This same situation exists now in the province of Ontario with regard to children. If there are children involved in divorce proceedings you have to go through an ancillary procedure under which you need a report from the official guardian with regard to the maintenance of the children. We know, therefore, that a divorce involving children is going to take more time and is therefore going to be more expensive.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Under the new bill there are three possibilities. First, there is the possibility that during the trial or before judgment absolute the court will find that reconciliation procedures would be helpful. In that case, Mr. Speaker, the judge would order a review of the whole case and the court would have to be satisfied that there was no possibility of reconciliation.

So, Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind that not only is there the question of divorce but also the welfare of the children and reconciliation possibilities to be considered, the cost of a divorce action would be difficult to determine because there could be an extended hearing which might last months or even years. This is particularly so should the action reach the supreme court where higher fees are quoted. In this connection some assistance has been given in Ontario through the introduction of legal aid; however, legal aid is not universal throughout the country.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, for these reasons I think the bill has not met the objective parliament hoped to achieve. It has not followed in its terms the major recommendation made by the committee in cases where there is a possibility of the marriage being revived.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment on the two answers given by the minister regarding county court jurisdiction. This goes beyond the question of cost and reconciliation proceedings, but the minister did deal with the two other fundamental points. First of all he said that in divorce cases the courts would be dealing with the fundamental rights of individuals and therefore felt that this was a matter for the superior courts.

Judges of the county and district courts are drawn from the legal profession of the provinces. County and district courts deal at times with very substantial matters. They settle very real legal questions and, with one or two exceptions, actually have concurrent jurisdiction with the high court. Nevertheless I have never heard it said that the county and district courts did not deal with fundamental rights. Certainly they hear jury cases, and the judges try criminal offences either with or without a jury. So surely fundamental rights are involved in the county and district courts, the judges of which can deal with almost any crime except murder, and some other serious offences. Therefore I do not think the minister has put forward a valid reason for not trying divorce cases in these courts.

The second reason offered by the minister was that jurisprudence should be settled in the high courts. Although I would agree with this statement, I think it is well known that jurisprudence is mostly settled in the appellate courts, not in the trial division. In cases involving interpretation of statutes it is almost certain that one of the parties will appeal the decision, and it is the appeal court that settles the question.

I therefore see no difference between an appellate court hearing an appeal from a county court and hearing an appeal from a high court. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the appeal procedure in county court cases is almost identical to that in high court cases. While I think a case may be made for saying that jurisprudence is settled in the higher courts, I do not see this as a valid objection in this instance. Against that there are the other disadvantages of the county court system to which I have already referred.

One final word about county courts, Mr. Speaker. They are in most cases much more closely in contact with the social agencies in the area. If the court decides that in a given case reconciliation procedures will be of assistance, while the county or district judge would know the appropriate agency to which to refer the parties, I am sure a high court judge on circuit would not have the same information. He would therefore have to turn to someone, perhaps the sheriff of the county or to counsel themselves, and would have to decide which was the most suitable body in the area to deal with the case. For example, in one district or county it might be the Children's Aid Society. In another area it might be a welfare agency. In yet another it might be a clergyman or some other person who has had reasonable success with rehabilitation and reconciliation procedures. Therefore, I contend that the county or district courts are better equipped than the supreme court in this particular exercise.

I think I should give the minister warning now—though he probably has received it—that we intend to move some amendments after the bill has been given second reading. Certainly I hope he will give serious thought to the question I have raised, otherwise the value of the bill will not only be diminished but divorce will be made more expensive, thus detracting from the very purpose of the bill in the modern context of today, which is to make divorce more accessible to those in dire need.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks on Bill C-187. It has been said that this bill is the best centennial and Christmas gift to the 500,000 Canadians who are living under common law marriages that the government has produced this year. The introduction of this legislation has also produced the feeling among Canadians that the government is determined to restore the institution of marriage and to give it its necessary moral, physical and spiritual well-being.

It would be very easy for me to give the full credit and glory to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) for bringing forth this measure at this time, but I think we would be doing an injustice if we did not recall the efforts of previous pioneers in the matter of divorce reform. When one thinks of the active work undertaken by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) in forcing the government to stop rubber stamping divorces, and to send them to the exchequer court, making the Senate finally responsible for the decrees, he realizes the courage and foresight that these two particular members possessed.

One would like also to recall the suggestion the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made some time ago to the effect that divorce cases be dealt with by the exchequer court. It would also be unfair not to give a great deal of credit to the communications media, to churches and other organized public opinion bodies throughout Canada who have brought this social issue to the forefront and forced the government to take action.

The special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons performed yeoman service in studying this problem and it would be fair to say its report forms the basis of the bill we have before us. I was not a member of that committee, but from my reading of the report it appears to me that the main issue was between those who advocate an approach by way of matrimonial offences as grounds for divorce and those who believe in the marriage breakdown theory. The former set up a list of matrimonial offences and rely on the judicial adversary system for proof thereof before a divorce is granted. Proponents of the marriage breakdown theory rely on the inquisitorial approach; the separation of the parties forms the basis for the action and the court proceeds to determine whether there has been an irretrievable marriage breakdown. If this is found to be the case, then if adequate provision has been made for the wife, the children, and in some instances for the husband, a divorce is granted.

Under the marriage breakdown theory great emphasis is placed on reconciliation. The government in its wisdom has combined both approaches, the major emphasis being placed on the matrimonial offence approach. The government shied away from the marriage breakdown principle because it was felt the courts would be given an indefinite and uncontrolled discretion, and preferred marriage breakdown to be established by proof of specific matrimonial offences.

Although I agree with the matrimonial breakdown principle, I must say the attitude which has been taken by the government appears to me to be proper at this time. I believe that in Canada we are not yet ready to accept in its complete form the marriage breakdown theory. Hon. members who have supported it have pointed to the examples of England and Australia. I would remind them that England is reaching its present attitude in two stages. Back in 1937 the government amended the divorce laws so as to include many of the matrimonial offences which are set out in the bill before us. Now Britain is ready to take a second step by recognizing the principle of matrimonial breakdown.

I would remind the house, too, that the English courts are specialized. Divorce petitions are heard in the divorce and admiralty court; criminal cases are heard separately; civil cases are heard separately. These courts are presided over by judges who specialize in particular fields of law, and judicial appointments to the bench are made bearing in mind the particular aspects of the law to be considered. We in Canada, on the other hand, appoint as our judges lawyers who have had experience both as solicitors and as counsel, and it seems to me we might not have available the specialized experience on the bench which would be required if the marriage breakdown theory were adopted.

Then again, I believe application of the marriage breakdown principle would leave too much room for interpretation and discretion on the part of the judges. Decisions could vary widely, and become highly unpredictable. Precedents would have to be built up in connection with many of the matrimonial offences to be considered. In other words, we might find that as the matrimonial offences theory is cast out of the front door by the legislature, it creeps into the back door of the courthouse.

Another reason advanced in support of the marriage breakdown principle has been the sordidness attached to proving adultery. I suggest it may be even more embarrassing or humiliating to proceed on the basis of marriage breakdown than it is at present, or than it would be under the terms of Bill C-187.

I can only speak from my own experience in the practice of law in Ontario. What I have found is that 98 per cent of all divorce cases are undefended and that no more than 5 per cent or 10 per cent are concerned with detective evidence. In the great majority of cases the action is approached on a so-called friendly basis; there is an absence of the humiliation and embarrassment to which some hon. members have referred.

Some have said there is a great deal of fabrication attached to evidence given in divorce actions. My experience has been that the judges of the supreme court are mature in their approach and can detect quite easily any fabricated evidence. In most instances it is not necessary to present evidence of catching a defendant in the act of adultery. Usually the evidence which is presented is evidence of past adultery which has been reported by one of the parties to the solicitor of the other party.

All one needs to do with regard to proving adultery in Ontario is to lay the foundation upon which an inference can be drawn that adultery has been committed. So there is a minimum of bitterness and humiliation. Ontario courts also require a report from the official guardian setting forth particulars with regard to the parties and the circumstances in which they are living, in order to give full protection to the wife and provide for the maintenance and custody of the children.

My criticism of the marriage breakdown basis is that an undue weight would inevitably be placed on the independent evidence of social workers and experts in marriage counselling. It is not clear whether the court would be called upon to take the mandatory or discretionary approach with regard to the procedure of reconciliation, and so social workers would be placed in the very awkward position of having to take sides with regard to the presentation of the evidence, and their function as social workers would be greatly impaired.

Again with respect to the marriage breakdown theory, the basis of the separation approach, it is said that once the separation has been established the court must determine whether the marriage is irretrievably broken down. In fact, in the committee report, as recorded at page 121, four questions are set forth as follows:

> Firstly, has the marriage broken down? Secondly, if so, are there any reasonable prospects of reconciliation? Thirdly, if not, is there any reason of public policy, especially involving the parties of the children, why the divorce should be denied? And finally, if not, what arrangements should be made regarding the parties and the children?
> By the suggested procedure, on proof of a period of separation alone, the court would be prepared to assume a positive answer to the question: has the marriage broken down; and in the absence of evidence to the country, it would assume similarly that reconciliation is not reasonably likely and that there is no reason to withhold the divorce. If there was anything in the evidence that led the court to believe reconciliation was possible, it could adjourn the case for an attempt to be made, but unless the fact of the marriage breakdown was strongly disputed by one of the parties, there would be no inquest to establish that the marriage had irretrievably broken down... Probably the only occasion for a full inquest into a marriage would be when a wife opposed it on the grounds that it would bring hardship upon her and her children, despite the fact that a husband had made quite an equitable arrangement. These cases would probably be few and the courts would be able to cope with them without any undue strain.

In this type of case you find one of the parties disputing the breakdown of the marriage. Advocates of the separation theory have said the separation term should be three years, but that may not be a sufficient period to bring about any reconciliation of the parties with regard to matrimonial offences. If a matrimonial offence has been an outrageous one, then possibly the period of three years may be too long. Some of the recommendations that were made covered periods ranging from two years to seven years. It is very difficult to determine an exact period with regard to the separation, and that may be the reason why it would be unwise to have separation as a sole and comprehensive ground.

Mr. Brewin: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Gilbert: Certainly.

Mr. Brewin: Does he not see you could still have breakdown which would require separation for three years, if that was the sole reason for the action; but if there was the so-called outrageous conduct you could then say the marriage had broken down in a period of less than three years?

Mr. Gilbert: I think my colleague appreciates the position I am placed in, that basically I believe in the marriage breakdown theory, but I find many practical difficulties presented by it. It may be, as he says, that if there has been an outrageous matrimonial offence within the three year period, then that period would be more than sufficient.

Now, directing my mind to the bill, Mr. Speaker, there are certain provisions which I am very happy to see in it. One is the extension of the matrimonial offences, and the combination of the two approaches covering matrimonial offences and the breakdown theory. The second is the provision which would have the effect of abolishing parliamentary divorce by setting up temporarily a new divorce division of the Exchequer Court of Canada, and enabling the jurisdiction to be transferred to the superior court of Quebec and the supreme court of Newfoundland.

The third provision in the bill which makes me happy is that respecting domicile. Practising lawyers appreciate the problems they have faced in the past with regard to domicile, especially where the husband had deserted. An attempt was made in 1930, through the Divorce Jurisdiction Act, to give the wife a limited break, but the provision in this bill goes far beyond that and it is certainly a most welcome one.

Next comes the question of the disappearance of one of the spouses to a marriage. In Ontario we had the situation that if one of the spouses could not find the other, after a period of six or seven years that party could apply under the Ontario marriage act for a marriage licence, and if, after reasonable inquiries were made, proof was offered that the other spouse could not be found, a licence was granted to marry a second time.

However, such people were always under the cloud that the first husband or wife might turn up, and this is not a very happy basis for a marriage. Further, the children of the second marriage were placed in a very awkward position if the first husband returned and the second marriage was declared to be void.

Of course there are shortcomings with regard to the bill. The first has been elaborated on by most hon. members, and it concerns the jurisdiction of the county courts. One would think the government would be happy to accept the county court jurisdiction as concurrent with that of the supreme court. Able argument has been presented by hon. members to show that small towns may be visited by judges on circuit only three or four times a year, and also the difficulty this causes in modifying maintenance agreements.

The question of costs is very important, and one would think that the costs in a county court would be much less than they are in a supreme court. One cannot help but be impressed with the evidence given to the joint committee by the former chief justice of Ontario. He gave that committee the benefit of his experience and recommended that there should be concurrent jurisdiction.

I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) to clause 3(d) where there is set forth certain conduct as a basis for a petition for divorce. This includes "sodomy, bestiality or rape, or has engaged in a homosexual act." One would think that lesbian acts should also be included. I think that is a shortcoming with respect to this particular provision in the bill. Another shortcoming concerns the question of adultery, where there is artificial insemination without the consent of the husband. These are provisions which probably will have to be amended in the future, and it may be necessary to incorporate new clauses now.

I also draw the minister's attention to clause 4(a)(i) dealing with imprisonment as the basis of a petition for divorce. It reads at present that the respondent—> —has been imprisoned, pursuant to his conviction for one or more offences, for a period or an aggregate period of not less than three years during the five year period immediately preceding the presentation of the petition,—

• (4:20 p.m.)

One finds that in criminal law there are many sentences for two years less a day. So in respect of that sentence which sends a person to a reformatory in the particular province, one would have to determine whether two years less a day would constitute really two years time. A person could be convicted to two years less a day on one offence and be convicted for one year determinate on a second offence. In this case the petitioner would have the difficulty of not complying with the three year period because of the provision of two years less a day. I should like to direct the minister's attention to that particular sentence because it may be that some clarification is necessary with regard to this type of problem.

I should like to draw the minister's attention to another clause with regard to desertion, which says:

> ...by reason of the desertion of the petitioner for a period of not less than five years...

I note that under the Australian law the period in respect of desertion is two years. It would seem to me that the five year period might create quite a hardship. In Australia, where they have adopted the marriage breakdown theory and where they have set forth 16 types of situations, we find that the period is two years. One thing which I am sure is in the minds of many members and many other Canadians is the problem of the possible flood of divorce actions in the next three years in the Ontario courts. Therefore I thought it might be wise to read about the experience in Australia, where they have standardized their divorce procedure. I should like to refer to an article in the Toronto Daily Star of April 29, 1967 by Geoffrey Tebbutt, which in part reads as follows:

> The standardization of the law and its liberalization in some important ways has not resulted in any startling increase in divorce.
> The number of dissolutions, nullities and judicial separations in Australia in the decade before the uniform divorce laws averaged 6,973 a year. There was a small drop to 6,750 in 1961, the first year of the uniform divorce law.
> Since then, the figures have been 1962, 7,290; 1963, 7,513; 1964, 7,967; and 1965, 8,534. The upward trend is largely due to population growth.
> The single ground most frequently cited in Australian divorces in 1965 was desertion (3,777 cases), followed by adultery (2,035 cases) and separation (1,706 cases).

Mr. Speaker, this should give some encouragement and some consolation to people who think we will be flooded with divorce actions. When one realizes that there are 500,000 common law marriages in Canada at the moment he also must realize that if people are to put their matrimonial house in order there probably will be an increase for a certain period to take care of the problem and to restrengthen the institution of marriage.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to give the Minister of Justice credit for his courage and his initiative in bringing forth this bill at this particular time.

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Kings): Mr. Speaker, I might say at the very beginning that despite the shortcomings of this very important piece of social legislation I intend to support it. In all probability I shall vote for it on second reading. I take this position despite the fact that I am one who believes that a valid marriage cannot be dissolved by any civil authority. However, I must say I do not expect to impose my beliefs on all the people of Canada. The power of the civil authorities to dissolve a marriage is now an established fact in our society. I do not expect that the laws of this country should be framed in such a way that they would prevent from obtaining a divorce those who in good faith do not believe that marriage is indissoluble.

I was privileged to be a member of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons which heard the representations made by various organizations which appeared before it. There certainly seemed to be broad general agreement on the need for legislative reforms which will provide more adequate social means to deal with marital problems. Those of us who listened to the testimony could not help but be impressed by the fact that unfortunately there are today some marriages which in fact are a hell on earth. We were very often reminded of the heartbreak and sometimes physical cruelty which results from such marriages. For those who find themselves in this unfortunate situation and believe in divorce, there should be some relief.

However, in our enthusiasm to provide this relief by a reform of our divorce laws we must not lose sight of the fact that lifelong marriage is the ideal, and that suits for divorce must be the last resort in the case of apparently broken marriages. We must not forget that the family is still the basic unit of society and that any forces which tend to destroy that basic unit are the enemies of men, and must be recognized as such. I believe we will all admit that a stable marriage is preferable to divorce.

It had been my hope that the proposed legislation would have made some provision to help promote stable marriages. In our desire to give relief in deserving cases we must not abandon our efforts on behalf of happy homes. I suggest that this is of direct concern to parliament. I suggest further that any further changes in the divorce law should be related to measures which have as their objective the fostering of stable marriages.

It is true that the present legislation does provide measures for reconciliation procedures but, as already suggested here today, I am afraid these will not be very effective. Clause 7 of the bill provides that the solicitor who is acting for the parties is required to draw to the attention of his client the provisions of the act which have as their object the bringing about of a reconciliation. He is obliged under this clause to inform his client that marriage counselling assistance might be available to him. He is obliged to discuss with his client the possibility of reconciliation. I suggest, however, that this may very easily become merely a matter of routine. The solicitor will do it simply because he is required to do it. That in itself does not guarantee a reconciliation.

I followed very carefully the proceedings of the committee and tried to analyze the more than 1700 pages of evidence, which I think represents every shade of opinion. It would appear to me that six major points evolved from these hearings and I should like to place these on record. The first is the need for reform of our present law. I do not think there is any question about the fact that everyone who appeared before the committee agreed that the present laws need reform. The measure now before us is a step in the right direction, and while I do not entirely agree with it I am prepared to support it because it is a reform of what we now have on the statute books.

The second point is that suits for divorce should be the last resort. This was also recognized by practically everyone who testified at the committee hearings. The third point is that at times even the best of marriages, as they pass through various stages, require counselling services. These services should be available to all Canadians.

I realize that to provide such services will present problems, inasmuch as people who are properly qualified to give these services may not be readily available. Something should be done to encourage more people to take up this profession so that counselling services can be made available when required. The fourth point is that reconciliation procedures are often necessary and often effective in rebuilding marriages that are on the brink of destruction. Reconciliation attempts should therefore be a part of any legal proceedings dealing with faltering or broken marriages. The fifth point is that there is impressive, if not complete agreement that the marriage breakdown concept should replace that of marital offences in divorce proceedings. This has been adequately dealt with by other speakers. I personally would prefer to see the marriage breakdown concept supplanted as the only ground for divorce, rather than retaining the various things set out in the measure.

I do not think it is true that the marriage breakdown concept will lead to more divorces or make divorce easier, and I think this concept was recognized by most of those who appeared before the committee as the one more likely to relate properly to the necessity for divorce, rather than the specific things mentioned in the present law, or this bill.

The sixth and final point was in relation to the need for specialized courts to handle divorce cases. That point was clearly brought out by a number of people and organizations who presented briefs and gave evidence. I am fully cognizant of the many difficulties involved in this matter. There are constitutional questions which have to be taken into consideration. In Canada today there is a shortage of facilities and trained personnel for marriage education and counselling work, but the fact remains that the evidence presented to the joint committee indicated a widespread feeling throughout Canada that nothing short of an all-out effort should be made to establish and maintain the stability of the family unit. It is our duty as parliamentarians to strengthen marriage and family life, and foster enduring marriages.

It is for these reasons I should have liked to see more incorporated into the provisions in this measure which would help to provide marriage stability. Unless I am mistaken, there is a rather serious deficiency in the provisions of clause 4(1)(d) which provides that one reason for dissolution of marriage is that the marriage has not been consummated and the respondent at least for a period of one year has been unable by reason of illness or disability to consummate the said marriage. It seems to me, and if I am wrong the minister will correct me, that in this regard one would have to prove two things. He would have to prove that the marriage had not been consummated and that for a period of not less than one year the respondent had not been able to consummate the marriage. What about the case of a married couple who had originally consummated the marriage and then, by reason of a serious accident to the husband, it was not found possible further to consummate the marriage? Is there any provision for divorce in a case of that type?

Mr. Trudeau: In answer to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, there is no such provision. The hon. member will realize the difficulty in respect of the problem he poses, because if there has been consummation how would we define the accident or its seriousness? Would we include old age, or just disaffection? There is this problem, once the marriage has been consummated. One can visualize that if there has been no consummation for a period of a year this may be because the couple are elderly. Does the hon. member want to allow divorce in this kind of case? This is the problem we grappled with, and short of spelling out what type of accident might fit the provisions I do not know of a solution.

Mr. McQuaid: Would it not be better to provide that by reason of illness or disability the marriage could not be consummated rather than leave it as it now is? Could we not say that if a marriage had not been consummated for a period of at least one year by reason of illness or disability this would be a ground for divorce, rather than making it necessary to prove in addition that the marriage had never been consummated? I am not particularly anxious to widen the grounds for divorce but I think in this kind of case there should possibly be some relief. If non-consummation of a marriage is to be a ground for divorce then I think that non-consummation by reason of illness or serious injury should also be a ground.

Mr. Trudeau: Of course in such a case the other test would be used. If a couple had lived in separation or apart for three years they would come within the provisions of this bill. If we follow the one year period, the condition that there has been no consummation must apply; otherwise once again you might have divorces between aged people at the end of one year rather than three.

Mr. McQuaid: I do not want to argue with the minister, but at this time I suggest that the separation or living apart provision is not good enough. These parties may be living together in one household, and I suggest that some consideration be given to providing relief for those who by reason of illness after original consummation of the marriage are no longer able to consummate the marriage. I think this follows one of the recommendations of the committee. Speaking from memory I think the committee recommended that wilful neglect or wilful refusal to consummate a marriage be made a ground for divorce, and that also serious mental or physical illness, with some evidence that such will continue for a lengthy period of time, should be a ground. I am not suggesting that a period of one year should be sufficient. One can foresee the case of a man who has been in a serious automobile accident being disabled for a period of a year or more. There should be some time limit so that relief can be given in cases of this kind. This should be possible to work out.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at any length at this stage of the bill, nor is it my intention to enter into a discussion of the details contained therein. However, I do want to make a few brief comments in a general sense regarding the matter that is now before the house. I followed with a great deal of interest the minister's statement when introducing this measure, which proposes to make some fundamental changes in Canada's divorce laws.

We all know that for some time this subject has exercised the minds of a great many Canadians. Many have vociferously urged divorce reform while others have viewed such reform with some misgivings. Those who tend to oppose reform in our divorce legislation do so, not because they desire to inflict further unhappiness on those concerned but because they view the trend as a threat to the established and divinely ordained institution of the family and the home, which in turn is recognized as the very foundation of our society and our nation.

Therefore the introduction of this legislation will meet with a mixed reception across the country, even though many members have stated that the country in general is more than ready to accept fundamental changes in our divorce laws. Personally I cannot share the undisguised joy with which some members of this house have greeted the measure. I have been rather surprised at the almost unanimous support that has been indicated. As I have pointed out, some have referred to this legislation in very glowing terms, even to the extent that it will be a wonderful Christmas present for a great many people. It seems to me that we have now reached the point where we have some very queer ideas about Christmas and Christmas presents. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I do not think this legislation would fit into the category that has been attached to it.

I have a copy of the brief, as have all hon. members no doubt, that was presented to the House of Commons committee on divorce by the Congress of Canadian Women on June 27, 1966. I should like to read just two sentences which are to be found on the first page of the brief:

> Divorce is a social devil, a disease symptom of a society that is ill. The remedy does not lie in making divorce more difficult but in seeking out the causes and as much as possible in removing them.

I am not indicating that this brief is opposed to the suggestions of divorce reform, but I wanted to place on record this particular definition of divorce because I believe it is something that should cause us some uneasiness as we deal with the legislation that is before us.

I do not believe that divorce reform will be the cure-all for the social problems that face us. Mention has been made of a number of these problems, such as illegitimacy, so many people living in a common law relationship, and many other things. Hon. members have spoken about the unhappiness that is inherent in a situation where love has departed and the relationship has settled down to more or less an endurance proposition.

I do not believe that divorce will solve all these problems. I am not so naïve as to believe that if we make it easier for people to obtain a divorce there will not be common law relationships, because we find that a great many of these relationships are formed even if there is no impediment to marriage. Therefore, making divorce easier to obtain will not meet this particular problem. It will not mean that those who obtain a divorce and then remarry will be happy.

I think we all know of a great many cases where people have been divorced and have remarried three, four, five or six times and still have not been happy. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this measure will not be a cure-all as far as the unhappiness of certain individuals is concerned. I acknowledge, however, that there are those who will benefit by changes and amendments to our divorce laws. But this measure certainly will not meet the situation in every case.

I believe it should be a source of great concern to us that we have failed in our endeavour to promote and maintain a society that is built on the concept of the sacredness and permanence of the marriage relationship. I think if we viewed the question from this point of view it would take some of the jubilation out of us as far as the introduction of this measure is concerned.

My attitude to the bill before the house does not involve a choice between what I conceive to be right and what I conceive to be wrong. I am forced into the position where I have to make a decision between what I consider to be two evils, on the one hand divorce and on the other the regrettable tragedy of legal relationships without meaning. Therefore in making my decision with regard to this matter I have to choose the lesser of the two evils.

Having voiced these fears, and while my understanding of the moral and spiritual laws as outlined in the Bible require that those of us who accept its authority govern ourselves accordingly, I am constrained to acknowledge the validity of the argument advanced by many in this house and by the minister in his introduction of the bill, namely that we must recognize the difficulty of applying what may be ecclesiastical, religious law to what the minister has termed a secular, or I believe he used the word profane, society.

As I have pointed out, it is not my intention to deal at this time with the various provisions of the bill. I wanted to indicate to the house that we are not unanimous by any means in approval of the measure that is before us; at least we are not in full agreement as far as its general concept is concerned.

Reference has been made to the brief presented by a number of Canadian churches. The names of the churches have been placed on record and I do not propose to name them again, but I just wish to say that I have been rather surprised by the position taken by some of the churches in regard to this particular issue. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) mentioned in his address the fact that this brief supports the marriage breakdown concept. I assume that it does, for it states that the validity of the marriage breakdown concept must be examined seriously and scientifically in contrast to the marital offence concept. Therefore I do not think I am doing the brief an injustice by assuming from it that its authors advocate the marriage breakdown concept.

Mr. Brewin: May I ask the hon. member a question? I do not wish to give him information but merely to ask him a question. Does he know that the United Church of Canada, the Anglican Church of Canada, the Seventh Day Adventists, and a group of other churches explicitly advocated the marriage breakdown theory as a basis for divorce? They stated so clearly, not by implication.

Mr. Patterson: Yes, individual briefs have been presented with regard to that; but I was reading one section taken from this brief, and perhaps I should place on record the names of the churches involved. They were The Anglican Church of Canada, The Canadian Catholic Conference, the Lutheran Council in Canada, the Mennonite Central Committee, the Presbyterian Church in Canada, and the United Church of Canada. I want to say again that I was very surprised at the position taken by these churches. However, I would not agree with the suggestion which has been made that all the churches in Canada take the same stand.

I would be interested to know to what extent these statements reflect the views of the membership of these religious organizations, because we know that a great many briefs which are presented to parliament on various subjects do not represent the views of the rank and file of the organizations which sponsor them.

I should like to commend the minister for taking the position that we should not go to the full extent recommended and advocated by the churches, but rather combine the two concepts, namely the marital offence and the marriage breakdown concepts. I think he was wise in doing this. If we are to move in this direction—and I do not think there is any question about it—we will have to do so. It is my view that marriage should be indissoluble, and I think some other hon. members also have stated this view. The indissolubility of marriage is the ideal toward which we should strive, and we should do everything possible to promote this concept.

Some hon. members have said that divorce should be the last resort. I believe so also. I think that ample time should be provided for counselling and guidance to save the marriage, if at all possible. I have been discussing with some of my colleagues the possibility that many young people will be more likely to enter into marriage without considering it carefully, and will say: If we cannot make a go of it, we can always divorce. The relationship they would enter into would then be a trial marriage. I suggest there should be a time limit of two or three years following a marriage before consideration is given to granting a divorce in these instances. I also believe that every possible provision must be made for any children involved.

In conclusion let me emphasize that every effort must be made to develop and to promote a full and healthy respect for the institution of marriage, which is basic in our society.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose there is a single member in this house who would disagree with the belief just expressed by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson), that marriage should be a partnership for life and that this is the ideal toward which we should strive. But as in human relationships in other fields, the ideal cannot always be achieved, and people for one reason or another have not found it possible to continue a partnership for life although they entered into it with the full expectation of doing so. In my view it is wrong under these circumstances to compel people, who have lost the love and respect for each other which brought them together in the first place, to continue that relationship when they no longer have the basis on which the marriage was built in the first place.

I also believe that divorce is no cure-all. There is no cure-all for such situations. I think that divorce is an essential measure which we must keep up to date as we do other measures in other fields. We live in a climate of social change which means that we must bring our legislation up to date, whether it be on capital punishment, divorce, birth control, abortion or any other matter, because public opinion demands that we sanction in our legislation the changes which our society has brought about.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills and public bills.

• (5:00 p.m.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacEachen: May I rise at this time to advise the house that the business for Monday will be the divorce bill.

Mr. Knowles: Followed by—?

Mr. MacEachen: Broadcasting.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT WIRE TAPPING

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-18, to amend the Criminal Code (wire tapping, etc.).

He said: The purpose of this bill is to revive the old common law offence of eavesdropping. I introduced this bill because of my concern and the concern of an increasingly large number of people in this country about what we believe to be a pernicious practice. This practice has been followed by law enforcement agencies, private investigators and probably other interested people who have invaded the privacy of ordinary citizens for personal reasons through the use of more and more highly sophisticated equipment. This practice used to be called wire tapping but the equipment used is now so sophisticated it does not require the physical tapping of the wires.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is very similar, with small amendments, to the bill introduced in this house several sessions ago by the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell) when he sat as a private member. We in Canada have traditionally looked upon ourselves as being very moral people. We have been quick to condemn the very antisocial activities in other countries such as the United States. One of the subjects upon which we have seen frequent reports in Canadian newspapers and magazines has been this question of wire tapping in the United States, the interception of telephone conversations. These articles suggest that is a common thing in the United States. Until recently this practice was reported in Canadian newspapers as if it were something which did not happen in Canada. The facts of course are entirely different. As they have become known in recent years, the facts prove that in every province of Canada there is no doubt taking place what we commonly call wire tapping.

On other occasions when I have introduced this bill I have given some illustrations. I will go over them quickly today because I do not believe there is any need to put all of the details on the record. I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat, that I am satisfied on the basis of information I have received and which I consider to be accurate, that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police used wire tapping extensively in Montreal at the time they were investigating the bombing carried on by the F.L.Q. I said before, and I say again, that this was a very serious situation, so one cannot blame the police for taking all the steps which were required. The point I made before, and which I make again, is that if the parliament of Canada believes wire tapping is necessary, then the law should be amended to make clear that wire tapping by the police is permissible and legal, and any restrictions or limitations upon it should be spelled out.

If hon. members doubt that the R.C.M.P. carries on the practice of wire tapping, I refer them to an article which appeared in the Toronto Star of August 31, 1966, written by Robert Reguly. I am sure most members will know him as a very aggressive, successful and accurate reporter. I should like to quote a couple of paragraphs from this article:

> For the R.C.M.P. has a discreet liaison with the Bell wiretap-checking branch in Montreal. The three Bell men there who check for wiretap are ex-mounties, according to a former Bell official.

Later, in the same article, I read:

> S.I. maintains a wiretap installation in one of the major downtown Montreal hotels, enabling it to tap any room phone.
> Another Montreal hotel—and one in downtown Toronto—are notorious for susceptibility to mountie wiretapping.

It is a very frightening thing, if it is true and I believe it is true, to think that if a member of parliament or any other citizen happens to be at these hotels his telephone conversation may be overheard. I do not know whether this would be the Mount Royal, the Queen Elizabeth or the new Bonaventure. In any event, a telephone conversation may be listened to by the R.C.M.P. or some other private agency. Other competent reporters have put on the record several times instances of wire tapping activities by the R.C.M.P. I know for a fact, Mr. Speaker, that during the S.I.U. investigation by the R.C.M.P. a hotel room in Toronto was set up so the R.C.M.P. could listen to conversations taking place. It is now an established fact of record that in Saskatoon the one telephone which prisoners in the jail could use had been so worked over by the police that they could listen in on every conversation. I say that if a person wants to speak to his lawyer, for example, and the police or anyone else can listen in on the conversation, then this is a pretty serious thing. One would hope that in our kind of society, with our ideas of British justice, the conversation between the person accused of a crime and his lawyer would be confidential. Otherwise how can a person get the kind of defence in court to which we think he is entitled?

In Edmonton, under a local bylaw, the police were permitted to listen in on telephone calls. There was a report in an Edmonton newspaper, I think in 1965, to the effect that in the previous year the police had tapped 87 telephone conversations. Within the last year in the city of Vancouver a royal commission held hearings about the tapping of the telephones of certain union officials. I believe in the right of people to have privacy. I believe that wire tapping should be prohibited. For the benefit of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), who usually follows me when I introduce this bill, I may say that I do not exempt any person from my distaste for wire tapping. I am not going to argue today whether the hon. member for Rosedale is correct in his statements. Let me say right now that if a former attorney general in the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan was guilty of recording telephone conversations by wire tapping or by tape recording, I think it was wrong. If a union official in British Columbia, who I feel is a very fine person, asked a private investigator to do any wire tapping, then this was wrong.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question, which really is a question by way of a statement. I regret that he has not a new speech this year, because I have. I may not have the opportunity to make it because I understand one of my colleagues is following the hon. member, but to save him any trouble I am not going to use last year's arguments this time; I have a new set.

Mr. Orlikow: That is good, Mr. Speaker. I hope that this year the hon. gentleman will support me, because I have some new stuff too.

I understand that the civil rights section of the bar association has endorsed in principle legislation to prohibit the use of wire tapping, except in very special circumstances. I think these special circumstances are covered by the bill I am introducing today. I hope that the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) will listen, if not to me, as he has not in the past, then to the Canadian Bar Association, and give my bill some general support, rather than the kind of living to death that he has given it in past years.

I put these facts on the record, Mr. Speaker, to demonstrate once more that wire tapping in Canada is taking place. An article appearing in the May 17, 1966 issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail dealing with industrial espionage in Canada went into great detail to demonstrate that increasing use is being made of wire tapping. I do not know whether the hon. member for Rosedale read this article but I should like to read one paragraph. The article referred to a man who was in the business of supplying equipment for wire tapping purposes, and one paragraph was as follows:

> Most of his clients are lawyers, private investigators and industrial companies. He described industrial espionage as growing by leaps and bounds in Canada.
> "It is reflected in my business. May sales of devices have increased more than 500 per cent in the past five years," he said.

Since it has usually been the hon. member for Rosedale who has contributed to the talking out of my bills, I thought I would restrict to the Toronto newspapers my quotations from newspapers which have come out against wire tapping. I would therefore put on record what they have had to say. It is not often that the Toronto newspapers agree with each other but here are some of the things said in editorials.

In an editorial that appeared in the Toronto Star on September 8, 1967, the following appeared:

> The bar association's suggested amendment deals with both these problems. It begins with a general prohibition of electronic espionage. An exception would be made in favour of the police, but this would be hedged around with special restrictions.
> Police officers would have to get a court order —and presumably satisfy the judge that the procedure was necessary—before they could be permitted to instal bugging devices in a suspect's home, office or car in order to listen in on his conversations.
> As a further safeguard, no court order could be issued authorizing the police to listen in on conversations between lawyer and client, husband and wife, or priest or minister and parishioner.

Here is one paragraph from an editorial that appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail on December 9, 1966:

> Obviously, there is a need for laws to restrain electronic eavesdropping—not just for private individuals, but for the police, the military, and everyone. Bugging is an invasion of individual privacy; the dangers of permitting such an invasion to go unchecked are far greater than those involved in depriving private and public investigative agencies of a useful tool.

An editorial which appeared in the Toronto Telegram on May 13, 1966, critical of the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell), had this to say:

> If the R.C.M.P. resorts to wire-tapping, which is illegal under the Criminal Code—

I interject to say that I do not think that is right.

> —he must put an end to this practice, for the force is breaking the law. He should also announce this action to parliament and the country.
> If the R.C.M.P. is not engaged in wire-tapping, he should clear it of this suspicion at once by making a statement in parliament.
> If Mr. Pennell believes that wire-tapping is a necessary method of investigation, he should admit this. He should then introduce legislation to make it legal for the R.C.M.P. and other police forces to carry on this practice.

It is not often that I agree with the editorials of the Toronto Telegram, but in this case I agree completely. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I see no reason for wire tapping. Nevertheless, if those who are charged with the administration of justice do believe it is necessary, then I suggest they ought not to carry it on injudiciously, refusing to admit it is being carried on, hoping to get by, and that the public will ignore it. They at least ought to have the honesty to report such cases to the minister; and the minister ought to bring in legislation which would make it clear, as I think my bill does, that wire tapping is prohibited except in certain special circumstances, and these circumstances should be detailed.

It may be that I would not agree with the reasons given by the minister for permitting wire tapping, but at least the matter could be discussed by parliament. Then if wire tapping were permitted it would only be on the condition that the police went to a judge of the superior court, gave reasons for the wire tapping and obtained a court order. In addition, Mr. Speaker, a report should be made once a year, as I understand is the case in Great Britain, of the number of times the authority given the police by the law had been exercised.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, not only do the police resort to wire tapping but I am also satisfied—and I think the evidence proves this—that private investigators can and do resort to this, to me, dirty practice. I think the practice is reprehensible and should be prohibited.

I do not expect the government to give passage to the bill tonight, but I hope that when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) brings forward his consolidation of the changes to the Criminal Code it will include a new section of the Criminal Code that deals with wire tapping practices. I would like to add that if this kind of section is not included in the changes to the Criminal Code, then the members of this party will bring forward an amendment to that end.

Mr. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, it seems I have the honour that normally goes to the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald). I certainly appreciate the opportunity of speaking on this subject, which is of considerable concern to me as it is to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) and others including members on this side of the house.

It has been pointed out that this matter was first raised in this house by the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand, the present Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell), and I believe that the bill now under debate is substantially a copy of his original bill. This is a source of great disappointment to me, Mr. Speaker, because I think it must be recognized that the bill introduced several years ago by our present Solicitor General was entirely inadequate for the needs of today.

The bill introduced today by the hon. member for Winnipeg North I would have expected to be much improved over the one he introduced last session, but this is not the case; it is still a horse and buggy approach to one of the problems of the electronic age. One might say, this is a horse and buggy approach to bugging. Today, snoopers have progressed beyond the stage conceived of by the hon. member for Winnipeg North in this bill.

Mr. Orlikow: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Stanbury: Yes, and I will be pleased to try to answer it.

Mr. Orlikow: Does the hon. member really believe that if I had done a great deal of work to bring the bill more up to date it would stand a better chance of passing?

Mr. Stanbury: I am glad the hon. member asked that question. If he were familiar with the work done in connection with this subject he would realize that there was a bill introduced in the house last session which did go far beyond his own. As a matter of fact it was introduced by me. It was not passed because the hon. member who was then minister of justice was not prepared to see it pass, as I am sure his successor is not prepared to see the bill under discussion today pass. I recognized the validity of my hon. friend's reasons then for not wanting to pass that legislation in the form in which it was submitted. What I did not understand was his failure to have these bills or their subject matter brought before a parliamentary committee. I regret that the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) is not in the house at the moment because I intend to suggest that in the next session, at least, if not in the present one, this kind of study should be made by a parliamentary committee.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North in presenting his most inadequate bill gave the impression that approval had been given to it by the civil liberties committee of the Canadian Bar Association. If he had done his homework he would know that this is not the case. What has happened, as I understand it, is this: Last fall a report was made to the annual general meeting of the Canadian Bar Association in the form of a resolution far broader than that suggested by the hon. member. My information is that it was in these terms:

(1) All electronic eavesdropping be made a criminal offence with the proviso that electronic eavesdropping may be employed by law enforcement agencies under judicial control.

(2) Electronic eavesdropping shall not be permitted under any circumstances to interfere with privileged communications.

(3) Electronic eavesdropping shall only be authorized in circumstances analogous to those under which a peace officer has the right to arrest without warrant.

(4) Evidence obtained through the illegal use of electronic eavesdropping shall not be made admissible in any court of law.

(5) Any charge before any court, the investigation of which has in the opinion of the court been furthered by means of wilful disregard of the provisions against electronic eavesdropping shall be dismissed, unless the court is of the opinion that such a dismissal would not be in the interest of justice.

I understand that this resolution was not adopted by the Canadian Bar Association because a majority of the members present for the closing session were of the opinion that there was not then sufficient time to consider properly a matter of such importance. However, I believe it will be considered at the next annual meeting and it is intended that a copy of the resolution will be circulated well in advance so that a full discussion might take place. I am informed that a half day of the general meeting will be set aside for the sole purpose of considering this resolution. This gives some indication of the importance attached to it by the Canadian Bar Association.

It is clear that the hon. member for Winnipeg North has scarcely scratched the surface of this problem in his minimal approach to it. If one looks back to the report of those who studied this subject for the benefit of the civil liberties section of the Canadian Bar Association, one finds that as far back as 1965 the chairman of that group, Mr. Aubrey E. Golden, in a report he submitted on September 2 of that year set out what he and his group felt were minimum requirements for legislation. I should like to quote from this report.

It is my respectful submission that only one federal enactment is required. It must be such that it constructs an effective balance between the interest of the individual citizen in maintaining his privacy and the right of the state to secure itself against crime or unlawful activity.

Federal legislation should absolutely prohibit eavesdropping and wire-tapping and make only rigidly defined exceptions where the interest of the state appears to be paramount.

Later, he says:

I would submit the very minimum requirement for exemption is that a county court judge be assured that the conditions of the statute for exemption are satisfied by ex parte vive voce examination of the police officer in charge of the investigation as well as obtaining a written information setting out the basic facts.

The conditions which seem to be reasonable for the granting of a warrant of exemption to a police officer are:

(a) the offence being investigated must be an indictable offence;

(b) normal methods of investigation must have been tried and failed, or must, from the nature of things, be unlikely to succeed if tried;

(c) there must be good reason to think that an interception would result in a conviction;

(d) where the identity of the person sought to be convicted is known, that no other charge is pending against him.

Mr. Golden in his report goes on to examine in some detail the considerations which should enter into the drafting of such legislation. He states it should be an offence to divulge any confidential communication between counsel and client which may happen to be overheard by anyone. He suggests that any kind of approved eavesdropping and wire tapping activities should be limited to a period before the actual charge is laid. He suggests that the only reasonable sanction for failure to observe any restriction which might be placed in the Criminal Code concerning wire tapping or eavesdropping would be the automatic dismissal of any resulting charge in the event that it follows any unauthorized activity. In addition, he suggests, violation of such legislation should be made an indictable offence, with severe minimum penalties provided.

Mr. Golden in this report stresses the fact that we must sanctify the right of privacy with strong legislative action, and only then should we recognize a carefully defined and safeguarded procedure which will assist our law enforcement agencies. He points out that both the United States and Great Britain have held public inquiries, with some educational effect, on the questions of wire tapping, eavesdropping and the invasion of privacy, but in Canada this has not been done.

I agree with Mr. Golden that it is difficult to see how truly effective legislation can be enacted by a government until it is in possession of such basic facts as would indicate where eavesdropping is most useful to law enforcement agencies, and until it has a definition of the real civil liberties issue. I submit that there should be such an inquiry where all interested parties could make submissions, and the issue be put into perspective for government and public alike.

In the United States there have been hearings on this subject over the past two years. Since last March the subcommittee on administrative practice and procedure, headed by Senator Edward V. Long, Democrat, of Missouri, has held hearings on a right of privacy bill. The first witness to be heard at those hearings was the attorney general of the United States, Ramsey Clark. Those hearings continued until October last when the bill was referred to the senate judiciary committee. At that time the Missouri senator in a press statement said:

> This bill is essential if we are going to clear up the legal fog that now surrounds wire tapping, eavesdropping, and snooping in America. I think Congress owes it to the citizens of this nation to act on this measure as soon as possible.

This right of privacy bill would prohibit all wire tapping or mechanical bugging except with the consent of one party. However, an exception is made for the President of the United States to authorize the use of these devices where the national security is threatened. It would also prohibit the manufacture, shipment, and advertising of all devices in interstate commerce which are designed for wire tapping and electronic snooping.

Another prominent American who has spoken out on the subject is Senator Robert F. Kennedy, Democrat, of New York, who in a speech before the law school forum at Columbia University last year said that all modern technology must be used in fighting crime, and he added:

> At the same time, however, we must act to assure that the new technology serves us properly and does not invade the privacy of the individual.

That should surely be the purpose of any legislation on this subject which is passed by this house. We should be much more ambitious in our attempt to attack this most modern of problems than has been the hon. member for Winnipeg North. Our purpose in reform in this field should surely be to protect truly the little man from the big ear.

It is clear from previous debates in the house on this subject that corporations and wealthy persons can protect themselves from electronic snoopers with counter devices which are almost as sophisticated as those available for snooping. There is, in fact, no legal restriction in Canadian law against the manufacture, sale or use of electronic devices for either snooping or the detection of snooping. This is a very grave lack in the law which should preserve the rights of Canadians to privacy.

In stressing the importance of a broad brush approach to such reform I would like to refer again to an editorial which my hon. friend from Winnipeg North mentioned in support of this bill; but when he hears my quotation from it, I think he will recognize it in fact as a clear denunciation of his approach. This editorial in the Toronto Star of September 5, 1964, included the following statement:

> What is needed is an amendment to the Criminal Code that would ban all electronic or mechanical eavesdropping. The only exception would be made for police eavesdropping with the permission of a superior court judge.

That obviously goes far beyond what the hon. member is proposing in his bill.

Mr. Orlikow: And far beyond what the Minister of Justice will agree to.

Mr. Stanbury: The previous minister of justice took the position that he wanted to receive the report of the royal commission on security before making any further study of this matter. I disagree completely with that approach, and I hope the present Minister of Justice will not take that position. I have suggested in the past, and I suggest today, that while we are awaiting that report there is no reason why a study could not proceed, for instance in the justice and legal affairs committee, on matters not touching national security. I urge the Minister of Justice to have the subject matter of the bills now on the order paper, and of the bills previously introduced, referred to that committee for study.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to be here again debating with my hon. friend from Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). In a time of continuing change in the political situation of Canada, it is always reassuring that there will be occasions like this when he will reintroduce the bill he has introduced for many years past and I in turn will have the opportunity to speak about it.

Several things have occurred in the useful relationship he and I have had in this regard. The first, dealing with eavesdropping, has been the appearance of intruders in this field. I am pleased to have the participation and the assistance of the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury), and I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North must be equally delighted to have the support of that pillar of ultramontane society, the doyen of manners and morals in this house, that defender of king and empire, the eloquent and articulate member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), who has introduced the bill which immediately follows that of the hon. member on the order paper, dealing with this same subject matter.

Therefore we will have the opportunity not only of discussing the type of law which the hon. member for Winnipeg North thinks is appropriate here—and for reasons I will deal with later, which I think is inappropriate—but in the near future and I think I can predict a time of not less than an hour, we will have the opportunity of discussing at great length, the legislative proposal being put forward by the hon. member for Kootenay West.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) tells me he thinks I should express a little praise also for the members who have stayed to listen to this debate, and I am quite prepared to recognize their participation in that manner over the years.

I have given an undertaking to the hon. member for Winnipeg North not to refer to any of the material I used in previous years, or for example to the fact that his political friends may have engaged in these self-same practices in Saskatchewan. I take it as accepted that that has occurred, and therefore I will not go further into the question. I should like to introduce into the debate what I believe has been perhaps a useful addition to the public documents on this subject. This has become available since we last discussed this matter. I am referring to the report of the Commission of Inquiry into Invasion of Privacy. The hearings of this commission were conducted by Commissioner R. A. Sargent in the province of British Columbia, and the report is dated August 9, 1967. As I believe hon. members are aware this had to do not so much with telephonic wire tapping as with bugging or eavesdropping which had been engaged in during the course of a union dispute.

The first conclusion to which the commissioner came, as the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury) has already said, was that there was no question that the union official, Mr. O'Neal, was involved in any illegal conduct. In fact there is no criminal law and I do not believe there is any civil law in Canada—although I should not speak for a jurisdiction where I am not a member of the bar—in this regard. Perhaps the most useful part of the report of the commissioner, however, is the catalogue of types of eavesdropping or interception of conversations which were engaged in in British Columbia.

The reason I feel I cannot accept the hon. member's bill—although I acknowledge that it is similar to a bill which was introduced at one time by my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell)—is that it is not adequate in this regard. I should like to refer my hon. friend to the excellent study made under the direction of Mr. Samuel Dash of Pennsylvania. The details of this are to be found in a book entitled "The Eavesdroppers". I believe Mr. Dash has presented much better than I could the particular criticism I would have of the hon. member's bill. At page 6 of "The Eavesdroppers" there appears this observation:

> The failure of legislators to recognize the relationship among these eavesdropping techniques—

That is, telephonic interception and bugging.

> —has led some states to enact strict prohibitions against one technique and completely overlook another. Thus, in Pennsylvania in 1957, it was made illegal for anyone to intercept a telephone communication, even for a law-enforcement purpose. The legislature ignored the use of concealed microphones, with the result that it is legal in Pennsylvania to bug a bedroom, den, or office, but illegal to intercept a telephone communication.

It seems to me that that captures the inadequacy of the hon. member's bill. While he is concerned about telephonic and telegraphic bugging he is not concerned about bugging of conference rooms or other more intimate places of meeting.

One of the more interesting things, as I have already said, was the reference made by Mr. Sargent to the very extensive use of bugging practices not only in the union field but also in industry and in other areas of Canada. Reference was made, for example, to the fact that in the automobile retail business it was not uncommon to use bugging devices to bug the conversations which may be taking place in the showrooms or in rooms adjacent to the showroom of automobile establishments. It was also established that an Arthur Murray dance studio in the province of British Columbia used a bugging device. The evidence was to the effect that it was used as a safety measure. The evidence discloses the enterprise which has been used in respect of bugging devices in the province of British Columbia. Reference is made to the fairly extensive monitoring practice carried on in jails. The hon. member referred to one type of monitoring. I would share his concern about the monitoring of telephone conversations when an accused is communicating with his counsel. However, in respect of monitoring devices in jails, to monitor the drunk tank so that the authorities may know whether there is a change in an individual's conduct which would suggest that treatment was necessary, or in respect of monitoring in maximum security institutions, I do not believe I can accept this.

However, the commissioner did refer to what he himself thought was extensive use of this type of equipment for industrial security. Unfortunately the report does not go into very much detail concerning the type of devices used or the type of situation in which they would be used. But apparently the commissioner did believe that this kind of electronic eavesdropping is used. The hon. member made reference to a situation in the city of Toronto, which I have the honour to represent. It is interesting that the Toronto Transportation Commission uses a type of television bugging device at the turnstiles of the St. George station so that they can find out who has been dropping tokens in the fare box and who has not been dropping tokens in the fare box.

Some of the comments of the commissioner and some of the comments I have made indicate that there is a wide spectrum of uses to which eavesdropping devices are put. Some of these I think would generally be recognized as being legitimate and others not. It is clear from the remarks that I have made that my reason for opposing the hon. member's bill—and this I am sure does not come with any great surprise to him—is the fact that he has not gone far enough in dealing with this kind of legal problem.

It might be interesting to have on the record some examples of the types of equipment and some indication of the scientific advance there has been in this area, as well as an indication of how subtle some of the types of equipment are. At page 30 of the commissioners's report we are given a number of examples. He pointed out that there are a great number of electronic devices now for sale and used in various situations. There is a sub-miniature FM transmitter known as the sugar lump. It is the world's smallest FM bug transmitter. It will pick up even whispers in a normal sized room. The transmission range is from 300 feet to more than one quarter mile. It can give a constant transmission for five days with a 1½ ounce battery. Then the report goes on to refer to what are called spiked mikes, which I am sure is not intended as any assault on the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr). This appears at page 35 of the report as follows:

> There is another contrivance, spike mikes, that look like needles. They go into the wall of the next room—about the size of a nail. It is not pushed quite through. The monitor on it is about as big as a thumb. They are equipped with small ear phones something like a stethoscope device.

The conclusions of the commissioner are interesting. First of all, he recommends some possible changes in the civil law within the jurisdiction of the province of British Columbia which might apply in a particular situation. He also indicates that he proposes a procedure not unlike that provided in the bill of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), Bill No. C-19. His proposal would provide certain examples which the hon. member does not have in this bill. The proposal makes reference to "the use of types of equipment which in certain circumstances could be regarded as legitimate."

• (5:50 p.m.)

I think it might be useful before our next debate on this matter, which may occur some time in 1968, if the hon. member for Winnipeg North examined this subject. I am sure we would be very interested to hear his suggested amendments to the bill, which might make it acceptable to the government, to the point where we might hail the forward advance in the law suggested by the hon. member. However, when this matter does come to a vote this evening, or at such other possible time when all hon. members have had a full opportunity to express their view on this matter, I for one will feel obliged to oppose the measure put forward by the hon. member as not going to the fullest extent possible to deal with what is becoming more of a problem every day, namely eavesdropping not just by telephone and telegraph tapping but by all these devices to which I have referred.

Mr. Orlikow: I wonder whether the hon. member would answer a question before he sits down.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think I will have time to do so.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member has said that he would vote against this bill when it comes to a vote because it does not go far enough. Would he consider drafting a bill for submission at the next session which would go further than my bill, and cover all the new modern problems to which I have referred, and which I admit are not covered by this bill? If he did that I can assure him that I would be very happy to vote in favour of such a bill.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I will certainly give that suggestion consideration. I must say I am touched by the confidence implicit in the hon. member's suggestion. Probably the first step would be to wait for the omnibus Criminal Code bill which will be coming forward, to see whether this important problem will be covered. I am looking forward to the presentation of that bill and if this matter has not been dealt with I will certainly consider the suggestion seriously, and perhaps make an effort to prepare a bill in respect of this very important matter.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it would seem that this afternoon is the afternoon for the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) to get his lumps, although they are not exactly sugar lumps. This hon. member has said he anticipates a new section which will deal with wire tapping in the new proposed omnibus amendments to the Criminal Code to be presented soon, and that if there is no such provision in that bill he will have a great deal to say about that lack. Surely none of us can seriously expect that there will be such a provision in this omnibus bill to be presented shortly. We are not ready yet, I submit, for the introduction of such an amendment to the Criminal Code.

Let me say first that it would be only common sense to wait for the report of the royal commission on security, which has been sitting since about November of 1966. That report should be in our possession in the not too distant future. It is extremely likely that this report will make recommendations in respect of this particular subject. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) and the government should also have the benefit of the considered view on this whole subject by the Canadian Bar Association. We have just heard from the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) that this view or opinion will not be available until at least September or October of next year.

At this time there is authority in Canada for penitentiary officials to open letters either to or from inmates. There is also authorization here to search houses and other premises when a search warrant has been obtained. It would seem therefore that a parallel authorization to use electronic eavesdropping devices in certain cases should be provided. Under certain circumstances this would be in the public interest.

As pointed out by previous speakers we have at this time a variety of devices for eavesdropping such as sugar lumps and spike mikes, and other types of electronic listening aids. We must explore this whole field in greater detail, using the best legal and technical minds available, before making any decision as to the type of legislation we require.

It may be of interest to hon. members to consider a bill relating to wire tapping which was introduced in Congress by the attorney general of the United States in 1964. The purpose of the bill is stated as one—> —to afford a clear cut basis for the legitimate and controlled use of wire tapping by law enforcement officials.

The attorney general suggested this should be so, while expressly forbidding all other types of wire tapping.

Speaking before the Senate subcommittee on organized crime and illicit traffic in narcotics, the attorney general said:

> Section 5(b) of this bill empowers the attorney general, or an assistant attorney general specially designated by the attorney general to authorize application to a federal judge for a wiretap order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the hour provided for the consideration of private members business has now expired. It being six o'clock this house stands adjourned until Monday next at two thirty o'clock in the afternoon.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, December 18, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

RIGHT HON. HAROLD HOLT

EXPRESSIONS OF SYMPATHY ON DEATH OF AUSTRALIAN PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure members of this house would expect me to express our feeling of shock and grief at the tragic accident that resulted in the loss of the prime minister of Australia over the week end.

Mr. Holt was a very distinguished Australian public servant over many years, culminating in his succession to Sir Robert Menzies as prime minister only a relatively short time ago. In that post he had so much to offer and so little time in which to offer it. He was a very strong supporter of the commonwealth and a very good friend of Canada. I know from talks with him that he was most anxious to deepen and develop the friendship between our two countries, both as members of the commonwealth and as Pacific powers.

Mr. Holt will be greatly missed, of course, in his own country but also outside Australia. He was a man of energy, great enthusiasm and warm natural friendliness, qualities which we associate with Australians. He was a good and valued friend of many of us, including myself. I had the privilege of welcoming him to Ottawa officially last summer, and my wife and I had the privilege and pleasure of spending a day or so with him in the country. It was only last Friday, Mr. Speaker, that I received a message from him expressing the hope that my own plans would not prevent a visit to Australia and New Zealand which I was anticipating. He said he looked forward to receiving me as host and as friend.

Our deepest and most heartfelt sympathy goes out to his devoted and courageous wife, Mrs. Holt, and to the members of the family.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the comments made by the right hon. Prime Minister. It is very difficult to understand this sort of thing when it happens. It is difficult to grasp that our sister commonwealth country, Australia, should lose its prime minister through such circumstances. Although Australia is a long distance from Canada I believe Canadians feel a particular cordiality and warmth to the people of Australia.

All Canadians suffered shock and a sense of loss when they heard or read about this tragic accident. I believe all the people of Canada would wish us to extend to the prime minister's family and indeed to the people of Australia our deepest sympathy on this very sad occasion.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate my colleagues and myself in the expression of shock at the tragic loss of the late prime minister of Australia.

• (2:40 p.m.)

This was an unpredictable, sudden and shocking accident that took the life of the relatively young leader of a commonwealth country. We would like to join all members of this house in expressing our deepest sympathy to the people of Australia and to the wife and family of the late Mr. Holt.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, in the name of our group and following the example of those who spoke before me, I join the right hon. Prime Minister in expressing our sympathy to the family of the late prime minister of Australia.

I wish to extend our deepest sympathies to the bereaved family and I hope that they will accept these words of comfort.

[English]

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, we share with hon. members of this house the sorrow expressed over the untimely death of Right Hon. Harold Holt, the late prime minister of Australia. As has been mentioned, Mr. Holt has given many years of distinguished service to his country in both domestic and external affairs. His courage and leadership will be sorely missed at this time. We in this party join in the expressions of sympathy to his country, to Mrs. Holt and the members of the family in this hour of their sorrow and loss.

External Affairs

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—REPORTS ON MEETING OF COUNCIL

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence and I have just returned from attending the first ministerial meeting of the north Atlantic alliance council to be held at the new headquarters of NATO in Brussels. It seemed to both of us that in making a report to the house it would perhaps be prudent if I were to make a report in respect of the matters which involve me as Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence would make a report as well, and that if this is agreeable these would constitute the government report at this particular moment.

The speed and efficiency with which NATO was able to move to its new headquarters are a credit to the Belgian authorities and to the NATO international staff.

This was an important meeting. Indeed, I believe it may turn out to have been one of the key meetings in the history of the alliance. NATO has reappraised its essential objectives and found them still valid, agreed on a new military strategy, and established guide lines for shifting additional emphasis to its evolving political—as distinct from military—activity. The guide lines were the product of the so-called Harmel exercise. At our last meeting in Paris in 1966 the Belgian foreign minister, Mr. Harmel, recalling the initiative taken by Canada in 1964, had proposed a study of the future of the alliance. As a result of this serious reappraisal it was possible to reach a consensus among all 15 members on the objectives and future tasks of the alliance. This consensus is expressed in an annex to the communiqué, which I should be pleased to table if it is the desire of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The member governments have confirmed that there is a continuing need for defensive military arrangements; I wish it were otherwise, but such arrangements are required, just as the regular payment of an insurance premium. In this field the alliance must display determination and firmness.

It was also confirmed that the activities of the alliance to promote a peaceful settlement, that is its political role, have assumed greater importance and should be emphasized. Here is something which is partly new and challenging. In this field the alliance will require imagination and vision. It was affirmed that the political activities of the alliance will be all the more effective if there is full and timely consultation among the members. It was agreed that the military tasks of the alliance are not incompatible with, but rather a necessary complement to, a constructive political role for the alliance.

What does this signify for the alliance and for Canada? In the military sphere it means that as insurance against possible revived Soviet pressures in Europe, bearing in mind that Soviet military capabilities are still increasing, the alliance must maintain an effective deterrent force. For Canada, as a partner in the alliance, it means continuing to contribute, as appropriate, to the alliance's forces based in Europe and to those based in Canada.

On the political side the conclusions of the Harmel exercise mean that our habit of frank discussion among allies of the most important issues facing the alliance and the world, both collectively and individually, is to be further developed. Such consultations I believe are a powerful factor in promoting wider understanding of the issues facing the alliance, and in this way contributing to its cohesion.

The habit of co-operation and consultation in NATO fits it to perform a constructive role in many areas; balanced force reductions, arms control and disarmament measures, improvement of east-west relations, the shape and content of a European settlement and steps which may be taken toward negotiation of such a settlement.

We cannot expect instant or dramatic developments in these areas. There is much to be done, and it will be a painstaking and time consuming task to end the tensions in Europe and achieve a viable settlement. But much depends on the Russians as well as ourselves. It has been abundantly clear, for instance, that the alliance is prepared to explore mutual reductions of forces with the Soviet union and its allies as an important step toward security and stability. But there has been no indication as yet from the Russians, explicit or tacit, that they are ready to respond on this issue. But we must continue the search for agreement, and I can assure the house that Canada will be a vigorous participant in this search.

As I said at the conclusion of the ministerial meeting, NATO has confirmed and emphasized its determination to pursue what I think can be aptly described as a dynamic quest for peace. I can assure the house that the quest for peace will be as sustained and resourceful as we can make it.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to report on the meetings of the nuclear defence affairs committee and the defence planning committee which preceded the meeting of the NATO council about which my hon. colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, has just spoken.

First I would like to deal with the meeting of the nuclear defence affairs committee, which was established a year ago so that all members of the alliance could participate in the formulation of advice to the NATO council on nuclear policy. This committee received progress reports on the studies of the nuclear planning group of which Canada is a member. I would be prepared to table the communiqué of the meeting of the nuclear defence affairs committee if the house so desires.

I informed my colleagues in the N.D.A.C. that for Canada the main purpose of the changing strategic concept is to avoid excessive reliance on the early use of nuclear weapons for defence against aggression. We suggested that the political aspects of the problem be studied further.

The defence planning committee, which consists of ministers of all member countries except France, reviewed the work accomplished since their previous meeting in May, 1967. All ministers strongly endorsed the view, which was later reflected in the communiqué, that one of foundations for achieving an improvement in east-west relations and a peaceful settlement in Europe must be NATO's continuing defensive strength and capability to deter aggression.

Against this background the ministers considered the following main subjects: (a) the new strategic concept; (b) NATO force plans; (c) the standing naval force, Atlantic.

The new strategy of response against aggression makes provision for a flexible and balanced range of appropriate conventional and nuclear responses to all levels of aggression or threats of aggression. The ministers approved this concept.

For the first time the ministers adopted a five year rolling force plan. The current plan covers the period from 1968 to 1972. It includes a firm commitment of forces for 1968 and an outline of national plans for the period from 1969 to 1972.

As far as Canada is concerned, we reaffirmed the continued assignment for 1968 of our forces in Germany consisting of (a) the air division; (b) the Canadian mechanized brigade group. We also confirmed the continued availability from Canada for 1968 of (a) our already earmarked naval forces; (b) two brigades retained in Canada and already earmarked for Europe.

In respect of our plans after 1968 we proposed, as forecast in the white paper of 1964, to substitute one air transportable brigade group based in Canada for the two brigades now earmarked in Canada. We also outlined in general terms proposed reductions in the air division during the next few years. During the next year we shall be forming our new CF-5 squadrons for the support of mobile command forces. In doing this we plan to utilize the trained personnel which will become available as a result of later adjustments in the air division.

Hon. members will recall that when the original decision was made to earmark for SACEUR's strategic reserve two brigades stationed in Canada, it was envisaged that it would be feasible to transport this force to Europe in time to make a significant contribution. However, as a consequence of the gradual mechanization of our brigade in Germany and the corresponding changes in Canada, it has become increasingly apparent that the sea and air lift required to transport these forces to Europe in a mechanized form would not be available in time to be effective.

During the past few years the government examined a number of proposals to overcome this problem. One of these proposals involved the stockpiling in Europe of mechanized equipment for the balance of the force. Because of the expense and the impractical aspects, this proposal was dropped. As a result of the recent review of our military commitments both in Europe and elsewhere we have concluded that another proposal, that of an air transportable force, would be more appropriate and useful. As additional air transport becomes available this force, including men and equipment, can be transported to Europe in time to make an effective contribution. It would also provide us with forces of sufficient flexibility to meet other requirements.

The new strategy of flexible response places more emphasis on dual-capable aircraft. Our air division has both a conventional and nuclear capability and thus is well suited to carry out the requirements of this new strategic concept.

The ministers also approved the organization of a new naval force. This force involves the transformation of the NATO Matchmaker naval training squadron into the standing naval force Atlantic consisting of six to eight destroyer type ships. Hon. members will recall that Matchmaker is a training squadron consisting of a number of ships from NATO countries in the Atlantic area. The squadron has been operating for the past few years and Canada has, from time to time, contributed a ship to it.

The major difference between Matchmaker and the standing naval force is that in Matchmaker ships joined the squadron for exercises; in the standing naval force they will be assigned for a given time and will be under the operational command of a NATO commander. Being composed of ships from various countries, the force will be a further visible evidence of NATO's solidarity.

Each participating country will assign a ship to the force for a fixed period during the year. Canada agrees with the concept of the force, and we are now studying the form of Canadian participation and expect to reach a decision shortly. Participation would not involve a new commitment but rather the assignment of one of the destroyers already earmarked for SACLANT to this NATO force.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, we all join in welcoming the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence back to Canada after their week in Brussels. I believe we have obtained more information about what went on there from the newspaper accounts than the ministers gave us in their reports today. However, I think everyone who takes an interest in this matter was delighted to note that the Harmel report was accepted by all the NATO countries, including France, so the unity of NATO was maintained at this time. I believe everyone was delighted, too, that the emphasis in the Harmel report was on further steps toward a detente in Europe.

[Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne).]

As the minister has said, and as we all agree, we hope these steps will go forward satisfactorily. The warning issued by the secretary general of NATO, Mr. Manlio Brosio in connection with the very large Soviet forces stationed in eastern Europe, the extension of their naval activities and particularly the increase in their naval strength in the Mediterranean, should be heeded because they pose a considerable threat so far as western Europe is concerned. These factors emphasize the necessity of maintaining military forces of NATO in a state of readiness so they will serve as a deterrent to any aggressive action, which is their main function.

The Minister of National Defence mentioned that a new strategy had been decided upon, but actually I feel this is not so much a new strategy as it is a reiteration or a more definite statement of a strategy which has been in effect for several years. I refer to the reliance on conventional forces, in the first instance at any rate, in the hope that their use will prevent the necessity of any nuclear attack being made or a nuclear response by either side. The five year force plan mentioned by the defence minister is to be in effect for the next five years, but he did not tell us what it is. I hope at some future time we will be able to get more details with regard to the five year force plan of NATO and particularly Canada's contribution to it.

The minister has said Canada's commitments for 1968 are unchanged, but there have been a considerable number of reports that the brigade in Europe is to be reduced by 500 men. Perhaps the minister could be more specific about that during the question period. I hope the proposed reduction in the air division has not been a unilateral decision on the part of Canada. There have been considerable rumours about a forthcoming reduction in the strength of the air division, and as I say whatever reductions are made in the coming years—there must be reductions because the aircraft are wearing out and crashing—I hope they will be made in consultation with our allies.

So far as the new destroyer force is concerned, as the minister rather indicated this seems to me to be more or less a realignment of forces already in existence. The minister did not say whether we were contributing one destroyer to this force, as has been rumoured, so I hope once more he will be in a position to give us some information.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, it is not easy to comment on this double barrelled announcement within the rules which require a brief statement; nevertheless I will try to stick to the rules. May I preface my remarks by welcoming both ministers back to the house. If they have been reading the newspapers they will have observed that however much the cold war in Europe is relaxing, the political wars in Canada seem to be heating up.

In his announcement the Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to one feature of the discussions about NATO which are certainly welcome. That is to say, the minister said its attention is henceforth to be directed to what he called constructive areas of activity, arms control and disarmament measures. We hope this is just not words but that the statement will be followed by action, because for too long NATO has taken on the appearance of nothing but a military alliance. Unless the detente in Europe is exploited by NATO, I suggest that NATO is not going to have a very long life. Therefore I hope the announcement made by the minister in connection with these matters will be followed by a form of vigorous initiative.

In regard to the remarks by the Minister of National Defence, I should like to reiterate a suggestion that has been made from time to time in questions asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch); namely, that the two ministers appear as soon as possible before a joint meeting of the external affairs and national defence committees of this house so the matters they have raised can be examined in detail by hon. members.

In so far as the statement of the minister, as far as I understand it, represents a plan of the government gradually to opt out of the air division in Europe and to concentrate upon air transportability, the minister and hon. members know this is a course of action that we in this party have been recommending for years. We are glad to see there is action at last. As far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, our only regret is that the action is not more decisive and vigorous than this. We do not believe there continues to be any useful role for our nuclear armed brigade in Europe. We think the Canadian contribution should be in the form of a mobile conventional force based on Canada, and we believe this fits in with what the minister said is the new approach of NATO.

We trust, Mr. Speaker, that these new approaches will be given full and quick implementation, because at this particular time in Canada's history I suggest we just cannot afford to be spending large sums of money on forms of defence that are either obsolete or no longer useful in meeting any existing threat in Europe.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult in many respects to square the statements of the minister for external affairs with what we see. He is, as we all know, tremendously skilled at manoeuvring, but it will require more than all his adroitness to shore up NATO while at the same time attempting to make the treatment the organization has received from the French government in recent years seem a triumph rather than a disaster. We welcome the fact that the move to Brussels succeeded at all, but we should not pretend that this will have strengthened the organization or that it will function fully without the complete participation of France.

We also know, Mr. Speaker, that all this talk about disarmament is wishful thinking. The Soviet defence budget for 1968 is the greatest in its history of military expenditure. We realize that the economies of western Europe which have been lagging recently will not need any more encouragement in turning to defence production as a means of fueling those economies. This is still the best device in today's world to keep an economy going.

I suggest that one thing urgently needed, and which perhaps could be done through NATO, is a study of the effects of the economies of the world ceasing to embrace any military expenditure. The minister shows concern for military development, but I doubt that the ability of Canada to save Europe by airlifting our forces to that continent is anything more than a dream.

