, although he knows very little of the facts of the case. He makes that confession in a provincial election trial, and the hon. member for Halifax, the good lawyer from Halifax, adduces the confession of Mr. McNish to prove guilt on the part of the Liberal workers in Brockville.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is the hon. gentleman speaking of my remarks the other day?

Mr. BRITTON. I am speaking of your remarks, as read from Hansard, last year.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I may mention that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that all that was needed was a plain statement and a committee would be granted at once.

Mr. BRITTON. I am dealing with the hon. gentleman as a lawyer.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am giving the hon. gentleman's leader's comments.

Mr. BRITTON. I am referring to the position you took as a lawyer.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman does not believe in his own leader.

Mr. BRITTON. I think if the hon. gentleman was trying to prove the guilt of any person in court he would not rely upon such evidence as that which he knows would not be received. If such evidence as that would not be received in a court, where is the fairness of bringing it up in this House and trying to couple Mr. McNish's confession in West Elgin with a charge of wrong-doing in Brockville. We have what has been said in regard to Brockville as well as in regard to West Huron. Then, hon. gentlemen bring forward to-night for the first time, the affidavits made by J. G. Pritchett, for a consideration, as I shall mention in a minute or two. Pritchett has a record. Pritchett comes from a good Conservative school. He knows all the tricks of the trade.

Mr. TAYLOR. When they turn Grit they always turn bad.

Mr. BRITTON. He turned Grit for a consideration, I have no doubt.

Mr. McMULLEN. And he has turned Tory again, for a consideration.

Mr. BRITTON. Yes. We have seen his name mentioned in London. We find that long ago, when a friend of ours happened to get into the toils in London, the man who was against him then and who was concerned in putting the law to work was named Pritchett. I do not know what relation he bears to this Pritchett and I do not want to impute to this one anything which he may not be deserving of, but I know that a man named Pritchett was connected with an election trial many years ago in London, and that he was the relator in a trial. This Pritchett comes apparently from hiding in the United States. He went away to avoid prosecution, as he says himself, and having gone away to avoid prosecution he makes these affidavits in hiding. He stated in his evidence yesterday before the commission that he made these affidavits because he was paid for it by Mr. Barker, the organizer of the Conservative party. He states himself that he made his statement before that commission under the promise that he would not be proceeded against for the crime he had committed. This same gentleman—no, I shall withdraw that word—this same man, this same scoundrel, who gave his evidence before the commission, was pronounced, as was stated by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, by the judge as a self-convicted liar. That is what was said of him by the judge, and undoubtedly he is a self-confessed liar, a self-confessed refugee from justice, a self-confessed seller of his oath for a consideration, and we are asked to-night as to three affidavits made in Detroit to prosecute him in this country for perjury. We are asked to do that by a good lawyer. Why do you not prosecute him? If the hon. gentleman can discover a law under which we could prosecute a man here for perjury in an affidavit which he makes over in Detroit, Mich., I would like to know it. I do not think he can find any such law. Then he says to us: That is what you ought to do. I will tell him what he ought to do, and I think every gentleman here will agree with me. If that man's affidavit is true, then he was counselling and teaching them to commit a crime, and there was a conspiracy on the part of these deputy returning officers, and they can be prosecuted for that conspiracy, and then we will see who is telling the truth.

Mr. BRITTON.

Mr. TAYLOR. You prosecute them; they are government officers and you have the evidence.

Mr. BRITTON. That is for the local government to do. Any one can put the law in motion in reference to a conspiracy.

Mr. TAYLOR. Let the government go on and prosecute.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Lay your information before a magistrate.

Mr. BRITTON. There are crimes which are barred by expiration of time, but this is a conspiracy under the code, and you can prosecute at any time. Lay your complaint and the prosecution will go on. It is the first time that we have heard these affidavits. The hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Borden) reads an extract from one the other night, and the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) read the others to-night, and I would like to know where they are. I want to see them.

Mr. TAYLOR. They are in the Hansard room.

Mr. BRITTON. I would like to see the original.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You would not like to see Pritchett before the committee though.

Mr. BRITTON. I would like to see him before the court. I invite the hon. gentleman to take him there where he will be protected by the judge, and where the counsel who will cross-examine him will be protected under the ordinary rules that prevail in criminal courts, and then we will see who is telling the truth. Now, with regard to Mr. Pritchett, when I read the statement in the newspaper of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), I thought I had better make a little inquiry in regard to Brockville. I did not know the deputy returning officers of the whole riding of Brockville, but I know the returning officers in the town of Brockville. It is true that Pritchett mentions the names of one or two deputy returning officers of the town of Brockville, but he mentions the names of two or three who were not deputy returning officers, and he is wrong in his affidavit in stating that these people were deputy returning officers at that election. I took the names down as they were mentioned by the hon. member (Mr. Powell), and I think I have them right. Pritchett in his affidavit says he met a man named Smith. I suppose there are many Smiths in Brockville, but there was no Smith in this instance who was a deputy returning officer in Brockville. He mentions a man named Cowan, but there was no such man deputy returning officer at Brockville. He also mentions a Mr. Jones. I want to tell this House who Mr. Jones is, and I no more believe that Mr. Jones, the son of Mr. D. B. Jones, who was a Conservative all his life, and died a Conservative; I no more believe that Mr. Jones would accept training for an unlawful purpose than I believe any hon. member of this House would be guilty of it. I think you will find that Mr. Jones will contradict that as flatly as any man can contradict it. I mean Mr. Elmer W. Jones, who is a barrister and a son of the late D. B. Jones, and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) will know him, because I think he was a government officer.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman is, I think, referring to the wrong Jones.

Mr. BRITTON. I am referring to the lawyer Jones there.

Mr. TAYLOR. This is not the man at all. Refer to the insurance Jones, the son of Jones the loan companies man.

Mr. BRITTON. Pritchett's affidavit refers to Jones who was a deputy returning officer, and that is the one I am concerned with. That deputy returning officer is Elmer W. Jones, who was a barrister, and he is the son of D. B. Jones, and I tell the House that Mr. Jones would no more be a party to be put in training by Pritchett for an unlawful act than would any hon. member of this House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is the hon. gentleman referring to the deputy returning officer in the town of Brockville only?

Mr. BRITTON. I said I only had the names of those.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not in the county?

Mr. BRITTON. Not in the county. I stated that I have only the names of the returning officers in the town of Brockville, and not in the rural part of the constituency. We only heard the names to-night, and the names of some of those in the town of Brockville are mentioned.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman is losing sight of the fact that the constituency of Brockville, is called Brockville, but it includes more than the town.

Mr. BRITTON. I do not lose sight of it, because I mentioned that I only made myself acquainted with those who were deputy returning officers in the town of Brockville.

Mr. WALLACE. But there were other deputy returning officers outside the town of Brockville.

Mr. BRITTON. Quite so, but the names of those mentioned in the town of Brockville are a sufficient guarantee that Pritchett's statement is not true. He mentions the name of James Robertson in that affidavit. Now, James Robertson was deputy sheriff for years, and he is an old resident and well known. Whatever Mr. Robertson's business abilities may be he is not, in my opinion, capable of any such fraud as is charged here. He mentions some one who, he says, was deputy returning officer at the opera house, and the person he named was not deputy returning officer at the opera house at all. I do not know who was deputy returning officer at the poll of the opera house.

Mr. TAYLOR. He said lessee of the opera house.

Mr. BRITTON. The deputy returning officers in the town of Brockville are men who are well known and of good character. Those mentioned are men of good character, and so far as Pritchett's affidavit refers to any one of these, they are foul slanders against these people in my opinion, and I have no doubt we shall hear from them later. One word more with regard to this. I say without fear of successful contradiction, that apart from politics, there is not a man in this House, there is not a judge or a jury, that would hang a dog on the evidence of that man Pritchett; on affidavits made on such circumstances as have been mentioned; paid for by this man, Mr. Barker who was at Brockville and who investigated the cases brought before the court, and who pursued Pritchett to Detroit and got these affidavits for a money consideration to produce in this House. I say that is not fair party warfare; it is an attempt to hit below the belt, and it should not be countenanced in our political strife.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us see what cases should come before a committee. When there has not been any return and the facts clearly warrant a return, and where the case calls for speedy justice, that case should go before a committee. I do not pretend to say that this parliament has divested itself of any jurisdiction over matters affecting the purity of the House of Commons; and, particularly, it has not divested itself of control over its own officers; but, certainly it is not every case that ought to come before a committee of this House. Since this Act was passed, no case involving charges similar to those set up in regard to the West Huron and Brockville elections have been sent to that committee; and we ought not to establish the precedent now of sending such cases there. If such matters are to go to committees of the House of Commons, how much better off are we by reason of the legislation which has been passed for the very purpose of taking such matters away from the disturbing element of committees of the House of Commons? When election trials took place before committees, they were not regarded as fair tribunals by constitutional writers. It was felt that it was well to get rid of such prejudiced tribunals. I will read a short extract from Cox's 'British Commonwealth,' on page 209, because the remarks, dealing with this subject, are very pertinent to the case we have in hand :

The existing provisions of law against bribery and intimidation of electors may be at once assumed to be inadequate. This inadequacy arises from several causes. In the first place, the adjudication on questions of bribery and corruption is given to tribunal peculiarly unfitted to act with judicial scrutiny and impartiality. If love of privileges had not an almost irresistible influence over human nature, the House of Commons would be utterly without excuse for the tenacity with which it maintains a power which it, of all bodies, ought to be the very last to covet. All means of preventing corruption of electors must be imperfect, so long as the tribunals which investigate it are chosen from the persons elected, and not from an independent body. True it is that great precautions are used to avoid choosing, on an election committee, members of the House of Commons personally interested in the result of its inquiry. But so long as bribery and corruption occur—as unhappily and indisputably they do in almost every part of the country—the members of that House will exercise very tenderly the powers entrusted to them. They may be—they are generally—men of integrity; but they are subject to human infirmities, and with however firm purpose they set out in their inquiry, it is too often shaken by a reflection that, if the sentence against corruption were strictly pronounced in every case, a large proportion of the elections would be invalidated. They know too well the manner in which elections are conducted to forget that such a sentence would frequently endanger their own seats. I quote that to show that an election committee is not the place to send matters of this kind to.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I would like to correct a statement he made a few moments ago, for I am satisfied he does not want to go on record as having made a false statement. I would say that Mr. Elmer Jones, of Brockville, a lawyer, who he said was a Conservative, is a son of the clerk of the Division Court there, Mr. D. B. Jones, also manager of the loan and savings society, who has been a Grit all his life, and whose son is one of the rankest of that kind that there is in Brockville.

Mr. BRITTON. Of course. I must accept the correction. I may say that I did not depend for the information on his being a son of Mr. D. B. Jones. The Jones I referred to was a lawyer in Brockville, who was afterwards made customs officer or postmaster.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is Bill Jones, an old bachelor, who never had a son. The hon. gentleman also made the statement that Pritchett made the affidavit that the men he named were returning officers in Brockville, while they were not. These gentlemen, to my knowledge, were returning officers, one at Lyn, and another a few miles back of Brockville.

Mr. BRITTON. Then, the hon. gentleman should bring charges against these men.

Mr. BRITTON.

Mr. TAYLOR. They are officers of this government; let them make the prosecution.

Mr. BRITTON. I submit, in addition to what was said this afternoon, that the charges made are not the kind that should come before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. What occurred in connection with the West Huron case, before the first sitting of the committee, the speeches made in this House and the editorial articles in the newspapers, all prove that it is not in the public interest that such charges should be investigated by that committee; and since the passing of these Acts, no such case has gone there. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that in these investigations you are only on the fringe of the corruption that ought to be unearthed. If that is true, why did not those who thought there was any such corruption in these constituencies as has been alleged avail themselves of the privilege that is given to them by the Act recited this afternoon? It would have taken no more trouble for these men—and they were quite within the time to do it—to get the petition of twenty-five electors, than was required to get their declarations; and if they believed the charges, there was no difficulty in putting the law in motion. It is worth noting how careful the law has been framed in regard to the particular offences it is intended to cover. Everything is provided for, whether fraudulent ballots or neglect of duty, or fraudulent acts individually or in concert with others; and penalties are recoverable in the way mentioned; so that, there is no excuse for gentlemen coming here and saying, we want an investigation, for they can get it before a judicial tribunal, where it will be properly hedged about and guarded. There has been, from first to last, in this matter, a great outcry. There is no doubt that this is part of an organized plan of an election campaign, which is started with an attempt to make the government responsible for frauds which are alleged, but which cannot be proved. I do not say that all these elections have been pure. I do not say that there have not been improper practices to some extent in the different elections, but what I do say is, that there is no more responsibility for these practices resting on members of this House, who have had nothing to do with these particular constituencies, than there is on men who were not in politics at all. But an organized plan of attack has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite, with the object of trying to convince the people that these things were done by this side of the House, and that we are attempting to burk an inquiry. We are doing nothing of the kind. Nothing is further from our desire.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BRITTON. We court an inquiry, but that is a very different thing from calling for an inquiry before a prejudiced tribunal, where you will be howled down when you attempt to bring out the facts. That is what was said in England, and what I say now. I say that this Privileges and Elections Committee of this House is not the place where can fairly be tried an offence of the description brought before this House. No one who knows the procedure before that committee will fail to agree in that opinion. All sorts of irrelevant testimony was admitted before it last session. No specific charge was made, and yet allegations based on no specific charge were allowed to be investigated, and names were bandied about without regard to reputations, and insinuations of the grossest kind indulged in, without any let or hindrance. If that is a proper place to try matters of this grave and important description, I am much mistaken. But in the courts every opportunity is given and every safeguard is afforded in the trials of such cases. Our judges have dealt with cases of this kind before, and dealt with them fairly. We have had the case of ballot-stuffing in Manitoba, the case of the Queen vs. Saunders, that came before the court there, and was fully investigated, and resulted in a conviction. If that court allowed a man to say for whom he had voted, it did so because the seat of no member of the House was thereby endangered, and the only matter in question was the crime itself. In the case of Hastings against Summerfeldt, the defendant was a returning officer. The plaintiff had inadvertently marked his ballot for the wrong candidate, and he showed his ballot so wrongly marked, and asked for a new one. But the deputy returning officer showed it to some persons in the polling booth, and refused to return it, and put it in the box, so that the man's vote was counted against the candidate for whom he had intended to vote. The judge in that case, Judge Falconbridge, said that, under the Election Act, the deputy returning officer was guilty of a breach of duty, and liable to a penalty. In the case of the Queen against Sturdy, Chief Justice Wilson said :

A person who does an act which a statute, on public grounds, has prohibited generally, is liable to an indictment for misdemeanour, and it is not necessary that the statutes should prohibit such an act in express language.

The defendant's name appeared on the voters' list, but before the election he lost the right to vote. He voted without having at the time qualification. Held that he was guilty of a criminal offence and was rightly indicted for a misdemeanour.

There is a case reported in the Law Journal, 1883, page 377, in which case a vote was tendered by a voter who had the right to vote, and refused, and the deputy returning officer was held liable to a penalty, although he had acted in perfect good faith.

In the case of Muskoka and Parry Sound, Judge Gowan, now a member of the Senate, whom everybody respects, held that irregular acts or omissions by a deputy returning officer, in dealing with ballots, do not warrant disallowance, and he allowed written ballots to be counted, furnished by the deputy returning officer, because the printed ballots had given out, although no such contingency was provided for by law. In his judgment, he said :

If acts challenged and fraud charged, these should be inquired into, on an election trial or action or a charge against the deputy returning officer.

So that the courts give every possible latitude with reference to all these matters.

It does not seem to me quite fair that hon. gentlemen opposite should excite themselves so much on these matters, as if they were the only purists in this country. They ought to remember that they have a record which it would not be wise for them to make too public. The hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster), told the young men of Toronto, that they ought to read the history of the Conservative party, and I believe that my hon. friend, who usually sits in the place I now occupy, had something to say about this the other night. It would be well for them, before they shout so much against the Liberals of this country, to look back on the history of their own party. I know very well the objection that may be raised to the tu quoque argument. I know that two wrongs do not make one right. But none the less, it would do these hon. gentlemen some good if they would recall the history of their own party, with reference to these election frauds. We have had lately before the courts of Ontario, a lot of trials for election frauds, and a lot of convictions, and the convictions were not all of persons on the one side of politics. There were both Conservatives and Reformers implicated, and I do not know or care, whether there were more Conservatives or Reformers, but I do know that men who stand high in the councils of the party opposite, have been found guilty of corrupt practices. I know that one man, who ran against the present member for South Ontario (Mr. Burnett), admitted corrupt practices, and the judges wondered that he himself was not brought up for trial and punishment. But he goes about unmolested, although no doubt his conduct was open to just the same charges of corruption as hon. gentlemen opposite are so lavish in making, with regard to the elections in West Huron, Brockville and West Elgin.

We also know something about what took place at North Renfrew. And we know that in the constituency of South Leeds, before the hon. gentleman who now represents that constituency, had anything to do with it, and who, I dare say, conducts a pure election, hordes were torn loose to defeat the Hon. A. N. Richards in an election contest and that constituency was ankle-deep in corruption. The same thing may be said of North Renfrew, where we know all the foreigners there voted for the Conservative candidate. And coming later down, we can find many cases in which the corruption was not all practised on the one side, so that it hardly lies in the mouth of these hon. gentlemen to make the charges they do. It may not be out of place for me to refer to the former head of the Conservative party, a man of undoubted ability and against whom no one would desire to say anything—the late Sir John A. Macdonald—but who was very nearly disqualified in an election trial.

Mr. WILSON. Where ?

Mr. BRITTON. In Kingston, when he was unseated in 1874. The trial took place before Chief Justice Richards; and before it went very far, such gross corruption was shown to have been practised, that the late Sir John Macdonald abandoned his seat, and the trial was continued as to the personal charges against him. The judge reserved judgment on the personal charges, and I will read this one clause of his decision :

I must confess I have been very much embarrassed in coming to a conclusion satisfactory to myself. If it was not that I felt compelled to look upon this branch of the case in the nature of a penal proceeding, requiring that the petitioner should prove his allegation affirmatively by satisfactory evidence, and that he might have given some further evidence to have repelled some of the suggestions in respondent's favour, if such suggestions were not reasonable ones, I should feel bound to decide against the respondent.

The election was set aside and all costs against him, even to the costs of pursuing the personal charges on which the petitioner failed. So, it has not been all on one side, if we go into the matter historically, or simply deal with it according to our own memory. For that reason I think hon. gentlemen ought not to make of this a party question that they are making such a tremendous to-do about, but they might be modest, fair and candid and deal with it in a fair way. I will conclude with this very short summary which I wish to put on record :

1. Upon the facts alleged, neither West Huron or Brockville is a proper case to go to the Elections Committee of the House of Commons.

2. The law having defined offences, attached penalties and punishments for the commission of those offences, and having provided means for trial before judge and jury, and having provided a mode for the recovery of pecuniary penalties, it is not intended that such violation of the election law as is alleged here should go to a committee.

3. Assuming it to be true, as alleged (and it is not true—

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) is reading his speech.

Mr. BRITTON. I am not reading my speech.

Mr. BRITTON.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, that is the hon. gentleman's speech and he is reading that. The reading of a speech is strictly forbidden under the rules.

Mr. BRITTON. I am not reading my speech, I am reading a succinct conclusion.

Mr. WALLACE. I object to succinct conclusion. That is another name for reading his speech, and that is strictly forbidden by the rules of the House.

Mr. BRITTON. I will conclude by saying: Assuming it to be true, as alleged (and it is not true, but, on the contrary, many of the alleged acts are the purest fiction), no good can be accomplished by sending these cases to the committee.

The seat is not attacked.

No specific charge is made against any one.

There is no power to punish in any adequate or proper way any person found guilty.

There is no proper protection to the accused against improper modes of examining witnesses.

There is no way of excluding irrelevant and incompetent evidence.

4. I say this is not burking inquiry. These alleged facts were all known in time for an election petition, or in time for a petition to the House of Commons, in time for charges, as some were charged, in the courts.

5. The whole parade of this matter in the House and by the Conservative party is in pursuance of a plan and is characterized by such apparent want of good faith that we should not permit another dollar to be added to the thousands spent in a perfectly useless inquiry, an inquiry that must result in nothing as to finding out guilt or punishing it.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, the country will be greatly surprised, to-morrow, when the announcement is made in the public press that the government have seen fit to change the position they took last year in reference to the investigation of the frauds in Brockville and West Huron. The members of the Liberal party throughout the country who are hide-bound partisans will receive the statement with the greatest pleasure. That goes without saying. The Ontario government were reckless enough to court an investigation with reference to certain election frauds practised in that province; and last year when this government, very foolishly according to the opinion of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) and others, permitted an investigation to be allowed, they were reprimanded very strongly for having done so. There is one very striking feature in this debate and that is this—the Department of Justice is represented in this House by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), and the Solicitor General, doubtless realizing the weakness of the case and thinking of its many imperfections and the disadvantage under which he would labour, passed that load over to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). And partly by speaking and partly by reading arguments, whether prepared by himself or by somebody else, that hon. gentleman endeavoured to persuade himself that the government were right in taking the right-about-face action that they have taken to-day. Let me tell the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the government that the people of Canada are not concerned as to any fine points of law in reference to these inquiries. The people of Canada to-day are looking to the government and asking whether the sacred rights of the ballot are to be trampled under foot by organized force and fraud, and whether this is to be permitted for all time to come. I must pay some attention to the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton), who has just resumed his seat. He declared throughout his remarks that the reputations of certain men had been assailed in this connection; and before he sat down he saw fit to make the statement that the affidavits made by this man Pritchett had been secured by payment of a sum of money by Mr. Barker of Hamilton. I tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) that the statement that Mr. Barker had procured these affidavits by the payment of money is without one tittle of proof.

Mr. BRITTON. He stated it yesterday.

Mr. BENNETT. Where?

Mr. BRITTON. Before the commissioners.

Mr. BENNETT. I venture the statement that Pritchett never made such a statement and I deny what the hon. gentleman has said on that point. Two lines of defence have been adopted by the hon. gentleman. The first is that there should be no inquiry because this is a trivial and petty matter, and the second is that the Conservative party have been just as bad in the past. But the hon. gentleman must recollect that he and his friends on that side are political Pharisees. For years they have been telling the people that they were the Puritans, that if they were afforded an opportunity this country would see political morality such as it had never witnessed. This country has witnessed political morality! It has been dragged down to such degradation by heelers who have gone around headed by ministers of the Crown that we see to-day what we have never seen before. A church synod—I refer to the Presbyterian synod of Ontario—has felt it incumbent upon it to deplore the prevalence of corruption and these frauds that have been perpetrated throughout the country. I do not think the hon. member for Kingston can find in the 20 years of Conservative rule any case where a church organization felt called upon to place itself on record on account of infamous practices in connection with elections. What has been this chapter of crime—because it is the fullest chapter of crime known in Canada, not only on account of its villany but because it has been condoned by those who have the administration of criminal law in their hands? The hon. member for Kingston says: Why does not Pritchett prosecute these men? I tell the hon. gentleman, and the House knows it well, that, to-day, the administration of law in the province of Ontario is in the hands of the hon. gentleman's friends. They know that Pritchett has been in the country for the last two or three weeks, and why is he not prosecuted? They allow him to walk free the streets of St. Thomas. Why? Because he can involve men of his own stamp? Nothing of the kind, but because he can place men who are high in authority in this country in a position where they will be driven to go into the box and perjure themselves, as Lewis did the other day, or else admit the truth of their connection with that gang. Why is it that Pritchett, this man who charges himself openly with crime, why does not the criminal law of Ontario reach out and prosecute him? It is for the reason he has stated when he met Mr. Barker in the city of Detroit, and said: If the Conservatives won't prosecute me, I fear no prosecution from the Liberals. And so he is permitted to roam around the country, and the friends of the hon. gentlemen dare not prosecute him. Now, what started this whole carnival of corruption, commencing in the summer of 1896? Beaten in his own riding, the now Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) was forced to go to the riding of North Grey, and there for the first time was seen a spectacle of corruption, a carnival of crime, that has only been excelled in West Huron. Headed by the Postmaster General and the member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), a crowd of men invaded that riding. There was Cap. Sullivan, there was Lewis, and a whole lot of other members of the gang. And what was the result? A riding that had been Conservative for years was carried by the Liberals with a majority of over 450. Flushed with their success in that riding, the gang moved on to the next election which took place in Cornwall. Doctor Bergin had had a majority in that riding of 400, and that was changed by the gang into a majority on behalf of the present member of upwards of 500. It is true, the Conservatives believed that public opinion had changed, not by the means we know now that produced the result, but by means of a plentiful expenditure of money. What happened next? There were coming on three more elections, and the forces had to be divided. There was an election in North Ontario, and one in East Simcoe, and one in South Brant. The Postmaster

General and the member for North Oxford parted company. Part of the gang was brought up by the Postmaster General into the riding of East Simcoe, and part of the gang was taken down to the riding of South Brant. As a result of its operation Mr. Henry was defeated in South Brant. But the returning officer in East Simcoe, so far as my knowledge goes, was an estimable gentleman, and when I asked him for the names of the deputies who were to be appointed, and he told me, I said to him, flatly and fairly: 'Mr. Miller, if you permit those men to act as deputies I will hold you responsible for any frauds that occur.' And he, having a reputation to sustain, secured another list of names who were substituted. Well, what took place in that riding? There was a man named Hanna employed by the Grand Trunk Railway to pass up and down and see if the conductors indulged in stealing, and this man was brought into the riding to go from one end to the other, and there in the town of Orillia he was found closeted with a certain Minister of the Crown. Sir, the statement that I make here to-night I have made outside of this House, and I shall continue making it, and I have afforded this man Hanna every opportunity to bring me into court to prove the truth or falsity of that statement—I state that he was found closeted with a Minister of the Crown, and that Minister was the Postmaster General.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman's statement is absolutely without foundation.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman says the statement that he was closeted with this man Hanna is without foundation. At the nomination in West Huron I made the statement publicly on the platform, and there defied the Postmaster General, as I defy him now, and as I defy Hanna, to bring me into court and I will prove the truth of my statement by credible witnesses.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is an absolute falsehood.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, the public will judge whether a man will rest under a falsehood if he is able to clear himself. I know that in the riding of East Simcoe the people believe that Hanna was closeted with the Postmaster General, and no power can make them think otherwise. Now, what happened next? A series of local elections then came on. The election of the Hon. John Dryden was contested, and a by-election followed in the riding of South Ontario. But before I leave that subject, let me say that a minister himself told me in the corridor that if I did not keep quiet in making these attacks on certain ministers the machine would be turned into the riding of East Simcoe. Well, I invite the machine into the riding of East Simcoe, and they will meet with a worse defeat than they have ever suffered yet. What happened next? As a consequence of fraud certain by-elections were going on in the province of Ontario for the local House. It was thought absolutely necessary that improper means should be resorted to to win South Ontario. In North Waterloo and other ridings the same gang that took part in the West Huron and Brockville elections were to be found in force and activity. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite complain that the statement of this man Pritchett is untrue. Well, why don't they prosecute Pritchett if his statement is untrue? And who is the man that says that Pritchett is not to be believed? It is Mr. Thomas Lewis, the man concerning whom the following evidence was given in the witness box on the occasion of the trial of the North Waterloo election. Mr. A. R. Shantz deposed in substance the following:

Lewis sat down and proceeded to tell me what was to take place. He said they proposed to pay $5 apiece for every ballot spoiled or switched. He took a piece of paper and put a piece of lead under his thumb, and showed us how to pick the ballot up so that when seen it was a spoiled ballot. He showed me how to switch the ballots also, and said they would be worth the same. He said he should get all in the room to handle the ballots, so then all might be said to have a hand in what was done if there was any trouble. He said he would not pay any more than twenty, so that $100 was the limit a man might make in this way. Lewis said we would be protected from trouble, that they would protect us. I asked Lewis as to what would be done if there was a recount. He said it would be fixed up so that it would come out the same, and that he would have too large a majority, anyway, for a recount.

Yet this Lewis is the worthy creature of whom Chief Justice Meredith said on the bench, in reference to the same case, that no reliability was to be attached to his statements. And because Lewis says that what Pritchett has deposed to is untrue we are asked to believe that all the statements made by Pritchett are untrue. Now, this is what Chief Justice Meredith said in reference to Lewis in the North Waterloo case:

That the witness Lewis was a party to it is also established—notwithstanding his denial by oath—by an overwhelming weight in quality as well as quantity of evidence. After hearing his own evidence one is not surprised to hear of his being engaged in bribery and other corrupt practices.

Pritchett, all through this affidavit, says that whenever he went into West Huron the first man he met was Mr. Alexander Smith, the Liberal organizer, and that Mr. Smith at once introduced him to certain men to whom he gave certain instructions. The member for Kingston and hon. gentlemen opposite say that they want the truth to come out. If they want the truth to come out why don't they bring these men face to face with Pritchett? Does any man believe the statement of Cummings, the deputy returning officer, in the evidence he gave in that case? Here is a man who swears that the poll was held in a building that was rarely used, in which men were expectorating, and where he expectorated himself, the floor was covered with tobacco juice, and the statement he makes is this: 'I placed these counterfoils in my pocket, because I did not wish to litter the floor.' And the guileless member for Kingston stated in his remarks that that was a very frequent habit. I challenge the member for Kingston or any other man to say that he ever saw a deputy placing these counterfoils in his pocket. What follows next? When Cummings is asked, he says: I took the counterfoils home and burned them. Why, in the name of common sense, did you not burn them in the stove in the ballot booth? He said: Because there was no fire in the stove, and before the words were cold upon his lips he admitted that it was in the middle of February, that it was a cold day, and that there was a fire in the stove. This is the guileless Mr. Cummings, by whose actions he is to be judged rather than by his oath. In addition to the circumstances of suspicion attached to him, we have the statement made by Pritchett that he had instructed him in the art of stealing ballots. If Mr. Cummings is the innocent that the hon. member for Kingston tries to persuade this House that he is, why is not Cummings brought here and confronted by Pritchett? You can have Pritchett here at any time you like. He is defying you, he is defying the provincial authorities, he is daring them to bring him face to face with these people, but the ministers are afraid to confront Pritchett. The hon. member for Kingston says: Here are a dozen reputable men, who were selected by the returning officer in Brockville, because they were all reputable and honest men. If they are reputable and honest men and friends of these hon. gentlemen, because they are, why does not the Prime Minister say, now, that having the evidence of Pritchett before us, we will summon these twelve or fifteen deputy returning officers, confront them with Pritchett, and prove whether they are guilty or not. Why are not all these men Boull, Jones, Nealson, Kelly, Robinson, Cowan, Upham, King, Smith and Truesdale confronted by Pritchett? These are the men that they say are reputable men, one a practising barrister in Brockville, and another a bookkeeper for the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Comstock). Why does not the hon. member for Brockville insist upon his bookkeeper being brought here? The hon. member for Brockville is a man of means. If, as the hon. member for Kingston says, the country has suffered too much already, I think if the hon. member for Brockville has any regard for his bookkeeper, or any regard for his own reputation, he should be willing to bear the cost of an investigation, and have Pritchett meet his bookkeeper face to face. These hon. gentlemen think they can brazen the matter out. They think that because they have a servile majority behind them, it is the voice of the country. I can tell them that they will find that it is not the voice of the country. They will find that the voice of the country will make itself heard at the right time; they will find what Mr. Hardy found in Ontario in the two ridings of Elgin. Mr. Hardy brazened it out as long as he could, and then he gave way to that archbrazen, Mr. Ross. Mr. Hardy withdrew from the public gaze of a public position, and when the Ontario government were reckless enough to allow an investigation into West Elgin, these hon. gentlemen began to abuse Pritchett. What is the press saying to-day about the farce that is going on in Ontario? These three judges and the counsel who are prosecuting that matter permit the press of Ontario to deride them, to scoff at them, and to treat them with the most utter contempt. These judges are afraid to attempt to move a hand to prosecute the proprietors of these newspapers for contempt of court, because it would be contempt of court of a most aggravated kind if their statements were not true, and it is not contempt of court if they are true. What does the St. Thomas Times say:

Counsel of the same political stripe as the scoundrels who committed the crimes are given charge of the case, one of them a man who had been previously engaged in concealing these very frauds.

The reference is to Mr. R. A. Grant, a practising lawyer of Toronto, who is associated with Mr. Watson in prosecuting these crimes. As Mr. Whitney said on the floor of the Ontario legislature: If we are allowed to appear by counsel, and if the investigation is made full and fair, we will place Mr. Grant in the category of the criminals. Yet, this same Mr. Grant is one of the prosecuting attorneys:

The commissioners refuse to permit them to do so. No one but the counsel whose party's interest it is to conceal the frauds and the former counsel of the men responsible for them can get the ear of the commission. . . . A direct encouragement to these men to do so. They are exempt from cross-examination. They are exempt from contradiction by other witnesses. For no adverse interest is allowed to be represented. . . . More than this, the prosecutors, by sneering at, browbeating and abusing those who confess to doing wrong, hangs a threat over witnesses who do not swear themselves clear. Pritchett is an example. Whatever his character or crimes (and he was once prominent in his party), he has been roughly and unfairly dealt with by the commission, in such a way as to discourage disclosure of the frauds the commission is supposed to be here to investigate. . . . The slick Tom Lewis, who was reported in North Waterloo, and whom the High Court judges then said they could not believe on oath, and others of his ilk, who 'can lie as deftly as a Russian diplomat,' are handled almost, as has been said, 'with all the solicitude of a Sunday school teacher.' They tell a smooth story, exculpate themselves, are patted on the back and go free.

That is the style of a commission that is going on in Ontario, and then these hon. gentlemen who have charge of that commission abuse Mr. Pritchett. Judged apparently from the tone of the public press, they would not permit Pritchett to say anything. We know that money was paid to the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite in order to get them out of the country. We know that after that scoundrelly Goderich election, Linklater was paid to get out of the country, and yet, hon. gentlemen think that they can brazen out this thing. But, the climax in this West Huron election was reached when we heard the pious and worthy Mr. Preston say that he brought into the riding Cap Sullivan, Macdonald and others because he knew they were men who would ever frown down anything wrong. Well, the public will have to take Mr. Preston at his word, and the public will have to take Pritchett at his word. This pious and unctuous Preston was so disgusted at the idea of anything wrong and improper, he said that it was such a rude shock that he would be some time before he would recover. What does Pritchett say of Mr. Preston in regard to the South Ontario election, when Mr. Dryden was unseated?

Monday, the day before the election, Mr. W. T. R. Preston arrived at Oshawa. He told me he had come from Whitby. I had seen him at the nomination, and we knew each other when we met at Oshawa. Jack Brant and he had driven over from Whitby. As I stood in the hall at the foot of the stairs Preston said to me: I want you to go down to Whitby. I want some help there to-night. I said I would go. That evening I drove to Whitby and met Preston in his room at the Commercial Hotel. Brant was in the room. He had gone up either with me or just before me. Preston said: 'I will be ready for you in a minute.' Brant and I went into a room near by. In a few minutes Preston came into that room, and handed me $50 in $2 bills. He said nothing and went out again.

All through this affidavit in reference to West Huron, Pritchett does as he did in these other cases. He names a number of these men who he instructed in the art of stealing and switching ballots. The public believe that such a carnival of crime and corruption has never been carried on in this country, and it is no wonder that church conferences have been so far driven as to remark the prevalence of this sort of crime in the country. Who is going to put down crime in Ontario? The Ontario government, who are the administrators of the law will not put down crime. Why? Because I do not believe that such men as Smith, Preston, Threlkeld and Vance are going to perjure themselves, and if they do not perjure themselves they are going to tell the truth of their wrong-doing. These men are going to be driven into this position, that they will have to explain where they got the money spent in these elections, and how it came to be used in this wrong-doing. The result of it all would be, that it would link together such a chain of crime that Mr. Pritchett can afford to proclaim himself the biggest scoundrel in Ontario, and yet the innocent Ontario government says: 'We like to encourage this kind of thing in the country, so you can walk about a free man, Mr. Pritchett. These gentlemen opposite are afraid to bring these Brockville deputy returning officers to confront them with Pritchett. They are afraid to put them on their oath, before a committee of this House, and why? It is because some of them, at least, may tell the truth, and it is the truth that this government wishes to avoid. What an illogical and ridiculous position does the government occupy in this. Last year when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden), said that he believed that he could prove certain things on the information given him, the Prime Minister at once replied: We court and invite an inquiry; you can have it. The inquiry went on. I will not say a word about the mode in which that inquiry was conducted. Of that the public can judge for themselves, and they have judged. This year the member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), comes forward, and he is balked in every way, and denied an inquiry. If the government with a majority at their backs were anxious for an inquiry, it was theirs to say on the very first day of the session, that there must be an inquiry, and the inquiry would commence. If, on the other hand, it was the wish of the government that there should be no inquiry, as we now know it to be the fact, then it was the policy of the government to take the course they have taken to-day. Last year, on the bald statement of the member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), that he believed the evidence in his possession was true, the Prime Minister was pleased to grant an investigation. This year, with sworn testimony of accumulative crime in West Huron, and the Premier says through his minister (Sir Louis Davies): 'There shall be no inquiry.' Last year with hardly any evidence at all, in the case of Brockville—and although the Prime Minister said the Brockville case was weak, he held there should be an investigation. But what does the Prime Minister say to-day? There are the names of a dozen men, political friends of his own; there are the names of a dozen men who supported the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Comstock); there is the name of his own bookkeeper, charged with crimes, dark and black, and the hon. member for Brockville does not call on this government to give his bookkeeper an opportunity to prove himself innocent. What is the reason of that? It must be one of two things. Either the member for Brockville and his friends know the guilt of these men, or else, they are afraid these men will tell the truth. The hon. gentleman from Brockville (Mr. Comstock), knows that for the past six months, citizens of that town have been across the line in the United States, afraid to return home for fear of criminal prosecutions.

These gentlemen opposite say: Why do you not prosecute these men criminally? Forsooth, prosecute them criminally for political crimes in the province of Ontario? That newspaper proves what a farcical proceeding that would be. Give these prosecutions into the hands of men who scoff at the law, who make a football of law and justice in the province of Ontario, what a farce that is? And yet the government are driven to this position, that the public believe to-day that they are afraid to prosecute these men for fear some of them might tell the truth. Where is the government going to stand?