Rather than thinking of military development I suggest we might well think of the political moves we could make, even within NATO. Here I think of our rather ambiguous approach to Portugal and our shoring up of the Turkish-Greek dispute in Cyprus all these years while those two countries have diverted their NATO strength from its original purpose.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Minister of National Defence leave to table certain documents referred to during his speech, which have already been tabled?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REPORT ON BLOOD INDIAN RESERVE

Question No. 684—Mr. Gundlock:

Has there been a study of resources on the Blood reserve prepared by Doctor G. D. Spindler for the use of the Indian affairs branch and, if so (a) what is the nature of the contents of such report and any recommendations made (b) in the event that such report has been prepared, has any use been made of the same by the Indian affairs branch (c) if such a study was prepared, what was the cost?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Dr. G. D. Spindler prepared the material for chapters II and III entitled "Contemporary Blood Indian Community" and "Psychological Characteristics, Work Preferences and Values" respectively of the 22 chapter report on "The Economic Potential of the Blood Indian Reserve." (a) The full report contains an assessment of the resources of the Blood Indian Reserve, e.g. human, mineral, soils, rangeland, agriculture and suggests some methods by which these might be utilized to advantage. (b) Copies of the report were provided to the Blood band council who used it as a basis to undertake a more detailed study of matters relating to land use and economic development. A study is under way to determine the feasibility of irrigating 25,000 acres of reserve land as recommended in the report. Indian affairs branch made a financial contribution to the cost of both these studies. Branch staff are also working in close conjunction with officials of the band council, Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act administration, and water resources branch in assessing the feasibility of irrigating some 8-9,000 acres of leasehold land. (c) The majority of the material for the report on the "Economic Potential of the Blood Indian Reserve" was prepared by federal or provincial employees. Dr. Spindler and Dr. Lok received $1,100 and $500 respectively for manuscripts written by them under contract. Preparation of maps, printing and publishing costs amounted to approximately $3,150.

SCHOOL ATTENDANCE, FORT ALEXANDER INDIAN CHILDREN

Question No. 695—Mr. Jorgenson:

1. Do Indian children of the Fort Alexander band attend the Powerview integrated school?

2. If so, how many children of the Fort Alexander band attended the said school during the 1966-67 term?

3. How many of the said children from the Fort Alexander band consulted prior to arrangements in the high school program for the 1966-67 term?

4. Of those enrolled in the high school program for the said term how many successfully passed the high school program?

5. Were the parents of the children of the Fort Alexander band consulted prior to arrangements being made for the said children to attend the Powerview school and, if so, what were the wishes of the majority of the said parents with respect to the choice of school to be attended by their children?

6. Were any representations made by the parents of the children of the Fort Alexander band to attend the school at Lebret and (a) if so, were the children of such parents permitted to attend Lebret, (b) if not, what was the reason for not allowing attendance at Lebret school?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Yes.

2. In 1967, 24 of the registered Indian pupils enrolled in the Powerview collegiate were members of the Fort Alexander band.

3. There were 24 pupils from the Fort Alexander band enrolled in grades 9 to 12 for the 1966-67 school year.

4. Of the 28 registered Indian pupils who wrote examinations at Powerview collegiate in the Spring of 1967, 11 passed.

5. The parents of the children of the Fort Alexander band were consulted prior to arrangements being made to include their high school students in the Powerview collegiate in 1962 and the majority expressed agreement to this proposal. This approval was ratified in January of 1966 by the band council when an expansion of the joint agreement was suggested.

6. Three families made inquiries as to whether their children could be sent to school in Lebret. (a) The parents were informed that they could, of course, send their children to Lebret at their own expense but that the department could not sponsor such a plan. (b) The reason for this decision was that a comparable school was available in the community. Subsidiary but decisive reasons were the fact that such a transfer would mean moving the students from the curriculum of one province to that of another plus the expense of travelling and maintenance.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES POPULATION STATISTICS

Question No. 761—Mr. MacDonald (Prince):

1. On what date is it estimated the population of the four Atlantic provinces will reach the 2 million mark?

2. How many persons were born in the four Atlantic provinces in the years 1950 to 1966?

3. How many persons migrated into the four Atlantic provinces in the years 1950 to 1966?

4. How many persons migrated from the four Atlantic provinces in the years 1950 to 1966?

5. How many of those who migrated from the four Atlantic provinces in the years 1950 to 1966 were between the ages of 16 and 65?

6. How many persons received financial assistance in migrating from the four Atlantic provinces from 1950 to 1966, and what amount was expended?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Manpower and Immigration, National Health and Welfare and Trade and Commerce as follows: 1. Information not available.

2. See attached table.

3. Information not available.

4. Information not available.

5. Information not available.

6. The manpower mobility program, administered by the Department of Manpower and Immigration, has been in operation since the beginning of 1966. Statistics on the number of people moved and on expenditures incurred are kept separately for moves within and from each province, but not by province of destination. As many moves are to neighbouring provinces, and the Atlantic region consists of four provinces it is not possible to give data on moves from that region.

Number of live births, Atlantic provinces, 1950-1966

Year	Newfoundland	Prince Edward Island	Nova Scotia	New Brunswick	Total four Atlantic provinces
1950	13,164	2,885	17,262	16,393	49,704
1951	11,738	2,651	17,125	16,075	47,589
1952	12,561	2,703	17,951	16,691	49,906
1953	12,797	2,737	18,276	16,458	50,268

PRESERVATION OF INDIAN ART AND CULTURE

Question No. 778—Mr. Barnett:

1. Has the Indian affairs branch of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development a program of providing grants for the preservation and advancement of Indian art and culture?

2. If so, when was this program inaugurated?

3. How many individuals and/or organizations have received grants under any such program?

4. What are the qualifications for eligibility for any such grants?

5. How and to whom should an application for any such grant be made?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Yes.

2. Program approval was received January 19, 1965 and the program was inaugurated immediately thereafter.

3. Thirty-three.

4. Individual applicants must be Indians within the meaning of the Indian Act; the membership of organizations must include members who are Indians within the meaning of the Indian Act; the purpose for which the grant is requested must be one which is not provided for in other branch programs; The purpose must be one which will contribute to the preservations, growth and/or expression of Indian culture.

5. Applications for grants must be submitted through an office of the branch on application forms available from branch offices, band councils, and friendship centres.

RETAIL CONCESSIONS ON ARMED FORCES BASES

Question No. 810—Mr. Ballard:

1. How many retail food stores are operated by the Department of National Defence on Canadian forces bases in Canada?

2. How many retail food stores are operated by the Department of National Defence on its Canadian forces bases in Alberta?

3. How many retail food markets are operated on a concession basis by civilians on Canadian forces bases in the province of Alberta?

4. How many automotive service stations are operated on a concession basis by civilians on Canadian forces bases in the province of Alberta?

5. Have there been in any recent modifications to the policy governing the operation of retail concessions on Canadian forces bases, and are any proposed changes presently under discussion?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): 1. None. Retail food stores on Canadian forces bases in Canada are operated by concessionaires or as non-public fund activities of units.

2. None.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

3. Two, CFB Cold Lake and CFB Edmonton.

4. None.

5. No. Some changes in operating procedures are under discussion.

HOUSING LOAN APPLICATIONS, PETERBOROUGH, ONT.

Question No. 823—Mr. Brewin:

1. Have there been any applications to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation from the Ontario Housing Corporation for funds for the acquisition of lands for housing purposes in the Peterborough area during the last four months?

2. If so, have any of the applications been refused and what are the details of such applications?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): 1. No.

2. See answer to 1 above.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

YUKON FOREST SERVICE

Question No. 759—Mr. Nielsen:

1. What was the number of (a) classified, and (b) casual employees on the strength of the Yukon forest service for each of the years 1957 to 1967 inclusive?

2. For each of the said years, what was the total payroll and the total value of capital expenditures?

3. For each of the said years, how many forest fires occurred and what was the estimated value of the timber loss?

4. For each of the said years, what was the total cost of the operations of the Yukon forest service?

Return tabled.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PARTICIPATION BY FRANCE IN NUCLEAR ENERGY RESEARCH IN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether his attention has been directed to a report that included in one of the cultural agreements between France and Quebec there is a provision for participation by the government of France in studies and research in the domain of nuclear energy in the region of northern Quebec. Has the minister's attention been directed to a report to this effect which appeared in today's press? Can he say whether the report is correct? Can he say whether the federal government was furnished with a copy of the agreement, and whether this aspect has the approval of the federal government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows he cannot ask whether a press report is correct. Perhaps the minister still wishes to make a statement in reply to the question.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I shall be glad to take a look at the press report and reply later.

Mr. Fulton: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. What was the reply? I could not hear it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I shall be glad to take a look at the press report, see what it says and deal with the question tomorrow.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a supplementary question to direct to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister tell us whether there have been any uranium finds in the province of Quebec?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, I cannot, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lambert: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister no information on uranium discoveries in the country?

Mr. Pepin: I have no authority in the provinces in these matters. I am only responsible for the activities of Eldorado Mining and Refining Company, which is not involved in mining uranium in Quebec.

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): May I direct a further supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister inform this house whether he is aware that official French delegations have visited the Chibougamau or Mistassini districts of Quebec?

Mr. Pepin: I shall undertake to report tomorrow, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ABOLITION OF SECRETARIAT DEALING WITH WAR ON POVERTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the widespread evidence that a substantial proportion of Canadians continue to live in poverty, and in view of the government's announcement that the special planning secretariat will be disbanded, would the right hon. gentleman inform the house whether alternative arrangements are being made to continue the work of the special secretariat in what was hopefully announced to be a war on poverty?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the absorption of the functions of the planning secretariat by other departments does not mean that the work the secretariat was co-ordinating will cease in any way, shape or form. We shall continue that work, I hope, in all economic and financial policies we bring forward.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the right hon. gentleman inform the house now or in a day or two exactly what departments are taking over the functions of the special planning secretariat, which I understand was established especially to deal with and co-ordinate remedies with respect to poverty in Canada?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I shall be very glad to do that, Mr. Speaker.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN POSITION ON RESOLUTION BANNING ASSISTANCE TO CERTAIN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister advise the house as to the position Canada took on the United Nations resolution to ban assistance to South Africa, Rhodesia and Portugal because of policies being followed by those countries?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have, of course, opposed apartheid as practised by the government of South Africa. The resolution dealing with this matter, however, contained other matters that in our judgment were not within the direct capability of the United Nations. Because of that we had to abstain, but with the general purport of the resolution we were in full accord. Likewise with regard to the discrimination that is practised in Rhodesia, we have made our position well known on this point at the United Nations and elsewhere.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

PREPARATION OF MATERIAL FOR FORTHCOMING CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the importance of arriving at useful and constructive conclusions at the federal-provincial conference that will be held in Ottawa at the end of next month or early in February, a conference that will deal with the constitution and other related matters, will the government take great care to ensure that material to be presented to the provincial premiers who will be attending the conference will be practical and constructive, so we can avoid the kind of conclusion which resulted from the conference which terminated so abruptly in Ottawa last Tuesday night?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question was more in the form of a speech. I think the latter part of his remarks probably out of order.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, may I assure you that I was not trying to be argumentative. I was trying to elicit some information from the Prime Minister on a most important subject. I think he wishes to answer.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): As always, Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to my hon. friend for his advice which I know is based on deep knowledge and long experience.

Mr. Hees: May I thank the Prime Minister very much for his kind and well received remarks.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the success of the confederation for tomorrow conference, is the Prime Minister giving further consideration to holding part of the forthcoming conference in public?

Mr. Pearson: I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, that that would be the best course to follow in respect of the conference that will be held in February. This conference may be different from that which was held in Toronto, which was an exchange of views. There was no question of dealing with proposals at that conference. Nevertheless I still hope we can hold the forthcoming conference in public to the maximum possible extent.

Mr. Eric Nielsen (Yukon): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since one of the primary subjects on the agenda at the forthcoming conference will be the bill of rights, will the Prime Minister assure us that Canadians who live above the sixtieth parallel, in the two territories, will be represented at least by observers in that part of the discussion which has to do with the fundamental and basic human rights of all Canadians?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows we shall follow the course which has proved to be the best as a result of experience in the past, the course which was followed by governments that preceded our government. I can give the assurance that when matters of direct importance to those Canadians who do not live in provinces are before the conference, they will be directly represented there.

[Later:]

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister a question relating to earlier questions concerning the forthcoming federal-provincial conference. Can he inform the house whether he has suggested to the provincial premiers, as has been reported, that they invite the leaders or representatives of opposition parties and, if not, will he in any case consider inviting the leaders or representatives of opposition parties in this house to the federal-provincial conference?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I certainly made no such suggestion to the provincial premiers and I would be straying outside my jurisdiction if I did so. I do not know where that report originated. As I did not make the suggestion I had better wait to see what stand they will take before we decide what we ought to do. If they invite their opposition leaders to this conference it would create a very unique and interesting situation which would have to be taken into consideration here.

FINANCE

INTERNATIONAL GOLD TRANSACTIONS TO SUPPORT DOLLAR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question, Mr. Speaker, is for the Minister of Finance. In the light of the statement by United States authorities and others who are members of the gold pool, and in the light of the recent statement by the governor of the Bank of Canada, would the minister now answer that portion of my question which he took as notice on Friday and advise Canada just where we stand on this question of the gold pool and international monetary relations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the hon. gentleman asked me a supplementary question. I think I answered his first question by stating that we were not a member of the so called gold pool and that we have been kept informed about the operations of the pool. We have never been asked to join it, and we are interested in the outcome of present gold transactions. The second question the hon. member asked, as reported on page 5470 of Hansard, is:

> Does this mean that dealing in futures in the gold market will not apply in Canada as well as in the pool countries?

The governor of the Bank of Canada over the week end asked banks and financial institutions to avoid selling gold on credit and to avoid dealing in gold futures.

Mr. Lambert: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister advise us whether the United States government has asked Canada to join in its action to maintain the price of gold at $35 an ounce and, indeed, to continue to shore up the dollar as the unit of international monetary exchange?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, that question is really the equivalent of asking whether we are a member of the gold pool. The answer to that question is in the negative. We are not one of those countries that are involved in supplying gold at $35 an ounce in order to maintain this value. We are, however, very interested in the stability of the international monetary system, and we will be co-operating with the United States in an effort to maintain the present price of gold. This is in the interests of ensuring the stability of the international monetary system.

Mr. Lambert: Notwithstanding the fact that Canada is not a member of the gold pool, will the minister advise whether the United States government has asked the Canadian government to participate or assist in this action?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had answered that question on Friday when I said we had not been asked to join the gold pool.

REQUEST FOR CONTINUED PRODUCTION OF HALF DOLLAR AND DOLLAR COINS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Now that he has had time to give consideration to my request of last week, will he satisfy the desires of Canadians who wish to have souvenir fifty cent and dollar silver pieces, and thereby improve his public image?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Starr: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, will the minister see to it that more fifty cent and dollar silver pieces are minted so Canadians may have them as souvenirs of centennial year?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I say in answer to the first question that if it would help the hon. gentleman's image I would be very glad to print his effigy on one side. As to his question about dollars and fifty cent pieces, the matter of souvenir collections of coins is still under consideration.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR JOINT MEETING OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND DEFENCE COMMITTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the reports the House of Commons has received today from the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence on the NATO meeting in Brussels, and keeping in mind the answer given to the house last week by the Prime Minister, may I now ask whether he will see to it that there is a joint meeting of the external affairs and defence committees before the Christmas recess?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Of course, Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows the committee chairmen have the responsibility, but I shall be very glad to take up the matter with them and assure them that the two ministers would be very happy if the committees could meet this week.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I direct a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Was the government's decision to withdraw the Canadian nuclear strike force from NATO influenced by this party's decision, at its 1960 convention, on its NATO policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—PROPOSED REDUCTION IN CANADIAN ARMY BRIGADE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has a decision been taken to reduce the Canadian army brigade in Europe by 500 men?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Well, Mr. Speaker, this may be a question of vocabulary. Some redeploy; others rotate; we restructure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I think I could say that the aim for all is the same, that is to improve the ratio between operational and administrative forces.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister's week with the Secretary of State for External Affairs has not done him any good. May I ask him if in future the strength of this brigade group is to be approximately 6,000 rather than approximately 6,500?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Approximately 6,000.

Mr. Harkness: Then if this reduction of 500 men is taking place, is it to be accomplished by doing away with one or more units in the brigade and, if not, how is it to be accomplished?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe I gave my description for it; by restructuring.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I do not think restructuring means anything so far as we are concerned in this house. What does the minister mean by restructuring? More specifically, how is this reduction to be brought about?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have an easier question for the Minister of National Defence. At the meeting of the nuclear committee of NATO at Brussels was there any discussion of Canada's plan to negotiate out of its nuclear role, a pre-election commitment made to the Canadian people by the Prime Minister over four years ago?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, this was not actually on the agenda; therefore there was no discussion of it.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): As a supplementary question, did Canada have anything to do with drawing up the agenda?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): No, Mr. Speaker.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER—PROTEST AGAINST IMPOSITION OF TOLLS ON APPROACH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I would like to direct to the attention of the Minister of Transport. It concerns Vancouver International Airport. What consideration is being given to the protest of the B.C. federation of labour against the proposed establishment of a toll crossing over the Fraser river, which it is argued will become a financial burden to the airport users?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that this question be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Mather: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

FREIGHT RATES

MEETING WITH RAILWAYS TO DISCUSS NEW L.C.L. RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Did he as yet have an opportunity to meet with officials of the railways with regard to l.c.l. rates in the Atlantic provinces? If not, when does he propose to meet with them?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had an opportunity to meet with them, but I have passed on to them the information following the meeting with the Atlantic premiers and the questions that arose from that meeting. The railways are now studying these various suggestions in order to decide what position they should take in respect to each of the propositions. Following that I shall be in a position to meet with them to discuss their positions and decide what further action should be taken, if any.

Mr. Coates: As a supplementary question, could the minister indicate whether he might be able to produce a decision prior to December 25, which would be a very satisfactory Christmas present to businessmen in the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Hellyer: I think the date is an admirable one, Mr. Speaker, but it will be determined to a considerable extent, if not totally, by the ability of the railways to come to a conclusion by that time.

TRADE

WHEAT—POSSIBLE TRANSFER OF FUNDS FOLLOWING SALE TO CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. As a result of the latest wheat sale to China will there have to be an appropriation from the federal treasury to wheat board funds?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): That remains to be seen in the light of wheat sales during the crop year, Mr. Speaker.

SHIPBUILDING

PAYMENT OF SUBSIDIES ON FISHING VESSEL CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. On December 5 I asked the minister what action the government was planning to assist the wooden shipbuilding industry in Nova Scotia, and he replied that it was the government's intention to continue the subsidy program. Has there been any change in the government's wooden shipbuilding subsidy program since December 5?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Crouse: Then as a supplementary question would the minister explain his statement written to the fishermen's loan board at Halifax on December 5 and December 8 that "no further applications for subsidy—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Crouse: —will be approved—"

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's supplementary is not in order.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member asked a question. He is now asking a supplementary question, seeking to have the minister explain a statement. That is not a proper question.

Mr. Crouse: Then may I rephrase my question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the minister's intention to continue with the present wooden shipbuilding subsidy program?

Mr. Robichaud: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is the department's intention to continue the subsidy on wooden ships, but I did write the fishermen's loan boards of Nova Scotia and of the other Atlantic provinces and Quebec, advising them that we had to review the subsidy position, due to the fact that fishing vessels had been completed and applications with respect to subsidies were sent in months after those ships had been engaging in fishing operations. We agreed at a meeting in Moncton on November 15 that all applications had to be reviewed to determine what money would be needed in supplementary subsidies to cover all applications for the current fiscal year.

Mr. Crouse: One final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister tell the house when the subsidy program will be reinstated?

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, there is no reason to reinstate the subsidy program. It has always been in operation, and still is.

HOUSING

MALVERN, ONT.—PROVISION OF SERVICES FOR PROPOSED SATELLITE TOWN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour in his capacity as the minister reporting on housing. In view of the critical housing situation, and in view of the fact that the federal government, together with the provincial government of Ontario, has for years been the owner of a considerable tract of land at Malvern, near Toronto, which could be made available for a satellite town of 30,000 people, is the government going to contribute to the cost of services, which I understand is the main obstacle to proceeding with the plan?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the hon. member that talks have been in progress for some weeks with the Ontario housing corporation with a view to making better use of the land that was acquired by the federal-provincial partnership some years ago. On Wednesday of last week I met with the minister, some of his officials and officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. We agreed on the appointment of a community planner and a consulting engineer in order to move ahead with this project. It is a strategically located site, one which we hope will be a model for other suburban communities in the years ahead.

EDUCATION

REQUEST THAT CONTINUED PROVISION BE MADE FOR STUDENT EXCHANGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I should like to direct to the right hon. Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to maintain, at the very least, during the coming year the level of funds available for student travel and exchange within Canada? I ask this question in view of the immeasurable value to the future of our country of the student exchange.

Mr. Speaker: I realize the importance of the matter but I suggest that this is the type of question which should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Nesbitt: I submit with great respect, Your Honour, that this question meets both the qualifications in respect of a question during this period.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows he can ask leave to debate the matter at the time of adjournment.

TRANSPORTATION

REPORT OF STUDIES ON RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister inform the house when the special studies on the social and economic impact of rail line abandonment in the prairies will be made available to the public?

An hon. Member: He does not know what it is.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I admit I do not know what it is. I think perhaps I should take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker. However, I believe I can tell my hon. friend that the Canadian Transportation Commission will have to see quite a bit more water go under the bridge before hearings commence on this very important subject.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister is taking this question as notice, when he reports to the house I wonder whether he will assure the house that there will be no future hearings on abandonment until these studies are available.

Mr. Hellyer: Some weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, I gave the house that assurance.

[Later:]

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one asked a few moments ago by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris of the Minister of Transport. When will the independent cost analysis report on transportation be available? More particularly, I should like to know whether it will be made available before any further hearings on rail line abandonment take place?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, this is part of the same question I answered some time ago when I said the commission would be holding public hearings and that further representations could be made to the commission before a costing order was made. No further hearings on rail line abandonment in western Canada having to do with the wheat trade will be held pending the hearings on the costing order.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Can the minister assure us that the cost analysis will be free of any previous orders or preconceptions?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, it is to be approached with a completely open mind. The conclusions that were taken previously are not to prejudice in any way the outcome of the anticipated hearings which will be held in the new year.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PRESENCE OF RUSSIAN SHIP NEAR VANCOUVER ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in the light of reports of unusual manoeuvres by a Soviet ship near the west coast of Vancouver island—manoeuvres which apparently drew the attention of two Canadian destroyers—whether he is in a position to report to the house on the significance of this event?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, not at the moment, but perhaps tomorrow.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence whether his department has any report which he is in a position to give the house in this regard?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am informed that two Canadian destroyers were dispatched last week to give assistance or guidance to a Russian hydrographic survey ship if it should enter Canadian waters. It has been the usual practice to keep under surveillance any foreign ships which might enter our waters, particularly those which have given no advance warning of their intention.

[Later:]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Does he have any information whether the Soviet hydrographic vessel, to which he referred in his earlier answer to the hon. member for Kamloops, has been involved in a program of underwater explosions in the north Pacific south of the Aleutians?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I do not think I can go beyond the statement I made.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

INQUIRY AS TO PROCLAMATION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. It relates to the Canada Labour (Safety) Code which was passed by parliament last December. Can the minister say whether this act and the regulations under it will be proclaimed before the end of this year, as the minister promised on several occasions; and will the administration of this act be brought into effect by that time?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to inform the hon. member that the necessary order in council has been passed proclaiming the new legislation, and it becomes effective January 1, 1968. Some regulations have been drafted, and others are in the course of being prepared.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS AND DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT

INQUIRY AS TO PROTESTS OVER AMENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address this question to the Minister of Labour. Is he receiving protests from organized labour and/or others regarding Bill No. C-186?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, there have been some communications received which might be regarded as protests and others which are not. These will be dealt with by the committee early in the new year, I hope.

BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO FACILITIES FOR EDUCATIONAL TELEVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State concerning educational television. When the Minister of National Revenue made his recent announcement concerning federal projects which are to be eliminated or postponed he made no mention of the transmission facilities for educational television. Does the government plan to build any such facilities in 1968?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is of such a general nature that I do not think it should be asked at this time.

[Later:]

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State and it is similar but not the same as one asked earlier. Has the government made a firm commitment to any province to provide transmission facilities for educational television next year?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member knows, there is a draft bill to go before the committee and the committee has not begun to deal with this matter. I suppose my colleague the President of the Treasury Board did not discuss this as a matter of dollars because there is no indication at all at this stage what proportion would be borne by the provinces or other interested groups and the federal government, or which provinces will be ready to put on enough hours of programming to make it worth while to build transmitters. It is not possible at this point, until we have seen what the committee has to say about it after it has heard witnesses and the bill has been put before the house, to ascertain how many would be required.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL RESOLUTION RESPECTING AMENDMENTS TO YUKON ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In the hope that it will assist in breaching what appears to be an impasse between the Yukon legislative council and the government, will he assure the house that in addition to discussions with the territorial council in respect of any recommendations which will be contained in the forthcoming important departmental white paper, there will be discussions in respect of other matters concerning the reform of the Yukon Act which might originate with the council?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, the constitutional powers of the council of the Yukon Territory derive entirely from the Yukon Act. Its amendment is solely within the prerogative of parliament. I have already assured the council on a number of occasions that when the white paper is prepared we will discuss it with representatives of the council. I should not like to give any undertaking beyond that because in doing so I would be going beyond my powers.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Will he at least assure the house that he or his officials will hold discussions with representatives of the Yukon council prior to the completion of the recommendations which will appear in the white paper in order that the views of the council will be ascertained before the white paper is completed?

[Miss LaMarsh.]

Mr. Laing: I fully expect to hear the views of the Yukon council whether I ask for them or not.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF FRESH WATER FISH MARKETING BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce which he may wish to take as notice. Has his department now reached a position of agreement with the government of the province of Manitoba relative to the strongly voiced disagreement in respect of the marketing of fresh water fish? May I rephrase the question and simply ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether any areas of disagreement between the government of the province of Manitoba and the federal government have now been removed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With respect, I suggest that the question is too wide in scope to be asked in this way at this time.

Mr. Schreyer: May I rephrase the question, Mr. Speaker, and ask the minister whether he can say now if the government has any intention of implementing the McIvor report on fresh water fish marketing?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have informed the government of Manitoba that there are areas of the report in respect of which we think we might work constructively and in harmony.

AGRICULTURE

ASSISTANCE TO PRODUCERS AFFECTED BY TARIFF REDUCTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the Kennedy round tariff reductions start coming into effect in less than two weeks does the minister plan to announce to the house before we adjourn on Friday any measure to ease the impact on agricultural producers who are adversely affected by these tariff reductions?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not have any plans in this regard at the present time, but I will be very pleased to keep the suggestion of the hon. member in mind.

Mr. Hees: In view of the fact that quite a number of weeks ago the minister advised me that the department was working on this whole matter, is he saying that they have arrived at no conclusions and that he has no information to pass on to the house regarding any plan to be put forward?

Mr. Greene: Some of the effects of the Kennedy round tariff reductions will only become evident when the economic results come into play after the implementation of the tariff reductions. On the basis of the information we have today we feel there will be nothing but benefit to Canada and the Canadian agricultural community in general. In the event that certain segments of the agricultural industry suffer any harm which should be alleviated by governmental action we will certainly be pleased to consider such action as becomes necessary.

Mr. Hees: In view of the minister's answer is he sure he has been opening all his mail?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADIAN ALTITUDE RECORD FOR JET AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence, but before doing so I hope he will allow me to express on my behalf and on behalf of all members of the house our congratulations to Wing Commander R. A. White, who I understand on Thursday established a Canadian altitude record for jet aircraft.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: Having said that, let me now ask my question. It is my understanding, according to a press release issued by the information service of the Department of National Defence, that this altitude record was achieved with a CF-104 Super Starfighter after six months intensive work by the Department of National Defence and private agencies. Will the minister please tell us why, if the CF-104 is to be phased out through attrition, this money was spent?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making an argument now rather than asking a question.

[Later:]

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to complete the information the hon. member for Vancouver East gave the house. Wing Commander White actually flew at a height of 100,100 feet.

TRANSPORT

INTRODUCTION OF MEASURES RELATING TO MARITIMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister if he can now answer the question I asked the other day as to whether legislation in respect of maritime transportation will be dealt with at a new session? I ask this because a simple yes would enable certain ambitious gentlemen to wander safely in Atlantic Canada in the four months ahead.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I am sorry I have not answered that question before now, Mr. Speaker, but I will certainly look into it very carefully.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that after the government having answered some seven written questions today approximately 153 still remain on the order paper, will the Prime Minister prevail upon his ministers to answer as many of the simple ones as possible next Wednesday prior to the Christmas recess, especially those ministers who might be hitting the campaign trail?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I do not know of a single simple question on the order paper, Mr. Speaker.

RESEARCH

TRANSFER TO U.S. OF HARP PROJECT AND PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Industry to advise the house whether the government is satisfied that the HARP project and all the personnel involved should be transferred to the United States?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, of course the government is not satisfied that all the personnel of the HARP project should be transferred to the United States. Indeed, on a number of occasions I have expressed the hope that this will not take place and that it will be possible to find a climate for them in Canada.

Mr. Lambert: May I ask the minister whether the government through its agencies is actively co-operating in attempting to have these people remain in Canada to work on this useful research?

Mr. Drury: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

PRIME MINISTER

METHOD OF AWARDING DESIGNATION "RIGHT HONOURABLE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a constitutional question to the Prime Minister. I think Your Honour will realize that I am asking it now while there is time to deal with the matter involved. Will the government make the necessary arrangements so that the next Prime Minister of Canada, whoever he may be, and all future Prime Ministers can be styled as "right honourable" without having to be made members of the privy council of another country?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the question may be constitutional, but it does not appear to be very urgent.

PUBLIC SERVICE

MAINTENANCE OF ETHNIC PRESS DIVISION IN STATE SECRETARY'S DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Secretary of State whether the ethnic press analysis branch of her department is being reduced almost by half effective March 1, 1968?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked me a similar question the other day. My answer is, not that I am aware, but it may be that this staff is subject to the curtailment policy announced by the treasury board. It should be appreciated that the Secretary of State's department is like no other in that it is very small with just a few agencies and a few people attached to it.

Mr. Starr: In view of the fact that this branch has been rendering valuable service, will the minister look into this matter and protest that such a small department should be curtailed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now making a representation.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr .Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the strategic importance of the work he has been undertaking in his position as minister, does he believe events are so well advanced that he might be spared from the international scene long enough for a brief return to domestic political life?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I doubt it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

• (3:50 p.m.)

DIVORCE

MEASURE RESPECTING GROUNDS, JURISDICTION, JUDGES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Friday, December 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Trudeau for the second reading of Bill No. C-187, respecting divorce.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, when this debate was adjourned on Friday afternoon I was making the point that every responsible person believes that marriage should be a permanent relationship, seriously undertaken and with the full expectation of building a lifelong partnership. This is the ideal. I believe that most young couples have the idea that their union will be permanent, but the strains on marriage are very heavy today and many young couples are far from prepared to withstand those strains. Consequently, whether we like it or not there are very many marriages that fall by the wayside and many partnerships that prove not to be indissoluble.

Times have changed very greatly. When giving evidence to the committee on divorce Dr. Ollivier said that in the first 12 years after confederation parliament had enacted eight divorces, whereas in 1966 the Senate passed over 1,000 divorce resolutions. When we reflect on the fact that in 1966 people from only two provinces, Quebec and Newfoundland, were still coming to the Senate with divorce petitions, we get some idea of the magnitude of the change. People from those two provinces alone brought to the Senate over 1,000 divorce petitions in 1966, and when we compare that with the eight divorces in all Canada which were enacted in the first 12 years after confederation we get some idea of the change.

I do not want to give the impression that there are not qualifications in this respect. In the first 12 years after confederation Canada was a very much smaller country and covered a great deal less territory than it does now. Also, the 1,000 divorce petitions in 1966 may have been many more than the number presented in a normal year from those two provinces. Nevertheless, times have changed greatly.

What is the situation today? We find that in Canada, whether we like it or not, no matter how much we may hope that all marriages will be permanent there are nearly half a million common law unions in which are not sanctioned in any way by marriage and the children of which are illegitimate. These unions have no position at all in law except in one or two very small respects. We also find there are very many couples, an undetermined number, who are held together in unhappy, strife-torn unions.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Yes.

Mr. Cowan: The hon. member used the term "illegitimate children" just now. I thought she was opposed to that phrase. Why is she using it?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): If the hon. member would like me to talk of illegitimate parents I will be very happy to accommodate him. It is one of the easier places to accommodate him, I may say. There are very many couples who are held together in most unhappy unions or in unions from which all the respect and love that brought them together in the first place have gone. These couples are together simply because they cannot get free.

Of the many letters which I, along with other members of the house, have received I would like to read just two. They come from Vancouver, one from my constituency and one from the constituency of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing). However, they are symptomatic of the letters which come to us from all across this country. One letter reads in part as follows:

> May I tell you that for 14 years my wife and I have lived apart. There is no possibility of a reconciliation. There are no children or religious differences involved. Ours was a marriage which was unsuccessful from the outset notwithstanding we lived together on and off for 15 years.
> My wife is gainfully employed and is approximately 58 years of age. I am also gainfully employed and am 59 years of age.
> Over the years I have attempted to secure a divorce under the existing laws. My wife is not interested in divorce. She advised me on many occasions that I could live with who I liked, but she would not agree under any circumstances to a divorce.
> I believe I am a law-abiding citizen and of temperate and/or moderate habits. Surely the divorce laws will be amended to permit a person in my situation, and I believe there are thousands of us, to secure a proper divorce in order to attempt to live a normal life, and take a proper place in society.
> May I urge you to be compassionate and understanding of the many people who, through no desire of their own, entered into marriages that did not work out successfully, and yet under existing laws are powerless to have such unhappy unions dissolved.

We have an example here of a union which was simply unsuccessful, where the partners failed to develop those human relationships that would have made the marriage successful, where there appears to be very little recrimination or bitterness but there is a settled conviction on the part of the husband that there cannot be a reconciliation. The wife evidently cares very little about the marriage because she has told him he can live with whom he likes but that she will not enable him to obtain a divorce.

In my opinion this is a very good example of the many hundreds of letters which all of us have received from people who want to be free. Frankly, I consider it is immoral to compel two such people to go on living together in a relationship which certainly does not make for happiness.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member realizes, of course, that this particular case could be solved by the new divorce law?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Yes, indeed. I want to come to that in a moment because I realize this is just one example of many hundreds of people who have been waiting and waiting in a very law-abiding and patient way for the new divorce legislation which will give them release. In this case it will give the husband release and will provide release also for his wife, even though apparently she does not want that release. I think much of her reluctance may stem from the fact she feels that under existing conditions it will not be recognized by the community as being a proper thing to do. The other letter is quite different. It is from a woman in my constituency who says in part:

> I am one of thousands of deserted women in this country who have no hope of obtaining my freedom while the present laws exist. No one has seen or heard of my husband since he left us three and a half years ago. Only his creditors really looked very hard, but they gave up. I cannot prove adultery although it was well known he left with a woman who took half her husband's bank account with her. However!
> My children are now six years and four and a half years old and lovely children. I do not attempt to meet anyone else because to me there is no point. That would probably end up in a common law relationship. This I do not desire for myself or children. But I can see why so many people are forced into this type of situation. With the problems a woman alone has to face in society, it can happen just from sheer human need.

I believe that this woman also can be helped by the new legislation, and I point out that here is a very fine type of woman indeed. Even if she could do so she does not want to expose herself to the temptations of a common law relationship because she does not want her children to grow up in such an atmosphere.

Fears have been expressed that the new legislation might tempt people to rush into divorce unduly and thus destroy the sanctity of marriage. But here we have a woman who has been waiting patiently for some years and who values the sanctity of marriage to the point that she does not wish to enter into a relationship which would violate her conception of a proper marriage because she does not wish her children to grow up under those circumstances.

I am sure that these two people and many others like them will be feeling gratitude now that the new legislation is on the point of being passed. I think we should express our appreciation to the minister in this regard. These marriages are dead and there is no hope of reviving them.

What must we do for people who find themselves in this situation at the present time? Two things can be done. We can either refuse to widen the grounds for divorce, pretend that a need for it does not exist and persist in festooning dead marriages with funeral flowers. In other words, we would go on perpetuating an immoral situation. Marriages that have failed have been called an unholy deadlock. I call them unholy wedlock. The other alternative is to do what the government is now preparing to do, to update our divorce legislation and in a measure at least clean up the hypocrisy which has surrounded the problem of broken marriages for so long.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

Although I was not a member of the committee on divorce and consequently was not present at their deliberations, nevertheless I have learned that two concepts are embodied in the bill before us. One of them is the concept of matrimonial offences which I call the theory of crime and punishment. It consists of a number of offences, any one or a combination of which would enable people to apply for a divorce with a reasonable hope of getting it. Until now adultery has been the only ground for divorce in Canada, whereas now other grounds have been added, one of which is marriage breakdown. This is a completely new concept. Under this concept, when a marriage is dead and can be proved to be dead for a number of reasons and when the court upon suitable advice and investigation finds that a marriage is dead, a divorce may be granted on the ground of marriage breakdown. The two concepts, marriage breakdown and matrimonial offence are contained in the same piece of legislation.

Like the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) and other hon. members who have spoken, I would have preferred to see us do away with this patchwork quilt of various matrimonial offences and to judge marriage on the sole ground of breakdown based on the various factors which have contributed to the breakdown. I believe a marriage should be judged on the basis of whether or not a human relationship has failed beyond the possibility of reconciliation. I believe that henceforth marriage breakdown should be the sole ground for divorce in Canada. We should avoid having to go through the 30 years of experience which Britain had to go through after having combined the concepts of matrimonial offences and marriage breakdown in one piece of legislation. I believe that Britain's experience has proven to the satisfaction of the British people that it does not work. This is demonstrated by the fact at the present time that country is on the verge of introducing in parliament a new bill whereby divorce may be granted solely on grounds of marriage breakdown. Britain is going to do away with the old-fashioned patchwork quilt of crime and punishment and matrimonial offences and adopt the new and modern idea that when a relationship has failed for a number of reasons couples should be granted their freedom and a divorce after having made all possible efforts at reconciliation.

I would have liked to see such legislation in Canada. However, Canada has a personality all her own and problems peculiar to herself. We are living in a pluralistic society and I am afraid we are not prepared to learn from the British experience or from anyone else's experience. I think that in Canada we will have to learn the hard way because our problems are not other people's problems, our history is not other people's history, and perhaps our stubbornness is of a brand peculiar to us alone.

Until now our social legislation in many fields has set a single hard line which has had to be followed by everyone regardless of whether of not it accorded with their beliefs on their conscience. Now we are discovering that in today's climate of social change it is becoming increasingly hard to enforce this type of legislation because Canadians are becoming sufficiently tolerant to realize that no one section of the population can speak for the rest of the country. I think we are making a good discovery. Last night I heard the minister speak on the Sunday night show on C.B.C. television and I was impressed with his tolerant attitude in this regard. He said that with regard to social legislation such as divorce many groups of people hold different opinions in this country. He said that in Canada, and perhaps he also included other countries, it is the business and the government to legislate for law and order so that people can live together without danger to themselves, their property or their families, and that is what legislation of this type should aim to achieve.

It is not the job of the government to legislate morality. This must be worked out by the people themselves. For too long in this country we have had one or another large group of people saying they will pass a law which must be followed and if someone does not like it, it is too bad for them They have insisted that such is the law and that it is the only way. As I said, it has become increasingly difficult and even impossible to adhere to such laws when they affect social problems. Let us consider the divorce situation and the fact that there are almost half a million common law unions in Canada. Surely this demonstrates that it is utterly impossible to enforce divorce legislation in this country based solely on the ground of adultery. It would be even more difficult to enforce legislation, if we were to try to do it, which would prohibit divorce in the belief that couples should have an indissoluble union until death.

Let us consider birth control. We are discovering that it is utterly impossible to enforce the legislation now on the statute books which makes the dissemination of birth control information a crime, as well as the provision of contraceptive devices. The most modest figures I have seen concerning the number of illegitimate babies would convince anybody that birth control legislation is a necessity. The other day I received a report from my own city of Vancouver indicating a most alarming rise in the rate of illegitimacy in that city. You only need to pick up one of the Ottawa newspapers to find a picture of little Mary or little Tim who is looking for a home. I hope it will not be too long before this province adopts legislation in line with the permissive character of the legislation in Alberta which contains the provision that illegitimate children born of parents whose faith was Catholic can go to a non-Catholic home and that Protestant children can go to a Catholic home. I think that Alberta has been showing us the course to adopt in connection with permissive legislation.

Another problem is abortion. Again, the most conservative figures I have seen for illegal abortions in this country indicate that there are between 25,000 and 75,000 illegal abortions performed every year. This figure was given by Dr. Lowe who was until recently chairman of the Ontario Medical Association committee on therapeutic abortions. This will show people that the existing hard line legislation on abortion can no longer be enforced in this country. If these figures do not indicate that, the poll taken in 1965 which showed that three out of four Canadians want us to liberalize the abortion laws should convince us.

The point I am making is that the solution for social legislation in these fields is surely not to draw harder and tighter lines and double or quadruple the number of law enforcement officers necessary to enforce this type of legislation. I believe that the real solution is permissible legislation in these fields. The committee on national health and welfare last year found that this worked when it was studying birth control. The committee discovered there were people whose consciences would not allow them to have birth control information or contraceptive devices. However, these people recognized there was a great body of people whose consciences would allow them to have this information. We found, for the first time in my experience, that the people who did not want to use this new legislation themselves were nevertheless willing that other Canadians who would make use of such information should have it.

We hope, Mr. Speaker, that within a few days we shall see the minister introduce legislation which will change the law relating to birth control in such a way as to leave it open to the individual conscience as to the use to be made of birth control knowledge or legislation. At the same time no one would be forced to accept this knowledge or these devices if their conscience did not permit them to do so. I believe this would be a good solution for Canada. Incidentally, I would be remiss in my duty if I did not express my appreciation of the stand of the churches in these fields of social legislation. The churches have given leadership in these fields. The churches have recognized that times have changed. They have realized that if they are going to help people they must do so in a very practical way.

In connection with birth control it was most interesting that the Canadian conference of Catholic bishops came before our committee when we were discussing birth control legislation. They said that they themselves were not too interested in changing the law on birth control but they knew the present law was unenforceable and that when a law is unenforceable it is bad legislation because it brings about disrespect for the law. They gave us the green light to go ahead and make the changes for the people who want the changes and whose conscience will permit them to use the information.

It would be my hope that before we have finished the discussions on abortion now taking place we would find that every church would be prepared to go that far. A number of them have already done so. I should like to see the other churches which have not yet committed themselves or have not yet appeared before our committee make it possible for those people who so desire to have the abortion laws liberalized.

I should like to say a word now about divorce. I was pleased when I read the report of the joint committee on divorce to find these words:

> Witnesses before your committee have stressed: "That those whose religious principles are against divorce in any form should no longer be able to impose restrictions on the personal lives of those whose principles differ in this respect".
> This view has been unchallenged and the representatives of the churches appearing before your committee have wholeheartedly endorsed it. "The Christian church no longer has the right to force its views on a pluralistic society", declared the Baptist Federation of Canada, a view endorsed by the Catholic Women's League of Canada.

I want to quote from their brief:

> While we do not believe in divorce ourselves we cannot expect the laws of this country to be used in such a manner as to prevent those who, unlike ourselves, do not believe that marriage is monogamous and indissoluble, from acting in accordance with their own religious convictions... We would also emphasize that while we have beliefs in the matter of marriage, we do not wish to impose those beliefs on the entire Canadian society through the medium of civil law.

On this permissive basis of allowing people to use this legislation when their conscience permits and not forcing it on people whose consciences do not permit, we are prepared to accept this new divorce legislation. I should like, of course, to see it go farther. Unfortunately the minister has put it at the point where he thinks he has a Canadian consensus. As the law goes into practice I would like to see the emphasis shifted more and more from the crime and punishment matrimonial offences basis to the marriage breakdown basis. I am convinced we shall get there before too long in this country. I believe the main points we must safeguard now have to do with the children of the marriage partners. Almost equally important are measures which must be taken, probably within the provinces, to see that the cost of divorce is brought down within the means of those people who would like to use this legislation.

Before I conclude I should like to congratulate the minister on being able to get this legislation before the house at long last. I should not like to leave congratulations without referring to some of the men who helped keep alive for so many years the idea that we needed this legislation. I believe that the co-chairman of the divorce committee, Senator Roebuck, will feel that his long life has indeed been crowned by the achievement of this type of legislation. Reference was made to Senator Aseltine who got a bill through the other place which sought to widen the grounds for divorce but unfortunately died on the order paper of this chamber. I should also like to refer to the hon. members for Skeena (Mr. Howard) and Timiskaming (Mr.

Peters) who, unpopular though their efforts may have been at the time, nevertheless kept alive the need for this legislation to be brought into being so as to get divorce out of parliament and into the place where it belongs, the courts of this country.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the person who perhaps more than anybody else started the agitation for modern divorce laws in this country. I refer to my father, the late J. S. Woodsworth, who in 1928 when there were nearly 300 divorce petitions, 95 per cent of them from Ontario, clogging up the machinery both of this house and the other place, turned himself into a single Horatius at the bridge, if you will, and as every divorce bill came up for discussion talked about it, examined it, asked about the children and made a complete and utter nuisance of himself in the interests of getting those divorce petitions out of the house and into a place where they could receive proper consideration. His final tribute was the passage of his own bill in 1928 to provide for divorce courts in Ontario.

All these and many others, Mr. Speaker, have helped over the years to achieve this legislation, and it needed the efforts of every one of them and many whom I have not mentioned. This bill is a real step forward. I hope we shall go the rest of the way before too many years have gone by and that we shall discover that this divorce legislation is not going to destroy or weaken marriage in this country. Marriage is far too important an institution for that.

I also hope this legislation will do what a number of us believe it will do, aid in building and strengthening personal responsibility on the part of individual men and women. For personal responsibility on the part of ordinary men and women, Mr. Speaker, there is no substitute.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. lady would permit a question?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Surely.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member said in the course of her remarks that it was not appropriate for parliament to legislate, particularly in the criminal law, on matters of moral judgment. I would draw to her attention Part IV of the Criminal Code which involves a series of offences that in turn involve moral judgments—rape, incest, indecent assault. Is she saying that they should not be included in the criminal law?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I thought I was voicing the thinking of the Minister of Justice in this regard when he said that in his opinion it was not the business of the country to legislate morality. However, the minister can speak for himself.

[Translation]

Mr. Antonio Thomas (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the house now has before it a bill to reform the Divorce Act in which many people are concerned. I hardly need to add that the most concerned are precisely those involved in this dilemma, who are waiting for the house to carry out amendments and pass new legislation which will not so much facilitate obtaining a divorce but make clearer and more realistic the grounds for divorce.

Like many members, I have received briefs and opinions. I have picked among the best elements brought to my attention and I shall use the very same words and phrases, so as to avoid changing their value or meaning.

I received in my office people involved in matrimonial problems who feel that only a divorce would enable them to reorganize their lives, but the requirements of the act were in no way in accordance with their means.

Being of the Roman Catholic faith and brought up in the observance of religious principles that were taught us, it would have been difficult for me, even a few years ago, to take position on such an issue, because it was said that only the death of one of the spouses could dissolve the bond of matrimony. Today, it should not be imagined that canon law has been changed or that the oecumenic council has changed the religion, not at all. The council has mitigated the legislation, eased the standards, but has never changed anything else. On this point I take the liberty of quoting an article published in the Medicine Hat News and reprinted in La Presse on April 24 1967, and I quote:

> The Catholic bishops of Canada are to be congratulated on having withdrawn their opposition to the mitigation of civil divorce legislation in the country.
> The brief of the Canadian Catholic Conference on this occasion emphasizes that for the Church, the bonds of matrimony are sacred and that civil authority has no power to dissolve them. They add that Canada is a multidenominational country and that the present civil law is open to abuse.
> This is surely a welcome proof of increased religious tolerance in Canada. And that is the hub of the problem. No one can deny the Catholic Church the right to have its own laws on matrimony. It is only when the Church attempts to block a bill involving both non-members and members of the Catholic Church that a conflict arises—

The bishops' brief removes one of the last obstacles to government intervention. When the sittings of the divorce committee will come to an end, the federal government will no longer have any excuse to abstain from legislating.

I feel bound today, as a legislator, to try to make my humble contribution to this debate and may God guard me from any blunder which might bring on me the anathema of the legislators of my church. Besides, the religious authorities of various provinces will be able to accept and endorse or reject the new civil law. In the meantime, it can be said that the basis of the present Divorce Act is not sound. It considers divorce as a relief granted to the innocent party, because of an offence committed by the guilty party.

Experience teaches us that only adultery which, in most provinces, is considered as an offence against the nature of marriage, constitutes grounds for divorce, and yet, adultery is only one form of offence, among others, which can cause the failure of marriage. There are many other forms of offences and their seriousness can vary considerably. Marriages have been broken up through offences other than adultery, and the present legislation tends to increase the bitterness and antagonism, because in divorce proceedings, how often is there agreement between the parties concerned. An adultery is invented and staged in connivance with the parties involved and the witnesses are paid to give evidence before the courts of what they saw and heard. To begin with, we must ensure a stricter enforcement of this condition which seems to the advantage of better-off, and give those of slender means opportunity to submit their grievances to the same courts.

I support the concept under which divorce is the legal and true recognition of the breakdown of marriage. Valid methods will then have to be developed to ascertain the failure, and a proper period of separation provided to show that the situation is lasting.

It might be necessary to consider other matrimonial offences—because they are at a negative level—such as sexual intercourse including manifestations of sadism, acts of cruelty on the person of the spouse or the children, or de facto desertion. As far as desertion is concerned, it will be necessary to consider the whole of Canada as the domicile and not the evidence of domicile from one province to the other. Besides the bill stipulates as much.

Mr. Speaker, even if I recognize that various matrimonial offences are committed, I find it difficult to admit that their simple existence constitutes grounds for the dissolution of a marriage, as the system of proceedings permits it. First of all, each major category of offences considered includes various situations which are greatly different. There is a fundamental difference between adultery committed on an impulse, as an isolated act, and a series of continuous adventures, or yet a liaison used to hurt and aggravate the spouse.

Similarly, there is a tremendous difference between blows given under provocation and maintaining a permanent attitude of anger and hostility, an attitude that can lead periodically to blows or that tortures the other spouse or the children and which manifests itself through verbal maliciousness as cruel as blows.

Experience has taught us this: when spouses discuss the causes leading their marriage to a dead-end, doubtless they throw violent accusations at each other but almost invariably they come to recognize, in some way or other, their respective share of the blame for reaching that situation. When they discuss divorce, it seems that the requirements of the law make them feel ill at ease, which leads them into presenting a cooked up version of the facts.

I think too that mental illness should be considered in the same way as physical illness and, to my mind, it is contrary to common sense and conscience to consider an illness as an offence or as grounds for divorce in itself. The presence of the spouse or children as well as the nature of the relationship between them may be one of the factors largely contributing to the recovery of the sick person. On the other hand, strained matrimonial relations may have contributed to the development of the illness.

The same applies in the case of a criminal. When a spouse must serve a sentence, even a long one, this does not involve a matrimonial offence but it involves going from a legislation and a procedure based on the matrimonial offence concept to a legislation and procedure based on the concept of matrimonial breakdown.

The hub of the problem consists in developing adequate means to prove such marriage breakdown. Proper application of the legislation will depend mainly on the adequacy of the tests to establish the fact.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I am asking divine providence to enlighten our leaders so as to pass just and equitable legislation for all, because all must be equal before the law.

[English]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, since the house is anxious to proceed to the committee stage of the bill I shall not prolong the discussion. I merely want to say that in this measure we see an interesting example of the country having been well ahead of parliament for some years in the matter of divorce reform. As usual, parliament has reacted rather than anticipated. I think that we as a government and parliament are now meeting our responsibilities in a most serious area of social need in which the need for reform has been evident for many decades.

The committee has done its work and it is, to use a legal expression, functus. That is a pity. It is also a pity that its timetable did not permit it to hear professional and other criticisms of the actual bill. Perhaps this is an area of procedure that might be discussed at some future time when we are discussing the reform of parliament itself.

In the case of a fundamental change such as the one that is the subject matter of this bill, once the committee has completed its study and the officials have drafted the bill and the minister has presented it, it would be better if the committee had an opportunity to get professional and other views on the matter. I do not blame the minister for what has happened. Clearly, a change in the parliamentary set-up is needed. Perhaps in a few months the minister will have the opportunity to lead a government that will bring about such an interesting innovation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fairweather: Speaking for myself, I can think of no more distinguished person on the government side to lead such a government.

An hon. Member: Why not support him?

Mr. Fairweather: No. I will stick by my own man.

An hon. Member: Join us.

Mr. Fairweather: No, I have no interest in joining. I shall give you the files to show you what can be done.

• (4:40 p.m.)

I happen to be one of those who are convinced that there is a good deal to be said for the marriage breakdown concept. Some call it the marriage breakdown theory, but it is not a theory. In my opinion this parliament or other parliaments will some day accept that concept. I have sympathy for the minister inasmuch as he has not had the benefit of experience in this area that others in other jurisdictions have had and therefore has not seen fit to make the drastic change of incorporating the marriage breakdown concept in the bill as the sole ground for divorce. But I do want to say at this point that just because one or two members of the party of which I am glad to be a member happen to be interested in the marriage breakdown concept does not in any way say we do not view this major reform in our social legislation with a very great deal of enthusiasm and are not anxious to join in supporting the bill as its various stages are passed by parliament. I think that is pretty clear to those who sit over here. Just because we have individual views on the method of reform does not in any way detract from our very great approval for Bill C-187.

As a one-time practising lawyer I wish to say I feel that most of my brethren will find the role of conciliator, as envisioned in clause 7, really not a very good answer to the many requests of church groups and others interested in divorce reform for a meaningful attempt at marriage counselling and marriage conciliation. One hon. member has spoken about the system in Australia. I hoped something like that would be made part of this bill, but I share the view of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) that many lawyers, not because of any wish to circumvent the law but because of the pressure of business and the fact that they are not trained as marriage counsellors, will make the provisions of clause 7 a rather routine proceeding. This, I think, would be a pity.

However, speaking for myself I wish to say I found that when husbands and wives, or one or other of them, approached me seeking my services the marriage had long since passed the point that efforts to reconcile the differences would have been of any assistance. Although I recognize that in most instances this would be a provincial responsibility I has hoped that through a joint federal-provincial effort a more meaningful type of marriage counselling service could have been provided.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and other hon. members to forgive me if I make one point having to do with the jurisdiction in my own province. I asked the minister a question about this point at an earlier stage during the course of his speech. Clause 2 (e) gives a definition of court, and in New Brunswick it is given as "the trial division or branch of the supreme court of the province." In my own province a single judge sits as a judge of divorce and matrimonial causes in only one city, the capital of New Brunswick, and I have heard rumblings to the effect that despite the definition provided in this bill the responsible officials in that province will attempt to circumvent what I am sure is the clear intention of parliament by maintaining the present system.

Speaking for many people in the legal profession in New Brunswick and also speaking as a representative of the people in at least one of its constituencies, I must say I would hope very sincerely that upon the enactment of this legislation all judges of the Queen's Bench division of the province of New Brunswick, as they make their circuits, will be hearing divorce matters. It would be a very great pity if this were not the case.

I think that over the next two or three years we have to be prepared for a large increase of petitions for divorce because this legislation will seek to remedy the very serious problems that have been enunciated not only by hon. members in this debate but also by very many people and institutions who presented briefs to the parliamentary committee on divorce. But I do not think we should be alarmed. I am sure those of us who have made some study of the subject will not be alarmed by a large increase. I hope others will not be put off should this happen. I hope we will all recognize that in many instances an opportunity for relief is being given to very many people who are suffering severe hardships and handicaps as to their own status and the status of their children simply because for 100 years the law of divorce in Canada has been so pernicious. I share the views of those who anxiously look forward to the clarification of the status of so many children through the instrument of a reformed divorce law.

I know that a vast majority of members of parliament will support the bill. I know they will do so conscious of the sanctity of marriage, conscious of the need to strengthen the family as the basic unit of our society, but conscious too that there has been a very evident need for reform and that we but do our duty by responding to the initiative, taken by the divorce committee and the minister, to try to bring some relief where it has been so obviously needed for so long.

[Mr. Fairweather.]

Mr. Yves Forest (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, the new divorce legislation has been well accepted everywhere, and rightly so, because it brings fundamental changes that have been awaited and desired for a long time by a large part of public opinion. It replaces provisions that have become old fashioned and obsolete, particularly in our present social climate.

I had the pleasure and the benefit of sitting on the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to consider the whole question of divorce and of sitting on its steering committee. Whe have received a lot of very interesting briefs, particularly from various religious denominations. Under the chairmanship of Senator Roebuck, well versed in the question and gifted with a rare energy and lucidity of mind for a man of his years, and assisted by one of our most distinguished colleagues, the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cameron), this committee sat most actively and, on June 20 last, presented a report which has certainly helped and guided the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau), as he himself indicated.

As a member of a religious denomination advocating indissolubility of marriage, I was greatly interested and impressed by the logical and realistic attitude taken by the Canadian Catholic Episcopate in its brief presented before the committee. A distinction is made especially between the moral or religious order and the civil or political order. While upholding the permanence of the conjugal bond, they recognize that civil authorities, under certain conditions, have the right to make the present legislation, more flexible as requested by a great number of citizens, for the common good of the civil society.

That new attitude of the church was surely inspired by the principles of religious freedom adopted at the second Vatican council, in December 1965, when the resolution proclaiming that man is entitled to religious freedom was passed.

Since, at the religious level, our country is a clearly pluralistic community, a pluralistic society, that freedom must be guarded more closely than ever and to confuse civil and religious legislation could easily be a source of misunderstanding and uneasiness.

Besides, as pointed out by the Minister of Justice, this is an act which will allow the dissolution of the civil tie of marriage but, of course, it does force anyone to remarry if that goes against moral or religious convictions.

If, as has been suggested, civil authorities are fully entitled to legislate in divorce matters, it must be kept in mind, however, that the family is the fundamental unit of society and that it is essential to do everything possible to preserve and maintain it. Divorce should only be a measure of last resort, taken after every possible means has been used to avoid a final breakdown.

Several other religious groups have expressed the same views, as concerns education and preparation for marriage, and promoting appropriate organizations designed to reconcile spouses experiencing difficulties. Those proposals are sound and worthwhile, of course, but are not easy to implement, because of the conflict of jurisdiction in such matters, and they concern rather the civil rights of the parties involved; this is rather a provincial matter and it might be advisable for the governments to deal with this important aspect of family relations when they meet for consultations or conferences on the constitution and its amendments.

However, the bill under study has provided, in many instances, for procedures of conciliation and it grants extended powers to the courts with a view to encouraging reconciliation between the spouses who will be granted a divorce only when it is certain that a reconciliation is impossible.

I have reservations about the efficiency of some of those means, but time and practice only will allow us to judge, and the law can then be improved accordingly. The report of the joint committee and the present legislation both recognized the wish of the state to maintain marriage as the basic institution of society and as its source of stability, but for those who believe in the dissolution of a union that has become unbearable or unendurable, the grounds for divorce have been duly extended in order to eliminate mainly the well-known effects of the present situation and also offer an opportunity to legalize the situation for thousands of Canadians living now under common law marriage.

I believe also that the government was right in following the recommendations of the joint committee and in rejecting the principle of marriage breakdown as grounds for divorce, as recommended by some reports submitted to the committee and by a few committee members. This theory may seem attractive at first sight, but I think that our courts would have too much freedom, too much leeway, and we would incur the risk of having excessive or inadequate interpretations depending, of course, on the area of the country concerned, and that would surely lead to confusion, uncertainty and inconsistent court findings.

It was more prudent and more realistic, for the time being at least, to provide the courts with some guidelines, some specific orientation for granting divorce when evidence of matrimonial offences or marriage breakdown is produced, pursuant to the provisions of the legislation. As it is, our courts are not yet organized, and they lack the expert or investigative services required for the application of such a formula.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not dwell upon the grounds for divorce listed in clauses 3 and 4 of the bill. They reproduce in the main the worthwhile and logical recommendations made by the joint committee. Practice and experience will show us whether these provisions should be revised later, always, of course, subject to the rigorous and explicit condition stipulated in the law, which is that divorce will only be granted if the court decides that there is no hope of reconciliation.

Mr. Speaker, I have more serious reservations or doubts concerning corollary relief measures, in the present circumstances, particularly with regard to the division of property, alimony and the custody and care of children. With a few other members of the committee, we tried in vain to introduce amendments to alter the recommendations of the committee in this connection. However, I note with pleasure that, in the present legislation, no reference has been made to the separate maintenance of spouses and since it is a matter concerning property, it will continue to come under the provincial laws.

For the moment, and as long as the provincial authorities do not decide to establish courts to deal with family problems, as I suggested, I wonder whether, in the case of the province of Quebec especially, it would not have been advisable, to avoid any confusion and any conflict of jurisdiction, to restrict ourselves to the problem of divorce as such and follow the practice existing for years and under which parliament has never looked after matters of alimony and custody of children which have been settled by the competent courts, most of the time by the superior court in the district where the spouses are living following an action for separation in accordance with the Civil Code. This will certainly create some ambiguous and unfortunate situations, for example, if a decision has already been made in connection with the alimony or the custody of children before the superior court and if, thereafter, an action for divorce has been lodged before the exchequer court and a party has obtained contradictory orders. Even if the orders delivered in accordance with clauses 10 and 11 of the legislation can be registered before the superior court and carried out as orders of that court, in my opinion, some practical difficulties and perhaps some detrimental delays could occur, if changes are required under the orders as a result, for example, of a change in the state or condition of the parties.

I think that this whole problem should be considered and I presume that the Minister of Justice will consult with the provincial authorities, especially on matters of procedure or rules on practices to follow.

At this time, I will merely raise another important point in the bill, that is the change in jurisdiction. Until now, citizens of Quebec and Newfoundland who wanted a divorce had to present their petition to parliament and, since 1963, to the Senate especially where, after hearing the petitions, a commissioner made reports to the Senate.

Now, these petitions will be presented to a division of the exchequer court, until the province of Quebec decides to present them to the superior court, as provided by clause 22 of the bill, where other suggestions are also made.

It is a happy amendment which should above all reduce considerably the cost of getting a divorce. That will abolish the discrimination which existed against people without much money.

That division of the exchequer court will sit at any time and anywhere in Canada. That should facilitate hearings, but since this will be, I suppose, travelling court and will be without the necessary services or machinery to discharge duties or execute its orders, I hope that this will be a temporary provision and that, following consultations with the province of Quebec or within the framework of the amendments to the constitution, if it is not possible to transfer the whole field of marriage and divorce to the provinces to maintain a perfect uniformity in the country or for other reasons, at least our provincial authorities will very shortly create real courts which will have jurisdiction over all problems concerning the family, including divorce.

These courts would be presided by judges who would have taken specialized courses in domestic relations and who would be assisted by experts such as psychiatrists, social workers, doctors, etc. Thus they could consider family problems as a whole, whereas at present these problems may have to be handled by several courts or jurisdictions, either civil or criminal, depending on whether separation, custody of children, refusal to provide alimony, etc. are involved.

This, Mr. Speaker, would be in the best interests of the family. Moreover, it would take place in an atmosphere conducive to the best possible settlement of family problems both legally and socially.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that there will be in the future, some agreement between the provincial authorities and the federal government in respect of jurisdiction, in order to prevent this mix-up and this confusion which make it impossible to take any concerted and planned action in this important field of human relations. Since divorce and its related problems will always be with us and be of concern to a greater number of our citizens, why not recognize this undeniable fact and, at last, make available to those who are entitled to this privilege and who wish to use it, the most complete and the best organized means to achieve this end, which, after all, Mr. Speaker, would only strengthen the very institution of marriage?

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the house and the country were presented with a variety of views on divorce at the committee hearings and I had hoped that as a result of the recommendations of that committee and the deliberations put forward the government would have had the sense to present what I would consider a better bill. As a lawyer I am appalled by some of the provisions of this bill and I will make some reference to them. I have my own views with regard to the sanctity of marriage, the preservation of family life and the purpose of this legislation, and naturally they may not coincide with the ideas of every member in the house.

I was very gravely disappointed that the government saw fit to apply the pressures of government sanction without allowing a free vote on a matter of this kind. To me the question of divorce is as important as abortion, and is as important or more important than capital punishment. Yet members are being blackjacked in this regard by party positions having to be taken. I can only say I regret that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) did not, having said that members would be free to express themselves and to vote as they wished, avail himself of the opportunity to allow them to do so. This whole matter has now been made subject to limited party positions. We know very well that the whip will be used. This is a very queer way for the minister to suggest that moral views should not apply. I wonder what sort of moral eunuchs he thinks we are, that we can be bland and take other than an objective position in respect of a matter so fundamental as marriage and the dissolution of marriage.

I recognize that everyone has a right to his own opinion, and from the beginning I have felt there are many areas in which our marriage and divorce laws should be changed. I am not suggesting I am a devotee of what I think has unfortunately taken hold of some of our colleagues in this house in respect of galloping, permissive morality. Their attitude is that as long as people want to do something let them go ahead, as long as they feel they should not be married let them put their marriages asunder. I have in mind particularly some of the extensive remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) I simply cannot agree with the type of morality that allows people to go ahead and get a divorce whenever they want. I think we must have a certain sense of responsibility and that there are norms to which society must conform. I would not like it to be said that we are instituting in this country a form of marriage and divorce legislation which would ultimately lead to consecutive polygamy, in other words, to something akin to the coupling of rabbits or the mating of mink.

I have seen a number of judges performing, if I may use that term advisedly, and I know their view is such that they will not decide whether a man and woman shall remain together. I know the view they will take in respect of this measure; this measure can become merely a convenient vehicle for consecutive polygamy or divorce by consent. If we go all the way with the concept of the breakdown of marriage being the main or sole ground for divorce—and this bill makes a mockery of reconciliation proceedings—then the decision will be taken by the parties themselves, because that will be the evidence put before the court. This evidence will reflect the attitude and the views of the parties, not the results of extensive investigation by the courts. There is no machinery whatsoever to provide for such investigation.

In case anyone should suggest that clause 7 imposes any degree of reconciliation machinery, let me say that this is patently wrong. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) referred to what he called the farce of the "three C's" and said that the answers to the questions involved were stereotyped. I can readily visualize the affidavits of counsel pursuant to clause 7. They will indicate that the lawyer has brought to the attention of the parties those provisions regarding conciliation and that the clients have been informed of marriage counselling and guidance facilities known to the lawyer.

Let me tell the minister that as a junior counsel I did a good deal of this type of work. In addition I was a member of the board of the Edmonton family service bureau and in every case with which I was associated I asked my clients whether they had gone to that family service bureau. I said, "I will make the appointment for you." In most cases they did consult social workers or family service workers. For some that was the end of it. But many more came back because, they said, the other party would not go. All I would have to do to comply with this clause would be to put in an affidavit that I had informed the client that there was available this or that bureau and had discussed with him the possibility of a reconciliation with his spouse. All I would have to do would be to ask the client, "Would you consider reconciliation with your spouse?" That is all I would have to do; that would constitute a discussion.

Clause 8 deals with the court's inquiry. I have pointed out to the minister that in my humble estimation this procedure will be totally inadequate for true, meaningful reconciliation. Knowing the attitude of certain men on the bench who say it is not their purpose to keep a man and woman together, I say that this provision will become perfunctory and therefore meaningless in our law.

I am not saying there are no conscientious men on the bench but I know there are many who are not that conscientious with regard to these matters. Divorce has never been a palatable subject for most judges. As a matter of fact, I know a good many eminent counsel who would have been excellent judges but who told me that under no circumstances would they consider accepting an appointment to the bench because they would have to sit on divorce cases. They had no moral scruples with regard to divorce but took this position because of a personal distaste. The same thing applies with regard to lawyers who have said they would never accept an appointment to the bench, if one was offered to them, because they would have to sit on capital cases and did not want to sit in judgment on a man's life. This was their personal approach.

I want to come back to the gounds for divorce that are opened up in this bill. I point out immediately to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that the grounds for divorce as they exist today in this country are not limited to adultery. As a matter of fact, the grounds that appear in paragraphs (a) and (b) of clause 3 are applicable in most provinces where divorce is allowed. I have had experience of this in the province of Alberta. This bill has introduced the strange anomaly of a marriage offence, not as an additional ground but merely as a ground for divorce that a person has gone through a form of marriage with another, without anything further. There does not have to be any sexual relationship.

Subclauses (a) and (b) of clause 3 talk about sexual offences or sexual aberrations, and then we have the mere going through of a form of marriage without anything further, whether or not it was culpable as would be the case in order to found a charge of bigamy under the Criminal Code. We know people have been innocently involved in a second form of marriage because they thought they had the right to marry and there was not sufficient evidence to establish a charge of bigamy. In such cases there may have been nothing more than a form of marriage and yet a provision is introduced in the bill establishing this as a marital offence; one might say one of the mortal sins of married life. I say this because clause 3 really consists of, shall we say, the major offences, and in clause 4 are the additional grounds, somewhat less than those contained in clause 3 but still sufficient to establish grounds for divorce.

Then we come to the question of physical and mental cruelty. With this provision I agree, with the reservation that I trust we shall not have that burned toast concept of mental cruelty which seems sufficient for some courts to grant a divorce, or that rather odd, eccentric conduct that shall be deemed to be mental cruelty à la Hollywood or of the type on which some jurisdictions are prepared to grant divorces. I am surprised the government did not follow the example of the British act and include incurable insanity as a ground for divorce. Perhaps it can be argued that clause 9 (3) establishes insanity because it deals with separation and its continuance. This is a sort of back door approach, if I am right in what is intended to be included in the bill.

Two psychiatrists spoke to me last week and said they hoped they would be able to write to me and make representations that incurable insanity be deemed to be a ground for divorce. According to their reading of the bill this was not provided in it. The minister may be able to point out to me where I have missed it in the bill, but with the greatest respect I have not been able to find it. We then come to the additional grounds contained in clause 9 (3).

Mr. Trudeau: Insanity for how long?

Mr. Lambert: I said incurable insanity. The word "incurable" has only one meaning. If it is intended that there shall be hope of rehabilitation, I am greatly surprised at the interpretation of "hope " contained in clause 4 (1) (b) where the following words are used:

> —and there is no reasonable expectation of the respondent's rehabilitation within a reasonably foreseeable period;

We must remember that in these circumstances a divorce will probably be granted In other words, the expectation of the respondent's rehabilitation is hopeless within a reasonably foreseeable period. But when we were dealing with the death penalty and the abolition thereof the Prime Minister said there is no man who can be deemed to be hopeless for rehabilitation. These words have been used with regard to the death penalty but with respect to divorce, if a man is an alcoholic or a drug addict it does not take much to declare him hopeless, I am wondering why we must apply different standards to "hope".

Also, I find it rather incongruous to see introduced in a bill on divorce a ground for nullity which until now has presented no difficulties whatsoever. If a marriage has not been consummated it is not a marriage but merely a form of it. The jurisprudence has been in existence for generations that non-consummation is a ground for nullity. Then why introduce it into a divorce bill?

There is another aspect of the bill which I must confess I find strange and on which I would have liked to hear the opinion of the Canadian Bar Association and of some other legal authorities. I refer to domicile. Nowhere in the bill is domicile defined except by inference under clause 6 in which we are asked to accept the definition of domicile of any jurisdiction in the world, including Las Vegas, Reno and Tijuana, Mexico. Under clause 6 we are to recognize foreign decrees based on domicile as locally defined and Canadians have the right to remarry as long as the law of the jurisdiction in which the decree for divorce was granted states that the parties were domiciled there.

For example, under the law in Nevada a divorce may be granted after six week's residence there, which is equivalent to domicile. In Tijuana, Mexico, I believe it is possible to file papers for a divorce on the basis of attorning to that jurisdiction. Is that what we are prepared to accept in Canada? This provision will introduce all sorts of complications. I may be wrong and I am subject to persuasion otherwise but I would say that this bill introduces more problems than it tends to cure from a legal point of view, although not necessarily a social point of view. When it comes to the application of the law it is difficult to distinguish between legal and social effects. It will be remembered that if the bill goes through unmodified, all Canadians will be subject to what I consider to be a legal horror because of the difficulties it will introduce.

There is one provision in the bill on which I wish to commend the minister, namely, the provision for the extension of jurisdiction for divorce to courts in provinces which at the present time do not have that jurisdiction. I think this is a logical and reasonable extension. However, that is the best I can say for the bill.

On the whole I would have liked to see a much better bill brought forward, with less rush imposed on us. It is true that there were many committee hearings at which numerous witnesses and various organizations were allowed to bring forward their recommendations with regard to marriage and divorce. I would have liked more people to speak about making it more difficult to get married and about preparation for marriage. Under this legislation it will be as easy to discard a spouse as to take one, which we know is relatively easy. One could do it as easily as buying a suit and discarding it after a period of wear. I do not think, with all due respect, that this is what we should be legislating for.

I grant you, sir, that there are many situations in which appropriate amendments to our law could have been made, but I say to the government that it should have taken the precaution of putting forward its proposals for examination by judicial bodies and others who could have commented on them. This legislation will have a long lasting effect. To have a proposal imposed upon the house and to ask the house to act on it under the pressure of a pending Christmas adjournment is totally wrong. I am not at all concerned about the government's desire for speed in passing this legislation. This is a very important piece of legislation because it affects all the people in this country much more than does, for example, the Broadcasting Act or the taxation bills, and yet we are asked to rush it along. I find this to be a rather strange attitude on the part of the government.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Is the house ready for the question?

If the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) speaks now, I must inform the hon. members that he will close the debate.

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my first word is to thank the hon. members from all parties for their constructive attitude in this discussion.

From all sides valuable comments have been made on this legislation and I have felt a sincere desire by all to improve it and to achieve a truly modern and useful divorce act for our country.

At this stage I could not reply in detail to all the questions that have been brought up. I believe I shall have the opportunity to do so during consideration in committee, but I should now like to touch upon three general questions which are also the questions that cropped up most often during the comments by the various members.

The first question bears on the issues of the breakdown of marriage and reconciliation procedure. The second bears on jurisdiction of the courts, for instance, the suggestion that was brought forward several times to give jurisdiction to county courts. The third question deals with conflicting legislation, for instance, between this legislation and the Civil Code of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say generally that all those questions can be answered by a single comment, namely that such matters give rise to very difficult problems with regard to federal-provincial relations.

Those are questions that cannot be answered without taking into account the conflicts of jurisdiction and that cannot be solved if the complexity of the federal system is overlooked. It is really a field where co-operative federalism is called for, and it is in that spirit that I, for one, have sought to improve the present Divorce Act.

I think that most proposals made for the commendable purpose of improving this bill implied some degree of provincial action, because almost all the solutions suggested concerned, either directly or indirectly, fields coming under provincial jurisdiction.

The government was faced with this dilemma: Should it wait several years before amending the Divorce Act, years which would be spent usefully negotiating with the provinces toward the setting up of a new system of courts, perhaps family courts as was suggested, which would have wide powers to act in the field of reconciliation? Should it still wait a long time to solve the very real problems of conflicting rights which this bill poses, and then perhaps, one, two or three years later introduce a bill, after rather complex negotiations, because they are related to constitutional matters, and members know that the constitution is not now an easy matter? Should the government wait for one year or perhaps several years to produce a bill closer to perfection, or should it act as soon as possible and attempt to introduce the best possible bill under our jurisdiction and let negotiations continue, as I have repeatedly indicated, at federal-provincial meetings, and undertake direct negotiations later which would eventually lead to improving the law?

We, on this side of the house, have decided in favour of a procedure which the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) considers perhaps a little too precipitous, a little too hurried, and which is certainly liberal rather than conservative with regard to the time factor.

In our opinion, the legislation we have prepared is quite within the jurisdiction of the federal government; we have gone as far as possible, and I suggest to the hon. members that they examine the bill and criticize it in that light.

• (5:30 p.m.)

[English]

The point I said I should like to deal with in a little bit of detail before going into greater detail when we reach the committee stage is the point of marriage breakdown. This concept or theory is a very progressive one and one to which I have not so much of a philosophical or moral objection but one in which I see real difficulties of a legal or constitutional order. Let me deal first with a matter of substance. I should say first, Mr. Speaker, that we have dealt with the marriage breakdown concept in a certain form. The bill itself speaks of breakdown and this is more than lip service. We are introducing the breakdown concept as one which is supplementary or additional to the concept of offences. This is a completely new approach in our law, of course.

As I say, it is not mere lip service and what we are attempting to do is to spell out the conditions under which the courts may or shall find there has been breakdown. When I listened to those members who objected to our approach discussing this problem it seemed to me that they always came back, in one way or another, to the type of legislation we have here. They would say that they favoured the breakdown approach, nothing more and nothing less. However, when called upon to spell it out in a little bit of detail they always indicated legislation giving the factors of the breakdown, giving some guidance to the court. For instance, I should like to refer to page 5484 of Hansard where I find the report of the eloquent speech made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). He referred to a private bill introduced in the United Kingdom, not by the government, which has not yet reached any stage of implementation. He made a fairly good summary of the provisions of the bill and then said:

> There will henceforth be only one ground for divorce in Britain—proof that "the marriage has irretrievably broken down". This will be deemed to have happened:
> (a) If the parties have ceased to cohabit for two years—

We have this in our law but we have set it at three years. It may be too much and perhaps the period should be shorter. This is a matter for discussion. We are now talking about the theoretical concept of breakdown and giving guidance to the courts. The bill the hon. member mentioned is a proposal which has not even reached the stage of legislation and is no improvement on ours. Once again, it is a question of time. We have three periods in our bill. We have the one year concept for non-consummation, we have two years for certain circumstances of imprisonment and we have three years for normal separation. We even have five years when there is desertion by the petitioner. These periods can be discussed and changed, but certainly the concept has been established in our bill.

The next ground is:

(b) If the couple have ceased to cohabit for five years, even though one does not want divorce—

This is exactly our five year test in the case of desertion. Then, ground (c) reads:

(c) If there is conduct which a husband or wife cannot be reasonably expected to endure, or adultery which either cannot after reflection forgive.

What is the great difference between this proposal in this revolutionary bill and ours? What is conduct which one party cannot endure or adultery which either cannot after reflection forgive? We have the adultery test. We have forgiveness in the sense there is a possibility of condonation. In so far as conduct which could not reasonably be expected to be endured is concerned, I cannot say what is meant. Surely our provision covering cruelty would, in most cases, cover this. I say that even those who propound their abstract theories, when they are called upon to spell out what they mean, in most cases adopt this type of answer.

Another illustration will be found at page 5500 of Hansard where a question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) is recorded. The hon. member for Broadview was indicating a certain preference at that point for the concept of divorce which is included in our bill. The question reads as follows:

Does he not see you could still have breakdown which would require separation for three years, if that was the sole reason for the action; but if there was the so-called outrageous conduct you could then say the marriage had broken down in a period less than three years.

Well, this is our test. If there were no reconciliation and if there were such outrageous conduct, then you could say the marriage had broken down in a period of less than three years. Here again the phrase "outrageous conduct" is wide. What does it mean? This is a test the courts will have to meet one way or another. I am not convinced that even those who want to talk about the substance of this procedure are talking about anything very different, if I am to judge from these examples, from what we are doing.

Procedure is something else again. The breakdown of marriage concept which has been espoused from many quarters presupposes a complete change in our conception of courts and justice. I should like to read a few brief quotations in this connection, and I refer first to the excellent report of the special joint committee on divorce, page 116. I am not going to read as much as I would like, but this matter is dealt with very clearly in this passage:

The novelty of the marriage breakdown theory does not lie simply in the grounds it proposes for dissolutions of marriage, but also in the procedure that would be required to effect the system. Indeed, it is not the essential validity of the theory that seems to merit the most careful inspection at this stage, but the practical consequences that would flow from it, were it to be adopted.

The existing system for the trial of divorce cases based upon the adversary method, the traditional practice of our courts, whereby the judge is the arbiter between two contending parties, would have to be changed. The procedure would have to be that of an inquest or inquiry into the state of the marriage, if the marriage breakdown system were to work. The parties would not provide all the evidence and the court might have to seek out and introduce evidence of its own.

According to this quotation, Mr. Speaker, I think you would need to have a different concept of what is a court. Also required would be experts trained in social services and family matters to give evidence. This would involve questions such as the children of the marriage, how they would be cared for, what was the pre-existing situation, problems of delinquency and so on.

This gets back to the difficulty I referred to at the outset of my remarks, that we are embarking on certain areas that are under provincial jurisdiction. I suggest we would have to negotiate for some time with the provinces before being successful in setting up this type of court. As I have said, we took the attitude that we should act now and do the most we can under our present jurisdiction. We will improve the law as time goes on but we cannot refuse the obvious remedy of divorce in those cases that will be embraced under the terms of the bill as presently framed.

I should also like to cite a short extract from a report presented to the British parliament by the lord chancellor in November 1966, command paper 3123. I refer to the conclusions of the report, which are to be found at page 54 and sum up a very long argument set forth in the command paper:

The proposals of the Archbishop's Group on Divorce made in "Putting Asunder"—

This was the proposal of marriage breakdown.

—though they are to be welcomed for their rejection of exclusive reliance on matrimonial offence, are procedurally impracticable. They propose that there should be but one comprehensive ground for divorce—breakdown of the marriage—the court being required to satisfy itself by means of a thorough inquest into the marriage that it has failed irretrievably. It would not be feasible, even if it were desirable, to undertake such an inquest in every divorce case because of the time this would take and the costs involved.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, this is a mere summary of the argument. I cannot deal with it in detail though it has been excellently presented in the report. However, a few lines that appear on page 32 spell out the argument that is here summed up:

If the inquest was to become a genuine one—

I should like the hon. members who are so keen on the marriage breakdown concept to realize this point.

—preliminary enquiries by trained personnel would have to be undertaken and the actual hearing would have to take much longer than at present. Moreover, it seems to us that public opinion would be unlikely to regard it as an improvement if in every case the whole matrimonial history were ventilated in public. In effect, this would be to introduce into every divorce case the distressing features of defended divorces which at present constitute only about 7 per cent of the total. The Archbishop's Group appear to face this prospect with an equanimity that we cannot share. If our divorce laws are to be made more humane, it seems to us that the undefended divorce affords a better model than the dilatory, expensive and distressing defended divorce.

Mr. Brewin: May I put a question to the minister at this point?

Mr. Trudeau: Of course.

Mr. Brewin: In his discussions of this matter has the minister considered the fact that the objection raised by the law commission in Great Britain to the necessity for an inquest in all cases on the law of breakdown would be met by a provision that after a period of separation, say three years or whatever it may be, there would then be a prima facie presumption of breakdown? If the law were to provide for this, the necessity for an inquest or inquiry would be confined to those cases where there was some other ground that properly deserved investigation. Has the minister considered that point? If he reads the report of the law commission carefully he may find the suggestion that I am making to him.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the type of point that I made a moment ago. By putting this three year test into the breakdown concept you are destroying the purity of the breakdown concept. We are making provision in the bill for evidence to be given to the courts which is indicative of breakdown. We are also avoiding the necessity for an inquest by giving the courts in some cases three years before finally settling the matter. Under clause 4 (1) (e) we are providing for a three-year test.

Under the proposition advanced by the hon. member the purity of the breakdown concept is destroyed, and, as I shall show in a moment by reference to the Archbishop's report, this is not desirable. The hon. member is suggesting a shortcut which is contrary to the spirit of those who support the breakdown concept. However, if he will be patient for a moment I should like to read an excerpt from "Putting Asunder" which expresses this argument exactly.

I also wanted to refer to a quotation from the London Times of May 8, 1967 where there is a fairly enlightening quotation from Lord Gardiner, but in view of the time factor I shall not read it. It is very much to the same effect, namely that the difficulty of marriage breakdown is procedural in nature. It is not the concept itself. It is the impossibility of writing it into our system of law as it presently exists. I should like to pass on to a few short quotations from the report entitled "Putting Asunder" prepared by a group appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury in January, 1964. Those who are familiar with this report will realize that the marriage breakdown concept meets with the same difficulty in the United Kingdom as I am outlining now. This report contains a number of recommendations respecting the divorce courts, recommendations which are regarded as so necessary, and here I quote from page 76, "that we could not continue to support the principle of breakdown if they were not implemented in substance."

What are those recommendations, Mr. Speaker, which would have to be implemented and which, if not implemented, would prevent the breakdown concept from being accepted? Quoting once again from page 76 of the report one finds the following:

(c) that the accusatorial procedure should be replaced by procedure appropriate to inquiry into the condition of marriage relationships;

(d) that means should be devised to ensure that all relevant information and conditions would be brought to the court's notice;

(e) that steps should be taken without delay to enlist the officers the court would need.

The report then goes on to point out that an uncontested case could, on occasion, call for greater care and judicial skill than a case which was contested.

There is another part of this report to which I wish to refer, Mr. Speaker. I refer to appendix C, the second part of which consists of an essay written by Mr. Quentin Edwards, a barrister at law and one of the members of the group that was appointed by the Archbishop. The conclusions of Mr. Quentin Edwards which are expressed at the bottom of page 135 and on the following pages are that the whole constitution and procedure of the high court under existing statutes and rules create reasonable doubt whether the high court could, if the substantive law were changed as recommended, satisfy the requirements prescribed as necessary to administer the new law. His conclusions, as set out on page 136 of the report, are that serious consideration might well be given to establishing an entirely new system of courts.

There can, I think, be little doubt that the wholesale adoption of the marriage breakdown concept as advocated in the report "Putting Asunder" would necessarily require the creation of new matrimonial courts that would administer the new laws after a form and procedure quite different from our existing judicial institutions across this country. It would be necessary, for example, to have welfare officers, social workers and other officials attached to such courts to administer effectively the marriage breakdown concept. I think it would also be necessary to have the judges of these courts specially trained in the field of matrimonial relations so that they would have a proper understanding of the dynamics of marriage and the causes of breakdown. The report is, for this reason, more visionary than real.

The appendix also sets out types of difficulties that we are not presently able to solve at the federal level of government under the constitution. In this instance, particularly, we were faced with this dilemma. Should we hold up divorce reform for X number of years until we have written a new constitution and perhaps given the provinces jurisdiction over marriage and divorce problems or should we perhaps attempt with the provinces to deal with this matter which, remotely, or not remotely, so far as the administration of justice is concerned, comes under the federal government's jurisdiction? In the face of this dilemma we answered that we must act now under our jurisdiction and that we could not wait until the whole judicial system was reformed in order to satisfy those who, for very good, theoretical reasons, prefer the breakdown concept.

My argument is very much the same with respect to the reconciliation procedures contained in the bill. Admittedly, those procedures are not as far reaching and as thorough as many good meaning people would like to see. Personally I also regard reconciliation procedures as being most important. I can only say that I think we have gone as far as we can under this law. That is to say, we have gone as far as we can without embarking on a prolonged and involved process of federal-provincial consultation.

In saying that we adopted the procedure of acting now I want to add that I am not trying to minimize the importance of federal-provincial consultations. I, for one, would have preferred those consultations to have taken place 10 or 15 years ago or sooner. We would then have a system of courts—call them family courts, integrated family, marriage and divorce courts, or what you will—in which to apply the pure marriage breakdown theory. The fact is that we do not have these types of courts now. They would need to be set up, and that step can only be taken after long consultation with the provinces. I thought it preferable, and perhaps more in keeping with the will of the nation, to proceed with divorce reform as quickly as we could without, of course, neglecting any very important factors.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the minister permit a question? Would he say whether, since this bill has been introduced and distributed, he has received any representations from any of the attorneys general of the provinces or other representations on behalf of provincial governments?

Mr. Trudeau: We have sent copies of the bill to each deputy attorney general. So far as I know we have not had any representations from them yet. I have had certain representations from members of the courts in the provinces. They have been very helpful and indicated to me ways in which the law could be applied with the greatest possible success. That is important to us. As I said in my speech at the resolution stage, we intend to carry on a great deal of consultation at the governmental level and at the level of the chief justices to implement many of the provisions of the law.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will the minister reveal the nature of these representations to us before the bill is finally proceeded with?

Mr. Trudeau: I have no objection in principle, of course, to revealing them. I am suggesting that perhaps I will not have received a great number of representations by then. I hope that the bill will be passed fairly soon. I do not think it is very realistic to hope that before the bill is adopted I will have got very far with such representations. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather), Unemployment Insurance—inquiry as to inclusion of hospital employees; the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), Public Service—request for reconsideration of increase refusal; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), Public Service—pensions of retired civil servants.

An hon. Member: A doubleheader.

• (6:00 p.m.)

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. It being six o'clock, the house will now proceed to private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions.

[English]

CANADIAN CULTURE

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF COUNCIL TO ENCOURAGE DEVELOPMENT OF NATIONHOOD

On the order: Private Members' Notices of Motions

May 9—Mr. Alkenbrack—That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the advisability of establishing a Canadian cultural council to encourage the development of nationhood, recognizing the existence of our cultural plurality.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of my seatmate I wonder whether somebody on the government side would be good enough to request that this motion stand so that it may hold its pride of place.

Mr. McNulty: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding from the hon. member who proposed the motion that he does not want it stood.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Is it now considered by the house that this motion is dropped?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

SHIPBUILDING

SUGGESTED RETURN TO ADEQUATE SUBSIDIES, REGIONAL TENDERING, ETC.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to a return to adequate shipbuilding subsidies, and regional tendering and allocation of new construction, overhaul and repair.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first may I say it is a pleasure to take part in private members' hour. When a private member places one of these motions on the order paper he, of course, takes his chance on when it will be called, and I am glad that after some period of time the important matter with which my motion deals has now come before the house. If I may speak politically for a moment I wish to say that embodied in this motion is a resolution adopted by the Atlantic provinces Conservative candidates at a meeting in the city of Moncton, New Brunswick, and one which is most important to the Atlantic area.

I intend to divide my remarks into three sections, the first dealing with the matter of steel trawler construction in the Atlantic area. The building subsidies for steel fishing trawlers and other commercial ships were introduced in a policy brought forward by the previous government when the former hon. member for Trois-Rivières was minister of transport. These subsidies have meant a lot to Canadian shipyards.

I recall going to the Canadian Maritime Commission, which is now part of the Canadian Transport Commission, and speaking with its chairman, Alex Watson, a man of Scotch descent and naturally very durable, who had worked hard to have the subsidy scheme introduced and adopted by the previous government. For ordinary commercial vessels 40 per cent was the amount set as the percentage to be paid by the federal government and for steel fishing trawlers the amount was 50 per cent.

This program accomplished two things. It assisted our Canadian fishery companies to get up to date equipment in the form of new trawlers so that they could compete with foreign fishery trawlers off our coasts. Second and of no less importance, it provided the means whereby our shipbuilding yards could compete with foreign shipyards. Prior to its introduction our fishing companies, in most if not in all cases, bought their vessels from European shipyards where, because of the assistance given those yards by their respective governments, they could get their trawlers at a lower price than they would have had to pay in Canada.

As has been widely reported and commented upon, on the night of December 7 the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Benson) made the following announcement:

> The 50 per cent subsidy now provided for the construction of steel hull fishing trawlers will be reduced to 35 per cent, effective tonight.

I wish to emphasize the suddenness with which this cut was made. I have looked into this matter and I am advised that a number of fishing companies were in the midst of negotiations with shipyards to have new vessels built when this announcement was made on December 7 and that the announcement may well mean the negotiations will end without any settlement, causing a terrific loss to the shipyards.

As reported in the New Glasgow News of December 11, one of the executives of Jerry Nickerson and Sons Ltd. stated:

> The 15 per cent decrease in subsidy has given us two choices—build abroad or not build at all.

The Nova Scotia deputy minister of fisheries, Brian Meagher, was reported in the same newspaper as saying:

> —an average 150 foot trawler costs approximately $1,000,000, of which 50 per cent has been paid by subsidy. Its annual catch is valued between $250,000-$300,000 and it gives employment to 100 men ashore and 15-19 men afloat.

From this it will be seen that the construction of trawlers means not only work for our shipyards but also work for those engaged in our fisheries. The effect of the minister's announcement was too sudden.

I think that debate on the motion I have proposed comes at an opportune time, and I would urge the government to reconsider the matter of subsidies on the construction of steel fishing trawlers. Not only should the applications for subsidy now in the hands of the Department of Industry be considered, but there should have been a date set warning the shipyards and fishing companies that were engaged in negotiations when the subsidy was to be cut.

I wish to quote now part of an editorial which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of December 14:

> Perhaps the reduction—
> The reduction in subsidies.
> —is designed to show people in landlocked parts of the country that the maritimes have not escaped Mr. Benson's axe entirely. If retained for a prolonged period, however, it might have a most harmful effect on shipbuilding in the Atlantic provinces, which has already been hit by a slump in orders for both steel and wooden fishing vessels.
> There is a danger that once demand for new construction and the replacement of existing vessels begins to pick up, the reduced subsidy will persuade fleet owners to look elsewhere for their vessels. Modern steel trawlers, suited to northwest Atlantic fishing operations, are being built in quantity in various countries. There are numbers of ways in which Nova Scotia and other Canadian buyers can obtain easy credit terms for these foreign-built ships.
> It would be a serious matter for Canadian shipyards if foreign builders obtained a substantial toehold in this way. The price would be ridiculous: a meaningless federal bow to fiscal prudence.

In the first budget introduced by the present government the then minister of finance, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon), pointed out the number of millions of dollars which had gone into this project. It is money which I think was well spent. The subsidy was 40 per cent for ordinary commercial construction but now it has been cut to 25 per cent and will remain at that level until May 31, 1969. After May 31, 1969, it will be reduced still further by 2 per cent a year until it reaches 17 per cent. As a result construction of this type of vessel will decrease.

Part of my motion, Mr. Speaker, deals with regional tendering. I believe there should be regional tendering, but the government has adopted a policy of national tendering. I remember the time a few years ago when tenders were called for the first coastguard vessels. I recall that the low bidders were two St. Lawrence river yards. The lowest bidder in the Atlantic area at that time—and this shows that regional tendering could help—was a shipyard in my own constituency, Ferguson Industries Limited. I went to the minister of fisheries at that time, the hon. member for Trois-Rivières, and put forward a proposition to assist employment in Canada. I proposed that two of the contracts should go to the St. Lawrence river yards and the third should go to the yard in my constituency since it was the lowest of the Atlantic area bidders. I can think also of the case of the ferry plying between Portugal Cove and Bell Island, Newfoundland, the John Guy. Regional tendering was permitted in this case and as a result the shipyard in my constituency obtained the contract. This system gives not only the major yards but particularly the smaller yards an opportunity to tender and thereby keep the shipyards employed.

Certainly in my area and most areas during the last few years there has been very little naval repair work given out in the form of contracts because the number of ships has been cut down. In my own area, with the exception of one or two very small contracts in amounts under $25,000 nothing has been done in that regard in the last three years. I believe that naval work could be allocated to these yards. I am not sure whether this practice is carried on now, but the Department of Defence Production had a system whereby they would put a ship into a shipyard and if the management could do a good job and finish the contract before a designated time a bonus was given based on a bonus system. I believe this was a good thing.

I do not wish to take up too much time because I believe other members wish to speak on this matter. The most important point is that there should be a return to the subsidies. As I say, I hope the government will look into the matter of returning to the former subsidies in respect of the construction of steel fishing trawlers. If we do not return to the former system. I am afraid, as pointed out by the executive of Jerry Nickerson and Sons Ltd., that the ships either will be built abroad or not at all. If they are built abroad it will mean that foreign companies will be building our ships and will have their foot in the door. This will be fatal to our shipyards.

Shipyards are necessary not only in peacetime but also in wartime. We must keep them active in peacetime in order to provide the necessary work and employment and so that in the event of war they will be ready to deal with matters of national concern. We do not want to be left without our shipyards. I think the shipbuilding subsidies program is what has helped put our shipyards on their feet. A decrease in the subsidy or the taking away of the subsidy would have the reverse effect. I should like to refer again to the article which appeared in the Chronicle-Herald of December 14:

> It would be a serious matter for Canadian shipyards if foreign builders obtained a substantial toehold in this way. The price would be ridiculous: a meaningless federal bow to fiscal prudence.

The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud), in answering a question I asked the other day, pointed out that the amounts which had been paid out were $24 million for steel vessels and over $6 million for wooden vessels for the fisheries. All I can say is that I hope this resolution will come to a vote and pass and that the government will give consideration to the meaningless cuts they have brought about. If money was spent it was money well spent.

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria (B.C.)): Mr. Speaker, one of the great advantages of private members' hour is that it provides an opportunity for us to air our opinions on matters of concern to our ridings. I think there are very few members in the house who are more concerned about shipbuilding than myself. Like my colleague and friend from Pictou I have in my riding, as it is now constituted, some shipbuilding facilities. There are two major shipyards, one large H.M.C. Dockyard at Esquimalt, and one medium size shipyard which specializes in building certain types of craft. Unfortunately, one of the major shipyards is in the process of scrapping its shipbuilding facilities. It is remaining in the steel fabricating part of the business. This is a result of the present state of affairs in the country.

I think one of the troubles in Canada at the moment is that while we have a government ship procurement policy and hand in hand with it have a shipbuilding subsidy program, we do not have a maritime shipping policy. It seems to me that the two should in fact go hand in hand if we wish to be honest and sincere about this whole matter. There does not seem to me to be any point in building ships purely for the sake of providing employment. This costs money in very large quantities and there may be better ways to provide employment.

In Canada with our population I do not think we can keep a large shipbuilding industry going on government contracts and subsidies alone. I believe we must become competitive in world markets. We must build for the world. I think we can do that. We did at one time have a massive shipbuilding industry. Our achievement in wartime was simply magnificent. I wonder how many hon. members realize how stupendous it was. For example, I do not think there is a member in the house who is not aware of the fact that the Clyde river and Clydebank in Scotland are a huge shipbuilding area. In the port of Vancouver during world war II a larger tonnage of shipbuilding was turned out than was turned out in the whole of the Clyde river area. That is a remarkable achievement. Of course, with the peacetime cut-backs construction has diminished so that at the moment on the west coast, for example, we have remaining two large shipbuilding facilities and various shipbuilding organizations of a smaller nature.

As I said, we do not have a national shipbuilding policy. We have a policy of ship procurement which to my mind is on trial. The present situation is that the government, for the first time, has lumped together all its shipbuilding requirements whether they be for the Department of National Defence or for another government department. They have stated what their requirements are to be. They have forecast these over a period of years and have given this information to the shipbuilding industry across Canada so that these yards now know that when times are tough and they need extra work they can sharpen their pencils and become really competitive.

I went along and do go along with this government policy and I think we must at least try it out to see if it will work. There have been many signs that we can compete on the west coast, in spite of our higher wage rates, with shipbuilding yards on the east coast of Canada. I do not have the figures in this regard at my fingertips but I will come back to this point later. In the United States the situation is different. As I said earlier, we should not only have a ship procurement but a maritime shipping policy. They do have one in the United States and I think it is called the Jones Act. Their declaration of policy reads in this way and I quote from subsection 1101:

> It is necessary for the national defence and development of its foreign and domestic commerce that the United States shall have a merchant marine (a) sufficient to carry its domestic water-borne commerce and a substantial portion of the water-borne export and import foreign commerce of the United States and to provide shipping service on all routes essential for maintaining the flow of such domestic and foreign water-borne commerce at all times, (b) capable of serving as a naval and military auxiliary in time of war or national emergency, (c) owned and operated under the United States flag by citizens of the United States, in so far as may be practicable, and (d) composed of the best-equipped, safest, and most suitable types of vessels, constructed in the United States and manned with a trained and efficient citizen personnel.

It goes on to state:

> It is declared to be the policy of the United States to foster the development and encourage the maintenance of such a merchant marine.

That is what the Jones Act says. The policy is clear, concise and desirable, but I think experience has shown that it is also expensive. I could read a few more provisions which have been developed over the years as they have gained experience. For instance, they have a construction differential subsidy. It is one of the things that followed the establishment of a national maritime policy. This subsection reads:

> Any citizen of the United States may make application to the federal maritime board for a construction differential subsidy to aid in the construction of a new vessel to be used in the foreign commerce of the United States. No such application shall be approved by the board unless it determines that (1) the plans and specifications call for a new vessel which will meet the requirements of the foreign commerce of the United States, will aid in the promotion and development of such commerce and be suitable for use by the United States for national defence or military purposes in time of war or national emergency;—

It then states that the board must also determine that:

> —the applicant possesses the ability, the experience, financial resources, and other qualifications necessary to enable it to operate and maintain the proposed new vessel, and (3) the granting of the aid applied for is reasonably calculated to replace worn out or obsolete tonnage with new and modern ships, or otherwise to carry out effectively the purposes and policy of this chapter.

I will not go farther with that point, but they have a maritime policy from which flows the requirement for a construction subsidy. There is also the important fact that if you are going to have a maritime policy and build ships you ought to have the facilities for building the ships. In the next paragraph it is stated:

> The federal maritime board shall submit the plans and specifications for the proposed vessel to the navy department for examination thereof and suggestions for such changes therein as may be deemed necessary or proper in order that such vessel shall be suitable for economic and speedy conversion into a naval or military auxiliary, or otherwise suitable for the use of the United States government in time of war or national emergency.

In order to make the policy economical it then goes on to say:

All licensed officers of vessels documented under the laws of the United States, as now required by law, shall be citizens of the United States, native born or completely naturalized; and upon each departure from the United States of a cargo vessel in respect of which a construction or operating subsidy has been granted all of the crew (crew including all employees of the ship) shall be citizens of the United States, native born or completely naturalized.

I am trying to show how complicated this matter becomes. It then says, and this will be of help to hon. members who were talking about this before—you will be happy to hear that I seem to have lost my place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Groos: To make this an economically viable operation the act states:

Any officer or employee of the United States travelling on official business . . . shall travel and transport his personal effects on ships registered under the laws of the United States—

It then goes on to state:

Whenever the United States shall procure, contract for, or otherwise obtain for its own account, or shall furnish to or for the account of any foreign nation without provision for reimbursement, any equipment, materials, or commodities, within or without the United States, or shall advance funds or credits or guarantee the convertibility of foreign currencies in connection with the furnishing of such equipment, materials, or commodities, the appropriate agency or agencies shall take such steps as may be necessary and practicable to assure that at least 50 per centum of the gross tonnage of such equipment, materials or commodities . . . shall be transported on privately owned United States flag commercial vessels—

I read this to show that the problem in respect of providing subsidies to the shipbuilding industry in Canada is not simple. To spare hon. members on all sides of the house I have only read parts of the law. I have here an extract from a Seattle newspaper which gives a fairly good idea of how this policy is working in the United States. The article refers to how the Jones Act applies to people in Alaska and it states:

Rightly or wrongly, many Alaskans see those laws—"Jones" or "inter-coastal"—whatever you prefer—as slowing the northland's development because they in effect limit competition and raise the cost of shipping.

As they stand now, those laws outlaw shipping of U.S. goods between two U.S. ports in a foreign vessel. A vessel qualifies as "foreign" if it wasn't built in a U.S. shipyard.

Later it states:

Alaska just recently put on the heat in the U.S. Congress to permit the shipment of goods on Canadian ferries en route from here to Alaska but the measure was defeated.

[Mr. Groos.]

The coastal shipping laws, as far as the rest of the economy here is concerned, have done their work too well. For one thing costs are higher on the U.S. vessels. Put those two facts together and it practically meant the death knell for the regions water-borne shipment of lumber to the U.S. east coast.

Let me point out this fact, however, still quoting from this article:

• (6:30 p.m.)

Lumber from British Columbia, however, has all but taken that market away from our region's producers. During the month of October, for instance, British Columbia sent 64.8 million board feet of lumber to the east coast via ship; Washington—

Another lumber state.

—7 million; Oregon, 11.3 million.

The difference doesn't turn on the quality of our lumber or the price here.

That is one example. You lose trade when you try to confine the shipment or your own materials to your own ships. I think another example that we all remember is the United States wheat sales last year to China. Because of the requirement by the government of that country that half of those wheat sales would have to be shipped in American bottoms, the cost of the wheat to the Chinese was increased so that they were no longer agreeable to buying it from the United States. The United States suffered; we were the ones who benefited.

This notice of motion calls for adequate shipbuilding subsidies. I think this is a little vague. I am not too sure what "adequate" means. I would have preferred the language to be a little more definite. How is our present system working? Some rather interesting figures came to light only yesterday. I refer to a press release issued by the Department of Defence Production, dated December 12, which says:

Shortly after 3.00 p.m. today, proposals for the construction and outfitting of the four helicopter-carrying destroyers (d.d.h. 280 class) were opened publicly by officials of the Department of Defence Production with the results as indicated in Appendix A.

Appendix A shows that for the lead yards two firms, Davie Shipbuilding Ltd. and Marine Industries Ltd., bid on the construction of the lead ship and one other. The indicated price for Davie is just over $24 million and for Marine Industries it is about $20.5 million.

For the follow-up yards, two more ships, Marine Industries came up with a bid of just about $18.5 million, Davie Shipbuilding came up with a bid of $22.5 million, Halifax Shipyards, that is Dosco, came up with a bid of just under $35 million and Burrard Dry Dock, in North Vancouver, came up with a bid of just over $49 million. This looks pretty bad for the west coast, but what it suggests to me is not that regional tendering is the answer but, as I am beginning to suspect, that the method of tendering needs looking into. There cannot be a spread of $31 million between the east coast and the west coast in respect of bids for identical ships.

On the west coast we have a wage differential of 70 cents an hour, or about a dollar an hour with fringe benefits; but the difference in wages is not $31 million. To my mind there is something wrong with the way those tenders were worded. There must have been too many vaguely worded clauses in the tenders which allowed for different interpretations between the east coast and the west coast, and the interpretation given on the west coast called for a far more expensive construction. I shall be very interested to see what is the final cost of these ships when construction is completed.

I am just about finished, Mr. Speaker. I want to see a shipbuilidng and repair facility kept on both coasts of Canada. If we are to be a maritime nation we must not only build ships but repair them on both coasts. I think there are ways of doing this other than by means of direct subsidy. I believe the shipyards have shown commendable activity and skill in diversifying and becoming steel fabricators, and in imaginative ship construction projects. They have developed in my own area some very highly skilled procedures in the building of offshore oil drilling rigs. I want to see this sort of activity continued.

I think there is a very large field for Canada contributing through external aid in the building of shipping; and shipping, of course, involves not just ships and offshore oil-drilling rigs but all sorts of other types of steel fabricating. I see that my time is just about up, Mr. Speaker. I wish to deal at another time with a scheme I have of trying to develop in Canada, using our external aid program, a school of harbour development by means of which we can use our shipbuilding facilities and talents as part of the contribution to our external aid program. However, as I say, I will do that at another time.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I had not been asked about this before, but I will now advise the Chair that I am seconding the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. MacEwan). Since he has made the points forcibly and well, I do not intend to make a long contribution to this debate. I also know that several other hon. members would like to make their points.

I will certainly try to keep more on course than the distinguished hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Groos). I know in his naval career, when he was at the helm of some of the mightiest and most expensive pieces of armament that this country produced, he would not have gone off on quite the same tangent as he has this evening, with regard to certain developments that really deal more with shipping policy than with shipbuilding subsidies, regional tendering and the allocation of ship construction, overhaul and repair.

It seems to me that the policy being adopted by the government is one that will put shipbuilding activity at a new level and force it to seek its own level in this country; and I am afraid that level will be below sea-level. The other day the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse), in one of the most impressive questions I have ever heard since coming to this chamber, pointed out very quickly that there had been a devaluation of the British pound to the extent of some 15 per cent, and an additional 15 per cent cut in the subsidy on steel-helmed fishing trawlers from 50 per cent to 35 per cent, so that in effect there is being heaped on this Canadian industry an additional 30 per cent in cost above that which existed before Wilson's devaluation, and the Benson abattoir treatment of government spending.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCleave: A 30 per cent difference represents a drastically changed picture indeed and something that, as the hon. member for Pictou has pointed out, the Chronicle-Herald dealt with in a good editorial on Thursday, December 14. It is true that there has been a temporary slowdown in the demand for new construction and replacement of existing vessels, but that will not always be so. Given those two conditions, it is quite likely that the fishing interests will turn their attention to other places.

• (6:40 p.m.)

In the constituency represented by my colleague and myself we have the Halifax Shipyards. We have been told in discussions with officials of Halifax Shipyards—and this is also a matter of public record—that they consider the fishing industry to be the greatest source of work for these yards. As most people who know the Halifax area will realize, the shipyards lie alongside the dockyard and alongside what is left of the Royal Canadian Navy, and yet these officials told us that the shipyard potential is in the fishing industry, and not in naval construction or naval refits. So instead of being able to take steps to offset the effects of the devaluation of the British pound and to adjust to that situation, we have taken steps which go hand in hand with the devaluation, but to the detriment of Canadian industry. We were met with various suggestions, that the work should be done on tender call, and the like. However, let us ask ourselves: if we have ever set up this type of industry on an economic basis in this country. I suggest we did not because if we had done so the yards on the St. Lawrence river and those on the west and east coasts would never have been asked to tender on the D.D.P. program. Perhaps the tenders would have gone overseas, or around the world to places where these ships can be built on a much lower wage scale and at a much lower price than in Canada.

So we have to admit that our defence contracts are partly used as an economic development weapon. Once we admit this, we must also admit that the various regions in Canada must be treated equitably. We have the west coast, where obviously the wage differential in comparison with the Atlantic and east coast yards puts them out of the picture. Then there is the St. Lawrence river, where another set of economic conditions prevails; and finally there is Atlantic Canada, the area I serve, where still other economic factors are at work. So if we grant that defence spending is a necessary economic weapon in the hands of Canadians, then perforce we must grant that it cannot be applied in the way in which the government is presently applying it, a policy with regard to which my hon. friend for Pictou (Mr. MacEwan) is seeking an answer. I think it is an important point.

I should like to say in conclusion, because I did promise to speak briefly, that it is difficult to understand how on earth there can be national tendering systems all across Canada for every last thing that government departments need, when there is no national transportation policy in this country. Firm after firm from the Halifax area has written to me complaining that when the D.D.P. tenders were called they could not attempt to put any in because the vicious l.c.l. rates increased their prices so much that competition simply became impossible. I make this point because the Atlantic resolutions, to which my hon. friend referred, will be brought up again after the next election to save the day for the hard pressed Atlantic industry.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal with a couple of points with regard to the motion before the house which deals with the building of vessels in general, and fishing vessels in particular. A remark was made by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. MacEwan) which perhaps should be challenged, that is that the reduction of subsidies for shipyards was made suddenly and that they were not prepared for it. I am given to understand by the government that the shipyards were warned a year ago of the impending reductions. They were informed that no subsidies would be granted under the existing rates for work that could not be completed within two years. So apparently they were aware of the impending reductions in the subsidy.

I believe it would be useful to give the house an idea of the size of the subsidy and what it has meant to the industry. For example, $24 million will be paid for steel hulls this year, and the Department of Fisheries, under its wooden ship construction program, will put out another $6½ million, which makes a total of $30½ million in subsidies granted to the shipyards for both steel and wooden hulls in the course of the current year. This subsidy has been granted for a number of years, and in the course of its history it has proved the capability of yards to turn out ships. Surely the capability of yards on both the east and the west coast must have improved as a result of the number of ships built under the subsidy. I think one of the direct benefits to the Canadian shipbuilding industry has been the fact that the subsidy has enabled them to improve their capital equipment and to build up a capability for meeting the very kind of competition for which it was designed.

Bearing this in mind, I think we should look at the money that we as the government have put out in subsidies, and ask ourselves just how we propose to handle this. Does a subsidy have to be continued indefinitely, and must it be repeated year after year, or is it possible that the government can put out money, as it has in shipbuilding programs, to encourage shipbuilding yards to improve their capability and meet their competition, and finally to reduce the amount of subsidy and turn government funds to some other purposes?

Mr. Crouse: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he care to tell the house to what better purpose these funds could be put than assisting the shipbuilding industry, which would automatically assist the electric, the steam, the heating and the steel industries in Canada, as well as all the varied industries which make up the very fabric of this nation?

Mr. Deachman: I do not think it is a case of determining to what better use money could be put. One way of dealing with the matter would be simply not too levy the tax. If it is possible with less subsidy to enable the shipbuilding industry to stand on its own feet, then surely as legislators we should strive for a position in which the ship building industry could operate on a smaller subsidy per hull, if it is possible to reduce the amount of subsidy granted to the industry. When the hon. member asks to what better purpose the money could be put, I say it might be turned back to the people to be used at their own discretion. We are often told by hon. members on the other side that we overspend. Perhaps money granted to this industry has now served its pupose to encourage the shipbuilding industry to a point where it can meet some competition.

I am glad to see in the house this afternoon the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse) because when he and I served together on the fisheries committee it was he who raised the question of the Golden Scarab, a Canadian subsidized vessel which was built in Canadian shipyards and which I am sure the government, in providing money for the building of that and similar ships, expected would ship in Canadian waters, hire Canadian crews, come back to Canadian docks and send its fish to Canadian markets, thus benefiting the economy of Canada. But as he explained so well to the committee, this was not what happened. Indeed the Golden Scarab disappeared from the Canadian scene. It fished in foreign waters, took on foreign crews and landed its catch in foreign ports for processing. This vessel therefore was literally lost to the Canadian economy after it had been built here.

We recommended, and my hon. friend was a party to that recommendation, that the Canadian government should tighten up the policing of subsidies of this kind, and that there should be in the subsidy more than merely the provision of funds to assist in the building of a hull. We should make sure that the hull will remain useful to the Canadian economy beyond the date of its launching. This motion suggests that the government should give immediate consideration to a return to adequate shipbuilding subsidies. I think one of the things we should make sure about is that the funds we provide do not simply build hulls, but that those hulls continue to perform a useful service to the Canadian economy.

It is not only in connection with the building of fishing vessels that such situations crop up, but they occur everywhere in connection with vessel construction under the Canadian subsidy system. I have in my hand a copy of the Appropriations Act, which includes the regulations in respect of capital subsidies for the construction of commercial fishing vessels. The definition of shipowner is a citizen of Canada, a company incorporated in Canada or Her Majesty in the right of any province in Canada. Under this definition, then, any foreign company which wants to take advantage of this Canadian subsidy can come to Canada and incorporate itself or gain control of a Canadian company already established. Such a company could then use the dollars which are obtained by virtue of the subsidy as leverage for acquiring an interest in a Canadian shipping company.

We had one famous example of this on the west coast. A locally owned tugboat company became owned by a United States company from New York. The United States company then provided the funds necessary for the building of vessels under the subsidy. The vessels were built in Canada and the Canadian government paid for the building of these vessels for this United States owned company. These vessels then went into competition on the Georgia strait with vessels of Canadian owned companies operating in those waters. These Canadian funds, raised from Canadian taxpayers, were made available to a United States company through the device of the subsidy, and were used as leverage to acquire an interest in a Canadian firm. The vessels were used in competition with those owned by Canadian companies.

I believe we should consider very carefully this aspect of the question of shipbuilding subsidies. I have raised this issue before in the House of Commons, and I raise it again tonight because I really believe that the funds are not being put to the best use. In the case of the Golden Scarab, these funds were used to build a ship which sailed off into foreign waters. In the second case, the funds were used as leverage by a foreign company to acquire a Canadian company and to go into competition against Canadian companies. I believe these subsidies should be made available to Canadian firms, and they should not be capable of being used as leverage by companies from other countries.

I could give other examples. There are many barges operating in the Georgia strait carrying wood chips and paper. More and more these barges have come to be built and operated by the pulp and paper companies on the west coast. At one time they were operated by locally owned shipping firms which operated up and down the strait. However, the availability of these subsidies has meant that pulp and paper companies owned and operated in the United States have found it profitable to use this Canadian subsidy to build barges for use in that area.

So I ask, does anyone in this house really feel we are putting this money to good use when it is being used as leverage funds for the purpose of assisting United States based pulp and paper companies operating in Canada? I feel this resolution should have added to it some clause which would enable us to look into these aspects of subsidies, as well as the other questions which have been raised by hon. members opposite.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members business has now expired. The house will resume the business interrupted at six o'clock.

At seven o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

DIVORCE

MEASURE RESPECTING GROUNDS, JURISDICTION, JUDGES, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Trudeau for the second reading of Bill No. C-187, respecting divorce.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe I was winding up my argument as to why we dealt with breakdown and reconciliation in the way we did, instead of trying to satisfy, shall I say, the theoretically pure concept of breakdown for which some hon. members have been pushing. I just want to wind up by spelling out in a little detail the kind of procedural change that would be required by the introduction of a concept which made several eminent British spokesmen declare—and this was referred to by the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on divorce—would be foreign to British law, and therefore I take it would also be foreign to Canadian law.

It is not so much the word "inquisitorial" that is distasteful; it is the practical difficulty of giving over to administrative boards or tribunals a type of decision which under our concept we give to the courts as part of the rule of law. A thorough application of this breakdown concept would really mean that we would authorize some kind of board or administrative tribunal—I am not quite sure what kind it would be; hon. members who spoke on the breakdown concept did not detail what they envisaged—which would have absolute or quasi-absolute discretion to inquire into all aspects of a marriage, and then reach a decision on standards which are the board's own and which were not tested by any text of law. Any decision of an administrative board could be appealed, only with great difficulty, because it would really mean substituting one administrative discretion for another.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I think it is closer to our concept of the rule of law for judicial tribunals or courts to apply the law, as we see it, and not for boards to inquire or pry into the very intimate aspects of the lives of the parties to a divorce suit. I think this law is a good one in the sense that the facts presented to the court spell out what is the state of marriage breakdown, and the court must accept those facts.

For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the procedure adopted in this bill is the best one. As I indicated earlier, it is the only one we could implement now without going through the very long procedure of reforming our judicial system.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform hon. members that I am not opposed to any particular reform. Some hon. members have stated that eventually the government will come in a few years—some hon. members said in ten years—to accept this concept. I agree with that statement quite readily, Mr. Speaker, first of all because it means we will still be in office in ten years—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Trudeau: I realize that was not the intent of the remark. Second, and less facetiously, I hope that over a period of years the application of this law will be studied by members of all parties. Certainly both the government and the Department of Justice will study its application, and if we can work toward the kind of tribunal referred to, I think, by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Forest) and establish a court that will look into various other aspects of family life, then this is only to be desired. However, until we reach that stage I submit that we had to move on divorce as we have.

Mr. McCleave: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question just before he leaves that particular point. Would he not agree with the feasibility of setting up a continuing study of this matter with the attorneys general and, say, the chief justices, who hold annual sessions now, to the end of exploring divorce reform on a continuous basis? We have had rather a large lump of it now, but perhaps the matter could be considered on a continuous basis hereafter.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is an excellent suggestion. I was going to say this later, but I welcome the opportunity to say it now. There are going to be meetings of provincial government officials and of chief justices which will be called to enable them to look into the aspects mentioned by the hon. member, and I hope these meetings will be taking place very soon. This is the reason that the last clause of the bill provides that three months will have to elapse before the legislation can be implemented.

As we get to the clause by clause study of the bill, Mr. Speaker, hon. members will realize, if they have not done so already, that many rules of procedure will have to be worked out. There will even be some conflicts of law which we hope to solve before the bill is put into operation. The meetings suggested by the hon. member are a very important part of the application of this bill. At these meetings we hope to study the various aspects that have been raised in the correspondence to which the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) referred earlier this day, and of which I expect we will be hearing more.

The second point I wish to deal with, Mr. Speaker, has to do with the county courts. Much has been said in this house about the need to have this legislation applied by county courts rather than by superior or supreme courts, as is the case under this bill. I meet this objection by quoting once again from page 77 of the report "Putting Asunder":

> For those reasons we—

"We" being the authors of this report,

> —cannot approve bringing uncontested cases into the jurisdiction of the county courts. We find ourselves in agreement, as did the Morton commission and the Denning committee, with the words of the Gorell commission of 1912.

Then follows a quote from the Gorell commission:

> —the gravity of divorce and other matrimonial cases, affecting as they do the family life, the status of the parties, the interests of their children, and the interest of the State in the moral and social well-being of its citizens, makes it desirable to provide, if possible, that, even for the poorest persons, these cases should be determined by the superior courts of the country assisted by the attendance of the bar, which we regard as of high importance in divorce and matrimonial cases, both in the interests of the parties and in the public interest.

That is the end of the quotation from the Gorell commission. I continue quoting from page 78 of "Putting Asunder".

> We also fear that transfer of divorce jurisdiction to the county courts could have the effect of impeding more radical reforms that eventually might be seen to be desirable.

The point here is that, traditionally, the superior or high courts have always been regarded as having jurisdiction in matrimonial cases. The principles which are contained in the new divorce bill change many of the laws which have been applied by many of our courts for many years. There are in excess of 80 county and district courts in Canada, a substantial majority of them being in Ontario. There are none in the territories or in the province of Quebec. Incidentally, the province of Quebec does not have county courts. All Quebec judges are judges of the superior courts and as such fulfil the role of county judges. Therefore in Quebec and in the territories, the kind of objection that has been raised does not apply.

It might be appropriate to indicate that each provincial legislature, if it so desires, can provide that county court judges shall act as local judges of the supreme court. Each province, if it so desires, could meet the objection which has been raised as to distance or as to the unattainability of superior courts. Each province must decide this matter in the light of its own problems as they arise in the administration of justice for that province.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would that not involve a reference and a report back, thus greatly increasing costs for litigants?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the minister answers I must advise the house that the minister's time has expired. Has he leave to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, with great respect I think the minister is making a most important statement and I am sure the house will give him leave to continue.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Trudeau: I thank the house for permitting me to continue. I have as much interest as hon. members have in getting on with this matter. I shall answer the hon. member's question briefly. The matter would not necessarily have to proceed in the way the hon. member for Carleton indicates. It would suffice that provincial legislation itself may decide that particular county court judges may hear divorce cases. The hon. member shakes his head. I refer him to the decision of the supreme court. It is Attorney General of British Columbia v. Lloyd G. Mackenzie, Q.C., 1965 Supreme Court Reports, page 490. That decision said that a county court could sit as a divorce court.

It happens that in Ontario, provincial legislation enables county court judges to sit, in connection with certain matters, as local judges of the high court.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That would be, surely, on a reference and report. Those two steps are most important. There must first be a reference, then a report. These, in each case, involve additional costs for the individuals involved.

Mr. Trudeau: That type of procedural question would have to be ironed out and it would be settled differently in different provinces. It could be settled in the way the hon. member indicates, but it need not necessarily be done that way.

I was arguing, Mr. Speaker, that the supreme court or high court is the natural court to render decisions in these types of matters. It seemed unwise to change our procedures radically. It seemed unwise to change the functions of courts at the same time as the substantive law is being changed.

In addition, to confer jurisdiction on the county courts would necessarily involve the inclusion of some principle that would enable a selection among those courts to be made. I am simply suggesting that that would be another factor that would have to be considered.

The hon. member raised the question of costs. That question is important, but I just wish to say this. Superior courts or supreme courts are not necessarily more expensive than county courts. Surely this is a matter which will be decided and fixed by the rules of courts, or by the code of civil procedure. I was hoping that this type of matter might be discussed in the meetings with the chief justices, meetings to which I referred a few minutes ago. Though the question of costs is important I do not think we should assume that necessarily it will be more expensive to litigate in supreme or high courts.

As a federal government we were dealing with effectively. Problems of legal aid, as with all aspects of the matter. Some aspects, however, the federal government, cannot cope hon. members know, cannot be solved by federal government action alone. At least, those problems can be solved only with great difficulty, if at all, where the federal government acts alone. Problems to do with lawyers' fees cannot be solved by the federal government, and court costs are fixed by rules.

Clause 19(1)(c) of the bill provides:

A court of appeal may make rules ...

(c) respecting the fixing and awarding of costs;

Subclause (2) provides:

—the governor in council may make such regulations as he considers proper to assure uniformity in the rules of court—

We have therefore some leverage in this matter. I can only suggest that this type of question ought to be settled by provincial consultation. Again therefore we did not find it advisable to give jurisdiction to courts which seemed traditionally unprepared to decide these very substantial matters of rights, merely because costs were to be involved. That matter could be settled by another approach. In other words, here again we did not try to deal with everything in this bill. We have tried to draft the bill as best we could according to the powers we have.

• (8:20 p.m.)

The final point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, has to do with conflicts of law. Here I am thinking mainly of a few points which were raised by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme) and the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Forest).

[Translation]

The problems raised by those members are extremely important. They gave us a real course in comparative law and I believe that we have taken that fact into consideration ourselves when drafting this bill.

It is obvious that the present divorce legislation, which is perfectly along the lines of the constitution, may, as a result, affect some other existing statutes under the Criminal Code. Here again, we have not felt that the decision to vote on a divorce legislation should be postponed indefinitely, nor deemed it necessary to wait until all legal conflicts are settled beforehand. I think it would have implied lengthy negotiations, and I am even inclined to say, very lengthy.

We have preferred to pass the legislation and keep strictly to questions of federal jurisdiction with the idea that later the courts will try to solve the problems of conflicting legislation under the principles applicable to other conflicting legislation throughout the country.

As for the question of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme) concerning children, I should simply indicate that the children over 16 will keep the rights they now have under the Civil Code. The present legislation deals with decisions rendered for children under 16, but the fact remains that section 165 and following clauses of the Civil Code dealing with alimony are not deleted for all that. These clauses apply to filiation and it is clear that the divorce legislation which breaks the bonds of matrimony cannot in the least break the bonds of filiation. Therefore, it may be that a 20-year-old son, wishing to pursue certain studies, may avail himself of the Quebec jurisprudence to the effect that he still has a claim on his father, regardless of the fact that the latter is divorced. In other words, the rights of filiation are unaltered by the Divorce Act.

There are other examples of conflicting legislation which I should like to deal with, but I am pressed for time and I hope that the hon. members will ask me questions with regard to the clauses themselves when we study the bill in committee. For the time being, I ask for your indulgence, since we are ready to move second reading of the bill and I should like to thank the hon. members for their attention and conclude my remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I propose to move an amendment to clause 2 to give divorce jurisdiction to the county and district courts. I shall give my reasons very briefly because the matter has been very carefully canvassed by members during debate on second reading, and a reply has been given by the minister. I think that the key to the success of this legislation lies in the question of jurisdiction. In the first place, high courts mean high costs. Divorce should not be the privilege of those who can afford it, but rather the right of those who merit it.

Second, divorce in the assize courts means divorce in a hurry. This has been one of the complaints over the years about divorce litigation, that it was shoved in without proper consideration, to be taken care of during proceedings in the assize courts at times when the judges had many other things on their minds. A very simple amendment to the bill could take care of this objection.

Third, reconciliation proceedings require continuing effort. In most areas county court judges are able to adjourn from time to time in order to follow up on reconciliation efforts. The high court judges are not. If these reconciliation proceedings, which some of us feel are unsatisfactory anyway, are to be at least carried out with some appearance of reality, then they should be carried out by judges who are able to continue their consideration of the matters involved.

These are the three points I want to raise. They were raised originally when I spoke on second reading, and I think they are still valid.

I would like to say a word about the minister's reply, because he made two or three points which had not been brought out previously. The first is that the provinces can now designate their local judges, who are county and district court judges, to try divorce actions. All I can say is that this power has been there all along, but it has never been used, except in Nova Scotia as my hon. friend from Pictou tells me. In general, across the country, this power has not been used and there is no reason to think the new law will result in any changes unless there is some direction. Therefore I do not think that point is valid. If the law has been there in the past, this bill will make no change in that respect.

The minister also mentioned that the regulations as to costs could be made by the committee which sets up rules of court in each province. Here again I say that such committees could have done this all along. They could have made provision to make divorces less costly. If it is the intention to make them less costly, I am sure these committees would expect parliament to give them some lead; but we are giving them no lead in this legislation—except what may be gleamed from the debate on it, and the vote which we shall have now—to show that parliament really intends that the costs should be kept down. So while the minister made a number of good points, I really think that it is fundamental to grant divorce jurisdiction to the county and district courts.

Over the week end I have become even more completely convinced of this, since so many people have said that the purpose of this legislation, as expressed during the committee meetings and here, is to get away from the practice of having so many common law unions—I will not call them marriages, because they are not—which result in illegitimate children and in a negation of the sanctity of marriage itself. This is the purpose of this legislation.

In the first few months or years we would hope that many of these unsatisfactory unions would be made legal. This would be done by a party obtaining a divorce from his or her spouse, who lives somewhere else, and marrying the person with whom he or she is living. If this procedure is to cost a substantial sum of money, then it will not happen. These people, many of whom are unable to obtain a divorce because they cannot afford it, will be in no better position after this legislation has passed than they were before. So we will end up with a person who can afford a divorce getting it more easily on broader grounds while those on marginal incomes who would be unable, or would not have the desire, to raise several hundred dollars to obtain divorces in the high courts will more likely abandon the idea and buy new refrigerators or washing machines for their homesteads, rather than get divorces. This is a real possibility under any circumstance.

If this legislation does nothing more than broaden the grounds for those who can afford a divorce, then it will not help the situation. I believe we will find that the very objectives which I know the minister and the government have will go by the board unless this parliament directs that the county court judges are intended to be the judges who will preside over these trials. Unless this parliament directs that the costs shall be kept to a minimum, then I am sure the desired objective will not be achieved. If reconciliation proceedings are intended to be real, this will be more difficult and will shove up the costs unless there is jurisdiction in the county courts. County court costs are known to be generally less costly, regardless of how one looks at it. They will keep the costs down to a reasonable amount; they could be kept very low.

For all these reasons I urge very strongly that the minister reconsider this question of jurisdiction. I will pass up all my other objections if this one suggestion is accepted, because I believe the rest will all come together. In respect of the marriage breakdown, the minister has moved in that direction. He has not moved as far as some of us would like to see him move, but he has moved. On the question of reconciliation he has moved, perhaps not as far as we would like to see him move, but there is the seed of a move toward reconciliation procedures. On the matter of the county court jurisdiction, however, there is no movement at all. In fact, if it is resisted here, then it can be taken that the intention is to keep the jurisdiction with the high courts, keep the costs up, and not to reduce the costs. I would ask that the minister consider this question of the other courts, because I believe this is fundamental.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to give effect to this I have an amendment which I should like to propose. I might say that this is an amendment in which all our members on this side concur, even though we have some differences of opinion in respect of the marriage breakdown question and how far it should go. We are in agreement that the county court jurisdiction should have effect. We have taken clause 8 out of the draft bill proposed by the joint standing committee, and we would like to see it included in the bill which has been proposed by the minister. I, therefore, move:

That subclause (e) of clause 2 be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(vii) In any province with courts having jurisdiction to dissolve marriages, the county or district courts shall have jurisdiction, equally and concurrently with the superior court therein, to dissolve marriages and to provide ancillary relief, on any existing ground or on any ground added by this act: Provided that, on the application of any party thereto, an action for dissolution commenced in a county or district court shall be transferred to the superior court, and provided further that any ancillary relief granted by the superior court coincidentally with a pronouncement of dissolution may be enforced, and may be varied from time to time as circumstances may require, by the county or district court in the county or district in which the petitioner resides."

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: For the information of the committee, I shall read the amendment moved by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken):

That subclause (e) of clause 2 be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

(vii) In any province with courts having jurisdiction to dissolve marriages, the county or district courts shall have jurisdiction, equally and concurrently with the superior court therein, to dissolve marriages and to provide ancillary relief, on any existing ground or on any ground added by this act: Provided that, on the application of any party thereto, an action for dissolution commenced in a county or district court shall be transferred to the superior court, and provided further that any ancillary relief granted by the superior court coincidentally with a pronouncement of dissolution may be enforced, and may be varied from time to time as circumstances may require, by the county or district court in the county or district in which the petitioner resides.

[English]

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Muskoka-Parry Sound. I shall try to make my remarks brief, because this matter has been discussed previously. There are some differences I have with the minister which I do not think can be very easily resolved and, although I may move or support amendments, I do not expect to persuade the minister. However, on this particular point concerning the jurisdiction of the county courts, once again I urge the minister to give consideration to this amendment.

There are a number of reasons. First I should like to refer to the report that was made by a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate. The members of this committee included a great many lawyers who are experienced in this field, including some from the Senate such as Senators Roebuck and Croll, for example. In addition, many hon. members on the government side of the house endorsed this report.

The report contained a unanimous recommendation that the jurisdiction be a concurrent jurisdiction in the county courts, and the reasons therefore are set out in the report. Although I do not propose to read this at any length, I should like to read the following which appears at page 261 of the appendix to Votes and Proceedings of June 27, 1967:

It is the practice in those provinces where dissolutions of marriage are granted for jurisdiction to be exercised by the superior courts. This practice has obvious disadvantages. The procedure of the superior courts is costly and involved, and these courts, burdened with cases of a more weighty character, tend to dispose of their long lists of divorce cases as quickly as possible and in a perfunctory manner.

I suggest that the voice of experience was speaking when that statement was made and that it is a fair statement of fact. I should like to read further from the report of the committee:

It would seem a far better solution—

And they have dealt with the idea of the family courts.

—to vest in the county courts concurrent jurisdiction with the supreme courts.

• (8:40 p.m.)

These courts have advantages over the superior courts for the disposal of local divorce cases. Their procedure is less involved and consequently less costly. County court judges are resident in county towns and their local offices and officials are readily available at all times. The judges can be easily reached when an order needs to be explained or varied and when additional provisions are required. Furthermore, county court judges are more familiar with the local circumstances and situation, as well as being more accessible, and consequently are in a better position to make helpful judgments.

These remarks were not just those of any individual speaking; they are the remarks of a whole group of experienced lawyers and other members on the committee, both from the Senate and from the House of Commons, who heard the evidence and looked into this matter and came to this serious conclusion. I think it is up to the minister to give a little better answer as to who advised him to change this particular conclusion. I want to assure him that the points made here are correct. County court judges are accessible in various parts of the country, and I think particularly of the province of Ontario. I ask the minister to consult the lawyers in his own party in this house, who have had experience in these matters. They will repeat exactly what I am saying at this particular time.

The minister sweeps aside lightly the question of costs, and I do not think it should be swept aside that lightly. The costs that are involved in this matter are going to be substantially lower in the county courts than they are in the supreme or superior courts. I cannot set an exact figure on this, but I suggest the difference lies somewhere between $200 or $300 for the average case in the county court, particularly if it is not opposed and there is a brief trial, and $600, $700 or $800 in the supreme court, again assuming that there is not a long trial. So we have the possibility here of cutting in half the costs, to litigants. Having this opportunity to cut this cost in half, why do we not avail ourselves of it by accepting that improvement which is recommended to us by the committee?

There is a lot more than this, and in respect of this matter I think the best witness we had before the committee, and I am a little prejudiced because he was a former partner of mine, was Mr. Justice McRuer, formerly chief justice of the high court of Ontario. In giving evidence before us he said this:

> Jurisdiction in regard to divorce is in the superior courts, in the supreme court of Ontario. Jurisdiction in regard to custody may be with the surrogate court, which is the county court judge, the supreme court judge, or it may be that a family court judge can make an order for custody.

He then said:

> I always felt awfully helpless in deciding a question of custody as a supreme court judge. I was very remote. I would go to Welland, and I would probably not be back in Welland again for five, six, or seven years. It is the same with other judges. We go on circuit, we go in and hear a case and we feel that we are not at the bottom of it at all, but we make an order for custody.

This evidence can be found in the proceedings of the divorce committee at page 597. Mr. Justice McRuer then went on to point out the complications when they are asked to review these matters of custody. They have to get in touch with the judge in the capital, in Toronto if the case is in Ontario, or elsewhere. He gave many illustrations of these difficulties.

The minister said something about not having to change this jurisdiction here in Ottawa, as the provinces can do this for themselves. I suggest that is not a good enough answer. If this parliament sets the jurisdiction in the superior court, I doubt very much if a province could do anything to shift it somewhere else. Let me read what Chief Justice McRuer told the committee—and the minister will find this at page 599 of the evidence, if he is interested. I do not know whether he has even looked into this. He mentioned the case in the Supreme Court of Canada and the British Columbia case, although I have forgotten the name. Chief Justice McRuer said:

> I would like to see in the first place a dominion act, in that it would be necessary for the dominion legislation to confer concurrent jurisdiction on the superior court and on the county court so far as Ontario is concerned. When you get to Quebec you do not have county courts, you only have the superior court there. In British Columbia they have been able to do this by provincial legislation. But I doubt very much if that could be done in Ontario, because the majority of the courts hinge around the history of the local judges of the supreme court, county court judges who are local judges of the supreme court.
> Mr. Justice Judson's judgment would probably go the whole way and Ontario could do it, but I think it is very dangerous. I think it ought to be done clearly by legislation of the dominion government, because 20 years from now the point might be raised that the divorce was not valid because the court did not have the jurisdiction in a case where inheritance or something of that sort was involved; you have to be very, very sure of your ground.

The chief justice was speaking here about the necessity of dominion legislation to clear up this question of the jurisdiction of county courts. The minister suggests we should let the provinces do this, but I ask him to listen to what the chief justice of this high court said. I would not be in the least surprised if the chief justice of this high court, with years of experience in this field, knew a little bit more than those presently advising the minister in this regard. I suggest we do not need to leave this matter in doubt.

There is one other point I want to make. The minister turned to the English procedure and he quoted from "Putting Asunder", the book I quoted from, and for which I have an extremely high regard; but the passage he quoted dealt with the situation in England, and the county court in the jurisdictional system in England bears little resemblance to those in Canada. In England they do not have the vast distances which make it inappropriate for supreme or superior court judges to be responsible for these matters. I remind the minister that under his own bill it is necessary for matters of custody and maintenance to be dealt with and varied, and I assure the minister that in practice this will create a real and actual complication, as well as injustices. If someone lives up in Port Arthur, for example, and has to send down to try to catch a judge who is in Toronto or on circuit somewhere else throughout the province, this becomes difficult.

The minister said, and I think he has a point, that perhaps some of the local county court judges for one reason or another may not be particularly suited to the very important function of dealing with these matters. If that is so, they should not be sitting at all.

The amendment moved by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka suggests concurrent jurisdiction. I know there are many points in regard to this matter on which I differ from the minister, and I do not expect him to pay very much attention to some of the changes I suggest. It would be difficult for him to do so, because the substance of the act is written down and he cannot be expected to back down on decisions that have been made by the government. However, in respect of this particular question of jurisdiction of the courts, he could make this bill far more acceptable throughout Canada if he listened to what he has been told today by experienced lawyers in every corner of the house. I hope that he will find some way to take a second look at this matter.

Mr. Trudeau: I have a very brief explanation, Mr. Chairman. I must say that in the very few instances where the government departed from the recommendations of the joint committee we did so only after great hesitation an consideration. In reply to the hon. member for Greenwood, who wants to know more about who advised me, I must say this is a cabinet decision. There are in the cabinet a great many lawyers who have had a lot of practical experience in the application of divorce law.

I do not think I need go beyond saying that this is a government decision, not a personal one. I must take exception to the phrase the hon. member for Greenwood used, to the effect that I swept lightly aside the question of cost. I am afraid the hon. member was swept aside by his own enthusiasm and lack of memory. I did explain that this question of cost was an important one, but, the government considered that the question of principle had to be dealt with first; and, in view of the fact that we were introducing divorce law that went way beyond any divorce law which had existed in Canada hitherto, we felt that this completely new concept of divorce, at least during the initial years, should be adjudicated by the high courts and not by the county courts.

The reason of substance is the one that was given in the report, "Putting Asunder". It is not here a question of distance so much as one of substantive law. It is of such a nature that it should be decided by the high courts at least during the early years. This was the first step taken by the government in terms of logic. Then it said: What is the consequence of this on costs? We realized that the costs question was not solved in the same way if the matter went to the high courts as if it went to the county courts. But we felt, as I explained this afternoon and this evening, that the question of costs is one that can be dealt with in another way. If, for reason of principles, we felt it should go to the high court, we decided we should follow our principles and that the question of costs could be decided in other ways, such as by consultation, as suggested by the hon. member for Halifax.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether it would help the minister if, because of the logic of the cabinet to which he has referred, there were added at the end of the proposed amendment, "provided, further, that such judges of county or district courts may exercise concurrent jurisdiction in any province upon the request of the lieutenant governor in council of that province"—in other words, take in the unanimous recommendation of the committee and make it a request of the province? I think this is frightfully important. We have had two expressions of opinion, plus the minister's response, but I have three other facts which I think must be injected into the debate.

This matter is really at the heart of, or is one of the real pedestals of divorce reform. The question has been asked whether it would mean a diminution of costs or less expense to the petitioner if there were county court jurisdiction in this matter. I think in honesty I would have to say, as a Nova Scotian lawyer, that we already have such differences in jurisdiction that the difference in cost is not a compelling factor; there would be less expense in county court, but not enough to justify the step that is being taken. However, I must point out to the committee that of some 470 divorce cases tried in Nova Scotian courts in the year 1966, there were 200 tried by county court judges exercising jurisdiction in the court for divorce and matrimonial causes, or the supreme court as it would be familiarly known here. That is almost 50 per cent of the cases.

So what is the logic of the cabinet decision going to do, if the minister does not accept the amendment? This logic would mean that for the next couple of years we will have amendments to the Judges Act every year so that an extra couple of judges could be appointed in Ontario, British Columbia, etc., because the burden would simply become greater on the supreme court judges. We know, if I may use the word, that a conservative estimate of the number of divorce cases in Canada is now around the 9,000 mark per year and that this number will double at least for the next couple of years, throwing a burden on the courts that will be extraordinarily difficult to meet.

In Nova Scotia, even with the judges of the supreme court, and 11 of the 12 county court judges working on divorce cases, it will mean a tremendous load for them. But for other provinces where the county or district courts have no say at all, I would say the burden would become insuperable.

There is the point about readier access to judges. I talked to a lawyer in Truro, Nova Scotia, tonight. Truro is 60 miles from Halifax. Lawyers and their clients, one would think, could drive from Truro to Halifax to have their cases tried. But this lawyer said: Would you impress upon the House of Commons the fact that having our county court judges deal with divorce cases in Truro is, even though it is close to Halifax, a tremendous boon to parties because they would have to wait for a circuit judge to come to Truro or go to Halifax at some convenient time. When dealing with mileage and people losing half a day or a day's pay in order to be a witness, you are dealing with factors that are in my opinion pretty considerable. This is another reason why the county court approach commends itself.

Others have mentioned this matter but I think it should be banged home over and over again, as I did on second reading. The very first time I saw the bill it struck me as extraordinary that under clause 8 the judge must lean over and face the petitioner, respondent or both and say: Is there any chance that you can come together and give up seeking this divorce? One of them might say yes, and the dear old soul would then say: We will postpone this hearing for 14 days to give you a chance of reconciliation. And off he goes. As has been pointed out, he goes on circuit and it may take years and years to catch up with him.

What will be the effect of this provision? As a lawyer I have a duty imposed on me, when people come into my office, to say: Is there any hope that this marriage can be saved? I am sure other lawyers do this as well. Under another clause of the bill you are supposed to give them certain advice. There will come a point early in the proceedings when the lawyer will have to say: "Madam petitioner, the judge will ask you whether there is any hope of reconciliation. I can advise you, my client, that if you say yes at that point your case will have gone for at least 14 days and you may never catch up with it again, or at least for months and months or years and years.

These are pretty considerable factors. I do not care what happened in 1912 in the Gorell committee. There was a different form of legal values then. We are talking of the here and now, and the unanimous recommendation of a divorce committee of both houses of parliament. If we are really serious about cutting costs for people, the amendment of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, commendable as it is and as much as I support it, will not be enough; we should have the guts to get down to a better administrative, more workable approach.