Mr. COCHRANE. They are going to fall.

Mr. BENNETT. Where is their majority in this House that was always prepared to applaud them? I have seen gentlemen opposite applaud everything the government did; applaud the Yukon deal, applaud the Drummond County deal, and to-night these applauders and clacquers are not in the House, but are transferred to government positions. Yes, more than that. If the Liberal members were in their seats, there are twenty men on that side of the House whose names in the public press and throughout the country are associated with government positions to come. There is the member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), who gets up to justify this conduct of the government, and his own paper has named him for a government position.

Mr. BRITTON. That is the old story.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, if the Kingston Whig will persist in saying that he is to get a judgeship, I cannot stop that paper. And, when the member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), endeavours to bolster up the government in this, or in any other dark proceeding, then he must be prepared to take the hard knocks that are in politics, for let me tell him that politics are not five o'clock tea parties by any means. Time will tell whether the Kingston Whig is right when it says that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton), will either get a Superior Court judgeship, or a senatorship.

Mr. COCHRANE. Which will you have?

Mr. BENNETT. Speaking for myself, I regret sincerely, that the government should take this stand. I do not believe that human nature is as dark and evil throughout as it is in the case of Preston, as it is in the case of Pritchett, as it is in the case of Lewis and the others. I believe that these men who were recommended in Brockville, as respectable men to take charge of polls; I believe that while these men were led to commit the crimes Pritchett says they did commit, still they are not so black and perjured in their souls as to take false oaths, in order to defend gentlemen opposite. I believe that some of them at least would tell the truth, and it is because the government fear that, and for that reason alone, that they are afraid to take these men from Brockville, to confront them with Pritchett, and to prove the truth or falsity of his statement. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing more to say, beyond this: If there was reason last year, in the opinion of the government, to merit an investigation, how much stronger are not these reasons to-day? There must, in a short while, be an appeal to the grand inquest of the nation; the people of this Dominion, and if the people of this Dominion are prepared to encourage this sort of wrongdoing; if they are prepared to say that the sacred rights of the ballot—and it is a sacred right of free men—are to be trampled under foot by an organized gang of scoundrels whose villanies are condoned by the government, then I can only say: God help the country that is under the power of an organized mob such as that whose dark deeds have been brought to light in connection with the West Huron and Brockville elections.

Mr. RUSSELL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It is rather early to adjourn at this period of the session, but I hope hon. gentlemen will not object. My hon. friend is not in very good health this evening.

Some hon. MEMBERS. All right.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. What business to-morrow?

The PRIME MINISTER. There is only one business that is to be disposed of. We want to clear that off the record, and then proceed to business.

THE FOX BAY SETTLERS.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). Before the House adjourns, I wish to read an article which appears in the Montreal Witness to-night, and to ask the Premier if the statements therein contained are true. The article is as follows:

Quebec, May 15.—Several of the French papers here publish the following letter, alleged to have come from Ottawa: 'Probably disagreeable news is expected here from Anticosti in a few days. The famous settlers on the island (Fox Bay), who were to have left last September, are still there and showing no sign or willingness to leave, notwithstanding the judgments, the agreements entered into and the offers of the Federal government, which offered them lands, transportation and provisions. The settlers do not want these. What they want is money. The case is one of regular blackmail. They further ask to be allowed to remain on the island until next September. The same dilly-dallying farce that has been going on for two years is still being played. But Mr. Menier wants an end put to it. Mr. Commettant, governor of the island, and Mr. Martin, Mr. Menier's agent, left Rimouski last week with the Rev. Dr. Griffiths, commissioned by Sir Wilfrid Laurier to try and settle the difficulty, and are going to make a fresh effort of persuasion to get these people out. The government has placed at their disposal the federal cruiser 'Constance.' If this fails, force must be resorted to. As already stated, the news from Anticosti is anxiously awaited here.

I would like to know from the Prime Minister if the statements made there are correct, or if he has any knowledge of them?

The PRIME MINISTER. What statements? There are so many there that I would like to know from my hon. friend what information he wants from me.

Mr. WALLACE. What about the cruiser Constance?

The PRIME MINISTER. The cruiser Constance is not at the service of Mr. Menier. Mr. Menier has his own boat, I understand.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is the cruiser Constance carrying Dr. Griffith or Mr. Menier's agent, Mr. Martin, at the instance of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as stated here?

The PRIME MINISTER. No, it is not so. I have not been asked to provide for Dr. Griffith, who is a reverend gentleman who takes an interest in the settlers. It is quite probable that he has been taken on board the Constance, which cruises in that district every year. With regard to the settlement of this matter, I have no objection to state what I know. Mr. Menier has obtained a judgment and conviction against the men known as the Fox Bay settlers. The hon. gentleman brought the matter to the attention of the House in the early part of the session. He knows that we have taken some interest in those people. We have offered to give them lands in the North-west Territories wherever they choose to have them, and I understand that they have selected a block of land on the shore of either Lake Winnipeg or Lake Winnipegosis—I am not sure which at this moment; and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at my instance has agreed to carry them to their destination. I suppose there will be no objection raised by the supporters of the government if we transfer them from Anticosti to the Pacific Railway station at Quebec. We are ready to do that at any time they ask us to do so. They have asked a respite from Mr. Menier, the proprietor of the island, for a few months, until midsummer or the month of August, to carry out the judgment, and Mr. Menier, I am informed, has refused to grant it. That is all I know of the matter at the present time.

Mr. TAYLOR.

THE CANADIAN EXHIBIT AT PARIS.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). Before the adjournment, I would like to have the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) tell us briefly if he can, in what condition is the Canadian exhibit at Paris, particularly the cold storage part of it. I think Professor Robertson went away at short notice owing to some trouble in connection therewith.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I am very glad to give the hon. gentleman the information he desires. The reports which I have from the Chief Commissioner in Paris, my colleague, Mr. Tarte, are that the Canadian exhibit is in an advanced stage of preparation—that it is practically the most advanced of any exhibit at the exhibition, with the exception, possibly, of the German exhibit, which I understand is a little more advanced than ours. With regard to the cold storage exhibit, there was a mistake made by the contractor for the building in carrying out the instructions sent from here. The result was that the architect in charge under the Imperial commission did not see his way to make the changes necessary to carry out our views, fearing that they would entail considerable expense. After several communications by cable, I thought it best for Mr. Robertson to go over and see if he could arrange to harmonize the actual construction with his plans for a proper exhibit. He has reported to me since his arrival that he has succeeded in doing that, and that the cold storage arrangements are very nearly if not quite completed. I received a letter from him yesterday, in which he stated that he hoped in about a week or ten days that they would be completed, and that without much expense.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the cost of the buildings?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I cannot give the hon. gentleman the cost of the buildings off-hand. I gave it to the House the other day when asked a question formally on the paper. I might say that the commissioners inform me that the arrangements for the completion of our exhibit are progressing rapidly, and that the comment on such of our exhibits as are placed is very favourable, and they are extremely pleased with the appearance those exhibits are making.

Mr. FOSTER. It might not be out of place to ask the Prime Minister if he can give the House any information as to the time when the absent Minister of Public Works and the absent Minister of the Interior will be in their places in the House. We are coming very close to the time when their estimates must be considered, and when questions of some gravity and importance affecting their departments will be put. Is there any possibility that we shall have the light of their countenances with us before we get through with that operation?

The PRIME MINISTER. If my hon. friend is very anxious to have the rules of the House observed, he should commence by observing them himself, and he should remember that on a motion to adjourn only one subject can be discussed. I cannot tell him when the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of the Interior will be back here.

Mr. FOSTER. Can the Minister of Agriculture tell us yet whether any decision has been made with reference to the Sunday closing of the exhibition?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have received no further information, though I have sent a communication with regard to the subject.

REPORT.

All the other questions have already been answered, and the answers will be found in Hansard of March 12.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—REWARDS TO CANADIAN VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. GUILLET (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

1. What substantial inducements are likely to be offered to our volunteers in South Africa to settle in that country at the close of the war ?

2. Is it the intention of the government to ask parliament to make provision for granting a tract of land to each Canadian volunteer serving in South Africa who returns to Canada after the termination of the war ?

3. Is it not of public importance that an affirmative answer should be given at once that all concerned may be promptly advised ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. The government has no intimation on this subject. 2. This is a matter which should not be considered during the war, but afterwards. 3. The same answer applies to this question.

YUKON—CLEARANCE OF STEAMSHIP YUKONER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

Did the firm of F. C. Wade (Messrs. Wade & Aikman), on July 10, 1899, request D. W. Davis, collector of customs at Dawson, to refuse clearance of the ss. 'Yukoner' until the wages of the crew were paid ?

2. Did the collector of customs clear the ss. 'Yukoner' and afterwards, at the request of Mr. F. C. Wade, detain the said vessel ? If yes, what are the respective dates of clearance and detention ?

3. If yes, in what capacity did Mr. Davis act in clearing the said vessel, and in what capacity did he act in detaining her after clearance ?

4. If Mr. Davis detained the said vessel after clearance granted, under what statute and section thereof or under what authority did he act ?

5. Did Mr. Davis, in connection with the claim against said vessel, allow the firm of F. C. Wade (Messrs. Wade & Aikman) the sum of $750 for legal services rendered to the master in the prosecution of the crew of the 'Yukoner,' notwithstanding the solicitors or the owners of the vessel had declined to prosecute under the facts alleged ?

6. Did the collector of customs at Dawson receive in his official capacity a cheque for $5,099.45 from the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner' ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

after tying up the ship subsequent to her first clearance ?

7. Did the owners of the 'Yukoner' request an accounting and return of the said sum, or at all events that it be paid into the court of the district pending the determination by the proper court of the question in dispute between the vessel-owners and the master and mate of the said vessel ?

8. Did the Department of Customs obtain any opinion or advice on the subject from the Department of Justice ?

9. Did the Department of Customs, on the 16th December, 1899, request Mr. Davis, 'in view of the opinion from the Department of Justice,' to arrange a settlement with the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner' ?

10. Did the opinion from the Department of Justice, if any, refer to Mr. Davis's conduct as 'high-handed and improper' ?

11. In reporting to the Department of Customs, did Mr. Davis say he was 'submitting to all these details without prejudice,' and did he comply with the advice of the Department of Justice as above in question 9 ?

12. After communicating the report of this public officer to the solicitors of the ss. 'Yukoner,' did the Customs Department of Canada write to the solicitors on April 21, 1900, and say : 'This information as received from Mr. Davis, together with a copy of further statements submitted by him in relation to this matter, has been furnished to you (without prejudice) ?

13. Does the Department of Customs, or the Crown represented by the Canadian government, admit that it is accountable to the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner' for disposal of the proceeds of a cheque made payable to the collector of customs at Dawson for the sum of $5,099.45 in connection with the ss. 'Yukoner' ?

14. Has the Department of Customs declined to account for the money in question ?

15. Has the Department of Customs left the owners of the ss. 'Yukoner' to its remedy against the collector of customs personally in connection with the receipt of the said $5,099.45 and repudiated all responsibility for his conduct in regard thereto ?

16. Has the Honourable the Minister of Customs declined to produce for the information of parliament the opinion of the Department of Justice referred to in question 9 ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I would say that I hope to be able to lay on the Table of the House in a short time such documents as I properly can in connection with this matter ; and I think the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will consent to let the question drop and seek the information he wants in the papers so to be brought down. If he finds that there is anything not covered in that way that I can properly answer, I will answer it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) when he expects to lay the papers on the Table ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think it can be done to-morrow—at any rate, at an early day.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Very well, the question drops.

STANDARD OIL COMPANY AND THE PRICE OF OIL.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether the Finance Minister is aware that last January the Standard Oil Company declared a quarterly dividend of 20 per cent upon its capital stock, that it has now declared a dividend of 10 per cent for the three months ending May 1st, thus making a dividend of 30 per cent for the past six months? The capital stock of the company is $100,000,000; is not the amount already paid out in dividends this year, $30,000,000? This is now nearly $5,000,000 more than the total customs receipts of the Dominion for the last fiscal year. Does the government intend to take measures this session to curtail the Standard Oil Company's power of extorting exorbitant prices out of the pockets of the Canadian consumer of oil?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I question whether the hon. gentleman's inquiry comes within the rules. But, waiving that, I beg to answer as follows: 1. I have no information respecting the affairs of the Standard Oil Company. 2. There has been no legislation under the present government which would assist that company in charging exorbitant prices. Every step taken by the present government, either with respect to legislation or to departmental administration, has been in the direction of removing restrictions and lessening the price of oil. 3. The duty on imported oil, which existed under the late government, has been reduced. 4. Burdensome regulations existing under the late government, with respect to inspection of oil, which could only take place after it had been put in barrels, have been abolished, thus facilitating cheap and convenient methods of handling the oil. 5. The number of points at which oil can be imported in bulk, in tank cars, has been increased. 6. Permission has been given to use tank wagons. 7. The former regulation forbidding the use of tank ships, has been repealed, thus giving along the line of our water communications the opportunity to receive oil by cheap transportation. 8. Where railway companies increased their freight rates on oil in such a manner as seemed likely to prevent competition in the oil trade, the government, on the advice of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, disallowed the increase and ordered the restoration of the former rates. In short, every step taken by the present government in relation to the oil business has been for the purpose of removing burdensome restrictions, reducing the cost of handling oil and cheapening the article to the consumer. If the price of oil has recently increased to the consumer, and larger profits are being realized by the manufacturers, either in the United States or Canada, such enhanced profits are not due to any measure of the government, but must be due to other causes for which the government are not in the smallest degree responsible.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. minister (Mr. Fielding) make that perfect by comparing the price of oil in 1896 and now?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) might as well ask me to compare the prices of anything else in 1896 and now. The prices of many things have increased since 1896. This is the growing time.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) has omitted to state how much each farmer uses.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. A great many things might be said about the oil business, but we have given a large amount of information in the answer submitted.

YUKON—DREDGING LEASES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. Referring to application of William L. Parrish per A. E. Philp, June 13, 1898, for a dredging lease for that part of Teslin River (Hootalinqua) commencing at the upper boundary of reference application No. 54,299, thence up stream a distance of thirty miles, (now on the Table of this House) :

(a) Whose application was No. 54,299 and what is the description of area contained in it? What is the correct description of that part commencing at the upper boundary of reference application No. 54,299, thence up stream as above?

(b) How many options for a lease up stream as above, if any, were given on the area referred to in paragraph 1 above, to whom were they given and at what date, respectively?

(j) Referring to Mr. Philp's letter to Mr. Sifton, 9th April, 1898, what is meant by mistake in marking the location of leases on Teslin River issued to Ildo Ramsdell, of Chicago? Whose mistake was it? Did the leases not follow the description in the application? If not, why not?

(k) Who, if any one, directly authorized G. U. Ryley to send the following telegram :

April 12, 1898.

A. E. Philp, Esq.,
Care of Foster & Hewitt,
250 Dearborn Street,
Chicago, U.S.A.

Ten miles on Teslin, beginning eighty miles from mouth, thence up river, will be granted upon receipt of plan you showed me and the lease.

(Sgd.) G. U. RYLEY.

(l) Referring to letter of B. D. Adsil, Chicago, May 14, 1898, saying: 'In February we purchased of Mr. A. E. Philp, of Brandon, Manitoba, two five-mile dredging leases in Teslin River, to be located from fifty to sixty miles from the mouth of said stream'; had Mr. Philp any lease or leases at this date?

(m) If the answer to (e) be in the affirmative, in what localities had Mr. Philp leases?

(n) In February, 1898, how many options for leases, if any, had Mr. Philp procured from the department, either in his own name or that of Parrish, Lindsay, Mitchell, Burnett, Hearn and others?

(o) If Mr. Philp in February, or later, held as attorney for others, or in his own name, options for leases, how many, and which were they, were followed by leases actually delivered?

(p) What connection had Dr. J. W. Forbes with the leases on Teslin River covered by the application in paragraph 1, or leases granted in this connection?

(q) Referring to Mr. Adsil's letter to the Department of the Interior, March 19, 1898, 'Dr. Forbes visited your department with Mr. Philp when Mr. Philp was last in Ottawa'; whom did these gentlemen see on the subject-matter referred to? Did they concur with the Minister of the Interior? Is there a record of their visit and the subject of it in the department?

(r) What is the date of application upon which leases No. 269 and 270 issued to W. L. Parrish for 10 miles of the Teslin?

(s) Have all the regulations and terms of the leases been complied with, in connection with these leases, since they have been granted?

(t) Have registration fees referred to in letter of August 8 and 17, 1899, been paid? If so, when?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. (a) 1. Frank Burnett. 2. That part of the Teslin River, commencing at the upper boundary of application reference number 54,079, and from thence extending up stream a distance of thirty miles. 3. Commencing at a point in the centre of the Teslin (or Hootalinqua) River, ninety miles above its mouth, thence up stream in the centre of the said Teslin (or Hootalinqua) River, following the sinuosities of the same, a distance of thirty miles. (b) W. L. Parrish, 100 to 200 miles, January 22, 1898; Geo. Edwards, 90 to 100 miles, January 22, 1898; E. H. Smith, 100 to 110 miles, March 12, 1898; J. E. Adams, 110 to 120 miles, May 17, 1898; A. E. Mortimer, 100 to 110 miles, May 27, 1898; F. A. Philp, 100 to 120 miles, June 24, 1898; F. B. Jamieson, 100 to 110 miles, October 11, 1898; R. G. St. John, 90 to 100 miles, May 19, 1899; H. W. Thomas, 90 to 120 miles, January 16, 1900. Each option lapsed before succeeding one for same tract was offered. (c) Frank Burnett, 60 to 90 miles, January 22, 1898; E. H. Smith, 85 to 90 miles, March 12, 1898;

John Dunlop, 65 to 85 miles, March 12, 1898; Geo. Sutherland, 60 to 65 miles, March 8, 1898; Frank Burnett, 60 to 80 miles, April 9, 1898; W. L. Parrish, 80 to 90 miles, April 12, 1898; W. L. Parrish, 60 to 70 miles, May 12, 1898; A. E. Mortimer, 70 to 90 miles, May 27, 1898; R. T. Smith, 80 to 90 miles, June 25, 1898; F. L. Owen, 70 to 80 miles, June 25, 1898; Frank Burnett, 70 to 80 miles, July 12, 1898; G. M. B. Vrooman, 70 to 90 miles, October 12, 1898; R. G. St. John, 70 to 90 miles, May 19, 1899; D. C. Catlin, 70 to 75 miles, January 13, 1900; C. S. Sargent, 75 to 90 miles, April 3, 1900. Each option lapsed before succeeding one for same tract was offered. (d) W. L. Parrish, 110 to 120 miles, March 8, 1898; Geo. Edwards, 90 to 100 miles, March 8, 1898. (e) W. L. Parrish, 60 to 70 miles, March 8, 1898; D. C. Catlin, 70 to 75 miles, January 19, 1900. (f) The cheque was marked good and forwarded by the Bank of Montreal. The name of the maker of the cheque was not recorded. (g) The descriptions were prepared by the Department of the Interior. (h) Yes. (i) Answered by (h). (j) The department has no information as to what was meant by Mr. Philp in saying that a mistake was made further than Mr. Philp's statement, that Mr. Ramsdell expected he was getting a location at a point lower down the river. It was suggested at first that it might have been a mistake of a clerk in locating on the plan, but this was found not to be the case. It was not the mistake of the department. The description in the leases, although not worded the same as the description in the application, covered the same stretch. (k) Authorized by the minister on the recommendation of the chief clerk of the timber and mines branch. (l) Mr. Philp had no lease or leases on the Teslin River at that date. (m) None, but Mr. Parrish's application was made through Mr. Philp.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In answer to (m), do I understand the minister to say that none of the applications, except that for Parrish, was made through Philp?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I call particular attention to that for further inquiry. The return shows that all these applications were made by Philp.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This is the answer made by the department, I will inquire. I think there are different applications.

—(n) 30 miles on Stewart River, W. J. Lindsay; 30 miles on Stewart River, P. C. Mitchell; 30 miles on Klondike River, A. E. Philp; 30 miles on Teslin River, Frank Burnett; 30 miles on Teslin River, W. L. Parrish; 30 miles on Bonanza River, A. E. Philp. None in the name of Hearn. (o) 20 miles on Stewart River, P. C. Mitchell; 20 miles on Klondike River, A. E. Philp; 20 miles on Teslin River, W. L. Parrish. (p) No connection further than shown by the correspondence included in the return to the House, and his own statement when at the department, that he was interested in the matter. (q) 1. They saw the chief clerk of the timber and mines branch. 2. They probably did, although there is nothing to show it in the records. 3. There is no record of their visit, other than contained in the names included in the return to the House. (r) April 9, 1898, but the leases were dated back to the date of those for which they were substituted. (s) None of the provisions of the regulations have been complied with, except payment of first year's rent. (t) No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would ask the hon. the minister, if he would be good enough to allow subsection (m) to stand, so that instead of my putting the question again, the hon. gentleman may refer to his officers, so as to make that matter absolutely certain. I am not referring merely to the description in the first part of it, but generally to the applications of Parrish, Mitchell, Lindsay and others in the return. They are not the same area, but they all appear in that return to be per A. E. Philp. With the consent of the minister, I would ask that the subsection stand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think it would be more satisfactory to the hon. gentleman and to the House, if he would write me a memorandum, and I will be glad to bring down the information to-morrow.

LEPERS IN TRACADIE LAZARETTO.

Mr. PRIOR (by Mr. Earle) asked :

1. How many patients are there at present in the Tracadie Lazaretto ?
2. Are they all from the province of New Brunswick; if not, how many are from that province, and how many from each of the other provinces of the Dominion ?
3. When were those, if any, from Nova Scotia and Manitoba admitted to the lazaretto ?
4. What means of transportation were employed in taking these lepers, if any, to the lazaretto ?
5. Is the hon. the Minister of Agriculture aware whether there are any lepers in British Columbia or not ?
6. Has the hon. gentleman ever been requested to take any lepers from British Columbia to Tracadie, or to assume the cost of their maintenance in British Columbia ?
7. Has the hon. gentleman ever refused to do so ? If so, for what reason ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). 1. Nineteen. 2. Fourteen from the province of New Brunswick, one from Prince Edward Island, three from Manitoba (disease contracted in Iceland), one from Nova Scotia. 3. Manitoba cases admitted, two, (three originally, one since dead), on April 15, 1897, and one on July 25, 1897. The Nova Scotia case admitted July 12, 1899. 4. In April, 1897, the lepers from Manitoba being in the contagious stage, were transported in a special car, which was subsequently disinfected under Dr. Smith's superintendence. For other cases that had not reached the contagious stage, such arrangements were not necessary. 5. The minister was officially informed of the presence of lepers in the lazaretto at D'Arcy Island, B.C., late in the autumn of 1897. 6. No. 7. Yes. By an amendment of the Quarantine Act in 1872, the clauses relating to public health, which gave the Department of Agriculture administrative powers, under statutory direction, in cases of outbreaks of sickness in the provinces, were eliminated and the administration in all such matters thereby relegated to the provincial governments. It was explained to parliament that such was the object of the elimination. By order in council dated February 7, 1898, the Dominion government, therefore, declined to assume charge of the care of the lepers on D'Arcy Island.

IMPORTS OF WAGONS AND CARRIAGES INTO P. E. I.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

The number of wagons and carriages entered at the ports of Alberton and Tignish, in Prince Edward Island, for the fiscal years 1897-8-9 ? To include buggies, farm wagons and bicycles. The value of each and the amount of duty paid ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). It is impossible for the department to furnish the information required by this question at present, for the reason that Alberton and Tignish are only outports of customs, and our statistical returns do not give the value of importations of outports separately—such importations being included in the returns of the chief ports having survey over the outports. To obtain the information, it will be necessary to write to the port of Summerside, which has survey over the outports of Alberton and Tignish, for a special statement. This will be done at once.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—PAYMENTS TO SS. LINES FOR TRANSPORTING SECOND CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

Mr. CLARKE asked :

1. What has the government paid, and what is it liable to pay, to the Allan Line and to the Elder-Dempster Line respectively for the provisioning of the second Canadian contingent for South Africa ?
2. What sum for (a) each officer, (b) each non-commissioned officer, (c) each man, and (d) each horse, has the government so paid or become liable to pay ?

3. What provisions and supplies did each such steamship line so provide for such purpose, and at what price?

4. From what persons or firms were the respective provisions and supplies in each instance purchased by each steamship line, and in what quantities and at what prices in each instance?

5. Did the government or the Department of Militia, or any person on its behalf, in any instances suggest or name to such steamship lines the person or firms from whom such supplies or provisions should be so purchased?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). It is impossible to give separately, at present, the cost of the provisions. However, I can state to the hon. gentleman, that the government has paid to the Allan Line, on account of the second contingent, $140,573.60; and to the Elder-Dempster Line, $175,987.29. This includes the charge for tonnage, as explained in my answer the other day, namely, 20s. per ton for a month, and the cost of fittings, coaling and provisions. The accounts have not yet been received in detail and adjusted; therefore, it is impossible for me to separate under the different headings the sums which I have given.

Mr. WALLACE. How many men were sent on that vessel?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I have not the number here now. It is about 1,200 men, and about the same number of horses. 2. In reference to No. 2, the House will see that there was no amount charged for officers. There was no distinction as between officers and men. The steamer was chartered for a lump sum; therefore, it is impossible and quite unnecessary to separate the cost of the officers from that of the men simply because no rate was fixed. 3. The answer to No. 3 is that the accounts have not yet been received. 4. Is answered by No. 3. 5. Certain names were suggested, but the companies were not restricted to any list.

TRAMP CATTLE FROM THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. DAVIN asked:

Has any correspondence taken place between the Medicine Hat Stock Growers' Association and the government on the subject of tramp cattle from the United States? Have any steps been taken to abate what is a growing nuisance?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Some correspondence has taken place between the Medicine Hat Stock Growers' Association and the government on the subject of tramp cattle from the United States. What is possible is being done by the North-west Mounted Police, by the force along the frontier, to stop the encroachment of tramp cattle from the United States.

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. DAVIN. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) know if the force is adequate at present?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is a question I cannot answer at the moment.

CUSTOMS OFFICER AT MOOSEJAW.

Mr. DAVIN asked:

Who were the applicants for the position of customs officer at Moosejaw? Was Mr. J. K. Stevenson appointed? On whose recommendation? Who were the other applicants?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). When the appointment of a customs officer at Moosejaw was determined upon, the only name or application before me was that of Mr. J. K. Stevenson, who received the appointment. He was recommended to me by parties in whom I have confidence.

THE YUKON TERRITORY—APPLICATIONS FOR LAND.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked:

Referring to the following report now on the Table of this House:

North-west Mounted Police,
Fort Constantine, Yukon River,
December 4, 1896.

The Deputy Minister of the Interior,
Ottawa.

Re Klondike Townsite.

Sir,—I have the honour to report, for the information of the department that land in the vicinity of the mouth of the Klondike River is becoming very valuable, and a few speculators are endeavouring to get the whole into their hands.

Up to the present time there are six applications to purchase land at what is locally known as the Klondike township. This does not include the reserve asked for by the police for their own and other government purposes. Most of the applicants are either American citizens or representatives of American companies doing business here.

In one case an application to purchase 160 acres was made by Joseph Leduc. He has been selling lots, evidently thinking that the application and deposit of survey fee gives him a title to dispose of lots, some of which have changed hands several times, and as high as $300 cash.

I beg to recommend that the department take the townsite into their own hands, laying it out either in lots or in blocks of two or three acres, and dispose of same either through the land agent or by public auction.

There are a certain number here who wish to get everything in their own hands, to the exclusion of smaller men.

The small angle of level land on the south bank of the Klondike, at its junction with the Yukon, has been occupied by the Indians for some years as a winter camp, and at the first rush to the Klondike some parties purchased from the Indians their cabins at a price from $50 to $100 each. These men are under the impression that they have purchased any right, title or interest the Indians may have had in this ground, which, in my opinion, is not warranted. I would recommend that this also be included in the Klondike townsite. The Indians have moved off it, and have now squatted with their missionary on the ground applied for for government purposes. The missionary, and also the bishop, has been notified that this land has been applied for as a government reserve. (Refer to the bishop's application and my report re Indians.)

An application of Andrew Harper, dated November 21, 1896, with survey fee paid, has this day been applied for by one Stewart Menzies, an employee of the Alaska Commercial Company. This man holds a power of attorney from A. Harper to deal with his business here, and in my opinion it is a piece of sharp practice on the part of the second applicant for this land, and further, that the application is made, as well as a prior one by the same person, S. Menzies, in the same vicinity, is in the interests of the Alaska Commercial Company, a foreign company doing business here.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) C. CONSTANTINE,

N. W. M. Police and Acting Govt. Agent.

(a) What action was adopted in the case of Joseph Leduc's application referred to?

(b) What action was taken by the department in the case of Andrew Harper's application, November 2, 1896?

(c) What action was taken by the department in the case of Stewart Menzies's application?

(d) If any of these applications were granted, upon whose report were they granted, respectively, and what is the date of each report, if any?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. (a) The 160 acres of unsurveyed lands applied for by Mr. Joseph Ladue were granted to him and the representative of the Harper estate (Harper and Ladue being partners in business), and Mr. Ladue was advised by the department that patent would issue in favour of the above for the land in question with the exception of such portions thereof as may have been prior to the 24th December, 1897, the subject of agreement to purchase from Ladue or Harper, and also with the exception of such portions as any person or persons may have prior to this date entered into possession thereof under license or permission from Ladue or Harper. This land was surveyed as Group Lot 3, Group 2. (b) The application of Arthur Harper (not Andrew Harper) to purchase land near Dawson City, which is dated the 17th November, 1895, was forwarded to Mr. Ogilvie for consideration in July, 1898. This matter was reported upon by Mr. Commissioner McLeod on the 8th September, 1898, who recommended that patent issue in favour of Mr. Joseph Ladue and Mr. James M. Wilson, executor for the Harper estate, on the latter filing a specific request to that effect. This land is surveyed as Group Lot 2, Group 2. (c) Mr. Stewart Menzies's application to acquire land at Dawson was referred to Mr. Ogilvie for consideration in July, 1898. Mr. Ogilvie has reported recently to the effect that the land applied for was that which was granted to Mr. Harper, being Group Lot 2, Group 2, referred to in answer 'b.' (d) All applications for land in the Yukon territory that are entertained are granted by the commissioner as provided for by order in council of the 7th July, 1898. Note.—The above lands are referred to in Mr. Constantine's report of 1896, as being in Klondike townsite, which is now Dawson.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) if he would be good enough to give me, either across the floor of the House, or afterwards, the date of the report of Mr. Ogilvie, to which he has referred.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will be glad to procure the date of Mr. Ogilvie's report.

THE YUKON TERRITORY—DISPOSAL OF RESERVED CLAIMS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

Referring to order in council, October 27, 1899, in which the following recommendation of the Hon. Mr. Sifton, that he be authorized 'to dispose of any claims or fractions in the Yukon Territory reserved for the Crown, in such manner as he may decide,' was approved, will the government lay on the Table at an early date a statement showing:

What disposal has been made under the orders, and all papers connected with each claim and disposal thereof?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The statement asked for will be prepared and laid on the Table of the House, also copies of all papers connected with each claim and disposal thereof. I will give full information.

THE YUKON TERRITORY—THEFT FROM GOLD COMMISSIONER'S OFFICE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. Has any action been taken respecting $2,400 stolen from the office referred to in report of Mr. Lithgow, January 30, 1899 (now on the Table of this House)? If so, what action and when?

2. What are the facts known to the department in this matter?

3. Has any investigation been made into the matter referred to in the following extract from this report: 'The following amounts have been charged against his account: Received from W. H. Norwood, $8,128 for free miner's certificate; this does not agree with the stubs which I inclose, being for $10,000, but in the absence of any return from Norwood, I must accept Mr. Fawcett's figures.' If so, what action and what result?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. On the 21st July, 1898, Mr. Fawcett, late gold commissioner for the Yukon district, filed a sworn affidavit explaining the circumstances connected with the theft, and in this affidavit is shown the steps that were taken for the discovery of the thieves. A copy of the affidavit is attached hereto. 2. The only facts known to the department are those contained in the affidavit mentioned. 3. Mr. Norwood reported that when he forwarded the money to Dawson a large sum was placed to the credit of the royalty account, which should have been credited to the Free Miner's Certificate Account; and that he would obtain from the bank a statement of all moneys paid in by him, which would be found to correspond with the statements showing the moneys collected by him. This statement has, no doubt, been furnished to the comptroller at Dawson by Mr. Norwood or the bank, but the department has not been advised. The comptroller is being instructed to report to the department at once as to this matter.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) refers to a copy of an affidavit. Would he allow me to have a copy of that affidavit?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman requires me to read it. It is attached to the answer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not want the hon. gentleman to read it, but I would be glad if he would send it over to me.

THE YUKON TERRITORY—ADVANCES TO MR. J. E. GIROUARD.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked:

Referring to the following document now on the Table of this House:

Department of the Interior,
Ottawa, January 9, 1899.

Sir,—I am directed to call your attention to the fact that the sum of $240 stands against you in the departmental books here, being advances to you for expenses which have not been accounted for. I am to say that the deputy minister is of the opinion that you have had ample time to account fully and satisfactorily for all the advances made to you, and he hopes that you will no longer delay in complying with the requirements of the department and the Audit Office in the matter.

Although full instructions have been given to you in regard to accounting for advances to meet expenses, I am to remind you that the statement of disbursements required should be in duplicate, and should give the dates, names of places, &c., and should show the expenditure day by day as far as possible. This statement should be accompanied by vouchers or accounts receipted by the payees. Full explanations of expenditure should be given, with a view of aiding the department and the Audit Office in the examining and passing of the accounts. It is, of course, imperative that the following form of certificate should appear at the foot of your disbursement statements: 'I hereby certify that the above account is correct and just in all respects, and that the whole expenditure was incurred on government business.'

Any portion of the advances not expended and not properly vouched for in the statements should be deposited in the bank to the credit of the Receiver General and deposit receipts sent to Ottawa.

Please send your accounts and vouchers to Mr. Lithgow, the comptroller, for transmission to Ottawa, as it is his particular duty to see that moneys are properly accounted for. A copy of this communication will be sent to Comptroller Lithgow.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) LYNDWODE PEREIRA,
Assistant Secretary.

J. E. Girouard, Esq.,
Registrar,

Dawson, Yukon Territory.

(a) Is Mr. Girouard a member of the Yukon Council?

(b) What was the total advance of public money made to Mr. Girouard, and the date?

(c) How often was he communicated with on the subject by the department, and on what dates?

(d) Has Mr. Girouard accounted for the money? If so, when?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. (a) Yes. (b) The sum of $240, as follows: On July 28, 1898, $100; on July 29, 1898, $140. (c) Mr. Girouard was communicated with, directly or through the comptroller of the Yukon Territory, Mr. J. T. Lithgow, on the following dates: January 9, 1899; June 1, 1899; February 16, 1900; April 21, 1900. (d) Mr. Girouard accounted for the expenditure by statement dated 13th February, 1899—but the account was not in shape for transmission to the Auditor General, and correspondence has taken place between the department and Mr. Girouard with a view to procuring more details. It appears that he sent an account with details of his expenses on the 15th November, 1898, but these were lost with the mail which went down in the Thirty Mile River about that date. An adjustment of his account will be made before the end of the current fiscal year.

YUKON TERRITORY—TIMBER LICENSES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Picou) asked:

Referring to Mr. Smart's letter of March 28, 1898, to J. W. Willison, Esq., Crown timber agent, police post, Lake Bennett, and now on the Table of this House:

(a) Have any parties in the Yukon Territory been permitted to, or have they been reported to the department as having cut timber before timber license was granted or before the required bonus was paid? If so, what is the name of each party?

(b) Have any persons or bodies corporate been permitted to enjoy, or have they been reported to the department as enjoying, more than five square miles at one point, or more than five timber berths altogether? If so, what are the names?

I have made some slight verbal alterations so as to improve the English of the question as printed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman's English if he would try to cut down his questions so as to have them shorter. The answer to the question is as follows: (a). No person who acquired a timber berth was given permission by the department at Ottawa to cut timber thereon before the bonus was paid and a license issued. Permission, however, was given at Dawson to the following persons who applied for timber berths and paid the bonus prescribed by the regulations to cut timber thereon, prior to the issue of a license: Kerry Canadian Mill Company, Klondike Yukon Stewart Pioneer Company, Yukon Saw-Mill Company, D. G. Stewart, Joseph Ladue Gold Mining and Development Company, Frank Swanson, O. W. Hobbs, D. A. Matheson, Stanly McFadyen, Richard Davenport. The above mentioned persons and companies were the owners of saw-mills and as it would take some time to obtain licenses from Ottawa to which they were entitled, having paid the bonus prescribed by the regulations, and there was a great demand for timber, they were permitted to cut it before the licenses were issued. (b). No: with the exception of Messrs. Heney & Stewart, who were permitted to include within their berths the island in the river opposite to the same, containing an area of one square mile, making the total area of the berth six square miles. The islands could have been made a separate berth, and covered by a separate license, but it was thought advisable to include the whole area of six square miles in one license.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). I would like to ask the Prime Minister if there is not one more paper at least which ought to be brought down along with these papers concerning the order in council about coasting on the lakes. It opens by saying:

That, on a report dated October 14, 1899, from the Minister of Finance;

But the report of the Minister of Finance, upon which, I suppose, the whole order is based, does not appear in the returns brought down. Would the right hon. gentleman say whether or not that will be brought down as I wish to get the papers printed?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The hon. gentleman knows from his own experience that an order in council is almost an exact copy of the report of the minister.

Mr. FOSTER. If there is no report—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is a report.

Mr. FOSTER. If there is no further report of the Minister of Finance except what in substance is given in this, then I do not see upon what basis the council founded its action. There surely must be some reasoned report of the Minister of Finance.

The PRIME MINISTER. I will look into it.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—TELEGRAMS RE CASUALTIES.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I wish to read to the House two telegrams which were received this morning from South Africa:

(Sir Alfred Milner to Lord Minto.)

Capetown, May 14, 1900.

May 14. Regret to report that 7833, Private J. W. Raymond alias J. W. Culver was slightly wounded Israel's Poort, 25th April.

(Sgd.) MILNER.

(Sir Alfred Milner to Lord Minto.)

Capetown, May 14, 1900.