In any event, Mr. Chairman, let us deal with the here and now and arrive at the most practical measure possible. I suggest to the minister that if he does not like the amendment of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka perhaps he would consider it with these extras added:

> Provided, further, that such judges of county or district courts may exercise concurrent jurisdiction in any province upon the request of the lieutenant governor in council of that province.

I so move, Mr. Chairman.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I am quite happy to accept the amendment to my amendment.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, while the table is getting things in order perhaps I may say a few words, not to meet the substance of the argument, once again, because I think the issue is joined, but because I would not want certain misconceptions to go about.

The difficulties mentioned by some hon. members are real of course, but they must not be exaggerated. I have heard it said on different occasions that it is sometimes necessary to wait six months or a year for some superior courts in certain provinces to reconvene. That is not a real objection because the rules of a court can be changed. If a court decides that attempts should be made at a reconciliation, after which it adjourns for 14 days so that all the evidence may be brought in, in view of the fact that the evidence has not been heard and the issue not yet solved, the court can be deemed not to have been seized of the case. In the event that it has been seized of it, the rules of the court could easily provide that the file be transferred to another judge coming to that city at a later period.

Let me say one final word with regard to the matter of costs. If the house wants to deal with the question of costs, I think it is possible to write into the law that no costs would be involved. This is done in the criminal law which is under federal jurisdiction. I think that under the constitution it would be possible to write into the law that no costs will be involved and that the divorce will be granted at the expense of the state. We may be prepared to accept this at a later stage. The point I am trying to make is that in this bill we are trying to settle primarily the question of principle. Although the matter of costs is an important one to us, I believe it can be solved by means other than the ones indicated in the amendments that have been moved.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The question is on the subamendment. Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I will have to speak in explanation of the manner in which I shall be casting my vote. As desirable as it may be for other reasons, I will have to vote against the subamendment and will probably find myself for the first time in my career here on the same side as hon. members opposite, although it is certainly not by choice. I may explain to my hon. friend from Halifax that my reason for voting against the subamendment is that the divorce courts in the Yukon have a separate and distinct jurisdiction. We have no county or district court and we have no lieutenant governor in council. The subamendment would therefore be absolutely meaningless to us at the present time.

The Minister of Justice has asked the council for their views with regard to the transfer of the administration of justice, which would be a great step forward in constitutional reform if anything comes of it, and I hope it will. However, in the meantime, since the subamendment will be meaningless to the Yukon jurisdiction, and I dare say the the same applies to the Northwest Territories, I must oppose the subamendment. It would be harmful in that the amendment could be made applicable to the jurisdiction in the Yukon if, for instance, power were given to the commissioner instead of to the lieutenant governor in council.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. McCleave) negatived: Yeas, 46; nays, 67.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I declare the subamendment lost.

Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Amendment (Mr. Aiken) negatived: Yeas, 49; nays, 66.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of delaying the final decision on this clause, but I want to put directly and immediately before the minister the very issue upon which he himself has alleged this matter could be settled.

He has said that immediately the bill is passed he intends to consult with the provinces, and that as a result of these consultations the legislation may have to be adjusted. If I may, I should like to give the minister full freedom of action to make the necessary adjustments after he has had these consultations. Therefore I propose to move——that clause 2(e) be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words: "Provided, however, that in any province or territory having county or district courts, the governor in council, upon petition of the lieutenant governor in council of such province, or of a territorial council, may order that such county or district courts shall have jurisdiction in such province or territory equally and concurrently with the court of such province or territory hereinbefore mentioned.

And provided further that, on the application of any party thereto, an action for dissolution and ancillary relief commenced in the county or district court shall be transferred to the court hereinbefore specified.

This is a very simple amendment. It gives to the governor in council full freedom of action in any particular province, if the lieutenant governor should ask for the authority to be invested in the county or district court. In the territories, it gives that right of request to the territorial councils. The provincial executive council or the territorial council is closest to the people and best able to decide the appropriate tribunal. I think the minister can accept this amendment and it would be a real contribution to getting the legislation through this chamber.

Mr. Fulton: I will not have very much to say about this bill, Mr. Chairman, because, as will be understood, I am not deeply exercised about the widening of civil grounds for divorce. But I do suggest to the minister that he should carefully consider the amendment moved by the hon. member for Carleton, because what does concern me about this bill is the potentially great increase in cases that will come before our courts. I believe that what the Minister of Justice should consider is whether he will find that, having passed this bill, there should occur a log jam in the superior courts of this country.

I am seriously concerned that this may be the case, and therefore I commend to the minister the consideration of this amendment which gives to the lieutenant governor of a province or the territorial council the opportunity, if they find the superior courts becoming over-burdened with petitions for divorce, to petition the governor in council of Canada to relieve against that situation.

The governor in council would then have the right to say, on that petition, that county and district courts may exercise concurrent jurisdiction. The result of the passage of this amendment would not be to deprive the superior courts of jurisdiction, but rather to confer concurrent jurisdiction on county and district courts. I do know the minister must be concerned with the expeditious disposition of cases. However, this amendment does not do violence to any principle which he or the cabinet may have had in mind in settling jurisprudence, but rather gives flexibility to the disposition of cases, which may well be found to be necessary if we are not to have the whole administration of justice bogged down with the burden of petitions from which burden relief could not otherwise be given.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am not a lawyer and therefore I am not familiar with all the ramifications the Minister of Justice has indicated are involved in the consideration of this principle. It seems to me the proposition is a fairly simple one. We are going to have a backlog of cases as the previous speaker mentioned. The Canadian Bar Association says 500,000 people are involved, and this may represent 250,000 cases being brought before the courts in the next ten years. This will probably be equal to the number of cases being heard by the courts previously. The minister raised an objection which in my opinion indicated that a number of judges of the country courts have been appointed who are incompetent, perhaps a far larger number than we are aware. This of course indicates that the patronage system we use to appoint judges is not a good one. I believe this is the only reason the minister has given for his objection to this procedure.

The minister said the decision with regard to giving jurisdiction to superior courts was a cabinet decision. I am sure they did not say they had to limit it to superior courts. No doubt the cabinet did say they would have to put these matters into courts where they would not get out of hand. I believe this statement illustrates the incompetence of county and district courts. This may be true, and if it is, then the 250,000 litigants who will be involved in divorce matters should not be foisted off on these lower courts.

The next matter of concern, of course, is costs. Then, too, on sundry occasions lawyers are always willing to bandy about that old phrase, "Justice delayed is justice denied". I know from my own limited experience there are cases now coming before the Supreme Court of Ontario which date back two years and which have not been heard as yet. If you ask about these cases you are told the judge has not had time to reach them. If you write the judge, he says the case was not on his docket and therefore the lawyer is to blame. If you ask the bar association they will say, "A plague on both your houses". The person making the inquiry is never sure who is to blame. He changes lawyers, tries again and the delay is continued.

I believe the minister should have a better argument than saying to the people of Canada or to members of parliament that this act is going to be so difficult to administer that only superior courts of the provinces are going to be able to handle it. We are not going to be faced with so many new divorce actions; but there have been many divorce actions pending the passage of this legislation. I am surprised at members on the other side. These are the members who stood up and said, "Let us not rush things", when this subject was before us two or three years ago. They should decide not to be sheep, and should take unto themselves the right which the Prime Minister gave on other occasions when moral matters were involved. This is a moral matter. Many people are waiting for relief from situations which developed through no fault of their own, and this legislation will grant them some relief. It seems to me we have an obligation to see that they get their case before the courts as soon as possible, with as little cost as possible.

I am sure the minister is not prepared to come back to parliament and ask us to double the number of supreme court judges in any province. I suggest, too, that no negotiations take place in the back room between the minister and the attorney general of a province. We should decide here to give jurisdiction to county and district courts. Surely we will be able to make our legislation and regulations simple enough that even some of these judges who may be incompetent will be able to understand them. If we cannot, then this is a sad reflection on the type of judiciary we have at the junior level, and who appear before John Q. Public at all times. They should be able to understand what appears to me to be a fairly simply bill. We have to decide what the grounds of divorce are and what the regulations will be, but I do not think it is stretching the imagination too far to suggest that most county and district court judges are competent to handle the provisions of a simple bill.

If hon. members opposite are going to wait five years before making this decision, then the responsibility will be on their shoulders. I remember I carried on my shoulders the responsibility for delaying divorce actions, which these same hon. members said at the time should receive free and easy passage. In this case I would suggest they question their moral justification for their present stand.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take very much time. The hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Carleton presented very able arguments to the minister, and I suggest it is possible that unless the amendment is accepted there will be a huge backlog of cases before long.

There is one question about which there is no argument, and that is that leaving jurisdiction in this matter entirely within the superior courts will increase the cost of divorce. I am astonished at the attitude taken by the minister and the hon. member for Fort William who have always been noted for their humanitarian interest in such matters. They are supporting, in effect, a piece of legislation which provides one law for the rich and another law for the poor.

I would appeal to the minister to reconsider this matter. This is not a piece of political legislation but something that every member of the house is anxious to expedite and approve, Although we never attribute motives to members of this house it seemed to me that the minister gave the appearance of ministers in the "good old days" of the Liberal party who regarded any suggestion coming from the other side of the house as unworthy of any merit.

I appeal to the minister to take a leaf from the book of the former minister of transport who, when dealing with a very detailed and complex bill in this house last session, accepted no less than 70-odd amendments. The amendment moved this evening was put forward in good faith by members of the house who have had a great deal of experience in the practice of law. It is moved for no other purpose than to try to improve the bill.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the minister and his colleagues not just to dig in their heels and lay their ears back simply because someone on this side has made a suggestion. I ask that they give it consideration and not support what is, in effect, one law which will favour the "cocktail set", making divorce easy for them, while making divorce not so easy and more expensive for others.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the intent of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Carleton and with some of the reasons given by the hon. member for Kamloops for giving the provinces an element of choice here. The administration of justice is mainly a provincial matter, and the problem will arise, of course, that there will be a greater number of divorce cases in the provincial courts. Indeed that is the very purpose of the bill. Even if the hon. member for Kamloops is not over-enthusiastic about enlarging the grounds for divorce, he has no objection to our doing so. Inevitably the number of cases in the courts will increase.

The question is, which courts will try these cases, the county courts or the superior courts? Whether it be one or the other there will inevitably be congestion. It does not seem preferable a priori to congest one court rather than another; the result in either case will be—

Mr. Lewis: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Trudeau: May I just finish my remarks. I do have difficulty making sure that my final phrase fits in with the first phrase, but when I have finished my sentence I will permit the question.

I was saying that the congestion will be in one court or the other. Inevitably the provincial legislatures will have to move to increase the number of judges at one level or the other. I would suggest to the hon. member for Timiskaming that it is a question for the provinces, as he well knows, to increase the number of courts in the provinces through their own legislation. All we do federally is to fill the vacancies.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the minister is missing something. Is it not true that if both levels of court are given concurrent jurisdiction, and there are in Ontario about 50 county courts—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Actually 65.

Mr. Lewis: Yes, 65 county and district court judges, plus 20 supreme court judges, all with concurrent jurisdiction, then the likelihood is that the congestion will be spread over a much wider area. This surely is of value to the courts.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member's question is really leading me to the second point that I was going to make anyway, a point I have made over and over again. We are giving the provinces a choice. We are saying that divorce is a high court matter and we are putting this into the law. But we are going on to say that if a province wants to provide for additional local judicial officers of the high court, to which county court judges can be appointed, then it can do so. But it will do so by provincial legislation, rather than by order in council as suggested by the amendment. However, the result is the same. The province can take action in one way or the other and decide for itself where the congestion is going to be.

If there is going to be congestion, then this can only be eased by an increase in the number of judges. Surely the situation cannot be met by shifting judges from one level to the other; more judges will have to be appointed either to the one court or the other.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, may I repeat that the decision is a provincial one. The federal government is not deciding that there is to be a distinction made between the high court and the county court. I do not think the argument about one jurisdiction for the rich and another for the poor should be addressed to me. If a province wishes, it can place all its courts on the same level. This is the case in the province of Quebec and also in the territories. The distinction between the county and the high court is not one of our creation. It falls within the administration of justice in a particular province.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get into a long argument on this question with the minister, but it is a fact that in some provinces in this country, Ontario for example, there are 65—as somebody said—county court judges permanently sitting in county towns, many of whom are not overburdened with work. On the other side of the picture there are 20 supreme court judges who go on circuit, and in some county towns stay for only a week or two weeks at a time.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Two days.

Mr. Brewin: It is for two days, as the hon. member for Carleton has said. I accept his amendment. In any event, whether it is two days or two weeks the fact of the matter is that often high court judges must deal with important criminal matters, murder trials and similar matters, and often they are not able to deal with divorces.

Really, I think the hon. member for Carleton has suggested a sort of compromise which ought to appeal to the minister. The minister said that the decision of cabinet was involved here. I do not know how deeply the cabinet looked into this matter, but I do know how deeply the committee on divorce looked into it and the unanimous conclusion they arrived at.

If this is a matter of cabinet decision and if what I say is true, that the legislation will not work this way and that there will be much congestion of cases on supreme court lists, then the amendment of the hon. member for Carleton, that the governor in council should take authority to direct that some cases go before county courts, should be accepted. I never saw such reluctance on the part of the governor in council to take unto himself additional powers. Usually the reverse is the case.

This is not a partisan matter. Because some of us see with great clarity the difficulty that this legislation will cause, we plead with the minister to accept this solution to the impasse we are in. It is all very well for the minister to say that he is concerned about costs. Traditionally, the county courts are the cheap or low priced forms of administering justice, and the superior or supreme courts are the high priced forms of administering justice. Some can afford to go to the high courts to have their matter decided, but those who are concerned with family and personal relationships are not the sorts of people who can afford to go to the higher and more expensive courts.

Amendment (Mr. Bell, Carleton) negatived: yeas, 50; nays, 63.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 2 carry?

An hon. Member: On division.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Grounds.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I introduced an amendment to clause 3. I will not discuss it at great length, but it deals with the basic question of the principle that is before the house.

The amendment that I now propose would base the law of divorce on the marriage breakdown approach. I spoke about this on the resolution stage and on second reading. Several members in the house, including the hon. members for Peace River, Royal, Parry Sound-Muskoka and others have also spoken about this.

I know that the minister will not accept my amendment. Quite frankly, I do not see how he could accept it because he has argued vigorously and at length that he is not prepared to do so. Nevertheless I propose to put this amendment before the committee in order that the principles that are involved may be made clear.

The principle is this. In the view of some of us it is necessary to change the whole approach to divorce. Divorce ought to be based not on a procedure of accusation, not on a determination of which of the parties is guilty or innocent, but on a finding of whether the marriage is dead. This is the basic principle I wish to make clear.

The minister spoke about this matter and said, that, although it might be a nice idea, it was totally impracticable. I do not agree with him; I think it is perfectly practicable. The Mortimer commission, according to the archbishop's committee, spoke about the pure form of breakdown. The minister said that that would have no application under this bill. He said that if we accepted the pure form of breakdown we should become involved in an inquisitorial form of procedure. What I propose in my amendment is the following. I would move:

> That section 3 of the bill C-187 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> (1) A petition for divorce may be presented to a court by a husband or wife on the ground that a marriage has irretrievably broken down and that there is no reasonable likelihood of reconciliation.

That is the basic amendment that I propose. It substitutes the one matter of marriage breakdown for all the concepts of matrimonial fault, all the rigmarole of collusion, connivance, condonation and the phony adultery trials. That is all the courts would need to determine. The minister said, after quoting the British report, that adopting the marriage breakdown concept would entail an inquisition into a marriage, in every case. I recognize that problem and for that reason I include subclause 2, as follows:

> (2) Where the parties have lived separate and apart for a period of not less than three years, then it shall be prima facie presumed that the marriage has irretrievably broken down and that there is no reasonable likelihood of reconciliation.

The minister might say that that is not the pure form of breakdown. I am not interested in purity; I am interested in something that will work. At the end of a lenghty separation—I do not care whether it is three years or five years, or whatever the period is—the court would be entitled to presume the breakdown of the marriage.

There would then, under those circumstances, be no need for lengthy inquests or difficult inquiries. As a matter of fact it might not be much more difficult than it is today to go through these hotel and motel trials that we have had. With respect to the third subclause in my amendment, it reads:

> (3) The court may refuse to grant a decree of dissolution of the marriage if it is satisfied that to grant a decree might prove unduly harsh and repressive to the respondent.

The reason I include that is that it is possible to conceive of a case in which a person has behaved very badly and that person might seek a divorce, but the courts might think it a hardship on the wife to grant the divorce. Therefore Mr. Chairman, I will move that clause 3 be amended, and my amendment be substituted for it. If this amendment were adopted—and I am not over optimistic that I can suddenly persuade the solid phalanxes of the government to agree with me at this stage of the day—then clauses 4, 7, 8 and 9 of the bill would not be necessary.

This is a new concept, a concept supported by the churches, a concept put before our committee and which we think makes sense. It bypasses the old method of doing things. It bypasses 30 years of English experience of doing things, and I suggest puts the matter on a more fruitful and sounder basis. The object of divorce legislation should be to provide that where the marriage tie no longer represents a reality, where the marriage is completely dead, and when it no longer serves the purpose of marriage, which is the life-long living together of a man and a woman, then the law shall determine that the marriage is at an end. It has been suggested that I should read this amendment again, Mr. Chairman. I am perfectly willing to do so. I shall read it in English and perhaps you, Mr. Chairman, might read it in French. I move:

That section 3 of Bill C-187 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"3. (1) A petition for divorce may be presented to a court by a husband or wife on the ground that a marriage has irretrievably broken down and that there is no reasonable likelihood of reconciliation.

(2) Where the parties have lived separate and apart for a period of not less than three years, then it shall be prima facie presumed that the marriage has irretrievably broken down and that there is no reasonable likelihood of reconciliation.

(3) The court may refuse to grant a decree of dissolution of the marriage if it is satisfied that to grant a decree might prove unduly harsh and repressive to the respondent."

As I have mentioned, if this amendment were adopted it would also replace clauses 4, 7, 8 and 9 of the bill.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Greenwood is correct when he says that there is not very much chance of this reform finding favour with parliament, but as one who had the privilege of seconding the hon. member's earlier bill, which would have brought this new concept into play, I want to be on record as supporting it. Some people, when they consider the marriage breakdown concept, rather sneeringly consider it to be woolly headed. I rather prefer to think of it as really a much clearer concept than that envisaged by the somewhat lengthy bill presented to us by the minister.

Of course the minister, and I said so earlier today, is entitled to credit, as is the government and I hope so will be parliament, for a reform. But I think it is well to remind ourselves that reform is a relative thing. Many jurisdictions have long since amended their divorce legislation. As the hon. member for Greenwood has said, we have the 30 years experience of the United Kingdom to guide us and they are about to adopt, I am quite satisfied, the marriage breakdown theory.

I hoped that I would have been part of a parliament that could have been a real pioneer in the matter of the reform of divorce laws. But apparently parliament—or perhaps it is Canadians, although I think I would rather restrict this to parliament at this stage—is not brave enough to break really new ground in this field. Perhaps parliament, to quote a well known statesman, is too timid to excite the daring.

The Montreal Star in an editorial on December 11 had this to say about the present bill, under the heading "Divorce Compromise":

Where the bill falls short of social need is in its attempt to define marriage breakdown, to set limits within which a broken marriage must fall before a court can say that breakdown is irrevocable. Breakdown is a matter of fact in the individual case. If the fact is established to the satisfaction of the court, then the court should be empowered to grant a divorce.

It had been my hope that this parliament would have seen fit to accept this major reform.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think it will be understood by the committee that as far as we on this side of the chamber are concerned, that is in the official opposition, while we have been prepared to support the bill on second reading—in other words, while we have been prepared to see a reform in the laws of divorce because we recognize that the present legal situation, to put it mildly, is far from satisfactory—yet from that point on, there is some difference of opinion on this side. For instance, I find myself now under the necessity of disagreeing with those on this side, not only some of my own colleagues but the hon. member for Greenwood, who would seek to make the marriage breakdown theory the only ground for divorce.

I respect the point of view of my colleagues who feel this way, but I would like to suggest to them that, whether they realize it or not, what they would be doing is stacking the cards against marriage. In my view the cards, if they are going to be stacked at all, should be stacked the other way, that is, that the presumption should be that a contract of marriage, properly solemnized by either a civil or religious ceremony, or a combination of the two, is a contract for life. There are family obligations which arise out of that contract which are not within the competence—

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Prittie: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: —of the parties to that contract to dispose of by their purely voluntary act. The parties having entered into a contract of that nature by their voluntary act, have yet assumed obligations which they cannot voluntarily dispose of. That is my approach to this question.

I think therefore that in approaching this matter of the grounds upon which the marriage may be dissolved there should be clear, distinct and somewhat narrow grounds. As I have said I personally share the point of view which says that one's own religious convictions should not be imposed on the rest of society: Therefore, with some difficulty I go along with this bill. But when someone suggests what to me seems to be an attack upon the whole idea of the sanctity of marriage as a contract with all its consequences, then I find that I must disengage myself from the point of view which relies upon this concept of the breakdown of marriage as being too careless a basis upon which to say that the marriage contract may be dissolved.

Mr. Prittie: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Prittie: Does the hon. member think that a person such as the Archbishop of Canterbury would be party to an idea that would be against the institution of marriage?

Mr. Fulton: I am not aware that the Archbishop of Canterbury is taking part in this debate.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a very few remarks in respect of this amendment. In the first place I should like to clarify something that did not seem to come out right. On Friday when speaking in the house I suggested there were several shortcomings in the bill and suggested also that amendments would be moved. Some reports indicated that I would be moving an amendment to incorporate marriage breakdown on behalf of this party. I do not think this is what I said, but I can understand that some mistake might have been made because I was not sufficiently specific.

When I attended the meetings of the committee I was much impressed with the good sense of having one uniform law of divorce in Canada. At this time, in this bill, we have two opposing theories. We have the theory of the marital offence in which the cause matters. Then we have the theory of the marriage breakdown in which the cause does not matter. These two are opposite; they are both contained in the same bill and I have the feeling this will be self-destructive so far as this bill being effective is concerned, and so far as making up a jurisprudence in Canada is concerned. I do not intend to repeat the argument I made on second reading. I do not think the minister was quite fair in his assessment of what marriage breakdown as proposed to the committee actually meant.

I should like to point out to him that subclause (1) (e) of clause 4 actually includes a good part of what I consider the marriage breakdown theory to be, except that clause (e) provides no safeguards whatsoever. Personally I should not like to see the basis of marriage breakdown being made easier. I should like to see it made more difficult. Subclause (e) says that a divorce can be granted if the spouses have been living separate and apart for any reason for a period of not less than three years. There is marriage breakdown in a nutshell. However, it does not have the safeguards which were included in the bill which the committee recommended.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I have in mind seeking a means to sit until eleven o'clock. If you agree, I would ask that the committee rise and report progress.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved:

That pursuant to section (6) of standing order 6 this sitting be extended until eleven o'clock this day or until consideration of Bill No. C-187 in committee of the whole be completed, whichever shall be the earlier of these two eventualities.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Cowan: I object.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the fact that there are fewer than ten members who have risen in support of the hon. member, the motion is deemed to be carried.

Motion agreed to.

DIVORCE

MEASURE RESPECTING GROUNDS, JURISDICTION, JUDGES, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-187, respecting divorce—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose, clause 3 was being discussed and the amendment thereto by Mr. Brewin. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make this one point, so that it will be clear why I think this bill is incomplete and why I believe one idea of the marriage breakdown theory would be acceptable. Here we have in the bill under subclause (e) what in effect is a marriage breakdown clause. It merely provides for divorce if the parties have been living separate for three years. The report of the joint committee and the opinion of most people who are in favour of the marriage breakdown theory in Canada is to the effect that this must be hedged about by some safeguards, and that it is not good enough just to create a ground for divorce and call a marriage breakdown a cause for a divorce. This is not good enough.

The recommendation of the joint committee was that, in addition to what is in this bill, the court must find, before it can grant a divorce, first, that the marriage is permanently finished; second, that every reasonable effort at reconciliation has failed; third, that there is no likelihood of the situation improving in the future; fourth, that the question of due care and maintenance of the children is settled; fifth, that no public interest is affected and, finally, that no undue hardship on the other spouse will result.

That is what the special joint committee recommended, and if the present bill had those safeguards and everything else was eliminated but clause 4 (1)(e), we would have a reasonably acceptable marriage breakdown bill. What we have is a marriage breakdown ground without the safeguards. The safeguards are not there, and it is my opinion that what I propose, which is in essence contained in the amendment, should be included. If you are going to allow a divorce merely after three years separation the least you can do is make sure you have a perfectly valid case, that the marriage is at an end, that efforts have been made to restore it and every other provision has been satisfied in favour of separating two people. This is what I say is wrong with this bill and why I am in favour of a limited marriage breakdown proposal.

The minister did, as he stated in his own words, go a long way toward what I consider the ground of marriage breakdown. In fact, I think he went so far he could have eliminated the rest of his bill and left this one provision in, and have a good marriage breakdown bill by adding the safeguards I would put in.

Mr. Trudeau: Would the hon. member not think that these safeguards are contained in the clause on reconciliation and in clause 9 in respect of the additional duties of the court?

Mr. Aiken: No, I do not, and that is my objection. As has already been said, there is no requirement on the court to hear any witness, or any evidence that there has been any effort at reconciliation. All the court has to do is ask the petitioner whether there is any likelihood of reconciliation. If the petitioner says no, that is the end of the reconciliation procedure. There are a lot of provisions in there as to what will happen if the petitioner or the respondent says there is hope of reconciliation, but what counsel or petitioner is going to go into court with the intention of losing his case? If the petitioner goes into court with the intention of saying to the judge, yes, we can get together, then why bother because the case is either going to be adjourned, set aside for reconciliation proceedings or dismissed. I have never heard of anybody going into court with a losing case, and that is exactly what he would be doing.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): You mean with the intention of losing.

Mr. Aiken: I accept the correction. They do not go in with the intention of losing the case. It is not a requirement of the bill that inquiries be made as to whether a social worker, the Children's Aid Society, a clergyman or anybody else has worked on the case or that they should be called before the court. I think it should be required that someone be called in to say they have been involved in the matrimonial dispute and have tried to effect reconciliation. Therefore I believe that this reconciliation procedure is a waste of effort.

Mr. Trudeau: The court can nominate a conciliator without consent of the parties.

Mr. Aiken: I agree, and that puts us right back to the question as to what control the judge is going to have. What judge is going to waste his time if all he is required to do is ask the question? He is not going to waste his time having counsel chase him all over the province to follow up on reconciliation procedures. That is what is wrong with this, and why the county court should have jurisdiction.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I do not want unduly to delay the passage of this bill in the committee, and I did not enter the debate on second reading for that reason, but I should like as briefly as possible to put on the record my feelings about hon. members' suggestions. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka very logically brought out in respect of the marriage breakdown concept the very reasons for my opposition to it.

I know it has been said in the house and reported in the press that this concept that was placed before the committee, of which I did not have the honour to be a member, was a modern, progressive theory of divorce reform that we should adopt, namely the theory of marriage breakdown. The amendment of the hon. member for Greenwood that is before the committee is to strike out all the specific causes and all the marital offence clauses and simply substitute the concept of marriage breakdown.

The reason I oppose this amendment is that I think it would make divorce a great deal harder to obtain in this country than will be the case under the bill as it now stands. It seems to me that the amendment before us could run the risk of leading to a situation where it would be almost impossible to prove before a judge that the marriage had in fact broken down.

The requirements of proof under the amendment are that the marriage has irretrievably broken down and there is no reasonable likelihood of reconciliation. I can imagine judges in my own jurisdiction, and without making any invidious references at all I can well imagine judges in the province of Quebec, for example, before whom it would be virtually impossible for petitioners to prove that the marriage had irretrievably broken down and that there was no reasonable likelihood of reconciling the parties.

It seems to me that petitioners before the courts have a right to divorce on the grounds enumerated in clause 3, and they should not have to prove to the court that the marriage had broken down because one of those offences has been committed and there was no chance of reconciling it. I believe that if one spouse has committed adultery, the other spouse has the right, as a matter of freedom of choice, to decide whether he or she should go to court and ask for a dissolution of the marriage. It seems to me that if one spouse has committed bigamy, the other spouse should have the right to go before the courts and, after proving the first marriage, the second marriage and the identity of the parties, obtain a divorce on the ground of bigamy.

One could deal with all the specific grounds of clause 3 which the amendment seeks to strike out. In my view the people who are concerned, those who become involved in marital situations, should have the right to go to court and ask for a dissolution of their marriage on these grounds. To pass this amendment, and require them to go through the difficulty of proof that I can envisage in the amendment, would make it extremely difficult in some jurisdictions to obtain a divorce and would, I suggest, lead to an extremely costly procedure for the parties involved.

A moment ago I mentioned the question of bigamy. It seems to me that if someone has the right to a divorce or dissolution of his or her marriage on the ground of bigamy, it is a fairly simple procedure to prove the first and second marriages and the identities of the parties involved. But if this amendment were accepted, a person whose spouse had committed adultery would have to go to court and prove something far more difficult, first that the marriage had irretrievably broken down, and second that there was no reasonable likelihood of reconciliation.

I believe that there are in this country judges who, in spite of the fact that one's spouse had committed bigamy, would still say: You should go to a couple of psychiatrists and see if you cannot work out your problems and keep this marriage alive.

Divorce Law Reform

• (10:10 p.m.)

It seems to me that the people of this country should have the right to dissolve their marriages on the grounds set out in clause 3. This is a right which they should be free to exercise of their own free will, and we should not take it away from them.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak for more than a few minutes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brewin: I knew I would get applause for that statement. However, I do want to comment on what was said by the hon. member for Kamloops. I am not sure I have his exact words but I think he said that the concept of marriage breakdown would strike at the sanctity of marriage. I want to take exception to that point of view. I may be wrong, and we are all entitled to our own opinion on this matter, but the fact of the matter is that this proposal was put before the divorce committee first of all by the United Church, second it was fully supported by the Anglican Church of Canada, and third, it is in line with the report made by a group of churchmen appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The point they made is that the breakdown theory is more consonant with what I would call a Christian or a religious concept of marriage. I agree that we in parliament must not necessarily try, and the church does not ask us, to enforce a view of marriage which is consistent with the religious view.

The church recognizes that we are legislating for the community as a whole, but they made it very clear that in their view a secular divorce law based upon breakdown would do more honour to the principle of marriage as a lifelong union than would a divorce law based upon the so-called matrimonial misconduct.

This, in a sense, meets what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has said. He is perfectly right, the marriage breakdown concept would make it harder for some people to get a divorce. It would certainly mean that perhaps in cases of a casual act of adultery the courts would have to inquire whether or not there is a possibility of reconciliation. So in some cases it might narrow the opportunity for obtaining a divorce. On the other hand it would broaden the opportunity for obtaining a divorce to include all other cases in which the marriage in fact was found to be dead and there was no likelihood of the parties getting together. So in some respects this concept narrows down the possibility of obtaining a divorce and in other respects it broadens it, but it is a new and a different concept.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a few words on this matter as an Anglican who differs from my friend from Greenwood and also from the Rev. E. S. Reed, Bishop of Ottawa, and other Anglicans who presented evidence before the committee. I can tell these hon. gentlemen that they did not represent many Anglicans in this country when they made their representations before the committee, although I am sure they made them in good faith and with the best intentions.

I should like to read briefly from page 119 of the report dealing with grounds for divorce. It reads as follows:

> The commission points out that not only would trial procedure be more painful to the parties, but it would be considerably more extensive in the time and space it would occupy. If all cases were to be inquired into, trials would inevitably be longer. The vast majority of cases at present are undefended and therefore can be dealt with both swiftly and without complications. The proposed system would necessitate more courts, more judges, and, most essential, the new procedure would require large numbers of trained investigators and social workers to assist the court. All this would be extremely expensive and would have to be paid for largely by the taxpayer, although it would no doubt be reflected in higher cost of divorce to the parties as well. Far from making divorces simpler and cheaper, it might well have the opposite effect.

I want to say in this connection that I have had some discussions with members of the committee and members of the other place who are very well versed on this problem, because I was somewhat concerned about various proposals put forward to establish the breakdown of marriage as the only ground for divorce.

As I said before, I talked to some members of the committee and some members of the other place who are well informed on the subject. They told me that if this section were implemented a certain amount of snooping would be involved into the private affairs of individuals. I must say I take a very dim view of any procedure that would entail this sort of thing. I base my stand on an experience I had some years ago, and I am going to cite that experience.

A lady I knew of impeccable character, whose husband had left her, was in receipt of relief owing to her unfortunate circumstances. The social welfare worker, who at that time had no training, called on the neighbours to enquire if this lady was living a good moral life. Two or three of the ladies informed her they had seen a man's laundry on the clothesline. The lady from the welfare agency searched the house and found a box of man's laundry. This laundry had been done by the lady out of the goodness of her heart for an old gentleman who was in poor circumstances. As a result of this snooping, the lady in question was promptly denied her welfare payments. The whole village, who knew the lady very well, was in an uproar and she finally got her welfare payments back because of the indignation of many good Anglicans and other church people in the district.

I was told by these gentlemen in the other place that if we have the breakdown theory incorporated in the bill, as suggested by some members on this side of the house,—and I fully appreciate their sincerity,—it would involve some snooping on the part of social welfare workers, probably at the corner grocery store, to find out how the people were getting on together. If I am incorrect in my understanding, I should like the minister to explain the meaning of this amendment before we conclude debate on this section. I am one who is very concerned about that sort of thing in every aspect of life because I believe in the rights of the individual.

In conclusion, I want to say a word or two about the concluding paragraph of this report which appears on page 122. It reads:

> The real problem with this simplified version of the marriage breakdown theory is an extremely basic one. How long a period of separation should be required before a husband or wife can ask the courts for a divorce? The witnesses proposing the inclusion of separation as a grounds for divorce in some system or another, have suggested various periods of time ranging from two to seven years. Similarly, the Mortimer group in England thought three years; the members of the English Royal Commission on Marriage and Divorce (1951-1955) believed seven years to be a reasonable time. If the period chosen is too short, the parties might rush into a divorce without having time to recover from either a violent matrimonial quarrel or a passing affair or infatuation. Nor might they have time to consider whether the difficulties in their marriage were capable of solution.
> On the other hand, if the period is a relatively long one, say three years, what becomes of those who presently can obtain divorces on the ground of outrageous conduct by their spouse? Must they have to wait three years? It seems unlikely that a period could be agreed that would render justice to all parties in both categories. Therefore, it does not seem possible that breakdown could constitute the sole and comprehensive ground.

I accept that statement.

> If the period of separation is to be more than six months, then it can only offer a practical solution if it is coupled with other grounds which would provide more rapid relief. This is not to reject marriage breakdown ideas completely. Far from it. The introduction of it through the ground of separation is discussed in the following section of the report.

I just want to say there is no question but that the introduction of this bill is a great step forward toward the curing of growing social difficulties in Canada. We give the minister credit for that. I suggest we should get experience from the application of this bill and as a result of that experience on the part of the federal and provincial governments as well as the courts, we can come to some conclusions which would make it easier to amend this act, with all respect for the marriage ties.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Amendment (Mr. Brewin) negatived: Yeas, 15; nays, 73.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon on second reading I raised certain questions about the thinking of the government on the introduction of a series of what were considered to be matrimonial offences. For example, I referred to the provision in (c) "has gone through a form of marriage with another person". In suing for divorce under that provision all one would have to do would be to prove the marriage ceremony, or the purported marriage ceremony, whether innocent or culpable.

The minister shakes his head. I do not know how much practice he has had with regard to this kind of matter, but there are cases of persons entering into a form of marriage believing themselves free to do so, and there have been no actual sexual relations. This is not the ground in paragraph (c); its provisions relate to a person who has gone through a form of marriage with another person whether entitled to do so or not.

I wonder why this ground of divorce is being introduced. This afternoon I asked the minister why incurable insanity was not included as a ground and I received no answer. At least if the minister answered I was not present to hear him. I wonder where in this bill there is any provision to grant relief in a case where one of the parties becomes incurably insane. Grounds for less serious matters are included in the bill. For instance where a person has become an alcoholic or a drug addict for a period of three years and there is no reasonable expectation that he will be rehabilitated within the reasonably foreseeable future, relief is granted.

Again, I put strictures on such types of interpretation. Under this legislation a person who is married to an alcoholic, for whom in the reasonably foreseeable future there is no cure, is granted relief. Where the husband is the alcoholic the legislation will grant to the wife the right to a divorce. In another case, next door perhaps, where the husband has become incurably insane, the law will not grant the wife any relief. Does the minister say, perhaps, that under clause 9(3) there is a backdoor way out in a case of incurable insanity? I should like to hear the minister's reactions to these propositions.

Mr. Trudeau: With respect to the first point, which has to do with clause 3(c), the form of marriage. As the hon. member assumed, that clause was included in order to facilitate proof of this offence. Take the case where a husband has left the country and has gone to live in some other country with some other person.

Mr. Nielsen: Tibet, say.

Mr. Trudeau: If this clause were not included the petitioner would have to go to the expense, trouble and difficulty of proving an adulterous relationship with the co-respondent. As a result of the inclusion of this clause the petitioner need only bring some kind of certificate to show that the respondent has gone through a form of marriage. The difficulties with respect to proof are largely avoided.

Mr. Nielsen: May I ask a question. When the cabinet considered the wording "has gone through a form of marriage" did it intend that that form of marriage should be a form of marriage that is recognized by Canadian law?

Mr. Trudeau: I should not give away secrets of cabinet. Let it suffice to say that "form of marriage" was used precisely to indicate that it could be a kind of marriage ceremony or relationship which is not provided for under our law, but which corresponds to our general concept of marriage.

There could be any type of marriage which is recognized in another country, which would have the effect of a bigamist relationship. But once again it is in order to avoid the proof of adultery that we use this expression "form of marriage" as attested by whatever documentary evidence is admissible in our courts, as to the existence of some marital relationship elsewhere.

On the other point of incurable insanity, I can only indicate to the hon. member for Edmonton West that this particular case would be solved by clause 4(e)(i). If the petitioner was not living separate and apart for three years from the person who is incurably insane, or who indeed is inflicted with any incurable disease—it could be physical as well as mental—we are asking parliament to assume he did not want a divorce.

A husband or wife, out of Christian charity and out of love for their spouse, may decide to live with the afflicted or diseased partner. As a matter of fact I hope this will happen in a great number of cases and that the parties will not be encouraged to separate under this legislation, merely because we permit a divorce at the end of three years. We are assuming that a great many people will continue to live with their spouses despite the fact that their spouses are ill. But we are saying in this bill that if one of the parties decides not to live with the other sick party, and has not done so for three years, then we take this as evidence of marriage breakdown.

Therefore you have the three year test here, the same as in the narcotic or alcholic case, the difference being that in one case they do not have to live separate and apart, while in the sickness case they would have to live separate and apart. The problem raised by the hon. member is met in this way. I think the government showed some distaste for spelling out the sickness case, lest it appear to assume that the parties would be deciding to separate merely because one of them was incurably ill. But it is certain if that is the case, and they do decide to separate, their divorce will become possible under clause 4(e)(i).

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I know that most marriage ceremonies include the words, as mentioned by my learned colleague from Queens, "in sickness and in health until death do us part," but I am just wondering whether it is quite right, if we are going to go to this extent in opening up the grounds for divorce, that the person who is married to an individual who becomes violently and incurably insane has to wait for three years under the provisions of clause 4(e)(i), as the minister has indicated. What is the rationale in making that person wait for three years? After all, it is not the will of the parties which separates them. It is the state which takes the person who is incurably insane and puts him in a mental hospital or asylum. That is a forcible living apart caused by illness, but with the sanction of the state. In those circumstances what would justify the waiting period of three years? The waiting period of three years with regard to the alcoholic and drug addict does not specify that they shall have lived apart for that time.

Mr. Trudeau: There is no magic in the three years. We have taken this test, and I think it is a rather conservative one, as indicative of a decision of the parties to seek divorce. If one looks at the ground for divorce under the English law he will find that it is unsound mind or continuously under care for five years. In Australia it is unsound mind and unlikely to recover, and has been confined for a period in the aggregate of five years. In New Zealand it is unsound mind for an aggregate of seven years out of the previous ten. These are not magic figures. We are using a rather liberal figure of three. I suppose I have no explanation other than to say that we want to be a little more liberal than some of these other countries. I have other examples from other countries, but I do not wish to take up the time of the house now.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee which had something to do with the drafting of clause 3 (c) in its original form, I might say that some of us were aware of cases before parliament involving, for example, a Nevada type of divorce which the party who remained in Canada found could not be recognized here. This party did not have to prove that the divorce had gone through, but had to prove that the other person had been involved in adultery or sexual intercourse with another person. This meant that the party was involved in the old detective situation. This meant that hundreds of dollars were involved in having to fly detectives to Nevada, or wherever the person had wound up. This might add $1,000 or more to the cost of the petition. We thought it was high time that a situation of that kind was cured. In today's world, especially when dealing with 50 different types of divorce jurisdictions in the U.S.A. alone, we thought it was high time something was done about this situation.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Additional grounds.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, subclause (1) (d) of clause 4 intrigues me. It permits a divorce on the ground that the marriage has not been consummated. I confess I am one of those innocents who always believes there is no marriage unless it is consummated. How can you dissolve an unconsummated marriage on the ground of divorce? This is something which passes my understanding. I think the minister has nullity and annulment confused with divorce in this regard. I believe, as well, he has become involved in some difficulty in relation to recognition, domicile and other aspects relating to the matter of nullity versus divorce, or annulment versus divorce. I do not intend to raise the issue at this hour of the night or to pursue it to any extent, but from a legal concept I believe subclause (d) makes absolute nonsense of the law which hon. gentlemen in this house who have been trained in the law have learned at a variety of law schools.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I think I can answer that briefly. If one looks further on in the bill at clause 26 (2) he will find that this repeals all other laws respecting divorce but that this repeal provision does not repeal the law to the extent that it constitutes authority for other matrimonial causes. This clause 4 (1) (d) is necessary to catch the so-called annulment cases or non-consummation cases which are not caught by the annulment clauses of existing legislation.

I will give one example. Under the civil code in the province of Quebec you can obtain an annulment for non-consummation when there are physical defects and so on, provided you demand it within a period of three years. If you do not, your right for annulment under the civil code is lost. This present provision would help people who had lost the right under the civil code. They could still act under this law, and that is the reason we have this type of change. While I am on my feet—

Mr. Lambert: May I interpose a question here? I am wondering why we should try to relieve laches in this way where the provincial code imposes a penalty for laches with regard to bringing an action under voidable grounds? After all the marriage that is nonconsummated is not void ab initio, it is merely voidable. The minister fully understands what we are talking about, even if some of the technical legal terms escape other hon. members. Why in these particular instances should we include this one ground in respect of a voidable marriage? Why not include as well the legal incapacity to enter into a marriage which, of course, is a ground for annulment, and the other grounds? The rationale would be the same. I cannot see why we should cure with this bill those laches which are imposed by the Quebec civil code, if they are retained in respect of a time limit. We have this in other jurisdictions as well. Why are you relieving the situation in this respect?

Mr. Trudeau: For the very simple reason that we are providing a double remedy for failure to consummate because of physical impotency, one remedy being annulment, and the other being divorce because of marriage breakdown. This does not apply to non-consummation because of wilful refusal. In the case of wilful refusal only the divorce remedy would apply. In the province of Quebec, for instance, you cannot get an annulment even within three years because of wilful refusal when obviously there is no physical impotency. Under this hypothesis if a person had never consummated the marriage and refused to do so for a period of three years the remedy of divorce would apply.

Mr. Peters: I should like to support this amendment for a different reason. From what was said at the committee hearing and from my own experience in this regard, the part with reference to refusing to consummate the marriage relates to another problem which came to our attention. I refer to the example of a homosexual for reasons of convenience getting married and not consummating the marriage. This has happened in a number of cases and it is almost impossible under any circumstances to find a remedy in any period of time. It seems to me this will solve this problem, particularly if it means what I as a layman consider it to mean.

Mr. McCleave: I wanted to ask the minister to answer a question I raised during second reading. Would not (e)(ii) of clause 4 be more clear if it read "by reason of the desertion by the petitioner"? I take it that the victim of desertion has the remedy within three years, but the person who deserts is given a remedy after five. I think the clause might be better phrased.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for Halifax for having raised this point at the second reading stage. I did promise to clarify the wording of this paragraph and I have done so by an amendment which is very slight but which is, I think, the one desired for clarification purposes by the hon. member for Halifax. The amendment is:

That the English version of Bill C-187 be amended by striking out line 23 on page 4 and substituting the following:

(ii) by reason of the petitioner's desertion of the respondent,

In French it would be:

Que la version française du bill nº C-187 soit modifiée en supprimant la 29e ligne de la page 4 et en la remplaçant par ce qui suit:

(ii) à cause de l'abandon de l'intimé par le requérant,

I have copies of this amendment, Mr. Chairman. I so move.

Mr. McQuaid: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could inject a note of caution at this stage of the proceedings. First of all, has paragraph (c) been carried?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. The committee heard the amendment read by the minister. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McQuaid: Paragraph (c) bothers me a little, Mr. Chairman. It provides that the marriage shall be deemed to have broken down if, for a period of not less than three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition, the petitioner has had no knowledge of or information as to the whereabouts of the respondent, and so on. I am wondering whether, as a matter of precaution, it would not be advisable to insert in there that some reasonable effort must first have been made to acquire the knowledge.

This provision makes it unreasonably easy for a petitioner to go into court and simply say: I do not know where my spouse has been for the past three years. Having said that, the marriage is deemed to have broken down—

Mr. Lewis: What about the last words of that paragraph?

Mr. McQuaid: The last words are "throughout that period, has been unable to locate the respondent." I suggest that the petitioner should establish that he or she has made some reasonable effort to locate the other spouse. I suggest that words to the following effect should be inserted somewhere in the clause, "having first made reasonable efforts to acquire the knowledge", or,

"having first made some reasonable effort to locate the other party."

An amendment of this sort would not seriously affect the bill. While we all agree that worthy cases should be given relief, I think some precaution must be taken to protect the marriage state and not make divorces too easy to obtain. I do not think this would be an unreasonable burden to place upon a petitioner, namely to show that he or she has made some reasonable effort to acquire knowledge as to where the other spouse has been, and that he or she has made some reasonable effort to locate the other spouse.

Mr. Trudeau: Here again, Mr. Chairman, I agree with the intention of the hon. member, but I suggest we have made this kind of provision in clause 9 (1) (a), where it is provided that the duty of the court is to refuse a decree which is based merely upon the consent, admissions or default of the parties or either of them. If the court considers that the lack of knowledge or information is not bona fide, I think it will be compelled under clause 9 to refuse the decree.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister how wedded he is to the three year period mentioned in clause 4 (e). It seems to me that one year would be a sufficiently long period of time and would serve the purpose of protecting children not yet born at the time of separation. I wonder if the minister would accept an amendment for two years, which would be a compromise.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I repeat that there is no magic in this figure of three. It is the figure which has been suggested by the joint committee. Subclause (e) mentions three years, subclause (a) mentions two years where the spouse is in prison and subclause (d) mentions not less than one year in the case of non-consummation. Here again I can only say that we have not been unduly severe. In the British law the period for desertion is three years. Frankly, we are not wedded to this time period, but we have given consideration to the various periods possible and we thought that three years would be a good start. The hon. member realizes that if we were to change the three year period in this subclause, consequent changes would have to be made in the other subclauses.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question on subclause 2 which provides—> —where the existence of any of the circumstances described in subsection 1 has been established, a permanent breakdown of the marriage by reason of those circumstances shall be deemed to have been established.

The minister is aware that there are presumptions in law which are rebuttable, and there are irrebuttable presumptions. That is to say there is a presumption which exists until it is disproved, or there is a presumption which cannot be disproved by evidence to the contrary. I wonder which form of presumption is referred to here. I call the minister's attention to the following words in subclause 9 (d):

> —where a decree is sought under section 4, to refuse the decree if there is a reasonable expectation that cohabitation will occur or be resumed within a reasonably foreseeable period.

I would assume that subclause 2 creates an irrebuttable assumption that the marriage has broken down, but it might be useful to clarify this and I invite the minister to do so.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, this subclause is clearly a precautionary one. We are just stating that the court in certain circumstances must come to the conclusion that there is a breakdown. The law could have been written without this clause, but we wanted to make it clear that it was the obligation of the court in certain circumstances to reach the conclusion that there was a breakdown in the marriage. This does not prevent it from acting under other clauses. Once again this is perhaps an excess of zeal on the part of conscientious draftsmen, but I think the clause may be useful and is certainly not harmful.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to clause 4 (1) (a) (i) and (ii) in which the words "the respondent has been in prison for a period of not less than two years" appear. Does it constitute actual time spent in prison and does it take into account time off for good conduct or parole?

Mr. Trudeau: I think the way the clause reads, it is the actual time spent in prison. If there has been a parole or a pardon, obviously the physical separation would not have taken place.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take any part whatever in the discussion of this divorce bill. However, since the house has seen fit to grant an extra hour to discuss it, there is a point or two which I want to comment upon. Now, clause 4 (1) (b) reads:

—the respondent has, for a period of not less than three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition, been grossly addicted to alcohol or a narcotic, as defined in the Narcotic Control Act, and there is no reasonable expectation of the respondent's rehabilitation within a reasonably foreseeable period;

This is not the first time that this mundane parliament has discussed a moral question. Recently we were adjured and advised that people were beyond the pale if they did not spend the rest of their lives in reforming criminals. I presume a person who is considered to be grossly addicted to alcohol or a narcotic must be considered a criminal since he must have had at least one conviction if not more registered against him.

In view of the great moral lectures that were read to us in the very recent past, I should like to quote from a speech delivered by Sir Winston Churchill in the British House of Commons some years ago when he was Home Secretary:

The mood and temper of the public with regard to the treatment of crime and criminals is one of the most unfailing tests of the civilization of any country. A calm dispassionate recognition of the rights of the accused, and even of the convicted criminal against the state; a constant heart-searching by all charged with the duty of punishment; a desire and an eagerness to rehabilitate . . .; tireless efforts toward the discovery of creative and regenerate processes; unfailing faith that there is a treasure, if you can find it, in the heart of every man. These are the symbols which . . . mark and measure the stored-up strength of a nation . . . proof of the living virtue in it.

Then, a few years ago, in an article in the New Statesman, Anthony Storr made the following statement:

To condemn him as inhuman is to fall into the trap of treating him as he treated his victims; as a thing, not a person, a thing on whom we can let loose our own sadistic impulses, not a fellow creature who might, even yet, be redeemed.

As the South African writer Alan Paton once wrote:

—but to punish and not to restore, that is the greatest of all offences.

A few weeks ago, in discussing one aspect of moral law, we were asked to spend the rest of our lives reforming certain people. In this bill, introduced by the same cabinet, we are told to spend three years and at the end of three years we are to come to the conclusion that there is no hope for this criminal. Therefore he can be deprived of his spouse. If we are going to read moral lectures to the public of Canada to the effect that they must spend the rest of their lives reforming criminals, why should they not spend the rest of their lives reforming those people addicted to narcotics or drink as specified in this bill?

This bill imposes a three year limit, and at the end of three years we will show the criminal what we will do to him. We are going to deprive him of his spouse. I was brought up on the old principle that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. I do not like duplicity. I do not like hearing people use an argument one day to the effect that we must spend the rest of our lives reforming those who are unreformable, and then the next day be presented with a bill to the effect that at the end of three years we conclude there is no reasonable expectation for rehabilitation of a person within a reasonably foreseeable period. In so far as one type of person is concerned, we spend eight years, ten months and one day reforming him, but we are told that after three years we can come to the conclusion there is no reasonable expectation for rehabilitation of this other type of person within the foreseeable future.

Shall I call it eleven o'clock, sir?

• (11:00 p.m.)

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being eleven o'clock shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fulton: Tomorrow?

Mr. MacEachen: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we will continue with this bill.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): And after that?

Mr. MacEachen: The broadcasting bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Pursuant to the order made earlier this sitting the house stands adjourned until 2.30 p.m. tomorrow.

It being three minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, December 19, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

First report of standing committee on health and welfare—Mr. Harley.

Third report of standing committee on justice and legal affairs—Mr. Cameron (High Park).

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS—CONCURRENCE IN SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West) presented the seventh report of the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

[Note: Text of the foregoing reports appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PROCEDURE—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the first report of the special committee on procedure of the house, presented to the house on Monday, December 11, be concurred in.

Motion agred to.

PROCEDURE—CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the second report of the special committee on procedure of the house, presented to the house on Monday, December 11, be concurred in.

• (2:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, in its second report, the special house committee on procedure recommends that its members be authorized to visit the United Kingdom in order to study the procedure followed over there.

I am all for improving the present procedure of the House of Commons in Ottawa. However, I ask the minister responsible for that committee to tell me one thing. Is it merely a question of making a trip, or will the government make last minute changes in the membership of the committee, so that, finally, those chosen for the trip will not be the regular committee members, or will those who sat on that committee since the beginning of the session be going?

If it is simply a question of authorizing a trip and having the government taking this opportunity to change the membership and reward those who always accept the decision of the caucus, then, I do not agree and I shall not accept this report.

If it is a question of sending the true members of the committee without changing the membership in any way, and without replacing by other members those who were sitting on the committee two or three weeks or a couple of months ago, in short if it is a question of sending those who have always attended the sittings, then, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

That is why I would ask the minister if there will be any changes on the membership of the committee? Will others rather than the members regularly sitting on the committee be sent? Will some be sent simply as a reward or will the original members of the committee really go to work seriously?

That is what I would like to ask the minister and I believe that he should tell us if he intends to make changes in the membership just before the departure for the United Kingdom, so that this will be a reward for those who have served the party well?

I should like to have an answer from the minister on this.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I should bring to the attention of hon. members that by making his motion the minister has already spoken. It is only by leave of the house that he can reply to the question asked by the hon. member. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we do have a hard working procedure committee, and it is the intention that the members of the committee will continue their work by making this visit to the parliament of the United Kingdom. I cannot give the hon. member any assurance that as chairman of the committee I might not have to cancel my own trip.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. MacEachen: However, other hon. members will go.

Motion agreed to.

PROCEDURE—CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the third report of the special committee on procedure of the house, presented to the house on Monday, December 11, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT FUNERAL OF LATE AUSTRALIAN PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce as the senior member of the government in the house at the moment, and ask whether it is the intention of the government to send anybody to Australia to represent Canada at the funeral of the late Prime Minister.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Leader of the Opposition. It is the intention of the government to send the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to represent the government of Canada on that sad occasion.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF RECENT FISCAL POLICIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the report of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics that non-agricultural production in Canada rose by only 2.8 per cent in real terms in the first nine months of this year as compared with an average annual increase of 4.8 per cent in the preceding 20 years, is the minister prepared to reconsider the fiscal policies he has recently introduced which threaten to still further slow down the economy?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. The present developments in the economy are pretty much as I had predicted them in my budget addresses both in June and recently.

[Translation]

SHIPBUILDING

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING COMPETITION FROM ABROAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I intended to put a question to the Minister of Transport but, in view of his absence, I shall address it to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Have members of the Canadian shipbuilding industry recently advised the government of the difficulties they are experiencing, and can the government tell us if they intend to levy a tax on ships built abroad and sold in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I do not think so, Mr. Speaker, but I will take the question as notice.

[Translation]

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? Have Canadian maritime companies complained about the unfair competition of foreign ships in our inland waters, and what steps does the government intend to take to rectify this situation?

[English]

Mr. Winters: Naturally there have been some complaints, Mr. Speaker, but anything that is done will be a matter of government policy to be announced in the usual way.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration?

Have special steps been taken in order to provide work for the 800 employees of the Davie Shipbuilding Company in Lévis, who have recently been laid off because of the austerity program implemented by the Minister of Finance?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my department has a number of manpower programs: mobility programs, retraining programs, employment programs, etc. Shipyard workers may benefit from all those programs just like any other workers.

[English]

CANADA LABOUR CODE

PROPOSED TERMINATION OF DEFERMENTS GRANTED RAILWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour I should like to address my question to his parliamentary secretary, to whom I have sent notice. In view of the continuing lay-offs of employees by Canada's railways, could the parliamentary secretary report on the progress made in the discussions with unions and management regarding termination of the existing deferments respecting hours of work on Canadian railways?

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his usual courtesy in notifying me of this question ahead of time. I have found that negotiations going on at the present moment between management and labour are proceeding satisfactorily, and the conclusion of the department is that some agreement could possibly be reached within the next few weeks.

Mr. Johnston: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the answer given by the parliamentary secretary, if the railways continue their present policy of laying off long term employees with little notice and no severance pay or alternate employment, will the government consider issuing an order to end the deferments, or state a date on which they will be ended?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is hypothetical.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PARTICIPATION OF FRANCE IN NUCLEAR ENERGY RESEARCH IN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of both the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the right hon. Prime Minister perhaps I may direct my question either to the Acting Prime Minister or to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I should like to know whether the government is now in a position to reply to the question I asked yesterday, as to whether there is in the cultural agreement between Quebec and France a provision regarding a joint enterprise in the development of uranium in that province?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I was told the Secretary of State for External Affairs would answer this question today. Since he is not here I presume he will do so tomorrow.

[Translation]

Meanwhile, may I give some information regarding the research done in Quebec to discover uranium.

Under the regulations of the Atomic Energy Control Board any individual or corporation which discovers an ore deposit containing more than .05 per cent of uranium must advise the board. If such individual or corporation wishes to proceed with the exploration of that deposit, it must obtain from the board a licence to that effect. One of the conditions of issuance of this licence is the filing of regular reports to the board.

In 1967, 17 companies were granted such exploration licences in Quebec territory, mainly on the north shore and in the Mistassini area and, up to now—according to my officials' statement which was also confirmed yesterday by the deputy minister of the Quebec department concerned—none of those explorations has shown any deposit economically worthwhile, in view of the present conditions of the demand with regard to uranium and the price at which it is sold at the present time in the world. Of course, this could change.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In respect of the companies that have these licences to which the minister just referred, are any of them or all of them consortiums in which the government of France is participating?

Mr. Pepin: It is very difficult to know. I have the 17 names, but as hon. members realize it is sometimes quite difficult in this industry to ascertain who is behind a name. The information I have from my officials is that some French companies are in there. It would be difficult for me to establish exactly the relationship between those companies and the government of France. I might add, for the information of my colleagues, that at least a French company is also at work in other parts of Canada, which would seem to imply that the French are interested in uranium as such, in the whole of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Would the minister tell us whether he has objections to the development by France of a uranium mine in Quebec and whether, in view of the fact that natural resources come under provincial jurisdiction, he, as a federal minister, has a say in this matter?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I have already explained that. I have no objection to that, on the contrary, but the rules of the Atomic Energy Control Board must be complied with and I just pointed out that, in fact, these rules were being adhered to.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, may I ask another supplementary question?

In view of the fact that natural resources come under provincial jurisdiction, and should a conflict arise between the Atomic Energy Control Board and the provincial authorities about natural resources, can the minister tell us what jurisdiction would prevail?

Mr. Speaker: That question is obviously hypothetical.

[English]

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I wonder if he can answer my question of yesterday concerning any information he may have as to visits by French officials to these uranium prospecting areas in Quebec. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Industry was ready to give us some information in relation to the first question posed by the hon. member—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Keays: I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources if he can reply to my question of yesterday.

Mr. Pepin: Which one?

[Mr. Pepin.]

Mr. Keays: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I asked the minister whether he had any information concerning any official visits by members of French delegations to probable uranium deposit areas in the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Pepin: No, Mr. Speaker, but I imagine that French citizens can travel in Quebec without getting my permission.

[English]

[Later:]

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): My question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. To disperse the confusion that seems to exist, could the minister tell me whether the mining of uranium comes under federal or provincial jurisdiction?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This type of question certainly may not be asked at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question having been ruled out of order, the hon. member cannot ask a supplementary.

[English]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): As Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs I might advise the hon. member for Kamloops, in respect of the activities in Quebec in relation to uranium, that no formal agreement was concluded between France and Canada, or France and Quebec, as a result of the visit of the French minister of education, Mr. Peyrefitte to Quebec last September. The communiqué issued at the end of that meeting indicated that arrangements would be put into effect to promote co-operative studies and research on a variety of subjects including hydrology, electrical energy, nuclear energy, computer systems, electronics, Quebec northern development, forestry, fisheries and geophysics. There was no indication that any formal arrangements had been made with regard to uranium mining.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or the Minister of Justice, as the case may be, if it is the government's intention to make a statement in the near future with respect to the authority that will have jurisdiction over Quebec's uranium. Will it be under provincial jurisdiction or under the authority of the Atomic Energy Control Board?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is only repeating a question which was asked a minute ago and which was ruled out of order.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, with your leave I should like to ask a completely different question. Does the government intend to make a statement soon—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member feels his different question is urgent, he could give notice that he intends to discuss it on the adjournment motion.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if I believe the matter is urgent and I give notice of it, then it is urgent, and the minister ought to reply to it.

[English]

Mr. Starr: I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and National Resources. Would the hon. gentleman tell us whether uranium mining comes under his jurisdiction?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a type of question which an hon. member cannot ask. Questions cannot be asked when they call for an interpretation of the law or the distribution of ministerial responsibilities.

Mr. Starr: On a point of order, if we are not able to ascertain what jurisdiction a minister has we are under a considerable handicap in directing our questions correctly. I think this point must be cleared up before we can ask any further questions on this subject.

Mr. Speaker: There are quite a number of questions which have already been asked on the subject.

Mr. Starr: And I am asking one more of the Minister of Energy, Mines and National Resources. Does uranium mining come under his jurisdiction?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already suggested to the hon. member that the question cannot be asked at this time. If he thinks it can or should be asked, there is a rule of the house which says he can give notice and discuss the matter at the time of the adjournment this evening, and have the matter settled at that time.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Can the minister advise us whether it is the intention of the government to alter the policy which brings uranium mining under his jurisdiction?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: This subject seems to be of great interest to a number of hon. members; it might be easier to get a reply from the minister. The question has been asked by a number of members now. Apparently the minister does not want to answer it.

Mr. Nugent: May I ask the minister whether he claims jurisdiction over uranium mining?

Mr. Turner: On a point of order, I wonder if I might refer Your Honour—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to hon. gentlemen that there is really no point in discussing the point of order.

Mr. Starr: I rise on a question of privilege. I intend to do so on behalf of the Minister of Energy, Mines and National Resources.

An hon. Member: He can speak for himself.

Mr. Starr: He certainly wishes to clear up this situation so the facts may be known to all the people of Canada, including hon. members of this house. I understood he was ready to answer and tell us whether uranium mining comes under his jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker: As I said a moment ago, in view of the interest shown by so many hon. members the minister may answer if he wishes.

Mr. Pepin: I do not wish to give a legal opinion. I will simply say that I am responsible to parliament for the atomic energy control board which, because of the security aspects, has the responsibility of implementing regulations in connection with the exploitation of uranium.

Mr. Starr: Because uranium is of national interest.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Could we go on to another subject? The hon. member for Ontario will recognize now that he was asking a question which called for an interpretation of statutes. It is clear that this type of question cannot be asked.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Keays: May I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he knows of any French financial assistance being given to the province of Quebec in connection with education?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is repeating a question which has already been asked.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

PROPOSED TRIPARTITE COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL DISTRICT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roger E. Régimbal (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): I should like to address my question to the Acting Prime Minister. On December 4 the Prime Minister announced the creation of a tripartite committee to make recommendations concerning a federal district for the national capital. My questions are the following. Have the nominations to that committee now been made by the parties involved? Has any action been undertaken by the committee as yet, or is any action being contemplated in the near future?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows he can ask only one question, not a series of questions.

Mr. Régimbal: Could we take them one at a time? Have all nominations to that committee been made by the parties involved?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think I can answer all three questions, Mr. Speaker, by saying a great deal of work has been done in this connection. I prefer, however, if the hon. member does not mind, to take the questions as notice and leave it to the Prime Minister to reply.

FINANCE

INTERNATIONAL GOLD TRANSACTIONS TO SUPPORT DOLLAR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, in reply to my question concerning the support of the United States dollar, the minister said the Canadian government had not been asked to join the gold pool. My question is, has Canada been asked to render any other assistance in support of the United States dollar as a medium of international exchange, or are we to stand idly by as apprehensive watchers?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe the United States government, which is the primary supporter of gold, is very happy with Canada's role at the present time.

Mr. Lambert: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister what precisely is Canada's role?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I believe the statements I have made are quite clear.

Mr. Lambert: In other words, nothing.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO MISSING PLANE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. On December 7 I asked him if any trace had been found of the missing aircraft which left St. John's, Newfoundland for St. Anthony on November 29. Would the minister please advise the house whether any trace has been found of the missing aircraft, and whether the search has been officially called off?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the air force and the coast guard co-operated in a massive search for this aircraft. Unfortunately no trace of the aircraft, the pilot or the passengers has been found. I was advised yesterday that the search operation had been terminated.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

INQUIRY AS TO SAFETY STANDARDS RESPECTING TIRES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It has to do with automobile safety. Having in mind the tire and rim safety regulations which I understand are coming into effect in the United States on December 31, can the minister say what is the situation with regard to tire safety in Canada?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the department is still in the process of organizing this branch. We are not yet in a position to establish definite standards, but I have asked the department to give priority to the establishment of tire safety standards in the development of the new program.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO EXPORTERS OF MARITIME PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Since approximately 25 per cent of the Nova Scotia apple crop is scheduled for export to Britain, have any steps been taken by the government to aid maritime apple, lumber and fish exporters who are looking for new trading agreements with British buyers that will enable them to hold on to their markets which have been weakened by the devaluation of sterling?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there was an increase in the British apple quota some few weeks ago, and I think that was of considerable assistance to Canadian apple growers. We have been searching the markets of the world for outlets for our fish and lumber. Fortunately there has been some improvement there. However, devaluation has had an impact, and we will try to help compensate for that by searching for other markets.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASED DELIVERY QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce under whose jurisdiction the Canadian Wheat Board comes. Could the minister supply some information as to whether, by the end of the 1967 calendar year, the quotas for delivery of wheat will be increased, so the farmers would be in a better position to judge whether to deliver their grain before the end of 1967 or carry it over to 1968 for income tax purposes?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. I can tell him that within the past few days the wheat board increased the quota to four bushels for 232 stations and this should accelerate the movement of wheat off the farms. As of December 18 there were 33 stations on the one bushel delivery quota, 546 on the two bushel quota and 1,045 on the three bushel quota. The Canadian Wheat Board has asked for the co-operation of the railways to give priority to those stations remaining on the lower quotas. The wheat board will authorize further quota increases as soon as sufficient space becomes available at individual delivery points.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the government policy of guaranteeing $1.95½ for No. 1 northern wheat applies to each individual sale or contract, or does it apply to the over-all average of the pool for one year's operation?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, we are still working out the details, but as of now it applies to each individual contract.

Mr. Korchinski: Yesterday, in reply to a question of mine, the minister indicated that the matter of whether there would be a government subsidy—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member asking a supplementary question?

Mr. Korchinski: Yes, a supplementary question for clarification because yesterday, in reply to a question of mine, the minister said this would be in connection with the over-all operation of a whole year. Does this apply in the case of all the Chinese wheat deals, in connection with the whole year's operation of the pool, or does this matter apply to the one contract?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, this would apply to the one contract, in the case of China. I thought the hon. member yesterday was referring to the over-all year's operation for wheat transactions.

Mr. Korchinski: A further supplementary question. In view of the fact that at the close of the 1965 pool prices generally were higher than $1.95½, and since from the beginning of the new crop year prices have been lower, will the minister prevail upon the wheat board—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making a representation to the minister; it is not a question.

Mr. Korchinski: Will the minister prevail on the board or will he make certain that the wheat pool is closed in such a way that the farmers do not receive lower prices for their grain?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made his submission.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Later:]

Mr. Korchinski: May I direct another question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in view of the fact that I may have fumbled the last one in my excitement, or something. Will the farmers not be receiving a lower price if the closing date of the current pool is deferred?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is argumentative.

Mr. Korchinski: Ten o'clock.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PROPOSAL THAT MEDICAL SCHOOLS OPERATE YEAR ROUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the serious shortage of doctors and the imminence of medicare, has the minister had any communication with the universities in order that the medical schools may teach the year round, to meet the shortage?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare: No, Mr. Speaker. There has been no communication from the university medical schools with this objective in mind—no recent communication, at least.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister propose to bring the representation that has just been made to the attention of the medical schools in order that the possibility of medical schools being operated the year round may be studied?

Mr. MacEachen: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the authorities in the medical schools have considered these proposals. However, I shall be happy to make certain that they are drawn to their attention.

INDUSTRY

COPPER—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PRICE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): My question is for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. May I ask him whether the inquiry he has been making into the reason for the increased price of copper has yet been completed. If not, when does he expect that inquiry to be completed, and when will he make a statement to the house?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I are still conducting our inquiries. I hope to be able to make a report soon.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

YUKON—INQUIRY AS TO WHITE PAPER ON CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Since the Yukon legislative council adjourned yesterday pending the production of the government's white paper with respect to the constitutional reform of the Yukon, could the minister say when he expects the white paper to be finished and tabled in the house?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, when we met the Yukon council in Ottawa some two months ago I indicated that we were hopeful of having the white paper before the end of the year. I have since told them that it has been delayed, but that nevertheless we will hasten with it and endeavour to prepare it at the earliest moment possible. I will not be held down to any date in particular, but I should think it will be ready within the next two or three months.

SHIPPING

SYDNEY, N.S.—INQUIRY AS TO PILOTAGE STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I have not sent him notice; possibly he may take this as notice. I ask it because quite possibly the matter may involve a hazard not only from the point of view of economics but also a marine hazard. Is it the intention of the department to remove the pilotage station from North Sydney—to change the base, in other words—or is the department's intention to completely remove the services of pilots from Sydney harbour?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is difficult for the Chair to determine whether this is a matter of urgency. I realize that it may be most important. If the hon. member feels there is urgency he may wish to debate the matter at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there is urgency since the house may rise in a day or two, and since the matter that I raised in my question could come into effect before the end of the year. We have only one or two days left in which the minister can inform us as to the intentions of the department.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I shall take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): In the absence of the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could address my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the reported widespread uneasiness among plant and managerial employees of Dosco, in Sydney, can the minister give the house any additional report about the part the federal government has undertaken to play in the takeover of the Dosco steel plant by the government of Nova Scotia and what commitment, if any, the federal government has made with respect to operations after April 30 of next year?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as was understood following the recent meeting between the Prime Minister and the premier of Nova Scotia, the premier of Nova Scotia was to send forward in writing certain proposals which he had in mind for assistance from the government of Canada. I believe these proposals have arrived; I received a copy this morning. They will be considered, I am sure, very soon by the government.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does that mean that until now no commitment whatever has been made by the federal government, either for the period to April 30 or for the period after that?

Mr. MacEachen: A commitment has been made with respect to the period to April 30. The further period is a matter of consideration at the present time.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether, when the decision is made as to financial assistance for the province of Nova Scotia beyond the date he specified in his reply, the Goldwaterites in the cabinet will outweigh the left wing element?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ESCAPE OF CONVICTED MURDERER FROM MINIMUM SECURITY INSTITUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): My question is for the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker. Since a convicted murderer who was sentenced to life imprisonment escaped from a minimum security institution at Agassiz, British Columbia, may I ask whether convicts of this type are to be kept in minimum security institutions in the future, and what steps will be taken to prevent similar escapes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that the hon. member should place this question on the order paper.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO RENEGOTIATION OF CANADA-U.S. AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry. Now that preliminary discussions have been held between Canadian and United States officials on the Canada-United States car pact, will the minister give the house the assurance that before changes or amendments are made to the existing pact the matter will be brought before a committee for discussion and will not be announced by way of a press release, as was the case when the original pact was announced?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the hon. member is asking a question which has been asked before. If not perhaps the minister might reply.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Though the original pact, which arose from the joint signatures of the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada in Texas, was in fact announced by a press release, and though the Canada-United States agreement was tabled in the House of Commons and was, in substance and form, the subject of debate on a resolution, I can give the house or the hon. member the concrete assurance that before the terms of the Canada-United States automotive agreement are altered or modified there will be an opportunity for discussion by members of the house.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LEASING OF UNUSED AIRFIELD FACILITIES TO PRIVATE OPERATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In cases where defence department airfield facilities, hangars in particular, are going unused or under-used, is it departmental policy to co-operate with regional air lines, air freighters and so on, by leasing such facilities at suitable rates?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a general question about general policy and it cannot be asked at this time.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ADJUSTMENT OF INTEREST PAID ON SUPERANNUATION ACCOUNTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue or the Minister of Finance whether an answer is now available to the question I asked last Friday about applying a higher rate of interest to the superannuation accounts.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): There is no intention at the present time to change the rate of interest.

DRUGS

REPORTED THREATS IF LEGISLATIVE AMENDMENTS ENACTED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Registrar General. Does the minister intend to make any comment concerning the open letter received by all members of parliament from the drug firm of Glaxo-Allenburys (Canada) Limited in which certain threats are made should the government proceed with its bill to amend the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act?

Hon. John N. Turner (Registrar General): I have received a communication from the president of the company mentioned by the hon. gentleman. We have given his representations careful consideration, and it is my intention to deal with the matters raised in his letter when this house debates second reading of the bill in question.

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Can the minister assure the house that the government will not be blackmailed by any drug company through misleading information sent direct to members of parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is argumentative.

DIVORCE

MEASURE RESPECTING GROUNDS, JURISDICTION, JUDGES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, December 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-187, respecting divorce—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose yesterday clause 4 as amended was under consideration.

On clause 4 as amended—Additional grounds.

Mr. Cowan: At eleven o'clock last night, when the house rose, I was making some comments on clause 4 of the divorce bill. Hon. members who were present, or who have looked at Hansard for yesterday, will be aware that I stated I do not like duplicity in any manner, shape or form. I shall be voting for clause 4, but I cannot allow it to pass without commenting on the actions of certain people who use one argument on one side of the fence one day and the same argument on the other side of the fence the next day.

• (3:20 p.m.)

As you will recall, when eleven o'clock was called I was emphasizing that we had been read homilies from Sir Winston Churchill, who spoke in the House of Commons and pointed out that we must spend all our time endeavouring to reform criminals. Sir Winston said that we must seek the treasure within the man, if we can find it, in the heart of every man. Then I read a statement by Anthony Storr which appeared in the New Statesman, in which he pointed out that to condemn a man is inhuman; it is to fall into the trap of treating him as he treated his victims, as a thing and not a person. The South African, Alan Paton, said "—but to punish and not to restore, that is the greatest of all offences."

I understand that I cannot refer to a previous debate in the House of Commons in the same session and I do not wish to transgress the rules of the house. However, I should like to remind hon. members that the Solicitor General stated we should never lose faith or abandon hope of reforming even one of these terrible people; we should never lose hope. Then why does the same cabinet come forward with this clause to the effect that after three years, when we can see no expectation of rehabilitation within a reasonably foreseeable period, then there are grounds for divorce? Why is it that in one moral argument we are told never, never to give up the possibility of reforming this type of criminal; then within a month have a bill before us to the effect that if a drunkard or a drug addict cannot be reformed within three years we have the right to say that the marriage has been broken on a permanent basis. In fact in subclause 2 of clause 4 we talk about "where the existence of any of the circumstances described in subsection 1 has been established, a permanent breakdown of the marriage by reason of those circumstances shall be deemed to have been established."

It is interesting to me that the cabinet by order in council has established that no murderer can be paroled in less than ten years, and then only if the parole board has O.K.'d it and the cabinet O.K.'s that. So the cabinet must consider that within ten years they can reform the most hardened criminal; that is, they can reform a man who thirsts for blood. Then why not spend ten years in reforming a man when he thirsts for liquor or drugs? But we are told, no; if in three years you find you cannot reform the drug addict or the drunkard, forget him, take away his spouse, take away his family and in some cases take away his property because he has had three years in which to reform and he has not reformed. But we can reform a murderer in ten years.

They used to reform murderers in eight years, ten months and one day, but I think they found that short course was not long enough so an order in council was passed to the effect that it would take at least ten years to reform a murderer. If we can reform a murderer in ten years, who says we cannot reform the drug addict or the drunkard? Why must we give up on the drunkard and the drug addict at the end of three years? Frankly, Mr. Chairman, you cannot have it both ways.

We in the Liberal party, of course, believe the members of our cabinet are the salt of the earth; if they were not they would not be the cabinet. I am telling you when they bring forth these moral arguments on behalf of one type of criminal we have to agree that they are the salt of the earth. But I say to the cabinet, if the salt within a month hath lost its savour wherewith shall the world be salted? It is thenceforth good for nothing but to be cast out and to be trodden underfoot by man.

I do not like having homilies read to me a month ago about how we should spend our time reforming criminals for the rest of time—for the rest of my human life—and then be told today that if after three years the reformation of drunkards and drug addicts is not effective, forget them and cast them on the dung heap. I say to you that if the trumpet give forth an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself to the battle? I hate duplicity. When the trumpet is sounded one way in November I do not like to hear it sounded the other way in December.

I believe this clause of the proposed bill should be amended and some clarification given. The cabinet may point out that this is not what they meant in November when they said you must spend the rest of your life reforming these hardened criminals, and that in what they are saying now in December they are blowing the trumpet to let you know that if after three years you have not completed the reformation of the drunkard or drug addict, snap your fingers, grant a divorce, take away his family from him and take away his material possessions in some cases; because if we cannot reform him in three years what hope is there?

I say to you it is not right to use arguments such as this on both sides of moral questions. Either the cabinet was right a month ago and wrong now or was wrong a month ago and is right now. Frankly I would say they were wrong a month ago and are right now, because I shall be voting for this bill and I did not vote for the other.

I sincerely hope, Mr. Chairman, that the cabinet will not refuse to heed the advice of the Solicitor General, who points out that we must never give up hope of reforming these criminals; and will not throw aside the advice of Sir Winston Churchill which was read to us in such fulsome terms as the words of one of our greatest speakers, when he pointed out that there is a treasure in the heart of every man. Sir Winston must have been somewhat of a dubious temperament because he added the phrase "if you can find it." That is my attitude so far as Sir Winston Churchill's message goes. He went on to say that we must have an eagerness to rehabilitate; we must make tireless efforts toward the discovery of creative and regenerative processes; have unfailing faith that there is a treasure, if you can find it, in the heart of every man. I think that proves that Sir Winston was a sceptic.

A month ago we were told to follow Sir Winston Churchill's advice and work, work, work in order to reform these criminals. But I say to you, if we can reform murderers in eight years, ten months and one day surely to heaven we can reform drug addicts and drunkards in a shorter space of time, even if it takes more than three years. We could bring in these rehabilitation specialists the cabinet has working with the murderers and making gentlemen of them in eight, nine and ten years, and turn them on these drug addicts and drunkards. These specialists who are making gentlemen out of murderers should not have any difficulty at all making gentlemen out of drunkards and drug addicts. Think of all the marriages they could save, thus making it unnecessary to go through the divorce courts.

I cannot see why the cabinet in December do not take the advice they were so freely giving in November. Either their memory is very very short or they think the public will not remember the advice they gave when we were being asked to consider the matter of capital punishment in the month of November.

I am sure if they trotted out all the nice Nellies and bleeding hearts they recruited to their banner in November and turned them loose on these drug addicts and drunkards, they would be reformed the moment they saw the bleeding hearts and nice Nellies in their presence. I sincerely hope this clause 4 can be altered so we would not be admitting that we are giving up the reformation activities of the cabinet in such a short period of time as three years. Three years in the average man's lifetime is as nothing. I believe the cabinet should take the advice of the Solicitor General and never give up in the expectation of being able to reform these drug addicts and these drunkards.

As I said before and repeat now, their advice was wrong in November and I did not accept it. Now that they are talking in December their advice is pretty good and I intend to take it. But I do not like duplicity no matter who is practising it, and I could not care less whether it is the cabinet that is practising it or the man on the street. I dislike duplicity and hate to see it in black and white in this bill.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 as amended carry?

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I should like the minister to explain why it was found necessary to insert clause 4(1) (c). This deals with the situation in which one spouse has not heard of or from the other for a period of three years, which will then be deemed to be a marriage breakdown. Under paragraph (e) it is also provided that where the spouses have been living separately and apart for three years for any cause this will be deemed to be a marriage breakdown. Is there any reason to refer specifically to special circumstances which would make paragraph (c) necessary in view of the wording of paragraph (e), subparagraph (i)?

Mr. Trudeau: That is a question that stumps me, Mr. Chairman. I can see that it is harmless but perhaps redundant. I know historically how it got in there. We were using the breakdown clauses which are current in other countries and the breakdown clauses found in the joint committee's report. As the hon. member will realize, we did subtract some of the recommendations because they were covered by paragraph (e) (i). I do not have the answer to the question now. I will read the clause and search my memory to find the answer. It may be that before the day is out I will be able to give it. However, the hon. member will realize that it is not a harmful clause though it may be redundant.

Mr. Baldwin: It may not be harmful but it might lead to some misunderstanding on the part of counsel who have been consulted by clients who propose to take proceedings. It seems to me that the simple provision in paragraph (e) (i), which refers to where there has been a separation for any reason for a period of three years, would be the more simple, easy and desirable way of handling this matter. There may be attempts to bring parties under (c) which may lead to complications. The minister might be good enough to look at this with the idea of withdrawing the paragraph later.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, perhaps we could stand this subclause for a few minutes while I search my memory and seek assistance in order that I may answer this question.

The Chairman: The proper thing for the committee to do under these circumstances is to stand the whole clause.

Mr. Otto: Before standing the clause, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make some remarks and ask the minister one or two questions. My question in respect of paragraph (c) is based on a different understanding of its intention than that expressed by the hon. gentleman. The purpose of this paragraph seems to me to be to prevent collusion. If this paragraph was not in the bill then an automatic separation for any reason at all, even if it was agreed to, would automatically lead to a successful petition for divorce.

I should like to ask a question in connection with paragraph (b) which refers to a three year period preceding the petition during which a party has been grossly addicted to alcohol or a narcotic, as defined in the Narcotic Control Act. Are we to assume that "grossly addicted" is defined in that act?

Mr. Trudeau: No, it is only narcotic addiction that is defined in that act.

Mr. Otto: That being the case, who is to define this expression? Up to now this has been within the jurisdiction of the courts. If it is intended that the jurisdiction will remain there I am in favour. On the other hand, if that is the case I question subclause 2 which seems to indicate that if the parties are living apart and any of the circumstances defined in paragraphs (a) to (e) inclusive exist, then automatically it will be presumed that there is a marriage breakdown. Does this mean that the whole question of marriage breakdown is removed completely from the courts? If this is the case I have no argument but I should like to hear the minister's reasoning and understanding. If people living separate and apart under any of the circumstances outlined in paragraphs (a) to (e) can establish automatically that there is a breakdown of the marriage, I take it that the one or the other would unilaterally be entitled to a divorce without any contest. Is that the case?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, the first part of the question is related to the expression "grossly addicted". This will be a matter of fact to be established by the judgment of the court. The idea of addiction and gross addiction is not foreign to our statute law. Many crimes or infractions are defined by the words "gross" or "grossly", and the intention here is to indicate that the courts must use their judicial discretion in deciding whether or not there is minor addiction, addiction to a substantial degree, or gross addiction. Once this judgment has been made by the court, subclause 2 applies and a breakdown is deemed to have been established. This will be, of course, a judgment of the court leaning on (b). This judgment of the court is subject to appeal and we will see the appeal provisions later on. This is one example of the many cases where the courts are left by parliament to make a decision on a question of fact, and this entails the forming of a certain amount of opinion.

The hon. member also raised a question in respect of time. Here again I suggest that if he refers to clause 9, subclause 3, he will find that a rule for the calculation of the period of separation will perhaps answer his question. If it does not, I will be glad to deal with it again when we are considering that clause.

Referring again to paragraph (c) I would say that the hon. member has given a reason for its usefulness. One can make a distinction, although there is perhaps a certain amount of redundancy. For the clarification and instruction of the parties who will be reading this bill, I think paragraph (c) will be useful because it will cover the case of a person who has disappeared and never been heard of and therefore might be dead. Paragraph (e) would apply to people who are obviously alive. That is part of the answer.

Another part of the answer is that if we struck out paragraph (c) one would not know for sure whether to proceed under paragraph (e) (i) or (ii), because the question would arise whether the disappearance was real and valid, that is, actually a desertion. If the petition was made under (e), the courts would have to make a decision on whether or not there had been a desertion so as to know whether to apply the five year rule or the three year rule. By including paragraph (c), the courts do not have to make this judgment which may be very difficult in the hypothesis of my explanation in respect of the disappeared person who is dead. Such a person would not be known of and the courts could not consult with him or seek information on whether that individual deserted willingly or unwillingly. For these reasons I think the clause is not useless. I agree with the hon. member for Peace River that there is perhaps an element of redundancy regarding paragraph (e), but for the reasons I have given I think it is useful to retain the paragraph.

Divorce Law Reform

Mr. Wahn: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question with reference to paragraph (d). An actual case has been brought to my attention where a marriage was consummated—indeed, the couple had several children—and at a later date, as the result of an operation, the husband became permanently impotent. Would the wife, under this legislation or any other matrimonial legislation already in effect, have the right to terminate the marriage in those circumstances?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I am now being asked to interpret statutes other than this one. I do not mind giving advice to such a close colleague. With respect to this bill I would say that the answer is clear. If there has been consummation, no matter what happened later this clause could not apply. In the case mentioned by the hon. member, if there was a desire to obtain a divorce it would most likely be established by the living separate and apart of the parties.

I should say that this example is akin to the one given last night where one of the parties is maimed, ill or insane. If the parties continue to live together, as many undoubtedly will, in spite of the fact that one spouse has been disabled, there is obviously no cause for divorce. If they decide, after mature consideration, that they want to obtain a divorce, they will have to go through the same three year waiting period that is necessary when one of the parties becomes incurably insane or incurably ill.

With respect to the final part of the question, whether any other statute would provide for dissolution of marriage in these circumstances, my uninformed recollection is no. But once again I think it might be wise for any lawyer to reread the dissolution of marriage act and the other acts which have causes for annulment spelled out therein.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Chairman, in my very limited training I was always taught that a legal draftsman would try to make his bill as clear as possible in the first place so there would be as little room for judicial interpretation and appeal as possible. But now we have the minister telling us that the clause is all right and we will be able to clear up this fuzzy provision because it will be subject to appeal.

I should now like to refer to clause 4(e)(ii). It seems passing strange that there should be a differentiation in respect of the time after which a person can petition for divorce. The spouse who is deserted can petition for divorce after a period of three years but five years must elapse before the deserting spouse can petition for divorce. This provision implies essentially a trial within a trial. When a person petitions for divorce it must first be ascertained who deserted whom.

What kind of desertion are we referring to in the clause? Are we referring to other acts? In the child welfare act of Ontario "desertion" has one meaning and in most other provinces it has another. What kind of desertion do we refer to in this bill? Do we refer to physical desertion? Suppose a man is married to a shrewish wife and he just walks out of the matrimonial domicile and leaves the wife but continues to maintain her. What is the situation then? She was really responsible for his leaving her. Does this mean the husband cannot petition for divorce for five years but the wife can petition for divorce after three years? Do we mean physical desertion? If one spouse just walks out and leaves the other, does this provision mean he or she incurs an extra penalty?

It would seem to me that clause 4 (e) (ii) is completely redundant. If the clause were passed in its present form all we would do would be to make divorce more expensive to the litigant. I think the clause should provide for three years in either case, in which case, of course, we could withdraw paragraph (ii) completely.

Mr. Wahn: Mr. Chairman, I refer again to paragraph (d) because of the minister's answer. Would he not consider the possibility of an amendment to permit a marriage to be terminated in circumstances such as I mentioned earlier, namely, where the marriage has been consummated but as a result of illness or disability it has become impossible to continue cohabitation? Otherwise a person has to wait three years before the marriage can be terminated. It seems a little inconsistent to permit the immediate termination of a marriage which has not been consummated and to force a person to wait three years when the marriage has been consummated but cohabitation cannot be continued. It just does not seem to be consistent with principle.

Mr. Trudeau: As I said last night, Mr. Chairman, there is no question of principle involved here and there is no magic in the figure of three years.

Mr. Lambert: The period of three years is set out in the subclause.

Mr. Trudeau: If this honourable house wants to make the period two years, one year or one week, that is a matter for the house and I will not defend the period of three years on the ground of principle. I will not move such an amendment and I do not think I would vote for it, because after comparing the periods which are most acceptable in civilized countries I found that three years was a rather liberal figure.

The fact that this particular form of impotency has occurred does not require, it seems to me, that we spell out special treatment in the bill. Surely there is no great difference, at least in principle, between the spouse who cannot have sexual relations for that reason and the one have them because the other spouse happens to be living in an asylum somewhere. I do not think the hardship is greater in one case than the other. The test is whether the spouses are separated. Once again, if three years appears much too long to most hon. members I cannot say that I will defend that period of time on any moral ground, but it seems to me the kind of period we have to impose in order to bring forth the point that a marriage contract is not an ordinary contract and that the state has some interest in it, that society feels that marriages should not be broken off by consent no matter whether one person happens to fall sick or falls prey to an injury, as in the example given. This is my feeling on the matter.

Getting back to the question asked previously, I object to the expression having been used that the subclause is fuzzy. The courts are asked all the time, in respect of all our statutes, to interpret words and questions of fact. It is absolutely inconceivable that any law would be written in such a way that the courts would have absolutely no discretion. I cannot think of a single statute or single code anywhere that does not rely in some instances on an amount of judicial discretion. That is what we have courts for, namely, to apply the law according to their best interpretation. If there was no need for the interpretation of our laws we could have machines to decide these questions. We could put the statute in a machine and the answer would come out. There is always room for a degree of judicial discretion, and because this is the case it does not mean that the bill is fuzzy.

Mr. Smith: But I suggest that you should be as careful as possible in the beginning.

Mr. Trudeau: I accept that suggestion, Mr. Chairman, and I think we should be as careful as possible not only in the beginning but in the continuation and at the end. I believe this is what we have done. All the words of an act cannot be defined in the interpretation section of every statute. It is a well known rule of the courts that, if the words are not so defined, they use the ordinary dictionary meaning of the words. I agree that the courts disagree in some cases, and this is why we have appeal courts.

Mr. Lambert: It is obvious to me that the minister has engaged mostly in academic consideration of the law and has certainly not had experience in the practice of advising clients who come to seek advice from counsel or solicitors. The minister said that the best answer that a solicitor can give is to say he does not know how the courts will interpret this statute. In that event, determination of desertion, as my colleague has indicated, is something that a court may interpret according to the state of the judge's digestion on a particular day, all of which is most unsatisfactory.

One of the prime requirements of any statute, of law in general, is its certainty. I suggest with the greatest respect that this is precisely where this bill is deficient, namely, in its uncertainty and the minister's Marie Antoinette attitude that if a client is not satisfied in the court of first instance there is always the court of appeal. This is really fine advice to give to a client. To tell the client he can always go to the court of appeal if he is not satisfied can never be a very satisfactory answer.

What is the purpose of the definition clause in the bill? As a matter of fact, clause 2 to some extent defines children and children of the marriage. What is collusion? Lord only knows. This term has been subject to judicial interpretation but the minister has seen fit to define it in the bill so as to avoid judicial interpretation. Yet we find in the bill the word "desertion", and the minister says that it all depends on how the judge interprets it. There is such a thing as constructive desertion, and the interpretation of the term in one jurisdiction may be as different as night and day from the interpretation of the same term by another jurisdiction. I must confess that I find the minister's answer to be very unsatisfactory. I wish he had included in the bill a definition of desertion in the same way in which I suggest to him the bill should contain a definition of domicile because it appears in the bill in a way which I believe makes legal nonsense.

Mr. Trudeau: I think it is rather paradoxical for the hon. member to say that my approach to this matter is academic and then proceed to give a lecture against the positivist approach to law. Surely he has done nothing more than to state that he has a certain legal philisophy. It may be an admissable one but it is not necessarily compatible with our approach to statute law. There is one philosophy according to which the law may be defined as what the courts will decide in any particular case, and this to me is a perfectly respectable approach to the law. However, I do not think much will be gained by engaging in a discussion respecting a philosophical approach to law at this time.

Mr. Lambert: It is a "spin the coin" philosophy.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member could ask for a definition not only of desertion but of any other term such as respondent, petition, addition, period, presentation, and many other terms such as adultery, homosexuality, bestiality and cruelty. I do not think it is a fair accusation to say that a lawyer cannot tell a client exactly what the statute means. There are two sides to most cases and the courts are there to decide between two points of view.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I like the minister's argument, particularly when he dealt with the need for leaving a residual, discretionary power to the judiciary. Because I like it I wish to suggest to him that there may be a way in which the deficiency to which the hon. member for St. Paul's referred a moment ago might be cured. I have great sympathy with the kind of example which he has commended for the consideration of the minister. In my own personal experience I have seen petitions for divorce of the nature described by the hon. member for St. Paul's and a good many others which deserve judicial consideration and are not covered by the provisions of the bill.

My friend from Peace River has made a study of the British legislation in this regard and he showed me an article from the Montreal Star which sets forth a proposal in a private member's bill which was made the subject of consideration in the house at Westminster. One section of the bill states as a condition for bringing a petition for divorce misconduct which a husband or wife cannot be reasonably expected to endure. This kind of provision in this bill would meet the rather sad cases such as the one raised by the hon. member for St. Paul's and would also cover other circumstances, one of which I will describe in a minute, which are not met by the provisions of the bill. For instance, in paragraph (d) a petitioner is on solid ground if the marriage has not been consummated. Here I think even the minister fell into the trap of using the term "consummate" in a different sense. To consummate, in law, and I do not see any provision in the bill which changes this concept, means consummation at the beginning.

There are cases where a married couple has been living together for ten years and then one party or the other will decide not to cohabit with his or her spouse. In circumstances such as those there is no recourse. If the conduct continues for a year or two, surely it becomes grossly unreasonable. Certainly there are wreckages of marriages where the couples remain together and where one partner is denied any recourse whatsoever because of the circumstances I described and which the hon. member for St. Paul's brought to the minister's attention.

I have an amendment which I will not move but I think it is worthy of consideration by the members of the committee. I will read it in the hope that the minister might advance it as a government amendment. I will go over the wording once again although I am sure the minister has it before him. I would propose that an additional paragraph be added after paragraph (e) (ii) of clause 4 subclause 1. The full stop at the end of the paragraph would be changed to a comma and then there would be another paragraph which would read as follows: "Or if there is conduct which a husband or wife cannot be reasonably expected to endure." The wording of that provision would meet the kind of case the hon. member for St. Paul's has raised and would meet the many cases of which I have personal cognizance and for which no remedy is available under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. Basford: I should like to go back to the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe North who discussed paragraph (e). He was concerned about the provision that a petitioner who is deserted can apply for divorce after a separation of three years but if the petitioner was the actual deserter he can apply only at the end of five years. I have thought about this a great deal myself, and I agree with the hon. member for Simcoe North that there is no need to differentiate between the two. It seems to me that by trying to add this punishment of two additional years to the petitioner who is the actual deserter we lead the courts into a problem which has been raised here of trying to decide what desertion is. There are circumstances which will allow a petitioner to leave home justifiably and, in fact, legally be a deserter. I see no reason for putting this punitive provision into the law. It seems to me that if spouses have been separated for three years for any reason, either one of them should be free to apply for a divorce and obtain dissolution of the marriage. I should like to move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North:

That paragraph 4 (1) (e) be struck out and replaced by the following:

(e) The spouses have been living separate and apart for any reason for a period of not less than three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

Mr. Nugent: When the minister replies, would he tell us what that does to paragraph (c) which would seem to have no place really because it refers to not even knowing where the other party is? Would that paragraph be redundant?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I think I will vote against that amendment because it was the intention of those drafting the bill to make a distinction between the offended and offending parties. There was no desire to give any incentive in this bill to the desertion of one spouse by the other. I think the law would be better if we made sure there was no such incentive to desertion. If two parties decide to separate and live apart, for whatever reason, then I suppose that is a fact which the law must accept. This was the reason we wrote this particular concept of breakdown into our law. I think we must be careful not to accept the kind of thinking, generous though it may appear, behind this amendment because once again we are giving an incentive to desertion. I do not believe we should do that. Incidentally, it is for that type of reason we did not accept the recommendation of the joint committee for another kind of breakdown, which was shorter than three years, in a case when there was wilful non-support of either party. We did not want to write into our law any clause which would incline one party not to support the wife, husband or children because such a party might get a quicker divorce and not have to wait for three years. It is for this reason that I, personally, cannot accept the amendment. Once again, I cannot defend my actions on any other ground than this which seems to me to be a common sense ground.

While I am on this subject I might answer some of the remarks that have been made about desertion. This is not a new idea we are introducing here for the first time, as some hon. members have said. Desertion is already in our laws because section 2 of the Divorce Jurisdiction Act speaks about desertion. Certainly, the courts have had to interpret this word and they have done so with some differences of opinion among the courts. It is for this reason that the idea of constructive desertion has also been spelled out by the courts.

Mr. Nielsen: And in the Criminal Code.

Mr. Trudeau: And in the Criminal Code. I believe that when we want to change the meaning of a word we define it, and that is why we have defined "collusion" and "condonation". It is not condonation in the ordinary sense of our statute law. We provide an exception to the ordinary meaning of condonation by saying there can be 90 days of cohabitation without that constituting condonation. We have a long definition here of collusion which is a particular definition that applied to divorce. These are the justifications I give for preferring to stick to these particular words.

I should like to add a final word on the suggestion of the hon. member for Yukon that we have a new paragraph (f). I am struck by the fact that the idea he wants to introduce, which I think is a good one has been dealt with in words which are almost the same in clause 3, subclause (d). The reference there is to cruelty of such a kind as to be intolerable. I believe the hon. member's amendment used the word "unbearable". There is perhaps a slight distinction here but I think what the hon. member has in mind is something closer to the notion of an offence rather than the notion of a breakdown.

The hon. member uses the word "unbearable". When we talk of mental cruelty which becomes intolerable we come in a large degree to the idea the hon. member for Yukon wants to put forward.

Mr. Baldwin: I should like to add a word in reply to what the minister has said. I think we have to take a minute to look at the historical background. When cruelty was introduced in the United Kingdom in 1933 as a ground for divorce, there was a series of judicial decisions which gradually crystallized so that cruelty, as a ground for the dissolution of marriage, must be cruelty of a kind which is clearly within the meaning of clause 3(d) in the bill the minister has introduced.

This is the culmination of a series of legal decisions in the United Kingdom, by which cruelty, prior to the introduction of the new act into its parliament, had to be of a kind as to render intolerable the continued cohabitation of the spouses. In considering the act which was introduced in the United Kingdom it is quite obvious that its framers—they were people in the government who consulted with private members and some of the other authorities—came up with what has been referred to, or suggested with great sense by the hon. member for Yukon, as conduct which a husband or wife cannot be reasonably expected to endure.

It is true that it is against my views and the views of some other hon. members—I cannot comment on that now since the house has seen fit to reject the suggestion that we should make marriage breakdown the sole basis—but there is no reason why a greater significance could not be given to that philosophy by introducing here what would be the counterpart of clause 3(d) and providing, as my hon. friend from Yukon has suggested, conduct which could be something less than the legally defined and established cruelty which is brought within clause 3(d). I think every member of the committee can contemplate circumstances under which conduct falling short of cruelty could, if it was persisted in for a very long time and was of a certain character, render intolerable the further cohabitation of the spouses.

Mr. Trudeau: Would that be mental cruelty?

Mr. Baldwin: No. I think you have established the cruelty which would be included within clause 3(d) but there is conduct falling short of that. Members of the bar have had occasion to advise people in matters of this kind, and I am sure other members of the committee also know of people in unfortunate circumstances where there is a course of conduct which is not cruelty within the meaning of clause 3(d) but which would justify a court in making a declaration, subject to all the other safeguards in this bill, that the parties need not further continue in the union which was binding upon them. I think it is on that basis that the hon. member for Yukon has made this proposal. I confirm and approve of what he has done. I do not know whether there is any use putting it in the form of an amendment, but I would like the minister to look at it and see if it could be a counterpart to the marriage breakdown provisions elsewhere in the bill.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I would like to support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North, because it seems to me that it simplifies and clarifies these provisions. I think that is desirable.

The minister, if I understood him aright, said it had been deliberately decided to treat a deserting petitioner differently from one who had just separated without the element of desertion. Perhaps this is reasonable, but I suggest to the minister that the purpose of making these separate categories is clearly carried out in the provisions of clause 9(1) (f) where it is provided that it is the duty of the court:

> where a decree is sought under section 4 by reason of circumstances described in paragraph (e) of subsection (1) of that section, to refuse the decree if the granting of the decree would be unduly harsh or unjust to either spouse or would prejudicially affect the making of such reasonable arrangements for the maintenance of either spouse as are necessary in the circumstances.

It seems to me that this provision in the bill would amply take care of the situation where a petitioning husband had deserted his wife and was refusing to make reasonable arrangements for her. I believe it would be a better way of dealing with the matter to leave it to the discretion of the court to say: You, as a deserting husband, are not in a position to secure your divorce; I must refuse it to you under clause 9 because it would be either unduly harsh owing to your conduct or unjust to the spouse you left without provision and would prejudicially affect the making of reasonable arrangements. In addition, under clause 10 and the following ones orders for arrangements can be made.

I suggest that the minister should contemplate the virtues of simplicity in dealing with these matters. He said we should not try to define everything. I am inclined to agree with him on that, but the fewer paragraphs we have about desertion as distinct from separation the better. If we have these provisions about desertion it will just add to the complications where there is a clear case of separation and the court is required to go into the question of whether the husband is providing adequately for the wife and also whether this was done in the initial instance three years before.

The definition of desertion, however it is made, is a complex and not a simple matter. It is not a question of just physically walking out of the house. It is a question of the provision that was made, of the circumstances and whether under those circumstances the person was justified in walking out of the joint domicile. It is a complex matter, and once you have established the principle of separation I contend you do not need to go into the question of desertion.

Mr. Otto: I put it to the minister that with respect to all of the offences under clause 3 and the grounds for marriage breakdown under clause 4 there is, with one exception, an opportunity to object. In other words, where the petitioner claims adultery on the part of the other spouse the other spouse has the opportunity to object and to prove that there was no adultery. The same applies to all the other marital offences and the grounds under clause 4 except one, and that is where there is a separation because of the husband or wife being in jail. Then, of course, there is no doubt. There obviously is a separation. A jail term has been handed down and in those circumstances there is no defence of any kind. Thus a divorce will be granted without defence.

I have no particular objection to that but for any of us to think that this bill is going to cure many of the ills present today would be not to face reality. Many of the provisions in the bill have been in force in the United Kingdom since 1937; yet one of the witnesses who appeared before our committee said that 95 per cent of the actions for divorce in the United Kingdom are still based on adultery. The minister will understand the reason for this. Adultery is a very simple thing to prove. There is a claim of adultery, there is an admission of adultery, and that is as far as the court goes. Therefore it is the cheapest and simplest way where a marriage is being put to an end by consent. Where there is no consent, at the present time it is impossible to get a divorce. Under the terms of this bill a divorce can be secured without consent after a period of five years. Other than that I cannot see that the bill changes the picture very much. I cannot see that any judge is going to accept an admission of cruelty, even by both parties. No matter how detailed and long the evidence in the case might be, I submit that what I say holds true. The same might be said about desertion.

The minister may say that where a husband is jailed for a long time the wife has an automatic right to a divorce. In other words, the imprisoned party loses his defence. It makes little difference if the period of separation is five years, three years or two years. A divorce is to be granted without the consent of the party not suing. For either party to sue for divorce before the prescribed period of separation there must be proof before the court of some form of marriage breakdown. In the alternative, the case must come within the confines of clauses 3 and 4 of the bill.

Mr. Wahn: I do not wish to labour the point that I originally brought to the minister's attention. His reply indicated that possibly he did not understand my suggestion clearly. I agree with the minister that a three year separation period as a ground for divorce is arbitrary. No one can say whether three years is right or wrong any more than whether five years is right or wrong. That is not the point to which I wish to direct the minister's attention.

My point is that where permanent impotence exists a divorce should be permitted and the parties should not be forced into a period of separation for three years, one year or for any period. I submit that in such cases the marriage should be terminated on the request of the aggrieved spouse without the necessity of any waiting period.

I know that the minister does not lack imagination. Let me refer to circumstances which are likely to exist to illustrate what I am suggesting. Take the case of a marriage which has been consummated and there are children of the marriage and then permanent impotence develops. Under this bill, in order for the wife to obtain a divorce she would have to desert her husband. She might have to take the children with her or leave the children with her husband. She might be without means of support. In any event, she must wait for three years at least before suing for divorce. The bill clearly states that a divorce may be granted after a certain period of separation.

Mr. Trudeau: Will the hon. member permit a question? What about impotence because of old age? Would he include that in the bill?

Mr. Wahn: I would have no objection to an exception being made in that case. I did not wish to complicate my argument by raising the point that the minister has raised. If it involves real difficulty I have no doubt that the departmental officials are adept enough to cover that contingency.

As presently drafted the bill provides that a divorce may be granted where the respondent for a period of not less than one year has been unable, by reason of illness or disability, to consummate the marriage. That ground is conditional on the marriage not having been consummated in the first instance. That clause, it seems to me, is almost mediaeval in tone. It is entirely out of keeping with the minister's character. It attaches too much importance to the single and original act of consummation. After there has been an act of consummation, there cannot be a divorce even though impotence develops. The parties must then seek their remedy under the separation clause of the bill.

To say that a divorce will not be granted in a case where a marriage has been consummated even though permanent impotence develops later is contrary to sound principle. I think the minister would be wise to correct this paragraph by deleting the words, "the marriage has not been consummated and" from paragraph (d). I hope the minister will consider this suggestion because the amendment which was suggested by the hon. member for Yukon and supported by the hon. member for Peace River might not cover the cases I have in mind. I submit that when a man is impotent he cannot be accused of wrong conduct.

Mr. Nielsen: It might be wilful refusal to cohabit.

Mr. Nugent: I am puzzled about paragraph (c). It seems to me that paragraphs (e)(i) and (ii) are wide enough to cover the three year separation period. Any petitioner who pleaded desertion as a ground of divorce would have to come within the confines of this clause. Surely the deserter would come under the confines of paragraph (e)(ii). To say under (c) that one of the parties could not be located for three years is to add confusion to the bill. My argument mainly is that paragraph (c) will bring difficulties. I cannot see the purpose of including it. Obviously, if the parties under paragraph (e)(ii) have been living apart for up to five years they have been separated; the marriage has broken down and a ground for divorce exists. I submit that paragraph (c) will hamper the courts in making their decisions. For that reason I think it is unnecessary in this bill. As I see it, paragraph (c) will bring nothing but difficulty.

[Mr. Wahn.]

Mr. Otto: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for St. Paul's raised an interesting point. Though the hon. member believes that impotence or non-consummation should be grounds for divorce I wish to point out that the common law of England, from which our law derives, and the laws of many other nations hold that non-consummation constitutes a breach of contract. The common law of England have never held that sexual relations cemented the marriage bond, because marriage was based on concepts of property.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Otto: When a man commits adultery with another man's wife he appropriates unto himself another's property. That was the old legal view. Non-consummation was a ground for divorce because it implied a contractual failure. The marriage contract was void ab initio. In other words, the contract never existed. If one of the parties is unwilling to participate in sexual relationships, that matter might be covered under clause 3(d). Otherwise it is not covered in the bill.

• (4:30 p.m.)

We cannot surely leave it to either of the spouses to decide that by withholding the pleasures of marriage or, indeed, by making such a claim, they will have grounds for divorce. This would presume that the laws of marriage and of divorce are based to some extent on this relationship. It may be that today we can make allowances for this relationship in our marriage and divorce laws by legislating in a different way, possibly under clause 3. This is a clause which is, unfortunately, linked with natural offences, and of course we are not dealing now with a marital offence. I understand that most countries which have had considerable experience with legal interpretation in connection with mental and physical cruelty have interpreted inability to engage in the sexual relationship as a form of cruelty and have made provision for granting divorce on this ground.

Mr. Basford: I should like briefly to answer the Minister of Justice in connection with my amendment and then to suggest, on a point of order, that we might have a more orderly debate if we confine our discussion to the amendment before us. The Minister of Justice has suggested it cannot be the purpose of the law to encourage or appear to encourage or reward or entice people to desert their spouses. Of course, I agree with that as a general principle.

I understand it was this thinking which led the special committee to recommend that a three year period be stipulated, that marriage be considered to have broken down if one of the partners had been deserted for three years or if one had been a deserter for a period of five years. It seems to me that when a marriage is going on the rocks few people will, in fact, be considering these legal distinctions and whether they have to wait for five years or only three years before they can go to court. From my own experience in the years when I was practising law I believe it would be unrealistic to say that the abolition of this distinction would be enticing or rewarding these people.

For those who might be considering their legal rights, it seems to me that the distinction created in paragraph (e) would lead to an undesirable situation in which a husband and wife whose marriage was going on the rocks would be jockeying around to see who was going to desert whom in order that the one deserted could have the advantage of a shorter period of three years before applying to a court. I can envisage that in some situations where hatred runs so high a husband who wanted to leave would refuse to do so and would create hell for his wife in the hope she would desert so that he would be entitled to the advantage of the three year period. For these reasons it seems to me that the distinction created in this paragraph is altogether undesirable, and I hope hon. members will support my amendment.

Mr. Trudeau: I can only say that on this occasion we have gone farther than the committee recommendation which provided for three years on the petition of the deserted spouse and did not provide at all for the deserter. I should remind hon. members that there has been a discretionary power in the divorce and matrimonial causes legislation of 1857 under which desertion was one of the bars to divorce. We are going much farther than that. We are permitting divorce even when there has been desertion but we are asking that the period should be five years.

Amendment (Mr. Basford) negatived: Yeas, 17; nays, 36.

Mr. Nielsen: I wonder whether the minister would reconsider the suggestion I put to him a moment ago in connection with the addition of a paragraph (f)? My hon. friend from Peace River has properly pointed out in regard to paragraph (d) that mental cruelty, the basis upon which a petition is founded, must be mental cruelty within the meaning of a strict judicial definition. I do not like using the word "definition" but it must be used here. Over the years the courts have defined this phrase within rigid boundaries.

The case raised by the hon. member for St. Paul's where there is no wilful refusal to cohabit but it is impossible to do so due to circumstances beyond the control of either of the spouses, could be repeated where parties have been physically injured as a result of accident or disease and where there is no wilfulness on the part of one party or the other but it is in fact impossible for them to cohabit. Notwithstanding the remarks of the hon. member for York East whose version of the law I cannot share, this is one of the main and fundamental factors for married people. I would therefore ask the minister to consider introducing a government amendment which would permit a judicial discretion to be exercised in cases of misconduct which a husband or wife cannot reasonably be expected to endure. This consideration could then be submitted to the courts as a ground for the exercise of judicial discretion in terminating a marriage.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Trudeau: This debate has such an agreeable tone and hon. members are so constructive that I hate to appear obstinate. Moreover, as hon. members know, I really have no vested interest in the legislation one way or another. In response to the hon. member for Yukon I can only say on the question of whether there is cruelty or not that if there is nagging I suppose it could be interpreted by the courts to be mental cruelty if it goes on for a long time. So there is the test under clause 3. If there is not cruelty, then I must object to the suggestion on the ground—and I think the hon. member for Yukon and the hon. member for Peace River realize this—that it is really introducing the breakdown concept once again in its almost pure form, because here the courts will have to say there has been no cruelty. But what is it that one of the parties cannot reasonably be expected to endure? Is it something less than mental cruelty, a physical handicap of illness and, if so, how long does it have to be unendurable? Having taken the stand in respect of this bill that we will introduce only a modified breakdown concept, I can only say I am caught in my own logic and, perhaps with nostalgia, must reject the suggestion of the hon. member.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 5 agreed to.

On clause 6—Rule for determining domicile.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, in connection with subclause 2 of clause 6 there is some doubt in the minds of several members who have read it and reread it concerning what it means. Would subclause 2 of clause 6 result in the recognition in Canada of Mexican divorces or divorces granted by any other jurisdiction outside Canada? At first glance it seems that this subclause is placed here in order to give effect to the first part of the clause relating to the domicile of married women who are under age and married women separate from their husbands' domiciles. However, there does not seem to be any limitation. The wording is most difficult to straighten out. Could the minister either give us the assurance that we will not recognize any divorce granted in any other jurisdiction which does not define domicile as we do, or tell us whether it limits it to places which recognize the domicile of a married woman only?

Mr. Trudeau: I will gladly answer that, Mr. Chairman. As a matter of fact I stood at the same time as the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka because I had an amendment to introduce which I think tends to clarify the very question which has been asked. I realize that since we introduced the bill there have been some questions raised both in the house and in the press about the interpretation of this provision. I should like to distribute copies of this amendment both in French and English. It is seconded by the Postmaster General. I should like to explain here what the intention is and what I believe the amendment spells out. We intend to introduce domicile rules which are new to our law and which will go beyond even the recommendations of the joint committee because we not only apply the new rule of domicile to the married woman within Canada but also outside Canada.

I should begin by saying that clause 6, subclauses 1 and 2, really apply only to married women. In other words, we are not changing the law of domicile as it presently exists for men. That is the reason that in the amendment—hon. members might look at lines two, three and four—I have added these words to the present clause:

—without limiting or restricting any existing rule of law applicable to the recognition of decrees of divorce granted otherwise than under this Act—

Let us sum up the situation in respect of men first. In the case of men the rule will not change. If a man goes to Mexico, Nevada or anywhere else, that is his domicile if he is domiciled there within the meaning of domicile as given by Canadian courts. Members, especially those who are lawyers, know that this is a difficult term and I would not attempt to define it here because domicile has varying meanings from province to province.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is the crux of the issue. It is what the Canadian courts determine.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes. I do not intend to rewrite all the laws in respect of domicile in Canada. There is a constitutional difficulty involved here. The provinces have their laws in respect of domicile and there has been some difficulty, as hon. members know, with regard to federal statutes in the matter of grappling with this idea of domicile. We did not wish to re-open the debate on that. If a man is domiciled in Nevada he can obtain a divorce under the Nevada laws, but he cannot just go there, establish a short residence there, not domicile in the sense we use the term, come back and expect our courts to recognize his divorce. So for the moment there is no change. Once again may I say that I am not attempting to cover all the jurisprudence and case law in respect of domicile. We are just trying to make the existing rule applicable to women as well as to men.

A woman who is married and domiciled in British Columbia does not have to move to the province where her husband has established his domicile in order to sue for divorce. In other words, under this clause, she is being treated equally with him. I believe this is a step forward toward fair treatment for men and women. We went a step forward and established this rule also in respect of persons domiciled outside of Canada. Here again we are going a bit farther toward liberalism and equality of the parties. We thought that the equality in this regard should apply not only within Canada but also outside Canada. That is the reason for subclause 2. Once again there is no attempt here to solve the problem of domicile in the final sense for men and women. We are just saying that whatever the laws are under provincial statutes or under provincial laws they will in divorce matters be the same for men as for women, a woman being in the position of a man for the purpose of divorce.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Do I understand the minister is saying basically that so far as a man is concerned the law is not changed? The minister gave the example of a man who is domiciled in Nevada. The question of whether or not he is domiciled there is determined not by the laws there but by the law of Ontario if that is the province of the court in which the petition is brought.

Mr. Trudeau: That is correct.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): On the question of domicile the rules to be applied are the rules of the Canadian court rather than the rules of the purported place of domicile.

Mr. Trudeau: That is correct.

Mr. Smith: I have a question for the minister relating to the first part of this clause which suggests that the domicile of a married woman shall be determined as if she were unmarried. This may lead to circumstances which are quite common to lawyers who live in the vicinity of armed forces bases. A soldier and his wife may have come from the province of British Columbia, for example, to live in Ontario. The cause for divorce may have arisen in Ontario. The man has no domicile here but the woman, if she has not gone into the labour force, may very well intend to return to her home, from whatever part of Canada she came, and could not meet the requirements. It seems to me it is not clear whether she has Ontario domicile for the purpose of divorce. It says "as if she were unmarried", but perhaps she has not entered the labour force or set up any permanent residence in Ontario and has not demonstrated one of the ingredients of domicile, namely, the intention to stay. Is that woman to be placed in the position of having to return to British Columbia where she intends to resume her separate life and be put to all the expense of a divorce in Ontario?

Mr. Otto: The minister has said that it would be very difficult to establish Canadian domicile and I should like to know why. The minister will realize that domicile is very complicated so far as men are concerned because it involves the intention of living somewhere for the rest of one's life. I think this provision will lead to many appeals. We are now saying that a woman is to be put in the same position as if she were unmarried. I think this will lead to difficulties particularly if there is any objection to the establishment of Canadian domicile. If a person had domicile in Canada that person could originate a suit anywhere in Canada. I am given to understand there is some constitutional difficulty in this regard. The minister should indicate the provinces, if any, that have objected to this type of change in the law. Why do we not take advantage of this opportunity to change the ridiculous common law on domicile?

Mr. Aiken: Before the minister answers I should like to outline one other thing that still puzzles me, and I have in mind the words "without limiting or restricting any existing rule." Could we not merely use the word "altering"? I am concerned about enlarging the existing rule of law applicable to the recognition of divorce. I do not think we are too concerned about limiting or restricting any existing rule of the law because the existing rule is fairly clear. What we are concerned about is that this clause may expand or enlarge the rule of law. I am wondering whether the minister has any objection to the word "enlarging"? This is more what we are concerned about. I suppose it is difficult to define what you mean by "restricting" and "enlarging" because this depends on the direction of your thought. To my mind enlarging the existing rule of law would be making foreign divorces more broadly recognized. I do not think this amendment completely covers the point in that this clause is not intended to enlarge the recognition of foreign divorces.

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps I may be allowed to answer some of the points, if I am able to do so. In answer to the question as to why we do not settle once and for all the rule of domicile and set it out in this law, apart from the constitutional difficulty, I think it is unrealistic for hon. members to want to settle this kind of extraneous question by the divorce law. I must refer members to the text of the bill which says "for all purposes of determining the marital status in Canada." It is for this purpose alone that I introduced the amendment. This amendment would not apply to other purposes which have to do with income tax, inheritance or anything else. We are saying that the existing laws on domicile, whatever they may be, when you are talking about marriage, will also apply to women.

Surely hon. members are aware of the reason we are doing this. It is not to complicate the law but rather to meet the case of a husband and wife who are living separate and apart. We want to avoid the necessity of a wife having to cross the country or perhaps the world in order to plead her divorce case in his domicile, which is the case under our present laws. Under our present laws, by and large we define a woman's domicile as that of her husband, if she is married. We are saying that in respect of a divorce which puts an end to the marriage, so far as the establishment of domicile is concerned, a woman can establish domicile in any way which is open to a man. I cannot refer to all the domicile laws in Canada, but if hon. members will look at sections 79, 80 and 81 of the Civil Code of Quebec I think they will find a very satisfactory definition of domicile. We could write this into the statute laws of Canada, but I am not sure that all hon. members would be prepared to do so without having a committee look into the matter. I am suggesting that we bypass this broad definition now and say we are going to accept the laws of domicile but make them equal for men and women.

As to the point of saying "without limiting or restricting" rather then saying "without enlarging", it seems to me the point is we are enlarging the existing rule of law in Canada in such a way that it will apply to women as well as to men. I think that is all we should say at this point.

Mr. Nugent: I am a little puzzled, since I think we all agree that the purpose of this clause is to make it possible for women to have a fair shake in the courts when it comes to domicile, because the clause says:

> —of any country other than Canada by a tribunal or other competent authority that had jurisdiction under that law to grant the decree—

I cannot get over the feeling that a court could interpret this as meaning that we are saying that if the court in the other country has jurisdiction then its law applies. I cannot understand why we have to word the clause in this way. Certainly the Reno courts would say that under their jurisdiction they have authority, and that is not our purpose. The minister shakes his head and indicates that it is, but it is my understanding that we are not recognizing the validity of a Reno divorce. The wording of this clause seems to me to leave it open to an interpretation which is not intended. All we are trying to do is to change the law in respect of women in order to make it clear that they have equal status. I think there should be some clarifying words to that effect.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Otto: Mr. Chairman, the minister has said that we should not tie in domicile with property, taxes and so on. My intention, of course, was to define "domicile" only under this bill and for the purposes of the bill, and to allow any person domiciled in Canada to initiate a divorce action anywhere.

The minister said that we are putting the married woman in the same position as the man. I have taken part in the debate on this clause because this question brings to mind the famous case of Gulbenkien v. Gulbenkien on the question of domicile. The minister will remember it. Young Gulbenkien, the son of the oil baron, pleaded that he was domiciled in Paris because that was where his father lived and from where he got his income. In all these cases it will now be pleaded that the wife's domicile is really that of her husband because she depends on him for her maintenance. We may be restricting the right of a wife to plead a divorce action by allowing the domicile rule to remain as it is in the clause. Why could it not refer to Canadian domicile?

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I may be extremely dense today but if I am I was dense yesterday and I have a number of dense associates because we cannot figure out how this subclause will not have the effect of permitting a person who has obtained a divorce anywhere in the world to say that the divorce is valid because it was granted on the domicile determined by that particular court. The subclause starts with these words:

> For all purposes of determining the marital status in Canada of any person—

In other words, the subclause starts out by covering those persons who have been legally divorced. Then it says:

> —recognition shall be given to a decree of divorce granted after the coming into force of this act under a law of any country or subdivision of any country other than Canada by a tribunal or other competent authority that had jurisdiction under that law to grant the decree, on the basis of the domicile of the husband or wife in that country or subdivision, or on the basis of the domicile of the wife therein determined—

Let us leave out the part about the wife because we know that is the intention of the subclause. I am concerned about the general law of Canada as related to husband and wife. As I read the subclause—and perhaps the minister could make it a great deal clearer—it provides that recognition is given to a decree of divorce granted on the basis of the domicile of the husband or wife "in that country", that is, the country that granted the divorce. How can the minister say this subclause does not say that? I know the minister's intention. The intention relates only to the wife. If that is the case, all right, but the subclause does not say that and it refers to any person. I think this subclause is so badly phrased that an amendment would only make it worse.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I can explain the meaning again, but before doing so let me say that when we find the word "domicile" in a Canadian statute—and I gathered from the question of the hon. member for Rosedale that this was understood—the Canadian courts interpret the word according to our law and not according to the law of whatever land is referred to. This explains the meaning of the phrase "domicile of the wife in that country." It is domicile as defined and understood by our courts in connection with our statutes and common law.

This means that if a person goes to Reno and obtains a divorce on the basis of residence and the person is effectively domiciled in Nevada—domiciled, once again, as understood by our courts—we will recognize that divorce because it was granted by a tribunal which had jurisdiction under the law of Nevada. In other words, the Nevada law will apply if the person is resident in Nevada under Nevada law and will be recognized in Canada if the person is domiciled there. Once again, the Canadian courts have always interpreted the word "domicile" in a Canadian statute according to Canadian laws and standards. This is the rule.

I would not mind spelling it out in a clearer way if that is the desire of the committee. I must say that we struggled quite a bit with this wording and I had the assistance of very able draftsmen, especially when there was some doubt after second reading. We then looked at this wording again. If we do not want to meet the kind of problem raised by the hon. member for York East and try to rewrite our laws on domicile, which I suggest we should not attempt if we want to adjourn for Christmas, we must not try to go any further than we do here. We must rely on the Canadian courts to continue interpreting the word "domicile" appearing in Canadian statutes as they have always interpreted it in the past.

With regard to the problem raised by the hon. member for York East, I would refer him to section 80 of the Civil Code of the province of Quebec and let him find the test there, which I think answers his question.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, would the minister answer a question? We say we are going to give recognition to a divorce granted by a tribunal that had jurisdiction under the law of that country. The only time domicile comes into the question is with regard to jurisdiction, and we are saying that we will recognize a divorce granted by a tribunal that had jurisdiction under the law of that country. This is the plain meaning of the word "domicile." I wonder whether we could not include a phrase such as "jurisdiction as defined or as recognized under Canadian law", in respect of a tribunal that has jurisdiction as recognized now by Canadian law?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not think it would meet the point at all. Let me try to illustrate by another example. I am only repeating the same thing in different forms. Let us consider the law of France. The law of that country will grant a divorce on the basis of nationality, not on the basis of domicile or residence or anything else. We would recognize a divorce granted in France by the authorities in that country authorized by their laws to grant divorce if the person asking for the divorce to be recognized in Canada was domiciled in France, not if he had the nationality of that country.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): According to our laws.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for Carleton says "according to our laws." We would apply the Canadian law of domicile to the person asking our courts to apply it. We would apply that test according to our law. I think I must sit down, Mr. Chairman.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: All those in favour of the amendment will please rise.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Divorce Law Reform

• (5:10 p.m.)

On clause 7—Duty of legal adviser respecting possibility of reconciliation.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, my comments on clause 7 will also apply to clause 8. In my opinion neither clause is consistent with the function either of a lawyer or a judge. It is the role of the lawyer to determine the facts in the particular case and to advise his client of their effect under the law. In the role of an advocate it is the duty of the lawyer to adduce proof of facts in support of his client's case and then to persuade the court of his client's rights under the law in the face of these facts.

I should like to turn to some of the considerations which are involved in these two clauses, namely, whether or not a particular couple may be reconciled, whether it would be appropriate to require them to undertake further efforts at reconciliation, and what these efforts should be. In my opinion these are not legal questions and should not properly intrude into legal proceedings. There may be persons with appropriate training in the social sciences capable of prescribing for conduct on the part of either or both the spouses which might lead to reconciliation, and it might well be that following a further study of human relations some more general process of reconciling this type of dispute may be established. I must express some doubt as to the likelihood of finding such an early solution to these problems, but I do not discount the possibility.

I note that the report of the joint committee at page 153 was much less positive than is the draft bill as to the efficacy of this proceeding. The committee acknowledged that compulsory marriage counselling is not a practical proposition and the following statement is made in its report:

> However, while the introduction of such provisions into the law might be desirable, it would be a mistake to expect too much from them. The experience in Australia, and some other jurisdictions, would lead one to believe that such powers tend to be exercised infrequently.

It seems clear to me that at the present time members of the legal profession and the bench are not qualified to make definitive judgments on the kind of question which is imposed on them, and it seems likely that the words in the clause which will most frequently be used are the so-called escape words, namely, "except where the circumstances of the case are of such a nature that it would clearly not be appropriate to do so." I have the suspicion that this exception will be invoked far more frequently than the other provisions of the clause.

I do not think the clauses impose a serious legal problem or a serious impediment to parliament but I think they are unrealistic. I direct my comment not so much at the minister as at my colleagues at the bar in Toronto who have asked me what we intend to do by this requirement. I do not think these are appropriate provisions. I think I understand some of the minister's thoughts in introducing them but I do not predict legal efficacy for them.

Mr. Fairweather: I could not agree more with the hon. member for Rosedale. I spoke on this matter at an earlier stage of the debate on the bill. I respect the minister and therefore I think he will not mind when I use strong language. I believe this is nothing more than a sop and window dressing. I am absolutely certain that it will just become a technique sloughed off by barristers merely to fulfil the meaning of this clause. I think this is a great pity because the need for assistance arises long before the case reaches the lawyers office.

I believe the minister will agree that there is a need for a useful marriage counselling service to be set up by whichever jurisdiction has the power to do so under the constitution. I think it is a pity that a basically good piece of legislation is cluttered up by a catch-all section which is thrown in here merely to placate those who are interested in the strengthening of marriage and in the reform of the law in general. I know the minister can give a good answer and we eagerly anticipate it, but I think it would be better if we did not have this clause at all. Parliament should not say something in the legislation which it knows perfectly well will not have a meaningful or useful effect.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Chairman, I support the hon. member who has just spoken and I suggest to the minister that the clause be deleted entirely. I urge the committee to vote against this clause. Let us consider it carefully. It reads as follows:

> It shall be the duty of every barrister . . . except where the circumstances of the case as of such a nature that it would clearly not be appropriate to do so—

Barristers are in business to make money. The old concept of professional ethics has certainly dimmed in the past 10, 15 or 20 years. I would hate to entrust some barristers with the decision as to which of the circumstances in any case are or are not appropriate. They are not trained to decide that. This is why in subclause 1(a) of clause 7 it is stated:

> To draw to the attention of his client those provisions of this act that have as their object the effecting where possible of the reconciliation of the parties to a marriage;

That is easy enough. The lawyer will say to the client: Here is the act, read it. Subclause 1(b) reads:

> To inform his client of the marriage counselling or guidance facilities known to him—

I for one cannot even think of one marriage counsellor in Toronto to whom I would care to send anyone. The qualifications of marriage counsellors in Toronto are nonexistent, and complaints have been made about this for years. There are no competent people in this field in Toronto. Of course there are psychiatrists who charge a great deal of money for their services, but I would not suggest to any person that he spend $40 or $50 an hour over a period of several years. Subclause 1(c) reads:

> To discuss with his client the possibility of the client's reconciliation with his or her spouse.

I suggest that whatever is usually done by lawyers will be done. I found whenever I undertook to discuss reconciliation with a petitioner for divorce that they had already made up their minds to get a divorce and did not want my advice. Subclause 2 reads as follows:

> Every petition for divorce that is presented to a court by a barrister—shall have endorsed thereon a statement by such barrister—that he has complied with the requirements of this section.

I suggest that the compliance will be in word only; it will merely be a rubberstamp compliance. Who will then judge whether the lawyer has indeed complied? Therefore I suggest to hon. members that they should vote against this clause.

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. member permit a question? He said that barristers are not trained to do the things he mentioned. I am in the dark on this issue. Could he explain his statement?

Mr. Otto: I am sure the Chair does not wish me to start a discourse on the training and qualifications of lawyers. All that can be said with certainty is that they are not trained to be marriage counsellors.

Mr. Enns: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to let the remarks made by the hon. member for York East go by without some challenge. Would he not agree that some effective counselling is being done by marriage and family counselling agencies, not particularly related to divorce proceedings but rather preventive counselling services to strengthen and keep families together? Would he not agree that such a service is available in Toronto?

Mr. Otto: No, Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with that. I have come to the conclusion that qualified psychiatrists are hesitant about taking marriage cases because they feel there is not much chance of success. If any lawyer tries to send a client to a marriage counsellor or a psychiatrist who specializes in this field, he will find it very difficult. In the city of Toronto marriage counsellors are usually retired tax assessors or hangers-on at city hall. These counsellors often say: There is not much you can do so you had better get a divorce. After all, this is a very complicated business. There are no doubt some competent marriage counsellors, but the average marriage counsellor leaves me with little hope for the success of this provision.

Mr. Brewin: The minister may be surprised to know, Mr. Chairman, that I should like to support this clause. I do not want to be diverted by the hon. member for York East into discussing either the qualifications of lawyers or of marriage counsellors in the city of Toronto. I should like to say to him only that I do not agree with his rather pessimistic conclusion on both groups of people. I am sure there are lawyers who have no qualifications. I am sure there are marriage counsellors who have no qualifications. I should like to suggest to him there are lawyers with very good qualifications embracing experience and humanity. There are marriage counsellors who have the same qualifications.

During the debate on second reading of the bill I said I was apprehensive about clauses 7 and 8 when they were attached to legislation which maintained the concept of marriage offences. What the hon. member for Rosedale and the hon. member for Royal have said may be correct. This may be just a sop, as they put it, or a formality which the profession may not take seriously. I share their basic views on this matter but I want to disagree with them in this respect. I believe that the maintenance in this bill of clauses, however inadequate they may be, which look to the concept of reconciliation is good. I take the view that if in the future it turns out these provisions are inadequate it will be up to parliament to amend them and make them more effective. I do not believe that we should just remove them from the bill as though parliament did not believe that procedures for reconciliation are important. This would leave the impression that parliament had adopted the view of the hon. member for York East that lawyers and marriage counsellors are quite incapable of dealing with matters of this sort. I repudiate this contention. I do not believe that these clauses, as they stand in the framework of this bill, are going to produce any wonderful results. However, I suggest there is greater value in keeping them here than in taking them out. I suggest we should support these clauses.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I believe the hon. member for Rosedale and the hon. member for Royal put the argument very well. There is almost nothing to suggest that these two clauses should be retained in view of the fact the house has considered and rejected the marriage breakdown concept. These two clauses really suggest to the courts that we are bringing in the marriage breakdown concept by the back door. Before the court can look at the petition for divorce the lawyer must advise the petitioners of this concept and the court must be satisfied that it has been considered. We then have a case which amounts to marriage breakdown. I suggest to the hon. member for Greenwood, who is so much in favour of that principle, that he is in favour of these two clauses because they do everything that he feels should be done in so far as the marriage breakdown concept is concerned. Since the house has rejected it and since it would be an unsatisfactory and unworkable way of trying to bring about a divorce, I must agree with the hon. members who support the rejection of these two clauses.

Mr. Wahn: I should like to support the retention of these two clauses. I say to the hon. member who has just spoken that the house has not rejected the principle of marriage breakdown, as I understand it, but has accepted the principle of marriage breakdown as one of the grounds for divorce. The house has rejected the contention of those who wished to have marriage breakdown as the only ground for divorce. The principle of marriage breakdown as an important ground for divorce has been accepted. These two clauses are completely consistent with the principle of marriage breakdown. I hope they will not be treated merely as formality either by the legal profession or by the bench but on the contrary will be taken very seriously.

It may well be that at the moment we do not have adequate facilities for marriage counselling, but we have some in the city of Toronto. It is my understanding that they have been effective in some cases. I feel these are important clauses and they should be retained. We are primarily concerned with the maintenance of sound marriages in Canada, not merely with providing a quick method for cutting the marriage tie. These two clauses are important and if they prove to be less effective than we think they should be strengthened in the future.

Mr. Leboe: I wanted to ask the minister to explain what an advocate is. There is a reference in the clause to "barrister, solicitor, lawyer or advocate." These words appear also in clause 8. It is interesting to note that after a petition is brought before the court, the court can nominate a person of experience and training in marriage counselling or, in special circumstances, some other suitable person. I am wondering what an advocate really is. Perhaps the minister would relate his explanation to clause 8. I realize we are dealing with clause 7 but perhaps he could relate his explanation to clause 8 and give some clear explanation of what an advocate is.

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps I should deal with that point first. As hon. members will recall, when you are in doubt about the meaning of a word in a statute of Canada you look at the translation. The words "barrister, solicitor, lawyer or advocate" are translated into French by the one word "avocat". I think the key to the enigma is that the bar of each province decides who has the right to appear before the court to present petitions for divorce. In some provinces they are called solicitors and barristers. The bar of each province will decide who is entitled to appear and the names given to these people will vary from place to place. I cannot explain exactly why the word "advocate" was used here except that perhaps some provincial bars use the word "advocate". From the context obviously it is any person who is entitled to present a petition for divorce.

On the same general problem, in dealing with the question of why we talk about reconciliation in these clauses the word "sop" was used. I am sure it was chosen with a little bit of irony. The truth of the matter is that the government took the view that it should write into the bill provisions intended to go as far as possible to avoid divorce by ensuring that reconciliation procedures would be attempted. We did this not as a sop to the very responsible bodies which made representations to that effect but because we wanted to respond as ably as we could to the desire of the Canadian people to maintain marriage as the important institution it is and to put divorce in a very special place in our society. I can say that we went as far as we could under our constitutional authority.

The hon. member for St. Paul's gave the bill his support. I am grateful for his support. He indicated that if it did not go far enough we should try to do better. I agree with his comments. But I can only say here that to go much farther we would have to enter a field which is not strictly a federal field. As I explained in my opening remarks, in this bill we were faced with all kinds of constitutional difficulties, and it would have been simpler if we had sought an amendment to the constitution to transfer jurisdiction over marriage and divorce to the provinces. I hope nobody in the press catches this, but this would have permitted an easier solution of one aspect of the matter because the provinces, through their authority over social welfare, through their authority over the general matter of children, marriage and the consequences of marriage in a social sense, can do much more than we can in the area of reconciliation. Perhaps I should point out, Mr. Chairman, that the first part of my last sentence was partly facetious. We have authority over divorce. We legislate on divorce and we have gone as far as we can to write provisions respecting reconciliation into our laws.

To lessen the fears of the hon. member for Rosedale that we are going outside the spirit of the law by asking the lawyers and the judges to do this, I can only refer him to the laws of a number of countries which are guided by the same rule of law as we have. I would not mention France, which has a different system and which imposes upon a judge the duty to attempt reconciliation, but I would point out that in New Zealand the court is required to consider the possibility of reconciliation, and it may adjourn for that purpose. The adjournment there is for 27 days instead of the 14 days that we have provided. In Australia the court is also required to give consideration to the possibility of reconciliation. Once again, I say we did the best we could under our law. Perhaps in better times and under a different constitution we could have a different type of court, similar to those I was attempting to describe yesterday, which would be closer to the concept of administrative law. But once again for constitutional reasons we could not do this.

We felt we must not refuse altogether to tackle the problem, and we have tackled it by a measure that went as far as we felt we could under the constitution. I would gladly accept amendments if they could make it go farther, or I would suggest we take the attitude that, in later years, after some time for study of the application of this legislation, we should see if we can improve it.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to note that all the members who have spoken on clause 7 are members of the legal profession. Perhaps they should have a special concern because what is involved is the imposition of duties on lawyers who attempt to act in divorce cases. I listened carefully to the hon. member for Rosedale but I could not really determine whether he was opposed to the provisions of clause 7 because he felt they had no efficacy or because he felt they were undesirable. Perhaps he meant both. I am still not sure.

I would like to support the retention of clause 7 in the bill for the reason that it simply puts the onus on lawyers who presume to act in divorce cases to attempt to try to help toward the achievement of reconciliation between marriage partners who feel they have no way out but to seek divorce. It may be that some members of the legal profession will use the escape feature contained in subclause 1. It may be that some lawyers will simply ignore the provisions of clause 7 by consistently using the excuse that in the circumstances of the case it is clearly not appropriate for them to advise their clients that there are marriage counselling services, guidance facilities, etc., available. But in that case, let the onus be on the individual lawyer. Let his conscience bother him. I do not see why we in this parliament should remove the substance of clause 7 simply because it is felt that some lawyers may seek to ignore its provisions.

Mr. Leboe: Would the minister consider a situation where in a province someone other than a barrister, solicitor, lawyer or advocate presents a petition to a court? It seems to me that there are other qualified people who could present petitions and if the provincial authority gave them that right they should be able to do so. This is something that should be left to the provinces, is it not?

I can see a real heyday for lawyers so far as money is concerned when they get into a situation like this with one postponement after another. The result will be that they will continue to add a little more to their fees and really go to town. It seems to me that we are putting the presenting of petitions solely in the hands of the legal profession.

Mr. Trudeau: This again is a matter for the constitution to determine. Under our system of law it is the provinces that are enabled to make laws for the administration of justice. So far as I know, and I think this is a pretty safe guess, all the provinces have decided what persons may appear before their courts and plead the law. I also think it is pretty safe for me to say that certain persons, if they are lawyers, advocates, solicitors or barristers, these being the four descriptions used across Canada, are entitled to represent other people before the courts. All provinces, in one form or another, describe those who are entitled by their laws to practice law, and generally this description is written into the provincial bar acts. But if a person wants to avoid going to a lawyer, this does not exclude the possibility that he can present his own case himself. I am quite sure that the laws of the provinces, at least of those I know, permit a person to act on his own behalf and appear in court to plead his own case. But those laws do not say that a marriage counsellor or a medical doctor, for instance, should plead divorce petitions before the courts any more than they would permit a skilful lawyer to operate on a patient for appendicitis. This is a matter of provincial determination.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, should there not be some mention about an individual himself being able to plead his case? That is not mentioned in the bill. I am not a lawyer; I am merely seeking information.

Mr. Trudeau: That might be ultra vires.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 7 as amended carry?

An hon. Member: On division.

Mr. Trudeau: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I do not think there was any amendment to clause 7. In any event, no amendment has been carried. The clause must either carry as it is or not carry.

Mr. Brewin: On the same point of order, Mr. Chairman, I recall that there was an amendment before us but I did not hear the amendment being put. Had it been put I should have voted against it.

An hon. Member: There was no amendment.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): There was the suggestion of the hon. member for York East. We did not vote on it. I want to say a few words on this clause because I support what the minister is trying to do. The thinking of the committee is well set forth on page 153 of the report in the following words:

> However, it is to be hoped that conscientious lawyers would do this without official urging.

Sometimes reconciliation is impossible. If a lawyer loses a case, so what? Every conscientious lawyer takes on that responsibility. The law is a profession; it is not a mercenary trade. The responsibility of the lawyer is to see that the law is carried out. That was the thinking of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

An hon. Member: On division.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 8—Reconciliation proceedings.

Mr. Enns: I share the reservations that some hon. members have expressed about the efficacy of clauses 7 and 8 of the bill. Clause 8(1)(b) increases the number of disciplinary professions that may be involved in counselling. Paragraph (b) reads:

> (i) a person with experience or training in marriage counselling or guidance, or
> (ii) in special circumstances, some other suitable person,

I ask the minister why so many categories are included. I also ask him to recognize that effective work is being done by child care institutions, family bureaux and other agencies throughout the country. They do good preventive work and they have kept many families from appearing before the divorce courts because of their counselling and preventive work. I wonder whether the minister would accept a suggestion. I am not prepared to move an amendment at this stage. Could paragraph (b)(i) read this way: "a person or agency with experience or training in marriage and family counselling". The other words in (b)(i) could be deleted. In fact, (b)(ii) could be deleted altogether. Would the minister accept this suggestion?

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I want to deal with precisely the same question that the hon. member who has just spoken has raised. Someone who is in the social welfare field with the social planning council of Ottawa told me yesterday that in the Canadian field of social services there are some who have been trained in family counselling rather than in marriage counselling. If marriage counselling is to be regarded as a separate discipline requiring a separate form of training, few Canadians have been trained in that field. For that reason I prepared an amendment which I sent to the minister. The amendment would strike out the words, "marriage counselling or guidance" in (b)(i) and substitute the words "family counselling". The latter term, I understand, includes marriage counselling or what is purported to be guidance.

I bring this subject forward not because I have any knowledge in this field but because certain information was conveyed to me. The term that ought to be used in the bill is "family counselling". I agree with the suggestion which the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa brought forward. I do not wish to move a formal amendment since formal amendments have not been too successful. But I ask the minister nevertheless, to give this matter consideration. Perhaps he might suggest such an amendment.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for Greenwood raised this subject yesterday. I have had time to reflect on what he said and I shall answer him at the same time as I answer the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa. I think the hon. member for Greenwood, who is sensitive with respect to constitutional questions, will understand my reasoning. I have no objection to the expression "family counselling" as such but I want the language of the bill to be as strict as possible. Though hon. members may have dissenting opinions on the matter, I wish to stick to the words of the B.N.A. Act which give the federal government jurisdiction over marriage and divorce but not over family matters.

Perhaps considerations having to do with the B.N.A. Act might not influence every member but I think they are important. I do not wish to give a pretext to any parties who might look at the bill for saying that the bill deals with subjects that directly or indirectly do not come within federal jurisdiction. I am certain that marriage and divorce come within federal jurisdiction but, on the other hand, family questions are mixed questions and are not entirely within federal jurisdiction. For that reason I do not think that we should spend too long on the words which have been suggested as amendments. The language of the bill is safe language, in my opinion.