May 14. 334 Trooper T. Woolacombe, Second Canadian Mounted Infantry died of dysentery and pleurisy at Carnarvon on 22nd April, casualty was reported officially to War Office but only to-day to me hence delay.

(Sgd.) MILNER.

SUPPLY—BROCKVILLE AND WEST HURON ELECTIONS.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Supply, and the motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. B. RUSSELL (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, the House has been reminded that the subject introduced by my hon. friend and colleague, the member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), is one which should be approached in a judicial spirit. In offering my small contribution to the discussion of the matter to-day, I shall endeavour to emulate, as well as I can, the calm and serene judicial temper in which the subject was approached by the member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) last night.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. In doing so I shall try to repeat as little as possible the arguments that have been so powerfully addressed to the House by my hon. friends, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton). These hon. gentlemen did refer briefly to the incidents connected with the procedure on this subject during the present session, but they did not make much reference to what had taken place during the past session in regard to this matter. I was not present during the whole discussion last evening, by reason of being compelled to attend a meeting of one of the committees of the House, and if any references were made of which I am not aware, I hope the House will pardon me if I should repeat them. What I shall say to-day is by way of rebutting the charge that has been brought against this side of the House, of a desire and an attempt to burk inquiry into those so-called election frauds.

Mr. MILLS. You have a job before you.

Mr. RUSSELL. I feel that I am quite equal to it, because I do not consider it is anything like the job that my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) imagines. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in opening, that if there is any person on whom the responsibility rests for burking these investigations and causing them to fail of succes, it is the hon. member (Mr. Borden), who has introduced the motion now before the House. The election was held, as we all know, in West Huron on the 21st of February, 1899, and the return of Mr. Holmes as member for that constituency was gazetted on the 11th of March, 1899. Solemn declarations were procured,—some of which were read to this House last session,—during March, 1899; they had begun to be procured early in March, and all of them, so far as my knowledge goes, were procured during that month.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). One of them at least that I remember was not procured until well on in May. Then it was made in Calgary, and was not received here until after the middle of May.

Mr. RUSSELL. That does not affect the matter in the slightest possible degree, because the substance of my hon. friend's case was in his hands, or in the hands of those who are promoting this inquiry, during the month of March, 1899. These gentlemen were very well aware during the month of March, 1899, of everything they would be likely to prove in the investigation they asked this House to grant. There can be no pretense that they had not under their control all the material which would be necessary to enable them to petition the courts for the purpose of setting aside the election which they now claim was an undue and improper election, at any time previous to the 10th of April, which I understand was the date at which the time for presenting an election petition expired. They did not choose to go to the courts. I am not censuring them in that regard; but I think it is a perfectly fair and just comment upon their conduct that they did not choose to go to the courts of the country for the purpose of having their wrongs righted and their grievances redressed. But having chosen to pass by the courts, which are the proper tribunals for the trial of this question, and having chosen to come to this House, which is not the proper tribunal for the trial of this question, they allowed the whole time from the opening of the session, some time in the month of March, all of April, all of May, all of June, and a good part of July, to expire before ever bringing their grievance to the notice of this House. I want to know whether it would not have been perfectly feasible and easy for my hon.

Mr. RUSSELL.

friend or for those who furnished him with the material on which he is moving in this House, to have taken action when they became possessed of the knowledge they had in March, 1899, and had determined that this House was the proper, or for them the safer, tribunal for the trial of those elections. I say if having made up their minds that they were going to come to this House for the purpose of obtaining a redress for their grievances, I want to know what excuse has been or can be given, for allowing nearly the whole session until some day in July to expire, while this House was comparatively at leisure, and might have given some reasonable degree of attention to the subject—why they chose to allow almost four months of the session to elapse before bringing their case to the attention of the House. Had my hon. friend chosen to act more diligently and more promptly, had he chosen to avail himself of the opportunities afforded to him to bring these matters to the attention of the House early in the last session, whatever the result would have been worth to him—and I propose to show later that it would have been worth very little—whatever advantage he could have derived from the inquiry, there is no doubt that he would have had the opportunity of concluding the inquiry into the case of West Huron, and probably that of Brockville as well; and if there were any parties connected with those contests who could have been proved guilty, he could have had his inquiry brought to a termination before the prorogation of the House last August. There can be no doubt whatever about that; and for the abortive result of that inquiry, for the fact that time and money were wasted in an attempt to prosecute an inquiry which has not yet been finished, and which bears no likelihood of being ever finished, in the way hon. gentlemen opposite have chosen to select, they are themselves to blame: and my hon. friend who could have moved at any time in the first three or four months of the session of 1899, is wholly responsible for that abortive result. I intend to show later on that if my hon. friend had succeeded in getting an adverse judgment from a committee of this House and from this House in reference to one or more of the deputy returning officers engaged in those two electoral contests, it would have been absolutely valueless to him, and perfectly farcical as a vindication of the election laws of the Dominion. I will deal with that point at a later stage. But if there was any value to him at all in a verdict from this House with reference to Cummings or Farr or any of the deputy returning officers in Brockville, my learned friend has himself to blame for not having secured it. I will not deal with what has occurred this session, further than to say this, that if my hon. friend had been as solicitous about his motion as the hon. member for Vancouver

(Mr. McInnes) was with reference to his motion for a mint, or as the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) was about his motion in reference to the tobacco duties, he could have had a discussion of this subject two or three months ago. The hon. member for Richmond put his notice on the Order paper on the 5th of February, and secured a discussion of the matter on the 7th of March. But my hon. friend did not do anything of that sort at all. I do not know why he was not here at the opening of the session; but he surely could have commissioned his friend, the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) to have put a notice on the Order paper as early as the hon. member for Richmond gave his, and as the hon. member for Vancouver gave his. He need not have waited until the 16th day of February, when there were thirty-eight motions on the Order paper ahead of the motion which he then proposed to move, before intimating to this House that he would ask to have this matter referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. SPROULE. Might I ask the hon. gentleman one question? Would he consider it proper to put a motion on the paper to refer a matter to a committee which was not in existence?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, I would consider it proper, and the best authorities of this House advise that it would be proper. Of course it would be. No one would make any objection to such a course, and I cannot conceive, of any person who would give five minutes reflection to the subject asking a question like that. My hon. friend said—and this is his excuse—that he did not know that this matter would not be treated as an unopposed motion. He should know that every hon. member has a right to oppose a motion if he sees fit, and he must have known the law as it was read to him by the Speaker when he did make the motion, that it was not a subject which could be treated as a matter of privilege. Having let go by last session and the recess and a considerable part of the session, he could not claim for his motion any precedence of the motion of the hon. gentleman for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), or the motion of the hon. member for Richmond, or the motion of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), or any of the other motions which in the view of those promoting them are quite as important as this. He must be taken to have known that. If he supposed that the same course would be taken this session as was taken last session, I ask him if he remembers what Sir Robert Peel once said of the suggestion that a motion dealt with in one way one session must be dealt with in the same way in another session. Peel scouted the idea, and said that it was as absurd as to suppose that one must navigate the same water in the same boat with the same helm at all times, no matter what might be the nature of the tide or the direction of the wind. My hon. friend must have known that there was no rule by which he could claim that this matter should have precedence of other matters equally important in the eyes of those who have them to promote in this House. Therefore, if he has committed any error, he will not stand up in this House and make the plea, which he certainly would never make in a court of justice; for I have been acquainted with him in his practice for a considerable number of years, and I have never yet heard him ask any indulgence or consideration from the court on the ground that he did not know the law or the procedure or the rules of the court, and did not understand his rights or the way to secure his remedy. I say, therefore, that if he had taken an interest in this matter, and had been really solicitous to have an early consideration of the subject during this session by the Committee on Privileges and Elections and by this House, he certainly could have had it two months ago and very likely three months ago, if he had taken the proper and regular methods which he should have taken in the circumstances in which he was placed. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to go any further into those questions, which are comparatively trivial questions to my mind.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, comparatively trivial questions to my mind. I wish to go into the really important and substantial question which is now before this House. Hon. gentlemen opposite have shifted their ground very considerably since this matter was first brought to our attention. Every one can remember that when my hon. friend made his motion last session he was very careful to disclaim any idea of interfering with the election or return of Mr. Holmes for the riding of West Huron. He was very careful to say, if I understood him correctly, that he accepted the precedent adopted by this House in 1887 to the effect that this House had lost its jurisdiction over the return and election of members to this House, and that the only thing remaining to this House was either such an exception as the personal disqualification of a member who has been returned by the returning officer, or the punishment of one of the officials who had been employed in the conduct of an election, as a matter affecting the dignity of this House and the duty owed by their officers to the House. He was careful to repudiate any idea that his motion affected the seat either of the hon. member for West Huron or the hon. member for Brockville.

But what did we see during the progress of the investigation before the Committee on Privileges and Elections last session, and since then during recess. Every other morning, in the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite, there were suggestions and accusations and attempts made to prove that the hon. members for Brockville and West Huron should resign their seats, which had been awarded to them by the return of the returning officers. And I am bound to admit that they so infected public opinion with this foolish, irrational and utterly unjust view of the case, that some papers, even on our side of politics, made the suggestion that if this, that or the other thing were so—which, of course, they were not—Holmes should resign his seat. I mention this as an illustration of the extreme injustice done to the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Holmes) and the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Comstock) by the way in which these proceedings were brought before this House, and if this were any other than a political contest, a contest on which directly or remotely the fate of parties might be made to depend in this country, the downright unfairness and injustice of that course of procedure and of this style of comment would present itself to the mind of every hon. member, and most accurately and forcibly to the very just, fair, impartial and able mind of my hon. friend and colleague from Halifax (Mr. Borden).

It is contended now, not merely that we have the right to punish one of our officials for official misconduct in connection with the prosecution of an election, but that the result of the investigation should affect the seat of my hon. friend from West Huron. That contention, if I understood him correctly, was advanced by the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) the other day. He contended that this House had never abandoned its right to inquire into the results of an election contest and return, and had the right to inquire into the merits and reverse the result. And the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) threw out the suggestion that it was the duty of Mr. Holmes, if the votes of these two subdivisions in the electoral riding of West Huron had been proved to have been affected by the corrupt or dishonest practices of the deputy returning officers, to resign his seat, even although in every other division he had an undoubted and clear majority.

Mr. POWELL. I am sorry to contradict my hon. friend, but I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. RUSSELL. Then I understood my hon. friend to have said so, but accept his statement that he made no such contention.

Mr. POWELL. I never thought of making it.

Mr. RUSSELL. Life is too short to read the hon. gentleman's speeches in Hansard, or I might refer to them, to verify my statement, but he certainly did indicate, if I understood him at all correctly—I am speaking of the time when he opened his speech in such a fair and impartial manner a few weeks ago, but shortly afterwards, metaphorically speaking, was in his shirt sleeves with his shot gun over his shoulder and on the war path to shoot some person in consequence of what happened in West Huron—he did indicate to my mind, and must have left on many minds, the impression that it was the duty of Mr. Holmes and Mr. Comstock to resign their seats as the result of the inquiry.

Mr. POWELL—I never did on that occasion either, and the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken as respects both occasions.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am giving now in all sincerity the impression left on my mind by the discourse of my hon. friend. Of course, I know he may have had some more acute listeners than I, who could gather more intelligently his meaning, but I am speaking of the impression left on my mind, and which I am satisfied was made on the minds of many other gentlemen in this House by the discourse he gave us the other day.

Let us examine that contention—the contention of the hon. member for South Lanark at all events—that by an inquiry, conducted as this was, by calling in witnesses who had voted at an election, and voted secretly by ballot, and by interrogating them as to their votes and by proving—so far as that is demonstration or evidence at all, and it was admitted as evidence in this inquiry—that there were some votes cast in a particular electoral subdivision for a certain candidate which did not appear as having been so cast in the electoral return—and that in that manner the result of the contest was affected—this House can deprive a member of his seat. I want to know how that is going to affect the seats of hon. members on the other side. I want to call the attention especially of hon. gentlemen opposite to the enormous disadvantage at which any such doctrine, if accepted, would have placed them at any time during the past four years in this House, and will at any time during the next twenty years. Does not the hon. gentleman see that there is hardly a member on the other side who can hold a safe seat in this House if once we concede any such doctrine. Take, for instance, the seat of the hon. member for West Assinibola (Mr. Davin), who holds it by a majority of one—by a fair majority of one. Quite true, that majority was given him by the casting vote of the returning officer, but that does not make it the less his right and his duty to occupy a seat here. But what would happen if a majority of this House could refer his case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and have an inquiry into it and call on the voters in some particular division to declare how they had voted, and procure one single man who would come forward and say that he did not vote for him, as his ballot indicated, but for his antagonist. How would that affect the seat of an hon. member who holds it by a majority of only one? There are numbers of hon. gentlemen opposite who hold their seats by narrow majorities, and there will be still more of them after the next election, and those that will then hold their seats will hold them by still narrower majorities. Do not these hon. gentlemen see what a tremendous weapon they are putting into the hands of their adversaries? They will come back after the next election, somewhat diminished in numbers and with diminished majorities, and if we were to accept the doctrine they lay down now, when we will have organized our Committee on Privileges and Elections, as we will do of course, with a majority on our own side, we will be at liberty to call any one of them before that committee and inquire into the majorities by which any one of them holds his seat. Does not the hon. member see that we can secure half a dozen witnesses who have voted for them. Of course, there will be many, 'lowd fellows of the baser sort,' men who, for half a dollar, will come before the Privileges and Elections Committee and swear that they voted, not for the hon. member sitting there, but for his antagonist. Would it be right to lay down the principle that such an inquiry should change the return in the half dozen or more seats that would be in this way affected and send these hon. gentlemen out of the House? It is quite true that there are half a dozen who could be spared. And, no doubt, there will be half a dozen in the next parliament who can well be spared in the public interest; but, for my part, I do not want to see such a doctrine laid down or any precedent established by which we would accomplish even that desirable consummation by such very questionable means.

Mr. LANDERKIN. But, surely, such an end would justify the means?

Mr. RUSSELL. Almost.

I will not be personal; but, I think I could name more than one hon. member on that side of the House whose removal from the House, even by this method, if we had had this wrinkle from the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) a few years ago, would have been of infinite benefit to the public business of the country, and would have prevented the huge burden that has been laid on the columns of Hansard. I think the account of one hon. member has run up to 3,796½ speeches, or thereabouts, to date. And all this would have been saved if we had been able to use the methods that is now claimed to be fair and just methods, to eject the hon. gentleman from this House. But, Sir, that, we know, is not the law. We know now that, notwithstanding the views of the hon. member for South Lanark, it is not the precedent that has been established in this House; on the contrary, it has been established by authority as eminent as that of Sir John Thompson, and as distinguished as Dr. Weldon, that, since the passing of the Controverted Elections Act, this House has not had jurisdiction—that is, it is not in accordance with proper precedent and proper parliamentary practice, to inquire into the majority by which any hon. gentleman in this House holds his seat. I feel sure that if I had time to read through the two volumes of the debates of the House for 1887, I should find expressions to the contrary in the speeches of my hon. friend from York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and others on that side—especially the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill)—who have taken such strong ground in this case against what they call the burking of inquiry into matters of this kind, and who have taken such strong ground with reference to the rights of constituencies. Though the doctrine that I have spoken of was upheld by Sir John Thompson and Dr. Weldon, in the case of the Queen's County election, it must surely have been after some protest on the part of these other hon. gentlemen. But, I have not been able to find their protests. In the Queen's County case, which was referred to by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) yesterday, there was an undoubted majority in favour of one candidate, but Returning Officer Dunn, in the plenitude of this usurped authority, saw fit to give the seat to the candidate with the minority of votes. It must be that the hon. gentleman to whom I have referred, protested against that, though I have not been able to find that fact recorded. The only view I can find as coming from that side of the House is that expressed by Sir John Thompson, whose words were read to the House yesterday, which I will not repeat, establishing the precedent that the House will not inquire into the majority by which an hon. member holds his seat. In that case of the Queen's County election, I am free to concede still, that the House might very properly have brought the returning officer, or rather the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, before the House and commanded him to amend the returns on the undisputed facts before the House—facts not requiring to be tried by any committee, but admitted by everybody and standing out on the face of the returns, that the man who had the right by majority of votes was not returned and the man who had the minority had been returned. But, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries pointed out, when there are disputed questions of fact, when it is a question what votes were cast and what votes were not cast, whether certain votes were counted lawfully or unlawfully—questions requiring a scrutiny of votes and the investigation of questions of fact, surely the precedent established was a good one, no matter how much we may have resisted it at the time, and no matter how strongly we may have felt that it was inapplicable to the case then under consideration. This House is totally unfit for such work as the trial of election petitions—and totally unfit for such work as it is asked to undertake at this moment. Hon. gentlemen have, perhaps, read in the Greville Memoirs the remarks which the writer makes with reference to the party spirit manifested even in state trials, where political questions were at issue and political interests at stake. Mr. Greville, referring to the proceedings against Lord Melville, notes it as a conclusive proof of the mighty influence of party spirit, that even in such a case, involving the guilt or innocence of a high official, all the Whig peers voted on one side and all the Tory peers on the other, with no apparent regard to the essential merits of the case. Now, if you cannot get a tribunal such as the House of Lords free from the partisan spirit, in the case of a state trial, I want to know how you can expect a committee of this House to be free from party spirit in such a case as that which we investigated last year, and which we are asked to investigate again this year? I am not going to allege or pretend that there was less party spirit on this side of the House than on the other side; it is sufficient for my argument to say that both sides of the committee—that is, the membership on both sides of this House as found in the committee—was influenced by party spirit in the inquiry last session. I will give the House an illustration of that. We had a motion before the committee, which I thought was a very fair and just motion, to this effect—the question was as to whether you should or should not immediately call up certain witnesses, men who had voted in one of the electoral subdivisions of West Huron. It was certainly against principle that they should be examined in respect to the way in which they had voted, if by any possibility such a declaration on their part could be avoided. It certainly was against the spirit of the Act that a man voting in secret and voting by ballot should be interrogated as to the way in which he had voted. He could not be required to make any response in an election trial as to the way in which he had voted if he had voted legally; and the contention was made that these witnesses ought not to be allowed to be asked for whom they had voted at all. But, this was the motion that was made, that, at all events, they should not be asked for whom they had voted until the committee had exhausted all other means of arriving at a true result, and at the facts that had taken place in respect to the matter. It was said that otherwise you would unnecessarily give away the secrecy of the ballot. The argument was that if there was any possibility of the committee concluding that it would be necessary to do that, at all events, the committee ought not to do it until they had exhausted all other means of getting at the facts. That strikes me as a fair and reasonable resolution, as a proposition to which there could be no possible exception. Yet, we found that every hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who was sitting on that committee opposed that motion, and every hon. gentleman from this side of the House who was sitting on that committee voted in favour of that motion. Does not that illustrate the partisan character of the tribunal? Does not that prove to a demonstration how entirely unfit such a tribunal is to discuss the question of the guilt or innocence of an official for the trial of whose guilt or innocence you have such a perfect and satisfactory tribunal appointed by the law of the land? I say, then, that that tribunal is entirely and absolutely unfitted by its nature for the purpose of prosecuting an inquiry such as this. But, I say further, that this House, and the members of this House, never had, and never will have, the time to devote to an inquiry such as that. Here let me refer to something that was said by my hon. friend from Westmoreland a while ago, where I thought he did not correctly represent the facts to this House with reference to what took place during the course of that election investigation. The hon. gentleman said, as I understood him—and I speak again with submission, and expecting to be corrected—or he gave the House the impression, that there were very few meetings of that committee at which there was not, at least, a considerable number of the members present to hear the evidence. Now, Sir, that is not a fact. The fact is that there were quite a number of sessions of that committee at which there was no person present except the chairman of the committee, the member for Westmoreland, my hon. colleague from Halifax and myself. A number of sessions of that committee took place when no other gentlemen were present. Well, that statement was made and the member for Westmoreland attempted to rebut it by calling up the records of the committee, and he said: You will not find a single session of that committee at which there was not a considerable number of members present, sixteen one day, eighteen another day, twenty-one another day, and so forth. But, the hon. gentleman failed to call attention to this fact, that he was only taking the records of the membership as it appeared at the beginning of the session, in the morning at eleven o'clock. If you will look at the records of that committee you will see that the committee sometimes rose at 1.45 p.m., and took a recess; it rose at six o'clock and took a recess. You will find there were afternoon sessions of the committee, and evening sessions, when the House was sitting. My learned friend will find, if he examines the record, that there were no less than eight sessions of the committee held under these circumstances, and at these eight sessions I make bold to affirm that at hardly one of them was there a membership present of more than four gentlemen that I have named—perhaps the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was present, but I think he was often absent. The evidence was taken by the chairman and reported by the stenographer, in the presence of the chairman, of my hon. friend from Halifax, of my hon. friend from Westmoreland, and of myself, although all the other members of the committee must admit that they had a duty to hear that evidence, although they were going to be called upon to pass judgment upon it, and although one of them has described himself as having the duties of a juror and compelled to pass judgment as a juror upon the effect of the evidence that was adduced during the inquiry. What possible verdict could that intelligent juror give as to the way he should value the statement of a witness whose evidence he had never heard, whose demeanour he had never seen, and of whose conduct he could not judge? It is the most absolute travesty upon a court of justice to call a competent court the thirty or forty members of that committee, every one of whom would have taken the same view as his leader, on which ever side he might happen to be. The members on this side of the House, I am quite sure, would have arrived at whatever verdict was arrived at by their leader; and, I am quite sure, the members on the other side would have arrived at whatever verdict my hon. colleague from Halifax had chosen to arrive at on the evidence that came before that committee. Talk about judicial procedure, talk about juries, talk about doing justice, talk about deciding on the guilt or innocence of a man, talk about punishing him after a trial such as that; and I am sure that the natural and reasonable instincts of any hon. gentleman must revolt at the idea of an investigation conducted under these circumstances and under these auspices, resulting in the punishment or acquittal of any person, for any crime of any character whatever.

Now, Sir, I wish to make another suggestion, one which I foreshadowed in my opening observations, and that is, that this House has no adequate power to punish any person effectively for the offences that are charged against the deputy returning officers in these two ridings. Why, Sir, if these men, if Mr. Cummings, if Mr. Farr, if the various deputy returning officers in the riding of Brockville, have been guilty of one-tenth part of the crimes which are attributed to them in the affidavits which have been read and in the charge made by my colleague from Halifax, the right place for them is behind the bars of a penitentiary; every mother's son of them should be serving out his term in a penitentiary. And what does my hon. friend propose? I suppose he proposes that we should have our solemn investigation, that we should have our conference, that we should have our report to the House. That report would be brought down, I suppose, in the closing days of the session, it could not be brought down before if it was brought down at all, when, I dare say, this House would be held up, as it was last session, waiting the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Then, after we had gone through the solemn farce of trying these men under these circumstances, and getting a verdict pronounced against them, I want to know what we would do with them. My hon. friend who, I presume, understands this question certainly as well as myself, and I want to know what he will say upon the question as to what we can do with them when we have arrived at our adverse judgment and have pronounced them guilty of an offence against the dignity of this House and against the election laws. Is there any tower to which he can send them? Is there any prison in which they can be imprisoned? Perhaps there is. Does he pretend that they can be held in custody a single hour after this House has been prorogued? If I understand the law rightly, the utmost this House can do will be to call them up to the Bar of the House, perhaps we can make them kneel down and go through some form of obelance, and make some sort of apology; and we, perhaps, can give them some sort of friendly admonition, some few words of advice. At the most, we can send them to prison only so long as this House is in session, and I have a very considerable doubt if a judge of any court having habeas corpus jurisdiction, might not, on hearing the whole inquiry, say that we have not even power to do that. That is a question which, perhaps, is worthy of discussion later on. But, at most my learned friends will not pretend that we could do more than send them to prison during the time this House is in session, and when this House is prorogued they go scot-free the following morning. And we are asked to admire such a proceeding as a vindication of the laws of this parliament, as a vindication of the laws of this country. We are asked to regard that as a punishment for crimes which, if they have actually been perpetrated, should land every one of the perpetrators in the penitentiary for a couple of years at the inside.

Now, for my part, I do not propose to engage in anything so farcical as that, but I am going to discuss, at all events, rightly or wrongly, the question as to whether we have any power to imprison these men, or to punish them in any way, for the acts that they are alleged to have committed. I doubt whether we have. I admit that it is a thing, perhaps, savouring of recklessness rather than courage to start such a question as that, when I know that by Mr. Blake, by Sir John Macdonald, by Sir John Thompson, and by other great and leading luminaries of parliamentary law in this House, the opinion has been expressed that there is no doubt, and the expressions which have been used by both Mr. Blake and by Sir John Macdonald are to the effect that they would be very sorry to believe that this House had ever given up its right to control returning officers and deputy returning officers as its own officers. But for that opinion, I would have been inclined to ask, whether it is correct to say that a returning officer is an officer of this House, or that a deputy returning officer is an officer of this House. I do not think that this question has been very carefully looked into. I would suggest that it would be a most excellent matter for hon. members in charge of this question, to inquire into, and that it would be a most excellent thing for the hon. gentleman who is to follow me, to address himself to that question, and to show by what process of reasoning, or by what course of legislation, or by what evolution of parliamentary law, it comes about that this House has jurisdiction to punish a returning officer or a deputy returning officer for an act which it has constituted an indictable crime by the statutes which we have now on the statute-book of the Dominion. I do not know how it happens that we have this power, unless it be that the returning officers and the deputy returning officers are indeed, as they have been said to be, officers of this House, but I do not know how they come to be officers of this House, and if hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House would assist me—I am only a humble inquirer—I would be glad to receive light upon this point. A returning officer is 'such a person as the Governor General appoints.' The writ which is directed to him is described as 'Her Majesty's writ' 'to him directed.' The return is made to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and a duplicate is sent to the party elected. He is paid by a warrant of the Governor General, directed to the Minister of Finance. If there should be a vacancy in the representation in the House, this vacancy is supplied by the Speaker, who issues, not a writ, but his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, who issues the writ as Her Majesty's writ, directed to the returning officer. If there is anything in all that routine, in all these provisions, in all the process through which the returning officer is selected and constituted, which makes him an officer of this House, then I can understand the process of reasoning by which it is said that this House has a right to punish that officer, if he misconducts himself in the execution of his duty, and in making his return of the writ.

Mr. TAYLOR. Who pays him ?

Mr. RUSSELL. He is paid, as I have said, by a warrant of the Governor General, directed to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. TAYLOR. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. If that makes him an officer of this House we have a great many officers.

Mr. TAYLOR. An officer of the government.

Mr. RUSSELL. An officer of the government? Very well; if he is an officer of the government, he is not an officer of this House. I am not going to dogmatize upon the subject, which, so far as I am aware, has not been very thoroughly discussed by anybody so far. I feel rather inclined to treat the matter as according to Mark Twain the Prophet Elijah treated the prophets of Baal. He said, according to Twain's old sea captain: 'I do not say that they cannot call down fire on the sacrifice, but I only want to see them do it.' So here I do not say that they cannot show any precedent for the punishment of the deputy returning officer appointed—as all our deputy returning officers have been, but I would like them simply to do it. It will afford comfort to me, and enlightenment to the House if hon. gentlemen will point out any precedent which shows that the House has a right to inflict any punishment on these deputy returning officers, assuming that they have been guilty of the crimes alleged against them in the proceedings before the House. This much is absolutely clear. To me, at least, it seems a thing so clear that there is no room for arguing it at all. The analogy is perfect between the question of punishing the deputy returning officer and that of trying a controverted election. In 1887, this House adopted as a principle, that seeing that the trial of controverted elections of members of this House had been, by the law, handed over to a tribunal constituted for that purpose, it was not expedient for this House to undertake to do the same duty, that it was wrong and improper for the House to enter upon the trial of controverted elections, when it had given to the courts the right and the jurisdiction to inquire into and adjudicate upon these controversies. If this is good logic and a good precedent, I want to know where the analogy breaks down, when you apply it to the case of the punishment of the deputy returning officer. This legislature, not this House, but this legislature, the Governor General, the Senate, and the House of Commons, have passed an Act, by which they have said that if a returning officer, or a deputy returning officer, places a ballot fraudulently in the ballot box, he shall be liable to a fine of $1,000, or to imprisonment for two years—I suppose imprisonment in a penitentiary. If it is good logic to say, that, because this parliament has handed over the trial of controverted elections to the courts of the land, therefore, this House ought not to be engaged in the same kind of controversy, I want to know, is it not equally good logic to say, that, if this legislature has given the courts of the land the right to try and punish these people, it is also improper that this House should be engaged in doing the same thing and doing with such infinite inadequacy, that which it has handed over to the courts of the land to do, and which the courts can do so much better? I see no imperfection in the analogy, or in the logic. Perhaps we will be told what this House can do. I believe there has been no attempt on the part of the House of Commons, by way of punishment for contempt of the House, not for a couple of centuries, at least, not since 1666, to fine anybody. They have not since pretended to have power to do anything but to imprison, so that we cannot fine these gentlemen, and if I am right, we cannot imprison them for any wrongful act they may have committed. At the most we can only imprison them during the time that the House is in session, so that their imprisonment ceases when the House is prorogued. They then go scot-free. They then go before a jury of the land and they ask why they should be a second time punished, why they should be dragged before a tribunal to be tried in reference to a subject upon which they have already been tried by this abortive, inadequate machinery of an investigation, before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the House of Commons.

If they can be punished at all, I suppose it will be conceded that the only ground of their being punished, would be for contempt of the House, if they had acted in the way in which it is said they have acted, as officers of the House in the execution of their duties. Now I hold in my hand one of the best books on the subject of the jurisdiction and privileges of the House of Commons, the constitution of parliament, and its powers and functions, that I know of. This probably is the best recent book we have on the subject, and I do not find any authority in it for regarding the fraudulent performance of his duty by a returning officer, as an infraction of the privileges of this House. This is Sir William Anson's book on the Law and Custom of the Constitution, vol. 1, and I find from it, that the kind of offences for which the House does punish persons, is:

The offences for which punishment is inflicted may be generally described as disrespect to any member of the House, as such, by a person not being a member; disrespect to the House collectively, whether committed by a member or any other; disobedience to the orders of the House or interference with its procedure, with its officers in the execution of their duty, or with witnesses in respect to evidence given before the House or a committee of the House.

That is the kind of offences for which the House inflicts punishment under this general and vague authority which it has, to punish persons for contempt of the House. I do not find that any one of them bears any resemblance whatever to a charge against an official altogether outside of the House, as to the performance of the duty cast upon him by the general law of the land. I do not see why there is any better reason for this House to punish an officer for failure to discharge that kind of duty, than there is for the House to undertake to punish any officer for failing to properly discharge any duty cast upon him by the law of the land. If this House is interested in having its members properly constituted, and if it is going to undertake to punish all offenders against the election law, then, as Mr. Lyons said in his argument before this House in 1887: If a man kicks up a row at the polling booth and prevents persons from voting, will this House undertake to punish him for a breach of privilege. For my own part, I find it difficult to suggest where the line should be drawn in these matters, if you are to haul up all such offenders here and punish them. If you are to do that, then it seems to me that you can punish all offences committed in elections, under the same vague power which is claimed by this House. At all events, Mr. Speaker, whether we have the power to punish or not, there can be no doubt that the courts have adequate and absolute power, and there can be no doubt that if my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) had been as anxious to get Mr. Cummings or Mr. Farr in the penitentiary for their offences against the Election Act, as he was, or as his friends were to make political capital out of the offences that are alleged against these men, he would have had them punished long ago if the charges are true. From what I know of the skill of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) in adapting means to an end, if he had been as anxious to get Mr. Farr punished—if he is guilty—as he and his friends have been to get this matter into the newspapers—bringing it up every day, sedulously nursing it, keeping the community in a state of agitation over it, using it as some sort of a set-off against the miscellaneous and long-continued rascalities that have been brought home to the Conservative party in many years past—if they had been as anxious to punish these men as they have been to do all this, they certainly would have taken the more effective way of having Mr. Farr and Mr. Cummings brought before the regular courts of the land, where, if guilty, they might have been mulcted in $1,000 or placed in the penitentiary for a period of two years.

I wish to address myself now for a moment to the question as to whether Mr. Holmes—I suppose Mr. Farr's case is not yet concluded—

An hon. MEMBER. Mr. Cummings.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, I mean Mr. Cummings. I beg pardon of Mr. Holmes, but he need not be offended, for anything I was going to say in regard to Mr. Cummings would not be in any way offensive if applied to Mr. Holmes. What I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, was, that Mr. Cummings is not guilty in my judgment of any of the offences alleged against him. In view of what has been said to the detriment of Mr. Cummings, who has been maligned for almost twelve months, I think it right to express the conviction impressed on my own mind. In view of the adverse comments on his character and reputation made in the Conservative papers, I deem it but justice to say, that I have no hesitation in stating that I am absolutely convinced of the entire innocence of Mr. Cummings of the charges made against him. Those of us who heard all the evidence that could be adduced against him and was adduced against him, and who witnessed his demeanour before the committee, have a right, I suppose, to express our opinion in that regard. It is very likely, indeed, that gentlemen who went to that committee predisposed against Mr. Cummings, predisposed to find him guilty, predisposed adversely to such a degree as made them unsuitable as judge or jury to try the case, it is very likely that such gentlemen will be ready to say that Mr. Cummings was a guilty man. I have no doubt that those who went there with like predispositions against Mr. Holmes would draw the same conclusion with regard to him. But I do say that the members who went to that committee with an unbiassed mind, and ready to take a fair view of the evidence, will have the same opinion in regard to Mr. Cummings as they have with regard to Mr. Holmes, that they are both absolutely guiltless in the matter.

Now, Sir, all the proceedings connected with that election were confessedly regular upon their face. If any such crime has been committed by Mr. Cummings as that charged against him, then it was committed by the perpetration of a piece of legerdemain such as it would require a consummate artist to achieve. For my own part, after hearing all the evidence, I came to the conclusion that Mr. Cummings was not only morally, but physically incapable of performing the trick which was attributed to him. I call the attention of the hon. member for Westmoreland to one particular circumstance in which he figured as one of the actors, and which tended to bring this conviction to my mind as much as anything else that occurred in the course of the whole trial. That was this: My hon. friend attributes to Mr. Cummings that he put his hand in his right-hand pocket and there deposited, I suppose, a lawful ballot, and that he then abstracted from some inside pocket—which has been discovered by the hon. member for West Assiniboia, but which was not discovered by any of the witnesses—abstracted from that inside pocket a spurious ballot marked for Mr. Holmes, and placed that spurious ballot in the box. Now, I wish to call attention to an incident that occurred as illustrating the physical incapacity of Mr. Cummings to perform that trick. He was asked to handle some ballots by my hon. friend (Mr. Powell) in the course of the inquiry, and it was a matter of general remark that he handled them very clumsily, handled them as if his fingers were all thumbs; so that my hon. friend (Mr. Powell) lost patience with him and said: Allow me; I am a more expert manipulator than you are, I will take these ballots out of your hands, and I will manipulate them for you. If any one was physically capable of performing this trick it would not be the deputy returning officer in Colborne poll, but it would be my hon. friend (Mr. Powell). That was a very significant circumstance as pointing to the physical incapacity of Mr. Cummings to manipulate the ballots as alleged, and it is a circumstance which would impress in his favour, any one who saw his demeanour in the witness box, when he was charged with the crime. It would be rather a laborious thing to read the evidence, and I shall not read it at length; but if my hon. friends will read the evidence of their own witnesses, James McManus, their own Tory scrutineer, and Edward Shaw, their own Tory scrutineer, which they will find in the published report at pages 7 and 88, they will find that these two Tory scrutineers, who watched the conduct of Mr. Cummings, had not a word to say against him. Mr. Shaw was not only not impressed at the time with anything wrong having happened, but after the inquiry had taken place, he was asked whether he had any suspicion in regard to the way in which that poll was conducted, and he said not merely that he had no suspicions at the time, but that he had no suspicions now. This was after all he had heard about the matter, after all he had read in the newspapers, after all the statements in the affidavits and after all the attempts to prejudice the public mind in the matter. But being a fair-minded man, he says he has not even now any suspicion that there was anything wrong in the conduct of that poll; and I shall be entirely ready to accept the judgment of their Tory scrutineer with reference to the bona fides of Mr. Cummings and with reference to the propriety of his conduct. If you read the evidence of the other witnesses, McAvoy, Lawson and Tobin, who were in the polling booth all the time the election took place, with the exception of an hour when some of them were out taking lunch, you will find that it is all to the same purport, that there was nothing wrong in the conduct of Mr. Cummings at that polling booth. But apart even from this evidence, one clear statement from Mr. Cummings would be sufficient to rebut the evidence given against him: for, as the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) pointed out, the statement of each of the witnesses referred to an independent issue, whether he did or did not put into the ballot box the particular ballot of a particular voter. Mr. Cummings says he did. The voter at the very worst says he did not; and Mr. Cummings's statement that he did is entirely equal as a matter of law, and better, on an issue of guilt or innocence, than the statement of the witness that he did not.