The hon. member for Portage-Neepawa suggested that paragraph b(ii) should be eliminated. I thought that in some instances the court might decide that the family priest or pastor, who is perhaps not specialized in marriage counselling or guidance, would be the appropriate person to bring in as a counsellor. That is why the wording is as it is.

Mr. Enns: Since the minister is reluctant to delete (b)(ii) would he consider adding to (b)(i) the two words "person or agency". I wonder whether the bill as it now reads excludes the worth-while work that certain agencies now perform. Certain family agencies may be excluded from participating in guidance or counselling as the bill now reads.

The minister referred to the language of the B.N.A. Act. What he said may be very true. The minister, I am sure, wishes to see certain revisions made to that act. We are now in 1967 and the act could include some new words. It could well include the words "marriage and family counselling". Would the minister not agree that far from being revolutionary this would, in fact, be more in keeping with the usage of language which is common today—"a person or agency with experience and training in marriage and family counselling"?

I find a special difficulty with the word "guidance". In my mind guidance has very much to do with vocational counselling. Most guidance counsellors work in schools or universities and advise students on courses of training appropriate to their future careers. Perhaps the meaning as I have expressed it is too limited. Perhaps the minister could expand it. I would still ask him, though, to include the word "agency" and the word "family" so that the clause might read, "marriage and family counselling" and so on.

Mr. Brewin: The Minister of Justice said I was sensitive to constitutional issues and I hope he is right. But surely he is carrying a constitutional issue beyond any conceivable relevance when he says that because we suggest in a clause dealing with a peripheral matter, that a family counsellor should be consulted we are in some way or another being unconstitutional.

After all, if the minister has been able to swallow clause 11 which deals with custody of the children of a marriage and the maintenance of the wife—and I do not know what is closer to being a family consideration than that—if he can swallow that camel surely he should not strain at the gnat in clause 8. I do not think this is an earth-shaking matter, but if the minister has found out that my information is correct, namely, that there is a group of people who are trained in family counselling and who happen to be the people most capable in Canada of performing the function referred to in clause 8, I wonder why what I must say appears to be a far-fetched constitutional argument should be dragged in to prevent a description of the officials who can help.

I point out that when we are through with family counsellors we can get any other persons to do the counselling. Surely the minister does not mean that reference to family counsellors would lead to constitutional difficulties simply because we do not put in the word "marriage" or "divorce" in every clause and subclause of the bill.

Mr. Trudeau: It seems to me we can rely on the courts to call on a marriage counsellor or a family counsellor. I think we can rely on their common sense. Even if an agency is called a family agency or family guidance agency, the courts could conceivably say that the people concerned must know a little about marriage.

I do not think this discussion is a very useful one. I used the word "marriage" perhaps because there was a slight constitutional bias in my mind in favour of a word appearing in the British North America Act, the subject of federal jurisdiction. I am not irrevocably wedded to it but I do not think it is worth while suggesting an amendment inspired by the idea that the courts would not use the services of people who happen to call themselves family counsellors instead of marriage counsellors.

I think the reason we used the word "person" instead of "agency" is that we did not want this to become impersonal. We think that, in fact, the courts will probably choose counsellors who are members of agencies, but there is nothing lost by using the word "person". Indeed, if one looks at the Interpretation Act one might even find "person" interpreted as being an agency on occasions. I am not sure. It might be the case.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 9—Duty of court on petition.

Mr. Brewin: In connection with this clause I have an amendment to move which I believe to be of some substance. It relates to subclause (1) (a) which provides that when divorce is being considered by a court it shall be the duty of the court to refuse a decree based upon the consent, admissions or default of the parties or either of them, and not to grant a decree except after a trial, which shall be by a judge without a jury.

Here I believe that what was intended was that a decree should not be based upon either written or formal consent presented to the court, or upon mere admissions or default in the absence of a trial. I think it was intended to deal with the question of proof or the manner of proof either of the offence or of the circumstances indicating marriage breakdown. But I would point out to the committee and the minister that a perfectly proper interpretation of the words I have referred to could give them a far wider meaning. They could mean that where there was consent basic to the circumstances concerning the ground for the divorce, the court must refuse the divorce.

It is my suggestion that this weakness could be cured very easily by adding two words to the paragraph which would then read as follows:

> It shall be the duty of the court—to refuse a decree based solely upon the consent, admissions or default of the parties or either of them—

And so on. The use of the word "solely" would indicate that it is the intent of parliament merely to deal with the question of how one proves the case upon which a petition for divorce is based, and that the reference is to formal consent or pleadings. This is important because it is quite possible that the intent of parliament could be defeated by some judge who would say that upon the evidence it appears to him that the parties consented, for example, to commit adultery or consented to a separation, and the petition was therefore based upon the consent of the parties.

The fact of the matter is that many divorces under the old system have involved an element of consent. No doubt this will continue to be the case when the new system is introduced. I am not talking about collusion. I am talking about consent to the extent that the parties are in accord as to the facts or are aware of what is going to happen. In these circumstances I suggest it would be useful to clarify clause 9.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether you propose to call it six o'clock and proceed with other business at this stage, but I have an amendment to present to the committee and I will read it in order that the minister may consider it. I move:

That clause 9 (1) (a) be amended and the following substituted therefor:

(a) to refuse a decree based solely upon the written consent, admissions or default of the parties or either of them, and not to grant a decree except after a trial which shall be by a judge, without a jury.

• (6:00 p.m.)

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock it is my duty to leave the chair in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather), Unemployment Insurance—inquiry as to inclusion of hospital employees; the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), Public Service—request for reconsideration of increase refusal; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), Public Service—pensions of retired civil servants.

The house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

VAWN PIPE LINES LTD.

The house in committee on Bill No. S-17, to incorporate Vawn Pipe Lines Ltd.—Mr. Jorgenson—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, we have before us in committee today a bill to incorporate Vawn Pipe Lines Ltd. which I have discovered was considered at the same sitting of the standing committee on transport and communications at which Bill No. S-16, to incorporate Cabri Pipe Lines Ltd., was considered. My examination of these bills indicates that there appears to be a good deal of similarity in form between them and that the powers set out in Bill No. S-17, as proposed for this company, are virtually similar in all respect to those contained in Bill No. S-16.

In the discussion earlier in this chamber the sponsor and his friend, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, made some effort to convince us that the proposed powers in this bill, as in the other one, really are not anything about which we need be concerned. If I may put it this way, an effort was made to suggest that these incorporations are simply what I might call paper tigers and that because they are we need not have any concern about the form of the bills and the powers which we are being asked to give the particular companies if they are incorporated. It was also suggested to us that we need not worry about them because they are subject to the provisions of the National Energy Board Act and the jurisdiction of the National Energy Board.

I have looked through this bill and I have read some of the discussion which took place during the committee hearing. I have refreshed my mind a bit about the terms of the National Energy Board Act under which the activities of this company will be governed if the company is incorporated. I am not at all convinced by the argument so far presented in relation to bills of this nature by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. In fact it seems to me that if one examines the proposed powers of this company in relation to the terms of the National Energy Board Act there is some ground for real concern about their request for power to go beyond, in many ways, the provisions of the National Energy Board Act in respect of holding properties and carrying on ancillary business.

One reason for concern is that the proposal is for incorporation of a company which would be authorized to construct and lay pope lines in all parts of Canada and beyond the borders of our country. In relation to the discussion in respect of the other bill I sought to draw some parallel between the situation that we may be creating now and the situation which was in fact created in this country in an earlier era with regard to the charter of a multiplicity of railway companies. I do not intend to repeat the argument I advanced in connection with the other bill. However, I notice that during the committee hearing some inquiry was made concerning the area of operations this company has in mind if it should be authorized to go into business. Reference was made to an area in the northwestern part of Alberta close to the Alberta-B.C. boundary. I should like to read from the minutes of proceedings and evidence No. 9 of the standing committee on transport and communications, page 315. This is the evidence of Mr. Matheson. He said:

> At this time we are probably talking about only 30, 40 or 50 miles, in that area, depending on how far east we have to go of the B.C. boundary to pick up the product and move into B.C.

Then the hon. member for Wellington-Huron asked about the existing pipe line over the boundary in British Columbia. In the questioning the fact is brought out that Westcoast Transmission Company Limited operates in the field of gas and a provincial company known as Western Pacific Products and Oil Pipelines Ltd. transports crude oil. It is mentioned that these lines run roughly parallel to one another down through British Columbia. Apparently it is made clear that this proposal would enable the transmission of petroleum products west through the outlet leading to the British Columbia coast rather than through the Rainbow Pipe Line system which apparently operates in the same general area of Alberta.

The point that interested me was a question by the member for Wellington-Huron in which he remarked that it would appear as though there were going to be an awful lot of pipe line companies out there. I mention this to show there are members of the house who may not be very familiar with the geography of a particular part of the country but who are interested, if not concerned, about the great multiplicity of pipe line companies and the possibility of unnecessary duplication of pipe line construction.

The spokesman for Vawn Pipe Lines made it very clear that while in comparison they may not be as big as Westcoast Transmission they would like to be. This leads me back to the point I was trying to make during an earlier discussion, that by granting to company after company wide open authority and power to build anywhere and everywhere, as is proposed by the terms of this bill, we are setting up group after group of businessmen who think they are going to be able in effect to run the pipe line business of the country.

By setting up a multiplicity of conflicting and competing interests we will in my view have overconstruction and overexpansion of transportation facilities, in spite of the authority for regulation conferred by the National Energy Board Act. This concern is more pointed if one examines the National Energy Board Act to see what terms of reference are given to the board by that act. As I understand the act, practically no terms of reference are given to the National Energy Board. I other words, it is a board that, subject to the occasional and very spasmodic review of parliament, acts at any particular time in relation to the allocation of certificates for construction of pipe lines almost entirely on the whims or fancies of government policy as they exist at any particular time. This situation is far too closely parallel to the kind of situation which existed in the days of the railways building boom in this country.

The National Transportation Act passed by parliament during the 1966-67 session and as hon. members are well aware, there is reference in that act to pipe lines but pipe lines which are defined strictly as commodity pipe lines. By definition this does not include the kind of pipe lines used for the transmission of oil or gas. It is true there is a preamble to the National Transportation Act which purports to set out a general transportation policy for Canada, but that transportation policy applies only to commodity pipe lines. I do not want to attempt to say whether it is adequate, but as I understand it that is the situation. It applies only to commodity pipe lines which are covered under part II of the National Transportation Act. It does not in any way apply as a term of reference laid down by parliament in respect of gas or oil pipe lines.

This leads me back to the contention that the existing terms of reference in respect of licensing for the construction of pipe lines are not such as to satisfy me that it is advisable or desirable to go on passing bill after bill incorporating companies with wide open authority to construct pipe lines anywhere in the country. In fact, the principle involved in the incorporation of this company is concerned only with the construction of a very modest pipe line within a fairly limited area, according to the evidence placed before the committee.

I am prepared to suggest in connection with this bill, as I did in connection with the previous one, that we should have a serious look at the advisability of continuing to incorporate companies of this kind. It is all very well to suggest that this is simply a matter of creating a corporate being, and I notice the National Energy Board Act says that pipe lines may be constructed and operated by companies, but this leads us to suggest that we ought to have a serious look to see whether it is necessary or advisable to allow groups to come before parliament with this kind of application for incorporation.

At this point perhaps I should draw the attention of the committee to another feature of this bill, and attention was drawn to this situation during the committee hearing by the hon. member for Kindersley. The terms of this bill, it was suggested, would give this company the power to get into the commodity pipe line business. In this respect it seems to me we are creating a situation in which the company will be given authority to operate under the National Energy Board Act and under part II of the National Transportation Act when that act is proclaimed and comes into being. Here again, in view of discussions we have had about a possible breakthrough in respect of commodity pipe lines it seems to me that by allowing as a matter of routine to any and all comers the right to enter this field, in addition to what they claim to be their immediate concern, the construction of a small pipe line for the transmission of petroleum products, we are opening up a real Pandora's box. If this is allowed to continue it seems to me it will become virtually impossible for any body such as the National Energy Board or the Canadian Transport Commission to maintain any kind of rationale because of all the conflicting interests and pressures which will be brought to bear.

The concern I am trying to express is by no means frivolous and I am not attempting to express an obstructionist view. I feel that hon. members should give consideration to a broader term of reference than apparently was dealt with by the transport committee. Indeed, when the transport committee meets to hear a particular applicant it cannot go beyond the terms of reference in questioning the proposals. I think it is up to the committee of the whole house to explore the broader aspects of whether the practice of incorporating companies such as this should be continued.

When I say that, Mr. Chairman, I am not in any way being directly critical of this applicant because the proposals contained in this bill have been put forward by others. No doubt counsel for this company, when assisting it to prepare the bill suggested the company should ask for all these powers, with the kitchen sink thrown in, as one might say. This is the kind of examination and consideration that I feel should be carried out in a broader context before we placidly rubberstamp these applications one after another as they come before us in committee of the whole.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, the only thing that surprised me in the address just given was that the hon. member said he was not being frivolous or obstructionist. As to the rest of his speech, I have no doubt as to the sincerity, earnestness and ignorance displayed in the views he brought to bear on this subject. I have had private conversations with the hon. member and I said to him that his last speech was obstructionist and he managed to talk the bill out so that it went to the bottom of the list.

Mr. Barnett: The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona did a fair amount of talking himself.

Mr. Nugent: I gave him as much information as I could, and I thought this time I had better put it on the record rather than privately and quietly in conversation with him. First, if the hon. member wanted to know anything about this company's plans, in order not to waste the time of the house—there is only a certain amount of time for private members' bills—these questions could have been asked in the committee. Certainly the efforts of the New Democratic party in the committee are notably lacking. They are not interested. All they want to do is make sure that they kill these bills in the house. I want it on the record that this is a pipe line bill in the usual form, the form that has been settled by parliament, by both the Senate and the House of Commons, for a long time as being the most suitable for pipe line construction. I want it on the record that this is a Canadian company, Canadian owned, Canadian managed, and working in a Canadian field—the sort of thing I thought most of us in this house wanted to go along with.

The talking out of the Cabri Pipe Lines bill, as they are doing now with Vawn Pipe Lines, means that these bills will not be passed this session. As the New Democratic party members know, this means we will not be able to provide jobs for welders and other workers in the pipe line and construction industry whom most of us want to see working. The New Democratic party, by their tactics, are keeping these people from valid employment this winter.

There was no valid point of criticism in the speech just made, nor was there in the speech of the hon. member for Timiskaming when the previous pipe line bill was before the house. There has been no validity at all in so far as criticism of the form of this bill is concerned.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question? Was there any indication anywhere in the evidence that this company had any intention of building the pipe line this year?

Mr. Nugent: With regard to Cabri Pipe Lines, I am not sure what the evidence was that was given before the committee.

Mr. Peters: I am referring to this bill.

Mr. Nugent: With regard to Vawn Pipe Lines the evidence given before the committee was that some drilling companies are now engaged in drilling for oil and gas in the field. If those efforts are successful, and the indications are that they will be, there will be an early demand for this commodity. Bearing in mind the time necessary to go before the National Energy Board and the various provincial bodies, if the company is to be able to service those oil fields at the time the service is required they need this authority now. I am not sure whether this will take two or three months, and obviously the hon. member who asked the question could not care less whether or not there will be jobs this winter.

The hon. member who just spoke talked about paper tigers and setting up a company with unlimited powers. All we are being asked to do is set up a corporate entity with the capacity to do any number of things that the National Energy Board will give them the power to do in the national interest. This house has delegated to that board the responsibility of checking to see what powers are necessary, what areas the company may serve, to what extent they may serve and in what manner they may do it.

[Mr. Nugent.]

All this is known, of course, to these members. Any suggestion that this bill is wide open and the company can build anywhere for any purpose is just so much nonsense, as they well know. I cannot for the life of me understand the attitude of the New Democratic party members in making such a fuss with regard to other bills. They have talked out other private members' bills because, they said, there was not enough Canadian content in the company. They wanted to ensure Canadian ownership, Canadian capital in the company, Canadian management and that Canadian workmen would get the jobs. When we find all these conditions met by this company, as they were by Cabri Pipe Lines, the New Democratic party finds another excuse. Perhaps I am being unfair to the New Democratic party; it could be that it is simply the hon. member for Timiskaming and his helper who have decided that there is no better way in which they can show how powerful they are as members than by abusing private members' hour and saying that everybody must knuckle under to them and to any peculiar notion they have.

I suggest that if the will of parliament were supreme in these matters members would rise and voice their valid objections and then let the matter come to a vote in order that the house could decide whether in a matter of this kind we were giving wide open powers to a group that was irresponsible or that we were neglecting to exercise control. Since the members who talk out these bills are singularly unwilling to let them come to a vote, it shows they know they would have no support whatsoever in the house in trying to obstruct these worthy projects. When these members try to talk to us about their duty as legislators, I submit their words fall on rather unfertile ground.

There is no use my talking any further, Mr. Chairman. I am sure we will hear a long harangue from the hon. member, but I want it on the record at the time these members are speaking that if there is anything wrong in the form of this bill I have yet to discover it. In my conversations with them and from what they have said in the house I have discovered they have yet to bring forward a single valid criticism of the powers granted or show that they are unnecessary. I am willing to answer any argument in this respect.

This is the type of company that we want to encourage in Canada. It has the kind of ownership that we want to encourage in Canada. There is good reason for not talking the bill out and for letting the matter come to a vote. If these obstructionists want to talk out these bills in order to build up their own ego, let them pick on a couple of companies that merit criticism. These are the wrong companies to pick on. Anybody with any understanding knows that these are companies that should not be picked on for this kind of treatment because they are exactly the kind of small businesses that we are trying to encourage in Canada. They have Canadian ownership and Canadian purposes.

The members of the New Democratic party always pretend to be champions of the working man. I hope that the various union people across the country, who through a levy on their union dues provide the funds that help elect these sort of people, will understand that their enforced contribution to the New Democratic party helps to make sure that there are no jobs available in this field this winter.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I could ask the hon. member a question? The hon. member has recognized that he has run into some difficulty on this bill. Would he be agreeable to standing it this evening so that it will retain its place on the order paper? Then he would be able to have the full hour on it again on Thursday. I think there might be general agreement to such a procedure.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that the hon. members who are trying to obstruct this bill, as they did the last one, have to take the responsibility for it. There is no reason for the bill not being passed. I hope it will be passed.

Mr. Germa: I heard it said on this side of the house when the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona was speaking that he made the same speech five years ago. I am surprised that he has been engaged in this activity for so long and yet has not become acquainted with the policy of the New Democratic party. He states that we want Canadian content, Canadian ownership, Canadian boards of directors, and everything Canadian. This is true; but I must also remind the hon. member that we have no more faith in Canadian boards of directors than in foreign boards of directors, because they are all motivated by the same principles; and I think the hon. member is quite familiar with the principles of the business world today.

I must also remind him that it is not only the N.D.P. that is objecting to the introduction of this type of legislation. The hon. member for Kindersley is certainly not a member of this party, and he moved an amendment in committee which would delete one of the provisions having to do with the movement of solids in the bill as it now stands. The hon. member for Kindersley said he had a feeling of guilt for taking what he thought was a rather superficial view of this provision for the movement of solids. In referring to other bills incorporating gas or pipe line companies which have been passed by the house he said he had a sense of guilt for not having objected to the passage of these bills. I am surprised that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona gave full credit to the N.D.P. for seeing that justice is done in Canada instead of giving the credit to a member of his own party.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of privilege. I did not give credit to the N.D.P. for having a sense of justice. Instead I blamed them for obstruction. I think it is an insult to put the hon. member for Kindersley in the same class as the hon. member for Sudbury or the members of his party.

Mr. Peters: That is some point of privilege.

Mr. Germa: If the hon. member wishes to dissociate himself from the members of his party, that is up to him. However, he cannot dissociate himself from us without dissociating himself from a member of his own party. I have more respect for the hon. member of the Conservative party, who is not afraid to be called an obstructionist, if that is what the hon. member considers him to be.

I offer constructive criticism. We are not satisfied with the incorporation of a multiplicity of such companies. The hon. member is oversimplifying the situation, which is often the case when a complicated problem is reduced to simple terms of yes or no. If an hon. member happens to say no, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona charges him with obstructionism.

I do not consider an application for the incorporation of a pipe line strictly in that limited sense. When we speak about the incorporation of these lines we must think about transportation as a whole, because certainly a pipe line is a mode of transport. We all know that the movements of solids either in capsule form or dissolved in another product will be the order of the day and may turn out to be our major mode of transportation in this country. This is why we are concerned. If I had only my own interest at heart I could be doing better things by joining the other 235 members who are absent. Perhaps this is why rail transportation in Canada is faced with such difficulties. The lack of interest in the house may have been the cause of the predicament in which the Canadian National Railways finds itself, faced as it is with a debt in perpetuity. Our children and our grandchildren will be paying this debt to the bondholders. The company was not nationalized in the interests of Canada, but to make the bondholders rich. This is precisely why I object to the creation of a multiplicity of conflicting and overcompetitive pipe line systems without any regard for the over-all transportation policy in Canada.

The hon. member only wishes to consider a small corner in western Alberta. He wants a 30-mile pipe line to be run across the border. I admit this is only a small project, but how many bills dealing with the subject have come before the house in the last four or five years? I have only recently arrived in the house, but my colleagues in the party have told me what is going on and the attitude of this parliament with regard to the subject. Nobody seems to care what will happen to transportation in Canada. Who will take the responsibility for the effect these bills might have? Is it the job of the 25 hon. members who are present here today to determine transportation policy? It certainly is not. I object to these bills, endorsed by a private member, being brought before the house. In the long run, he does not have to take the responsibility for what happens.

These bills should be brought in by the government and it should take the responsibility for the ultimate result. No one bears the responsibility for the incorporation of these companies because by the time the effects are evident hon. members sponsoring these bills will be gone. It is a surprise to me that there are so few members in the house who take an interest and who try to come to a consensus on how the transportation policy of Canada should evolve.

Mr. Nugent: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he not realize that the question is not how the transportation policy of Canada should be evolved? He should realize that the reason for the small number of hon. members in the house is that they are aware of the fact that if they were here they would have to listen to members like the hon. member who now has the floor.

Mr. Germa: That is what I referred to, namely oversimplification. The hon. member cannot think of more than one thing at a time. As I said at the beginning, these pipe line systems cannot be considered separately from the over-all transportation policy in Canada. They are inter-related; eventually they will conflict with each other and become a great burden on the taxpayer.

Some members have a high degree of faith in business. They believe that as long as it is business it must be good. I have nothing against business, but to me it is only a means of supplying me with a service. It is not an institution like the church or schools, which we have to perpetuate and develop. If I could supply my needs without business, I would do so. That is how much faith I have in business as it exists today.

Some people are more cynical about business than I am. When I visited the Yorkville area in Toronto, where the real cynics of Canada are concentrated, I met a girl who was selling toilet tissue at one cent per piece. I asked her what she was up to, to which she replied that she was a businesswoman and that as long as it is selling and people are buying she is doing business. She was highly cynical with regard to the business community.

I am glad I am not that cynical, but I do not have the faith in it that some hon. members here seem to have. In the long run the general public support business, and yet the costs of advertising, of competition and of overconstruction are being borne by the people of Canada. Business itself does not support this.

The support the business set-out in this bill will receive must come from the people, and therefore the people have a right to say where, when and how it will function. Parliament is the voice of the people, it is for that reason we are standing here tonight asking these questions.

The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona certainly should not be making disparaging remarks about the N.D.P. He has not said anything constructive so far, and he has not answered any of the questions.

Mr. Nugent: Ask your questions and I will answer them.

Mr. Germa: I should like to read what he said at the time we were discussing the other pipe line, as reported in Hansard at page 5442.

The Chairman: Order, please. I have been listening very carefully to the remarks of the hon. member. While I recognize there is a general debate on clause 1 of a bill of this nature, that general debate must be relevant to the bill before the committee. May I suggest to the hon. member for Sudbury that he confine his remarks to the bill before the committee. If he wants to quote from the debate on another bill, I must advise him the Chair would not consider that to be relevant to the bill before us.

Mr. Germa: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate your interjection. I hope you will feel free to correct me at any time I stray from the rules of this house. I realize I am not fully acquainted with the multiplicity of rules for this chamber, and I do appreciate your guidance and instruction. I accept them quite readily. I should explain that I was going to quote those remarks because the committee report referred to the two bills in one sentence. The committee said both bills were in the same form and contained the same powers. I thought therefore I could relate them, but I accept your decision.

The hon. member did ask what we objected to in the bill. We have told him that we did not want to give Vawn Pipe Lines the power to erect townsites and, in fact, reduce a whole group of people to living under the federal system. This bill would give the company the power to buy and sell land, to construct streets, roads, sewers, instal electricity, and do almost anything an incorporated town would have the power to do. I do not see where such powers have any relationship to the export, transportation or refinement of petroleum products. However, these powers are in the bill.

The only argument put forward so far as Bill No. S-17 is concerned is that it is in the same form as other pipe line bills. This is precisely our objection, Mr. Chairman. Since we were wrong yesterday or we were wrong last year, does that mean we have to continue to be wrong for time immemorial? Are we never going to demand that these bills be put in a form which is acceptable to me and to the large following we have in Canada?

Mr. Nugent: How about the majority of the house; would that be acceptable?

Mr. Germa: I made a proposition which would enable these bills to be passed by the house. If the government would introduce the bills and accept responsibility for these pipe lines, then certainly the bills could be rammed down the throats of the people. So long as the bills are in this form, and no one takes responsibility for the mess which we are going to have in Canada as a result of this proliferation of pipe lines, then we will object. The passage of this bill would result in the construction of 30 miles more of pipe line.

The hon. member also criticized the fact we were going to stop welders from having work this winter and that we were delaying construction. There is nothing to indicate the company is going to start work now. They are still exploring and have high hopes of obtaining some product to transport. According to the committee report the company hopes eventually to get a product to transport. At the moment, they have nothing so we are not delaying the development of Canada. Certainly if the product were piling up waiting to be transported we would have to grant this incorporation for the immediate public good. We would have to disregard the long term effect. This certainly is not the case now. There is no oil or gas running out on the ground for lack of transportation.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say about Vawn Pipe Lines at the moment. If someone were willing to delete or amend the powers in the bill to which we have objected, then certainly we would have no objection to a Canadian company being incorporated to transport a Canadian product and to supply work to Canadian workers. In fact there is probably no party in this house more concerned about labour than the New Democratic party.

If you just look at our members, Mr. Chairman, you will see the section of society from which they come. I believe the members of the other parties represent a different section of society. So, Mr. Chairman, I am unwilling at this moment, for the price of $1,200, to grant this hunting licence to Vawn Pipe Lines Limited.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I will be prepared to ask the indulgence of the committee to have this bill remain at the top of the list for further debate, as we did with the Cabri bill, if the circumstances were similar. We were then of the opinion that Cabri Pipe Lines was sincerely interested in having a pipe line constructed. However, the Vawn company, which is the same company under a different name, does not fit into that category. As the previous speaker said, the Vawn company is asking for a licence to hunt. They are going to hunt anyway, because they get that licence from the provincial government. When they find something, then we will supply them with the means of transporting and delivering it.

I agree with some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. I certainly endorse those remarks which were related to the fact this is a Canadian company which is engaged in a Canadian development for the purpose of handling one of our natural resources. Really this company and the previous one should have formed only one company, but in the case of Vawn in particular more time is needed to reconsider just what they need. Today the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is sponsoring this bill. I think he is a more appropriate sponsor for it than his predecessor. At least he comes from the area where these companies will be operating, while the previous sponsor came from another province.

The hon. member has referred to the National Energy Board as the regulatory agency, as the policeman of the federal parliament. I have looked up the National Energy Board Act, which was passed in 1959, and which has been amended a number of times since then. I find that in operation it has not done exactly what it was inferred it would do. It was the intention that the board would grant rights to a pipe line, once a pipe line company had been incorporated by parliament and received corporate identity. These rights that the board was to grant cover most of the rights which are laid out in this bill.

If hon. members turn to page 315 of volume 1 of the Statutes of Canada, 1959 they will find there Part V of the National Energy Board Act, dealing with the powers of pipe line companies. Section 2 deals with the general powers granted to pipe line companies under the act. It speaks about entering upon crown lands, and in subparagraph (b) uses these words:

—purchase, take and hold of and from any person any land or other property necessary for the construction, maintenance and operation of its pipe line—

In subparagraph (c) it uses these terms:

—construct, lay, carry or place its pipe line across, upon or under the land of any person—

[Mr. Peters.]

Subparagraph (d) reads:

—join its pipe line with the transmission facilities of any other person at any point on its route;

Subparagraph (e) uses these words:

—construct, erect and maintain all necessary and convenient roads, buildings, houses, stations, depots, wharves, docks and other structures—

Subparagraph (f) contains the following:

—construct, maintain and operate branch lines—

Subparagraph (g) says:

—from time to time alter, repair or discontinue—

Subparagraph (h) reads:

—transmit hydrocarbons by pipe line and regulate the time and manner in which hydrocarbons shall be transmitted—

And subparagraph (i) says:

—do all other acts necessary for the construction, maintenance and operation of its line.

Section 2 deals with a pipe line handling sulphur compounds obtained from an oil or gas well, or any product thereof. In other words, Mr. Chairman, we gave the National Energy Board the right to make all these decisions, and what we are being asked to do in this bill is duplicate those decisions. I point out that Part V of the National Energy Board Act, in section 80, winds up by saying:

Except as otherwise provided in this Part,

(a) this act shall be construed as incorporate with a special act, and

(b) where the provisions of this Part and a special act relate to the same subject matter, the provisions of the special act shall, in so far as is necessary to give effect to the special act, be taken to override the provisions of this act.

We have given the National Energy Board the authority to give the company the right to do everything that foreseeably it will be able to do. Now we are being asked through this special bill to give Vawn Pipe Lines the right to do all the things that it foresees within its expanded expectations.

Mr. Nugent: Within the capacity given to the company to accept that power.

Mr. Peters: I am not interested in what may not happen; I am only interested in the eventuality.

There is an interesting thing about this particular company. In the proceedings before the transport and communications committee of the Senate on June 29 of this year Mr. Matheson, one of the witnesses for the company, was asked how far the pipe line would extend and he replied that it would extend approximately 17 to 18 miles. But on November 28 the same gentleman said they were talking about 30, 40 or 50 miles, depending on how far they had to go to pick up the product and move it into British Columbia. This company has a great propensity for convincing itself of its expanded requirements.

I think both of these pipe lines are excellent ones. In my view the company's original proposition was worth while and could be supported. I and members of this party will support it, but we will not support all the junk that goes with it. Of the 11 private bills on the order paper, five deal with pipe lines. These five companies are asking for powers that they will never use. Had Vawn Pipe Lines Limited just wanted to build a pipe line to collect from an oil or gas well that has not yet even started to produce, and was not opposed by Westcoast Transmission and other pipe lines, we would be agreeable. I hope the sponsor of the bill will convey to the company our willingness to acquiesce in any reasonable projection.

Mr. Nugent: You have given no suggestion of any reasonable projection. You simply say, "Don't ask for this power," but there is no practical limitation of power that you can suggest, or that I may suggest, in which you will acquiesce. Give us some reasonable suggestion, and not just say that we must clean up the bill in order to suit you.

Mr. Peters: If the hon. member will sit down and read the evidence given before the Senate committee and the House of Commons committee, and then study the bill that was drafted following those proceedings, leaving out the one amendment that was moved, I think he will not find it difficult to draft a bill that will get a better hearing than this one.

The Chairman: Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members business has expired.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The house will now resume the business that was interrupted at six o'clock.

DIVORCE

MEASURE RESPECTING GROUNDS, JURISDICTION, JUDGES, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-187, respecting divorce —Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Batten in the chair.

At seven o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) was being considered.

[English]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I am rising to speak about the amendment which the hon. member for Greenwood proposed. I dealt with this subject previously when I was asked whether the word "consent" in this clause would bar the possibility of parties consenting to separate for three years. My reply is that the matter has reference to procedure within the court. It cannot be taken to have meaning within any other context.

I see no harm in that part of the amendment that the hon. member suggests. Possibly there may be usefulness in accepting it. I do not mean to belittle the amendment. If the introduction of the word "solely" before the word "upon" would achieve a greater degree of precision, I should welcome the amendment.

I am not so enthusiastic, however, about other parts of the hon. member's amendment. I refer to the word "written" before the word "consent". It seems to me that by adopting the word "written" we should destroy the precision of the sentence. In other words, if there were "written consent" in the clause, the courts might be inclined to judge a contrario and to say that a verbal consent was not written consent and that therefore they need not necessarily refuse the divorce.

While we are waiting for other hon. members to enter the chamber perhaps I might move a subamendment to the effect that I have outlined. If the hon. member who moved the original amendment would agree not to insist on the word "written" I should have no objection to including the word "solely". That word corresponds with our intention, and therefore I welcome it.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I am so overwhelmed by the flexibility of the minister that I gladly accept his suggestion. I think he is quite right; we do not need the word "written". The word "solely" is perfectly adequate. I do not know the right way to go about amending the amendment. In any event, should the minister move the amendment he suggests, I should gladly accept it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It might be easier if the hon. member were to withdraw his amendment and move a fresh amendment.

Mr. Brewin: With your leave, Mr. Chairman, and with leave of the committee I shall withdraw my original amendment and substitute the amendment which would add the word "solely" before the word "upon".

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to do that?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the hon. member for Greenwood has leave to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: For the information of members of the committee the hon. member for Greenwood, in his new amendment, moves:

—that clause 9 (1) (a) be amended and the following substituted therefor:

(a) to refuse a decree based solely upon the consent, admissions or default of the parties or either of them, and not to grant a decree except after a trial which shall be by a judge, without a jury.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 10—Interim orders.

[Translation]

Mr. Forest: Mr. Chairman, with regard to clause 10, on second reading, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) indicated in his reply that jurisdictional conflicts should not be allowed to interrupt the study of a divorce bill. I fully agree with him, but clause 10 of the bill provides that the divorce division of the exchequer court could make orders with regard to alimony and the custody of children.

Now, could the minister tell us which will have precedence, the divorce division of the exchequer court, the superior court, or a provincial court, such as the welfare court, regarding the custody of children, or if agreements will be entered into with the provinces in that connection, in order to avoid any jurisdictional conflict, if, for instance, a decree has already been granted and, afterwards, a petition for divorce is submitted by one of the parties wishing to have the judgment of the courts, already rendered in that regard, reviewed or amended? Could the minister enlighten us on that matter?

Mr. Trudeau: With pleasure, Mr. Chairman. I have indicated that this problem deserved consideration and I am happy to be reminded of this by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Forest) at this stage.

I think that if proceedings in separation have been started in the provincial courts with subsidiary or corollary relief concerning the custody of the children, alimony, etc., and that, later, a petition for divorce is introduced and accepted by the courts, it seems to me that when a divorce decree becomes absolute, there does not seem to be any doubt that a divorce having occurred, judicial separation ceases to exist and, as a result, the corollary relief ordered under the separation decree would also cease to exist. In other words, and I base this on the jurisprudence of our courts, when a divorce decree occurs, the bond is broken and there is no longer any question of separation of bed and board because, under the law, there is no longer any marriage.

Therefore, the effects resulting from a judicial separation no longer exist, as would be the situation if one of the parties died. There is a breach of the marriage bond, there is a breaking off of the cause which resulted in subsidiary effects and, therefore, in such a case, the federal act on divorce would prevail, not because of a precedence of the federal act on the provincial act, but because the decree of divorce, once again, destroys the very bond of marriage and thus destroys the effects which may result from a decree of separation. The conflict would be resolved in that way.

The other hypothesis which might be proposed in theory would be: Could the court which granted a decree of separation amend its decree after the divorce? Certainly not, since the divorce ended the marriage.

This brings me to deal with another question raised the other day by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme) about the conservatory measures which can be taken under the Civil Code and the Code of Civil Procedure now in force in the province of Quebec, and which should be taken before the superior court. There is no doubt that those measures of conservatory attachment could not be regulated under our act because, as accurately pointed out by the hon. member, those are measures concerning civil property and rights, and the central government is unable to legislate directly in that field, even if it wanted to. Therefore, the hon. member was right to suggest that, in such a case, the parties in the province of Quebec—and I think that the same reasoning would apply in the other provinces where, as we know, separation legislation exists —should take another petition in separation with the conservatory measures before the civil court, if that were necessary to protect his share of the common property.

This leads us to the conclusion that everything would be much simpler if, first of all, federal legislation regulated not only divorce, but also separation from bed and board. I indicated at the resolution stage that we intended to hold discussions with the provinces in an endeavour to deal with this problem of separation from bed and board and, if possible, treat it in the same way and deal with it in the same legislation as divorce. Secondly, I said that we were hoping the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland would decide to follow the wise advice of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme), according to whom it would be greatly beneficial to the parties if these provinces were to use clause 22 of our bill to allow the superior courts of Quebec and Newfoundland, rather than the exchequer court, to apply the federal legislation.

Mr. Laflamme: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. minister just one thing. Subclause (b) of clause 10 says:

—for the maintenance of and the custody, care and upbringing of the children—

When referring to children, in clause 10, are we referring to the definition of children given in clause 2, subclause (b) which says that they are under 16 years of age?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Chairman, since the courts acting under this bill would have no jurisdiction over the children who are over 16 years of age and that is why we have insisted a little on the interpretation clause which gives a definition of "children".

Of course, the problem which we face is this: what would happen to children over 16 years of age, and for an answer to that problem I refer the hon. member to a statement which I made earlier, to the effect that the rights of the children born from the filiation, under the Civil Code, subsist and could be pleaded under other proceedings. Therefore, a child 18 or 20 years of age would have other recourses against his father, but they would not be available to him under this legislation. I must add that this is true also for the other provinces, since all of them do not accept the age of 16 as the age when obligations of custody and so on cease.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 11—Orders granting corollary relief.

Mr. Aiken: On clause 11 my hon. friend from Kamloops had intended to raise a point concerning the need for more definite inquiries on the part of the court into the circumstances of the parties. The suggestion is that a duty should be placed on the court to do more than is required by this clause—that another form of words should be used which would oblige the court to make inquiries.

With this in mind I suggest to the minister an amendment along these lines:

That clause 11 be amended to read:

(1) Upon granting a decree nisi of divorce the court shall, if it thinks it fit and just to do so . . . make one or more of the following orders—

Then the clause would go on to paragraphs (a), (b) and (c). The substitution of "shall" for "may" would I believe strengthen the bill. This would make it more certain that we really do intend to protect the spouses, particularly the wife and the children.

Before deciding whether this should be put forward as a formal amendment I should like to know whether the minister would be sympathetic toward such a proposal.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Trudeau: Once again my intention here is the same as that of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. I suggest the wording of the bill meets the intention he has in mind. The court may make one or more of the following orders, which is his phrase. He indicates, however, that perhaps the court should have regard to "the condition of the parties", and so on. I suggest that the way it is spelled out here amounts to the same thing. If the court thinks it is fit and just to do so, "having regard to the condition of the parties" and so on, this means that the court must have "regard to the conduct or condition of the parties", and so on, in order to know whether it is fit and just to do so. In other words, the court cannot just decide whether it is fit and just, in the abstract. It will decide whether it is fit and just, having had some look at the evidence and after having looked at some substantiation of the fitness. The way to do so would be to have "regard to the conduct of the parties", and so on.

Therefore I suggest that the other wording may be more happy wording, but I believe this present wording meets the same end and perhaps has the added advantage of not imposing upon the courts any obligation which it obviously must not fulfil in any great detail.

I have in mind a case where perhaps one of the parties is dead, has gone or has disappeared. The court will have regard to this, but it does not have to make a very detailed investigation into the moral conduct of that disappeared person because there is no question of that person being given the custody of the children. Therefore I do not think the amendment is absolutely essential, and under the principle of Occam's razor, I suggest it should not be accepted.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister to reconsider this matter because, without reflecting on the merits or demerits, it seems to me that what is being done by this bill is not only to regularize divorce but make it easier. Earlier in respect of clause 7 and other clauses we had discussion about the obligation which it is suggested falls upon various people to bring about reconciliation, and the criticism that perhaps this is not a proper function to impose upon the advocates who represent the parties in these proceedings, a suggestion with which I concur. If the minister, however, is prepared to impose upon the lawyers the obligation of attempting to bring about a reconciliation—an obligation which may be both too late in time and misplaced after the onus has shifted—then, it seems to me he should also be willing to ensure that the courts will carry out a function, which will now properly belong to the court, not of trying to bring about a reconciliation of the marriage but rather of ensuring that the consequence of the breakup of the marriage does not bring hardship to the children of the marriage.

It seems to me that what is the concern of the clause should be the concern of the bill. I believe that the concern is suggested somewhat casually in a sort of passing fashion in the following words:

> Upon granting a decree nisi of divorce, the court may, if it thinks it fit and just to do so having regard to the conduct of the parties and the condition, means and other circumstances of each of them, make one or more of the following orders—

So, it may do so if it thinks fit having regard to the circumstances. There is no obligation upon the court to inquire into the circumstances. There is no obligation upon the court to decide whether the circumstances properly require the making of some order to ensure that the welfare of the children is provided for, and to ensure that there is proper provision for the injured spouse.

What the amendment seeks to do is to ensure that the court, which I submit can discharge this function, will accept as an obligation upon the court the function of ensuring the welfare of the family. The old principle of wards of the court gives testimony to what I am saying. In respect of a bill which is designed to rationalize a divorce, and to ensure that there will be a larger number of cases with regard to which divorce may be granted by the court—divorce having all the consequences it has with respect to the family and children—I suggest it is proper and indeed essential that the legislation should direct the courts to the extent that they will have an obligation to inquire into the circumstances of the family, and make an order accordingly. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in order to bring the matter to a head. I should like to say that I hope the minister will reconsider this matter. I wish to move the amendment which I believe my colleague the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka has already read to the committee.

Mr. Trudeau: This is perhaps one case in which we can demonstrate the utility of publishing the statutes in both languages and illustrate that it is useful to lawyers to have both texts of the statute in order to know what really is meant. Especially when debating with the hon. member for Kamloops I know I do not have to apologize for speaking in French.

[Translation]

If we look at the French text, it is clear that clause 11 intends to achieve what the hon. member wants, and I have tried to show this by reading the English text. I feel that if we look at the French text, it becomes even clearer:

> —the court may, if it thinks it fit and just to do so, make one or more of the following orders—

Then, it is precisely what the hon. member wishes as far as orders are concerned.

> —the court may, . . . make one or more of the following orders—

But after that,

> —if it thinks it fit and just to do so,

We have:

—having regard to the conduct of the parties and the condition, means and other circumstances of each of them—

Mr. Chairman, the parenthetical clause, the one between comas, a sort of ablative absolute, if I may refer to the classics, is the one that is important and should be taken into account; the court that would not consider the conduct of the parties, as well as their condition, would, I suggest, be overruled in a court of appeal, because it would have acted in an ill-advised fashion that would not correspond with the French text and, also, I would say, with the English text.

Once again, Mr. Chairman, it is not a substantive matter. I agree with all the hon. member has said and with his purpose to make the obligation of the court more specific; but I would suggest to him very humbly that the French text does that and, such being the case, it is not necessary to accept the amendment.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: For the information of members of the committee perhaps I should read the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops. It is as follows:

That subsection (1) of Section 11 be amended by deleting lines 16 to 20 thereof, and substituting the following:

(1) Upon granting a decree nisi of divorce, the court shall make such inquiries as may be necessary to determine the condition, means and circumstances of the spouses and the children, if any, of the marriage, and may make such one or more of the following orders as shall seem fit and just having regard to the conduct of the parties and the circumstances disclosed by such inquiry, namely:

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate what the minister has said in respect of the meaning of the clause in the French language, but I think the minister will agree with me that the courts in English speaking Canada do not read French, and therefore will be governed by what the English text says. I am aware that the nuances of the French language are sometimes more precise in that beautiful tongue than they are in English, but we are dealing here with the English text, which is the text with which the English speaking courts will be dealing.

If the minister wishes I would confine my amendment further by saying that the text of the English bill should be amended as follows, thus leaving the French context with the precision the minister suggests it already has.

Mr. Basford: Would the hon. member permit a question? I take it that his objection really is that "may" is permissive rather than mandatory. Can the hon. member imagine a situation in which a court or judge would think it fit and just to make an order but would not make the order?

Mr. Fulton: Frankly I cannot think of a situation where it was felt to be fit and just to make an order but the judge would not make such an order. I want to be sure by this amendment that the court will have the obligation to make the inquiry, so that it will then know whether it is fit and just to make an order. The court cannot know until it has made an inquiry. It is the making of the inquiry that I want to see mandatory.

Mr. Trudeau: Supposing one or both of the parties had not asked for such subsidiary relief, why should it be mandatory for the court to make an inquiry? If there was no need or desire on the part of the parties for such to be done, why should the court be required to do so? This clause is permissive and empowering, and not one which must apply in all cases.

Mr. Fulton: My answer to the minister is that it is precisely because the parties may omit the seating of such an order that I think it should be mandatory upon the court to inquire into the circumstances. The court should inquire to see whether there are children whose welfare has not been brought before the court by the pleadings of the parties. It is an obligation of the court, when it is proceeding solemnly in respect of the dissolution of a marriage and the breakup of a family, to find out whether there are children whose welfare is affected, and to find out whether the welfare of those children is properly provided for, and then to make such order as seems just and fit. If the parties have properly provided for these children, then it will not be necessary to make an order. I have left the permissive word "may" in that part of the amendment. The mandatory word relates to the making of the inquiry to satisfy the court as to the circumstances.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I have the feeling that the amendment proposed by the hon. member may not be necessary because nearly all courts are required in matrimonial matters including divorce by their own rules of practice to have disclosure as to whether there are children of the marriage and what provision has been made for them. However, I cannot see what possible harm the amendment could do. I am speaking about the English language, not the French, and I cannot see what possible harm it could do to underline the fact that it is the duty of a court in dealing with the dissolution of a marriage to deal with the ancillary matters and to deal with the obligations that arise from a marriage. Certainly an inquiry into the means of a spouse, to see that she or he and the children are properly looked after, is an obligation.

The case might arise where the wife had not put forth her case, as she should for some reason, such as intimidation or something of the sort, or where the husband and the wife wanted to forget about their responsibility for the children. This amendment merely makes it clear that the court should do what I think it would normally do as a matter of course.

In my opinion there should be an obligation on the tribunal that pronounces the dissolution of a marriage to see that these matters of the family which are essential to the marriage be dealt with because, if one thing is clear, it ought to be that dissolution of marriage is conditional upon people living up to their obligations to the children as well as possible. Sometimes it is not completely possible, but they should as best they can live up to their obligations. The amendment makes that abundantly clear. I do not think it does any harm, but it will make clear what I am sure many responsible courts would likely do in any event. Why not make that clear while we are at it by accepting the amendment?

Mr. Trudeau: In answer to the hon. member for Greenwood, if he is indicating that there should be a duty on the courts to make such inquiries, I suggest that the duty already exists in clause 9 paragraphs (d) (e) and (f), which make it clear what are the duties and obligations of the court. It is spelled out that we must consider questions in respect of the children and the spouse.

Once again let me say that clauses 10 and 11 are empowering, and make it necessary that the courts applying these divorce laws will have the power by statute to do something as regards the spouse and children. We wrote this in to make it clear that, in our minds, the application of our laws must be taken into account regarding those things we have been discussing with the hon. member for Stanstead and the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency. This would make it clear that the court is empowered to do these things and it must do them in certain circumstances as spelled out.

Mr. Brewin: The minister referred to paragraphs (d) (e) and (f) of clause 9 which has already been dealt with by the committee. Are not all those paragraphs applicable to divorces granted under clause 4 of the bill, which does not refer to clause 3? Clause 3 is the one which deals with matrimonial offences other than because of breakdown. Surely if there is an obligation to deal with these matters, clause 11 covers all decrees nisi, whatever the basis may be, whereas clause 9 paragraphs (d) (e) and (f) do not relate to clause 4. It does seem to me that clause 11 covers the whole thing, together, and should be of universal application.

Mr. Trudeau: Admittedly the duties of the court to which I referred apply to the breakdown aspect of divorce cause, and not to the offence cause; and this is the way it should be. Surely the hon. member would not want the existence of or the consideration for the children to be an absolute bar to divorce granted on the ground of adultery. If he does, he is going backwards from our present law. Under our present law the judge is not obliged to look into the situation of the children, if adultery is the ground for divorce. All we are doing by clause 9 is spelling out this kind of bar that applies in the case of breakdown. Once again this is the clause that spells out the duty of the court. Clauses 10 and 11 are empowering clauses. I made reference to a certain part of the French text, and I think this is even more clear in the English text, which reads "having regard to the conduct of the parties". That is to say, the court must have regard to the conduct of the parties. I cannot accept the amendment as I do not think it is a useful one.

Mr. Otto: On this question, Mr. Chairman, I believe that hon. gentlemen opposite, belatedly but nevertheless realistically, are concerned about the vast question that presents itself, namely who are the parties to the marriage? To presume that there are only two, the husband and wife, is of course to deny the whole status of marriage, which affects all the children of the marriage. Indeed, where a decree is made it affects not only the husband and wife but the children, whose position is changed. I believe the concern expressed by hon. members opposite is quite real. They want included in clause 11 a provision that is more than just permissive. They want the clause to provide that it is the duty of the court to make an order which includes the rights and disposition of the children.

The minister has said that this matter is covered in clause 9 (d) (e) and (f). I do not agree, because clause 9, in paragraphs (d) (e) and (f) appears to cover the case where a decree is not granted, whereas here we are talking about a case where a decree is granted. Whether or not the petitioner begs the court to make this order is not the issue. Indeed, that is of no consequence if it is the duty of the court to do so.

Hon. members opposite wish the bill to provide that regardless of the desires of the two main parties, the husband and wife, the court shall make this order and this investigation. I put it to hon. gentlemen opposite, and in this I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, that at the present time there is in the laws of the provinces a provision—in fact, there are several such provisions—that the court shall look into these matters and consider them. It may be argued that this is a provincial area and if a province decides to move out of this sphere the children of Canada should be covered by federal law.

In that case, this is a question to be decided here. I see no objection to such an amendment and I am completely in favour of it. I would like it to be set down on the record that there are not two parties only to a marriage. If there are children, each child has rights equal to those of the husband and wife of the marriage, and his or her rights should be protected in any decree granted or order made by a judge.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Fulton) negatived: Yeas, 37; nays, 50.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 12—Payment and conditions.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to move to clause 12 as follows:

That clause 12 be renumbered as clause 12 (2) and a new clause 12 (1) be added as follows:

12 (1) Where a court makes an order pursuant to clause 10 or 11, it shall have regard to the laws of the province of domicile of the petitioner related to each of the matters referred to in the said clauses, and shall make its order as nearly as possible in consonance with the laws of such province.

The substance of this amendment is suggested by the hon. member for Carleton and I have pleasure moving it for him. The committee will recall the arguments the hon. member has already made as to the necessity of bringing this law into conformity with provincial jurisdiction, preserving the principle of provincial control of provincial courts and providing that any decrees, and so on, made should have regard to the form and substance of provincial law, the principle mentioned a moment ago by the hon. member for York East.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, I hate to delay the committee on this matter but I think I should indicate, in fairness, that the hon. member for Carleton gave me notice of this amendment and I have prepared a little argumentation against it. I do not want necessarily to deliver it if the committee feels it is well informed in this regard.

The purpose of the amendment is laudable, especially as it may help to solve certain problems as to the custody of the children of a marriage. However, on reflection, I have found that it would create many more problems than it would solve. Amongst other problems, it would tend to create a situation where the parties would shop around for domicile in whatever province happened to better suit their action. It would tend, and this is more serious, to perpetuate different treatment being afforded under different provincial laws, whereas we are trying to seek some sort of uniformity.

Such a provision would be of difficult application in the case of an action brought in one province by a petitioner who was domiciled in another. It would make it difficult for the court to decide the question of the domicile of the petitioner if it happened that the petitioner was petitioning in another province. There are many other difficulties inherent in the amendment, Mr. Chairman. I do not think I need go into them in detail, but the amendment would not provide as happy a solution as would appear to be the case.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Fulton) negatived: Yeas, 21; nays, 71.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 12 carry?

Clause agreed to.

• (8:50 p.m.)

On clause 13—Decree nisi.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question on subclause 3 of clause 13 in which it is provided that:

> Where a decree nisi of divorce has been granted but not made absolute, any person may show cause to the court why the decree should not be made absolute,

Does the minister not think that he is inviting a great deal of difficulty by extending the power to any person, whether or not they have a vested interest or a concern in the matter, to make an application to the court to prevent the granting of an absolute decree? There may be a valid explanation for it, and I can understand that one might give the right to intervene if necessary to people in authority, such as the Queen's Proctor in various provinces. But why should any person have that right? I may have misread the clause.

Mr. Trudeau: I think the hon. member's reading of the clause is valid. He interpreted correctly the meaning which went into the writing of the clause. The person in question could be the Queen's Proctor or, under the Quebec law, a public officer who represents the state. However, as has been said often in this debate, the dissolution of marriage is a formal and public act which is of concern to the state and to society. The approach adopted in drafting the clause was that any member of society who has information relevant to this issue should be entitled to bring it forth. This is perhaps a less formal way of obtaining the same result as if we had empowered a special official of the state to represent the public interest, as is done in some countries, or if we had empowered an officer of the courts or of the government to plead the public interest.

I have no further explanation to give on the interpretation of this clause. Its terms are perhaps broader than the hon. member would have liked. It does not seem to me to be a clause which could easily be abused, and it is an indication that since the public has an interest in the issue it should be allowed to enlighten the courts if possible.

Mr. Johnston: If collusion is discovered after the divorce decree nisi is granted, would it not make more sense to treat collusion as some other form of crime and impose a fine or some sort of penalty, rather than rescind the decree, because surely not much can be made of a marriage already broken up, where two people are joined together in collusion.

Mr. Trudeau: The reasoning behind the clause is that we do not want to recognize divorce solely by consent, if I may borrow the phrase used by the hon. member for Greenwood. If we merely punished collusion by the imposition of a fine or in some other way it would be tantamount to saying that divorce by mere consent can be granted, but a fine may have to be paid if collusion is discovered.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 14, 15 and 16 agreed to.

On clause 17—Appeal to court of appeal.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, all I wish to do with regard to this clause, and it would apply equally to clause 18, is to ask the minister why it is necessary in this measure to deal with the matter of appeals. As I understand it, and I may be wrong, the provinces have under their judicature acts a series of appellate courts which provide for appeals from final decisions of the supreme courts, and the Supreme court of Canada deals with appeals from the decisions of the appeal courts of the provinces. It seems to me to be a mistake to incorporate in each federal act a new code relating to special appeals with regard to this subject matter. I appreciate that, for example, the Criminal Code is quite different. In the Criminal Code special provisions relating to criminal matters require a special hierarchy of appeals and the normal judicature roles would not apply. But I ask the minister why it is not sufficient to leave the matter of appeals from judgments made by the court to the provinces? Anyone who has had to deal with appeal courts knows that appealing under the precise statutory rights of appeal often creates many problems, and that it is simpler and better to rely upon the general rights of appeal which have been worked out over the course of time.

Mr. Trudeau: The explanation is that here again we wanted to make sure that we would not perpetuate a different approach in various provinces. We wanted to reach a degree of uniformity which would be compatible with the freedom of the provinces to administer justice as they wish. To use an expression employed earlier, we do not want the parties shopping around to find a province whose appeal provisions would suit them best. We have allowed in sections of this act a great degree of latitude as regards the rules of procedure and the rules of evidence, and we have shown that it is the intention of the present statute to respect the procedural differences among the provinces. However, we feel that in a new statute such as this one which is breaking ground in the divorce law, it is for the good of the country for the courts across the land to view the divorce law with a certain degree of uniformity. In other words, we want to avoid a different application of divorce laws by the various provinces. It is with this in mind that we decided that appeals should be dealt with in a uniform manner.

Clause 18 agreed to.

• (9:00 p.m.)

On clause 19—Rules of court.

Mr. Baldwin: I want to take one minute to direct the attention of the minister to the possible dangers which may be inherent in subclause 2 of clause 19. By clause 14, which we have already passed, a decree of divorce granted under this bill shall have legal effect throughout Canada. This includes the decree of divorce and ancillary orders affecting the children, alimony and maintenance. There has been built up in the provinces a jurisprudence with regard to the custody of children. You will find at the present time decided cases in some of the appellant tribunals of the provinces which have been decided upon somewhat different principles.

I suggest to the minister that any attempt under subclause 2 of clause 19 by the governor general in council to pass regulations dealing with the provision for the registration and enforcement of orders covering the custody of children, the allowance of alimony and maintenance, should be handled very carefully. This may be a very delicate situation. The minister has already drawn to our attention the effect of some of the provisions in this bill.

He is aware of the problem in the constitutional area. I hope, without in any way attempting to dilute the effect of clause 19, that the minister will exercise the utmost care in fixing regulations which would supersede the regulations made under provincial authority.

Mr. Trudeau: The point is very well taken, Mr. Chairman. I should think that any governor in council who was thinking of applying this subsection would do so only in fear and trembling. I feel it is important that each province feel free to administer justice in its own way. I can only suggest, in the same sense as I did to the hon. member for Greenwood, that it is good, especially at the outset, that the government which makes this law should also have the power to make sure that there are not too many discrepancies in the application of it, at least in the early stages.

By way of reassurance, I would remind the hon. member for Peace River that the Criminal Code has the same type of provision under which the governor in council can make uniform procedural laws across the country. To my knowledge, this power has never been used. I hope that this present clause would not be used to any great extent either. I think it is safe to have here for the same reasons that it exists in the Criminal Code.

Mr. Fairweather: May I ask the minister once again, Mr. Chairman, for some reassurance. He knows I have some concern about procedures in the province of New Brunswick. I have had an assurance, but at this stage could I have an underlining of that assurance? I really believe this is serious. I put it forward in no partisan way. I think it is within the spirit of subclause (2) of clause 19. I know a great many members of the profession in New Brunswick and even more important than the profession, the people who are affected by this law, are concerned. I hope no provision has been made to continue in New Brunswick a policy which I feel is not right.

Mr. Trudeau: Is the hon. member referring to the matter of the courts of law? The hon. member nods in assent. If that is the case, I think I can reassure him. This bill provides that the court in New Brunswick will be the supreme court of the province. This will be the divorce court. If the province wants to give divorce jurisdiction to the county courts, that can be done under the procedure which was indicated the other day by amending its own law. The province would have to provide that judges of the county court would become local judges of the supreme court.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, this bill does not permit any province to say that divorce will not be a matter for the supreme court of New Brunswick but shall be a matter for some other matrimonial or divorce court. This the province cannot do. It must make divorce a matter for the supreme court.

Mr. Fairweather: Yes, but some people wish to continue the status quo in New-Brunswick whereby one judge of the present court of appeal of New Brunswic is the judge of divorce and matrimonial causes. All causes are heard in the capital city of Fredericton. This works a great inconvenience and hardship on the members of the profession, the petitioners and witnesses.

Mr. Trudeau: I know this point well because the member has gone to some pains to explain it to me on other occasions. I did look into it, and I can assure him that the province would have no choice but to agree that the court for divorce is the supreme court of the province, and no other.

Mr. Lambert: I do not rise to criticize this clause but to express the hope that the various courts that may be making rules with regard to procedures and so forth, particularly with regard to subclause (1) (d) dealing with maintenance orders, will make it possible to enforce maintenance orders in other jurisdictions with a minimum of difficulty. In the past it has always been one of the most difficult and painful operations a lawyer acting on behalf of a client who is aggrieved can undertake. There may be an order for maintenance in one jurisdiction and the husband may have moved away from the original jurisdiction into another. There have been so many safeguards and formalities hedged around the enforcement of an alimony or a maintenance order that I hope the minister will use his moral suasion upon the courts and various jurisdictions to streamline the rules with regard to the enforcement of these orders in order to facilitate the enforcement of them.

Mr. Trudeau: This is a fair request, Mr. Chairman. I will use whatever moral suasion I can muster. It was for this purpose that we provided for the three months interval before the law can be put into application. We intend to have discussions between federal and provincial authorities on such matters as this, not only between governments but also between the chief justices and the federal officials.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 20 agreed to.

On clause 21—Admissions and communications made in course of reconciliation proceedings.

Mr. Enns: I should like to commend the minister for having included in this bill the protection of the principle of confidentiality which is guaranteed by clause 21. One word however bothers me in this clause which reads:

• (9:10 p.m.)

A person nominated by a court under this act to endeavour to assist the parties to a marriage with a view to their possible reconciliation is not competent or compellable in any legal proceedings to disclose any admission . . . made to him—

The wording "not competent" bothers me. I wonder if as a social worker I am too defensive, but perhaps this casts an undue reflection on other professions, and here I am thinking of doctors and priests who could be involved in this counselling procedure. I suggest that these two words "not competent" be deleted. The clause would still retain its sense and protect the very important principle of confidentiality.

Mr. Trudeau: I can understand that if the word "competent" is taken in a defensive sense it would be an offensive word and I would certainly want to withdraw it, but I suggest that the words "not competent" in a statute such as this means that a person not able for legal reasons to do certain things. The first definition of competent in the Oxford dictionary is "legally qualified", I suggest that is the meaning which should be given to the word in this clause.

Mr. Smith: How is the social worker or family counsellor going to communicate with the judge? Is there any provision for him to file a report with the judge on the success or failure of his work? In Ontario we have the official guardian reports. There is a system whereby they go into the record. What happens under this legislation?

Mr. Trudeau: This is a dilemma, Mr. Chairman. For the reason which was just given by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa we had to make sure that any person assisting the parties with a view to reconciliation would have at his or her disposal all the information needed to make reconciliation possible. For the reason given by the hon. member we had to ensure that there would be absolute discretion. How do we reconcile this with the problem raised by the hon. member for Simcoe East?

I suggest that clause 8 applies here, that the reconciliation would be attempted after the judge has adjourned for that purpose. The test will be 14 days later if the parties apply to the court to have the pleadings resumed. The court will then presume that the reconciliation effort has not been successful.

Mr. Smith: I can understand that the social worker's evidence, or admissions made to him, cannot be used in determining whether there shall be a divorce, but surely his report upon what he found out would be absolutely vital to the judge in later determining the custody and maintenance of children? It seems to me that at some point there ought to be a provision whereby his report would go into the evidence, or at least be placed before the judge and become part of the court records.

Clause 22 agreed to.

On clause 23—Consequential amendments.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, as a poor, deluded member of parliament who for four and a half years has been trying without success to follow the confused wriggling of the government in many things, would the minister explain why under clause 23 there is a right given under certain circumstances to provide that a county court judge may sit and hear divorces in the provinces of Newfoundland and Quebec, while he has refused the legitimate and logical request made from this side that such action be permitted in other cases?

Mr. Trudeau: I explained during debate on some other clause that the provinces could, as indeed British Columbia does, declare that their county court judges can operate as local judges of the supreme court if they are so designated in their instruments of nomination by the federal government. In other words, the province is the power which can validly make a distinction between superior courts and county courts.

Mr. Baldwin: This is at the request of the president.

Mr. Trudeau: I was indicating this was the case for all other provinces. Now, in the case of Quebec and Newfoundland, where we have made provision that a judge of the exchequer court would be the competent judge until such proclamation as is mentioned in clause 22 is made, the exchequer court will be the court which will judge the cases from those provinces. This provision, being an amendment to the Exchequer Court Act, is made in order that the Exchequer Court can add additional judges to its ranks to meet any congestion of cases in that court. I think it is done in a way which is an improvement on the present Exchequer Court Act. Under section 8 of the Exchequer Court Act, the president is permitted to appoint deputy judges, and these deputy judges are appointed at the pleasure of the governor in council. In this proposed new section 8 of the Exchequer Court Act, we are saying that there shall be a procedure to appoint special judges. They can be retired judges of the exchequer court, or of a superior court or county court. They can also be sitting judges. The amendment provides that they can sit and act as judges of the exchequer court.

It is reasonable to expect that if this can be done by the provinces it can also be done by the federal government. Now the federal government can designate one judge or another to act in this capacity, but in passing may I say that the Exchequer Court Act, I think, has been improved because such a nomination will no longer be at the pleasure of the governor in council which, to me, smacks a little of impingement on the independence of the judiciary. An appointment at the pleasure of the governor in council could result in a government some time saying, "We don't like some of these judges and therefore they will no longer be judges." Under the proposed modification, the appointment of such judges can only be for particular periods or purposes and their appointments are no longer at the pleasure of the governor in council.

On clause 26—Repeal.

Mr. McCleave: May I ask the minister whether, in subclause 2, he would consider substituting the words "no longer have effect" for the words "are repealed". I suggest that, because I talked to a deputy attorney general of a province and he thought it rather strange that this parliament should repeal the laws which have been passed by other legislative bodies. The amendment would bring no change in substance. It would be a diplomatic step. Perhaps the minister might accept it.

Mr. Trudeau: I shall use this opportunity to say to the provinces that I do not wish to be rude to them. If we appear to be rude in the wording of this legislation, then I apologize in advance. Our intention must be quite clear. All other laws having to do with divorce that were in force in Canada are repealed. Why we are doing this is quite obvious. In this country we have a system of divorce laws that antedate the present constitution of the country. It must be made quite clear that those laws no longer have effect. This is done in legal jargon, which is not meant to be offensive. I should not be surprised if that kind of jargon were used in the Statute of Westminster. I should be surprised if we did not find the word "repealed" there.

Clause 27 agreed to.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks on the first clause. In doing so I might say that I am not a suppliant for divorce. For over 50 years I have lived a happily married life, but anybody looking, at today's newspapers might think that my wife has grounds for divorce. That is not so.

I rise to make a few brief remarks and to interject some historical notes. I have been in this house for over 23 years and I have seen the ebb and flow of the different moods and spirit of this house. I rise to support the spirit of the bill which has been introduced by the minister, and to commend him on what I consider the flexible way in which he has handled the entire matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: Already I have received correspondence from my constituency which indicates that quite a number of people are pleased with the introduction of this bill. I am sure they will be pleased to hear of its passage. One lady informed me that she thought the minister was a very sensitive, humanitarian intellectual. I thought I would pass that on to him.

As other members have mentioned, it has been more than a quarter of a century since the last attempt was made to reform the divorce laws of this country. According to the record, Senator Aseltine was able to persuade the members of the other place to pass a measure that would have widened the grounds of divorce to include cruelty and desertion. However, this bill was allowed to expire quietly on the order paper of the House of Commons, without any member even asking a question as to when the minister intended to proceed with legislation.

A very different situation exists today. Since then, public opinion has changed to such an extent that the Minister of Justice has created a precedent in Canadian history by introducing this measure. I am sure that members on all sides of the house will give him credit for that. Politicians from all parties throughout the years have avoided this contentious issue, because it was politically dangerous. We all knew it. In my opinion they underestimated the changing circumstances and opinions in our society, particularly in recent years. It was not until the churches and other organizations and groups in Canada recognized the need for a drastic change in our divorce laws that parliament was persuaded to act in response to public opinion.

In this connection I have had a little research done. This is a matter of historical record which has been passed on to me. Apart from the bill that was introduced by Senator Aseltine in March, 1930, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre introduced a bill intituled "An Act to provide for the Jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada in Matters of Divorce". He introduced that bill continuously from 1949 to 1956. The explanatory note says:

> This bill does not change the grounds for divorce. It does not establish divorce courts in Quebec or Newfoundland. It does not make available to persons residing in Quebec or Newfoundland anything not now available to them. It merely transfers the hearing of divorce petitions, in the case of persons residing in these two provinces, from parliament to the Exchequer Court of Canada.

That was a most commendable objective and, in view of the climate of public opinion which then prevailed, that was about as far as anyone would wish to go.

Later the hon. member for Timiskaming introduced a bill a number of times from 1960 to 1966. These provided for changes in the grounds of divorce. The purpose of that bill was to provide a law for the dissolution and annulment of marriage that would be common to all persons domiciled in Canada. That bill widened the grounds for divorce. I must give my hon. friend for Timiskaming credit for introducing his bill continuously from 1960 to 1966.

In 1962 another major effort was made in this house to transfer divorces from the House of Commons to the Senate. The hon. members for Timiskaming and Skeena conducted a filibuster for some months. I know that was very trying for members of the government and for other members on occasion, especially when they had to listen to long extracts being read from the Senate divorce proceedings in order to indicate the need for the change in procedure. I wish to pay tribute to the courage and persistence of those two hon. members. Finally, the government of the day saw the light, gave in and introduced legislation that provided for divorce to be transferred from the House of Commons to the Senate.

As the years went by the courage of hon. members picked up. The public climate was changing also. On February 18 and April 8, 1965, in the new session, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond introduced a bill which would give to the provinces concurrent jurisdiction in Canada and also widen the grounds for divorce. Later, in 1966, the hon. member for Kootenay East introduced his bill. That bill provided for additional grounds for the dissolution of marriage.

As the years went by and as the climate of public opinion changed, as the need for changes in our divorce laws grew, members of parliament responded to that different climate of public opinion by introduction of this legislation.

Later we saw the introduction of a bill by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard in 1966-67 to widen the grounds for divorce and make them applicable to all persons domiciled in Canada. Later, the hon. member for York-Scarborough introduced his bill to provide for the dissolution of marriage on a just and common basis throughout Canada. The hon. member told the house in an explanatory note:

> Essentially, the grounds for divorce provided for in this bill are adultery, cruelty and desertion, but include involuntary desertion by reason of incurable insanity and three years separation without reasonable likelihood of reconciliation.

It is interesting to note that the development of public opinion in Canada has been accompanied by an increasing understanding on the part of members of the house. The final act was the introduction of a measure whose committee stage we have now almost concluded.

I wish now to mention one or two other things. On March 15, 1966, the house approved a motion that a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to inquire into and report upon divorce in Canada, the social and legal problems relating thereto and such other matters as might be referred to it by either house. I was personally very pleased when this committee was appointed, because I have long been of the opinion that committees of the Senate or of the Senate and the House of Commons can undertake investigations into any subject at much less expense than those incurred by some royal commissions. I have read the report of the special joint committee carefully and I must congratulate the joint chairmen, the members of the committee, and the witnesses who appeared before it. I should also pay tribute to the services rendered by the committee's special assistant, Dr. Peter J. King, associate professor of history at Carleton University, and by Mr. Patrick J. Savoie of the Senate committees branch. In my opinion the committee has made a splendid contribution to the understanding of problems relating to divorce in present circumstances.

I heard the minister's speech, I have read it a couple of times and I have listened carefully during the greater part of this debate to what he has had to say by way of explanation of the clauses and in his comments on the various amendments offered. Whether we agree with every detail of what has been done or not, I believe, in all fairness, that we must admire the hon. gentleman for the attitude he has taken toward this legislation and for the spirit in which he has pursued his purpose.

The minister has indicated his willingness to learn from experience in the administration of this legislation and to make improvements or amendments if necessary. In adopting this measure the house will have remedied a quarter of a century of indifference compounded by political apprehension —and we all know what that is in certain circumstances. In conclusion, I say the house has acted with wisdom and prescience to meet a specific human problem which affects a large number of Canadians.

Mr. Otto: In case some hon. members may get the impression from the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken that this bill is the result of the efforts of everyone except the Minister of Justice, let me set the record straight by saying it is the Minister of Justice who had the courage and the tenacity to introduce the bill before us and get it through.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Otto: This is something I did not expect, to be frank; I did not think my hon. friend would move so quickly. It is to his credit that he has done so. My hon. friend did say earlier in the debate that he had no vested interest in the subject of this bill. But of course he has, as a member of the Canadian community. And his children, if and when they form families—I am assuming, of course, that he does get married and have children—will be affected by this far reaching measure.

The hon. member for Kootenay West told us he had read the report of the committee. I was a member of that committee and I heard all these briefs presented. We heard presentations from deserted mothers, mothers alone, men, women and judges. But at no time did we hear any evidence as to the effect of divorce on children.

At no time did anyone say a study had been made as a result of which we knew that the effect of divorce on children was so and so. Consequently I rise to say that this bill is not a panacea. It will not result in a greater number of divorces. It will certainly not be a sovereign remedy for marriage or family problems. Indeed, it is but the beginning of new work which we must undertake. We must put our house in order with respect to all matters affecting family units and the rights of children. At the present time the children at least know to what establishment they belong. But we, as a society, having adopted a very liberal view of divorce, have failed to provide a suitable climate for the children of divorced parents; they are still looked upon as being somewhat apart from the rest of the community. They are not yet accorded the same treatment as is accorded to the children of married parents. We have to deal with this situation because these are the children affected by the legislation we are passing.

I hope the minister's next endeavour will be to continue research into the problems of divorce as they affect the children, and into the whole field of the laws relating to divorce proceedings.

[Mr. Otto.]

Mr. Cameron (High Park): If it is appropriate and in order may I say a few words on this bill? As the hon. member for Kootenay West has indicated, this amounts to a demonstration of the worth and merit of joint committees of this house and of the Senate.

There were 24 members from the house and 12 from the Senate represented on the special committee. Many of the representatives from the house were members of the justice committee and they included some of the brightest legal minds among us. I have no doubt at all as to the efficiency of the committee. Added to that, we had the experience of the senators from the other place, and I refer in particular to my co-chairman, Senator Roebuck.

Senator Roebuck has been chairman of the divorce committee for many years and has heard some 15,000 cases. He is a master of the law on divorce. As co-chairman it was easy for me to assist in the organization and in the work of the committee and to preside at some of the meetings. The real work was done by him. I think we should all congratulate him and pay tribute to him for what he has done—a 90-year-old Senator who is 90 years young.

The report which the minister has been kind enough to indicate has been the basis for the bill emanated largely from the work of Senator Roebuck of the other place. Some members of the committee made contributions in the nature of suggestions, and other members of the committee took an active part in the discussion when the report was finally considered and settled. I do not wish to praise the members of the committee unduly, but may I refer to a comment which appeared in the Globe and Mail and ask hon. members to take their praise, in place of what I might say:

> In many respects, the bill is as broad and liberal a piece of divorce legislation as any western nation has written. Yet it will still maintain some unjustified matrimonial prisons and it will still contribute to perjury in the courts.

I should like to congratulate the minister for the very able way in which he has presented the bill to the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): I take it as a tribute to the committee that the bill as drafted was largely founded on the report of the joint committee. I hope that the prison doors that will be opened as a result of this bill will be sufficient reward to the members of the committee for the many long hours and very determined concentrated studies they put into this subject.

Mr. Chairman, I think when this bill becomes law the parliament of Canada will have a bill to be proud of.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, we seem to be passing around laudatory remarks, and therefore, before the bill passes I should like to give credit to the senior member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) who has carried through our work on this bill. The hon. member was one of the few people jointly from the house and the Senate who did the real groundwork for the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act which was the first real step to a more rational divorce law in Canada. This particular law to be passed today completes the process to this point. For this reason I believe we should acknowledge the part the hon. member has taken in this matter. More than that, I believe that today is his birthday.

Mr. Chairman, I must take issue with just one remark made by the hon. member for Kootenay West when he commended the minister for his flexible attitude. I am afraid we on this side of the house did not find that he had such a flexible attitude. In spite of the number of amendments which were proposed very few were accepted. However, this bill does represent some real progress. For this reason I am authorized to say we would be happy to consider, if it is the wish of the house to do so, proceeding to third reading tonight. The bill has been changed so very little in committee that it really does not amount to any change at all.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in the mood of good will which prevails in the house I should like to move the following motion:

That pursuant to section (6) of standing order 6 this sitting be extended until eleven o'clock this day or until consideration of Bill No. C-163 in committee of the whole be completed, whichever shall be the earlier of these two eventualities.

Mr. Cowan: I object.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is an objection. Are there any members rising in support of the objection?

Pursuant to section (6) of standing order 6, the order is deemed to have been adopted by the house.

BROADCASTING

IMPLEMENTATION OF CANADIAN POLICY

The house in committee on Bill No. C-163, to implement a broadcasting policy for Canada, to amend the Radio Act in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential and related provisions—Miss LaMarsh—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 2—Broadcasting policy for Canada.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, there are a number of us who did not have the opportunity to speak on second reading. There are some of us, I believe on both sides of the house, who have some ideas we would like to put forward. We understand, because of the resignation of the former president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, that a new president is to be appointed very shortly. Numerous rumours have been circulated to the effect that a very highly respected and very senior civil servant will be appointed to this position.

All members of the house are cognizant of the fact that the new president of the C.B.C. may be faced with problems which he or she has never experienced previously. I think it is only proper that the person who takes on this very important job should have the opportunity of receiving suggestions from members of this house. I know, Mr. Chairman, that suggestions from members of this house are not welcomed by the senior officials of the C.B.C. and that when one does offer suggestions which are not welcome they are not taken very kindly.

We hope when this broadcasting act passes many of the complaints about the C.B.C. will disappear. Let that not be a fond hope. Perhaps the new president will be able to spruce up his policies. I am sure this will be acceptable to the Secretary of State and, indeed, to many members of this house, and the country. Perhaps many of the faults which have caused the complaints over the years can be rectified.

There has been created an impression in the public mind, through the press, periodicals and the like, that a number of members of this house are opposed to the C.B.C. as such. There may be some who are, but I for one have been accused repeatedly of this and I am not opposed. I think the corporation performs an excellent and valuable service to the country and can continue to do so. What I object to are some of the policies that have been carried out in some branches of the C.B.C. It is those policies which over the years have caused the vast majority of complaints. I am sure it is the hope of many members of this house, as it is mine, that these complaints which I intend to deal with specifically, can be rectified in future so that the C.B.C. can continue to serve Canada.

There have been many complaints raised about the intellectual entertainment programs. I do not suppose it is easy to please completely any two people in the country, because one is pleased by something while another is pleased by something else. This is because people have different tastes and like different things. I do not intend to make any comment about the general level of the quasi-intellectual entertainment programs of the C.B.C. Some people like them and some do not. Personally I like the majority of them but I may be unique in this respect. The only suggestion I would make is that it is obvious some of the producers of the entertainment programs for the C.B.C. lack the same standard of taste which is generally acceptable in Canada. I hope the new president puts his foot down and will insist that some of these producers will accept these general standards. Perhaps they feel these programs are acceptable because of a new spirit of permissiveness in Canada, but since it is the public which must pay for them, they should have some regard to general standards of behaviour. I hope this will be borne in mind by the new president, and some of these producers who I think produce these programs for no other purpose than to show off and to shock the public.

Another complaint on the part of many members of this house, including myself and many members of the general public who have brought this to my attention, concerns the public affairs programming of the C.B.C. It is in this regard I have serious complaints which fall generally under three headings. The first relates to political interference on the part of the C.B.C., and a heavy political bias in respect of many public affairs programs.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

The second group of complaints relate to matters of public controversy such as the Viet Nam question, race riots and apartheid, to mention a few. Unfortunately the C.B.C. seems inevitably to present only one side of a question. Any opposing point of view is presented in such a biased manner it cannot be considered a fair presentation.

The third group of complaints relate to the deliberate and fraudulent misrepresentation of the credentials of speakers. This can also be said of photographs and other things. I hope all these complaints can be avoided. If the causes can be corrected I am sure the complaints will disappear. It goes without saying that any member of this house would strenuously object to any outside political interference in the C.B.C. At the same time I think it is proper to object to political interference, or that which appears certainly to be political interference, from within the C.B.C. itself.

I have no hesitation in saying that on rare occasions it may seem that a point of view of the Liberal party or the Conservative party is presented by the C.B.C., but most people to whom I have talked regard the C.B.C. as a propaganda machine for the N.D.P. All one has to think of is the interviews by Mr. Laurier LaPierre and Mr. Pierre Berton. I have several examples of this.

During the 14 or 15 years I have been a member here I have driven back and forth between my constituency and Ottawa on innumerable occasions. During those trips I have listened to the C.B.C. constantly and made notes on every occasion. I have a file containing hundreds of examples. If any member of the C.B.C. would like to discuss these with me privately on some occasion I would be only too happy to accommodate him.

The general impression created is that the point of view of the N.D.P. is greatly overemphasized out of all proportion to the number of its members in this house and its percentage vote in the country. That party is promoted steadily in every conceivable field of public affairs. Let me make it quite clear that I have no objection to N.D.P. propaganda on C.B.C. My objection is that the two major political parties receive almost no time in this regard. After all, the supporters of the Liberal and Conservative parties pay the taxes that keep the C.B.C. going, and this situation does not seem fair.

My next point relates to this same matter. I refer to the one-sided point of view on matters of public controversy. The parliamentary secretary to the present Prime Minister in a speech in Winnipeg pointed this fact out very well. That speech has been quoted at length by other members of this house including the hon. member for Athabasca, the hon. member for Leeds and I believe the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. I can only say that when you receive one-sided views on race problems in the United States, or the Viet Nam situation, it does not help the public reach a reasonable conclusion.

Most of us in this house have had the opportunity from time to time of talking with fairly senior people in the C.B.C. I have had the viewpoint expressed to me on many occasions that it is not the function of the C.B.C. to present a balanced picture of such controversies, but to lead the people in thinking in the proper way. It would seem to me that on matters of great public interest and controversy such as the Viet Nam situation, a balanced point of view should be presented so the public could draw its own conclusions as to who is right and who is wrong. This is difficult to do at the best of times, but when you get only one side of the picture the brain washing effect is pretty evident.

This leads me to a question in respect to the commentators on C.B.C., and this matter relates also to the previous point. I refer to the falsification of the credentials of those people who speak on C.B.C. I have here a good many examples of this, some of which I have heard and seen myself, and others that have been brought to my attention. I will give just two illustrations which might be of interest to the house. The first is this. A few years ago on the program "Preview Commentary", which I think is described as a free expression of opinion, whatever that means, on a good many occasions we heard one, Professor Michael Oliver, giving a commentary on the news. He was described as a professor of political science at McGill University. Some thought it strange that no professor of political science of any other university was ever called upon to comment.

We later discovered that this gentleman was elected president of the New Democratic party. He continued for some time on the C.B.C. to give commentaries on the news, as Professor Michael Oliver. As a matter of fact these commentaries were very interesting, but I just wonder what would have been said from some quarters of this house if the president of the Liberal association or the president of the Progressive Conservative association had been brought on to "Preview Commentary" to comment freely on the news every morning. I can imagine the comments that would have come from some of my friends to the left, had this taken place. This is just one illustration.

I will give another example which I think is a really interesting one. This occurred several years ago when I happened to be at the United Nations. It was brought to my attention that a television show which had been produced in Toronto was exceedingly critical of the entire Canadian delegation at the United Nations, its activities and the personnel thereof. At that time the Toronto Globe and Mail published an editorial and said that ordinarily, from their information, they would not have thought this to be so, but since the speaker on the television show, Mr. Arnold Beichman, was described on the C.B.C. as the United Nations correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, they must pay attention to it.

I was quite familiar with members of the press gallery of the United Nations and made inquiries about this matter. I asked whether Arnold Beichman, who was described by the C.B.C. as United Nations correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor, in fact held that position. I was told he had never worked for the Christian Science Monitor, was not a member of the United Nations press gallery, never had been and was not known to the press gallery. The C.B.C. were contacted and said they had made a little mistake and it would not occur again. About three weeks later, on a television program advertised in the Globe and Mail, the program being about anti-Americanism in Canada, I noticed that on the panel were Mr. A, Mr. B, Mr. C, and Mr. Arnold Beichman the United Nations correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor. So there was no possibility at all of a second mistake having been made by the C.B.C. As it turned out Mr. Beichman was apparently editor of the "AFL-CIO" News Bulletin.

These are just illustrations, Mr. Chairman, and I have many more here, of what can only be described as misrepresentation of the credentials of people who appear on the C.B.C. I have another illustration. Not too long ago there was on the C.B.C. a program about the Viet Nam war. Certainly the suffering of individuals on both sides is a subject of pity and concern to everybody. There were televised a number of pictures purporting to show atrocities in Viet Nam which undoubtedly resulted from bombing. One picture shown on this program was of a small child covered with black as a result of an explosion, sitting on the steps of a building crying and obviously covered with blood. It was a very moving picture indeed.

There was only one thing wrong. Those of my vintage and others perhaps remember that this was one of the leading propaganda pictures of world war II. It was a picture which appeared on the cover of Life magazine at the time of the bombing of Chungking. It may be said that this was just the kind of thing that happened in Viet Nam, but it was represented as having taken place in Hanoi.

This is what we have complained about so often in the house. Attention is never paid to complaints made in the house. Impertinent telegrams are sent by officials of the C.B.C. and summonses are received to appear in their office to discuss the matter with them. There is a gap between members of the house and the C.B.C. It may be that C.B.C. officials feel they are unfairly treated, that there is a lack of dialogue, although I hesitate to use the word, and "conversation" may be a better word in this context. Perhaps officials of the C.B.C. feel there is lack of conversation between members of the house and the C.B.C., but I feel that the public which has to foot the C.B.C. bills to a tune of $140 million or $150 million a year should at least be permitted to express its views through members of parliament to the Secretary of State, who is in charge of the C.B.C. and who can then relay these viewpoints and complaints to the corporation.

Naturally no one expects the management of the C.B.C. to pay attention to every single complaint which comes in. Every one knows that is impossible. But one does expect a slightly more courteous hearing of these complaints. I can only hope that when the new president of the C.B.C. and the new senior officials take over, these serious complaints, whether they are made by members of the house as individuals or on behalf of their constituents, will be given serious consideration. No one wants to hamstring the management of the C.B.C. I imagine it is probably difficult to administer such a large corporation. However, I think the management should pay some attention when complaints are made with regard to the political bias of certain broadcasts of the news and one-sided presentations are made of matters of great public concern. The C.B.C. management should then make some effort to bring some of the producers to heel.

I should like to make one more comment. It has always puzzled many of us why some subjects which have no direct bearing on Canada are dealt with at such length by the C.B.C., a good example being the racial disturbances in the United States. Naturally these matters are of some interest to Canadians, because the United States is our next door neighbour and we have been tied up with them one way or another. It is natural that what goes on there is a matter of great interest in Canada. But when day after day and hour after hour we get nothing but pictures of racial disturbances in Alabama or in Cleveland, it becomes rather much. Someone has suggested to me that perhaps one of the reasons for the emphasis on this subject is that since a great many of C.B.C. radio broadcasts permeate a large section of the United States, and so do some of our television programs, perhaps some of these programs are really being directed at the United States and not at Canada. Be that as it may, and even if the intention is to direct some of these programs at the United States in an effort to reform them or change their attitude, the fact to be remembered is that we are paying for the programs. If anyone is going to reform the United States, they had better do it themselves. I am not suggesting that such programs should not be broadcast. I think that anything that goes on in the United States is of interest here, but it does not warrant so much C.B.C. time. I think this matter should be reviewed.

I know other hon. members will wish to comment on this subject and I intend to bring my remarks to a conclusion. Let me just make it clear that I am very much in favour of the C.B.C. and I like the great majority of its programs. I think they are excellent and the C.B.C. should be commended for them. I refer particularly to some of their artistic and sports programs. However, with regard to public affairs programs I hope the new president and the senior management of the C.B.C. will pay a little attention to some of the complaints that have been made in the house.

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Chairman, I was not going to make a general speech at this stage; I was prepared to speak on particular clauses of the bill. However, having heard the number of shots fired by the hon. member for Oxford I have come to the conclusion that some of them require a reply.

• (10:10 p.m.)

If the hon. member is a friend of the C.B.C., all I can say is God protect the C.B.C. from its enemies. I got the impression that he would like a broadcasting corporation which did nothing controversial and which had lots of commentators expressing views which he liked. Then there would be no problems. It is some news to us that the C.B.C. is the political arm of the New Democratic party. I have a great deal of evidence to the contrary. I wish I could show the hon. member the thick file of correspondence which has passed between the leader of our party in the province of Saskatchewan and the president of the C.B.C. He would know that gentleman, in any event, does not consider it to be the political arm of the New Democratic party. A number of my colleagues in the House of Commons, when they get fed up, say the C.B.C. is just a bunch of Liberals. Perhaps this is the way it should be: Keep everybody guessing. I can assure you if the C.B.C. is the political arm of the New Democratic party they are not serving us the way we would like them to.

The hon. member for Oxford is also asking for a balanced view on race relations in the United States and conditions in Rhodesia. He will have a hard time finding many public spokesmen in Canada who will express opinions he may like to hear on these subjects. I should like to say a word or two, Mr. Chairman, about the proposed new appointments of president and executive vice president of the C.B.C. I imagine that the announcement of these appointments will be made after the house has recessed. The Prime Minister did say that he would make the announcements after the bill had third reading. There is not very much time and, as I say, I suppose these announcements will not be made until perhaps next week or the week after. We have heard reports concerning the names of two gentlemen who have been suggested for these positions. They are both highly qualified in the field of administration and have proven themselves respectively in the public service and in private business. Without saying anything detrimental about either of the two gentlemen suggested, I should like to say it is a pity neither of them has any experience in broadcasting. I think one of the two should have had broadcasting experience.

Broadcasting is a complex field and the C.B.C. is a complex organization. It would have been better if one person had had experience in broadcasting. Again, these appointments have not been made as yet and we are only going on rumour. I hope that the new heads of the corporation, whoever they may be, do not try to put their feet down too heavily, as the hon. member for Oxford suggested they should. If the C.B.C. ever reaches a stage where they do not do things that annoy members of parliament or annoy the public, where they do not do challenging, controversial things, then I do not know what we will need them for. I hope we will have a public broadcasting corporation that will continue to put on public affairs programs, entertainment programs, that will challenge the people, that will please some people and that will annoy others.

I recall, Mr. Chairman, about 20 years ago when I was living in Ottawa Max Ferguson began broadcasting. At that time he imitated some members of parliament, and I believe they got up in the house and complained about the kind of thing this man was doing on C.B.C. radio. We need people who will poke fun at us, who will challenge us, who will present conflicting points of view. The experience has been that this is much more likely to happen on a public broadcasting system than on private broadcasting. I hope therefore, that the new heads of the corporation will perhaps make organizational changes which may be necessary, effect economies which may be necessary, but leave a free rein to the producers who produce the kind of programs which will interest and arouse the people of this country. Otherwise, it would be a very tame body and would not be serving the purpose at all.

I should like only one other comment on the remarks on the hon. member for Oxford. He based his whole statement upon the fact we are paying for this public broadcasting service and therefore we have a right to speak. This is true. We are paying also for private broadcasting. If the hon. member would look at the information supplied by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for 1965 he would see that a total of $162 million was spent on radio and television advertising in Canada.

Mr. Nesbitt: We are talking about the C.B.C. at the moment.

Mr. Prittie: We are talking about the Broadcasting Act which deals with all of broadcasting in Canada, and I would point out to the hon. member that I am just as able to make wide ranging remarks as he is. If the hon. member would look at the D.B.S. statistics for 1965 he would see that $162 million was spent on radio and television advertising in that year. Taking away approximately $30 million which the C.B.C. receives for advertising, this leaves $132 million which went into advertising on private radio and television. As consumers we are paying for that too. There is nothing wrong with it; but people tell us that we do not get anything in this world free. That is true, Mr. Chairman, and in this regard we are paying for both public and private broadcasting.

I could continue at great length and make the kind of speech which hon. members normally make on second reading or on clause 1 of a bill but, Mr. Chairman, in the interest of speeding things up tonight I shall confine my remarks to the few I have already made. We in this party are ready to go ahead with discussion on the clauses of this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks about this broadcasting bill which is now before us again after having been referred to a committee and reprinted following several essential amendments. At first sight, some of those amendments seem rather minor ones, even though a few are somewhat interesting.

I should like to refer particularly this evening to clause 2. My remarks may seem of a general character, but they will deal mainly with that clause of the bill.

For many years, Canadians have been asking for radio and television services everywhere and in all areas. That is to say that this medium of information, of culture and of recreation is quite highly esteemed by the public. For those reasons, then, I feel this bill must be studied and passed as soon as possible, because it seems to make the necessary changes.

Once this new act is passed, the committee entrusted with managing the broadcasting system, private as well as public, can then satisfy the request of Canadians who have been clamouring for radio and television services. In this connection, I should like to point out that too many fairly important centres are still deprived of the services of this system or this means of information.

I recall that, in 1962, when I was elected for the first time, I noticed that certain areas in my riding had made application and had brought pressure to bear, to get the services of the C.B.C. Not long after the 1962 selection, we were faced with a severe austerity program and, at that time, the millions of dollars granted the C.B.C. for its expansion were withdrawn, and the C.B.C. could not provide the additional services it had intended to give. Therefore, as a result of that austerity program, of that financial crisis, areas such as Chibougamau, Chapais, Clova and many others, throughout the country, were refused radio and television coverage because of a lack of money. Therefore, year after year since then, those developments have always been postponed due to a lack of money.

Once again this year, following the announcement made a few days ago by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson), the same situation prevails and the citizens who live in those regions, which the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) as well as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) like to call remote regions, isolated regions which cannot be reached or can be reached only with great difficulty, will have to wait again, in short will have to wait again until the government finds the necessary funds to give them that service.

Mr. Chairman, when the ministers or the government tell us that those regions are remote, isolated and, thus, inaccessible, I disagree with such statements because when it comes to collecting taxes there, the Minister of National Revenue does not find them too remote. The miners who live in those regions know that very well, for they have to pay twice over for services which they do not get because, as pointed out by the hon. member who spoke before me, television, whether public or private, must be paid for.

Therefore, when the people of those regions buy a bar of soap, a pack of cigarettes or any other product advertised on television, they pay a slightly higher price because the companies which advertise their products on television raise their prices to pay for the publicity. Therefore, these people are paying for television services which they do not get. This is an injustice which I hope will be corrected by the new broadcasting council. I think that the hon. Minister of Finance should be approached as soon as possible by the Secretary of State, so that the

C.B.C. may obtain the appropriations it needs to extend its services in all parts of the country, so that as many Canadians as possible may enjoy them, as well as private stations. We note that private enterprise can hardly serve those places, and it is up to the C.B.C., which is a crown corporation, to give those services.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another point which I would like to raise this evening. I referred to it a few days ago and I would like to bring it up again this evening. In some areas such as the one in which I live, the northwestern area of the province of Quebec, we have a private radio and television station. However, as that service does not entirely meet the requirements of the public and broadcasts programs which sometimes people can hardly understand, because they are unsuitable, I ask the C.B.C. to extend the services of FM radio, in order that we may obtain some truly cultural programs which could be heard by everyone, by those who prefer good music, first-rate music rathern than music which I would compare to abstract art music which means just about nothing and only produces headaches and some rhythm.

So, I think that the C.B.C. should provide the northwestern region of Quebec, the region of Abitibi, with FM radio service so as to serve the public as well as possible.

Before closing, Mr. Chairman, on clause 2 of the bill, I am wondering about subclause (i) stating that:

—service should be provided within the Canadian broadcasting system for educational broadcasting;

I should like to ask the Secretary of State if there is an agreement with the province of Quebec, because I believe that, in matters of education, the government of the province of Quebec is rather touchy, and rightly so. I think that agreements should be reached by the two governments so as to avoid any encroachment.

Mr. Chairman, in closing my remarks, I hope that the minister will pay them particular attention and that the C.B.C. particularly will have available the necessary money to extend broadcasting services everywhere in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Johnston: I should like to discuss the undiscussable this evening at some length. When I say "undiscussable" I refer to a subject which might be stated in one word —taste. Or if you want to use two words, good taste. I realise that this is an area which is difficult to define and therefore one from which a modern individual tends to withdraw in helplessness or confusion rather than attempt to make a case for standards in an area in which it can be difficult to set standards.

I would say, further, that this is particularly undiscussable at 10.30 in the evening of a long day, and I regret that this important piece of legislation should be brought down at this hour for hon. members to begin a clause by clause study in committee. I regret also that this legislation should be brought before the house on the eve of a Christmas recess, especially on a Tuesday evening when we know that Wednesday is a short day and that Thursday is to be taken up by a debate on housing which was supposed to have taken place on Friday. So the time available for this clause by clause study will be of the very briefest.

Mr. Barnett: Might I suggest that the hon. member is not altogether correct. As I understand it, the regular hours of sitting on Thursday are to be extended, and the morning sitting will be additional to the normal proceedings of the house. I think the hon. member's reference to the debate on housing is incorrect.

Mr. Johnston: I appreciate the illuminating point of order raised by the hon. member. I do not mind what excuse he puts forward for the suggestion that doing double duty on Thursday will add to the lustre of this chamber and do justice either to housing or the Broadcasting Act. I submit it will do justice to neither.

To return to my point, I am much concerned about this undiscussable area in the C.B.C. It was not discussed in the committee to any extent. At the beginning of the sittings, every time we came to one of these difficult, dangerous or possibly embarrassing aspects, the clause was allowed to stand. We were told this had been done so that the committee could get on with the housekeeping part of the subject and that at the end there would be time for a complete discussion of these problem areas. Of course when we did eventually reach that point, passage of the bill through committee was drastically accelerated as a result of the resignation of the president of the C.B.C. and the urgency of rushing ahead with the legislation so that the nation could cease holding its breath and learn who the new president was to be.

All the clauses which had been allowed to stand were rushed through in a single afternoon, with the bare minimum of discussion. I felt this was a regrettable and reprehensible use of the committee. We hear a lot about what the committee system can do for parliament generally, but if we continue doing to the committee system what we are doing to it now there is not much hope in that direction.

I should like to talk about what I would call the sweet smell of decay which has surrounded a good part of the supposedly entertainment programming of the C.B.C., particularly in some of its most prestigious spots on the prime time. I know the minister has received letters about some of these programs and I know other members as well as myself have received such letters also. Previously I was one of those people who defended the program "Festival" particularly. I took the position that the good things it did were quite capable of balancing out the odd utter failure that would happen every so often. But I do not think that ever before in the history of our Canadian broadcasting have we seen such a lengthy process of assault on the sensibilities of the Canadian public as we have through this fall and early winter season of the C.B.C.

In spite of the remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond I do not quite see why the public should have to sit back and in a sense allow itself to be hammered over the head by material that is pointless, tasteless, provocative and expensive or have to turn it off after they become sick of writhing as they watch it, knowing that they are paying for it through taxation. Although the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond may equate the sums which go through by the means of advertising into program production to those which come through the public purse, I do know that although you can stop buying the product—you do not have to buy the soap or detergent or whatever it may be—you cannot stop paying taxes. At least I have not found a method of doing so yet and I doubt whether the minister has either.

Miss LaMarsh: Have a low income.

Mr. Johnston: I would entirely agree with the minister in that regard.

I should like to quote from an article written by Mr. John Sparrow which appeared in the Sunday Times of London, England. In a sense speaking to today's public and using examples drawn from samples of Swift and Burke he says:

> "You have subtilized yourselves," he might tell with Burke, "into savages," pointing to two revolutions that are taking place within our gates: the Abdication of the Artist and the Abdication of the Adult.
> The abdication of the artist means the triumph of Anti-Art; the domination, in literature and in music, in painting and in sculpture, of a random element. The chance object usurps the place of the artefact; finding is making; the spectator takes over from the artist, the audience from the composer and the executant. If the artist asserts himself at all, it is not to carry out a conscious purpose, but to fulfil an inner impulse which he does not seek to control.
> In all this Swift might see a revolt against the rule of order of design, of restraint; a deliberate appeal to chaos and an invitation to violence; a challenge to the very idea of art as a special kind of conscious activity.

He then went on to say that through this abdication by the artist we have a policy of simply presenting life as it is without expurgation and with a minimum of editing. The article then continues in this regard:

> —an aim which, if its validity is admitted, justifies not only the presentation of the random "happening" as a work of art, but the description in print, and the representation, (even, perhaps, the actual exhibition) on the stage, of copulation, excretion, sadistic practices, anything, in short, that people do.

Later the article states:

> All this Swift might well observe and record with an amused and perverted relish. His scorn he would reserve for the abdicators—

Mr. Sparrow lists them as critics, instructors, parents and legislators. He then says:

> —who might well appear to him to have lost, in a paralysis of confidence, the will and the power to criticize, to control, to condemn; and that, at the very juncture when civilization and enlightenment are under the heaviest attack.

I am afraid that through the rising processes and through the timing the government has used in presenting this bill for study this chamber will find its members among the legislators who are abdicators. This area will not receive the consideration and the discussion it should, and because of a paralysis of hesitation we will withdraw from the attempt to regulate and to call, through the legislation itself, for a little more order out of the chaos.

You might feel that these words are a little harsh. Let me quote from the C.B.C. Times itself, which is not usually regarded as the most severe critic of the C.B.C. Let me quote from the previews they gave of three of the programs which followed in a series and had a rather cumulative effect on the public. I begin with a review of something called "The Ernie Game". It states:

"The Ernie Game is very modern, very contemporary—the things that it deals with are things that are the preoccupation of the psychedelic generation ... sanity, insanity, consciousness."

These are quotations from what was said by Mr. Owen, the producer. It continues as follows:

I'm presently very much interested in surfaces. I think that's where the profundity is—in the surface, that there is only a surface, that the other thing is an invention ... In The Ernie Game, which is all surface, nobody ever tells you anything about the characters, no information is provided, the reason for doing anything is completely unclear, because I think it never is clear.

I have no objection at all to the artist having a private insight or playing a private joke on the public, but I do question the advisability, the desirability and the propriety of asking the taxpayer to foot the bill constantly and regularly without being able to obtain anything from it.

Let us look at the description of "Waiting for Caroline" from the C.B.C. Times a week or two later. It states in part:

It's not, however, just a simple love story. That's something Kelly says he's not interested in filming. "The last thing I want to do is entertainment," he says. "Unless one stimulates an audience to be aroused rather than to be more soporific, it's a waste of time.

I think people should come away with their complacencies somewhat jarred."

• (10:40 p.m.)

I must admit that it stimulated the audience. It stimulated people to write letters to me and, I am sure, to a great many other members of parliament. These people are aroused because they are being asked to pay for this form of stimulation.

I should now like to refer to the final effort of this series, called "The Paper People". One director described it in the C.B.C. Times in these words:

—light, gay, frivolous, but underneath is an edge of despair and terror. I have been told it has the baroqueness of a Fellini production, and the mysticism of some of Antonioni's work. It's not an historical piece. It's very contemporary and avant garde, about the "now" generation.

The description continues in this way:

It's a slice through the artsy crowd. To some people it may seem sick, a little camp, a bit decadent. But it's really a rather strange love story, and a search by the artist for many things.

I submit that when the C.B.C. in the C.B.C. Times calls its own programming decadent and suggests that it may seem sick and a little camp, it really is, and that we have it on the best authority. We have noticed this fall something that has been missing from the Canadian television scene, that is, a revolt amongst the critics themselves who have grown weary of calling this sort of programming harmless, artistic, very fine. They have grown weary of seeing the same bedroom scene over and over again, week after week, regardless of what is the title of the production. The undressing of the characters in the bedroom scene has not been sufficient to add that much interest to the program, and it has reached the stage where the critics now describe this scene as the "obligatory" scene; it has to be in or it will not be a C.B.C. production.

I should like to quote one critic who reviewed "The Paper People", the last of this series of programs, and described it as "pretentious, sickeningly arty, and boring." Sheila H. Kieran says:

I've always considered myself one of that band ... who have thought of the C.B.C. as a noble experiment and who have looked down on its detractors as philistines ... but, boy, is the C.B.C. making it hard.

This was because she had seen the screening of "The Paper People". She went on to say:

Yesterday I saw a screening of "The Paper People", next Wednesday's Festival production. Even for the precious types who inhabit the C.B.C. this play is a bit much: it is pretentious, arty—in the worst sense—and downright boring.

Most of all it is insufferably arrogant—it seems to have been made by the few for the few. I don't subscribe to the idea that everything the C.B.C. does has to have the widest mass audience but, with this production, the C.B.C. becomes the world's only national network serving 50 people.

I think that is a rather good line, because I understand this final production of the series cost $150,000. This figure has been mentioned in various reviews on the program. At a time when we have heard an appeal for austerity, which has great merit, and the government has seen fit to take the subsidy off quality farm products, I wonder whether it might not consider that it is too highly subsidizing in the C.B.C. a product singularly lacking in quality. Sheila Kieran talks about "the characters standing around and talking significantly." Then she says:

—frankly, I still don't know what they were talking about. (I have a sneaking suspicion they don't know either.)

I might tell the minister that I was invited out for dinner the evening this production was to appear, and so I hesitantly asked my host and hostess if we could not watch "The Paper People" because I was concerned about it. I knew it was the third part of a trilogy and I thought I should at least see it before I rose to criticize it in the House of Commons. Very graciously they consented to watch it. I am still apologizing in a way for the imposition on those who were entertaining me that evening, because if Sheila Kieran whose business it is to write about it did not know what they were talking about, then certainly the average Canadian or even the considerably intellectual Canadian failed to know what they were talking about.

I know the minister has received strongly worded letters about the program. I will quote from one, a copy of which I have received. The program commenced with a warning that this is adult entertainment, and perhaps one should shut it off. As the writer points out, this was a slightly pompous warning. She went on to say:

> Did anyone think of the myriads of 13-18 years group baby sitting, watching their own T.V.'s or otherwise out from under adult supervision? What are you trying to do to them? They are struggling into a strange complex adult world and these are the guide lines they are offered.

Here the author was referring to the program "Waiting for Caroline" but I am sure the confusion was compounded a week or two later by "The Paper People". She went on to say:

> In our youth certain people undoubtedly behaved like this but their example wasn't thrown at us and depicted as the adult, glamorous, "in" way to conduct our lives, by a communications medium that subtly affects us all. All youth is not yet decadent and corrupt. Their decency amazes one. But what chance are we giving them, depicting licentiousness as freedom, self discipline as a quality completely unknown and truth in personal relationships not even to be considered.
> I repeat, where is the C.B.C. leading these people who will take Canada into the second century? Don't underestimate your influence.

I would suggest that in the final stage of considering the legislation we should give serious thought to amendments which will set down a little more firmly guide lines for the Canadian radio television council not only for C.B.C. broadcasting but also in the private area, because I think it is important for us not to abdicate this great responsibility. I feel the council is far too small in number to adequately take care of all the housekeeping duties which the bill assigns to it. The members of the council will scarcely be sufficiently representative to include representation of the areas most concerned about the moral and religious well-being in the country, and I suspect they will spend their time setting down regulations about how many minutes of advertising should be allowed per hour, about which station should be licensed where, and about how much colour we should have in television programs,—in other words about housekeeping and not about programming.

Unless we provide in the bill more guide lines than are contained in it at present, I am afraid the council will have few occasions to consider seriously the impact and the purpose of the productions that are, after all, what broadcasting is all about.

It bothers me when I receive a letter such as the one from which I have quoted, and I am sure my experience is repeated throughout the house. I experience a tremendous sense of helplessness in the face of such a letter. It is not a letter from a crank. It is a letter from an intelligent, articulate, reasoning and concerned person who wants to know what can be done. I have received many letters like it in the last two years.

I think there is something that can be done without in any way impinging on the artistic freedom of the producers and artists. If they are truly artistic they will learn to select and they will discipline themselves. They will find that, by selection, the meaning is increased and not decreased. Without impinging upon their artistic prerogatives at all, we can set down guide lines that will express the wishes of the voiceless mass of Canadians who sense something is wrong and who have felt up until now they just could not get at that something which is wrong. We can express concern for the sensitivities of religious groups, of parents and of those who are concerned with the moral development of the young. We can do this as legislators in this parliament.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to rise at this point since there are only a few minutes left. However, perhaps I can complete what I have to say in those few minutes. There are only two things I want to bring to the attention of the minister. The hon. member for Chapleau has dealt with one as it applied to his area, and the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke has certainly dealt with the other in a very capable manner. However, I would feel remiss in my duty as the member of parliament for Kindersley if I did not say a few words about the T.V. situation in Saskatoon and in northern Saskatchewan in particular.

As has been pointed out on numerous occasions, there is no T.V. station owned by the C.B.C. in that area. The result has been that we find it difficult to receive adequate C.B.C. coverage in many areas of the province. The intention was to put a station in Saskatoon but because of the freeze on certain areas of the dominion, including Saskatoon, nothing was done for about two years. Finally the matter was brought before the Board of Broadcast Governors back in March and approval was given in April for the construction of the station in Saskatoon.

This matter then went to the cabinet. I am astonished that it has taken the cabinet some months to make a final decision upon whether or not they would proceed with the building of this station, since it had been obvious for at least four years a station was needed in that area. Yet in spite of that, nothing was done. Now we are caught in the so-called economy squeeze, and nothing is going to be done in the immediate future. The people in this portion of the west to which I refer might accept this decision more readily if they did not feel there had been a great deal of money wasted by the C.B.C. in launching coloured television. I will not say that money is actually wasted, but when some $30 million odd goes into colour television and we do not have adequate black and white television it can be understood that we in that area are a little bit incensed. Furthermore, when we realize that the C.B.C. spent some millions of dollars giving television coverage to Expo we are somewhat disturbed that our area of the country is being forgotten.

Mr. Knowles: Did they miss the Tory convention out there too?

Mr. Cantelon: Yes. Now the station has been deferred once more as an economy measure on the part of the cabinet, and more than ever we feel we are the forgotten area of the country. We have heard this government say it intended to go where the votes are. Apparently the votes in western Canada cannot be of much value to it or it would have concentrated a little more on building this station.

We have done everything we could to get proper coverage. In fact we investigated cable television, but the company responsible discovered the distances were so great that it could not get enough stations on its line to make it a profitable venture.

We are further disturbed when we are given to understand that a new French language radio station, which is supposed to be built in the Windsor area, will cost something like half a million dollars. I must say I am not opposed to French language stations; please do not misunderstand me; but if money is to be spent in that way, then we feel money could be spent to put the television facilities into our area that we feel ought to be there.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but it being eleven o'clock shall I rise and report progress?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, December 20, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

RURAL DEVELOPMENT

TABLING OF STUDY PREPARED FOR ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table, on behalf of the Prime Minister, special study No. 7 prepared for the Economic Council of Canada by Helen Buckley and Eva Tihanyi, entitled "Canadian Policies For Rural Adjustment: a Study of the Economic Impact of ARDA, PFRA and MMRA."

Sir, I very deeply regret that French copies are not available at this time, as the study was prepared in English. It is presently being translated, and copies in French are expected early in the new year.

Mr. Speaker: Has the parliamentary secretary leave to table this document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE IN DISABILITY PENSION RATES

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions both the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board have indicated to members of this house that an adjustment of veterans disability pensions was being taken into consideration in the preparation of the budgetary calculations recently announced.

I have also indicated from time to time that the government was aware of the need for an adjustment of veterans pensions, and that we would not necessarily wait to do this until the two studies we had initiated were completed, that is the Woods committee report and the study of pension rates. It is proposed, therefore, to increase disability pension rates 15 per cent across the board effective January 1, 1968.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Teillet: This means, of course, the inclusion of widows, orphans and dependant parents. This will mean an increased expenditure of $30 million in next year's estimates and $7.5 million in this year's expenditures. We will take advantage of the next supplementary estimates to make this effective. Both these increases were taken into account in the estimates of expenditure presented by the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, naturally all veterans will welcome this announcement by the minister of an increase in their pensions. I am not quite sure whether the minister said the increase will apply also to dependant children.

Mr. Teillet: Yes.

Mr. Chatterton: At least the grave error that was made in November of last year, when the minister said there was to be a 15 per cent increase but it would apply to the basic pension only, has not been repeated. That was a grievous mistake; as a matter of fact veterans with families received the smallest increase. The veterans of the country will not be satisfied until there is a permanent basis for establishing their pension rates. The national organizations demand that the pension rates be tied to the salaries of certain types of employees in the civil service.

I hope the minister will use his good offices to speed up the report of the special departmental committee on pension rates. I hope, also, that the minister will soon introduce the amendments to the Pension Act which he announced and promised in 1964, so the inequities that now exist in the act and that will no doubt be reported on by the Woods committee can be rectified.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all veterans who will benefit from this increase will be very pleased that it has arrived almost as a Christmas present. They have waited very patiently throughout the months for the government to make a decision with respect to this very important matter. The 15 per cent increase across the board I am sure will be welcomed by those who will receive it in the near future.

I hope, as did the previous speaker, that the report of the special committee dealing with the question of rates will soon be forthcoming, because this is a matter of great importance to many veterans; and that an equitable rate will be established in relation to the casual worker and the wages which prevail today. I must say that I can see the response throughout the country to the minister's announcement will be most favourable indeed.

I have one question for the minister. He did not mention in his statement anything about the war veterans allowance. Would he say later whether any consideration is being given to this matter?

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group are glad to hear the announcement of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Teillet) to the effect that veterans will be granted a general 15 per cent increase, without any discrimination as to groups.

However, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that this presents a contrast with the budget brought down a few weeks ago by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp). Just before Christmas especially, I think that veterans will be very happy about the minister's anouncement.

On the other hand, I call the attention of the minister to the fact that even if we were to grant a general increase of 15 per cent, it would still be desirable, until the measures concerning veterans affairs and allowances are amended, to ensure that no niggardliness is practised as to the degree or percentage of incapacity of veterans. There have been complaints not only on the amount of the pension but also on the procedure to determine the degree of incapacity of a veteran. On this point, I can give many instances of which I am personally aware. I should like to ask the minister at this time to make sure that no niggardliness is shown on this score. It is useless to grant 15 per cent if it is to be taken away in another fashion.

I believe that on consideration of the bill to amend the present legislation, we may deal with this problem and until then, once again, in the name of the veterans, our group welcomes this announcement by the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

[Mr. Herridge.]

[English]

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am sure, as has been stated, that veterans across Canada will welcome the announcement that has been made this afternoon, as we welcome it here in the House of Commons. I am also certain that one of the happiest individuals in the house today is the Minister of Veterans Affairs himself, because in spite of the long delay I believe he has been seriously concerned about this particular problem. Not only will his wish be fulfilled, but the minister's announcement will save him from having to answer the many embarrassing questions which are put to him from time to time.

We welcome this announcement, and we know the minister will continue to press for the establishment of an adequate formula for determining these rates. He pointed out that the increased expenditure in the next year's estimates of the department will amount to $30 million, but I believe the people of Canada, in spite of the recommendations of the Minister of Finance to curtail expenditures, will be happy to bear the costs necessary to assist those who served the country so well.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ADJOURNMENT FOR CHRISTMAS RECESS UNTIL JANUARY 22

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved:

That when the house rises this week for the Christmas recess, it shall stand adjourned until January 22, 1968, at 2:30 o'clock p.m.; provided always that if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with Her Majesty's Government, that the public interest requires that the house should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the house shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Mr. Speaker being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker shall act in his stead for the purpose of this order.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROVISION FOR MORNING SITTING ON DECEMBER 21

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved:

That, in addition to the hours of sitting set down for Thursday, December 21, 1967, the house shall meet at 10:00 a.m. and sit until 1:00 p.m.

That after prayers have been said at 10.00 a.m., a Minister of the Crown shall propose a motion "That the house do now adjourn" for the purpose of debating the subject of "housing", provided that the said debate shall be terminated not later than 1:00 p.m. in the said sitting, when the motion "to adjourn" shall be deemed to have been withdrawn and thereupon the sitting of the house shall be suspended until 2:30 p.m.; and

That when the sitting is resumed at 2:30 p.m. the house shall forthwith proceed with the ordinary daily routine of business and such other business that has been appointed or set down for consideration in that sitting.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are all in favour of this motion but there is one suggestion I should like to make. Perhaps I might put it to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in the form of a question. In view of the fact that this is special time we are providing, and in order that a reasonable number of members might be able to participate in the debate, I wonder if the minister would ascertain, either now or during the day, whether a house order could be passed limiting the length of time each member might speak. If we make the limit 20 minutes, then more members could take part in the debate tomorrow morning.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the house leader would take into account the numerical strength of the various parties, if a limitation of time is to be imposed, and make it on that basis.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to lodge something of a protest against this most unusual attempt to brush over what was supposed to be a high minded debate on Friday by shifting it to Thursday morning. It seems to me that just a few days ago we went through the bi-annual exercise of playing fast and loose with the date for the recess. Everybody resolved, with great unity of purpose, that we could forgo one day of the recess in order to debate this topic. I feel that a commitment was made at that time by the people who precipitated the adjournment debate, by the Prime Minister and by the house leader for the official opposition, for the debate on Friday. I find it passing strange we should in any way renege on that commitment to the Canadian people, who I am sure feel that housing is a sufficiently important topic that a day should be allotted to it.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In his first motion, the minister said simply:

That when the house rises this week for the Christmas recess—

He failed to specify which day: Thursday or Friday? If we are to sit Friday, Mr. Speaker, then I wonder why, under the terms of the second motion, we could not sit Thursday to deal with the regular business of the house, and Friday, to debate the housing problem. I think the minister should give us some clarification and tell us whether or not we are to sit Friday, supposing that we pass this motion to hold the housing debate on Thursday morning? Could the minister answer this question?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: In speaking now the minister will close the debate.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it is proposed that the house will rise on Thursday. The precise time of adjournment was not placed in the order because we are not certain at this point at what moment on Thursday the house will adjourn. It is not intended to sit on Friday.

With respect to the motion now before the house, Mr. Speaker, it was felt—and I think this view was expressed by all parties in the house—that this would be an efficient and useful way to have a housing debate. It will be possible for all points of view to be expressed in this three hour period. In no way is the house ignoring its obligations to the people of Canada, nor its obligation to have a debate on the subject before the Christmas adjournment. I am sure if the time is properly used tomorrow morning it will be possible to have as useful a debate as if it were held later in the week.

With respect to the proposal made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I am quite prepared to consult with the other parties to arrange for a 20 minute time limit, and also to take into account the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. If these two points of view can be reconciled, then it will be possible to have a wider participation representative of all members of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Questions

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

HALIFAX RELIEF COMMISSION

Question No. 416—Mr. Caouette:

1. In what activities has the Halifax relief commission been involved over the past three years?

2. Who are the members of this commission?

3. What were the annual expenditures of this body for each of the past three years?

4. Does the government intend to do away with this body, which was established in 1918?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1. Over the past three years the Halifax relief commission has continued to carry out the responsibilities for which it was established, namely, the payment of pensions to those suffering disabilities and to widows of victims of the Halifax explosion of December 6, 1917. In addition, medical assistance in relation to their disabilities is provided for both pensioners and others who were injured in the explosion. The commission is also responsible for the management of the funds and property with which it was entrusted.

2. A. M. Butler, chairman; F. H. Flinn; W. E. Tibbs.

3. 1964, $114,355; 1965, $114,412; 1966, $110,764.

These expenditures were made from revenues accruing to the commission from funds donated for relief many years ago by various governments and private donors.

4. As the need for the assistance provided by the commission diminishes with the passage of time, the federal government will review with the government of Nova Scotia the question of the future of the commission.

C.N.R. EMPLOYEES WITH EXPENSE ACCOUNTS

Question No. 523—Mr. Godin:

How many employees of the Canadian National Railways had company expense accounts during the year 1966?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: It is company policy to reimburse all legitimate out of pocket expenses incurred by any employee in connection with the business of the company. The control of these expenses is maintained through the company's budgetary and other internal controls. It is not possible to answer the question in the form asked as the expenses involved are allocated to the specific phase of the business of the company where the expenditure was incurred.

C.B.C. NORTHERN SERVICE

Question No. 526—Mr. Nielsen:

1. How many employees are employed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in connection with the operation of the C.B.C. Northern Service in the Yukon (a) in Whitehorse (b) in Ottawa or elsewhere, and what is the name, position and salary of each such employee?

2. (a) What was the cost of the operation of the C.B.C. Northern Service in the Yukon for each of the years since its establishment (b) what was the cost of such operation in the Northwest Territories for each of such years?

3. What was the cost of the establishment of the "Frontier Package" in Yellowknife, N.W.T., and what is the estimated annual cost of operation?

4. (a) When is it intended to establish such "Frontier Package" in the Yukon (b) upon the establishment of television services in the Yukon, what communities will be served (c) what is the estimated cost of the establishment of the "Frontier Package" in the Yukon and the anticipated annual cost of operation?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the C.B.C. as follows: 1. (a) 13. (b) Ottawa, 13; Yellowknife, 14; Inuvik, 9; Frobisher Bay, 9; Goose Bay, 10; Churchill, 9; Montreal, 10. Staff in Ottawa and Montreal are also engaged in providing recorded and shortwave programs for the Department of National Defence radio stations overseas and programs for the northern short wave service. While it has not been customary to request the C.B.C. to disclose salaries of individual employees, a list of positions by location is attached.

2. (a) and (b)

Cost of northern service operations

	Yukon $	Northwest Territories $
1958-59	31,827	14,645
1959-60	136,862	75,372
1960-61	175,370	128,703
1961-62	235,475	199,689
1962-63	211,723	263,608
1963-64	206,751	298,465
1964-65	227,291	303,943
1965-66	235,194	356,157
1966-67	263,115	450,229

3. Cost of establishing the frontier station at Yellowknife was $48,000. This does not include costs of establishing special recording facilities at Calgary and testing equipment which is also for use in servicing other such stations. Estimated annual cost of operating the Yellowknife station is $22,000.

4. (a) The corporation intends to submit an application to the Department of Transport in January, 1968, for a frontier station at Whitehorse. This application is expected to be heard at the public hearing of the B.B.G. in April, 1968. (b) Other television stations are planned for the Yukon in addition to that at Whitehorse but exact locations have not been finally determined nor have details of construction and cost yet been worked out. (c) The estimated capital cost for the Whitehorse station is $108,700. A larger transmitter than that normally planned for a frontier station will be used, primarily due to the problems of terrain in the area. Also, a tape playback centre will have to be installed away from the transmitter site and linked to the transmitter by microwave to overcome problems arising from the difficulty of access to the transmitter. The estimated annual operating cost for Whitehorse is $45,000. Costs involved with development of other locations cannot be forecast realistically until on-site surveys have been made and detailed engineering estimates developed.

1. Established positions by location: Whitehorse, Y.T.; Station manager; Clerk; Supervising technician; Technician; Program supervisor; Receptionist-switchboard operator; News editor; Announcer/operators (6).

Ottawa—headquarters northern service and armed forces service: Director; Administrative officer; Administrative assistant; Program liaison officer; Program planning officer; Supervisor of technical operations; Clerical and secretarial (7).

Montreal—production centre northern service and armed forces service (including shortwave): Production manager; Production assistant; Presentation officer; Producers (3); Program assistant; Clerical and secretarial (3).

Yellowknife, N.W.T.: Station manager; Clerk; Supervising technician; Technicians (2); Receptionist-switchboard operator; News editor; Program supervisor; Announcer/operators (6).

Inuvik, N.W.T.: Station manager; Clerk; Supervising technician; Announcer/operators (6).

Goose Bay, Labrador: Station manager; Clerk; Technician; Receptionist-switchboard operator; Announcer/operators (6).

Churchill, Manitoba: Station manager; Clerk; Technician; Announcer/operators (6).

GREAT SLAVE LAKE RAIL LINE

Question No. 574—Mr. Schreyer:

1. With regard to the construction of Great Slave lake railroad, what was the original estimate of the date of completion and of the total cost of construction and what was the actual date of completion and the total cost?

2. How many road construction contractor firms were involved in this construction?

3. How many contractors went bankrupt during this operation or within one year after date of completion?

4. How many settlements regarding claims have been finalized?

5. How many claims are pending?

6. On each section of the railway construction project for which separate tenders were called and where the amount of earth moving was not in accordance with specifications, to what amount was the actual in excess of or below that specified for tenders?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. Original estimated date of completion was December 31, 1966. The original estimated cost was $86,250,000. By order in council No. P.C. 1966-2415 dated December 22, 1966 the date of completion of the line of railway was extended to March 31, 1970 and until the line is completed actual final cost figures cannot be given.

2. Ten.

3. The information requested is not within the knowledge of the railway.

4, 5 and 6. As litigation is pending in the courts on certain aspects embraced by these questions, it is not considered appropriate to provide information in view of the sub judice nature of the matter.

RECONSTRUCTION OF TRESTLE ON BRANCH LINE, CHELAN, SASK.

Question No. 586—Mr. Korchinski:

Does the government intend to continue its policy to guarantee certain railway branch lines until January 1, 1975 and, if so, when will the trestle on the branch line west of Chelan, Saskatchewan, be reconstructed?

Questions

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Yes. The Canadian Transport Commission advises as follows: The railway transport committee of the Canadian Transport Commission, by its order No. R-715 of December 1, 1967, has ordered the Canadian National Railways to reconstruct the railway bridge destroyed by fire on May 19, 1967, on the Chelan subdivision, near Chelan, Saskatchewan, within three months of the date of the order.

STEEL AND NICKEL PRODUCTION

Question No. 638—Mr. Godin:

1. Does the government intend providing any support towards increasing the steel and nickel production in Canada?

2. By how much should this production be increased to meet Canadian requirements?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): In so far as the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is concerned: 1. The government already provides substantial encouragement to the nickel and steel industries through certain mineral incentives under the Income Tax Act. These incentives have contributed substantially and directly to past and present expansion programs of these two industries.

2. Canadian production of nickel far exceeds domestic Canadian requirements, so much so that about 97 per cent of production must be sold on the export market. Canadian steelmaking capacity is now over 12 million tons a year, more than enough to meet current Canadian requirements of about 10.5 million tons a year.

In so far as the Department of Industry is concerned: 1. The government does not currently have any intention of providing support toward increasing steel or nickel production in Canada.

Both of these industries are in a strong position with the exception of the current problems involving the Sydney, Nova Scotia steel plant. There has been a substantial expansion in Canadian plant capacity in recent years.

2. The Canadian steel industry supplies approximately 87 per cent of the country's demand for primary iron and steel products and in 1966 exported more tonnage than Canadian steel consumers imported. Some of the imports consisted of kinds of steel not produced in Canada.

[Mr. Korchinski.]

Canada consumes only 4 per cent of its nickel production. The balance of output is exported. Canadian capacity is being expanded to supply the growing world demand for this product.

LETTER FROM TRAINMEN'S UNION, SYDNEY, N.S.

Question No. 646—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

With reference to question No. 282, answered on June 26, 1967 has the board of transport commissioners reported on the matter referred to them by the Minister of Transport?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Yes, the secretary of the union being notified accordingly. A copy has been provided the hon. member.

EVALUATION OF PILOT PROJECT, ELLIOT LAKE, ONT.

Question No. 682—Mr. Aiken:

1. With respect to the pilot project at Elliot Lake in which the Indian affairs branch is a participant, was there a contract awarded to Dr. Jamieson Bond for the evaluation of the project?

2. Has the Department of Manpower and Immigration, also a participant in the project, any facilities for research and, if so, for what reason or reasons was the evaluation of the project carried out by contract rather than by the said department?

3. Has any report of the evaluation been completed and made available to the government and, if so, at what cost, and if such report has been completed, what is the nature of its content and recommendations, if any?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Manpower and Immigration as follows: 1. Yes, an evaluation, particularly of attitudes and social factors.

2. The Department of Manpower and Immigration has facilities within its organization for carrying out research studies. However, as the department's participation in the Elliot Lake project was limited to arranging occupational training when this was required, the decision concerning the method of evaluating the project would rest with the Indian affairs branch, which had the primary interest in the project.

3. The report has not yet been received; the cost will not exceed $4,900.

PENSIONS OF RETIRED C.N.R. EMPLOYEES

Question No. 691—Mr. Knowles:

1. How many retired employees of the Canadian National Railways are in receipt of pensions of less than $25 per month?

2. How many are in receipt of a pension of $25 per month?

3. How many are in receipt of pensions of (a) $25.01 to $29.99 per month (b) $30 to $39.99 per month (c) $40 to $49.99 per month (d) $50 to $59.99 per month (e) $60 to $69.99 per month (f) $70 to $79.99 per month (g) $80 to $89.99 per month (h) $90 to $99.99 per month (i) $100 to $124.99 per month (j) $125 to $149.99 per month (k) $150 to $199.99 per month (l) $200 to $299.99 per month (m) $300 per month or over?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: The information currently available is the same as was given in reply to question No. 2427 of January 13 last.

C.N.R. PENSION FUNDS

Question No. 692—Mr. Knowles:

1. What was the total amount of money on the books of the pension funds of the Canadian National Railways as at (a) December 31, 1964 (b) December 31, 1965 (c) December 31, 1966?

2. What rate of interest does the C.N.R. pay on this money?

3. What amount of interest was credited to the above noted pension funds during the year ending (a) December 31, 1964 (b) December 31, 1965 (c) December 31, 1966?

4. What was the total amount paid out of the above noted funds in pensions during the years ending (a) December 31, 1964 (b) December 31, 1965 (c) December 31, 1966?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: The information which is contained in the company's annual reports for the years 1964 and 1966, is as follows: 1. The total amounts of the investments, cash and other current assets on the books of the pension trust funds were: As at December 31, 1964, $531,627,361; December 31, 1965, $575,887,009; December 31, 1966, $626,818,658.

2. The CNR does not pay interest on these assets which are held separately in the pension trust funds.

3. Net earnings on the investments of the pension trust funds were: Year ended December 31, 1964, $23,830,471; December 31, 1965, $25,932,593; December 31, 1966, $28,763,156.

4. Total amounts of the pensions paid out of the pension trust funds were: Year ended December 31, 1964, $32,145,649; December 31, 1965, $34,575,142; December 31, 1966, $37,595,615.

REQUEST FOR OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING, FORT ALEXANDER INDIAN BAND

Question No. 694—Mr. Jorgenson:

1. Has Chief Dave Courchene of the Fort Alexander Indian band in Manitoba made application or representations to the Indian affairs branch and/or the office of the Department of Manpower in Manitoba for the basic upgrading of forty-two Indian people in his band who are unemployed and eligible for training under the occupational training for adults legislation?

2. If so, what consideration, if any, did the respective departments give to the request of Chief Courchene?

3. With respect to his request, did the Indian affairs branch indicate to him that the branch would provide welfare for the people on course in lieu of allowances?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Manpower and Immigration and Indian Affairs and Northern Development as follows: 1. Chief Dave Courchene of the Fort Alexander Indian band in Manitoba has not made any direct representation to the Department of Manpower and Immigration. Some 40 persons are currently being financed in courses on this reserve, and other applicants will be considered.

Mr. David Courchene, chief of the Fort Alexander Indian band, has made representation to the Indian affairs branch regarding training for the Fort Alexander reserve.

2. and 3. Chief Courchene was informed by the Indian affairs branch of the position it would take in the event that the Department of Manpower and Immigration did not authorize the purchase of level IV training, as follows:

(a) Indian affairs would either purchase the service from the province or operate the course.

(b) Indian affairs would pay the cost of instruction, including teacher's salary, books, and transportation when required.

(c) It would not be possible for Indian affairs branch to pay living allowances.

(d) Most unemployed reserve residents desiring training would be receiving welfare assistance which would cover their living requirements.

(e) Indian affairs branch does not wish to take people out of employment and to put them in training. If the employed Indian people desire to raise their educational level, a possibility of evening courses would be explored.

ADMINISTRATION OF HARBOURS

Question No. 715—Mr. Caouette:

1. Does the government intend to set up an autonomous body for the control of the Montreal Harbour?

2. Does the government intend to apply the recommendations of the Gibb and Glassco Royal commissions concerning the administration of Canadian harbours and, if not, for what reason?

3. Has the government taken any steps to make the St. Lawrence River navigable throughout the year and, if so, what are they?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No.

2. The Department of Transport has already implemented the recommendation of the Glassco royal commission that the administration of Canadian harbours be decentralized. This is being done by establishing local harbour commissions under 13 Eliz. II, Chap. 32, "an act on the establishment of harbour commissions".

Furthermore, with the regional organization now under implementation, harbour administration will be delegated to the regions.

Generally speaking, the Gibb report was implemented in part by the formation of the National Harbours Board in 1936 under the National Harbours Board Act. Recommendations of the Glassco commission were implemented, in so far as harbours under the jurisdiction of the National Harbours Board are concerned, wherever it was found practicable to do so.

3. In the St. Lawrence river below Quebec the arrangements to support navigation throughout the winter consist of an organization to maintain up to date information on the constantly changing ice situation and to advise shipping on the conditions that they may expect and the easiest route to follow. Where necessary available icebreakers escort ships through difficult areas.

Between Quebec and Montreal the Department of Transport uses icebreakers to maintain an open channel so that broken ice from up river may move down freely and avoid heavy accumulations that will cause the river level to rise. Suitably constructed vessels are free to use this channel provided they do not impede flood control operations. There is no means at present of entirely preventing conditions that will cause ice to jam in the channel from time to time during the winter, but these blocks are always removed as quickly as possible.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

*CONSTRUCTION OF NATIONAL REVENUE BUILDING, OTTAWA

Question No. 735—Mr. Aiken:

1. Has construction recently commenced on a new building for the Department of National Revenue at Confederation Heights, Ottawa?

2. If so, when was the work started, what is the projected completion date, and the total estimated cost?

3. What is the purpose for which this building is being constructed?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes.

2. The contract for $17,981,000 was awarded on August 18, 1967. The projected completion date is February, 1970.

3. To provide consolidated accommodation for the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue and for the data centre.

C.N.R. LAY-OFFS, QUEBEC REGION

Question No. 764—Mr. Laprise:

1. Since the layoff of C.N.R. employees in Quebec regions on November 1 last, how many work days have been lost by employees transferred to other sections of their region?

2. What is the estimated amount lost by these employees?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1 and 2. The company does not maintain records which would readily produce information to answer the question in the form asked. This type of information is not required for purposes of the operation of the railway and would entail considerable time and clerical expense to produce.

CENTENNIAL INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Question No. 767—Mr. MacDonald (Prince):

1. Has the centennial commission recently declared a surplus in its operations and, if so, how much?

2. Is consideration being given to using all or part of this surplus for the development of foreign aid programmes or for further work by the centennial international development programme?

3. What plans have been formulated for the continuance of the centennial international development programme?

4. How much money is it estimated has been raised to date under the auspices of the centennial international development programme?

5. In what cities have events been sponsored by the centennial international development programme?

6. How many persons is it estimated were involved in the various programmes and events sponsored by the centennial international development programme?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): 1. The centennial commission has not declared a surplus in its operations. However, it is expected that some of the funds voted in the current fiscal year by parliament to the centennial commission will not be required through economies largely in the administration vote and accordingly whatever amount remaining will lapse as of March 31, 1968.

2. No. As indicated in the answer to part 1, most of the savings are in the administration vote and cannot be used for programs not under the administration vote.

3. None.

4. Total: $1,192,000.

5. Victoria, Vancouver, Calgary, Red Deer, Edmonton, Regina, Three Hills, Alta., Winnipeg, Brandon, Man., Lakehead, Kitchener/Waterloo, Hamilton, London, Welland, Scarborough, Windsor, Orillia, Ottawa, Montreal, Fredericton, Moncton, St. John's, Memorial University.

PRESENTATION OF CENTENNIAL MEDALS

Question No. 774—Mr. McCleave:

What, if any, arrangements have been made by the armed forces and civilian departments for any ceremonies involving the presentation of the Centennial Medals?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Department of National Defence and my department as follows: Special arrangements were not made by the armed forces for the presentation of the centennial medal to its members. The medals however, were despatched in bulk to unit commanding officers for presentation to those members under their command. The form of the presentation ceremonies was the prerogative of the unit commanding officer. Nominations for the centennial medal in respect of civilian employees of all departments are sent to the Department of the Secretary of State and the medals are subsequently forwarded direct to the recipients by that department by registered mail.

FISHERIES EMPLOYEES IN YUKON

Question No. 782—Mr. Nielsen:

1. How many fisheries officers are employed in the Yukon?

2. What other employees, if any, are employed by the Department of Fisheries in the Yukon?

3. In each case, how long have the said employees been so employed?

4. What is the total cost of the operations of the Department of Fisheries in the Yukon for each of the years since the establishment of a fisheries office in the Yukon?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): 1. Two fisheries officers are employed in the Yukon, one fishery officer 4 and one fishery officer 1.

2. One clerical and regulatory level 3.

3. Fishery officer 4 since Dec. 15, 1964; fishery officer 1 since Feb. 1, 1967; clerical and regulatory level 3 since June 23, 1966.

DELAYS IN PENSION PAYMENTS, ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL

Question No. 783—Mr. Harkness:

Are members of the Armed Forces, upon retirement, experiencing delays in the payment to them of pensions under the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act and, if so (a) how long are these delays (b) what are the reasons for them (c) have steps been taken to improve this situation and what are they?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Not normally. Service personnel during the course of their release procedures are informed that they may expect the first payment of any pension they are entitled to under the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act within six weeks of their official release date. On average initial payment cheques are issued well within this six weeks period, the average is 28 days. There are, however, isolated cases where delays are experienced. (a) In such isolated cases delays of from two to four weeks over the six weeks period have been experienced. (b) Some delays are attributable to the complete review of the administrative procedures leading up to the payment of benefits and to the conversion of the three service pay manual systems to a computer system. (c) Yes, the integration of the services benefit sections will improve the situation and will isolate the problem cases so that they will receive special treatment.

DEVELOPMENT BANK LOAN TO VICTORIA SHINGLE COMPANY

Question No. 787—Mr. Douglas:

1. Did McCarter Shingle and Shake Ltd., 119 Sanghees Road, Victoria, B.C., secure a loan from the Industrial Development Bank?

2. If so, what was the amount of the loan and the interest charged for this loan?

3. Has a moratorium been granted on the repayment of principle and/or interest by the Industrial Development Bank?

4. If so, what was the reason for such a moratorium being granted and how long is the moratorium to last?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1, 2, 3 and 4. It has not been the practice nor is it considered appropriate for the I.D.B. to make information publicly available relating to the affairs of a particular applicant or borrower.

ADDITIONAL LAND FOR NEW WELLAND CANAL

Question No. 788—Mr. Saltsman:

1. How much land has the St. Lawrence seaway authority purchased or expropriated for a new canal from Thorold to Lake Ontario and what has been the cost?

2. What amount of additional land may be taken over and what would be the estimated cost?

3. What is the cost estimate for the entire canal project?

4. When does the seaway authority plan to proceed with this development?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority advises as follows: 1. Approximately 2210 acres at an estimated cost of $7,000,000.

2. If any additional land is required, the amount should be relatively minor.

3 and 4. The cost estimate is confidential and no decision has been made to proceed with the project.

COMMUNITY PASTURE, SUFFIELD RESEARCH STATION

Question No. 808—Mr. Horner (Acadia):

Has the Department of National Defence decided to permit the use of the pasture area at the Suffield research station to be used as a community pasture in the coming year?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): No. Any decision to permit the use of pasture at the defence research establishment Suffield is dependent upon the declaration of an emergency drought situation, and subject also to the nature of usage for defence purposes in progress at such time.

COMPLETION OF BUREAU OF STATISTICS FORMS

Question No. 809—Mr. MacEwan:

1. Under what authority are forms forwarded by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for completion by various companies in Canada?

2. What penalties are involved if a form is not completed, and for non-compliance with instructions and under what authority?

3. What guarantee is provided by D.B.S. to a company to keep information confidential?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics collects information from companies, establishments, organizations and individuals, compiles and publishes the resulting data, under the authority of the Statistics Act, chapter 257, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952.

In addition, the dominion statistician is responsible for the administration of the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, chapter 26, 10-11 Elizabeth II which came into force on January 1, 1963. Under this act certain corporations and labour unions are required to supply the dominion statistician with financial and other information.

2. Under the Statistics Act, section 35, every person who, without lawful excuse, refuses or neglects to answer, or wilfully answers falsely, any question requisite for obtaining any information sought in respect of the objects of the act is guilty of an offence and is liable, upon summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months or to both fine and imprisonment.

Under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, section 6(1), every corporation that fails to file with the dominion statistician a return for a reporting period as and when required, is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding fifty dollars for each day of such default. Where a corporation is guilty of an offence, every officer, director or agent of the corporation who directed, authorized, assented to or acquiesced in or participated in the offence is a party to and guilty of the offence and is liable on summary conviction to the above fine for the offence or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or to both such fine and imprisonment, whether or not the corporation has been prosecuted or convicted therefor.

3. Under the Statistics Act, Section 6, every officer, census commissioner, enumerator, agent and other person employed in the execution of any duty under this act must take and subscribe an oath, swearing that he or she will not disclose or make known any matter which comes to his knowledge by reason of his employment.

Under Section 15, no individual return and no part of an individual return made, and no answer to any question put, shall, without previous consent in writing of the person or the owner for the time being of the undertaking, be published, nor, except for the purposes of a prosecution under this act, shall any person, other than a person employed by the bureau, or working under arrangement with the bureau and sworn under the abovementioned oath, be permitted to see any such individual return, part or answer. In addition, no report, summary of statistics or other publication under the Statistics Act shall contain any of the particulars comprised in any individual return so arranged as to enable any person to identify any of the particulars as relating to any individual person or business. Returns of carriers or public utilities, hospitals, institutions, libraries and universities are exempt from the secrecy provision except returns of a financial nature or where an individual patient or other person might be identified.

Under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, financial and certain other information is privileged and is available only to an official or authorized person employed for specified purposes. If any such person, including any person formerly employed, contravenes the secrecy section of the act, section 14(7), he or she is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars or imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or both such fine and imprisonment.

PURCHASE OF AIRCRAFT FOR USE IN CANADA

Question No. 811—Mr. Hales:

Is the Department of Transport considering making an amendment to the appropriate air regulations to enable a Canadian citizen to purchase a registered Canadian aircraft for use in Canada and permit him to have the privilege of taking possession of the aircraft immediately that the bill of sale has been duly signed, witnessed, and dated, and commence to operate it for a period of 15 days without the need for any documentation or permission being necessary from the Department of Transport?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Yes, civil aviation officials have had under study for some time proposed legislation which would amend current regulations relating to aircraft ownership and registration.

New regulatory procedures, as a matter of priority, are planned to be introduced early in 1968, and will permit the continuing use of an aircraft while change of ownership and registration is being effected.

EFFECT OF SULPHUR DIOXIDE FUMES, SUDBURY

Question No. 817—Mr. Germa:

Will the Minister of National Health and Welfare undertake a survey to determine the effects on workers, of long term exposure to high concentrations of sulphur dioxide fumes at the International Nickel Company plant in the Sudbury district?

[Mr. Cantin.]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The Department of National Health and Welfare would assist the provincial government, if requested, in conducting a survey of this type.

PLUG-IN OUTLETS, SASKATOON AIRPORT

Question No. 818—Mr. Brand:

1. Has the Department of Transport considered providing all-weather electrical outlets for automobile plug-in use at the Saskatoon airport (a) for DOT staff members and other airport employees (b) for the general public?

2. If not, what are the reasons for non-provision of this service?

3. If so, when will these plug-ins be made available?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. (a) Yes. (b) No.

2. (b) No practical means are available for control and recovery of capital and operating costs by the department for outlets provided in public parking areas.

3. (a) The installation of outlets, for use of persons employed at the airport, is proposed in conjunction with the plans for extension of parking facilities for which funds are presently included in the 1968/69 capital estimates.

INVESTIGATION INTO OIL POLLUTION, HALIFAX HARBOUR

Question No. 821—Mr. McCleave:

1. What methods of investigation are used to investigate instances of oil pollution in Halifax harbour?

2. Who carries out such investigations?

3. What possible sources of oil pollution are checked, and how often?

4. Have the investigators found instances of oil pollution for which they could not specify the sources?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1 and 2. Pursuant to the oil pollution regulations which are administered by the Department of Transport, upon learning of the presence of oil on the harbour waters, a steamship inspector of the Department of Transport goes to the scene and takes samples of the polluting oil and endeavours, visually and by considering the effects of winds and currents and the statements of any known witness, to trace the source. If there is a possibility of its being a ship, he visits the ship, inspects its oil record book, its pumping equipment, overboard discharges, engine room and bilges, takes samples of oil and questions crew members. The various oil samples are analysed by commercial analysts.