The only circumstance, then, that has to be accounted for is the fact that 13 witnesses have come forward and have sworn in effect that Mr. Cummings did not put into the ballot box the ballots they handed to him. We must face that statement; there is no doubt about it. There is the statement made by 13 witnesses against Mr. Cummings, that the 13 ballots which they severally had handed to him were not put into the ballot box, but that other ballots were put in in place of them. Well, Sir, I suppose the House is very well aware of the way in which that evidence was got—the way in which the declarations of those men were concocted. If it is not, and if any one will look at the evidence of Joseph McCann, on page 52, and the evidence of James Kirkpatrick, on pages 65 and 66, he will see that immediately after the election. Mr. McLean, having been disappointed in the support he had received, finding more votes against him than he had expected to find—which is not a very unusual experience in the life of a defeated candidate—and finding that some of the men who had promised to vote for him had apparently gone back on him—which also is not a very unusual thing in the life of a candidate—went around among them and challenged them: 'Didn't you say you were going to vote for me?' 'Yes.' 'Well, I hope you kept your word.' What could a man say to that except that he had, whether he had or not? His ballot was a secret ballot, and I suppose the man who has a right to the secrecy of the ballot does not strain the matter very much when he thinks that if he has a right to keep his secret, he has a right to lie about it to a person who asks him a question which he has no right to ask. Having made the statement that he had so voted, he was asked, 'I suppose you would have no objection to sign a paper to that effect?' 'Certainly not.' The paper is presented to him, and he signs it. How could he refuse to sign it after having made the statement? The declaration was not in many cases presented to him as a solemn declaration having the effect of an affidavit, but as a simple statement. But the declaration having been got, the next stage is easy. This man is told: 'There is going to be an inquiry into the election by a committee of the House of Commons, and you will be hauled up before that committee, and asked to say for whom you voted; now, don't forget that you have signed a declaration stating that you voted for McLean, and you had better stick to that declaration, because, if it is proved that you have made a false declaration, you may find yourself lodged in the penitentiary or in the county jail.' Heaven knows what the poor man's imagination would conjure up as the consequence of having made that declaration. Take the 13 electors of the class to which these men belonged, and they would think they had involved themselves in the danger of a prosecution for perjury for having made a false declaration. No person knows for whom they voted, nobody knows that they did not vote for McLean but voted for Holmes. It is a great deal easier for them to go into the witness box and say, 'I voted for McLean,' than to say, 'I voted for Holmes, but signed a solemn declaration that I voted for McLean.' That is a terrible temptation to present to a man in humble circumstances. He is caught; he knows he is caught, and he takes the bull by the horns, and goes before the committee and swears, as these 13 voters did, that they had voted for McLean and had not voted for Holmes, knowing that nobody could say anything to the contrary, that their votes are locked up in absolute secrecy, and that there is no danger of their being confronted with a false declaration.

Mr. MILLS. How about the evidence of the micrometer?

Mr. RUSSELL. I will take it all up by degrees; it is all here. The micrometer has absolutely nothing to do with the question I am discussing. I want to call the attention of the committee now to the fact that there was a concerted attempt to frighten these people, to impress them with the fact that they had signed a solemn declaration. If any one will read the evidence of Scarlet Williams at page 179, or that of Abner Morris at page 234, he will see that there was a concerted effort to produce an impression on the minds of these witnesses time and again that it was easier for them to stick to the declaration they had made than to go back on it, and that it would be a dangerous thing if at the inquiry before the committee they did not stick to the statements made in that declaration. More than that, they did not trust these witnesses entirely to themselves and to their own inspiration. They were corralled in a hotel in this city, and they had the services of a man to keep them in good training and to instruct them. If any hon. member will look at the evidence of James Clark, on page 206, and the evidence of Aaron A. Williams, on page 216, he will see the nature of the services rendered by Mr. Beck. Why, there was no occasion on which that committee met, when Mr. Beck was not sitting there in full view of the witnesses confronting them. He was with them in the hotel, he was their conductor on their excursions around the city; they had their personal conducted expeditions over the city, and they thought so much of his services that they passed the hat around, and from the large fees they received as witness, day in and day out—and which amounted to a pretty penny, some $10,000 or $12,000, I am informed—they made up a purse for Mr. Beck to reward him for the kind services he was rendering McLean and the witnesses in keeping them here while the matter was being inquired into. So that every precaution was taken that they should not go back on the declarations they had made. There is nothing remarkable in the fact that dragooned, coralled and trained in that way, thirteen men out of some 100 odd in that particular subdivision, should have been worked up to come here and swear positively that they had voted for McLean, when they had voted for Holmes. My belief is that that was what took place. I cannot bring myself to believe that Cummings was physically or morally capable of the trick attributed to him. It is not an uncommon thing, any man who has had experience in election trials or courts of justice at all, knows that it is no uncommon thing to find a considerable number of witnesses who will lie in a case like this. It is unfortunate and it does not show the best side of human nature; but any one of us who has had any legal practice, more especially in election trials, will not be surprised at such things occurring. I have known of cases in which a candidate was obliged to confront a dozen or more witnesses, and I am sure that there are not members of this House who have been obliged some time or other in their career, to stand up in court and confront at least a dozen of witnesses, who have come forward and deposed to statements which were utter fabrications, but which were given as statements of fact for the purpose of disqualifying a candidate. And in each case, it has been laid down as law in this country that where a candidate has squarely contradicted the statements of such witnesses—no matter how many there may be, so long as each gives evidence on an independent issue—the word of the candidate, as in this case the word of Cummings, must be received on each one of the issues as answering the statements made by each one of these witnesses. Not merely is that the legal conclusion, but any fair-minded man, watching the demeanour of those witnesses, seeing how they behaved, seeing the shuffling way in which they answered the questions put to them, seeing how some of them collapsed altogether under cross-examination, seeing how some trembled as they came to the stand, noticing the way they evaded questions, remarking the whole course of cross-examination, could not fail to come, not merely as an indisputable legal inference, but as a matter of actual demonstration, to the conclusion that this legal conclusion is a correct solution of the question at issue between Cummings and those witnesses.

The hon. member for Westmoreland attached importance to the fact that there were two different kinds of ballots, and that the thirteen produced were different ballots printed on different paper from the genuine ones. My hon. friend refers to the micrometer to show that these were different ballots, printed on different paper from the stubs from which they were taken. I admit freely that if the micrometer was an infallible piece of machinery and honestly manipulated, it was proved that these ballots were on different paper from the stubs from which the real, genuine ballots were taken. But that does not prove that Cummings put them in the ballot box at all. Those witnesses may have, for reasons of their own, taken those ballots, marked them for Mr. Holmes, and given them to the deputy returning officer to put into the ballot box in the place of the official ballots which they had received from him. Everybody knows that that is not an uncommon thing for voters to do.

Mr. WALLACE. Where would they get them?

Mr. RUSSELL. It was easy to get them. The ballots were printed in an ordinary country printing office, somewhere around Lake Huron, I suppose, and the printers had directions to print a certain number, but they were not printed in any secret place, with any guarded surroundings, but at a place where it was the simplest thing for anybody to get any number he wanted. I admit that that was an irregularity. I admit that the returning officer should have stood over the printer, when printing them, and seen that none were printed except those put up in the parcels for which receipts were taken. But everybody knows that that is never done, and that until you have some official stamp or seal or mark on the ballots used, you will always have the possibility of this thing happening, and of there being more ballots printed than are required.

Mr. HAGGART. Had not these ballots the initials of Cummings on them, and did he not admit that the initials were his?

Mr. RUSSELL. No, he did not, and they did not have his initials on them. His initials were only on the genuine ballots. If these were genuine, which I do not think was absolutely disproved, but may be regarded as improbable, then they had his initials upon them. But if they were spurious, then they did not have his initials upon them, and he did not say they had. I can only give my hon. friend the effect of Cummings's evidence, because I have not here the brief which refers to the particular page, but the effect of his evidence was this. These particular ballots were put in his hand at an early stage of the inquiry, and he was asked if the initials on the back were his, and he said they were. He had not then the remotest suspicion that there could be any contention made that they were not the very ballots he had given the voters; and assuming that they were, he answered, as any innocent man would, but as a guilty man in all probability would not, that the initials were his. What else could he have said when he believed in good faith that those were the ballot papers he had given the voters, and which they had brought back to him to put in the box? But after he discovered that there were two distinct kind of ballots, and after the suspicion was created that these might be spurious, he was asked whether the initials were his, if the ballots were not those he had given the voters. He replied that they certainly were not. I am merely giving the effect of his evidence and am not quoting his exact words. That particular question, I now remember, was objected to and not pressed, but he was asked a more explicit question.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him? He says that Mr. Cummings said the initials were his only before he knew there were different kinds of ballots. Let me point to him this evidence at page 36:

Q. Then, you are satisfied in your own mind, are you not, that all the ballots of series 3, from Nos. 1 to 14, inclusive, are different paper to the rest of the ballots?—A. In my judgment.

Q. I suppose you are no judge of paper to go into these stubs?—A. No.

Q. Now, Mr. Cummings, you have already sworn that these initials on the backs of all these ballots are in your handwriting?—A. Yes.

Q. There is no question about that?—A. No question.

That was after his attention had been drawn to the fact that there were two different kinds of ballots.

Mr. RUSSELL. Because he had not come to the conclusion that there was anything wrong about the papers. He believed at that time that these were genuine ballots. And believing that he believed these were his initials; and it is not proven that they were not genuine ballots, nor is it proven that they were not his initials. I find this in Mr. Cummings's evidence, at page 43, of the inquiry:

Q. You told Mr. Powell that you didn't put any number on the counterfoil?—A. Yes.

Q. You simply put the initials?—A. I simply put my initials.

Q. Now, if a voter brought back to you a ballot paper having the counterfoil on it, would you have any means of identifying that with the paper you had given him except what you would conjecture to be your initials put there?—A. No, no means.

Q. Would it be possible—did you examine the colour, thickness or print—of course not, that was on the face—the outside of the ballot was all that you could see?—A. That was all.

Q. Did you examine the colour of the paper of the ballots or the thickness or quality when the ballot was given back to you?—A. No.

Q. You simply took it in good faith from the voter, tore off the counterfoil in the way that has been described, folded it and put it in the box?—A. Yes.

Q. Now, you have said to Mr. Powell you could not be certain these fourteen ballots were the ones given to you by the returning officer?—A. I have.

Q. Could you be certain that they were the ones given by you to the voter if you had not numbered the counterfoil?—A. That is the same position.

Q. Just the same position getting it from the voter as from the returning officer?—A. Yes.

Q. That is to say, it might be possible for a voter to bring back a different ballot bearing your initials and for you to fold it and put it in the box?—A. Yes.

Then, at page 45, I find this:

Q. Mr. Cummings, you made your statement yesterday that you had initialled all these ballots; I want to ask you, as a matter of fact, did you initial any ballots but these handed to the voters in the booth?—A. None.

Now, I consider it to be an extremely unfair thing, and an unusually unfair thing, on the part of my hon. friend to seek to make it appear that Mr. Cummings could be represented as stating that the initials on these ballots were his initials. He stated them to be his initials, and believed them to be so. And everybody believed them to be his initials, and these ballots to be genuine ballots. I think yet, that they may be genuine ballots. But suppose a ballot paper to have been handed to him by a voter, as to which ballot paper we are not prepared, even now, to say conclusively that it was spurious—how are we to hold that it was wrong for him to assume that it was a genuine ballot? And, how can we say it was wrong for him, under that supposition, to swear that they were his initials, when he tells us that if it should turn out that these are spurious ballots, these are not his initials, because, he says, he initialled no ballots, except those he gave to the voters? Surely it is pressing the matter unduly, to say that he swore that these were his initials. Now, I promised I would say something about the micrometer—

Mr. HAGGART. Before going on to that, would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell), please explain how it comes that these thirteen ballots are initialled in ink with a pen, while the others are done with a pencil?

Mr. RUSSELL. There is a great deal in the evidence about that. The evidence is that some of the unquestionably genuine ballots were also written with ink.

Mr. McALISTER. No.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, my hon. friend (Mr. McAlister), is forgetting the evidence.

Mr. McALISTER. Not one.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that there are no ballots in ink in No. 4 Colborne, except these thirteen ballots?

Mr. HAGGART. I would say that the whole thirteen were in ink, and there is only, at most, one which was—

Mr. RUSSELL. No, several. And the question was put to different witnesses at the time, and to different members of the committee, and we had to examine them closely, to determine whether they were written in ink or in pencil. No person, unless his eyesight was very good, could be certain on that point, without examining the ballot papers through a magnifying glass. Are we, then, to hold Mr. Cummings to be a criminal, because, when these ballots were presented to him, bearing what appeared to be his own initials, he did not stop to think whether he had written his initials in ink or in pencil, or whether the ballot handed to him was initialled in ink or in pencil. The paper was brought to him, apparently in good faith, bearing his initials, and he folded it up and put it in the box, without suspicion that there was anything wrong about it. If his attention had been called to any suspicious circumstances, he might have got out his magnifying glass, and looked to see whether the initials were in ink or in pencil. He was not conducting an election trial, and had not had his suspicions aroused then. He did not suspect that anybody was trying to fool him, and I do not know that it would have made much difference to him, if they were. So long as the voter wanted to put in the box the ballot that he handed to Mr. Cummings, I think it probable that Mr. Cummings would have thought it did not make much difference to him, whether it was the ballot he gave him or some other—he simply took it, folded it up, and put it in the box. If he had been intending to put up a fraud, or stuff the ballot box, if he were a man corrupt enough to practice such a trick, would he have left open so plain and obvious means of detection, as that of marking these thirteen ballots and only these in ink? The very fact that my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) has mentioned, is one of the strongest indications of there being no pre-arranged attempt on the part of Mr. Cummings to stuff the ballot box, and no conspiracy on his part. Such a means of detection, even the veriest fool or imbecile would not have left open, if he had been attempting a fraud.

Now, as to the micrometer, the allegation is, that by means of a little steel machine, an expert can tell, by the pressure he puts upon it, and by the indications he gets after the pressure, to distinguish a difference of the thousandth part of an inch between the thickness of the ballot and that of the stub. If this micrometer tells the truth, if it has been made to tell the truth, then, of course, it is undoubted that the ballot that was put in the box was not the ballot that was given to the voter by the deputy returning officer; but it does not at all follow that it was not the ballot given by the voter to Mr. Cummings. All that follows is that this very common and ordinary trick, which is put up frequently in elections, was put up in this case, namely, that the voter, for some reason or other, preferred to hand to the deputy returning officer a ballot which he himself had been previously furnished with. That is all it proves. It is not very important whether it is conceded to be true or not. All I am going to say about the matter is this, that in regard to that micrometer you have to draw two conclusions before you can be certain that the micrometer is telling us the truth. First of all, it is an instrument of extreme delicacy, although it did not look like an instrument of extreme delicacy, it is only a small piece of machinery which I would have supposed would hardly have been adequate to the measurement of such infinitesimal differences of thickness as that of a ballot paper. The thousandth part of an inch is a very extreme fractional dimension, the one-tenth part of an inch is very small.

Mr. McALISTER. Did Harvey not say that the paper was so thin that he could tell from its appearance that it was not made on the same machine?

Mr. RUSSELL. That would prove absolutely nothing.

Mr. DAVIN. May I ask one question?

Mr. RUSSELL. No, I am 'slow of understanding,' and I can only absorb one question at a time. Now, the circumstance which the member for Restigouche (Mr. McAlister) has referred to has absolutely nothing to do with it. The fact that there were two different kinds of ballot papers proves nothing. Because it was demonstrated beyond any possibility of doubt that among the genuine ballots there were two different kinds of ballot paper, and that among the genuine ballots which were handed to the deputy returning officer and actually used for the purpose of voting, there were ballots exactly the same as those thirteen ballots that were called spurious in polling division number 4, Colborne. There is no doubt also that ballots of that kind were mixed up with ballots of the other kind in the same polling booth. And there were the same differences in the dimension, the same differences in the appearance, the same differences in the type, the same differences in the dye from which these were struck between the admittedly genuine ballots that there were between these so-called spurious ballots—I call them spurious for the purpose of argument only—that went into the box in number 4 and the ballots that were admittedly genuine. The explanation is a very simple one, that they had two different dies, both of them official, in order to save press-work in the office where they were printed and in order to do the work more cheaply than if they made all the ballots from one die.

Mr. POWELL. But was it not proved conclusively that all the ballots in that booth, so far as the stubs were concerned, were identical in thickness?

Mr. RUSSELL. I say the proof of that depends upon the micrometer. If the micrometer tells us the truth, then undoubtedly they were different from the stubs, and the conclusion is inevitable that they were not the ones that were given to the voter by the deputy returning officer. I say that has absolutely no tendency in the world to prove that they were wrongly put in the box by the returning officer; all it proves is that, for reasons that we can well understand, for the purpose of a little trick, which we have seen perhaps perpetrated, a little trick which many of us have heard of, and about which I am afraid some of us know more than we ought to—the voter may have desired to put in the ballot box a paper different from that which was given to him by the deputy returning officer, but which implies no fraud at all on the part of the deputy returning officer.

Mr. DAVIN. How will he account for Mr. Cummings's initials being on these ballots?

Mr. RUSSELL. I will not answer that question, for the reason that if the hon. gentleman chooses to treat this House in the same way he treated the Election Committee and to absent himself when matters are being discussed, I do not feel bound to go a second time over the ground already covered. The parties, however, assuming these to be spurious ballots and desirous of having these ballots used, of course, would take care to make the initials such that they would deceive Mr. Cummings and make him think these were the same ballots which he had given to the voters.

The reason why I say there is some doubt about the micrometer is this: None of us were experts, we were entirely at the mercy of the man who brought the micrometer there. He could tell us whatever he pleased, we had no means whatever of checking him. I do not understand the micrometer; I do not know whether the member for Westmoreland or any of us understood to what tricks the micrometer itself might be open. If I were a witness and had the manipulation of a machine like that it might be possible for me by the amount of pressure I placed upon the screw, by the amount of purchase I gave, to show there were one thousandth or two thousandths or three or four thousandths of an inch of difference. The only difference we have to account for is a difference of a one-thousandth part of an inch in the thickness of the ballot paper. I say that difference may have existed, and if so it proves the spuriousness of those ballots, not that they were stuffed in by Mr. Cummings, but that they were different from the ones that he gave to the voter. But I say first of all, it is written down in the books that the micrometer is not a machine which can be absolutely depended upon, but that on the contrary very important and very great mistakes have been made in astronomical calculations by placing dependence upon the micrometer. It is not a machine of absolute accuracy in the first instance, and in the second place, nobody knows whether the witness was able or was not able so to manipulate it as to make it tell whatever story he chose to have it tell to the committee. We have no means of knowing whether the micrometer spoke the truth, or whether, in fact, those ballots were really the very same ballots which were given to the voters by the deputy returning officer. All I say is that it proves nothing whatever to grant that they were spurious ballots, it proves nothing whatever against Mr. Cummings's integrity, nothing against his honour, nothing against his honesty, to prove and to admit that these ballots were different from, and could never have been taken from the stubs which were produced before the Election Committee. The only inference we can draw is that they came in from the outside, and for some reason or other the voter preferred to keep the ballot paper which he had given to him perhaps as a voucher, or to show it to somebody else, or to destroy it, for some reason that we may be able to conjecture, and to deposit in the ballot box a ballot different from that which he received from the deputy returning officer.

Now, I do not think I need spend much time on Farr's case. There was no instance before the Election Committee in which any statement was alleged to have been made by Farr under circumstances when it was possible to check it by the evidence of some other person, that his story was not proved conclusively to be a gross fabrication. A witness was called to say that Farr had alleged that a man named Horton had taken him down to Craig's, wherever that was, and put him through his facings; and that Yates had tried to get him to give up the ballot box because he was not equal to the job. That was a statement attributed to Farr. Well, the facts were that these men knew that Mr. Farr, as some expressed it, had been on a spree, and that he was really incompetent to take charge of the box, that it would be discreditable to the subdivision that he should be the presiding officer there at all. He had been the presiding officer on various occasions appointed by municipal councils of both parties. He had before this, without complaint, conducted election contests in that subdivision. He had had charge of the poll in the plebiscite campaign, and no complaints had ever been made against him, and he was appointed as a mere matter of routine, as a sort of permanent presiding officer, so that, whenever an election came on, I fancy, that every one knew that Jim Farr was a man who would conduct it. The returning officer selected him because he had always been the presiding officer on these occasions. But these prominent Liberals knew that he was not fit to conduct that poll, and they went to him to induce to him to give back his poll books, to give up the box, and to allow the returning officer to select some one else more competent to discharge the duties assigned to him. He did not choose to do so, and the very things that it was thought might happen did happen in that instance. He was on a drunken spree, and may have put wrong ballots into the ballot box, he may have put some ballots in that had no names upon them at all, and some that had no initials upon them. It may be that in his clumsiness, he handed two ballots to a voter so that when the ballots were produced, it was found that some of them came out with initials on the back, but no cross on the face, and others with a cross on the face, and no initials on the back, which was exactly what would happen. How it happens makes no difference so far as the Liberal party is concerned, and so far the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes) is concerned. It does not make any difference what you think about Farr. The hon. member for West Huron, who has been called upon to resign his seat because of these irregularities did not appoint him. He had nothing to do with his appointment; the man had been previously appointed and he had frequently conducted elections before. Some of the prominent Liberals of the subdivision desired to get rid of him, that he should be replaced by a competent officer, and more than that, he voted for Mr. McLean. There is not the slightest evidence to attach any responsibility to the hon. member for West Huron. Why the hon. member for West Huron should be called upon to resign his seat, why he should be called to account for the vagaries of this poor drunkard is something that it is absolutely beyond any capacity I have to understand.

Now we have a new element which has been imported into this matter which was not before us last year, and it is the affidavits made by Pritchett. Mr. Pritchett seems to have the same facility of making affidavits as the immortal Titus Oates. He can always produce an affidavit. There is no limit to the number he can make. There are three affidavits, and they all seem to be made on the same day. Why he should not separate them by a little time and give himself a little rest is something that it is not easy to understand, but this is the kind of evidence upon which we are asked to reopen this case. This man who makes these affidavits, some of which were read in the Ontario assembly a few weeks ago, is a man who himself, confessed on oath that he allowed himself to personate a man by the name of Marshall P. Johnston, that he had accepted the poll books as Marshall P. Johnston, that he had signed a paper, forging the name of Marshall P. Johnston to that paper, and after admitting personation and forgery he went on to tell of a number of other rascalities that he had perpetrated, as described in the affidavit which the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) read to us the other night, or rather he read one paragraph of it. Why he did not read the whole of the affidavit is something that I do not understand. Why he gave it to us in such homœopathic doses is something that he must have reason for, but which no fellow can understand unless he is in the secret. Whether it was to give the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) an opportunity of making the grand spectacular display that he made on a later occasion, I do not know. But, I think it would have been only fair and just, if, on Friday evening, he had given us the opportunity of knowing what was contained in the affidavit instead of doling out a small portion of the affidavit and leaving the rest to be given by the hon. member for Westmoreland on Tuesday afternoon.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I stated—

Mr. RUSSELL. I have not finished.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I have the right to raise a point of order.

Mr. RUSSELL. I will ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) to allow me to finish my statement, and I will yield the floor. I was going on to say that I was not in the House when the affidavit was read by the hon. member for Westmoreland, and I do not know whether it was the same affidavit from which the hon. member for Halifax read an extract on Friday evening. There may be a different one. I was unfortunately obliged to deny myself the luxury of listening to the hon. gentleman having been engaged at another duty upstairs. But if it was the same affidavit from which the hon. member for Westmoreland and from which the hon. member for Halifax also read, then I say that he should have given the whole of the affidavit and not have doled it out to us in fragments.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I read one paragraph of the affidavit and I stated the effect of the rest of the affidavit.

Mr. RUSSELL. My learned friend (Mr. Borden) did not give any names.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I said that the names were given.

Mr. RUSSELL. You did not give the names.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would have given them if they had been asked for.

Mr. RUSSELL. The hon. gentleman did not give us the names.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I will explain the reason why I did not give the names. There has been complaint made in this House about giving names, and I thought it was better to state the effect of the affidavit unless the names were called for by some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. But, I stated the effect of the affidavit.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have such absolute and unbounded respect for the hon. member for Halifax, and such absolute and unbounded belief in anything he would state that I accept his statement as being absolutely true, as to the reasons why he did not give the names, but, if almost anybody else had made that statement, I would have been inclined to have doubted it. Anyway this affidavit maker has been already pilloried in this House, on the strength of the statement made by a learned judge, 'as a self-convicted liar.' He is not only a self-convicted liar, but he is self-convicted of perjury, self-convicted of personation, self-convicted of forgery and almost every other crime in the calendar. He is like the man who desires to abolish the ten commandments. Now we cannot have the opportunity of meeting his affidavit which we would have had if all the facts had been given to us at length on Friday evening, yet we are able to read some affidavits which nullify very largely the effect of his statements, although, to my mind it is absolutely and entirely unnecessary to do so. It is simply preposterous that any action of this House should be based on the statement of a self-convicted scoundrel of such a character as is the man whose affidavit has been brought before the House. If it is necessary to produce affidavits in reply, I have affidavits which I will read to the House. Here is one :

Dominion of Canada, province of Ontario, county of Leeds. To wit:

Mr. MONTAGUE. Did the hon. gentleman read the whole of the last affidavit?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, substantially. It is exactly the same affidavit as the other.

Dominion of Canada, province of Ontario, county of Leeds. To wit:

In the matter of the election for the electoral district of the town of Brockville, held on April 20, 1899, at which William Henry Comstock and Hon. Peter White were the candidates.

I, Rufus W. Smith, of the township of Elizabethtown, in the county of Leeds, farmer, do solemnly declare that:

1. I was the duly appointed deputy returning officer at polling subdivision No. 5, for the township of Elizabethtown at the said election.

2. I have read the statements reported in the newspapers to have been made by Mr. Borden, M.P., in the House of Commons recently relating to the said election, and I say that as far as I am concerned, and as far as I have any knowledge of the actions of the other deputy returning officers, the statements imputing improper conduct to the deputy returning officers are false and unfounded.

3. I do not know the man Pritchett referred to by said Mr. Borden.

4. I received my instructions solely from the returning officer.

5. I conducted the said poll in a fair and impartial manner, and I know no such frauds as are alleged were practised there.

6. I have resided in the said township of Elizabethtown all my life, and have frequently acted as deputy returning officer.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

(Sgd.) RUFUS W. SMITH.

Declared before me at the town of Brockville, in the county of Leeds, this 15th day of May, A.D. 1900.

(Sgd.) E. J. REYNOLDS,
A Commissioner, &c.

That is another mentioned in the affidavit, and I have no doubt that if the names had been given to us on Friday night, we would have half a dozen more solemn declarations from the persons named.

Mr. BRITTON. They will all come.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have no doubt in the world that Mr. Pritchett will be contradicted, in so far as he has not taken previous good care to make his statement in such form that he cannot be contradicted. I have no doubt that he has been instructed to make his declarations in an astute way, so as to try and avoid responsibility. So far as he has made statements affecting the deputy returning officers in the town of Brockville, I believe he will be as flatly contradicted in regard to all as he has in these affidavits now before the House. Now, all those affidavits, so far as I have been able to ascertain, were sworn in Detroit, in the state of Michigan.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Not these affidavits.

Mr. RUSSELL. Not these affidavits, of course. I refer to the affidavits of Pritchett, and so far as I have been able to ascertain they were all sworn in Michigan.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

Mr. RUSSELL. As it is six o'clock, I do not wish to detain the House longer, and I shall conclude. All I have to say in conclusion is: That under all the circumstances; seeing that the law of the land gives such a perfect and adequate remedy; seeing that the tribunal of the House of Commons is confessedly such an entirely inappropriate tribunal for the trial of questions of facts such as these; seeing that any committee which this House can select is bound to be biased by its political complexion; seeing that from the experience of last session the members of this House cannot possibly attend to the proper duties of their constituents, if while this House is sitting they are investigating matters upstairs which can be far better investigated by the courts of the land; seeing that there is grave doubt as to whether this House has any power at all to punish the deputy returning officers who may not be officers of this House and who may not be under its jurisdiction and control; and seeing that any punishment which this House could impose is absolutely and entirely farcical; seeing all this, I for my part am prepared to vote that it is not expedient for us to waste any more time upon an inquiry which could have been, and can now be, so much better conducted before the regular tribunals of the land.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 159)—from the Senate—for the relief of Gustavus Adolphus Kobold.—(Mr. Bennett.)

SUPPLY—BROCKVILLE AND WEST HURON ELECTIONS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross-Robertson) has spoken to me since recess, as he is very anxious to go to Toronto to-night, and would like to interpose to make a brief speech in this debate before going. I myself have no objection to his doing so, if it is with the unanimous consent of the House, so that I shall not lose my right to speak after him, as I propose to do.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). Certainly.

Mr. JOHN ROSS-ROBERTSON (East Toronto). Mr. Speaker, I am much obliged to the House for the courtesy extended to me. I have not very much to say. I have been trying to size up the situation, having regard to the position of the government in this election business. The fact is that the more I look into the matter, the more convinced am I that the government is not only in an unsatisfactory but awkward position, and I am certain that the country will regard it in the same light. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), by his speech yesterday showed all the signs of a first-class scare. He is evidently afraid that if these charges went to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that committee might, perhaps, be overworked; and I can tell the government that it is a pretty black outlook when one of its members is afraid that a committee might have too much work to do, if it had to inquire into all the crimes that are committed on behalf of the government. I would suggest to the government, and to the leader of the government, who has just entered the chamber, that the best way to stop the demand for inquiries, is to stop the supply of crimes. But it looks very much as if the government will neither prevent the crimes nor order an inquiry. I am not a lawyer; I cannot, therefore, enter into the legal quibbles in this case; but it seems to me that this parliament has no higher duty than of exposing the crimes charged in those terrible affidavits which have been produced and read in this House. I grant you that the maker of this affidavit may not be an archangel. It must not be forgotten, that this man Pritchett was a good enough man to do election work for the government, and why then, should he be too bad a man to give evidence for the opposition? If this man Pritchett could travel from constituency to constituency on behalf of the government, why should not the opposition be free to put him in the witness box on behalf of the country and the electorate which has been so gravely wronged by his misdoings? There is an old saying, that when thieves fall out honest men get their own. But, according to the policy of this government the election thieves have only to hang together until it is too late to get at them in the courts, and honest men may then look in vain to this parliament for redress. There seems to be no chance of getting at the truth in these election cases till there is a row, and the row seldom comes until it is too late to use the evidence in the courts. It is clear to me, Mr. Speaker, that the government does not want the truth to come out, either in the courts or anywhere else.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Picton). Mr. Speaker, it is only polite, in replying to the junior member for the city of Halifax (Mr. Russell), to make a passing reference, at least, to that portion of his speech with which he opened, consuming fifteen minutes of time exactly by the clock in dealing with what he considered, and described himself at the conclusion of his statement, as trivial considerations in regard to this question; because, while the hon. gentleman showed some dexterity in the manner in which he could present a portion of a record to the consideration of the House, he took gross liberties with the facts in dealing with what he pretended and boldly asserted had been an attempt on the part of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) to burk an inquiry into the frauds connected with the West Huron and Brockville elections. The extent of the hon. gentleman's audacity throughout that speech can be gauged by a reference to the records of this House in that connection: and since the hon. gentleman devoted so much time in that vain effort, I venture to ask the House to bear with me while I recall to the minds of hon. gentlemen the extraordinary efforts that the senior member for Halifax was compelled to make in order to have a full inquiry at a comparatively early date in this session, and the extraordinary and unparalleled combination, which the record shows, of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, with their supporters, to prevent the hon. senior member for Halifax from having his motion considered. And bear in mind that the hon. gentleman was perfectly willing, as the record shows, to bring that question up at a time when the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) could not put forward that impotent answer, that there was no opportunity for the government to propose an amendment. The hon. gentleman was thwarted in bringing his motion on at such a time. The facts shortly are these: Parliament opened this year on February 1; the Committee on Privileges and Elections was appointed on February 9, but not organized; the notice of motion was given by the hon. senior member for Halifax, that he would move on the following Tuesday to have this matter referred again to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, so that the inquiry, begun with the sanction and approval of the Treasury benches last year, could be completed this session. The motion was attempted to be made on February 14, but an objection from the government side of the House, sustained by the Chair, made it necessary for the senior member for Halifax, to put a notice of his motion on the Order paper, which he did on the same day. The Committee on Privileges and Elections was not organized, and not ready for business of any character, until February 20. When the motions were reached, and the unopposed ones were being first gone through, this motion, by request of the government, was, on February 26, allowed to stand. The government took Thursdays on February 27 as government days, exclusively for government business, and an appeal was then made by the senior member for Halifax to the government to enable him in some manner—and a manner could have been easily devised by the government, if they had the slightest desire to, push the inquiry—to expedite the motion, to inquire into this subject. On March 19, for the first time, I think for years in this House, the government declined to allow the unopposed motions to be gone on with as a matter of course. This action on their part compelled the senior member for Halifax to drop his notice on the Order paper, so that he could, on the motion to go into supply, take advantage of his right, and move it; for if his notice stood on the Order paper, he would have been prevented, under the rules of the House, from bringing up the subject any other time than when his motion was called in due course. But the government were equal to the occasion. The hon. the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), who figures largely, in one connection or another, in all these unpleasant and unsavoury matters, whose name—whether rightly or wrongly, does not concern me at present—was connected with these elections, who was connected undoubtedly with the West Huron election, and that he will not deny—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). What does the hon. gentleman mean by saying that I will not deny?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That the hon. gentleman was in the West Huron campaign.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will not deny that I addressed public meetings in the West Huron campaign.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is sufficient for me. Later on I will make some further reference to the hon. gentleman.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman will have full opportunity.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Thank you.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. But he will understand that he need not indulge in insinuations. Let him say what he desires to state, openly like a man.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before I get through, we will see whether hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches are prepared to act like men, or are going to shelter themselves behind their majority in this House, and compel their supporters to take a position the reverse of that which they took, with one accord, last year, in order to shield, not only these criminals whose names have been mentioned in the evidence time and again, but the government of the day, from the light being cast on their course of action in these matters.

But the Postmaster General, apparently one of the interested parties, who has admitted that in this extraordinary campaign in which, according to the evidence, it would appear, that a seat was stolen, addressed meetings—that hon. gentleman seeing what the senior member for Halifax was about, and the light that would be let into all the doings in that campaign, whether by him or by men working for him, and under his instructions, and in his interest, jumped into the breach, and came on with a motion that has been since relegated to a back shelf on the Order paper among government orders. And, so we find him occupying the attention of the House, and preventing the senior member for Halifax going on with his motion, by prevailing on the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), not to take up supply, but to let him move this meaningless resolution on March 22. Then on March 23, these charges having been for the time prevented from being ventilated, the Minister of Finance came on with his budget speech, the discussion and consideration of which occupied all the time of the House from March 23 until May 4. After May 4, there was an opportunity to invite, if the government dared, the debate that is now on. There was ample opportunity for them to invite the discussion at an earlier day, if time were of the essence, by making their motion that the House go into Committee of Supply when, as they knew from the personal notice given by the senior member for Halifax to the government, that hon. gentleman would at once bring his motion before the House. But no supply was asked. The Minister of Finance took good care not to ask for supply, and give this opportunity from May 4 until May 11, and then the present motion came on. In the face of that record, Sir, I was amazed at the junior member for Halifax having the audacity to take up fifteen minutes of the time of the House in the vain and fruitless attempt to make it appear that the senior member for Halifax had himself been guilty of an attempt to burk an enquiry into these two elections. But such are the facts.

Let me make another reference to the speech just delivered by the junior member for Halifax. A most extraordinary allusion was made by him across the floor to a gentleman for whom he professed to have the highest consideration. After hearing the encomium, he then gave and the remark which followed, trust that I do not myself stand very high in his estimation. When, for instance, the senior member for Halifax, with characteristic sincerity told the junior member for Halifax, who charged him with having suppressed information and names, that he did not disclose them for certain reasons which he gave, but was ready, if any hon. gentleman asked him to do so, to give the fullest information, the junior member for Halifax replied that out of his great personal regard for him, he would accept his statement, but he followed that encomium with this remark—and I shall not dwell upon it, or characterize it—that if that statement had been made by any other hon. gentleman, he would not have accepted or believed it. Knowing the junior member for Halifax as we do, and after listening to him for some time to-day, we must believe that he was thoroughly conscientious and sincere in his speech, but to paraphrase the remark of the junior member for Halifax concerning the senior member for that constituency, I would say that if that speech had been delivered by any other hon. gentleman, we would have supposed that he was insincere, and that he really believed there had been gross wrongdoing which should be investigated, and investigated promptly, and that he was after all devoting his ability for party purposes to the uncongenial work of shielding criminals in wrongdoing.

The hon. gentleman then dealt at considerable length with the record of evidence. I shall not follow him very far in connection with the examination of the evidence, or such parts of it as he has adduced; and, for a reason which, I think, will commend itself to the intelligence of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. First of all, if I followed him correctly, he devoted a great deal of time, he quoted copiously, to prove that Cummings was a perjurer; that Cummings did not know what he was talking about; that Cummings, when he swore the initials on the back of all these ballots were in his handwriting, and that there was no question about it, and when asked to account for it, said that he could not say, was stating under oath that which was untrue. And, after having demolished that statement of Mr. Cummings, I understand the hon. gentleman to have come to the conclusion that Mr. Cummings was a much maligned gentleman on the part of hon. members on this side of the House. Incidentally, I might ask the junior member for Halifax—taking that portion of his argument as serious—whether it would not weaken largely the effect of the affidavits that he produced later on for the consideration of this House (ex parte affidavits not to be referred to a committee, not to have the advantage of cross-examination upon them), when he says himself that a witness who stands high in his estimation when asked by some gentlemen certain questions, stated what was incorrect, and, on further examination explained that all away. The hon. gentleman also, though he approached this question, or attempted to do so, in a judicial spirit, referred to great favours shown by Beck to some of the witnesses, and, of course, drew a conclusion from that. It occurs to me that, if the hon. gentlemen were on the bench of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, and were examining and reviewing this evidence, he would not have mentioned that without having also mentioned that Mr. Holmes was exceedingly attentive to the gentlemen who attended to give evidence regarding the election of Mr. Holmes before this committee. I think the hon. gentleman attempted to prove also that Farr was an imbecile, that he handled himself in such a weak and helpless manner before the committee as to warrant very severe criticisms—

Mr. BRITTON Farr was not before the committee.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It does not matter as to the name, he was speaking of one of the deputy returning officers. And what occurred to me when listening to the hon. gentleman was that this man whom he described was one whom this government were responsible for appointing to take part in that election. But I feel personally relieved from the necessity of following the hon. gentleman through the evidence, for he was frank enough to make confession at the outset as to how he proposed to deal with it. He argued, to his own satisfaction, and from his own experience, that the members of the Privileges and Elections Committee were not competent to deal with matters of fact; that they were blind partisans; that they approached these questions with partisan zeal; that they were incapable of fairly weighing the evidence or reporting the results to this House. He wound up his argument largely with the same conclusion. And I think that, so far as he himself is concerned, we will do him the justice to say that he made out his case—that he convicted himself of possessing a great deal of that spirit to which he so often referred. And is it not an extraordinary thing, Mr. Speaker, that that hon. gentleman who has a fair and legitimate ambition in connection with his profession, through whose mind are now going calculations as to how many gentlemen in this House will return after the next election, who undoubtedly has his eyes fixed on the bench of Nova Scotia, and who no doubt believes that he is just as much entitled, for his advocacy of the policy of the Treasury benches as gentlemen who have preceded him, to a judicial reward, to be paid for these arguments—is it not wonderful that not only that hon. gentleman—we can understand his reasons for the extraordinary change of attitude from last session to this—but also as we shall see, not all, I hope, but the bulk of hon. gentlemen sitting behind the Treasury benches, equally ready to answer the beck and call of the leader of this government, in order to burk this inquiry and prevent it going on as they were ready, all of them, last year, to help it on by sending it to the Privileges and Elections Committee? An hon. gentleman suggests that it was due to the fact that they found it a much more serious investigation than they expected. That might be the reason for this volte-face, that might be the reason for the change of attitude. I rather think it is; but hon. gentlemen opposite, not admitting that, must give some other reasons to the people of this country, altogether independently of this House, for the celerity with which they had decided that the action they took with one accord last session was wrong constitutionally, was wrong from a common-sense point of view and involved an enormous expenditure of money. On these reasons the hon. member for Halifax based his so-called constitutional argument, or argument relative to jurisdiction. Every one of these arguments and suggestions must have been before his mind as a member of the House and a member of the legal profession last year, yet he brushed them aside, and supported the leader of the government in sending this to the Privileges and Elections Committee. But, with the same knowledge, with no new light—he does not profess that he has made any discovery of a radical nature—he is just as ready to turn right-about-face at the suggestion of the leader of the government, and bring forward all this artillery in order to prevent an inquiry being made into these extraordinary cases.