3. Ships. Oil record books are checked upon arrival. Spot checks are carried out thereafter.

4. yes.

TOBACCO IMPORTS FROM SOUTH AFRICA

Question No. 824—Mr. Brewin:

What are the figures for the importation of tobacco from the Republic of South Africa into Canada during each of the last five years?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): The figures for the importation of tobacco from the Republic of South Africa into Canada during each of the last five years are as follows:

Year	Description	Quantity Lbs.	Value $
1962	Tobacco, cigar leaf, unstemmed	159,459	74,302
1963	Tobacco, cigar leaf, unstemmed	122,786	63,096
1964	Tobacco, unmanufactured stemmed, n.e.s.	78,410	52,721
1965		Nil	Nil
1966		Nil	Nil

C.B.C. PROGRAM "HATCH'S MILL"

Question No. 826—Mr. MacEwan:

1. What is the cost of making one production of the C.B.C. programme "Hatch's Mill"?

2. Are there any sponsors for this programme, or is any revenue obtained by the C.B.C. from the production of this programme?

3. Are there any natural born Canadians employed as actors or actresses in the cast of this programme and, if so, how many?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the C.B.C. as follows: 1. Cost of making the hour long color programs in the "Hatch's Mill" series varies from week to week, but averages about $100,000 per program.

2. Yes. There are two sponsors, each of which sponsors a half hour on alternate weeks.

3. Yes. The village setting for this historical drama series requires a fairly large cast which includes 53 natural born Canadians.

PURCHASE OF EXPO SECURITIES

Question No. 829—Mr. Hales:

1. What is the total value of the securities purchased by the Dominion of Canada from the Canadian Corporation for Expo '67?

2. What is the rate of interest charged and the total value of the interest?

3. Has any of the interest been paid?

4. Have any of the securities been redeemed?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1. $205 million.

2. Rates of interest are established quarterly, based on the government's own cost of borrowing for comparable maturities. They vary from 5⅛ per cent on notes issued in 1965 to 5⅞ per cent on notes issued during the fourth quarter of 1967. The value of interest accruals to December 31, 1967 is $13.2 million.

3. Yes. Interest is payable semi-annually, and all due payments have been met in full.

4. No.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO CORNING GLASS FOR PLANT CONSTRUCTION

Question No. 836—Mr. Martin (Timmins):

Was any money advanced by the federal government to assist Corning Glass to build their plant at Bracebridge, Ontario, and, if so (a) how much (b) what provisions and safeguards are set down to ensure Corning Glass lives up to labour laws and regulations?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the departments of Industry and Labour as follows: (a) Corning Glass Works of Canada Ltd. has applied to the area development agency for assistance under the Area Development Incentives Act in connection with a new plant near Bracebridge, Ontario. The level of assistance has not been determined pending confirmation of allowable capital costs for the project. (b) Labour laws and regulations governing the construction of any such plant would come under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities.

SALE OF C.M.H.C. HOUSES, ELLIOT LAKE, ONT.

Question No. 837—Mr. Martin (Timmins):

1. Has the price of houses owned by C.M.H.C. in Elliot Lake gone up since July, 1967, and if so, by how much and for what reason?

2. Has the legal fee for handling transfer of titles of C.M.H.C. houses in Elliot Lake been increased since July, 1967, and if so, by how much and for what reason?

Questions

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): 1. Houses sold in Elliot Lake by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation subsequent to October 1, 1967, have been at prices $500 higher than charged for comparable houses sold earlier. Previous sale prices were established in 1961 and were substantially below reproduction cost. The cost of rehabilitating houses for sale has very substantially increased and is the main reason for the price increase. Market conditions generally in Elliot Lake have improved substantially and the increased price is partially a reflection of the more buoyant market.

2. The cost of preparing and registering transfers of titles from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to house purchasers is borne by the corporation with no legal fees charged to the purchasers. The corporation has no knowledge of the level of charges made by solicitors who may be acting on behalf of purchasers and who were retained by them.

*C.B.C. BROADCAST OF MEETING WITH MESSRS. LEVESQUE AND AQUIN

Question No. 844—Mr. Blouin:

Did a team from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation visit Sept-Iles, Quebec, and broadcast a meeting with Messrs. René Lévesque and François Aquin on the evening of Saturday, December 9, 1967 and, if so (a) on whose authority (b) what are the names of the participants paid by the C.B.C. for this trip and what were the amounts paid by the Corporation for each (c) what were the total expenses for this broadcast, including the return trip—Montreal-Sept-Iles—and how much time did the team from the C.B.C. spend on location?

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the C.B.C. as follows: (a) On instructions from the office of the chief news editor for C.B.C. French networks, a crew was sent to Sept-Iles to cover the meeting with René Lévesque and Francois Aquin for radio and television. (b) No participant was paid by C.B.C. (c) Total expenses for the radio and television broadcasts amounted to $571. Two days were spent on location.

*EMPLOYMENT OF COL. CHURCHILL

Question No. 854—Mr. McQuaid:

1. On what date was Colonel Edward Churchill first commissioned by the government to review the design of the Northumberland Causeway?

[Mr. Martin (Timmins).]

2. By what department of government is Colonel Churchill employed and is his employment for any specific period of time?

3. Since the date of his employment, has Colonel Churchill made any interim report to the government and, if not will the government now ask for an interim report and make public the reply it receives from Colonel Churchill?

4. Is the Causeway project to be deferred or phased at a slower pace as a result of the reduction in expenditure levels which the government has undertaken to achieve for 1968-69?

5. What amount of money has been placed in the 1968-69 estimates for this project?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 of the question was given on October 16, 1967, in reply to question No. 443, as appears at page 3115 of the House of Commons Debates.

As to part 2, the answer is (a) Department of Public Works and (b) yes. As to part 3 the answer is as follows. Colonel Churchill has had many exchanges in the ordinary course wtih other persons employed by the Department of Public Works. All are confidential in the normal way.

The answer to part 4 is, on December 7, 1967, the Minister of National Revenue stated in the House of Commons that:

The government has decided to defer the placing of any further new contracts for the Northumberland causeway, pending a thorough review of the situation by Col. Edward Churchill, whose services have been retained as a co-ordinator of the project.

The answer to part 5 is, this information will be set forth in the estimates for 1968-69.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, since 42 written questions were answered today, I think it is incumbent on me on the eve of the Christmas recess to congratulate the Prime Minister for prevailing on his ministers to be industrious and answer these questions. I hope this attitude and perseverance will continue in future.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is about the most gratifying exemplification of the Christmas spirit that I can think of. I wish to emphasize to my hon. friend that I need not prevail on my ministers to do these things; I have to hold them back.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: Hold them back from what?

Mr. Pearson: I will not answer that, Mr. Speaker.

DEVELOPMENT OF NATIONAL CAPITAL AREA

Motion No. 37—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, briefs or other documents exchanged since the first day of January, 1967, between the Prime Minister, the Minister of Public Works or any official on their behalf and the Premiers of Ontario and Quebec, any Member of the Executive Council or official of either Province, on the subject of development of the National Capital Area.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF POSTMASTER, LIBAU, MAN.

Motion No. 38—Mr. Schreyer:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence and documents relating to the alleged decision of appointment in 1964 by the Post Office Department of one Mr. Ewald Greening as Postmaster for the Postal District of Libau, Manitoba, and that this order do specifically include such correspondence or documents which would indicate the reason or reasons why this alleged appointment did not in fact take effect.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the notice of motion is acceptable, subject to the usual reservations.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): No. What are they?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations or conditions expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house that notice of motion No. 38 be deemed to have been adopted?

Mr. Lambert: No, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a point of order. I think it has been pointed out on a number of occasions that "the usual reservations" on the part of the ministers are not enough. I think on a number of occasions the Chair has ruled that those reservations must be stated explicitly.

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, when I speak of the usual reservations, I mean confidential and personal letters which cannot be published.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The point made by the hon. member for Edmonton West is well taken, and I suggest that ministers or parliamentary secretaries should do more than simply refer in a general way to "the usual conditions". The reservations should be detailed to some extent.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF COL. CHURCHILL, NORTHUMBERLAND CAUSEWAY

Motion No. 39—Mr. McQuaid:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the Order in Council or other document appointing Colonel Edward Churchill as Government Co-ordinator of the Northumberland Causeway project.

Motion agreed to.

LEASE OF SPACE IN PLACE DE VILLE, OTTAWA

Motion No. 41—Mr. McCutcheon:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all leases, agreements to lease, letters of intent to lease or other similar documents, relating to the occupancy by the Government of Canada of space in the building known as Place de Ville in the City of Ottawa, together with a copy of all correspondence, briefs or other documents exchanged between the Minister of Public Works or any officers of that Department and the owners of the said building or anyone, acting or purporting to act on their behalf since the first day of January, 1965.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER IN TAPED INTERVIEW

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, who is reported as having taped a message yesterday urging among other things that in connection with South Viet Nam the United States should simply stop fighting, a policy which President Johnson yesterday described as soft headed and pudding headed. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he consulted with President Johnson or any other responsible United States authority before making this reported statement, which I believe is likely to arouse a profound reaction from United States public opinion?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): If I had in fact said what I am reported by the hon. gentleman to have said it might indeed arouse a good deal of interest; that is, had I urged the United States to take this course. That is quite incorrect. I should inform the hon. gentleman that this report arose out of a broadcast which I was recording in Toronto for the New Year, and apparently there was a newspaper reporter inside the studio. He must have been there with the knowledge and approval of somebody, and the report by the newspaper reporter was a report of an interview which is not to be released until January 1. I consider this to be very extraordinary behaviour on the part of those who may have been responsible.

In addition, the report referred to by the hon. gentleman is quite inaccurate. I made no proposal urging anything on the United States. I am asking now, as I have the right to do, for a copy of the script of the broadcast which is to be made on January 1, and I shall make any further statements on the basis of that script which will give a very different impression to that just conveyed by the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I think perhaps I should address a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs; it has to do with the same subject matter. In view of the statement of the Secretary General of the United Nations concerning the deepening international crisis and the escalation of the war in Viet Nam—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot agree with the hon. member that this is a supplementary question. It refers to the same subject matter, but I suggest that the substance of the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition related to a statement made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Fulton: Could I ask a related if not a supplementary question of the Prime Minister?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member can only ask a supplementary question now. I am suggesting he should not ask a related question at this point.

Mr. Fulton: It has to do with the possibility of discussions looking toward the bringing of peace to Viet Nam.

Mr. Speaker: That is not the point which was raised by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Fulton: I will defer my question until later.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I was about to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister arising out of the reply he gave to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition. May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether this blatant transgression of honour and integrity in relation to a broadcast intended for January 1 was committed during a recording for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, it was in another station which is owned by a man who also owns a newspaper.

VIET NAM—SUGGESTED TRUCE EXTENSION AND PEACE NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I should now like to address the following question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the statement of the Secretary General of the United Nations as to the deepening international crisis and the escalation of the conflict in Viet Nam with its tragic story of suffering and agony, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs say whether he or the Canadian government have made or will make at this season an appeal for the extension of the truce and the taking of new and meaningful steps to initiate negotiations between the parties concerned, particularly the National Liberation Front?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yesterday in my absence the hon. member gave notice to my office of his intention to ask this question. I do not know whether I can satisfy the hon. member in all particulars, but to the extent that I can I shall endeavour to do so. The views of the Canadian government with respect to the importance we attach to the cessation of bombing as a first step toward resolving this conflict are well known.

[Mr. Fulton.]

The statement made on behalf of the government to the general assembly on September 27 remains the basis of Canadian policy. More recently, when I was in Brussels last week I had the opportunity to discuss this and certain other aspects of the problem with Secretary of State Dean Rusk. I took advantage of this meeting in Brussels to press our view as to the possibility of taking a calculated risk to break the present impasse in the interests of peace. It remains the earnest hope of the Canadian government that the forthcoming holiday season and any actions planned in relation to it may provide openings through which an approach may be made to settling the wider issues involved in these tragic hostilities.

Mr. Brewin: I am very pleased with that statement, even though the minister has not satisfied me entirely. May I ask him as a supplementary question whether he has represented to the United States government that it would be extremely difficult to arrive at fruitful negotiations unless the National Liberation Front, which is in actual control of part of south Viet Nam, was included as one of the parties?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The President of the United States has made it clear on a number of occasions, as has his ambassador to the United Nations, Mr. Goldberg, that this is not an insurmountable problem.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and it relates to the difficulties in Viet Nam. Would the minister make representations to Hanoi and to the Viet Cong leaders requesting them to desist from using flame throwers on peaceful villagers and on women and children?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman, I am sure, will appreciate that in the position the Canadian government has taken we have acknowledged that it takes two sides to end a war. Our stand as to the cessation of bombing does not overlook the fact that the mere cessation of bombing will not end the conflict.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask a further supplementary question, and perhaps get a clear answer this time. My question refers to the use of flame throwers on peaceful villagers, women and children, by the Viet Cong or those representing Hanoi. Would the minister make representations to these people and express Canada's concern over this barbarous practice?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure we all understand the very honourable purpose which the hon. gentleman has in putting this question, but it must be evident to him as it is to all people throughout the country that barbarism of any sort by any country does not satisfy Canadian public opinion.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a further supplementary question; but first, with your permission, sir, may I extend to the Secretary of State for External Affairs my congratulations on leading the latest public opinion poll on the Liberal leadership race, the results of which I understand appear today, although it also says that 15 per cent of those who were interviewed do not like any of the candidates.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: My question is, Mr. Speaker, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs not inject himself more forcibly and more actively into an attempt to bring about some form of peace in Viet Nam, particularly at this time of the year?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am very interested, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend should ask this question. He has not asked questions too often in this area, having left that to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. I say to my hon. friend very seriously on this very vital question that I am sure that in putting it he has realized fully that no government has been more sincerely dedicated to bringing about peace than this government.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PENSIONS OF RETIRED CIVIL SERVANTS—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF INCREASE REFUSAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the very welcome announcement of the Minister of Veterans Affairs relating to disability pensions for veterans, may I ask the Prime Minister if he would not now remove from the government's austerity program the adjustment of pensions for retired public servants, including the armed forces and the R.C.M.P., as unanimously recommended by a joint committee of this house and the other place.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what has already been said on this matter by my hon. friend the President of the Treasury Board, that we hope the time will come soon when we will be able to reconsider it.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could this not be dealt with by a supplementary estimate in the same way that the veterans pensions are being handled?

WATER RESOURCES

PARTICIPATION IN STUDY OF DIVERSION FROM JAMES BAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Would he tell us if the federal government is providing financial and technical aid toward the study of the diversion of water from James bay to the great lakes, a project allegedly undertaken jointly by Quebec and Ontario?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have an agreement with the Ontario government to that effect and we are now negotiating a similar agreement with the Quebec government. I for one certainly hope that these negotiations will succeed.

[English]

LABOUR RELATIONS

MARITIME UNION TRUSTEES—EXTENSION OF TRUSTEESHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour I would direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the S.I.U. trusteeship terminates in ten days, and likewise in view of the fact that none of the basic problems inherent in the S.I.U. situation have been solved by the trusteeship, could the Prime Minister inform the house and the public whether the government is considering extending the trusteeship past December 31?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a great many of the basic problems have been solved by this trusteeship, but I shall be glad to look into my hon. friend's question.

[Later:]

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether a decision has been reached in respect of the continuation of the maritime trusteeship, which took over the affairs of the Seafarers' International Union? I ask the question in the light of a report on a news broadcast last night that the government had reached a decision to discontinue this trusteeship.

Mr. Pearson: To my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, there has been no such decision, but I should like to look into this and perhaps make a reply tomorrow.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—HANDLING OF COMMERCIAL TRUCK TRAFFIC BY FERRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I hope, in the yuletide spirit that surrounds us today, he might be able to tell me when the Newfoundland ferries will be ready to handle commercial truck traffic on a regular basis?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): In the same warm spirit of the season, Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for her good wishes and also for giving me notice of this question. It is merely coincidental that I have a very happy answer for her. Full service must await the completion of the end-loading docks at North Sydney, which should be in the very near future.

Because of space and loading limitations it has been necessary to limit severely the number of trucks handled, by charging freight rates on vehicles as well as contents. However, in anticipation of the new facilities the Canadian National will institute new rates for the carriage of trucks effective January 1, at $2 per foot of length loaded or empty. There may still be only limited space available for a time, but the new rates will make possible regular commercial truck usage of the ferries.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Since the minister is in such a kind, charitable and festive mood in this holy season will he advise the house, when those ferries go into operation together with the railway ferries, what jobs will be found for the several hundred stevedores who will be laid off?

Mr. Hellyer: This is a matter of primary concern, Mr. Speaker, and one I know is under consideration by a number of my colleagues in the hope that we can ameliorate the situation and not exacerbate it; and I am sure my hon. friend would like to join us in that hope.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO INCREASE PRODUCTIVITY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the sharp decrease in freight car loadings, an accurate measure of our country's economic activity, and in real output, and the consequent increase in unemployment, I wish to ask the minister does he plan to introduce any new measures to stimulate the economy and increase productivity before he leaves Ottawa to hit the campaign trail?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not know that the hon. member was interested in another budget, but I can assure him I have no such intention.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR PAROLE OF FISHERMEN'S UNION OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Solicitor General. I apologize for not sending him notice of it but I have been run off my feet with long distance phone calls, to such an extent that I nearly missed the Minister of Veterans Affairs' welcome Christmas message to veterans. There are a lot of people in Vancouver interested in this question and that is why I am asking it. Can the minister inform the house what further consideration has been given to allowing certain officials of the fishermen's union, who are now in confinement, to be paroled during the Christmas season?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that the hon. member's colleague, the hon. member for

New Westminster, gave notice of his intention to ask the same question. I can only say at this moment that the matter is still under study.

RESEARCH

TRANSFER TO U.S. OF HARP PROJECT AND PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry. Now that it has been definitely announced that the space research institute, otherwise known as the HARP program, with its scores of scientists and technicians, is being transferred to the United States, will the minister advise the house just what efforts were made by his department and the government to retain this very special research facility in Canada, in line with the answer he gave me on Monday?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I think we will all be glad a position has now been found for the space research institute which, incidentally, separated itself from McGill University some months ago.

As those hon. members will know who read the announcement by Norwich University through the words of its president, General Hamlett, it is proposed to establish an undergraduate faculty in aerospace studies at this university. The government of Canada endeavoured to integrate the objectives of the space research institute in Canada within Canada, but as the ultimate future of the HARP program appeared to lie in the field of intercontinental ballistic missiles, or anti-I.C.B.M.'s, it was felt that neither Canadian universities nor the government of Canada would be prepared to lend massive support to an objective such as this.

Mr. Lambert: Is it not a fact that an amount of $1 million to $1½ million would have maintained this institute in Canada?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the sums suggested by Dr. Bull were considerably in excess of this.

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST FOR EARLY INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. On December 1, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Charlevoix, he stated he intended to introduce the omnibus bill dealing with significant amendments to the Criminal Code very shortly. Does the minister still intend to do that this session?

[Translation]

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will look at the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons for December 19, he will see that I gave notice that the house would go into committee of the whole to study the proposed resolution to amend the Criminal Code. Therefore, notice was given yesterday.

[English]

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, would the minister seek unanimous consent at some stage before the house takes recess to have this resolution adopted so the bill might be available to us during the Christmas season, when we will have an opportunity to study it?

Mr. Trudeau: I am certainly happy to ask the leader of the house to consult with leaders of other parties to see whether this is possible. I would be very favourable to the suggestion, and I welcome it from the hon. member.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PROPOSAL THAT MEDICAL SCHOOLS OPERATE YEAR ROUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of National Health and Welfare be kind enough to inform the house whether some months ago he suggested to medical authorities that medical schools could well be operated the year round to help overcome the acute shortage of doctors?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I answered a similar question on this point yesterday.

Mr. Rynard: Would the minister consider taking this up with the authorities so there will be sufficient doctors to operate medicare with some semblance of efficiency?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my understanding that both questions were submitted to the minister yesterday.

Mr. Rynard: Not in that form, with all due deference.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SUGGESTED CAMPAIGN AGAINST USE OF ALCOHOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Roxburgh (Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It has been brought to my notice that the federal health department is stepping up its anti-smoking campaign on television.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Roxburgh: Thanks for the applause; I hope you will also applaud this part of the question. I should like to ask the minister whether his department has given or is giving consideration to a similar campaign in respect of a product far more dangerous to the people of Canada than tobacco, namely alcohol?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Roxburgh: Let's hear you applaud over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Roxburgh: I have not had an answer from the minister. If he does not intend to answer I will have to debate this at ten o'clock after the recess.

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR EMBARGO ON CATTLE IMPORTS FROM U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I should like to put a question to his parliamentary secretary.

In view of the present foot-and-mouth disease epidemic in the British Isles, does the government, as a preventive measure, intend to put an embargo on the entry into Canada of animals from Great Britain?

[English]

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will bring this question to the attention of the minister. I know the hon. member will realize that we do have restrictions now on the importation of livestock from the United Kingdom.

[Mr. Rynard.]

GRAIN

REQUEST THAT RYE, FLAX AND RAPESEED BE BROUGHT UNDER BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister, the subject of which will not cost the government any money. Is it the intention of the government to implement the recommendations of the agriculture committee presented to the house last May 8, namely to bring rye, flax and rapeseed under the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board? If so, will this be done during the coming session?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if you do not mind me replying at the request of the Prime Minister, I should like to say this matter is under continuing study but at the moment there is no such intention.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY AS TO AGENDA FOR FORTHCOMING CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether, in view of the imminent recess and the obvious importance of the conference to take place between his government and the governments of the provinces in February, he can as yet give the house any information about the agenda.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there has been any change since I last reported to the house, but I should like to look into the most recent correspondence and make a short report perhaps in the question period tomorrow.

Mr. Stanfield: Perhaps the Prime Minister could give us some indication particularly with regard to the scope of the conference.

Mr. Pearson: As my friend knows there are two specific subjects on the agenda at the moment; the question of a bill of rights, which will cover a very wide field, and the question in respect of the recent report of the bilingualism and biculturalism commission, which will be important.

I might say we have also emphasized that if any province wishes to discuss any other constitutional question we would like to put it on the agenda. I should like to look into this matter, but I do not think any special subjects have been put forward. It is obvious that one of the things we must discuss on this wider basis is the setting up of machinery which will carry on an examination of the constitution.

Mr. Stanfield: I have one further question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the importance of the conversations that have taken place and the importance of all parties in the house being well informed on these questions, would it be appropriate for representatives of other parties in the house to be present as observers at closed sessions, if there are any at the conference?

Mr. Pearson: I would not myself see any objection to this, Mr. Speaker. This is a matter of fundamental importance to the whole country and its future, and it is my thought that the more we could all be involved in this the better it would be for the country.

TRADE

CONSIDERATION OF NORTH ATLANTIC FREE TRADE AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo South): I should like to address my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker. In view of General de Gaulle's veto against British entry into the European common market has the British government approached Canada to propose an alternate arrangement for a north Atlantic free trade area?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, sir, not to my knowledge.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. In the absence of a British request along this line, is the minister considering a Canadian initiative toward forming a north Atlantic free trade area?

Mr. Winters: No, Mr. Speaker, we are not. This has been one of the possible developments of an avenue of freer trade which has been on the minds of a number of people. Recently I had some preliminary conversations in London and elsewhere, but there was nothing definitive about them. I expect I will be seeing several ministers of the United Kingdom government later this month, and undoubtedly they will bring me up to date on the post-de Gaulle veto and anything else they may have on their minds with regard to the trading situation.

INDUSTRY

COPPER—STATEMENT ON PRICE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might have your permission to reply to a number of questions asked recently about the price of copper.

The strike in the United States which began in July has closed down practically all major United States copper producers. It is already apparent that some 700,000 tons of production, or approximately half the United States annual output of copper, will be lost before full production can be restored.

In the disturbed copper situation, which has continued since 1965, copper in all forms has remained under export control in Canada. As a condition of their freedom to export refinery copper the government has the assurance of the producers that realistic requirements of domestic consumers will be met. The supply situation within Canada is therefore normal.

The United States strike has had its impact on world market prices. The London metal exchange price for copper had been easing downward before July. Since then it has advanced from a level of 44 cents U.S. to exceed 60 cents U.S. in November. The New York quotation for copper, the so-called "E. and M.J. export refinery price", averaged 47.3 cents U.S. in October and 54.7 cents U.S. in November. The Canadian producer's price to domestic consumers at 51 cents Canadian is therefore lower than any other market quotation at present.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I hope the time taken up by this statement is not being charged against our 30-minute question period.

Mr. Winters: I might say, Mr. Speaker, that this statement was in reply to a number of questions which have been asked.

Mr. Nielsen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister would complete the reply he was making a moment ago, if it is not very much longer. I am sure we are all interested in it.

Mr. Winters: I am grateful to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker. In the situation to which I have already referred, the confused situation of world pricing, much will depend on the level of the United States producers' price established after settlement of the strike. In view of the easing world market prior to the strike it may be reasonable to expect some decline from present levels. The probabilities, therefore, are that the present level in Canada will be temporary, but we will keep this situation under close review.

TRANSPORTATION

REPORT OF STUDIES ON RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. On Monday last the minister promised to report on the studies going forward with respect to railway line abandonment. Has the minister got his music on that subject with him today?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I am afraid I do not have it with me, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister report on this matter before the house rises for the Christmas recess?

Mr. Hellyer: I will make a special resolution to do that if at all possible, Mr. Speaker, so we can wind up the year on a happy note.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY AS TO REQUIREMENT FOR SOCIAL SECURITY NUMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Is it now government policy to make it mandatory for all Canadians to obtain social security numbers before filing this year's income tax returns, as indicated in a recent notice sent out by the Department of National Revenue?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I would like to look into this matter, Mr. Speaker, but my impression is that this is the law now.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ENDORSATION OF PEACE APPEAL BY THE POPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is related to a series of questions asked earlier of the right hon. Prime Minister. Has his government given any consideration to endorsing the appeal of His Holiness the Pope with regard to the designation of New Year's day as a day of total world peace?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we would be very happy indeed to give our endorsation if it would help in this respect. I would also like to go a little further and hope we may soon reach the time when every day will be a day of peace.

BROADCASTING

IMPLEMENTATION OF CANADIAN POLICY

The house resumed from Tuesday, December 19, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-163, to implement a broadcasting policy for Canada, to amend the Radio Act in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential and related provisions—Miss LaMarsh—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee adjourned yesterday, clause 2 of the bill was under consideration.

[English]

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, before commencing my remarks I would like to point out that as reported in yesterday's Hansard at the top of page 5649 I am supposed to have answered "Yes" to a comment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. There were many other comments made by hon. members at that point and it is understandable that they were not all caught by the Hansard reporter. I was in fact replying to a comment made by the hon. member for Acadia.

Last night when the house adjourned I was attempting to make the point that my constituency is very poorly served by television coverage and that the constant postponing of providing better coverage by means of a new C.B.C. station in Saskatoon has aroused a great deal of antagonism. The minister knows this very well, for I presented her with a petition from Unity and district which made very plain the need in that area. It was ignored, or perhaps it would be fairer to say that it did not have enough effect on the cabinet to prevail on them to approve the station.

Many representations have also been made to this effect by the hon. member for Saskatoon. Neither of us has been able to move the minister and the government to take action in this regard. However, we are still hopeful that another attitude will be taken and that the government will decide to proceed with this long delayed requirement and build the station and its Luseland satellite this coming year.

Again and again members of this house have attempted to persuade the programmers of the C.B.C. that the people disapprove of shows like "Waiting for Caroline" and "The Paper People". We—and I speak, I am sure, for the large majority of my constituents—stand strongly behind the views so ably expressed by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke, and especially his quotations of the comments of Sheila H. Kieran. It has never been my practice in this house to repeat arguments already made, so I will content myself with this expression of support of the views which the hon. member expressed.

I have received many letters from constituents, and to reinforce those views I would like to read a paragraph from one. It is typical of the many letters I have received. I received it this morning from—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The chair has a little difficulty hearing the hon. member for Kindersley. I would ask hon. members who are in the chamber and wish to hold yuletide conversations to kindly go into the lobbies, where there are comfortable chairs and a wonderful Christmas spirit. We will now tune in to the hon. member for Kindersley.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cantelon: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was saying that this letter is typical of the many I have received. I received it this morning from Primate, one of the small towns in my area, and it reads in part as follows:

> There is another matter which I would greatly appreciate your help with, is the discontinuation of the t.v. show Festival. This show is a distorted and filthy portrayal of the Canadian image. I do not believe that the filth displayed on this show to portray seductiveness is in any way justifiable. Perhaps the Canadian producers want to creat a Canadian image which is different from other nations, but the rubbish that is on this show is entirely disgusting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cantelon: Sometimes it is suggested that as M.P.'s we have no right or responsibility to criticize the C.B.C. Perhaps I am mistaken, but this seemed to be the tenor of the remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond. This is an absurd suggestion. The C.B.C. is a public enterprise, established by parliament and largely financed by the taxes paid by the people. The people know this. They send us their views. We agree with them. We state them.

We do not criticize the private networks. We would not need to, even if we thought we had the right, which of course we have not. The private networks and stations have to please the people in order to live. They live on advertising revenues, which would soon disappear if the people disliked the programs. Do you ever remember seeing a program like "Waiting for Caroline" or "The Paper People" on the private networks? Of course not. The people do not want them and will not pay for them. Therefore the private networks do not show them.

But the C.B.C. gives us such programs, although they offend the sensibilities of the great mass of our people, that great mass of solid, moral, law-abiding citizens which constitutes the strength of this nation. So I believe it is our responsibility to present their feelings to the minister and to hope she will use her influence with the C.B.C. to stop such kooky shows.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to begin by doing something that was not done earlier, and that is to wish a happy birthday to the minister who is responsible for this bill. I want to assure her that, in the interest of giving her a birthday present, I will not impede the passage of this bill, and I hope everyone else will do the same.

However, there are a number of things that I would like to say in a general way in connection with this legislation. The first of them is to commend the minister and those who are responsible for the legislation because I think it can be said in a general way that this is the best piece of broadcasting legislation we have had. It is far better than any of its predecessors, and I think also it is a justification for the substantial amount of time and planning that went into the various factors in the consideration of the bill before it was finally brought into this chamber.

I think the minister would be the first to agree, however, that the legislation has a great many weaknesses, and that they are almost inevitable and unavoidable for the very reason that broadcasting is unlike any other area of governmental or parliamentary activity when an attempt at control is required. I do not think it is necessary to go into detail as to why this is so, but of course we are dealing in broadcasting with creative forces, and wherever creativity is involved there are bound to be legitimate differences of opinion.

As I said in commenting at the time the resolution was introduced, any of us who are so naïve as to believe that legislation will give us good broadcasting are bound to be disappointed. There is of course another reason why legislation in the broadcasting field must of necessity have many shortcomings, and that is the fact that we are also dealing with what is essentially a means of communication. I believe that today there is general agreement, which perhaps did not exist a decade or so ago, that broadcasting is for all practical purposes an extension of the press, in the modern sense of that term. It is a news medium and a medium of information as well as one of enlightenment and entertainment, and whenever the state involves itself, albeit of necessity, in the broadcasting field, it is in fact getting itself involved in something which has an effect on public attitudes and public opinion.

So we have a situation where, despite the best efforts of legislators—and may I say as an aside that I was impressed by the non-partisan attitude of the broadcasting committee in debating this bill—any form of bill relating to broadcasting has to be inadequate on that account. I myself, perhaps based on my experience, am not as sanguine as some hon. members, perhaps including even the minister, about the efficacy of this bill to resolve the problems which now exist in Canadian broadcasting. I can understand, and perhaps share to a degree, the belief that good men in positions of importance which this bill assigns to them can do a great deal to iron out the differences and the various controversies that have developed. However, at the same time I think it must be said that there is bound to be a continuation of these controversies and difficulties, and the best will in the world will not solve all of them.

One of the things that we have tended to do in this parliament and that has been done throughout the country has been to be rather critical, and perhaps on occasion justifiably so, of those who up to now have held positions of importance either on the regulatory side or within the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. But as one who has had some experience in working with the chairman of the Board of Broadcast Governors and with the former president of the C.B.C., I want to say that I do not know of any two more dedicated men in the country. While inevitably they became the subject of a good deal of criticism, and while inevitably there were those of some competence in broadcasting who on occasion might have taken decisions different from those taken by these gentlemen, I do want to say that I believe Mr. Alphonse Ouimet, for example, deserves a great deal of credit and has given good service to the people of Canada over a great many years. I want to wish him a well earned retirement.

I also want to say a few words of commendation, because they appear to be so rare these days, for the chairman of the Board of Broadcast Governors, and by and large for the actions of that board over the past several years since it was established. It is always easy to pick out those points in the decisions of the board on which there can be criticism and argument, but anyone who is close to broadcasting knows that for every one that has been contentious there have been dozens and indeed hundreds of decisions which have been sound and which on balance, I am sure hon. members would agree, produced the best over-all system of broadcasting of any country of comparable size and geographic and language difficulties in the world. I should like to go on record as saying that the two gentlemen to whom I have referred, and many of their associates, can take a great deal of credit for this achievement.

We are in a situation where the president of the C.B.C. has retired and where from all accounts we are to have two new top executives as soon as this legislation is passed. I am inclined to share the concern and fear of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, who spoke last night about the fact that despite the undoubted talents of the two men who, it is rumoured, will be appointed to the positions, neither of them has any practical experience in the broadcasting field. I believe this will create for them quite serious difficulties, and it will certainly be vitally important that they get from those who are now in the corporation in both high and low level positions full co-operation and a willingness to help them in every way they can, not only to administer the corporation properly but to acquire the basic knowledge which will be so essential if they are to carry out the mandate implicit in this legislation.

The fact that the two main positions within the corporation will be held by newcomers, whether or not they be in fact the gentlemen whose names have been mentioned, makes it absolutely vital in my view that there be some continuity in the higher echelons of the broadcasting regulatory authority. Having said a few moments ago that I believe Dr. Andrew Stewart has done a good job, and having heard recently of his wish, which I gather has been expressed officially, to retire soon from the position of chairman of the Board of Broadcast Governors, I urge the government to take the steps necessary to try to retain the services of Dr. Stewart at least during the transitional period. I predict that we will have an absolutely chaotic situation in Canadian broadcasting from the administrative and regulatory point of view if we suddenly find that there has been a total and complete change in the top management of the regulatory bodies.

There are a number of specific areas in this legislation to which I should like to refer, and I will do so briefly because I do not intend to make additional comments, in the interest of trying to get this legislation through quickly. But there are three or four comments I should like to make on provisions which I would like to see improved in this bill, and which I commend to the minister either for direct action by amendment in some form or other or for clarification purposes. One of these has to do with whether or not the C.B.C. per se is on all four with the wording in the legislation concerning the objectives of the national broadcasting service. Here I am referring to that portion of the legislation which states rather emphatically that if there is a conflict at any time between private interests in broadcasting and the objectives of the national broadcasting service, they must be resolved in favour of the national broadcasting service.

During the committee study on this bill I asked the minister whether or not this meant that in any argument between private and public broadcasting the C.B.C. point of view should and must automatically prevail. I suggested then, and I suggest now, that it is a mistake to believe, and some of the comments made in this chamber in recent days confirm my view, that we should automatically equate the C.B.C. as a corporation with the national broadcasting service, or even with the public interest. In other words, it is wrong to assume that the C.B.C. and the public interest are always on all fours. I would ask the minister, if it is not possible to change this wording, which I personally do not like particularly, if she would give assurance to this house that the new council, as it is now to be called, will not automatically be required under the words found in this legislation, automatically to make a decision where a conflict arises in favour of the C.B.C. I believe there are many cases where it will be perfectly easy to demonstrate that the C.B.C's case is not necessarily one that is automatically in the public interest.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that no one is more aware than the minister of the inevitable difficulties which are going to be encountered in the immediate future. These are going to mushroom over the next three or four years because of the intentions set out in this bill in terms of describing a broadcast undertaking. I am aware of course of the reason that cable television systems, for example, have been embraced within this bill. Having held conversations with certain television operators in the cable field and others, I can understand the degree of their concern over the intentions expressed here.

However, I am not so much concerned as perhaps some other members are about the immediate or direct application of this legislation to cable T.V. systems. I think that they will be able to live with it. I think some form of integration between conventional broadcasting and cable systems is the answer if we are going to direct the whole of broadcasting. The end result of any form of activity of this sort by C.A.T.V. or conventional system is, of course, indistinguishable so far as the viewer is concerned.

There is no doubt that some of the activities in the cable field could have an economically detrimental effect in so far as free television is concerned. What I feel is going to be far more important, and what raises many questions, including constitutional questions, is the developments which are going to occur in the electronics field over the next four or five years, some of which are already evident in certain parts of this country. Only a week or so ago some of the most responsible engineering authorities both in the United States and Canada seriously raised the question at a broadcast symposium as to why we should use the spectrum at all. There is a strong and growing body of conviction that the day will come when broadcasting will cease to use the spectrum in the conventional fashion we are employing it today. In fact, in the great majority of cases, with the possible exception of satellite transmission, the whole of television and the whole of broadcasting will be carried by cable or some means which does not make any use of the air waves.

I suggest that the authorities here will have really grabbed a tiger by the tail if they attempt constantly to modify and change legislation in order to try, and it will be a futile effort, to bring all of these various forms under some form of national or governmental control. I caution those who are going to have this responsibility against this pitfall, whatever I may think or whatever other members may feel about the validity of the present definition of a broadcast undertaking.

I could go on at considerable length to express my doubts about the appeal procedure or the referral procedure that has been included in this bill with regard to matters which are originally approved by the new council and subsequently referred to the governor in council. I will merely content myself with saying that I believe this section is going to be very difficult to work, and that it is going to create all manner of problems for those who must make a decision. The council is established as the licensing authority. The decision of the council must be referred to the governor in council, and it can then be referred back to the council. If it so desires, the council can sustain its original decision. However, the governor in council can then decide not to act on the council's ruling and decision. It seems to me that this is really a shuttlecock operation which is not going to operate very satisfactorily in the long run. If there were more time, a more reasonable way, a better way to get at this problem might well be divised.

The proposal to establish a $100,000 fine for a breach of the regulation is a totally unrealistic and meaningless proposal. I suggest it ought to be removed. I suggest this for a number of reasons. In the first instance, the presence of this figure in the bill tends to suggest that broadcasters, be they public or private, have some sort of capacity for a kind of massive defiance of the public will or the laws of the land. I do not believe this is true. The minister said, in her comments before the committee, that the vast majority of breaches of regulations which have occurred have been inadvertent and, in her view, action should not have been taken at all. I, for one, cannot visualize a breach of a regulation which would in any way command this kind of economic suicide, and really that is what it would be for a broadcaster to risk this kind of fine.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

In my view, what is more ridiculous is that in the back part of this bill, which covers radio, we find the fine is something like $2,500 for a person who sends out a false s.o.s. distress signal to ships at sea. Surely there is nothing that anyone could conceive of in terms of the conventional responsibilities of broadcasters that would warrant a $100,000 fine, when a man in radio can send out false distress signals or commit other offences equally severe and face a potential fine of something like $2,500. Everyone who has appeared before our committee, everyone who has expressed an opinion on this, has agreed that the figure is meaningless. They all agree that no magistrate or judge, under any circumstances, would be liable to impose a fine anything like this figure. I suggest that it is an amount that is rather meaningless and therefore cannot be justified. It will not convince broadcasters, be they public or private, to come along in the fashion and with the encouragement that is the whole reason behind this bill.

There are only one or two other matters on which I want to comment, although I should like very much to deal with the subjects raised by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke last night. I do want to say I feel there is definite improvement in this bill, in so far as the regulation of political broadcasting is concerned. I, for one, do not think the bill goes far enough. It seems to me that in this day and age we ought to regard broadcasting as we regard any other form of mass media. We cannot control the newspapers. There would be a great howl if we attempted to do so, and properly so, in so far as political material is concerned.

I see no reason why the broadcast media should not be treated in precisely the same fashion as the other media. May I recall for the benefit of members that I was one of three on a committee, the other two being the heads of the C.B.C. and the B.B.G., who brought in precisely that kind of recommendation. If we cannot go that far, if there is not a sufficient amount of enthusiasm for my view to permit us to do this, then I think the improvements which are envisaged in this bill are very much worth while.

We have recommended that the so-called ban on political broadcasting be reduced to a period of one day rather than two. We have allowed the new authority to give more latitude in the presentation of political broadcasts which surely we all agree, whatever our political convictions, are the dullest material on the air these days. We have eliminated some of the restrictions which were in the old legislation.

One of the things, of course, which is going to be watched most closely by parliamentarians in the next little while is whether or not we are still going to have placed before us these controversies in the broadcasting field with which we are still incapable of dealing. This will depend very largely on whether the machinery established for the resolution of differences between the C.B.C. and the new Canadian radio and television council is effective. Here again, I am not convinced that any commission can resolve these. In some cases they will inevitably involve matters of principle, difficult issues. I do not envy a responsible minister, indeed I do not envy any parliamentarian sitting in this house because I say we are going to continue to have these hot potatoes placed in our laps. I think we ought to examine this matter much more carefully and be prepared, if it does not work, to bring in the necessary amendments.

The real reason that this situation exists, it seems to me, is that we are still not prepared—and this is not a matter that has been raised by only those on one side of the house; it seems to be something that is believed by numbers of members in all parties—to say what ought to be said, and that is that the Canadian radio-television council is the ultimate authority and that the C.B.C. is responsible to it. There are many instances throughout the legislation where an "out" is provided for the C.B.C., and unless my guess is very wrong and my experience taught me nothing we are going to see the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation taking advantage of these "outs" on every occasion when they can get elsewhere what they are looking for from the C.R.T.C. Therefore I say once again that the day must come when the C.B.C. is made subject to this authority in the same way as other broadcasters.

Further, Mr. Chairman, may I say we simply cannot deal with this matter in its totality until we see the financing bill which is going to follow this one, and which will set up the system under which the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is going to be financed. When that day comes, which I presume will be early in the new year, we will have to examine carefully whether the various assignments given the corporation are justified in relation to the very large sums of public money which we will be asked to expend.

I also believe, Mr. Chairman, that there is a great need to examine the whole concept of statutory grants. Personally I believe in this principle, but I contend it will be meaningless unless the C.B.C. are told clearly and emphatically, having been given a certain amount of money, that they will have to live within their means. If there is again a loophole which enables the corporation to come back annually or whenever they feel like it to change their so-called statutory grant, then the financial control over the corporation will be no better than it is today, and conceivably could be worse. Therefore the next stage in this important debate will be when we receive the financing bill.

Having filed these reservations, Mr. Chairman—and some may regard them as serious reservations—I still say that this is a good bill. As the minister has stated, it will depend a good deal for its implementation on the wisdom, the sense of responsibility and the awareness of those who are given the important jobs on the council and in the corporation. However, I do not believe that we have yet reached the stage—and I wish we had on this eve of Christmas, 1967—when we can say that parliament can at last free itself from a role for which it is really not suited, which is acting as a day to day arbiter of public taste in the functioning of our broadcasting system.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, what I have been trying to say up to now is that the criticisms that we hear are valid. But let them not blind us to the fact—and anybody who has seen television and listened to radio programs in other countries I feel would have to agree—that Canada is served extremely well by its broadcasting system today. By that I mean both the corporation and the private elements. I hope that this bill will enable all of us to serve Canada even better.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few comments with regard to clause 2 of Bill No. C-163. My first remark deals with subclause (b) of clause 2 which reads as follows:

(b) that the Canadian broadcasting system should be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians so as to preserve and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economical fabric of Canada;

However, Mr. Chairman, it so happens that, in Canada, several radio and television stations are operated while the majority of their shareholders are not Canadian citizens nor Canadian residents but American citizens, which is contrary to legislation.

I should like to refer, as an illustration, to the two television stations in Quebec: channel 4 and channel 5 which are not owned by Canadian citizens. In answer to a question which I had put on the order paper, the hon. Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) said that those two television stations operated under an order in council. In Quebec, there are three television stations, the C.B.C. and two private stations owned by American interests.

Mr. Chairman, I think that the hon. Secretary of State will admit that it is an abnormal and unacceptable situation. The present legislation, even before it was amended, specifies that our radio and television broadcasting stations must be owned by Canadian citizens.

In subclause (b) of clause 2 it is clearly stated, and I quote again:

(b) that the Canadian broadcasting system should be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians—

In Quebec, the only two private television stations are owned by American subjects. The result is that those two television stations present regularly news commentaries, three times a day on the French station and three times a day on the English station, and they are identical commentaries, translated back into English, since those two stations are owned by the same American company. When comments are made on a decision taken by the federal government or by the Quebec government or by a municipality, it is always the American point of view which is put forward during the news commentaries of those two Quebec stations, either the English or the French station. It is always the American point of view on, or reaction to, the events occurring in Canada and Quebecers, as a result, are overwhelmed by American reactions.

I think this is not at all normal, since an attempt is being made to have Quebecers think or figure according to what the Americans think, because these editorials of the two Quebec television stations are prepared according to American ideas or reactions since such stations belong to Americans.

There is a young squirt who reads these editorials, possibly with some assurance, but everyone knows that he is not writing them; nevertheless, they are regularly given over the Quebec television, either on the French station or on the English station.

So, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the former legislation stated that television and radio stations in Canada "should belong to Canadians." The new legislation restates it, but the cabinet passes orders in council, allowing the operation of the two Quebec stations even though they are owned by American citizens. I wonder if the Secretary of State accepts this situation. I believe, in the circumstances, that subclause (b) should be amended so that it will no longer provide that:

—the Canadian broadcasting system should be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians—

—but read as follows:

—the Canadian broadcasting system shall be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians.

• (4:10 p.m.)

No longer "should", because that is a statement of good intentions achieving nothing. What we need is to write the principle firmly and precisely in the legislation thus:

The Canadian broadcasting system shall be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians—

Further, the minister should grant a maximum delay of a few months to require these American concerns to sell the shares they own in these two Quebec television stations. I believe this is completely normal since the minister, when drafting her bill, admits that "the Canadian broadcasting system should be effectively owned by Canadians." Why not then clarify the principle and include it in the legislation by providing that "the Canadian broadcasting system shall be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians"?

Then, the good intentions of the minister would be written in the legislation and the owners of such companies would have a fixed period to sell their shares on the Canadian market. It would be easier as barely two or three years ago—three years I think—when the B.B.G. granted a licence for the operation of a C.B.C. television station in Quebec city, some Quebecers had applied for a licence to operate a private station there. Therefore, since some Quebecers are interested in private television in Quebec city, why leave it under the control of American citizens?

The fact that the minister mentioned subclause 2 shows her good intentions; but this does not go far enough, and I feel the bill should be much more specific. That is why I intend to move an amendment to clause 2(b). Therefore, I move:

That subclause 2 (b) be amended by substituting, in line 11, the word "shall" for the word "should".

so that the amended paragraph would read as follows:

—the Canadian broadcasting system shall be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians so as to preserve and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada;

Therefore, I move that amendment and I would ask the Secretary of State to accept it, since her views and good intentions are already known with regard to the Canadian ownership of our radio and television stations.

I submit that amendment, trusting that the Secretary of State will readily accept it. At the same time, she could perhaps tell us, indeed assure us, that her department will see to it that, as soon as possible private radio and television stations controlled by foreigners are handed over to Quebec interests, and that those foreigners sell their shares on the Canadian market.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. For the guidance of the members of the committee, I shall read the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lapointe:

That subclause 2 (b) be amended by substituting, in line 11, the word "shall" for the word "should".

[English]

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make some general remarks about the C.B.C. and broadcasting in Canada. We have had a broadcasting system in Canada for about 30 years now and many who look closely at that system say that it has failed to carry out its initial and primary purposes. On the other hand, when some of us realize that certain milestones in broadcasting have been passed, we are satisfied with some progress that has been made so far.

I think every member of parliament receives many letters criticizing the extremes of programming content of certain C.B.C. programs. Some of the feature programs particularly, which are said to reflect the changes taking place in our society, have been found objectionable by some. In our society the population has been moving from urban to rural areas. Those who live in rural Saskatchewan, as well as those who live in the urban areas of that province, find it hard to believe that some C.B.C. programs reflect the realities of Canadian life today.

The members of this parliament and of future parliaments will be charged with the responsibility of directing the broad stream of broadcasting in our nation in the years ahead. Since we endow producers and directors of programs with great responsibilities, they should be Canadian citizens, especially when they work within the C.B.C. I do not know how many of them are not Canadians but I have been told that in the administrative hierarchy there are some who cannot claim Canadian citizenship. I believe that a corporation like the C.B.C. or any crown corporation which is involved with the objectives that are set forth in this legislation, should be staffed at senior levels with citizens of this country. Those citizens should have a true interest in pursuing objectives that are national, and peculiar to this nation.

I feel that the way we allocate our broadcasting stations in Canada enables some to obtain greater privileges than others. Some of those privileges are much more valuable than we thought they would be a few short years ago. Those stations which have been established should be more strictly supervised than they have been. I say that because I can think of one or two staions which have almost become a law unto themselves. They wield a tremendous influence in certain areas of the country. The course they pursue with regard to national objectives is questionable.

I believe, sir, that Canada has room for more television stations than she has presently; primarily, I am speaking of privately owned television stations. Stations should not be given a monopoly in the area they serve. I recognize that new stations must establish themselves if they are to become a strong factor in the communications media of an area. Yet I believe that other stations should be allowed in areas which are already served by an existing station. I think that those who grant licences ought to be freer with their allocations than they have been in the past. Competition will not hurt our broadcasters; it may raise the over-all tone of broadcasting in this country.

When I said that producers and directors ought to be Canadian citizens, I did not mean necessarily that the artists who appear on the C.B.C. must be Canadians. Obviously, artists from other countries are welcome to take part in some programs. But the top administrators and the more important producers and directors of the C.B.C. ought to be Canadians. I must impress on the minister the necessity of making certain that Canadians have a voice in what programs are to be broadcast in this country.

The hon. members for Saskatoon and Kindersley have asked for television stations to be established in their areas. The hon. member for Saskatoon especially, for the past year or two, has asked for a television station to be established in Saskatoon. Demands have also been made for a French television station to be set up on the prairies, though, as I understand, the advent of such a station is some way off. Past legislation has decreed that there be English and French networks in Canada, but as I look at Saskatoon I cannot see that a French television station in that area has any prospect, at the present time, of paying its way. Where a limited number of French speaking people live on the prairies, radio or television stations in the area might carry programs in English and French. This would be possible if there were other stations in the field in these areas; their presence might go a long way toward ending some of the difficulties we have encountered. I cannot but feel that some action is needed in Saskatoon either to provide a C.B.C. outlet or to allow private individuals to provide one. If Canada does not intend to spend any more money to set up television stations, then surely we should consider allowing others to provide them if they are willing to make the necessary funds available.

This leads one to the whole question of whether the C.B.C. should be in the station business at all. I realize it is a little late to bring up this point now, nevertheless, when one considers the amount of money involved in setting up a station and the lucrative possibilities which such stations present today we are bound to reflect on the fact that we have seen nothing but deficits in the C.B.C. accounts year after year, and that the forecast for the future is unchanged. The prospect is surely one which encourages us to consider whether we are justified in providing funds for the setting up of stations by the C.B.C., possibly at the expense of assistance which might develop the talents of Canadian artists and give them a real incentive.

To my mind, the development of Canadian talent is one of the great problems facing television in this country. I think the failure to develop our own talent adequately is one of the reasons we have so many poor programs from the C.B.C. today. We have asked the corporation to seek out Canadian talent. In many instances its efforts have been found lacking, and as a result some of the programs have been vulgar, lacking in taste, even shocking to a great many people. It seems that programs of this kind were the only ones which could be relied upon to draw attention, at C.B.C. headquarters. This forces us to ask what qualifications are set by officials in senior positions when they determine who are to produce and direct the programs which go on the air.

I do not believe any easy solution will be found. We still have a long way to go. The federal government, together with provincial governments should devote more attention to providing incentives for the development of real artistry—the creation of a pool upon which the C.B.C. could draw. It is my belief that as a result of the way in which the two networks have been set up in Canada there has been an overwhelming inclination to draw talent from the corporation's centres in Montreal and Toronto.

Talent which might be developed in the outlying parts of Canada has been overlooked to some degree, though I am firmly of the opinion that talent exists in many parts of this country outside Toronto, Montreal or Ottawa. I do concede that it needs encouragement and development. I would go further and say there is a useful field of work open here for some agency of the government, some segment of the C.B.C. itself.

Before going further I wish to congratulate the minister on her birthday today—we could make that unanimous, all round the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nasserden: We hope the broadcasting bill will set a new standard of broadcasting in this country, that it will serve the purpose for which it was originally designed, that is, to build a stronger Canada, and that it will lead to the development of talent in this country, giving employment to Canadian artists so that they will stay at home, rather than go abroad. The fact is that many Canadian performers have been obliged to go abroad. The C.B.C. could not discover them, but somebody else did. This lends weight to the argument I was making earlier—that there should be some section responsible for searching out and encouraging the talent we have here in Canada.

Mr. Barnett: I have been listening with interest to the speeches which have been made during this discussion. I was particularly interested in what was said by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, because of his background in the medium now under consideration. I do not intend to comment on his speech in any detail, but I will say I agree with him when he says that the officials who have just retired or who are about to retire from the corporation and give up their responsibilities in this field certainly served as public servants to the best of their ability during a tumultuous period in the history of broadcasting. To this extent we owe them our appreciation for their efforts.

I was also interested in the speech made last night by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke. I was surprised he appeared to be so diffident about raising the question he dealt with at that time. Perhaps it was only the lateness of the hour which caused him to express himself as he did when he told us he intended to discuss the undiscussable, namely the question of good taste in broadcasting. I have never felt that this is a subject about which one should be inhibited in any way when speaking, and I should like to make reference to the hon. member's proposal for dealing with this problem. Let me refer to his remarks as they appear at page 5648 of yesterday's Hansard, where he had this to say:

> I would suggest that in the final stage of considering the legislation we should give serious thought to amendments which will set down a little more firmly guide lines for the Canadian radio television council not only for C.B.C. broadcasting but also in the private area, because I think it is important for us not to abdicate this great responsibility.

I am not quarrelling with the objective the hon. member had in mind, nor am I quarrelling with his remarks critical of certain programs. Indeed, I shall myself have some critical things to say about some programs before I conclude. However, I do not subscribe to his idea that one can legislate good taste. As far as the bill is concerned, the guide lines laid down in it appear to be fair and sensible. I believe the question of good taste in broadcasting is something which has to be left in the hands of those who operate the broadcasting system, subject to the reaction of the Canadian people and in particular of this parliament.

This brings me to a point I would like to raise for the consideration of the committee. It is that in this bill we have not in any way touched on a very important aspect of this whole matter, the relationship to parliament of the broadcasting system and the Canadian radio television council. Often over the years that I have been a member of this house I have heard the idea expressed that the broadcasting system and its operation were responsible to parliament, and not to the government. While there has been lipservice paid to this idea, it really seems to me that this question of the relationship to parliament has never been defined, has never really been dealt with in a way that created a satisfactory situation.

In dealing with this piece of legislation which, as the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo said, most members consider to be a forward step, I think we should give some attention to this aspect of the matter. I for one have never felt that the arrangement, whereby one of the ministers of the crown acts as spokesman or go-between betwixt parliament and the Board of Broadcast Governors and the C.B.C., has been a satisfactory one. The desultory questioning on orders of the day and the assurances given by the responsible minister that he or she would bring an hon. member's remarks to the attention of the president of the C.B.C., or what-have-you, have been so unsatisfactory that in some ways they have been responsible for a lot of the general discontent with the operation of the broadcasting system in recent years.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I would like to add that in my view the various ministers who had that responsibility during the time I have been a member of the house, including the days when the late Dr. McCann was minister of national revenue and played that role, and when the late former member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, who was also minister of national revenue, played that role, all were most meticulous in trying to maintain the attitude that the broadcasting system was not the tool of the government but was responsible to parliament. The present minister has very meticulously given the same kind of response when members of this parliament have put questions to her.

There has been some reference to some of the present minister's comments, as an individual member or citizen, with respect to certain aspects of the management of broadcasting. Indeed there has been some furore about her comments. I would remind the committee that this is not a unique situation. I recall that when a number of years ago the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent led the government an occasion arose when there was an extended debate in the house about whether he, the prime minister, could make a representation to the president of the C.B.C. as a private citizen.

It is for this reason, as well as taking into consideration the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke, that we should seek to legislate in more detail the matter of programming, in relation to whether it is in good taste or bad taste, whether it is poor programming or good programming, that I wish to put forward the view that we in this chamber ought to be giving some serious thought to another way in which we could express our views on the question of broadcasting.

If the concept of the responsibility of parliament as an institution for the operation of broadcasting, rather than of the government, is to have any real meaning, then this national forum should set up some kind of machinery or mechanism of its own through which, from time to time, members could channel the views of their constituents, as well as their own views on the nature of various programs. When the hon. member for Kindersley was speaking he tried to imply that the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond suggested we did not have any right to criticize C.B.C. programming. That was not my understanding of the remarks made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond. But what did strike me, if I heard it correctly, was the comment by the hon. member for Kindersley, that there was some distinction between our right as members of parliament to criticize C.B.C. programming and to criticize programming carried by privately owned stations or network.

Mr. Prittie: The Prime Minister himself complained today.

Mr. Barnett: Yes, today the Prime Minister complained about a broadcasting matter which, from the context of his remarks, related to a privately owned operation. But this leads me to suggest that the members of the official opposition should make up their minds on whether they support this legislation or not. I would draw the attention of the hon. member for Kindersley and of the hon. member for Rosthern to the very beginning of the clause now under consideration, which sets out, as it has been so often set out in the past, that Canadian broadcasting constitutes a single system and that all persons licensed to carry on broadcasting have a responsibility for programs they broadcast, but also have the right to freedom of expression.

I would like to put that on all fours with the right of members of parliament to freedom of expression, taking literally the text of this bill which sets up the broadcasting system as a single system. It is on that basis that we should consider our role with respect to what we think programming should be, and with respect to the other activities of broadcasters.

Instead of trying to set out guide lines in detail concerning what is good taste and poor taste, as suggested by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke, I think we ought to consider what role we might play in this area, through proper discussion from time to time of broadcasting and its content. I hope to make some critical comments about a certain program if time permits, Mr. Chairman, but I do not feel this is a satisfactory way to do so. While I am trying to make my comments relevant to the bill, certainly as relevant as those of other hon. members have been, nevertheless I would point out that each time a broadcasting bill or financial proposal relating to broadcasting comes before us, we tend to use it as an occasion to criticize programming. This has resulted in rather desultory and undirected discussion about the content of programming.

I think we should consider taking a new approach to the question of the responsibility of parliament for broadcasting. Instead of having a minister as our spokesman or go-between in matters concerning the new Canadian radio-television council, I think we might have Mr. Speaker perform this role, as our spokesman to the C.B.C. and the regulatory body.

What has given rise to this thought in my mind was the procedure adopted in relation to another aspect of life in this country. I am referring to the procedure laid down in the bill which set up the redistribution commissions. As hon. members will recall, there is provision under the rules for debates on what the redistribution commissions have done. A copy of such debates is sent to the commissions by the Speaker of the house, as an official expression of the views of the members of the house. There is also provision under which the house can give its expression of opinion by way of a resolution. It does seem to me consideration might be given to something, perhaps not exactly parallel but somewhat similar to that, in connection with the matter of broadcasting. This could be done without any direct relationship to the bill. It could be done by an arrangment under our rules whereby from time to time there could be a motion "that this house express its opinion to the C.B.C." or the Canadian council on radio and television. This motion would be debatable and amendable. We could then have a discussion which could be centered on the matter of programming, or the general policy in respect of the extension of broadcast facilities into coloured television or to areas such as referred to by the hon. member for Kindersley, or to that area of the country from which I come. Such a debate would provide proper focus for the expression of the views of members of this house and, through them, the people of Canada.

It seems to me there is a helpless feeling on the part of many Canadians about this business of merely being able to write to their member, who asks a question of the minister, who in turn then says she will draw the remarks to the attention of the proper official, whoever he may be. They can simply write to the C.B.C. and get a reply from the president on matters of programming. I am not suggesting there is no place for this type of comment on programming, but there are times when certain issues develop which should be focused in this house. If there is going to be any real meaning to the concept of the responsibility of parliament for the broadcasting system, some kind of focus of that sort is necessary, and this is something we should do after we have dealt with this bill.

Contingent upon that I think is an acceptance on the part of members of this house of the principles of the broadcasting system as they are set out in this bill. If there have been suggestions that people like myself and the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond have been a little hesitant in our criticism from time to time of the C.B.C., it is perhaps because we have believed as strongly as any in the idea and value of a public broadcasting system. We have been concerned over the years with attempts by members of the Conservative party, although not exclusively, to subvert the concept of public broadcasting, and it seems to me there was an example of that sort of thing in the remarks made last night by the hon. member for Oxford. The same sort of criticism has been expressed much more strongly during previous sessions by hon. members in that part of the house, but I think this is dying out. I hope there will be a recognition of the spirit and the realities set forth in this bill.

The hon. member for Rosthern questioned whether the C.B.C. should operate television stations. His remarks were the echo of something expressed much more strongly during previous sessions by members sitting in that part of the house. It seems to me that if we could bring this out in the open, as a right of parliamentarians during a proper debate, and in some way convey our criticisms of programming to the responsible authorities it might be possible to establish a much more satisfactory relationship between ourselves and the broadcast authorities than obviously has existed in recent years.

Having said that, I must add my share of blood-letting by drawing attention to the sort of thing which I hope will come to an end with the adoption of this bill. I have always felt that if one is going to criticize he should do so specifically and in relation to particular programs or actions. The one I should like to draw to the attention of the house is a program which was of great concern to some of my constituents. It was called "Young in a Small Town", which was carried on "Camera West" August 20 last. This program focused on one of the communities in my constituency. Certainly most of the constituents of that area considered it to be a very unfair portrayal of the situation as it exists.

Let me say first of all that the C.B.C. Times, about which some others have spoken, in describing this program displayed a very cheap and sloppy piece of journalese when, in referring to the Albernis on Vancouver island, it said:

> Huge complexes of pulp mills, shingle mills, saw mills, and plywood manufacturing plants dominate the towns with their soaring smoking chimneys and the cacophony of machines—

This is just a sloppy and inaccurate piece of writing. Perhaps it would be more accurate if it had referred to a huge complex, because there is one pulp mill, one shingle mill, two saw mills and one plywood plant. Later on it refers to the young people with big cars who roar around the country, and it mentions that the population of this area is approximately 20,000. At another place in this article it states:

> Week ends is the time for "blowin' up the gas" and great hordes of these youngsters head for the larger cities of Nanaimo and Victoria on the island or Vancouver on the mainland—

I do not know what the estimate of the producer or the writer of this article would be in respect of great hordes, but it certainly sounds like this means the 20,000 people living in the Albernis roar out of the towns on week ends. The writer might have been more accurate if he had said 50 or 100,—and I have travelled that highway often myself.

I wrote to the president of the C.B.C. about this program. I had to admit that I had not seen it myself but had heard a lot about it from many people. When I became aware of the widespread and official concern of the community, which was expressed by the mayor and the city council as well, to the regional director of the C.B.C., I made a point of carrying out a rather broad inquiry. I said in my letter:

> I may say that I did not myself actually view this program, but have had it discussed with me by a great many people who did see it. If I may make my own observation as a result of these discussions, there would appear to be a consensus that the social situation outlined does not exist as an element of the life of the Alberni community and also of many others in Canada today. The main brunt of the criticism appears to have arisen from the fact that it was presented in documentary form, focusing on a particular community and, therefore, in presenting one narrow facet of life in this community on a nationwide hookup, thereby created a very distorted image of what the community actually is.

This was underlined by the kind of blurbs that were written about the program in the C.B.C. Times.

I then said in my letter:

> Had the social situation been presented in the form of a play or in some way which did not pinpoint it on a particular community there would, I believe, have been much less valid grounds for objection to the program.

In the reply I received to that letter the comment about the program was completely ignored, and I was told:

> • (4:50 p.m.)
> As you have so aptly observed, the social situation outlined is common to virtually all parts of North America. This is pointed out in the letter which Mr. Caple sent to the mayors of Alberni and Port Alberni—

With regard to the investigation into the program, in my view either the producer of the program completely brainwashed the regional director of the C.B.C., and through him the president, or they are simply refusing to recognize the incorrect approach taken in the program by pinpointing a particular community in a way that made it appear that the community was involved to a greater extent than any other and completely distorting the situation as far as that area is concerned.

As one of the aldermen of the cities pointed out, the impact of this program was such that someone in Nova Scotia who heard that a friend of his was moving from Alberni to another community wrote saying he was so glad his friend was getting out of this horrible place. This is the kind of distortion to which the people of the Albernis were objecting. They were not denying the existence of a social situation; they were objecting to the form of the program which was carried on a national hook-up and gave the impression that this was the main characteristic of the community. If the community had not been mentioned by name, and the program had televised scenes of the area and used them as a documentary, I do not think there would have been so much ground for criticism.

The latest comment on the matter, as a result of further protest and the suggestion that there be a fresh look at the matter, is that the program was not staged with a view to distorting the situation. In this connection I should like to quote part of an article which appeared in the Nanaimo Free Press of December 15. The article points out that Mr. Caple said that none of the scenes were staged or edited with intent on the part of the C.B.C. to reflect adversely on youth generally in the community. Perhaps the intent was not there, but the fact is that the program did reflect adversely on the community and its youth. The fact is that scenes were staged. There are a number of people in the community who know they were staged and any attempt on the part of the producer, Mr. Caple, or anybody else to deny it is not very convincing.

The people producing the program got two or three high school students, who happened to be driving fairly nice cars, owned by their parents, to go round and round the school in order to create the impression that all the students of the high school were driving this kind of car. The producers provided beer to young people on the beach on the west coast so they could portray them drinking beer on the beach. In view of these facts my constituents cannot be convinced that the program was not staged.

The situation that was portrayed is one that exists; nobody in the community is quarrelling with that. They are quarrelling with the fact that the whole situation was enlarged and distorted to create the impression across the country that this was the main characteristic of the community. This is what the people are objecting to, and it is what I am now objecting to on their behalf. I have made my point—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Barnett: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I may be allowed to conclude with one sentence. While I have expressed the views—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but the time allotted to him has expired, unless the committee gives unanimous consent for the hon. gentleman to continue.

Mr. McCleave: Let him finish his sentence.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Barnett: I conclude by saying that having made these comments I feel, as I said earlier, that this is an unsatisfactory way of having to do it and I hope the members of the house will give consideration to my earlier remarks about a different way of dealing with this sort of situation.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, I would not like this bill to pass without making some comments and putting forward my hopes and aspirations with regard to what can be done under the C.B.C. or under the proposed Canadian radio commission which will, if the bill passes, be the governing body in respect of communications in Canada. In my opinion clause 2 of the bill legalizes and condones what one might call the brainwashing of the Canadian public. I think this is a dangerous thing. As the previous speaker said, you cannot legislate taste. It is dangerous, also, to spell out exactly what you want broadcasters to do.

As the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo said, this bill will provide many loopholes for the C.B.C. to use. I agree with him wholeheartedly. Clause 2 provides that the programming provided by the Canadian broadcasting system should provide reasonable opportunity for the expression of conflicting views on matters of public controversy. Nowhere does the bill spell out that the Canadian broadcasting system should provide reasonable opportunity for the expression of neutral views, non-partisan views, or even that both sides of the conflict must be portrayed. It just says that it is all right for the C.B.C. to project across Canada matters of public controversy and conflicting views.

When you study the bill clause by clause you wonder what we are really trying to do here. Are we trying to regulate broadcasting? Are we trying to define what we want Canadians to listen to and see? Are we, on the other hand, creating for the C.B.C. an enormous loophole by means of which they can avoid any real responsibility?

When introducing this bill the minister said that she and previous ministers had experienced a great deal of difficulty in providing any regulatory authority in respect of broadcasting in Canada. This bill will certainly not enhance the minister's position in this regard.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it five o'clock?

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions and public bills.

• (5:00 p.m.)

RESEARCH

STUDY BY STANDING COMMITTEE OF CARE, UTILIZATION AND TREATMENT OF ANIMALS

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the following matters should be referred to the standing committee on agriculture, forestry and rural development with the authority to call for persons and papers and report its deliberations with recommendations:

1. The use of animals for medical research purposes, their care and utilization, and procedures for government licensing and inspection of, and control over, all premises using animals for laboratory research or medical training;

2. The treatment of animals as pets and, as far as federal jurisdiction permits, recommendations regarding legislation providing penalties for those abusing animals, and any persons making a business of raising or catching animals for sale to research individuals or centres and not keeping the same in a humane manner;

3. The most humane method of trapping furbearing animals, and consideration as to whether the Canadian seal hunt should, and could on a practicable basis be discontinued; and

4. Consideration of the entire Canadian picture relative to the maintenance of fish, bird and animal wildlife and the regulations required for conservation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the remarks which I intend to make are based on voluminous files which are the result of one year's intense inquiries and research on the subject matter of this motion, inquiries with respect to which were sent to various countries of the world. Hon. members will have noted that this motion has been on the order paper since May 9, and therefore there has been plenty of time for the purport and the implication of its wording to be studied and understood. I sincerely hope that all hon. members who have read the motion will note that it is not dogmatic in its terms and that it makes no specific recommendation. It outlines serious matters which, in my estimation, are not only worthy of, but demands, the attention of the house and the study, investigation, hearing of representations and recommendations from a select standing committee of the house.

Perhaps there is only one aspect of the motion on which hon. members might wish an explanation, that is the suggestion that the four points contained in it should be referred to the standing committee on agriculture. The reason for this is that on making inquiries and investigations throughout a number of countries in the world I have found that these matters were being always referred for study either to a royal commission or to the agricultural committee of the legislative body of the country, and that when action was taken by the legislative body, the enforcement of regulation and the inspection of the licensing was undertaken by that country's department of agriculture. It is because I have discovered this to be the procedure in other countries of the world, and particularly the United States and the United Kingdom, that I suggested reference of the subject matter of this motion to the select standing committee on agriculture.

First of all I should like to deal briefly with the fourth point in the motion, which is the consideration of the entire Canadian picture relative to the maintenance of fish, bird and animal wildlife and the regulations required for conservation. I am certain that every one in the house is interested in conservation, but wishful thinking, or pious or sanctimonious utterances are not sufficient. We need action, and that action must be taken soon. As a result of research I have discovered that there has been a brutal massacre of wildlife on this continent. In the past 150 years 60 species of birds and animals have been exterminated by the greedy and the ignorant. Experts in the United States and Canada have informed me that about 80 other species of birds and animals are on the danger list and face the same fate. Surely I need only mention what is happening to our big horn sheep, our grizzlies and our polar bears.

Last year we heard about so-called sportsmen using helicopters to locate polar bears and grizzlies and shooting them from the plane, with the result, the experts say, that these species are dangerously near extinction. So the fact some species of birds and animals are being exterminated is sufficient reason to refer this important matter to the committee for study.

I want to say immediately that I realize that action is required on a federal, provincial and, in some aspects, on an international basis. However, someone must give the lead, and I respectfully ask hon. members this question: Who would be better qualified to give the lead than the House of Commons of Canada? This is the reason for point 4 of the motion.

In the past two years in particular a great deal has been said about seal hunting by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud), and we accepted what he had to say. However, experts in the field who have witnessed seal hunts have criticised the way in which they have been carried out. So much has been said and publicised concerning seal hunts that