Then, I wondered too, when the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) decanted at some length on the unreliability of affidavits, the great danger involved to all concerned, the encouragement of perjury, the encouragement of even blackmail. For instance, affidavits or solemn declarations, as he explained, are taken privately, ex parte, and then the deponent or declarant is forced on from stage to stage. He is told: You swore so and so in your affidavit to me; you are to go before a committee, and you must stand your ground, or you will be put in a very awkward position. I wonder when the hon. gentleman elaborated that idea.

Mr. COCHRANE. Fabricated it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. 'Fabricated' is the word suggested by an hon. gentleman. At any rate, he gave that explanation to the House. I wonder if he has forgotten a transaction for which the government he supports is responsible and which he has never denounced, in which the so-called 'Manitoba election frauds' were dealt with in precisely the same way? On that occasion, at public expense, not as in this case by private expense, a secret commission roved round the province of Manitoba obtaining these affidavits on the sly and on the quiet; and how was it that, when that so-called nefarious work was being exposed, the hon. gentleman did not suggest that these men were forced from point to point and finally brought into court and confronted with these affidavits, these gentlemen dare not qualify them, dare not recede, but were in fact compelled to take a very extreme position. The hon. gentleman's position is extraordinary. No man can play these pranks in this legislature, taking such an attitude as he was responsible for last session, and then posing as he did to-day and give these reasons for the exact opposite without finding himself in a very sorry plight indeed. The hon. gentleman was driven to that ridiculous argument that I think some other hon. gentlemen suggested, that these affidavits of Pritchett were worthless, that they were not statements really made under oath, that is, that the man who made these statements in the affidavits took care to make them outside of this country, and therefore could not be made responsible in a court of law in Canada. Now, consider the absurd position in which the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) is found in that connection. Here is this man in Canada saying through the hon. members of this House: I am ready to go into a court of Canadian jurisdiction and swear to every statement in that affidavit. And hon. gentlemen opposite who say that they cannot prosecute him for perjury are frightened lest this committee should be seized with the case, and the man be put in such a position that he could be prosecuted for perjury. They are fearful lest this man be given an opportunity to swear to every word of that affidavit, as he stands prepared to do, and become responsible, so as to meet that objection. Does not the hon. gentleman know that in Canada that man has already sworn to statements very similar to these? Does he not know that this man is now under Canadian jurisdiction and responsible for all that?

But the same hon. gentleman again found himself in another extraordinary position. Having argued for some two hours on the utter futility of bringing affidavits before this House, the utter want of jurisdiction in this House or in the committee to inquire into this matter, supporting his leader, supporting the government in their desperate attempt to prevent the full light being shed on all the transactions connected with these elections, the hon. gentleman actually asked this House as a conclusion to that argument to listen to him while he went into the inquiry from his point of view. The hon. gentleman who says that we have not Pritchett here to examine him under oath, to be cross-examined by even the junior member for Halifax so that his whole story may be sifted thoroughly, asked the House to sit and listen, to inquire, to investigate, into these ex parte affidavits and the statements contained in them, by hearing read some other ex parte evidence. Well, no one in this House pretends that because a man makes an affidavit on one side or the other every word of it is capable of actual proof. No one pretends, for instance, that any member of this House is ready to guarantee the statements in any of these affidavits, either those read by the junior member for Halifax or those read by the senior member for Halifax. If you are going to inquire at all, why not inquire thoroughly? Why not bring these men face to face instead of keeping them away from testifying under oath before the committee? Why not bring them man-fashion and openly, let them be confronted before the committee and let us then see who is telling the truth, let us see who will stand the cross-examination, instead of arguing one moment that we have no right to inquire, and then asking us to accept these ex parte affidavits.

Now, I know nothing of these people. I myself, of course, know nothing of Pritchett, and nothing of the gentleman whose declarations were read by the junior member for Halifax. But I put this to you, Mr. Speaker: In all fairness, which statements would you consider the most reliable or the most open, the statement of a witness who was seeking to come before a committee of this House to be cross-examined, a witness who does not content himself with making a general statement, but who gives dates, and names of a series of witnesses, on different occasions, and makes a statement that the most ordinary cross-examiner could test, and makes it with the view of having the whole matter thoroughly investigated—or the statements of these witnesses referring to statements of the hon. member for Westmoreland, but attributing them to the hon. member for Halifax, and who make them knowing that the government, backed by a very convenient and docile majority, propose to prevent their being given an opportunity of being cross-examined on those affidavits?

Then, in connection with the jurisdiction or powers of this House, the junior member for Halifax devoted a great deal of time to the disposal of questions, no doubt important in themselves, but questions as far removed from the subject of the resolution of the senior member for Halifax as they well could be. Let me call attention to the motion which is in your hands. What is asked to be referred? He asks that the poll-books, voters' lists, and all other papers, letters, documents, &c.:

--be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections during the present session of this House for further consideration, and for the purpose of inquiring into and investigating the conduct of the respective returning officers and of the several deputy returning officers and other officers at and in connection with the said several elections respectively, and of reporting thereon with all convenient speed.

Now, in the consideration of that resolution the Solicitor General will not in this debate, as a law officer of the Crown, venture to deny for a single moment our right to act: I venture to say, knowing that hon. gentleman and his standing at the bar, conscious of the responsibility that rests on him, different from that which rests on the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, different from that which rests on any member of the government, recognizing his duty to this House as well as his duty to the government, I venture to say that he will not question the authority and jurisdiction of this House or of a committee to give the fullest consideration and action under the terms of that resolution. I say more, that there never has been a member in this House, Sir John Thompson, Sir John A. Macdonald, or Mr. Blake, or any of the gentlemen referred to in the debates, who ever threw doubt on our right to pass a resolution of that kind, and to send a matter of that kind to a committee to inquire into. It is significant that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) knew it. It is significant that while the hon. gentleman discussed a lot of other interesting questions, expressed his doubt upon some nice points as to whether the returning officers were our officers or whether they were not, discussed the question of pains and penalties and punishments and the imprisonment of them even, the hon. gentleman, in the intense zeal that he has demonstrated ever since he has been in this House to support the government of the day in any position in which they may find themselves, dared not say as a man, as a lawyer, as a member of this House, or as anything else that it was not the right of this House to pass that resolution, and of the committee to act upon it. He went on to deal with questions not connected whatever with any power embraced in the terms of the resolution. He discussed our right to question the seat of a member, with certain exceptions, I think he mentioned the question of disqualification, and that sort of thing. He discussed the Baird case, to which I will make reference later on. I stop here to say that when he spoke of such a resolution, and said that even in that it was shown that there was no jurisdiction to make an inquiry, he forgot that Sir John Thompson moved, and that the House, I think, unanimously,—I will not be sure, as other points came up—but, that Sir John Thompson moved, and that this House carried a resolution in almost, in so far as the empowering words are concerned, identically the language of this resolution to refer the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections with no instructions beyond the instruction to inquire and report. Then, the hon. gentleman spoke of punishment. Who is asking for punishment? Does the resolution, Mr. Speaker, in your hands, suggest that the committee shall even recommend punishment? Does the resolution, Mr. Speaker, in your hands, suggest that punishment is the only object sought to be obtained? Is it not idle to discuss the extent of our power in that connection? Here let me tell the hon. member for Halifax that he has not been as keen, or as close, an observer of the proceedings of this parliament as one might imagine. Has he forgotten that although we cannot do directly certain things we can do them indirectly? Take the case of the Manitoba election frauds. Was there not punishment inflicted at the expense of the exchequer of this country? Was there not punishment inflicted in one case at a cost, I think, of $20,000, $10,000 of it being public money? Cannot this parliament inflict punishment on returning officers just as freely and amply as gentlemen on the treasury benches? Are they greater than this parliament, or is not parliament greater than the government? Cannot it make and unmake governments? Yet the hon. gentleman seriously discusses this as one of the matters we ought to consider before presuming to have an inquiry into the conduct of these officers, whether officers of this House, or officers independently. Then, he came to the position of the returning officers and apologized, if I remember correctly, for differing from Sir John Macdonald and Mr. Blake in that regard. Whether he is right or wrong, or whether these two distinguished gentlemen were right or wrong as to whether these men are our officers, I do not think that that should be introduced into the consideration of so serious a matter as there is before us in dealing with this question. If it is an important matter to decide, if an inquiry is ordered he can bring forward at the committee, as was done in the Baird case, many interesting questions, many interesting authorities and ask the committee to report in regard to the position that has been held. Then, I come to the speech of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, for, after all, he gave the lead to the hon. junior member for Halifax, and marked out the course that he should follow, and like an obedient supporter the hon. gentleman followed. I remember an old member of this House, some years ago, speaking of the wonderful discipline of the Reform party, and of the manner in which they had for a long time back been accustomed to a sudden turn, whether they thought they were right or wrong, as their leader desired. He referred to the statement made by a youth who was very positive of certain things, and who said of a certain statement: I say it is so because mother says it is so, and if mother says it is so, it is so, even if it isn't so. So, the hon. junior member for Halifax, following the position marked out by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, has backed him up as far as he possibly could. That hon. gentleman is an adept in swinging from pillar to post, just according as the interests of his party suggest. For instance, he has told us, that, in the Baird debate, a case that could not be defended on its merits could be saved on a question of jurisdiction and on that one the hon. gentleman apparently has based his argument. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries referred to the ballot box. He spoke of the sanctity of the ballot box—the people's citadel. I believe the time has arrived when the people will consider, that, whatever kind of a citadel the ballot box is, this government is rapidly becoming a citadel for Yukon scoundrels and corrupt returning officers, and that what is far more serious than even that is that there are others behind these corrupt returning officers and Yukon scoundrels. There are, besides the citadel, outlying trenches, and these poor officers, in one case, or the other, are often so essential to the government, who are participating in their wrong and who are really as guilty as these men, force the government of the day to stand by them lest the citadel itself will be taken and destroyed. The hon. Postmaster General said what, in some instances, would be a reasonable thing, even from the hon. Postmaster General, and that was, not to make insinuations but to talk out man fashion. Let us talk over this thing in a manly way, let us leave insinuations. Let me put a case to him, and if the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) were here, I would like to couple them both together in putting that question. I was beginning a little while ago to say, that, right or wrong—I have no evidence or information myself that would warrant me in making this charge—but, right or wrong, these two gentlemen, one of them, I think, admitting to-night, took part in the campaign in West Huron on the public platform, and I think, also in Brockville where they took part in the same manner. Now, it has been said that these two hon. gentlemen did a great deal more than take part in the election from the public platform. If the hon. gentleman says, do not insinuate, but speak out boldly I will do so. This is what is going through the air. It is, so far as I know, wholly unsubstantiated by testimony, but it is that these scoundrelly officers, these men who are worse than scoundrels, if the charges made by Pritchett, that he is ready to swear to and be examined upon, are true, are being protected because the government of the day and these two hon. members of the government are so far involved in that election that most damaging information might incidentally come out. I think it due to the hon. Postmaster General and to the hon. acting Minister of the Interior, that they should not be under a suspicion of that kind, cruel as it may be, and which is hovering about, but, that they should be most anxious to expedite an inquiry, that they should be anxious to vindicate the whole of their party traditions in regard to the powers of parliament to fully investigate such matters advocated so earnestly in the past, and that it would be in their interest to court the fullest inquiry. Would it not be in the interest of the government to court the fullest inquiry, and even to hunt down the men against whom these affidavits have been made, as they hunted down the men in the province of Manitoba who were supposed to be working in the Conservative interest; by detectives, by lawyers, by solicitors by the score, and by secret inquiries extending over months? What a contrast between the conduct of the government in that case and their conduct in this? What an extraordinary contrast between the treatment of their officers working in the interests of these two important and influential ministers, as is alleged, and their treatment of the officials alleged to have been working in the interests of their opponents! I say that the conclusion will be irresistible over the land, that the ministers of the Crown connected with these election campaigns dare not have further inquiry, and so have dragooned their supporters into pulling them through this ordeal, by preventing a full and untrammelled inquiry by a proper and ordinary committee of this House. It is absolutely unparalleled I believe, with the exception of certain cases that have occurred in the time of this very government that an inquiry of this kind once begun has been suddenly closed. One was the Yukon inquiry, and the other, that conducted by myself, with the assistance of the Prime Minister, into the causes of the resignation and retirement of Major Walsh from the public service. Those two inquiries were begun, and those two inquiries were stopped. This present inquiry which we are discussing was begun and this is also stopped. These three inquiries were all in the time of this government, and they were all stopped when the information elicited became damaging and dangerous. When the Yukon inquiry was begun, as shown by the report of the Minister of the Interior to council, no limitation with regard to August 25 was inserted, but, when the order in council was passed, the language used in it showed that Mr. Ogilvie's commission was to be limited as to time. That ruling came in the middle of the commission, when it was found that men were ready, at great cost to themselves, to come forward and give evidence. That inquiry was practically stopped, notwithstanding the promises made by the ministers. The Minister of Marine in this House, on April 14, 1899, speaking as to the Yukon inquiry, said:

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

There will be no skulking behind any law points. There will be no attempts to evade investigation on the ground that the commission had no authority. If that commission does not give authority another can.

Was there skulking behind law points today? Was there an attempt to evade the investigation on the ground that this House had no authority? Why, that is the only case the government has set up. The Minister of Marine said, with regard to the Ogilvie commission, that the time would not be limited to August 25. Mr. Ogilvie wrote to this government, when he himself was seized with the unfairness of it, when the injury to the government in consequence of such a contention being upheld became apparent, Mr. Ogilvie wrote to the government at the very beginning of that commission, namely, February 20, 1899:

I regret to inform you that the royal commission for the investigation of charges against officials has, to an extent, fallen through. Mr. Armstrong, chairman of the miners' committee, who drew up the memorial which led to the issuance of the commission, and Dr. McDougall, the secretary, withdrew from the investigation when they learned that the scope of the commission only included what occurred previous to August 25, the day of the memorial. I would have been quite willing to go on taking cognizance of everything up to date, but the question was raised and could not be avoided. There is no doubt, from the wording of the document, that only such things as were related to or came within the scope of the memorial could be investigated under the commission.

Now, here is his recommendation:

If you can see your way clear to renewing the commission and extending it, please do so at the earliest possible date. I think it would be politic to do it, and I would urge you, as far as lies in my power, to grant this, for the reasons I have above stated.

Notwithstanding the facts I have mentioned, be it known that that document was in existence when the Minister of Marine made the speech which I have quoted. Be it known also, that although that document was asked for it never saw the light of day outside of the department until this year, and that investigation, and that request of Mr. Ogilvie, was denied. Too much had already come out, even though the tribunal was wholly unfit to satisfactorily cope with the subjects referred to it. Then, in regard to the Walsh matter, a most extraordinary thing occurred. After having received from the Prime Minister a great courtesy—permission to look at a public file in connection with the retirement of Major Walsh from the public service, on discovering that that file had been burned in the West Block, I received permission from the Prime Minister to interview the Comptroller of Mounted Police who was familiar with all the facts connected with the investigation that had taken place into the accounts and transactions of Major Walsh as an officer of the government. I received authority from the Prime Minister to use a memorandum from the Comptroller of the Mounted Police, after it had been submitted to the Prime Minister. The facts evolved from the Comptroller of the Mounted Police were so serious that the Prime Minister told me he would recall that permission and would not permit me to use as an official document, the memorandum recorded by his own officer, after the conversation to which I have referred.

Now, Mr. Speaker, those are the only cases I know in which an inquiry of public or semi-public, of a formal or semi-formal character, have been begun under the authority of the government or of the parliament here, and stopped just when the evidence was damaging to the character of some one, or to the government responsible for it. But, these gentlemen who have brought up in grand array this challenge for precedents, this interrogation into our powers, these ingenious suggestions as to whether what we are doing is fair or unfair; what do these gentlemen do when the men who are aimed at are their political opponents? Why, on the smallest evidence—they talk of a self-convicted liar—on the evidence of a man whose character was denounced in the investigation by the bench itself as a self-convicted scoundrel. These hon. gentlemen never questioned the powers of parliament; but behind the back of parliament, stealthily, quietly and secretly, the government began to spend our money by the hundreds and the thousands in order to fasten, if they could, charges of ballot-stuffing, if you please, on the shoulders of Tory returning officers in the province of Manitoba. Criminal prosecutions, says the junior member for Halifax, are for local governments, not for the Federal; this government cannot appear in the courts and take charge of criminal prosecutions. No, but when their opponents are involved, they can go in at the back door, after taking the money out of the treasury of this country, and pay the men in the provinces. They can work and co-operate with friendly Grit governments throughout this country to ferret out all they can against their opponents, and then prosecute them at the public expense. But to-day, says the Minister of Marine, look at chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes of 1886; that is sufficient; it provides for a full and unlimited inquiry. Just put up your money and bring on your evidence, and you can obtain nearly all you could hope to obtain in the Privileges and Elections Committee. Why did not these gentlemen in July, 1896, just after they got into office, think of chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes of 1886? Why did they not write to 'my dear Sifton,' and tell him, when he asked them to supply the money to bring over Pinkerton's detectives, when he asked them to fee half the bar of Winnipeg at the expense of the public exchequer: Look at chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes of 1886. What was the result? The expenditure of $10,000 of the public money of Canada on the sly, and the conviction of one man charged with ballot-stuffing; but so far as the evidence goes to show, convicted really because he had admitted that he was a blackmailer and had blackmailed the Conservative candidate in the riding. Let us look a little at the circumstances for the purposes of comparison, to see what sort of a case you require to get the power of the great Grit government to move, when they refuse to consider this case as of great importance. Now, the evidence which I hold under my hand, and to which I will only briefly refer for the purpose of comparison, is as follows: Mr Sifton—and I refer to him as Mr. Sifton, because he was not then a member of this House, but a member of the local government—knew something better than spending his own money or his friend's money in prosecuting election petitions, and bearing the very heavy expense of supporting charges against his political opponents. Before the petitions were filed, according to the language of Mr. Howell, he was put onto a scheme to educate deputies to defraud the electors. As Mr. Howell says, that was the initiation of this business, and let us see the connection of the gentlemen now on the Treasury benches with it. Let us see whether their answer to Mr. Sifton was as summary as the answer we are now receiving from them—whether it went into constitutional questions and questions of criminal jurisdiction. Here is a letter of July 17, 1896, marked confidential, and addressed to the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, Ottawa:

Dear Mr. Laurier,—The result of the late elections in some of the constituencies in Manitoba indicated to me that a fraud of some kind had been perpetrated in the interest of the government candidates.

We have heard a great deal in this debate about being specific. We are told, make your charges, give the names of your witnesses, let us see all the proof, and then, forsooth, there is not to be any prosecution of this kind with an expenditure of public money for the purpose; but then we may be permitted to go to some committee. Then, says Mr. Sifton:

I at once placed several detectives at work.

Again:

As I have said above, detectives are now at work, and my purpose is to promptly but secretly push the inquiry, and secure evidence upon which to convict the guilty parties. It is also important—

Now, mark, Mr. Speaker, how wide a range of vision, not confined to the province of Manitoba, had this gentleman of detective proclivities with regard to his opponents:

It is also important that no means be left untried to unearth these frauds in the province of Ontario, and punish every one guilty of complicity.

Now, the hon. junior member for Halifax referred to the waste of public money in pushing an inquiry into the conduct of the deputy returning officers in two counties of Ontario; but Mr. Sifton would rebuke him if he were here, because he thought it necessary to ransack not only the whole province of Manitoba, but the province of Ontario as well. Then promptly came an answer from the Prime Minister, not referring him to any chapter of Revised Statutes or to the fact that the responsibility for the administration of criminal law was upon Mr. Sifton's government and not on his; but a telegram as follows:

I feel confident that you will unearth the most odious conspiracy which has taken place for many long years, and we will most willingly furnish the necessary funds for the service, in order to carry on the work in which you are engaged.

No authority of parliament. Not a man of them dared to come to the House, though it sat the next month, and tell the House what they were doing with the public funds of this country. Nor did they tell the House the next year what they were doing with this money. It was not until the Auditor General, in connection with the various financial and liting operations conducted by Mr. Sifton and Mr. Howell to the extent of $10,000 in the end, ventilated the matter a year after the whole thing had been going on in this secret manner. Not a man in the Manitoba legislature knew of the co-operation of this government. Now, let us see what the evidence showed, and what warranted this extraordinary course on the part of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. They did not dare, at any time, to ask this parliament for the whole $20,000 which had been expended. They were caught red-handed, and after the matter had come before parliament, though they had taken $10,000, they dare not ask parliament for the balance, and had to get it out of private pockets. But, in connection with this matter, is it not important to know on what information the mills of the gods began to grind? Is it not important to know what started the whole machinery of the Federal government and the local government on the tracks of these people? Mr Howell told the committee that from June, 1896, before these gentlemen got into office, until December of that year, he was fishing for evidence all over the province of Manitoba. With Pinkerton's detectives by the score, with his little army of Grit lawyers of Winnipeg, this gentleman was fishing for evidence to expose this 'most odious conspiracy' to defraud the people by tampering with the ballot boxes, and their efforts resulted in the conviction of a man who admitted that he had tried to blackmail the Tory candidate. On mere suspicion, the gentleman at the head of the government here, started this expensive machinery. But, says the junior member for Halifax, following in the wake of the others who are attempting in this debate to burk this inquiry, this man Pritchett, this self-convicted liar, was actually paid for his affidavit. This man, he said, whom we are asked to accept as a witness, actually received money for the information that has been used by the opposition. Well, some of the money that those gentlemen gave on the sly to the province of Manitoba and Mr. Sifton—quite a portion of it went to buy Mr. Freeborn and keep him comfortable—went to pay his bills, and to pay for the evidence given by him.

One of those gentlemen came to court, and the other is only too ready to come and make a statement, but these hon. gentlemen say that men of that kind are always ready to make such statements, that they are always ready to admit that they have done wrong. But there are facts to which they can testify, and in the case of Pritchett, the public knows that it would be impossible for him, unless he were stating the truth, to injure any man by his statement, and his statement is credible because of the circumstances, the details, the names he gives and the days and the dates to corroborate his story. We have heard what has been said of Pritchett, who has not been examined and cross-examined, who has not had the opportunity of confronting those to whom he has referred. But what was said of Mr. Freeborn by the Chief Justice of Manitoba, from the bench? This, he said, in his charge to the jury:

Now, you saw Freeborn—

After they ransacking the province of Manitoba for six months, as Mr. Howell has said, this is what the chief justice said of the chief informant:

Now, you saw Freeborn and heard him give his evidence, and I must say there is nothing about his character to be commended. The only thing about it is that he frankly owned up to having been engaged in crooked work and in a number of transactions which were far from creditable to himself. . . . Now, it is very often necessary to use such persons in connection with such matters. Frequently criminals who have been engaged in such matters and who split on their associates, come forward, and the Crown has to use them for the purpose of bringing other criminals to justice.

As the saying is: 'When knaves fall out honest men get their own.' We want to know who are the other knaves besides Pritchett. We want to know if those returning officers, or men in power, were implicated in the knavery. We want to know if such men enabled those other knaves to perpetrate such a bold and audacious crime as has been laid at their door. That is a subject into which all parties in this House ought to be ready to inquire, but which the government are making such desperate efforts to prevent being investigated. What was Sir Oliver Mowat's opinion, who, when Minister of Justice, used to be quoted with great respect, as to what was proper as well as legal, and his opinion applies to this case, as well as to the Manitoba matter? This is what he says, and the information upon which he acted:

I did, as a law officer and a member of the Dominion government, consider it proper, under the circumstances, that the expenses attendant upon the prosecution of the persons charged with fraud in connection with the Manitoba federal elections, should be paid out of the Dominion treasury. In the British North America Act—

And I would ask the attention of the junior member for Halifax, to this, but I find he has become a degenerate, and is not in the House:

In the British North America Act there is nothing specific as to the expenses of criminal proceedings, and the question depends in each case on what is reasonable.

He says further :

I did approve of the previous proceedings heretofore taken, so far as I was aware of them. The instructions we gave Mr. Howell were to proceed with the investigation and to prosecute such of the guilty parties as he had or should get sufficient proof against to entitle him to verdicts. A great deal had to be left to his discretion in the matter, if the investigation or prosecution were to be effective. We had confidence in his prudence and judgment. The frauds which were ascertained or were believed to have been committed were of great magnitude and accomplished by novel and dangerous devices, and it was—

I ask particular attention to this :

—in the public interest to expose and punish the perpetrators, if possible, notwithstanding the expense might be considerable.

One would suppose that Sir Oliver Mowat had anticipated the statement of the junior member for Halifax, and desired to condemn it with all the weight of his experience, when he penned those lines, for the statement I have quoted was a written answer to a written question. Further on Sir Oliver Mowat said :

I think that where a crime has been committed, or is believed to have been committed, in respect of Dominion elections in the province of Ontario or any other part of Canada, and the public interest requires its investigation and prosecution on the part of the Dominion, it would be proper for the Dominion to undertake such proceedings and prosecutions, having regard to all the circumstances. It would seem to me unpardonable that in such a case the criminals should escape exposure and punishment unless the provinces should undertake the expense. Every case should be determined on its own circumstances, on the responsibility of the government having the confidence of parliament.

Could there be a more complete answer to all the miserable quibbles suggested on the other side, as to our authority and right to investigate into these matters in order to find out the guilty parties and obtain and have proper punishment inflicted on them ?

But on this subject, I want you, Mr. Speaker, to listen to words, of greater wisdom, perhaps, that fell from the mouth of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). When the subject came before this House, that hon. gentleman gave expression to these views :

If ever there was an incident in the history of this country—

And this was before the investigation was concluded. It was on May 16, 1899.

—where we enjoy the privileges of responsible government, and where every man is entitled to the free, untrammelled and sacred exercise of his franchise, if ever there was an incident that deserved the most exhaustive investigation at the hands of the government, in which every effort could be put forward to try and catch the individuals that were guilty of the offences which were perpetrated in that province, I say, it was in connection with the election of Mr. Macdonald in Manitoba. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) says that there was no evidence before the government and before Mr. Sifton, to rest any charge, but that he started on a fishing expedition. It is a well known fact, it is on record in 'Hansard,' it was proved before the committee in 1897 and 1898, at least in one polling subdivision—

Listen to this, if you please :

—in at least one polling subdivision, thirty-four men came forward and actually swore that they had voted for the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford), when there were only twenty-three ballots in the ballot box.

One would suppose he was referring to the very case which is now under consideration.

There were other cases of a similar character, under similar conditions. If these things—

Mark this, too—

If these things came to the notice of the hon. Minister of the Interior he undoubtedly did what he ought to do, what any patriotic man would do, what was right for any man to do, and what the people of this country gave him credit for doing—he took immediate steps to try to catch and punish the men guilty of these transactions.

There was a case where their efforts to catch these men involved no risk to the government or their friends. Only in that respect does it differ from this case. No one will deny that in this case there was a possibility of some very awkward evidence being given implicating others than those whose names have been so frequently before us. But we have the language of another statesman who last year agreed in directing the course of this House in one direction and who now is endeavouring to direct it in another direction—the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. This is one of the occasions when they called in the weight of Sir Oliver Mowat's name to protect them. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, referring to the Minister of Justice of that time, said :

That experienced statesman advised the Premier—

But that experienced statesman takes great care to say that all the information he had on the subject was from the Premier, and I have shown what the Premier had.

That experienced statesman advised the Premier in the course he should take, and the course the Premier took was taken with Sir Oliver Mowat's sanction. Sir, on what did he advise him? He found there had been committed one of the greatest crimes of the century.

The same crimes as are charged to have occurred in these two Ontario constituencies.

One of the greatest crimes of the century—a conspiracy having for its object to defeat the will of the people in the elections of 1896; a conspiracy which, if it had succeeded, might well have defeated the will of the people throughout Canada; a conspiracy so vile that hon. gentlemen opposite might, by means of it, have been returned to power; a conspiracy to stuff the ballot boxes of every constituency in the province and to return the minority candidate where necessary. The hon. gentleman boasts that the prosecution were unable to succeed in convicting the parties who were charged. Sir, it is true that in many cases they were unable to succeed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There was not a man indicted.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think that proves very much. One man, at any rate, was convicted, and was sentenced to his term. But, whether they succeeded or not, that such a conspiracy could be carried out, would render popular government unnecessary. It would place a dictator in the Premier's chair, and leave him there as long as he pleased to remain, irrespective of the will of the people. If an hon. gentleman—

I ask particular attention to this :

If an hon. gentleman, standing in the position of my hon. friend the Premier, and having the prima facie evidence before him of this conspiracy refused to expose the conspiracy, would be derelict in his duty. There is no use in arguing it now; there will be a time when it can be argued.

I could refer, but I hesitate to do it, being in the highest degree derelict in their duty. I say they are in possession of far stronger evidence than the mere suspicion of Mr. Sifton. They are seized of evidence which not only suggests but proves that in many cases gross frauds were practised in these two ridings, West Huron and Brockville. And, in the language of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in dealing with the case in which he thought his opponents were affected, the government will be derelict in their duty, if they do not go—not as far as he suggested they should go, I do not say or ask that, but I ask at any rate they go as far as proposed by the resolution of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) and refer this matter for inquiry to the Privileges and Elections Committee.

Now, I said I would refer to the case of Baird. It is only necessary for the purposes of my argument to point to the distinction that all agreed upon. So far as my recollection of the discussion goes, on both sides there was a distinction which was seen then and is easily seen now, and to which I have already adverted—the difference between a proposal to act and a proposal to inquire. As to the proposal to act, there are authorities, and they were mentioned in the debate, though disputed by hon. gentlemen opposite, who declared that the return of a member, except in certain circumstances of disqualification, could not be questioned. For instance, a petition challenging the seat of a member could not be received in this House while the legislation similar to that in England, which is mentioned in this debate, existed. So far as I recollect, and I have refreshed my memory by looking over the report of the debate, no one denied our right to inquire into any subject, the elections, the returning officers, or anything that the mind of man can conceive of.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Would it not be ridiculous to say, that because we had temporarily denuded ourselves of certain powers, we would not institute an inquiry into the very subject that we had so dealt with in order that we might consider whether other legislation was necessary, in order even that we might consider whether the legislation passed should not be repealed. I need not, however, dwell on that, but I will refer to May's Parliamentary Practice, which bears upon the point I am at the moment dwelling upon :

A few words will suffice to explain the proceedings of the House, so far as its judicature is still exercised in matters of election. It being enacted by section 50 of the Election Petitions, &c., Act, that 'no election or return to parliament shall be questioned except in accordance with the provisions of this Act,' doubts were expressed whether this provision would not supersede the jurisdiction of the House, in determining questions affecting the seats of its own members, not arising out of controverted elections. It is plain, however, that this section applied to the questioning of returns by election petitions only. Under the procedure in force before the Elections Petitions Act, 1868, when returns were questioned by petition, the matter was determined by the statutory tribunal; otherwise the House uniformly exercised its constitutional jurisdiction. And such continues to be the position of the House, after the judicature of its election committees had been transferred to the judges.

I could refer, but I hesitate to do it, taking the view I do of this question, to Sir John Thompson, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the present Minister of Justice, in order to show that, so far as Sir John Thompson was concerned, he neither directly or indirectly challenged the right to refer matters to the Privileges and Elections Committee, but, on the contrary, he moved a resolution to be referred to that committee without limiting the powers of authority of the committee. But, the present Minister of Justice went a great deal further in regard to the law of the land. And the language of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was as positive in support of the view he expressed then as his language now is positive in support of the contrary view. But that, of course, will surprise nobody. That hon. gentleman can change his views with unexampled rapidity. The function of parliament to inquire, I submit, is absolutely unlimited. It can recommend legislation, or institute a prosecution. Take the case of McGreevy and Connolly: It was by virtue of the inquiry into that case conducted in this House that this government took proceedings by proper authority in the Ontario courts; and we have also the cases in Montreal, and all the expenses of these prosecutions were defrayed out of the federal treasury. So that no point can be made in that connection. But it is interesting to recall to mind a statement made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries who has been suggesting our narrow powers :

There are higher considerations involved in this matter than those which would govern a court of nisi prius.

I need not refer to the more recent authority, which is amazing, at least the contradiction of it is amazing, approaching rebellion. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries referred almost contemptuously to the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Well, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has not followed his profession. But, the Prime Minister of this country is equally subject to that contemptuous reference by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; for these gentlemen last year took part not only in inviting in the fullest manner this investigation, but they took it for granted that the position I have myself been generally supporting in regard to our right to refer, was unquestionable. So there is that extraordinary condition of affairs, not so extraordinary of late, because the disagreement between the members of the government is not only observable in matters of this kind but in other matters of government. Now, it is not necessary to refer the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to his speech in that Baird case where he said there were other questions involved than the simple question of an assize. With all the ingenuity that hon. gentleman may possess, he could not conceal one of the happy ideas that had occurred to him and no doubt to his colleagues, why it would be safer for the government and these returning officers that this matter should be dealt with by a court. He satisfied himself that if there were fraud the question for whom a witness voted could not be put to him in a court of law, and therefore, says the minister, this matter should be referred to the courts where the facts could be probed to the bottom, although a few minutes before he had shown that undoubtedly the courts, according to their machinery, and rules, and the rules of nisi prius, would be powerless as compared with our committee to probe this matter to the bottom. So it is clear that that broad view of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is based on a very narrow wish and a very narrow desire.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to occupy so much of the time of this House as I have done, and I have hurried as fast as I could over the various questions that have come up. But I warn the government, in concluding these observations, of the consequences of this the third attempt to burk a proper inquiry. I warn the government that the public mind of this country is already disturbed in connection with the open corruption and fraud that has been committed at elections during their regime. For almost the first time in the history of the country religious bodies and non-political men are adverting to these matters, and if they find a disposition on the part of the parliament of Canada to prevent a full and thorough inquiry into such questions as are raised by this resolution, there will be consternation over the land. The position of the government in regard to the Yukon, I am satisfied, is not satisfactory. I believe throughout the west of this country, at any rate, there is most intense dissatisfaction with the government's evident cowardice in that connection. I say that when we find the names of ministers of the Crown connected with these matters now under consideration, recognizing that an inquiry had been begun, that a most serious affidavit has been produced, involving the most serious consequences on all who were guilty of crime, and that at that particular juncture an inquiry should be stopped at the request of the government, the conclusion will be that the government are equally guilty with the parties charged.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I must confess that I did not originally intend to take any part in this debate. Unfortunately I was absent last year when the reference to the committee was ordered, and I was also absent at the time the witnesses were being examined before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. But I have read carefully the speech made at the time that the reference was ordered by the hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden); I have also read at intervals the evidence given before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate that has taken place here on the application now made for a renewal of the inquiry. I must confess that while I was much struck with the calm and deliberate statement of this case, made in his usual able manner, by the senior member for Halifax, I could not help feeling that that speech was very much more suggestive than it was conclusive. It seemed to me it suggested many things, but it proved little. I might say, absolutely nothing. Now, I mean to be very brief; and at the outset I would like to put this question: What are the facts which we are called upon to deal with? What are the facts connected with the inquiry at its inception? What is the present position of this case which we are called upon to deal with, practically, as a court of parliament? The West Huron election took place on the 21st of February, 1899. All the facts connected with the alleged wrong-doing were known to hon. gentlemen opposite within ten or twelve days after the election took place. They certainly were known to them previously to the 30th of March, because on that day several affidavits were sworn to. The Brockville election took place on the 20th of April, 1899. Many facts revealed in the course of the investigation so far, were also known to hon. gentlemen opposite within a few days after that election took place. Now, what was the position of hon. gentlemen opposite when these facts were brought to their knowledge? As the Minister of Marine and Fisheries pointed out in his able speech yesterday, they might have proceeded by way of a contestation of the election, they might have proceeded by way of a petition under chap. 10 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, an Act respecting corrupt practices; they might have proceeded by way of an information laid before a police magistrate charging an offence against those parties under the section of the Criminal Code; and, finally, they might have adopted the proceeding that has been adopted here of referring the matter to a committee. They chose the latter, and I put to myself the question: Why have they chosen this latter procedure?—the most unsatisfactory. It seems to me, the most inconclusive, if they are really desirous of finding out the truth, and, having ascertained what the truth was, of really punishing the culprits. They chose a method which was unreasonable, which would inevitably result in absolutely defeating the object they pretend to have in view. I say that it was the most unsatisfactory method they could adopt. When I listened to-night to the speech made by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), I was amazed. He will pardon me for borrowing an expression from a vocabulary that is well known to him. I was amazed at his remarks when speaking of the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), having said that the Committee on Privileges and Elections was not such an impartial tribunal as should be charged with the duty of investigating of a judicial affair of this sort, because, I find, that the hon. member for Pictou, on a previous occasion, used language almost identical in every respect with the language used by the hon. member for Halifax this afternoon, and which appears to have startled him so much. In connection with the Queen's County case, the hon. member for Pictou spoke on the subject of having the investigation referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and what did he say, among other things? He said:

Surely no one but a hypocrite would say that we can enter into this case utterly devoid of partisan feeling and political bias. If that is the case, is it not wise to follow the letter, or, at all events, the spirit of the Act which relegated all these political or quasi-political questions to the legal tribunals? I think such a reference would be a result which every one should strive to reach, a result that would take from us the responsibility of dealing with what I have pointed out to be a question in which we are all personally interested.

In what respect does this language differ from the language used by the hon. junior member for Halifax this afternoon, and which appears to have so violently startled the hon. member for Pictou?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) allow me to say a word here, because he has misapprehended my remarks to-day?

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Certainly, go ahead.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not question the statement made by the hon. junior member for Halifax, that a committee of this House was necessarily partisan, or to some extent partisan, and was composed of strong party men on each side. The only reference I made was to the manner in which he had dealt with the evidence or examined it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Of course, I accept the correction of the hon. gentleman, but, I understood him to challenge the language used by the hon. junior member for Halifax, and which, in my judgment, was almost identical with the expressions used by the hon. gentleman himself. The hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House chose the most ineffective procedure of all the five methods that they could have adopted of dealing with this question, and I am now going to state my deliberate opinion, so far as I am concerned, as to the right to refer a matter of this kind to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. In my opinion, the trial of controverted elections by the courts does not in any way deprive the House of Commons of the powers it possesses generally in respect to the qualifications or disqualifications of its own members, or the conduct of officers in its service, whether permanently or temporarily. Formerly the parties complaining of an undue return were heard at the Bar of the House, and this having been found an exceedingly cumbersome practice, was superseded, in the early part of this century, by the appointment of a committee of inquiry, to inquire into and report upon a controverted election, under the Grenville Act. This Act was amended by Sir Robert Peel's Act, and ultimately, investigation by the committee was superseded by investigation of the courts. The judges report the result of the investigation and trial to the Speaker, and that report is treated by the House in some respects as the report of the committee was under the former system. So that, to that extent, but to that extent alone, the House divested itself of its authority, and I have to say now, that it is without precedent that the House should undertake to conduct an inquiry which appropriately falls within the provision of an election petition. If that be the case, in this case, the most effective method would have been, with the knowledge that the hon. gentlemen had, to have contested this election, and under the Controverted Elections Act to have made the returning officer a party to that contestation. The result would have been that the returning officer would have been brought before the court as also the deputy returning officers connected with the elections and dealt with summarily by the judge charged with the conduct of the trial. That would have been an effective method of disposing of the whole matter, but what would necessarily be the result of an inquiry, no matter how full, no matter how complete, conducted by this House. It is undoubted, and I challenge the hon. member for Pictou to point to a single expression of opinion in any quarter which would sustain the contrary, that the only result of an investigation before the Committee on Privileges and Elections would be, in so far as effective punishment is concerned, a report of the proceedings of the committee made to this House, and an order given by this House to proceed against these persons before the courts, so that with this inquiry conducted before the House, when everything would be completed, you would have to go to the courts, or the tribunal to which you should have gone at the beginning. Now, dealing with the matter we have in hand, what is the position of this investigation? What are we asked to do? Last July the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), moved to refer the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. At that time he was in possession necessarily of all the facts upon which he could base the serious charges he then made. He was then, as I pointed out a moment ago, in possession of all the evidence upon the subject into which he wanted an inquiry. Dealing with the West Huron question, what is the question into which he wished to inquire at that time? He wished to inquire into the conduct of deputy returning officers at poll No. 4, Colborne, and poll No. 3, Goderich. He wished to inquire into the conduct of two men who had acted in connection with the election in West Huron in reference to the placing of ballots in the ballot box. At that time there were present in the polling booth the two men incriminated, the two poll clerks, and there also were present, at the outside, four scrutineers at each polling place. That would mean six men in each polling place, or, in the two polls, twelve men who would be supposed necessarily to have an intimate knowledge of the grievances of which he complains. We had that inquiry held, the hon. gentleman summoned ninety-nine witnesses before the committee, we had these ninety-nine witnesses examined, the committee held twenty-five sittings occupying seventeen days, over 500 pages of printed evidence were taken, and when the hon. gentleman has done all that, he comes here and says he has not completed his inquiry, and asks leave to begin again. I ask you, after all this has been gone into, is it a reasonable request, or is my hon. friend in such a position that he is obliged to admit that he was fishing for evidence, that he had no foundation for the charges he laid in July, 1899, and that he was not able, with all the valuable legal assistance he had at his disposal, to make out his charges, notwithstanding that he has examined these ninety-nine men, had all these sittings of the committee and taken all this evidence?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will my hon. friend permit me; perhaps he does not understand. There were nine witnesses that the committee refused to hear for want of time. He is also possibly not aware that the cross-examination of one of the deputy returning officers, Mr. Cummings was not completed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Of course in this instance, as in many others, those who trust to the official records of the House are sometimes at a disadvantage.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That appears in the report.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I will read the report:

The Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections beg leave to present the following as their third report:

Your committee under the order of reference made on the 9th day of July, 1899, have partially inquired into and investigated the conduct of the returning officer and of certain of the deputy returning officers at the last election for the electoral district of the west riding of the county of Huron.

That in so doing they have heard the testimony of ninety-nine witnesses, and have submitted interrogatories for the examination of the county court judge of the county of Huron of four witnesses; that twenty-five sittings have been held for the purpose of taking evidence, covering seventeen days, and comprising seventeen morning sessions and eight afternoon sessions; that the committee determined to hold the last session for the examination of witnesses on Monday, the 7th day of August, 1899, and for that reason nine witnesses then in attendance for the purpose of giving evidence were discharged without examination; twelve witnesses also failed to attend, and the attendance of three was countermanded. The proceedings of the committee being thus incomplete, the committee do not feel warranted in reporting any conclusions.

Your committee therefore report herewith the evidence given by the witnesses who were examined, that the House may take such action thereon and as to continuing and completing the inquiry and investigation as may be deemed best, and they recommend that the said evidence and exhibits be printed for the use of the members of the House.

Therefore, I find that notwithstanding that I was not present at the inquiry, apparently I know more about it than my hon. friend, Mr. Borden.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Not at all. I suggested to the Solicitor General what he has just read. There were nine witnesses in attendance whom the committee did not examine.

Mr. COWAN. You said nine out of the ninety-nine were not examined.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Not at all. I said there were nine witnesses in attendance who were not examined on account of the want of time, and I say again that if the hon. gentleman will examine the evidence he will find that Mr. Donald Cummings remained in attendance to the end and was not discharged; and that his cross-examination was not concluded.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am dealing with the report, and I see no suggestion in it that Donald Cummings was not discharged. At all events that is not very important. As I have said, the committee examined ninety-nine witnesses, ordered four others to be examined under commission, making in all one hundred and three witnesses; and all this to investigate the fact as to whether or not the returning officers in two polling booths had been guilty of fraud in connection with the election, when in each booth there were six persons present, twelve in all, and it took one hundred and three witnesses for my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) to say he has made out a prima facie case, and that he wants an opportunity to prove further in connection with the matter. My hon. friend said the other night (as will be found at pages 5341 and 5342 of Hansard), that substantially he had proved his case. It is either one thing or the other. Either, with the examination of all these witnesses, and with the assistance of all the legal talent which surrounds him on the other side, he has failed to make out his case, or, as he argues now, he has made it out in its entirety. In either event, what is the necessity to go further into this investigation? Has he shown by his speech, that he has now any evidence that was not available to him a year ago? What evidence can he produce now to enlighten the House which he could not produce a year ago, and if it was available to him then what justification would there be after the expenditure of all this money amounting to, as was stated this afternoon, $10,000, or $12,000; what justification would there be for this House to open up an inquiry again which would entail an additional expenditure, amounting, I presume, to the sum already expended. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) has nothing new to offer the House now except the evidence of this Mr. Pritchett. Let us deal with Mr. Pritchett. We have got Mr. Pritchett's evidence contained in these affidavits, and let me say a word about the circumstances surrounding the obtaining of these affidavits. Mr. Pritchett was a fugitive from justice; he went to Detroit to evade the laws of his country. After he reached Detroit, a Mr. Barker, of Hamilton, and a Mr. Fleming, of Windsor, crossed over to Detroit to interview Mr. Pritchett. They were then the bearers of a warrant against Mr. Pritchett. A warrant had been issued in Ontario calling for the arrest of this man and they were the bearers of that warrant. Having that warrant in their possession, they exhibited it to Mr. Pritchett, and the condition upon which they obtained these affidavits was that they should not execute the warrant; that that man Pritchett should be free to come back to this country and that they should compound that felony with this felon. The other night an hon. gentleman opposite said that Mr. Pritchett agreed to come back if the leaders of the Conservative party would undertake not to prosecute. Why would they undertake not to prosecute? What authority had they to do it? Being in possession of that warrant, why should they undertake to deal with that man otherwise than as he should be dealt with? Why not bring him back to this country and deal with him as all criminals in this country are dealt with, leaving it to the authorities if it were necessary to deal with him as an informer, and to treat him as a man in his position should be treated. But no, they make this bargain with him and they bring him back to this country. Now, what do we find? This is something more serious, because, if what I have pointed out is true, and I have reasonable cause to believe it is true, it is more serious for Mr. Barker and more serious for Mr. Fleming than it is for Mr. Pritchett.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I suppose the hon. gentleman will give his authority for making these statements?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. All the circumstances I have pointed out, with the exception of the bargain with reference to the criminal prosecution were obtained from the lips of Mr. Pritchett himself, examined as a witness. As to the authority with reference to the bargain I am not prepared to give it, but I am credibly informed of it and I have corroborative evidence from the lips of the member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), who said this man came back on an understanding with the leaders of the Conservative party that he would not be prosecuted. There is the evidence I have in support of it. Therefore, I say that when hon. gentlemen opposite sent this gentleman named Barker, their chief organizer in Ontario, over from that province, to Detroit, to make this corrupt and illegal bargain, which I say puts those who made the bargain within measurable distance of the jail—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has made a very strong statement, which, so far as my information goes, is entirely inaccurate. But, I would like to ask him this: What undertaking could Mr. Barker, or any living person give to this man, that he would not be prosecuted? The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that he could not give any. This man was invited to come back here by persons belonging to the Conservative party, he would not be prosecuted by them if he came; but here is a man who had put himself in jeopardy, and no man living could give him the slightest assurance that he would not be prosecuted by the Crown, or by any person at the instance of the government; and the confidence with which he was enabled to return, was due to the fact that he knew too much, that he was not afraid of being prosecuted by the Conservatives, and that he knew that the Crown, directed, as it is at the present, would not dare to prosecute him with the information he had in his possession.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In answer to the leader of the opposition, I would say: That they could give him the assurance is undoubted, and that it is not a valid assurance is equally undoubted. They could give him the assurance for the purpose of decoying him back to this country, while knowing that it would have no effect, and would not be binding upon them. There is the answer. If my hon. friend wishes for more information, let him inquire of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), what he meant when he said that this man got the assurance of the leaders of the Conservative party that he would not be prosecuted.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I listened to the hon. member for Westmoreland, and I heard no such statement from him. I heard the statement that he understood that he had the assurance that he would not be prosecuted so far as the Conservatives were concerned, and Mr. Pritchett then stated, 'I am quite safe, then, because the representative of the government would not dare to prosecute me.'

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He did not require any assurance from Mr. Barker that he would not be prosecuted by the Conservative party. I think I can fairly ask the leader of the opposition to give one case since confederation, out of the many iniquities perpetrated by the Conservative party, wherein a man was prosecuted.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend has made a very daring and a very unsafe challenge. I can point to a number of cases in which Conservative supporters of the Conservative government were prosecuted by that government. Persons were even expelled from this House by the Conservative party, although belonging to that Conservative party, and subsequently prosecuted in the courts under the auspices, and at the expense of the Conservative government.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is one case, no doubt, the case of Connolly and McGreevy.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That was not the only case.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I speak subject to the hon. gentleman's better information on the subject.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Curran bridge case was another, in which the Conservative government prosecuted St. Louis, and followed up the case to the best of their ability in the courts.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have the Connolly and McGreevy case in mind. That is a case which I do not want to speak very much about, because one cannot always distinguish between what one knows as a public man, and what one knows as a private individual—between what one knows as a member of parliament, and what one knows as having advised his clients. But I ask, who would have ever heard of Connolly and McGreevy and their peccadilloes at Quebec, had it not been for the Liberal party? Who would have heard of the stealings that went on at Quebec, or of the expulsion of any of the men concerned from this House had the government of the day not been forced to take action by the Liberal party? With regard to the Curran bridge, there was an investigation at Montreal in connection with that matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me a single moment, before we depart from the subject of the statement made in the speech of the hon. member for Westmoreland. This is what he said, as it appears in Hansard:

I challenge the right hon. leader of the government to proceed against Pritchett. Pritchett is in the Dominion to-day. He gave evidence before the commission the other day; and if his evidence is false, he is a perjurer. I challenge the government, now that they have the power, to arraign this man before the courts of this country and have him indicted for perjury. I will go further and give them further incitement to inaugurate a prosecution. It is reliably reported to me Pritchett says they dare not. He says it is the last thing on earth they would dream of. He told Conservative gentlemen to whom he spoke about coming back: If you fellows do not prosecute me, I am not a bit afraid of the others, for I know too much about them for them to attempt any prosecution of me.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is what I had in mind, when I made the statement, which statement I now repeat in order that there may be no doubt about it. This man was approached in Detroit, by Messrs. Baker and Fleming. Of that I am absolutely certain. I am credibly informed that they had then in their possession a warrant against him.

Mr. POWELL. That is twaddle. How could they serve a warrant in the United States?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am credibly informed that the bargain was, that he would come back, provided that warrant should not be put into execution against him, and he was not arrested under it. That is not a matter on which I can speak with as great precision as on the other matter; but I am so credibly informed, and my information is corroborated, I say again, by what the hon. member for Westmoreland said.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman not know that Mr. Pritchett is prepared to swear before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that he was approached on behalf of hon. gentlemen opposite with a bribe, that if he would swear that he was not at Brockville, they would pay him a large sum of money, and that he refused to be bribed to perjure himself at the instance of the parties who were interested in protecting themselves now?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am quite aware that Mr. Pritchett was supposed to have said in his affidavit, that he had done those things; but is the leader of the opposition aware that Mr. Pritchett gave an affidavit in connection with the West Elgin election and that when he was examined as a witness, before the commission and was confronted with that affidavit, his answer was: 'That affidavit does not contain the statements I made to those men; they have misrepresented what I said; I never swore what is contained in that affidavit'; and it was that that one of the commissioners said that this man was a self-convicted liar. Now, the leader of the opposition said a moment ago that this man came back and said that he would not be prosecuted, that he defied the Liberal party to prosecute him. The leader of the opposition knows full well, that for the majority of the offences with which this man could be charged, there is a limitation. He knows full well, that under the Elections Act, for the majority of the offences, there is a limitation of one year; and when this man says that the Liberal party can be defied, and that he cannot be proceeded against, he knows that he is safe, because the only people who can prosecute him, are the gentlemen who have possession of the warrant that was sworn out within a year. He knows full well that he could defy the world, because he has the Conservative party at his back, with this weapon, which they keep in their pockets, so that they can protect him. I would say this, Mr. Speaker, that it is a question whether this man is going to be allowed to go on continually defying public justice in this country. It is a question as to how far it is going to be possible to allow that man to come into this country and to say that he is a forger and a perjurer, and a manipulator of ballots, and that the arm of justice of Canada is not long enough to reach him. It is a question to be considered how long that sort of thing is to be tolerated.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me? I have the evidence here, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to point out where the judge said Pritchett was a self-convicted liar.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My hon. friend will realize, I am sure, that it is impossible for me to take up a newspaper and go through all the evidence and show where the judge made that remark. I read it in the Globe on Saturday or Monday last; and if my hon. friend will permit me to give him this further undertaking, I will undertake to get the reference in the Globe for him before this debate closes. I am sure that he, who, I know, is a persistent reader of newspapers, must have seen it and forgotten it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

The hon. the leader of the opposition said something about the prosecution by the late government in connection with the Curran bridge. What occurred in that case? Why, Mr. Speaker, there was an investigation held by three employees of the government down at Montreal. As the result of that investigation, criminal proceedings were instituted before a magistrate at Montreal, and that magistrate looked upon these proceedings as being so admirably well conducted, so sincere and honest, that after the investigation was complete, he rejected the whole affair. He knew it was all a farce. He did not even consider that they had made out a prima facie case which would warrant him in committing these persons to stand their trial. After the matter came before the court, we had the solemn farce proceeded with of employing counsel to assist the Crown prosecutors. Indictments were prepared, and submitted to the grand jury, and the grand jury refused to take cognizance of them and threw them out. And the only result of these criminal proceedings taken by the late government, in connection with the Curran bridge, was a large bill of costs which the government had to pay for this farce now characterized as criminal proceedings.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think the hon. gentleman would willingly reflect indirectly on the officers of his own department, but I say this which I can prove by the record. The instructions from the Department of Justice (now on record), to reputable counsel in the city of Montreal—and if my memory serves me, Mr. Sharpe was the junior counsel, and the firm of Mr John S. Hall and Mr. Bissailon were the senior counsel—the instructions were to these gentlemen to do all they could to secure conviction. That subject was once discussed in this House as to whether these men had done their duty, and the right hon the Prime Minister, if my recollection is right, withdrew a somewhat similar reflection made upon a member of the bar of Montreal, who had these instructions from the Department of Justice.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not dealing with the instructions of the Department of Justice, and have no recollection of what they were, but am absolutely certain that they must have been in the sense indicated by the hon. member for Pictou. I am not disputing that or suggesting any action on the part of the lawyers which was not quite up to the level of what they ought to do, but I am simply stating the facts. I am simply giving the obvious result of this Curran bridge prosecution which took place, within a stone's throw of the city of Ottawa, and there can be no disputing the facts I allege. These men were proceeded against in the police office, and there can be no doubt that the magistrate threw out information.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The case was proved to the hilt.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not dealing with my hon. friend's opinion, but simply stating that the magistrate threw it out. He held the case as made out to be such a flimsy one that it was not worth his time to attend to it. What is worse than that, an indictment came before the grand jury, and the manner in which the case was presented was such that the grand jury threw it out.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the manner in which the case was put before the grand jury induced them to throw it out? Does he mean to say that the counsel in charge of the case for the Crown courted this result?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, what I said was that the manner in which the case was put before the grand jury led to its being thrown out, whether on imperfect evidence or for any other reason. I have nothing to do with. If it was thrown out on imperfect evidence, the counsel had nothing to do with it. A steal certainly took place. Hon. gentlemen opposite appeal to this Curran bridge matter as evidence of their desire to prosecute guilty parties, and what did their prosecution amount to? It amounted to the whole proceedings being treated as a farce, so far as results were concerned. It went before the magistrate and the grand jury and both threw it out, and when it came before the full court, on a question of costs, the Crown was condemned to pay all the costs. That was the result of the Curran bridge inquiry.

Dealing with the application made by the senior member for Halifax, I say that when he made his application last year the government then, without a moment's hesitation acquiesced in the reference to the committee, that he had his opportunity to go before the committee, with all the advantage of his own skill and knowledge, and the skill and knowledge of the hon. member for Westmoreland, and the hon. member for Picton, and all the other legal lights on the other side. They examined ninety-nine witnesses and expended the public money as lavishly as they chose and the result was that the hon. gentleman comes before the House this year and says: I did not succeed in accomplishing any thing last year, but ask you another opportunity to begin again. I say that the circumstances are such that the government would not be warranted in adopting my hon. friend's suggestion. Nothing new has been shown. The conditions are the same as they were last year, and we are warranted in saying that the result would be absolutely the same as it was at the last investigation.

Dealing with Pritchett's declaration, if what I have said of him is true, it would be beneath the dignity of this House to attach any credence to what he may have said, and the only thing this government has to consider is the question whether or not that man should be allowed to go on much longer defying public justice as he has done. The other question to be considered is, if that warrant that I spoke of a moment ago is still in existence, in the hands of Messrs. Barker and Fleming, it is the duty of hon. gentlemen on the other side to co-operate with the government, to produce the warrant and initiate proceedings, and then see how far the government will go in supporting them and making an inquiry.

My hon. friends on the other side have spoken of the carnival of corruption inaugurated by the Liberal party, and that exists in the whole Dominion as the result of the Liberal party coming into power. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) was especially loud in his denunciations of the Liberal party in that connection, as is his custom. He was not the only one, because, if I may use this expression, 'as the old cock crows, the young one learns.' Last year, the leader of the opposition referred to—

The circumstances attending the West Elgin election, where have been brought to light these frightful election frauds that have been the staple commodity of gentlemen opposite for years in carrying elections, these indecent attempts, almost open and undisguised, at corrupting the electors of this country, of carrying elections by gigantic bribery, both public and private.

He goes on to speak of:

This gigantic corruption that has for years been stalking and rioting throughout this land, and has finally culminated in one of the most frightful exposures of electoral fraud and rascality that has ever been witnessed, and which has been carried on under the auspices of hon. gentlemen opposite for a long period. They boast of carrying by-elections, and how did they carry them? Did they carry them by honourable and just means? No. They carried them by the influence of the operations of this same machine, invented and manipulated by W. T. R. Preston, an officer of this government.

But, since the Liberal party have come into power, what have we seen? In the general elections, we had 117 Liberals returned, that is exclusive of Independents, Patrons and vacant constituencies. We have had 48 by-elections, in which 45 Liberals have been returned. In all these elections of Liberals, what evidence is there that there is fraud or rascality connected with any of them? Was any of them ever successfully contested in the courts? Has any attempts been made to prove corruption or rascality such as the leader of the opposition spoke of in connection with these elections? Hon. gentlemen opposite know well enough that the only elections contested successfully have been those of members of the opposition and the only members driven from this House as the result of electoral fraud since this party came into power have been members of the party opposite. The whole thing is narrowed down to the West Huron and Brockville elections. It is the old story—they wish to go before the country and say: The Liberals have been for years preaching purity in elections, and they are no better than we are, because in the Brockville and West Huron elections they refused to allow us to make an investigation after we had exhausted all the evidence obtainable and had proved nothing. These hon. gentlemen cannot point to a single instance, except Brockville and West Huron, where there has been even a suggestion of fraud. What is the result? They are forced to fall back on what has taken place in the provincial elections in Ontario; they have nothing else to speak of except what took place in West Elgin in the Ontario elections. However, bad they may have been in local politics, that in no way concerns us. But, so far as the two parties are concerned, what is the result? Count the number of men who have gone to jail or who have paid penalties and see whether the majority is on the Tory or on the Liberal side.

Mr. DAVIN. What is the reason of that?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I presume the reason is that they have been schooled so long in iniquity that it has been impossible to trace more than a small portion of the Tory frauds.

Now, I said a moment ago that our friends opposite had the option of proceeding in the courts. They were not anxious to do so. Why? Because they have had a wholesome experience in the courts. They know that in the courts they would not be allowed to waste the time as they wasted the time of the committee, producing these useless witnesses in the manner they did. And they know, that in the case of the Brockville election they tried their hands in the courts—and with what success? They brought a charge against Empey, and the jury acquitted him almost without leaving the box. They tried to prove a charge against the other man, Wendling, but, after several postponements, after having delayed the case from day to day, the magistrate dismissed the case and they were obliged to withdraw all proceedings.

Mr. POWELL. The witnesses absconded to the States.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Supported by hon. gentlemen opposite.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. So far as the witnesses who absconded to the States are concerned, I can say to my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) that the two men, McIntosh, who absconded to the States were not Liberals; they were the two gentlemen who were engaged in the attempt to blackmail this Mr. Wendling, a respectable hotel-keeper at Brockville to whom a lady was sent to demand five hundred dollars from him. Why have they not come back? And, in connection with the Brockville election, I have this further information—I was not in Brockville myself and I give the information for what it is worth—in every polling booth on election day, the Conservatives were represented by a lawyer who surely had his eyes open enough to prevent fraud. That is not all. After the election there was a recount before the county judge, and, at that recount, there were three lawyers present, beside Mr. Stewart, the agent of the Conservative party. There was no suggestion at the recount of wrong-doing, no suggestion of fraud, no suggestion of anything having taken place such as took place in one of the Northumberlands, where, as a result of the investigation on the recount, one of the judges refused to count the ballots in the box, because they were so apparently fraudulent. And hon. gentlemen opposite had better remember this also—that they know what the result of the last general election was, and they know better than any one can suggest the organized frauds perpetrated throughout the length and breadth of Ontario. They know very well what was said after the election by their friends in Quebec—that if their manipulators in the province of Quebec had been schooled up to the same standard as those in Ontario, the Liberal party would not now be in power. Now, in one of the boxes used in the plebiscite—

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Mr. BENNETT. Is that the one that the whisky bottle was found in?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I cannot help admiring my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett)—

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) is flattering me.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am sure the hon. gentleman must feel flattered. But I cannot help admiring him; I cannot help admiring the technical knowledge he has of all these frauds, no matter which one may be suggested.

Mr. BENNETT. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will allow me, I may say I intimated to the House the other night the kind of work that was going on in East Simcoe in the by-election, and so hon. members can understand what I saw and was personally cognizant of.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I did not impute to my hon. friend personal knowledge acquired otherwise than by observation. But, as to this ballot box used in the plebiscite, there were eight ballots found in the ballot box of subdivision 35, East Northumberland, marked for the Liberal candidate. How did they get there?

Mr. WALLACE. Explain.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The explanation is perfectly obvious to those who wish to understand, and for those who do not, I do not wish to waste my time. Now, reference was made a moment ago to the Manitoba election. It strikes me as one of the peculiarities of my hon. friends opposite that they do not appear to be afraid of skeletons, they appear to be rather fond of them. The idea of the Conservative party bringing up this question of the Manitoba elections and having the audacity to talk of them in this House as something of which they might well be proud! What are the facts connected with the Manitoba election? A man named Birmingham, the Tory organizer for the province of Ontario, sends this man Freeborn to Mr. Boyd, a candidate for one of the counties of Manitoba, with a telegram in which Birmingham, the Conservative organizer, tells Mr. Boyd that this is a good man and that he has proved his worth in North Bruce. The Tory organizer sends this man up to Manitoba for what purpose? Freeborn himself says that the purpose for which he was sent there was to educate the people of Manitoba up to that high level which we were told a moment ago existed among the Tories in Ontario, so as to enable them to manipulate the ballot boxes in Manitoba in such a way as to bring about a Tory majority. And they did it, and the hon. gentlemen opposite boast of that, and appeal to it as something of which they are proud. Now the member for Pictou says: Why do you suggest that there is anything wrong in the present procedure adopted by us in view of the proceedings you adopted in Manitoba, but why do hon. gentlemen opposite not do in Ontario in connection with these two elections what we did in Manitoba? Why do they not do what we did in Manitoba, bring these men before the court and there prove up to the hilt what I have stated, that an organized system of bribery, and corruption, and manipulation of ballots was in existence throughout Manitoba, which system was inaugurated by the Tory organizer with the knowledge of Mr. Boyd, one of the Tory candidates, and with the aid of this man Freeborn? That is something of which they appear to be proud. We prosecuted this man before the courts, and caused him to be punished. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not seek to imitate us in that respect, they are careful not to do it, and don't want to do it because they know the result would be, if they initiated this prosecution the same as it was in a few cases in which they tried their hands at Brockville. Then what happened in the Manitoba elections? Mr. Boyd's seat was contested and he had to go. What happened in Winnipeg? The election of Hugh John Macdonald was contested and he had to go, they both had to go.

An hon. MEMBER. But he is back again.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He has come back on a side wind, I admit, but after going out through the main door he apparently is coming in through the chimney.

Mr. CASGRAIN. He has come in to stay.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Well, I am satisfied that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) should look to Manitoba for a ray of sunshine and of comfort; he can see nothing but icebergs in the near vicinity of the place he comes from. Now, I will not take up the time of the House any further with this matter. So far as I am concerned the position I take substantially is this: The right to inquire exists undoubtedly in this House in a matter of this sort, but to have an inquiry under the circumstances of this case, in view of all that has taken place, I say is perfectly unjustifiable.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency). I am surprised and I am sure the House is surprised, at the very weak defence which has been put up by the government against the amendment which my hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) moved the other evening. We have had a speech from the Solicitor General, who certainly is one of the most able lawyers in this House. He has defended many criminals, and has got many criminals off. He has had such influence with the jury, his power of speech and his abilities have been such that he has got criminals off in many instances when public opinion pointed to their guilt. To-night he has defended this great criminal that we have before us, the government. But I think I may say with certainty that he has failed to prove that the guilty parties in this matter are not guilty and if an independent and impartial verdict could be given by this House, I have no doubt they would return a verdict of guilty upon the indictment which was made against them by the senior member for Halifax. The hon. the Solicitor General has travelled a good deal outside of the record. This is a scheme generally adopted by lawyers when they have a bad case to argue. I cannot find in his speech much which touches the question before the House. He has spoken to us about the McGreevy trial, he has spoken about the Curran bridge, and he has spoken to us about the frauds in the Manitoba elections which he says were perpetrated in 1896. Now, I will ask any impartial hearer of the hon. gentleman what all that has to do with the question before the House?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. For an answer to that question, I would recommend the hon. gentleman to ask the hon. member for Pictou, who started the inquiry.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The hon. gentleman found it very convenient to travel outside of the record because, not finding anything to say in this case, he had to fall back upon the public history of this country in order to say something to the House. Now this motion was made by my hon. friend for Halifax on Friday night. The House knew it was coming, the government knew it was coming. The government was well aware that at the very first opportunity my hon. friend would bring this motion before the House. It was known by the House from the beginning of this session that this motion would be brought before it, and that the House would have to pronounce upon the reference which was asked for by us to the Committee of Privileges and Elections of that important question. This amendment was moved on Friday night. The government had all Saturday, all Sunday and all Monday to prepare their defence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not Sunday.

Mr. CASGRAIN. No, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is not yet in the cabinet; still I think that the hon. gentlemen who now form the administration are not so scrupulous that in a question of this kind they would not work upon Sunday. Now, the work they had before them was not only to decide upon the defence that they would put up, but they had to decide the other important question in the eyes of the country, whether they would oppose this motion or accept it; whether they would burk the inquiry, whether they would prevent this House from empowering the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate the new charges which have been made, or whether they would simply accept the motion and relieve themselves in the eyes of their own supporters of the imputations which were cast upon them as leaders of public opinion in this country. I have no doubt that a great many of their supporters, those who in the old times made the welkin ring with denunciations of Conservative corruption, urged the government to accept this motion and to refer again this question to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I have no doubt that many members of this House, remembering well what they had said when they were on this side, remembering their denunciations of the Conservative party in regard to these questions of corruption and bribery, urged the government to again allow this question to go before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The great question for these hon. gentlemen to decide was whether or not, in the face of the accusations brought against them by the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), they would allow this question to be referred back again to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or whether, in the face of what they heard from all parts of the country, from their supporters, they would not rather say: These accusations are not only serious in the eyes of the party to which we belong, but they are just as serious in the eyes of the country, and we will allow this investigation to go on so as to prove that the accusations and the indictment which are brought against us are not true, but that these accusations and this indictment are completely false. That, it would seem to me, was one of the reasons and probably the greatest reason why these hon. gentlemen took so long to decide what they were going to do, but, yesterday, we had the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) get up and try to make the defence of the government. It was said often that it was strange that the hon. gentleman who represents here the Minister of Justice, the hon. gentleman who represents the Crown law officers should not be the first to rise and discuss the question from a legal standpoint and prove that the time to refer the question back to the Committee on Privileges and Elections was passed and gone and that the House had no right to refer it back. But, we have to take the defence put up by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The hon. minister is certainly one of the lawyers of the government who is the most capable of making the defence of the government in this instance, but what did we have? I may say, and I think the House will bear me out, that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries made one of the weakest defences that could be put up on a question of this kind, and that although he is skilled in the law, although he is an able lawyer, we fail to find one single reason given by him why this question should not be referred back to the committee. The government says: We have heard your charges, we have heard the indictment which has been alleged against us, but we refuse to investigate these accusations; we refuse to allow them to go back to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and we will not hear any witnesses in our defence. What are the reasons given for this? There are five reasons given. First, it is said that the hon. member for Halifax was neglectful in the manner in which he brought the question before the House; secondly, it is said that it is too late in the session now to have any kind of an investigation ; thirdly, it is said that the House has divested itself of the right to inquire into these charges ; fourthly, it is said that the motion which is moved is one of want of confidence in the government because it is brought up in amendment to a motion to go into Committee of Supply, and that the questions of the Brockville election and of the West Huron election, being joined together, hon. members who would probably be willing to investigate charges of fraud in connection with the West Huron election, would not be ready to vote for an investigation into the Brockville election in which no charges have been proved and no prima facie case made out ; and, fifthly, the argument which has been made by the hon. Solicitor General is that Pritchett's evidence is not to be believed, that it is insufficient and as the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) said : no man in the country would hang a dog on the evidence given by Pritchett. Let us examine these reasons which are given as a defence for the government. These are the only reasons, as far as I could gather from the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, which are given, why the accusations, which certainly affect the honour of the government, which certainly affect the honour of the other side of the House and of the Liberal party, and which affect the honour of Canada, should not be referred back to be investigated by the committee. The question last year was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections as a matter of privilege. When the hon. senior member for Halifax got up and made out his case it was called by the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) a prima facie case, and he was not required to give any notice of the motion he was then making. He was not required to follow the ordinary rule of the House and give notice that on such a day he would move that the question be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The matter seemed to be so grave and so serious, a prima facie case was so well made out that the right hon. leader of the government got up and acquiesced in the motion of the hon. senior member for Halifax, and said : We will grant an investigation immediately. If it was a question of privilege last year, if it was a question that could, without notice, be brought before the House and referred to the committee, what has intervened between this session and last session to convince us that it is not a question of privilege which should be referred to the same committee without any notice and upon the same rules which guided the hon. leader of the government when he so readily acquiesced in the motion of the hon. senior member for Halifax ? There has not been one solitary reason offered by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), or by the hon. Solicitor General, this evening, why the nature of the question has been changed, and why, if it was a question of privilege last year it is not a question of privilege this year. So that, Sir, this year the refusal of the government comes without any reason whatever, without any justification except the fear in which these hon. gentlemen are that some further proof may be adduced by which not only the members interested in the two particular constituencies upon which we are here deliberating now, but the members of the government themselves will be involved in such serious charges that their honour and their dignity in this House and the country will be imperilled. But, my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) has not been at all negligent in the way in which he has brought the matter before the House. Upon the first opportunity that was given him he brought the question up and asked for a continuation of this investigation. He naturally thought and believed and he was convinced, as we were on this side of the House, that the rule which had been followed last year would be followed this year, and that immediately after he had asked for that investigation the Prime Minister would adopt the same course as he did last year and would acquiesce in the motion which was made. Therefore, being under this impression, being convinced that this would be the rule followed this year he moved, as soon as he could, to have the matter referred to the committee. But the motion was refused for the reason I have just indicated ; because of the fear that new evidence might be brought forth if he was allowed to continue the investigation before the committee. Therefore, the right hon. gentleman who leads the House opposed the motion. What course was left to the hon. senior member for Halifax ? The only course which was open to him then to follow was to give notice of his motion. Did we find the government willing to acquiesce in the procedure which the hon. gentleman had taken ? Did we find the government ready to favour for a single instant the procedure which he had taken and which he thought was the natural procedure which he ought to take after the refusal of the right hon. leader of the government ? We had the motions called and we saw the studious conduct of the members of the administration to make this motion stand from day to day until it become too late to bring it before the House this session. If hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House had, at any time during the session, been willing, or ready, or anxious, to bring this matter before the House they would have consented immediately to allow my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) move his motion when the order was called. But, we heard the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries say the other day that the right hon. leader of the government has no control over the Order paper. We all know that if the hon. leader of the government had got up and said: Here is a motion asking for the continuation of the investigation into these frauds; here is a motion which I desire the House to pass immediately so that we may clear our skirts of the accusations which are brought against the Liberal party and against the hon. members from West Huron and Brockville, can it be supposed for an instant that the right hon. leader would not have led this House as he leads it on all important questions, and would not have got his followers to adopt that motion?

Mr. COCHRANE. He did not want to.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Sir, if what I am saying is not correct, then it is evidence of what we have heard time and again in the House and in the country, that the right hon. gentleman has lost control of his party. Either he did not want this investigation to be continued because he was afraid of it, or he has so completely lost control of his supporters that he could not get a motion of this kind passed, because he was afraid, forsooth, that some back bencher would get up in the interest of the member for Brockville (Mr. Comstock), or the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes) and say 'stand,' and the motion would have stood accordingly. It seems plain, in view of what has taken place within the last few days, that the government have resolved to burk this inquiry, because they are afraid that such revelations will be made as will not only imperil the seats of the two gentlemen immediately concerned, but which will imperil the honour and dignity of some of the gentlemen who occupy a high standing in the Liberal party and in the government. Not only that, but it is known all over the country, as it is known in parliament, that for days and days and for weeks and weeks, the motion to go into supply has been delayed simply because the government knew full well that the moment that motion was made this amendment would be moved. That is the reason why we have been here for three and a half months, an unprecedented time, before the motion to go into supply has been moved by the Minister of Finance. Sir, for the last seven or eight years, and probably the last ten years, it is well known that within a few weeks after the House meets the motion to go into supply has been made so that members will have an opportunity of discussing the estimates, but this year the government has deliberately postponed this motion from day to day and from week to week, against the interests of the country, keeping the members here now for almost four months whose business require their presence at home. We have all this delay for the simple reason that the government knew that the moment the motion to go into supply was made, some gentleman on this side of the House would move that these questions would be referred back to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CASGRAIN.

Now, Sir, in the face of all this, the excuse given by the government is, that it is too late in the session to hold this investigation. Why too late? Simply for the reason that the government have wilfully retarded public business for the reasons I have mentioned. If it is too late, then it is the fault of the government, and they must bear all the responsibility for the delay. The Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) has argued, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) argued before him, that this House has divested itself of the right to investigate such matters.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to correct my hon. friend. On the contrary, the Solicitor General, speaking for himself, said he could not say that.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I did not hear the learned Solicitor General take that position, but I am glad to say that in this instance, as in a great many others, his law is correct. On the other hand, however, I must point out that if his law is correct, the law of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is all astray. Here, then, are two members of the administration speaking in this House, speaking with the responsibility which rests upon them not only as ministers, but as eminent lawyers, differing one from the other on this important point. And what as to the argument of the Minister of Marine: That this House has divested itself by statute of the right of inquiring into these frauds. I know that in questions of protested elections these are generally left to the courts. I know also that by chap. 10 of the Revised Statutes, when general fraud is alleged in any constituency, a commission may be appointed to inquire into these frauds. But that is not the case we have before us. We know very well that at the time of the Brockville and West Huron elections, although we had a grave suspicion that corruption had taken place on a large scale, we had not in our possession anything like the evidence of it which is now before the House. But the Solicitor General says: Oh, you had Conservative lawyers or you had Conservative scrutineers who are well versed in the art of looking after the deputy returning officers, and they did not discover that these officers were not doing their duty. Sir, my answer to that is: That these fraudulent inventions were so new to the people of Canada, that this plot was so deeply laid, and the fraud carried out with such skill, that even our scrutineers, and even our lawyers who watched these men, could not detect it. The putting of the marked ballot under the left hand and abstracting the good ballot and putting it in the pocket of the deputy returning officer, was so new and so skilfully accomplished, that it was not detected at the time. This fraud was all perpetrated with a great deal of skill; it was done by men well versed in it; it was done by men who had practised it for a long time and who instructed other men to do it in such a skilful manner that it could not be detected. We have not before us to-night a question of ordinary frauds; we have not a question of corruption being practised in one county or in two counties; we have not a question of an election being carried on by bribery or corruption in one constituency or another, but we have to deal with an organized fraud; we have a fraud which has been practised from 1896 to the present day in every by-election that has taken place in the province of Ontario or in the province of Quebec. And, Mr. Speaker, as to this being taken out of the statute, there is no statute which has been passed yet which contemplated or provided for such organized frauds as these we have evidence of to-day. There is no statute which provides for it, because until the Liberal party came into power in 1896, we never had such organized frauds as these that have been practiced in the by-elections since that date.

Now, is it true that under the law, or under the procedure or under the parliamentary practice, an investigation begun before a committee of parliament in one session cannot be continued during another session? That proposition laid down by gentlemen opposite cannot be maintained for an instant. The precedents cited by the member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) show conclusively that parliamentary practice is absolutely to the contrary. I will quote one instance. In 1854, there were frauds perpetrated in England in connection with the carrying of the mails between Dover and Calais, and the celebrated Churchward case came before the English House of Commons. This case was investigated during one session, and at the same time the carrying of the mails and the contracts in connection with the telegraph lines were investigated, and the committee reported to the House, and the next session of parliament this very same investigation was continued. It may be said that that is a very old case; but, I may tell the House, ever since that case, this very same practice has been followed in the Imperial House of Commons, and year after year and session after session, the investigations which have been begun in one session before one committee of the Commons or another, have been continued during the next session. Therefore, if hon. gentlemen opposite rely upon the law or upon parliamentary usage, they have not a leg to stand upon, and so, the defence which has been put forward by the most eminent lawyers on the other side falls to the ground. These gentlemen cannot give us one single reason either, in law or in parliamentary practice, why this investigation should not continue this year. But, there is something more. If a prima facie case was made out last year, upon the speech of the hon. member for Halifax, which was sufficient for the leader of the government to say: We will refer this question to the Committee on Privileges and Elections immediately; how is it that in face of the frauds which were proved before the committee last year; how is it that in face of the frauds that have been proved this year, or at least in view of the prima facie case before this House, this is not a fit question for investigation? I believe, I speak not only as a member of the party sitting on this side of the House, but as representing the general views of the public of Canada, when I say that it was the bounden duty of the government this year, when this new indictment was laid, to stand up and say: 'We will court this investigation; bring on your accusations and prove them before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and if you do not prove them, you stand as a dishonoured party in the eyes of this House and in the eyes of Canada.'

I spoke a moment ago of the general system, and it has been proved to be a general system. It was proved before the committee last year to be a general system which has pervaded the whole province of Ontario; it has been proved by the affidavits which have been brought before this House, and by the investigations now going on in Ontario. My hon. friend the Solicitor General cannot advance here with any degree of plausibility the argument that the evidence given before the investigating commission in Ontario has nothing to do with the investigation which we are seeking to have made before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Why, Sir, the men who acted in Brockville and West Huron are the very same men who acted in the elections which are being investigated in Ontario to-day. They are the very same gang of men who went around from constituency to constituency in the Ontario elections, and the very same men who have acted in every Dominion election which has taken place in the last three years. This system of corruption has been so general as to be taken altogether out of the statute, and out of any contestation before the courts or before a committee of investigation as provided by the law.

Now, I come to the last point urged before the House why this amendment should be voted down. It is that the affidavit made by Pritchett is not one to which credence should be given—that it is an affidavit devoid of truth. I ask any hon. member of this House who is familiar with legal procedure—I go further, I ask any hon. gentleman of common-sense, who has seen this affidavit, and has noted its circumstantial character, giving dates, places, times and names, not omitting any point, whether it does not bear upon it the stamp of veracity, and whether this man could give such circumstantial evidence if he were afraid he could be tripped up on any of the accusations made. Why, Sir, anybody who is at all familiar with the practice in the courts knows that if an affidavit that is untrue gives dates, places, times and names, it is easy to contradict that affidavit. Now, have we any counter affidavits touching those of Pritchett's? We have some which are general in their character, but which do not deny the specific allegations. Have we any letters produced from those who are incriminated not only by this affidavit but by other affidavits and by the evidence which Pritchett gave before the commission in Ontario? If letters are too long in coming, have we any telegrams from any of those parties?

Some hon MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Not one has been produced before this House. These men are friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, and if they were not guilty, and if this affidavit of Pritchett's were not true, we would have telegrams from all parts of those constituencies saying that this man had lied and perjured himself. But nothing of this kind is forthcoming.

Mr. FROST. There are a dozen telegrams to-night from the parties in West Huron, who have been accused by Pritchett, denying his statements.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Let us have the telegrams, and if what Pritchett says is not true, bring him before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and put him face to face with these men whom he says he instructed in the art of stealing and forging ballots. Bring him and these men face to face before that committee, and see if they will say under oath what they say in their telegrams. That is what we want. We do not want telegrams which may be sent by anybody. If these men were able to do what they are accused of having done in West Huron and in Brockville, they are able to forge telegrams; but we want them brought face to face with their accuser, and then we shall see who is telling the truth and who has perjured himself. It is said that this man Pritchett cannot be prosecuted for perjury because his affidavit has been made in the United States. But there is one way in which he can be prosecuted. He has accused these men, giving times and circumstances and names, of having stolen and forged ballots, of having committed offences against the election law, for which they could be prosecuted and sent to jail. Why do they not prosecute Pritchett for libel? Why have they not had him arrested for criminal libel and brought before a jury to see whether or not he is telling the truth? That would be a good test; but nothing of this kind has been done. I take it that there is not a man on the other side of the House who does not believe that Pritchett has told the truth, and that the reason why this inquiry is refused by the government is that they know that Pritchett is telling the truth, and that these frauds were perpetrated.

Now, the objection made by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as to this motion being a motion of want of confidence, and also that it cannot be accepted because it has joined the Brockville and the West Huron elections together, is not a serious objection. It is not a serious objection, first, because it is well known that if the government chose to say that they did not take this motion as a motion of want of confidence, it would not be considered as such. Parliamentary usage is well known to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and if a motion does not imply in its terms a want of confidence in the administration, it is well within the power of those who sit on the Treasury benches to say, we accept this motion, and from that time it is not considered a motion of want of confidence. It is not any more a motion of want of confidence than the motion proposed by the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) the other day. It is not a motion of want of confidence from the simple fact that it is proposed as an amendment to going into Committee of Supply. That does not make it a motion of want of confidence. Time and again this House has sanctioned the procedure under which an amendment is moved to the motion to go into Committee of Supply without being considered a motion of want of confidence if the government does not declare it to be such.

But, Sir, answering the other objection, that it was unfair to couple together the elections of West Huron and Brockville, has any offer been made by the government to sever this motion? Had the government said: If you propose an amendment only with regard to West Huron election, we will accept it, very probably such an offer would have been accepted. But, no, they stood on their dignity, and insisted on rejecting the motion in its entirety. Had they come forward and offered to accept an amendment, dealing only with the West Huron election, there would be something in the argument put forward by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, but they did nothing of the kind.

History, Mr. Speaker, repeats itself. In the declining days of the Mackenzie administration, we had just such a scandal as those which were divulged to this House in the West Huron and Brockville elections. I am alluding to what is known in the political history, especially of the province of Quebec, as the St. Ann's trap. Everybody who is familiar with the political history of this country, knows what happened in the county of Jacques Cartier, when my late lamented friend, Mr. Laflamme, was returned, and I am making no reflection on his memory, when referring to this matter, because I have too great respect and always had too great respect for him, to think of doing anything of the kind. But everybody remembers what happened in that election. It is true that the trick was the same as that which was practised in West Huron and Brockville, and what was done? At a certain time of the day, in the parish in which the Conservative candidate had a large majority, the deputy returning officer, who was a good Liberal, found himself suddenly unwell, and obliged to leave the polling room, and for safe keeping he put the ballot box into a sideboard. While he was away, a trap under the floor was opened, the ballot box was taken out of the sideboard and the Conservative votes were taken from it and Liberal ballots substituted. The election was carried for the Liberal candidate by virtue of this fraud. That scandal is known all through the province of Quebec, as 'la trappe de Ste. Anne.' The Mackenzie government, knowing that they could not face the electors in any open, fair and square election, invented this scheme to carry elections in the face of public opinion. Similar frauds are being committed by this government, because they know well that they cannot face an honest electorate in a square fight, but must resort to corruption, forgery and stealing ballots, in order to have their candidates returned in the by-elections. They probably can boast of having carried a great many by-elections since 1896, but we know now the corrupt devices by which they carried them. We know now that the by-elections they carried did not represent the sentiment of the country at all. The same devices were tried in Sherbrooke, where, I believe, minions of the party opposite, were stealing and forging ballots, and perpetrating all the frauds that were committed in West Huron and Brockville, but all their efforts were of no avail. The men of Sherbrooke, instructed by the past, were too wide-awake; and in that election, in which all nationalities and sections of the country were represented, the Conservative candidate gained the day, notwithstanding the $30,000 which these gentlemen poured into that constituency.

In view of what has been said on this side, in view of the very serious indictment laid before the House, it seems to me that it is the duty of the government to grant this investigation. It seems to me that there is no plausible reason, no real or legal reason, no reason founded upon any practice of this House or any parliamentary usage, why this reference should not be granted again this year. The government is bound in honour to grant the inquiry asked for. It is bound, if it has any respect for itself, to clear its skirts of the accusations brought against it, because not only are men outside this House accused, but men in this House, on the government side are accused of sitting here, not representing the majority of their electors. It is a surprise to me and everybody, that the two members in question, have not seen fit to resign their seats. When we saw even the principal organ of the Liberal party in this country, calling upon one of these gentlemen to resign, it is a surprise to me that he should still hold his place in this House. It seems to me that they themselves, should go to the government and say: Give us an investigation, give us an opportunity to clear ourselves of the degrading charges brought against us, so that we may be able to show that we were legally elected to represent our constituencies, and are not sitting here under false pretenses, and representing only a minority of our electors. Not merely is the honour of these gentlemen concerned, but the honour of the whole Liberal party. If that party had any sense of dignity, it would put itself into a position of being able to say to the electorate: We have given our opponents every opportunity to prove their charges, and we have proved that we were not guilty of the frauds alleged. But there is something else that we ought to consider. These accusations are not only known all over this country, but outside of it. We are gaining the reputation of carrying elections by bribery, fraud, forgery, stealing ballots, and all kinds of corruption, and it is due to the honour of Canada, either that these accusations should be proved false, or that those who perpetrated the frauds should suffer the full penalty of the law.

Mr. J. H. BELL (East Prince, P.E.I.) As a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, this matter has been forced ad nauseam upon my consideration. I desire now to give reasons for the vote I propose to cast upon the motion before the House. There is one point which was brought out prominently before the committee, but which has not been sufficiently emphasized in this House, and that is that it was demonstrated that the Liberal member for West Huron has as good a right as any other hon. member to sit in this House. He was elected by a majority of 140 votes, as declared by the returning officer. The Conservative party in the Riding went deliberately to work to ascertain how many bad ballots they could find had been cast to warrant them in impeaching the validity of the election. They discovered two polls, namely, that at Colborne, where they allege they were defrauded out of 13 votes and the poll at Goderich, where they allege they were defrauded out of 15, making in all 28 votes. If we give the Conservative party the benefit of all the votes that they claim were fraudulent, and if we subtract them from the Liberal candidate's vote, we find that Mr. Holmes, has, after all, been elected by the substantial majority of 84 unquestioned votes. The Conservative party, having ransacked the riding of West Huron, have only been able to call in question these 28 votes; and thus they have established the fact, which is unquestioned and unquestionable, that the Liberal candidate has been returned by a substantial majority of the popular vote. And this, Mr. Speaker, is the great fact, the main fact, which the people of this country are interested in knowing and being certain of viz.: that the will of the people has been respected, that the people of this constituency have not been cheated out of their representative; and, satisfied of that, the people care little for the technicalities with which some hon. gentlemen attempt to surround and obscure this case. Sir, I was pleased to hear the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to purity of elections and the recognition of the sovereign will of the people. I recognize in the expression of these sentiments the dawn of a better state of political morality. Let me recall an occurrence that happened in Prince Edward Island. A contest was held in the county of King's. The Liberal candidate received a majority of 84 votes. The returning officer made what is called a double return, on the allegation that the Liberal candidate had not effectually resigned his seat in the local legislature. The matter came up before this parliament and was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that committee demonstrated its peculiar capacity to deal with a question of this kind, in what manner? By reporting that the man who had received the greatest number of votes should have the seat in this House? No, but by recommending that the man who had been rejected by the people, against whom stood an adverse majority of 84 votes of the honest electors of the county, should have the seat. This was a deliberate attempt to ignore, to despise, to over-ride the will of the people as expressed at the polls. And, Sir, when I hear these hon. gentlemen now shouting about purity of elections, about respecting the voice of the people, I am glad to welcome such sentiments; and I only hope that the Conservative party will redeem its past and carry its professions into practice. These hon. gentlemen denounce the crime involved in the manipulation of ballots. I recognize and admit that it is a crime, against law and morality. But, Sir, there are greater crimes. Let me recall what took place in 1882, when the Conservative party in this House made a deliberate attempt to gerrymander the province of Ontario. There was a substantial equality of votes in the province. The design of the Tories was so to arrange the constituencies that they should return a large majority of their representatives to this parliament. That design was carried into effect, with the result that these political purists actually stole eight seats that belonged to the Liberal party, thus giving a majority of 16 to which they were not entitled. It is a crime to stuff the ballot box, but it is a greater crime to stuff and steal the constituencies. Sir, when these hon. gentlemen shout that parliament should always represent an honest and untrammelled vote, I call on them to remember their past record and repent of their own iniquities before they venture to charge the like offences against their opponents.

The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) has raised a question with regard to the power of this House to refer this matter to a committee. I do not propose to argue that question. I incline rather to admit the contention. There is no doubt that a certain power has been granted away by Act of this parliament. By a certain Act, we have relegated to the courts power to deal with questions of this kind. Insofar as the courts have been invested with power, and insofar as parliament has denuded itself of this power, there can be no question as to jurisdiction. All that has not been granted away remains in this parliament. A case happened in Ireland where a candidate for parliament had been convicted of felony. No one presented a petition against him, he came and took his seat in the British House of Commons. The British parliament came to the conclusion that they had the power, notwithstanding the act for the trial of election cases to deal with the qualification of the member. They resolved they had the right to purge parliament of the presence of this felon. I can imagine a case where, if a candidate is properly elected and takes his seat in this House, and afterwards enters into a contract with the government, and if the matter is brought clearly before the House, it is the manifest right and duty of parliament to take that matter up and deal with it and expel the member. Therefore, there are exceptions to the general rule. By passing the Act this parliament has not entirely denuded itself of power. Under certain circumstances it has power to deal with the seat of a member, and to refer such a matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. But, the question of expediency and policy is an entirely different matter. Parliament may have the power, but it is a question as to whether it should exercise that power. This parliament has constituted a court before which all cases can be tried affecting elections, more satisfactorily, more economically, and more efficiently than before a committee of this House. We cannot point to one case where, since the statute has been passed, the validity of an election has been inquired into and determined before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The House has always said: Go to the court, that is the proper tribunal to try the case. In the present case the question is simply whether this matter can be more conveniently, more economically, and more satisfactorily tried before a court.

Mr. HAGGART. What is being tried ?

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) The charge against the deputy returning officers. The question is : Is there a forum open to the public, open to any contestant, where this complaint can be more efficiently, more economically tried ? If there is, then the policy of this parliament is, and should be, to relegate it to that court. It is conceded that the court has power to try these cases. You have an Act concerning elections, which defines the crime ; all you require is to lay an information based upon the Criminal Code, or a section of the Act respecting Elections. Have the information laid before a magistrate, and have the matter tried before a judge and jury. If the charge be preferred and prosecuted under the Criminal Code it will be tried at the expense of the country. The expense is not thrown upon the individual who initiates the proceeding. Does the Statute of Limitations now operate to avoid your process ? In a matter which affects the seat of a member, a statute of limitations does apply. If you do not present your petition within thirty days you cannot present it afterwards. But in this case, there is no statute of limitations to forestall your action. The matter was open to you a year ago, it is equally open to you to-day, it will be open to you a year hence.

Then look at the consideration of public convenience. Is there any doubt that the public convenience would be best consulted by bringing the case before a court ? The case could be tried in Goderich. There are 100 or more witnesses to be subpoenaed. They need not be absent from their homes more than two or three days. But, bring these witnesses to Ottawa, what is the result ? During this investigation sometimes forty or fifty men could be observed lounging about the grounds or corridors for days, yes, for weeks. Is there any question that the public convenience would be best served by having the trial at Goderich, where the cause of the complaint arose, instead of bringing it here ? Then look at the question of expense, an important consideration. A charge against one of these deputy returning officers could be tried at Goderich at an expense to the country of probably $500, whereas, if you bring the case to Ottawa the expense would be enormously greater. We have already spent $12,000 in this investigation, and that with no result, and we are only, as it were, on the threshold of it. I submit that the consideration of economy should induce every member of this House to send this matter to Goderich to be tried, rather than to bring it to Ottawa. Then, there is another consideration ; there is another matter, and it is the matter of an independent tribunal.

Mr. HAGGART. After the investigation, cannot we order it to be tried at Goderich ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) knows it.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). That is apart from the question. That would involve a second prosecution for the same offence.

Mr. HAGGART. We are not trying the men.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) If we are not trying the men there so much the worse. We are spending the people's money, and that without attaining any result. Consider now the question of the tribunal and the independence of the tribunal. What is it that hon. gentlemen want ? They want to investigate the case. They want to reach a conclusion that will be acceptable to the people. They want that, if they want anything. You go before the court, take the case before the judge, place it before a jury sworn to do right between the parties and you will reach a verdict in which the people of the country, from one end of the country to the other, have confidence. The people will respect it and accept it as final and conclusive, but, Sir, if you bring the matter before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, what will you arrive at ? The probability is that you will not reach a conclusion at all, but, if you do your verdict will be despised by one-half of the people of the country. They will regard it simply as the decision of a partisan majority. Then, take the other consideration, that of enforcing your verdict. You bring the matter before the court. You have the matter tried. If the party is found guilty the judge has power to send him to jail or fine him or mete out other appropriate punishment. But, take the matter before the committee. Its hands are tied. There is no power to mete out to the returning officer any punishment even supposing he should be found by this committee to be guilty of the offence charged. Now, these are grave considerations which ought to influence us in coming to our conclusion upon this matter. When we find that we have an open court properly constituted to try these cases, when we find that the case will be tried at the expense of the country, and not at the expense of the complainant, when we find that no statute of limitations prevents that complaint being presented, when we find that all considerations of public convenience and economy, the consideration of an independent tribunal and the consideration of enforcing the verdict are furthered by a reference to the court, I appeal to hon. members on both sides of the House, if, under these conditions, a matter of this kind should not be sent to the courts to be tried, rather than to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It is on these reasons that I base the opinion that this matter, in the beginning, should not have been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections at all. In that respect, I say the government made a mistake, which I trust they will not now repeat. Further, I think that they made another mistake. Last year when the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), proposed his motion, he produced forty-three declarations, which he alleged were the declarations of voters in the poll at Colborne, that they had voted for the Conservative candidate. The right hon. leader of the House said, that, in his opinion, the presentation of these declarations made a prima facie case against the deputy returning officer. In my opinion these declarations made out no case against the deputy returning officer, because, in the first place, even supposing that the declarations were true and represented the facts, yet, nevertheless, it did not follow that the manipulation of ballots was traceable to the deputy returning officer. It might have been, and probably was done by the voters themselves who, for purposes best known to themselves, substituted false for proper ballots. It might have been caused in some other way which it is not necessary for me to suggest, but, at any rate, it formed no element of proof of guilt in the deputy returning officer. Therefore I say that this House was wrong in coming to the conclusion that a prima facie case had been made out. More than that, I say this House erred in coming to the conclusion that these declarations were any evidence of how the voters voted. Why do I say that? They were merely secondary evidence at the best. The primary evidence was in the ballots. The primary evidence was the cross made by each voter on his ballot. What did the law say and do in regard to this primary evidence? The law declared that you have to tear off the counterfoil. The law declared that there should be no number on the ballot. The law declared that every means of identifying that ballot must be removed. The policy of the law prevented you from making that ballot evidence in any respect before the court. Now, you are proceeding by a subterfuge to evade the law by giving secondary evidence of that which the law says in regard to primary evidence shall not be given and cannot be given. Under these circumstances, the declarations produced were no evidence at all—even of who the men voted for. I say more, that it is bad law and bad public policy to allow a man to testify in regard to any point upon which you cannot cross-examine him and test by independent evidence whether he is swearing truly or falsely. Here is a man who declares that he voted for Mr. McLean. How are you going to test that? Have you any means of cross-examining. Have you any independent proof to offer? The secret is locked and locked for ever in his own breast, and yet you propose to allow that man to swear as to how he voted when at the same time you have no means of telling whether he has sworn truly or falsely. Sir, take a poll and ask yourself if you can determine how a hundred men in that poll voted? How are you going to do it? You say in the first place that you know how these men promised to vote. Well, any man who has anything to do with the conduct of an election will know that there is a vast distinction between a promise to vote and the vote itself. You can get the promises to vote much more easily than you can get the votes. That is the experience of all of us. You go to a man and you ask him for his vote on the ground, perhaps, that he is a personal friend. He says he will vote—he goes into the polling booth and there the consideration of personal friendship is removed by the secrecy of the ballot,—the man votes as he pleases. Another promises to vote because he is indebted to the candidate or to some friend of the candidate. He goes into the polling booth and there the law has removed the debt temporarily, and the man votes as he pleases. Another man is paid $5 for this vote. He goes into the polling booth, and the same want of principle that he manifested in taking the bribe accompanies him there, and he may vote against the man who bought him. Another man may promise to vote, on the ground of party. You appeal to him that the party is in danger, and he says he will vote as he always has done, but when he goes to the polling booth he begins to reflect; perhaps he thinks that the Conservative party has been long enough in office and that there is a possibility of a purer and more economical administration, and so he gives his vote for the Liberal candidate. Another man is an ignorant voter, and too proud to confess his ignorance, and he goes into the polling booth and thinks he votes for McLean when in reality he votes for Holmes. If you take all these considerations into account you will find that in every poll you will have a discrepancy between the promises to vote and the votes themselves. But gentlemen opposite may say: We have got the solemn declarations of these men. I would ask you to reflect a moment, upon the manner in which these declarations were obtained. Take one example from the many. One Kirkpatrick in his evidence, which is to be found in the report, swears that his declaration was not read over to him, that it was not explained to him as being of the same nature as an oath, that the book was not presented to him upon which to make oath, and that the paper was obtained under the pretense that the Conservatives simply wanted to know how many men voted on one side and how many upon the other. I say that when you have got declarations obtained under these circumstances, you have no better or more reliable evidence than you had in the promises. What position do you put a man in when you ask him to sign a paper and declare if he voted for the Conservative candidate? Whether he voted for the Conservative candidate or the Liberal candidate, he is likely to put down his name because by merely asking him you put him in a hole, out of which there is no escape except by signing the declaration. Therefore, when, under these conditions you have got your declaration, you are no better off than you were before, so far as the truth of the case is concerned. It is the same consideration when we consider the evidence which these gentlemen gave. I say that when you have got from these men a promise and a declaration, there is no escape out of the dilemma, except as the expression is, to go the whole hog, and to swear upon oath that they voted for the man for whom they promised to vote and declared they had voted, and this is made all the easier when no man can tell whether the declaration or the evidence is true or false. What I mean to say is this: That where you say that you have laid the foundations of this case in that you have proved that forty-three men voted for the Conservative candidate, I say you have proved nothing of the kind. There is no man acquainted with the manner in which declarations and promises are signed and obtained, who will say that he can be legally sure that these forty-three men voted for the Conservative candidate. What you can be sure of is, that the majority, perhaps a large majority, voted as they promised and as they declared, but so far as the minority is concerned, no man can tell how they voted or be sure the statements they made or the declarations they signed are true or false. Then, there is another matter in which, I think, the government made a mistake, and that is in placing too much confidence in the promises of the Conservative party as to what they intended to do with the evidence to be elicited before the committee. What was the condition under which this whole matter was to be investigated? Why, Sir, it was definitely understood in this House that this matter was to go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with the understanding that no portion of the evidence adduced should be used against the reputation or the seat of the sitting member. That matter was again discussed in the committee, not once, but half a dozen times, and it was there clearly and distinctly understood that no evidence should be taken to the prejudice of Mr. Holmes. For that reason the rules of evidence were thrown to the winds, for that reason the ballots themselves were produced and examined, and for that reason hearsay evidence was allowed. For that reason witnesses were allowed to testify contrary to the law and the policy of the law for whom they voted. But, how did the Conservative party fulfil their promise?

Mr. TAYLOR. They made no promise in the House.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) They made a promise both in the House and before the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR. Not a bit of it.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) Yes, this was the clear and precise condition on which the case was sent to the committee. How did they fulfil their promise? The very moment they got the slightest information which they supposed cast suspicion upon the conduct of the election, they used that evidence, not against the deputy returning officer—they were after higher game—but they used it against the sitting member. They proclaimed: The seat had been obtained by fraud, and that the man who occupied it, if he had any sense of honour, would forthwith resign his seat. Not only that, but the Conservative newspapers took up the cry along the same line, and they tried to hound Mr. Holmes out of his seat by creating public sentiment against him. They were not satisfied even with that. They said through the members of the House, that it not only proved that the seat in West Huron was obtained by fraud, but that there was a conspiracy that extended all over this country, that the Liberal party, everywhere, were brought into disrepute, that they had obtained office, and now hold the same by having stuffed the ballot boxes in the several constituencies. That was the manner in which the Conservative party in this House fulfilled their promise. You call that fair-play; I call it striking below the belt. You call it proper politics; I call it denying and ignoring and violating the obligations that honourable men take upon themselves. I say that the Conservative party have falsified the promises which they made when this matter was relegated to the committee and proceeded with before the committee. Sir, I have read of the manner in which the Boers conduct their war in South Africa. When the English are storming a kopje, and the Boers are driven to extremities, they hoist the white flag. The British, relying on the sacredness of the white flag stand up to receive the surrender of their foes, whereupon, the Boers take advantage of that, and shoot down the English soldiers. Sir, if I were one of the members of a brigade storming a kopje under these circumstances, what would I do? I would shut my teeth, and make a resolve never again to allow these Boers to perpetrate their fraud. Sir, I feel very much in that spirit with regard to this very matter. I feel that the Conservative party in this House have abused the confidence which the House placed in them with regard to the object for which this investigation was to be had, and for which the evidence was to taken; and because they have abused that confidence. I do not feel personally like giving them an opportunity to do the like again. I feel like saying, never shall I, as a member of this House, either by vote or otherwise, enable them to commit a second fraud and deceive me and other members of the Liberal party a second time. For that reason, as well as for the other reasons, I have indicated, I am prepared to vote against this resolution, and to take the full responsibility for that vote.

Mr. E. B. OSLER (West Toronto). Mr. Speaker, the hour is late, and but for the fact that I do not trespass very long on the time for the House when I do address it, I would not speak to-night. What a wonderful array we have had of technical defences of fraud. It is perfectly marvellous to find one lawyer after another on the government side, getting up and quoting from law books and law cases, as if they were arguing to defend a criminal. They are arguing to defend not merely one criminal, but many criminals; these criminals are having very strong and very able advocates in the members of the government and their supporters. We are not here, I take it, to discuss mere technicalities, or how one man can protect another man from the penalties of his fraud. We are here, I take it, to bring criminals to justice. All the speeches of members of the government and their supporters have been for the purpose of whitewashing criminals; but they are not succeeding. That there has been election fraud committed, not one member of the government nor one of their followers will deny. All they are trying to do is to shield these criminals and to shield themselves from the penalty they will have to pay at the next election, for having aided and abetted these criminals. Last year the Premier and the government allowed the Committee on Privileges and Elections to inquire into certain election corruption. I was not a member of that committee, but I took some interest in the inquiry; I attended it on many occasions; and the opinion I formed—and I think I formed it without political prejudice—was that the chairman and the members of the government on that committee found that they were going to unearth a nest of corruption, and they deliberately tried to prevent a proper and honest inquiry. Now, if a great fraud has been perpetrated, as a great fraud has been perpetrated, it will not excuse the government to say that for technical reasons this is not the way to bring these criminals to justice, and you should have proceeded otherwise. The government can only justify themselves by saying, this fraud has been perpetrated, and we will use our best endeavours to bring the criminals to justice. But one lawyer after another gets up and argues as if he were in court, quoting from cases and giving reasons why these men should not be brought to justice at the court that has been opened. I say nothing about that; I say at once that I do not know whether or not it was the right way to proceed; but the court having been opened for the trial of these criminals, their trials should be concluded. The government know they are criminals, the country knows they are criminals, we all know they are criminals. You may try to shield them if you like. From what I saw of the operation of the committee last year, speaking for myself individually, if I had been an outsider, observing a case in which I had no interest, I would have come away saying that the government advocates were trying to shield the criminals and burk the inquiry; and the action of the government now, in saying that they will not carry on that inquiry, but will refuse it, justifies, I think, to the fullest extent my impression of what I saw. No amount of special legal pleading can justify them in the eyes of the people. The hon. the Minister of Marine made what he considered a magnificent case to show why this was not the proper mode to catch a particular sort of criminal. He tried to show that the men who gave evidence against the government's friends were of bad character. He attempted to show that the government's friends who had committed frauds were wonderfully straight and honest, and could not by any possibility have committed these frauds. He argued that the old farmer, whose hand was all knuckles and warts, had been brought before the committee to show how he could manipulate the ballots, and had shown by his clumsiness that he could not possibly have done the sleight-of-hand work attributed to him. But if that old gentleman had sense and cunning enough to manipulate the ballots in private, as no doubt he had, he certainly had sense and cunning enough to appear very awkward when before the committee. The man who puts a pea under one thimble appears a very awkward man to a country green-horn when doing it, but is one of the cleverest manipulators in the country. And the men who manipulated these frauds were as cunning and well educated in that particular line as the thimble ringer at the fair.

I was very much surprised at the claim of the last speaker (Mr. Bell), that because the hon. member for West Huron had, even rejecting the ballots discovered to be fraudulent, still a majority of seventy or eighty, consequently the fraud did not effect his election at all and was not of interest to the House. Well, I claim that if there had been fraud to the extent of only one ballot, that affected the whole election, no matter even if the gentleman elected had 400 ballots of a majority in his favour. I say that the man who sits here representing that constituency is sitting here fraudulently, and I should be very sorry to think that I could bring myself to realize that an honourable man could retain his seat in this House and vote under the conditions that hon. gentleman does to-day.

The province of Ontario was described by the Prime Minister, when he came in to power, as his right hand. Ontario, he thinks, is still his right hand to-day, but that province has shown to this country such a mass, and such a system of scientific corruption as has never before been exhibited in any other part of the Dominion. There is not a man in this House, there is not a member of the government, that is not ashamed when he thinks of the iniquity and the corruption and the low baseness enacted in the Ontario elections. The ballots in connection with one of the elections, which were very important for the trial and bringing to justice of the men who had stolen that election, were required when the investigation came before the courts. But unfortunately the ballots had shared the fate of the city of Hull; they had been burnt. There was no moral insurance upon them. If it had been possible for honest men to take out a policy to insure protection of those ballots, the insurance company would have required a premium of many hundred per cent if they knew the ballots had been in the custody of the men implicated in these frauds.

This is one of the things that I feel very keenly about. I feel that the election frauds affect my own individual honour and the honour of every man in Canada, and I say that there has been such a wave of corruption passing over this country since the present government have come into power—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. OSLER. I will not take back anything I say. I was not in politics before 1896.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You did not know anything about politics before that?

Mr. OSLER. I did not, and if there was in politics before that time the amount of corruption that the politics of the present day disclose, I am glad I was not then in politics; and that the men who were in politics then have been turned out. I hope that this country will not be so demoralized as to condone what has been done to-day because of what may have been done in the past, but I would say to the party in power that if the Conservative party were guilty in the past of the corruption which these hon. gentlemen denounce, they have improved upon that corruption and are now keeping themselves in power by means of it. I am prepared to say, without any hesitation, that I had a great deal of sympathy with the Liberal party before the last election. I felt that the other party had been perhaps too long in power, and I had a sort of half belief that the promises and professions of honesty and honour which the Liberal party made before they came into office would more or less be carried out. But have we seen one single solitary instance of this? Certainly not since I have been in this House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You have seen honest government ever since.

Mr. OSLER. I have not. I have seen a government that has made me ashamed of my country. I have seen an attempt to put through the Yukon Bill which was simply a gigantic steal. I have seen the Drummond deal put through, which was a most iniquitous transaction.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Talk sense.

Mr. OSLER. I am talking sense, and the hon. gentleman knows it. If the Minister of Railways would try to carry out the promises which his party gave before they came into power, he would be very much more respected in the country than he is. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), in talking about this corruption, said that it was a small matter not worth bothering about. Well, if the hon. member for Kingston and the other followers of the government, and the members of the government itself, think that this is a small matter, I do not, and I do not think that the country does. I think that it is the most important matter that has come before the House since I have been a member. If we are going to have the country that we ought to have, and deserve to have, we should have the members of the government honest. I am not cavilling about a little bit of extravagance. We may differ about the expenditure on one public work and another, the country can stand it. But there is one thing we cannot stand.

Mr. FROST. You say you would like to have the members of the government honest. Has there been any member of the opposition who has stood up in his seat and impeached any member of the government since the government took office in 1896?

Mr. SPROULE. What about the Yukon scandal?

Mr. TAYLOR. There are two ministers fugitives from justice in this House to-day.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is a cowardly statement to make.

Mr. OSLER. I am not going into the question of the honesty of any members of the government, or about any member of the government putting money into his pocket.

Mr. FROST. You are making the statement that they are not honest.

Mr. OSLER. I am not going into the question of individual members putting money into their pockets.

Mr. FROST. You make that statement.

Mr. OSLER. I beg pardon. There is a greater dishonesty than stealing money from the treasury of the country—the dishonesty of stealing the franchise from the people. This country can stand the stealing of millions of money, humiliating and degrading as that may be; but this country cannot stand the slightest attempt on the part of the government or of any man to shield election corruption.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Who does that?

Mr. OSLER. The government. I say fairly and squarely that the government have tried for the last two sessions to shield corruption such as has never been unearthed before—it may have existed, but it never before came to the surface where the government could grapple with it and check it. England is fighting to-day, and we are fighting to-day, for what? We are sending our sons to Africa to defend the right of suffrage, the right of proper representation of the men who own property. The government to-day are trying to suppress the honest opinion of the people, they are trying to do that as effectually as Kruger and the Boers tried to suppress the voting of the men who by their money and their work have made South Africa.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am prepared to make every allowance for the violent and extreme political opinions that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler) holds. But, having made the extraordinary declaration he has, I would ask him to specify one act of political corruption that this government are defending.

Mr. OSLER. I simply state here, that, in my opinion, the government, in trying to suppress this inquiry into fraud so great that the whole country feels degraded by it, is defending corruptionists. As a question of moral wrong, it is greater than the Yukon deal or the Drummond county deal.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman will excuse me, he has not answered my question. What one act of political corruption has the government defended? Name the culprit.

Mr. OSLER. I am not here to go into technical matters—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. OSLER. You may laugh if you like. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) laughs. But the government last session appointed a commission to inquire into corruption.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. OSLER. The government did not?—

Mr. FROST.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman will permit me, the government appointed a committee last session to inquire into the conduct of certain election officers.

Mr. OSLER. Put it in any way you like—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Now, will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler) condescend to say which deputy returning officer he says was guilty of fraud and that the government is defending.

Mr. OSLER. May I suggest to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) that all those accused of corruption have had most magnificent defenders in the minister himself and others behind him. If these men had been here to hear the defence made for them, they would have gone out of this House as the murderer who had been acquitted went out of court, saying: I never knew I was as good a man. I may be quite wrong in my premises as to technical matters, as to whether this is a proper tribunal before which to bring this question or not. But I say that all these difficulties were swept away by the one act of the government last session in agreeing to the reference to the committee. I saw these men come down last session, forty or fifty of them, and those of them that were accused of wrong-doing I heard defended by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries and others as though they were paid defenders, using all their skill in cross-examination and the raising of technical points to prevent evidence being given. I am not concerned with the question whether it was right or wrong technically; but I am concerned with the broad fact that the impression left on my mind was that there was a desire on the part of the members of the government to shield and protect those who were doing wrong.

Now, I have spoken a great deal longer than I intended to speak, but this is a matter upon which I feel very keenly. It should not be made a technical matter at all. If these men have done wrong, or if wrong has been done the government should at once take the initiative and have them punished.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What men do you allude to?

Mr. OSLER. Nonsense! You know what men. If the government do not take the initiative and use every effort to bring these men to justice, they are shielding these men. Like the ostrich which thinks to hide itself by thrusting its head in the sand, the government are trying to hide behind the special pleading of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), and the hon. member (Mr.

Bell, P.E.I.) who has just sat down, and who gave us an awful specimen of this kind of oratory—

Mr. TAYLOR. And the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick).

Mr. OSLER. Well, he was in good humour anyway, and had not much to say. But, though the government try to hide themselves in this way, they are not deceiving parliament, they are not even deceiving the men behind them. The men behind the government are feeling humiliated with the knowledge that they have to back up the action of their leaders. Nor are the government deceiving the country. Sweeping aside all technicalities, the country, knowing that wrong-doing has been perpetrated, believe that the government should prosecute and punish the wrong-doers. We cannot shame you; we cannot make you other than you are. But I should despair of my country if the people condoned the action of this government going hand in hand with the Ontario government to shield corruptionists—if it had been necessary, they would have burned the ballots, as the Ontario government burned ballots to shield their friends. If the country, at the next election, does not express its opinion of these gentlemen, then I shall be sorry to think that the poison of corruption has affected more than the members of the government, that it has even affected a section of the people, and has degraded and disgraced the whole country.

Bill (No. 158) for the relief of Gertrude Bessie Patterson.—(Mr. Richardson.)

Bill (No. 153) respecting the Western Alberta Railway Company.—(Mr. Oliver, by Mr. Richardson.)

Bill (No. 160) to amend the Act respecting interest.—(Mr. Fielding.)

EXPROPRIATION ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 161) to amend the Expropriation Act. He said: This Bill deals only with the question of the rate of interest where 6 per cent is mentioned as a rate that may be paid under the Expropriation Act, and it is proposed to change that to 5 per cent. I have also a general Act of the same character relating to interest which I shall ask the House in a moment to read the first time. Under this Bill 5 per cent will be the standard rate of interest rather than 6 per cent, in the absence of agreement.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I would thank the hon. gentleman if he would be good enough to call my attention to the Act of parliament which he has in his mind, and which is, evidently, the basis of this question. If he will send me a memorandum in writing of the particular statute, I will answer the question the next day.

COURT OF APPEALS.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Before proceeding to the Orders of the Day, I desire to ask the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) if he has any news to give me about that Court of Appeals concerning which I put him a question some time ago, and he said he would give me an answer as soon as he could get the papers from Montreal. This was eight or ten days ago.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have not the answer, but I will make inquiries immediately.

Mr. TAYLOR.

THE INTERCOLONIAL WORKSHOPS AT RIVER DU LOUP.

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouata). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the government, and more particularly that of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) and of the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to a correspondence from Fraserville, which appeared in the columns of the Soleil last Saturday, and which deals with a subject which I consider of the utmost importance, as it affects the interests of the county of Temiscouata, which I have the honour of representing in this House, and particularly those of the city of Fraserville. I may even say that the province of Quebec is, to a certain extent, concerned in that question. As I intend to offer a few remarks in this connection, in order to put my remarks in order, I shall, before resuming my seat, move the adjournment of the House.

Let me now read to the House the correspondence referred to :

The Intercolonial Workshops at River du Loup.

If the present state of things goes on much further, there will be no competent men left at the shops. Within a year, six at least of the best machinists have left the service, and it is not unlikely at all that before long, others will have also left, in order to better their conditions. Now, the reason why these men leave the service is not far to seek; and it is because their pay is not proportioned to their work and skill.

Since the Drummond Railway was purchased by the government, there is no denying it, the repair works have increased at least by 25 per cent, and with a mechanical foreman more or less well-affected for the men, their working hours have increased out of all proportion to the wages received.

What is going to be the inevitable result of such a condition of affairs? To put it in a nutshell, it will result in our workshops losing their importance and in the work being sent to Moncton where the staff and machinery will be increased, to the great prejudice of the town of Fraserville, which from its position and the future which is in store for it, deserves a better treatment.

Still, this evil could be easily remedied; let the government raise the wages of their employees. The men who left the service were paid from $1.25 to $1.45 per diem. With such starvation wages, all they had to do was to leave and to seek employment in the shops of the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, where they receive from $1.80 to $2 a day. Is it not a fact that we have now, in the Intercolonial shops, most competent machinists who, after fourteen or fifteen years service, are paid the paltry wages of $1.80, while they should receive from $2 to $2.50?

We draw the attention of the member for Temiscouata to this most serious condition of affairs, in the interest of Fraserville and of the whole county and we hope he will be able to induce the Minister of Railways to redress the wrongs which most deserving mechanics employed at the Intercolonial workshops here are suffering at the hands of those higher in office.

Now, Mr. Speaker, from the very first session during which I sat in this House, in 1898, I called the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to the fact that the staff of the Intercolonial workshop at River du Loup was not proportioned to the amount of work carried out there, and I made a very strong appeal to the government for an increase of men, showing that the employees were working day and night, and that, as another result, the work was going to Moncton, thus involving a great loss of time and money for the country, and depriving the establishment at River du Loup of a large amount of work which the people there are entitled to have. If my memory serves me, the hon. Minister of Railways, who has invariably treated me with kindness, told me that in any railway shop it was impossible to avoid overtime and night work occasionally, and that owing to the pressure of work, private companies had sometimes to give out work and orders to other companies.

I have this to say, Sir, in reply to that, year in and year out, there is always a certain amount of overtime which is being worked in the shops at River du Loup. I know whereof I speak, as I am just back from a visit to that town, and I was in a position to obtain the fullest information on the subject. Why, Sir, I found that ever since the 1st of January, the men have been kept busy, day and night, even on Sundays, doing repairs; and yet, in spite of all that, they cannot catch up with the work. To give one instance, engines Nos. 9 and 68, which had been wrecked, were entered for repairs into the workshops at River du Loup; but owing to the insufficient number of hands and to the want of proper machinery for those repairs, they had to be taken out and sent to the Moncton workshop.

If in 1898, the staff was insufficient, it stands to reason that it is altogether inadequate now that we have acquired the Drummond Railway and that, as stated by the correspondent, the repairs to engines and cars have increased by 25 per cent, and I may add that as those repairs concern the province of Quebec, they ought to be done in the province itself and at River du Loup, which is the most central point.

But have they increased the number of hands? As a matter of fact, I must say that the force of employees at the workshops has been increased, but in such a small proportion that it is hardly worth mentioning; and for every ten men added to the staff—and God knows with how much trouble—an equal number have left the workshops.

Last year I obtained from the railway department that an investigation should be made by Mr. Joughins into the efficiency of the staff, and, of course, it was reported to the department that there was a sufficient number of hands, and that the staff was fully able to cope with the work done or to be done at the workshops. But that did not prevent the wrecked engines from being sent to the Moncton establishment, owing to the lack of hands and for want of proper machinery for such repairs, and the consequence was that the workmen at River du Loup lost that work.

But there is still more, Sir. Railway hands and mechanics may be found anywhere, when needed; but skilled machinists, and competent engineers with fourteen or fifteen years' experience, who understand how to rebuild and repair locomotives, are not to be found so easily. Now, whenever private concerns have in their employ competent and efficient employees, they do all they can to keep them in their service and to prevent them from seeking employment with other rival companies, which would thus benefit by their skilled labour and their experience. But apparently it is quite different with government employees, so far, at least, as the workshops at River du Loup are concerned. As a matter of fact, our best and most skilled machinists, mechanics, helpers, boiler-makers, are leaving the service and find employment either across the line or in the shops of the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railways, and those companies are very glad to secure the services of experienced shopmen and to pay them higher wages.

Now, in order to show that I am not drawing upon my imagination for my facts, but that my statements are borne out by actual facts, let me say that within the last twelve months a dozen at least of the best and most skilled employees have left the service and that many others have made up their minds to follow them, if their salary is not increased. Why so? Because alluring offers from the outside have been made to them, and they have only been too glad to accept them. Let me give an instance out of a score of similar cases. I could quote names which are familiar to me, such as, for instance, Messrs. Michaud, Roy and Bélanger. Mr. Roy, who is a skilled turner, after seven or eight years' experience in his trade, was paid only $1.35 a day; he asked for an increase of salary, and I supported his demand, but we met with a blank refusal. The consequence is that he leaves the service, to enter the workshops of the Canadian Pacific Railway, where he gets at once $1.80 a day, with the prospect of getting before long $2.00. Others have followed him, and now Mr. Ouellet, the mechanical superintendent, is looking everywhere for good mechanics, without being able to find any. This goes to show that the correspondent was right when he said: 'We have employees with 14 years' experience who are paid $1.80 a day when they should receive from $2.00 to $2.50.'

After these men had left the service of the Intercolonial they either went to the United States or on the Temiscouata Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, where they are getting $2.25 a day.

Who is to blame for the fact that these men are not receiving fair wages? Are some of the high officials at Moncton interested in thus ignoring the claims of the establishment at Rivière du Loup, so as to benefit by the work which cannot be done there? Is the mechanical department acting in connivance with the interests of the town of Moncton? I cannot say. At all events, wishing to unburden my mind once for all, I asked the department, last year, to hold an investigation into the whole matter. I may say that my request was acceded to without any delay. Of course, we had to pass under the caudine forks of the superintendent of the Moncton workshops, Mr. Joughins. That gentleman, as directed by the Minister of Railways, came down to Rivière du Loup and once there, I am told, he closeted himself with the mechanical foreman, Mr. Ouellet, and it was decided upon that it was not necessary to make any general raise of pay at Rivière du Loup, as the men were receiving fair wages for the work performed. A report was sent to Ottawa that the men at Rivière du Loup were receiving as high wages as those paid to the men at Moncton, and that it was not necessary to grant an increase of pay.

Later on, I met Mr. Joughins and I asked him why he had not raised the wages of the machinists at Rivière du Loup. To my amazement, he told me that he did raise the wages from time to time, according to Mr. Ouellette's suggestions. I then saw Mr. Ouellette and I said to him: 'You agree that some of your men are entitled to higher wages; then why, in all fairness, don't you advise the Moncton authorities to do so, seeing that matter of raising the wages is under your control?' His reply was still more characteristic than Mr. Joughins's statement. 'Why,' said he, 'look up my correspondence at Moncton and you will see that I have urged the authorities to raise the wages of the men and to increase the number of hands, but all to no avail.' That is how matters stand for the present, and there is nothing yet in sight. Such is, Sir, the awkward position in which I have been placed for over two years. It is high time, I should think, that some issue should be found out of that vicious circle. But by what means? Here is a suggestion which might perhaps prove acceptable. Let the government hold an investigation at Rivière du Loup, but the committee of inquiry should not be presided over by any of the Moncton officials, as, for the most part, those gentlemen are still too closely connected with the Conservatives who appointed them to their present positions for us to be able to place any trust in them or to expect fair-play from them. I have not the least hesitation in making that statement, with a full sense of the responsibility which I assume, knowing that my statements are borne out by the facts. Let the government appoint as investigators an impartial and disinterested man like Mr. Dubé, the Lévis superintendent, conjointly with two competent machinists, having no connection with the government shops; let them visit the shops, examine the workingmen and make inquiries about the character of their work, the number of years they have been in the shops and the wages received. I am ready, with all the workingmen, to leave it to their decision, and I pledge my word that I shall never bring up the matter again before the House. We have been told that the rate of wages paid to the men at Rivière du Loup was fully up to the rate paid at Moncton. Well, I shall not go so far as to say that such a statement is a falsehood, as it would be unparliamentary. But I may just as well point out here the double-dealing and the trick to which they have recourse and which can easily be ascertained. At the Rivière du Loup workshops, many workingmen who have already served their apprenticeship as machinists, are kept on the staff as common labourers at the rate of $1.05 a day. At Moncton, on the other hand new-comers are no sooner able to file a piece of iron or to fit a bar to an engine than they are forthwith trumpeted as fitters, helpers, boilermakers, machinists, &c., and they are given the wages of the class they are taken in. This is a point well worth considering.

Mr. Speaker, it was suggested one day—I could not say by whom—that the repairs of the province of Quebec should be done in the province itself, and I think the suggestion thus offered was a wise one, and should be carried out. So far it has been ignored, and to carry it out, it will be found necessary to enlarge the workshops at Rivière du Loup, to increase the staff, to equip the shops with proper machinery for the repairs to the new engines which we have bought for the Intercolonial, and to give the men fair wages. In so doing, the repairs will not suffer any delay; the government will save time and as in railway matters, time is money, they will also save money, and Fraserville will have its fair share in the increase of population and labour resulting from that broad and generous policy.

The working classes have always had the sympathies of the various administrations which have succeeded each other on the Treasury Benches; but this government have proclaimed themselves the friends of the workingmen in a very particular manner. Things being so, I think it most unfair for anybody, even for a stump-speaker like Mr. Charles Thibeault, to stand up and denounce this government, as he did recently in Montreal, for having done nothing for the working classes. Such a statement is at variance with truth and clashes with the actual facts, as revealed by the expeditious and easy way in which the Prime Minister settled the troubles between the railway companies and the telegraphists.

At all events, whenever the working classes prayed for the redress of well-founded grievances, their wrongs have been righted. Well, Sir, if I rose in my seat to-day to address the House, it was in order to claim justice for the workmen at River du Loup. Those employees for the most part, are creatures of the old government; but when the interests of labour are at stake, and when the question of paying workmen fair wages in proportion with their skill and the work performed, I do not trouble myself about their political complexion, but I only mind the justice of their cause.

I am afraid, Sir, that I have occupied the time of the House at too great length, but I hope it will not be time spent uselessly, and that from what I have said there will result some practical good for the workmen at River du Loup. The government, I hope, will take my request into their most favourable consideration, and will see to it that justice be done to whom justice is due.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Demers) the adjournment of the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have been unable to follow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gauvreau), but, I will take the means to inform myself fully, as to the matters to which he has referred, and will give my personal attention to the subject.

Motion (Mr. Gauvreau) to adjourn, negatived.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, I am reported in the Herald to have said that on the occasion of an election in East Simcoe, the returning officers exhibited a list of the deputies, and I taking exception to the list, he changed it and made an entirely new list. What I did say was, that I took exception to two names on the list, and that two names were changed, that two names were dropped from the original list, not the whole.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. G. W. GANONG (Charlotte). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. acting Minister of Public Works (Mr. Mulock), if there is any probability of my getting the returns asked for on February 26, some eleven weeks since?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). That date is prior to my taking charge of the department, and, therefore, I have no recollection of the motion in question. If my hon. friend (Mr. Ganong), will be kind enough to indicate in a note across the floor of the House, what the returns are, I will see the order of the House is promptly complied with.

SUPPLY—BROCKVILLE AND WEST HURON ELECTIONS.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Supply, and the motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. FIRMAN McCLURE (Colchester). Mr. Speaker, the subject that is brought before the House by the amendment proposed by the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), is one of the most important that could engage our attention. Like most important questions it is one into which party feeling is almost certain to enter. It is one of the incidents—I do not know that I can say that it is one of the defects of our system of government—that party feeling is almost certain to enter into every question of importance that is discussed in this House, but, if it is a defect, then it is one for which we have many compensations. As I understand the question submitted to the House, it is this: Last session the hon. senior member for Halifax, proposed a motion here to refer all the papers and documents relating to the elections in the ridings of Brockville and West Huron, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, for a certain definite and well-defined purpose. That purpose is set out in the resolution proposed by him; it is 'to inquire into and investigate the conduct of the respective returning officers and of several deputy returning officers in connection with each of the said elections respectively, with powers to send for persons and records, and to report thereon with all convenient speed.' That motion was adopted by this House. The subject-matter referred to in the resolution was referred to the committee; it was investigated by them, and we have their report. They report to us that they have no conclusion, or finding, to make on the subject, but they refer the evidence which they took to this House that such action may be taken as this House deems wise. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say, in the first place, that, in my humble opinion, as one member of this House, every object which the House sought for in making the reference to the committee which it did make, has been accomplished and fulfilled.

Mr. SPROULE. Was Brockville ever touched?

Mr. McCLURE. The statement was made in this House that certain irregularities, or frauds, or call them what you will, had been committed in connection with these elections, and that the returning officers, or the deputy returning officers had been implicated in these irregularities and frauds. This House referred the question to the committee to ascertain if there was any evidence upon which we could fasten the charge of irregularities and frauds upon the returning officers, or the deputy returning officers in these ridings. The committee heard a large amount of evidence. I do not propose to go into any of the details of the evidence, but, having been a close listener, having heard nearly all of the evidence given, and having read what I did not hear, I have no hesitation in saying that I do not think there is a member of this House, no matter what his political views may be, who will hazard the statement, that one particle of evidence was produced there which connected, directly or indirectly, any deputy returning officer, or returning officer, with frauds or irregularities, providing even that frauds and irregularities had existed. What did we have? The election was conducted in the ordinary way. We had all the officers which the law requires present in the polling booths. We had all the safeguards that the law provides and throws around elections, to prevent irregularities and frauds. Prima facie everything was regular. The committee called in evidence the deputy returning officer, in the cases where fraud was charged, they called in evidence the scrutineers of the Conservative candidates. The deputy returning officer positively, on oath, declared that he had conducted things regularly, the scrutineers of the opposition candidate were not able to give one particle of evidence that pointed to any irregularity on his part. They called scores of witnesses, voters who came to the poll and voted and in case after case, these witnesses came forward and swore: We received the ballot from the hands of the deputy returning officer, we took the ballot, we marked it in the regular way, we returned it to the deputy returning officer, and that ballot which we gave into the deputy returning officer's hands, was, in our presence, placed in the ballot box. In other cases, where the witness did not swear that, he had, at least, to admit that he had seen nothing irregular in the conduct of the deputy returning officer. After all this, and there is no hint of any other evidence being available, am I not justified in coming to the conclusion that the prima facie case, made out in this House against the deputy returning officers, absolutely and completely failed, and that the reference, the object of the reference to the committee has been absolutely fulfilled? Now, what is the proposition? That we should refer this matter back to the committee for further investigation. In answer to that, I want to say, in the first place, that the Committee on Privileges and Elections is no doubt an important body, and one that has imposed upon it responsibilities of a grave and important character, but, I think that it will be in accordance with the views of the most experienced legislators here and the views of the politicians who have had the most experience of election contests, and of investigations in this House, that so far from being a desirable tribunal to conduct an examination, in such a case as is spoken of here, it will be hard to find, within the limits of the constitution, a body less calculated, by its constitution, to properly conduct an investigation into a case of this kind, than the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I do not say this from any spirit of hostility against, or because of lack of faith in the soundness of the principles that govern committees of this House, but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that matters before this House and before its committees, whether we wish it or not, are bound to be more or less biassed and controlled by party feeling. In a question like this that affects the rights of the electors of the country independent of party, surely it was a wise provision of our laws, that such questions should be as far as possible taken from partisan bodies and entrusted to judicial tribunals. Wherever it is possible that a case of this kind can be conducted before a judicial tribunal, surely, in the interest of good government, in the interest of the parties themselves, in the interest of purity of elections, in the interests of everything we hold dear as citizens; it is desirable that these matters should be conducted before our judicial tribunals where no partisan bias can enter into their consideration. And, Mr. Speaker, this is especially more true to-day than it was when we had this matter before us last session. At that time there were questions in regard to the conduct of parties who in a sense might be regarded as officers of this House. I do not discuss the question whether legally or strictly they were officers of this House, but there might be ground for such a supposition, and consequently ground for referring this case to a committee of this House which would be supposed to have a peculiar jurisdiction over its own officers. But that phase of the case presented to us last session has disappeared to-day. There is no longer any prima facie case against officers of this House. The charges, the accusations, the evidence—if evidence there be—goes to show electoral corruption, bribery, stealing if you will, but not necessarily committed by officers of this House or of the government. It is purely a matter for the courts to deal with; a matter over which this House has no jurisdiction; a matter where there is no ground for dispute between the jurisdiction of this House and the jurisdiction of the courts; a matter which never should and never can be properly brought before this House or before a committee of this House. Further than that, we are justified in taking this position because of the peculiar character of the evidence which is now presented to the House on the new charges that are made. And what is that evidence? We have a number of affidavits read here, made by a man named Pritchett. I do not know who he is, I never heard of him until his name was mentioned in connection with these frauds, and if he is as bad a man as he himself says he is, I hope I will never hear of him again. There is upon the evidence and upon the record which he himself has made, such marks as would indicate that he is not a man upon whose unsupported word the character of any honest, right-thinking official of this country should ever be placed in jeopardy. I say unhesitatingly that life in Canada would not be worth living if officials of this government or any other government, if men entrusted with responsible duties, men with good characters, men standing well in society; are to have their characters blackened in this House and placed in jeopardy by the unsupported affidavits of a man who, according to his own confession, and the judgment of the courts before which he has come, is a self-confessed liar. Is it desirable that men whose character has been heretofore unimpeached should have their reputation jeopardized in this House (where they can have no redress and where they can make no answer) by the unsupported statements of a character of that kind? Bad as the case was upon its face, it was made worse yesterday by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) when he read affidavit after affidavit from the men whose characters had been blackened by this Pritchett, absolutely and emphatically denying the statements he has made. And as the days go by the denials and the contradictions are coming in faster and faster. If Mr. Pritchett is telling the truth, then I would hope that somebody would send missionaries into the province of Ontario pretty soon to inculcate into the people of that province some idea of honour and truth. But, Sir, I cannot believe it. Am I going to believe this man Pritchett in preference to the hundreds of men who upon oath are prepared to contradict him. Am I to believe a man like Pritchett, whom even the men who presented his affidavits in this House will not dare to say is honest or truthful; am I to believe him in preference to the sworn statements of men who heretofore have had reputable characters in this country? To supplement somewhat the statements made by my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) I hold in my hand three telegrams. They are only telegrams no doubt, but under the circumstances under which this matter was brought before the House there has not been time to get affidavits. They are from men who are charged by this man Pritchett with most serious crimes, and they contain the most emphatic contradiction of the statements made by him. I have in the first place a telegram from Mr. W. L. Horton, of the township of Goderich, who is the treasurer there, a man who is thought enough of by his fellow-citizens to be entrusted with that position.

Mr. McCLURE.

Mr. CLANCY. Then why do you not vote to give him a chance to come and clear himself, rather than read a telegram.

Mr. McCLURE. I propose that he shall clear himself, but I hope to goodness the time has not come in this country when men have to be put on oath to clear themselves from charges made by blackguards like Pritchett. I hope the time has not arrived in Canada when every honest man has got to get up and swear a contradiction of statements made by self-confessed scoundrels. This telegram says:

Goderich, Ont., May 16.—Don't know Pritchett. Never spoke to him at Craig's Hotel or elsewhere. No one suggested tampering with ballots. Pritchett's statement untrue as to me.

You can believe either one you like. For my part I prefer to believe a man whose evidence has never been impeached, a man who was trusted by his fellow-townsmen, and not a man who is a fugitive from justice. I have another telegram from Mr. B. D. Grant, who is a teacher in the Collegiate Institute at Goderich and which reads:

May 16.—Never heard of or spoke to a man by the name of Pritchett in connection with the West Huron election. Never took any one, deputy returning officer, scrutineer or other, to see any person at Craig's Hotel or elsewhere. Never saw Farr or Cummings in said hotel. Never heard any one suggest fixing ballots. Pritchett's story wholly false so far as I am concerned.

I have also a telegram from W. H. Gundry, deputy sheriff of Huron, one of the men charged by Mr. Pritchett. He says:

Just say 'Mail' to-day. Absolutely untrue what Pritchett says about me.

Mr. DAVIN. To whom are these telegrams sent?

Mr. McCLURE. They are sent to Mr. Holmes, the member for West Huron.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, oh.

Mr. McCLURE. To whom else would they send them? Did the hon. member (Mr. Davin) expect they would send them to him? They sent them to a man who had a good majority behind him, not a man who got in by the casting vote of the returning officer.

But, we were told last night, and told with a great deal of unction, by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), that the objections which we were raising were all of a technical character, and that by raising these objections we were defending a lot of criminals. I regret that hon. gentlemen opposite have got into the habit of throwing that word criminal across the floor of the House with such great freedom.

I think it would be more becoming in these hon. gentlemen if they would be a little more specific as to whom it is they mean. I do not admit that these are technical objections; I say they go to the very root of the matter. But, it sounds strange to hear leaders of the Conservative party talking about technical objections in cases of this kind. Why, the whole history of Conservative politics in this country goes to show that nothing ever saved that party so long from the righteous judgment of the people but the technical objections which they threw in the way of honest investigation into the frauds which they committed. While the hon. member for West Toronto was speaking last night, I was struck with a recollection of an incident in the life of the late Sir John A. Macdonald. It may be an interesting fact to this House, and probably it is within the knowledge of many members here, that the first speech ever made in parliament by that hon. gentleman was a speech in which he prevented an investigation into frauds at an election by raising what the hon. member for West Toronto would call a technical objection. It was away back in the year 1844. Two men were elected in the city of Montreal admittedly by corrupt practices. It seems that the government of that day was rather weak and hesitating, and did not know how to deal with the matter. In the course of the debate on the question, we are told that Sir John, then Mr. Macdonald, made his first speech in parliament; and what do you suppose the speech was? If the hon. member for West Toronto had been there, he certainly would have accused him of defending criminals by raising technical objections. It seems that after the debate had proceeded a considerable while, Mr. Macdonald rose in his place and took the objection that the petition could not be entertained, because the man who made it had not been a resident of Montreal at the time the election was held. He, therefore, made a motion to give the six months' hoist to the whole business, and that motion was carried, and no investigation into that election ever took place. Mr. Collins, in his Life of Sir John A. Macdonald, which I think is fairly friendly to him, makes this comment:

It is doubted by no one now that both Mr. De Bleury and Mr. Moffatt won their seats through fraud and perjured instruments, but it was not Mr. Macdonald's aim or concern to shield them in their ill-gotten places. To reach that was made impossible by a fatal informality in Dunn's petition.

A technicality of the grossest kind. I do not blame Sir John A. Macdonald. I say he did perfectly right. He was defending the laws of the country; but when we get up and make objections five times, yea, a thousand times more fatal, because they go to the essence of the case and question the manner of procedure proposed by hon.

Mr. McCLURE.

gentlemen opposite, we are told that we are raising technical objections to protect criminals. I want to insist that these hon. gentlemen be more specific. The hon. member for West Toronto says there have been a lot of speeches made on this side of the House in defence of criminals. I want to ask him—he was asked last night, and he gave no answer—who are the criminals? Are they the deputy returning officers? If so, and if the hon. gentleman listened, as he said he did, to the evidence given before the committee last year, I call upon him, as an honest and honourable member of this House to admit that the case against them absolutely broke down. The hon. gentleman would place himself in the position of uttering a foundationless slander who would dare to say that that evidence fastened upon any deputy returning officer the slightest evidence of guilt. It may be that in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite there is a belief that these men are criminals. If so, they are, at least, entitled to the justice and fair-play accorded to every British subject of being considered innocent until they are proved guilty, or, at least, until some suspicion has been thrown on their conduct. Is it the members for the two ridings of Brockville and West Huron whom these hon. gentlemen stigmatize as criminals? If so, I tell them that there is not a man among them bold enough to get up in this House and make a charge against either of those hon. gentlemen. There is not a man among them bold enough to say that either of these hon. gentlemen knew anything about the crimes and rascalities which they allege to exist, but which they have not proved up to this hour do exist. Then, is it the government whom they charge with being criminals? If so, they are recreant to their duty in not making that charge specifically, and bringing forward the evidence to prove it. I say it is a duty incumbent on the members of this parliament to prove charges of this kind just as much as it is to discharge any other public duty; and if they know, as they allege they do, that the government are behind any rascality, or are implicated in it in any way, I call upon them to bring down their charges and let us have them investigated. There was a time when that was done in this House. There was a time when members of the government were charged in this House with corruption and when those charges were proved and the guilty men were driven from the government and from their seats in this House. If these hon. gentlemen have any charges against the government, let them make their charges specifically, and not in the empty phrases used last night, and they will be answered. So, I say in regard to this wild charge that criminals are being defended, hon. gentlemen opposite have absolutely failed to show where the criminals are. If they have any case, they have failed in their duty in not bringing it forward. We would have very short memories if we did not recollect that this is not the first time that these hon. gentlemen have made charges against this very government. We recollect when, a few sessions ago, members rose in this House and gravely insinuated, not to put it more strongly, that gross frauds, rascalities, villainies of an abhorrent character had been committed in connection with the purchase of the Drummond County Railway. They got what they pretended they wanted, but did not want, a committee to investigate. They did investigate; and after the investigation was over, they calmly got up and said: 'We never said there was anything wrong.' That was the history of that charge. Then, we had numerous long speeches, very long drawn out, in regard to the Yukon scandal—fearfully long speeches—but, I noticed we have never had anything but such speeches on that question, and we are likely to have more speeches, more wind, more of the same empty charges, but nothing specific, never an honest attempt to investigate, only talk to the gallery and the country in order that if they make a great noise and keep up that noise long enough, some people will believe that there must be something at the back of it all or otherwise they certainly could not have yelled so loud and so long.

I do not know what the feeling may be in the west, but I do know what it is in my province, and that feeling is, as I am satisfied this hon. gentleman will find to his sorrow, that he could not get anybody in Nova Scotia even to listen to the long speeches he made here on that subject.

And so it will be in these particular cases, they will continue to make their charges, they will continue to orate, they will continue to read affidavits, they will continue to drag to the front their Pritchetts and anybody else they can bully or bribe into coming here, but will never come to the point and attempt to prove the charges that they make. If these hon. gentlemen have failed in all these previous cases, if they have up to the present failed in this case, it is not, I am satisfied, because they are not the right kind of gentlemen to look up matters of this kind. For if there was ever any class of men who, by a long and patient experience during many years, have had opportunities to become thoroughly acquainted with the ways of hoodlers, ways that are dark and tricks that are vain, it is hon. gentlemen opposite. They are peculiarly qualified for that task; and if they have failed, it must be because of the weakness of their case, and not because of the lack of ability of the men that are conducting it.

I would like to call the attention of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) to this fact. He is very severe upon this government for having, as he says, let loose upon his country such a carnival of corruption as never prevailed before, and I notice that he said—and it is well that he did—that, previous to 1896, he knew nothing about the politics of this country. He must certainly have known nothing about them or he would never have spoken as he did. If he had known something about the politics of this country previous to 1896, he would have known of the McGreevy scandals, he would have not forgotten that a minister of the Crown was, by charges made and proved on the floor of this House, in connection with these scandals, obliged to resign his seat as a minister and go back to his seat as a private member; and the country is not shutting its eyes to the fact that that very man, who was expelled from office for corruption, proved in the light of day, has been taken back to the bosom of hon. gentlemen opposite, and is one of the leaders of the Tory party to-day.

And I call attention to the fact that when to-day the hon gentleman is backing up the Conservative party in this country, he is not backing up that party as it was when led by the late Sir John Macdonald, but is proposing to put in office the same men who in 1896 were turned out on account of these charges, and who to-day are unrepentant and prepared to carry out the same carnival of corruption, to use the hon. gentleman's expression, that they always did.

It was rather singular that the fact should have aroused no suspicion in the mind of the hon. member for West Toronto, that these charges of corruption, ballot-stuffing, and other rascality, comes from hon. gentlemen whose skirts are far from being clean in such matters. We were told that if such iniquities did exist before the advent of the present administration to office, they were certainly never unearthed. Well, I am not as old as many hon. gentlemen opposite, but have some recollection of the political experience of this country, and can speak of my own knowledge of certain unsavoury facts. I have the honour to represent a county which once was represented by a minister of the Crown of the Tory government. I stood in court myself and heard the partner of that minister swear under oath—and this is on record in print to-day—that he, out of his own means, paid out in his own county thousands of dollars to purchase votes to put that minister into a seat in this House. But if these hon. gentlemen say that that is ancient history, let me give them a case a little more modern. We had an election in that county in 1896, and, as often happens, there was a little difference of opinion over the choice of a candidate, and the man who wanted the choice did not get it. He got mad and proposed to leave the country. He bought his ticket for the West Indies, and took the train to start to catch the steamer, but before he reached the steamer he had an interview with the present leader of the opposition. What took place I do not know, that is a matter within the knowledge of these two gentlemen, but I know what happened afterwards. This man did not go to the West Indies, but came back to our town and went back to his own office, and I can produce sworn evidence that day after day he had paid out money and given orders for free liquor, and given passes over the Intercolonial Railway to carry voters to the poll. All that was entered in the records of the court to be proved, and these are the gentlemen who charge us with corruption, and exclaim at the same time, that their hands are clean. I do not say that the hon. the leader of the opposition knew anything about it, but I only state the facts, namely, that this man declared he would have nothing to do with the elections, but that since then he has been given a certificate of character by the leader of the opposition, and is a strong supporter of the party; that he intended to leave the country, but had an interview with the leader of the opposition, which changed his mind, and that he came back and did the things I have stated.

I could cite for the benefit of the hon. member for West Toronto further suspicious practices in the province of Nova Scotia. And I think that the mere fact that these charges of corruption are made by a party led by such men as these, especially charges based on such evidence as we have had offered to us, ought of itself to raise suspicion in the mind of any honest, honourable member of this House.

But the hon. member for West Toronto said this was a matter which he felt affected his own personal honour. No doubt that hon. gentleman has a very fine and delicate sense of honour, but does he think that it is absolutely consistent with honourable manhood, to say the least, that he should assume that his fellow members in this House, who differ from him, are wanting in conscientious conviction? Does he think it right and fair to say that the members of the committee who investigated this case and the members of this House who differ from him, have not as keen a sense of honour as he, have not characters to defend just as well as he has, and does he think it manly on his part to stand up here and charge that they are doing anything dishonourable because they happen to differ with him?

He told us that he knew nothing about politics previous to 1896. I do not know what he was doing previous to 1896, but I am bound to say that if the speech he made last night is a fair sample of the lore he has absorbed since then, he must have been cultivating this fine sense of honour at the expense of his intellect.

I notice that the hon. gentleman was careful to tell us that he did not object so very much to extravagant expenditures on the part of the government, if they would only stop stealing the franchise of the people. Now, I hope the hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler) will not think I am offensive, I trust I am not, when I venture to suggest to him that

It is barely possible that his sensibilities upon this point of extravagant expenditures have been dulled by the consideration for the pockets into which some of that extravagant expenditure found its way. Perhaps, that is not a proper way to put it; but still I think it ill becomes the hon. gentleman who has been the recipient, not personally perhaps but in a business capacity, of large favours at the hands of the government of this country, to rise in his place and say: I have no objection personally to extravagant expenditure—we can stand that, but I do object to stealing franchises. Well, if we can get proof that franchises have been stolen, he is right to object; but he has no right—though he comes here with the prestige of an honoured name, though he stands high in financial circles—he has no right to come here and charge men who are as good as he is, who have consciences as clear as his, who have reputations as good as his, with being boodlers and with stealing franchises, simply because they do not happen to agree with him.

In conclusion, I consider that the object of the reference to the committee, if there ever was any, has been absolutely and entirely fulfilled. If wrongs have been committed, the courts are open to investigate them. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler) said that we were here to bring criminals to justice. I deny that. Surely parliament is not assembled to deal with criminals. What are our criminal courts for, if we are to spend our time in bringing criminals to justice? We have no more to do with criminals who steal ballots than we have to do with those who steal dry goods. They are all criminals in the eye of the law, and if hon. gentlemen opposite have evidence that will convict men of these offences, it is their duty to place that evidence in the hands of the proper officials and have the case investigated before the tribunals established for that purpose. And it does not become the dignity of this parliament, and it is not going to promote purity of elections, it is not going to raise the standard of public morality, for hon. gentlemen to come here day after day and make long-winded speeches full of partisan bias with the object of making capital against their political opponents. They could not in this way, though the combined forces of parliament should unite to assist them, bring these criminals to justice. But, if they have the evidence that they say they have, the courts are open to them. Upon the men who have the evidence and refuse to use it, who have warrants and refused to execute them—upon them lies the responsibility for a failure of justice and not upon this House.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) made a reference to the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) and seemed to think it was a good thing for him to call the attention of the House and the country to the protagonists on both sides. The hon. member for West Toronto advocated inquiry into matters which the hon. gentleman (Mr. McClure) objects to being called criminal—but what word will he suggest to me that will designate those dreadful and disgraceful transactions, but the word 'criminal'? Well, Sir, I will leave it to the people of Canada to judge between the hon. gentleman and the hon. member for West Toronto, with his standing in the community, his weight of character—I must not say his intelligence, because the hon. gentleman says he is a man of honour at the expense of his intelligence. I think we may leave both combatants to the judgment of the people.

I wish, very briefly, to direct the attention of parliament to one thing. I am not going to reply to vermicular apologies for political assassins. I am not going over the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McClure). Is it necessary for me to refute the mere technicalities on which he rested his argument, when we have the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) telling us that there is no doubt whatever—this was the last word as well as the first word of his speech—that there is no doubt whatever that this House and a committee of this parliament would be properly seized of this matter? But, Sir, why talk of precedents? Have we not the best precedent of all, the precedent set by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) himself last year, who, when the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) brought forward his motion, got up and covered himself with glory by a speech that was hailed throughout the Dominion and which has since been again and again referred to? He told the House and the country, first, that what the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) had called attention to was the most important question which could engage the attention of parliament; second, that the purity of elections must be guarded at all costs; third, that a prima facie case had been made out in the case of West Huron and that it must go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; fourth, that while he thought that the case made out with regard to Brockville was more than weak, such as it was—I call the attention of the House to the language of the Prime Minister:

Such is the sanctity of the ballot, such is the sanctity of the rights of the people which they must exercise whenever they are called to the polls that though, in my opinion, speaking here on behalf of the government, the case made out in regard to Brockville is more than weak, still, the government will not offer any objection to this case also being referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Fifth, that there was no question which could with better advantage occupy the time of the House; sixth, that if a wrong had been done, nobody should be shielded; seventh, that we must know now—and I call the attention of the House and the country to this—we must know now, hereafter and for ever, that the will of the people must be expressed as the people wish to express it.

Why, what has come over the right hon. gentleman? Was the thought drunk in which he dressed himself last year? And now, has it waked up to look so green and pale that he is afraid of the resolve he then took? The Globe on the following day, 8th of July, 1899, speaking of the right hon. gentleman's action, said:
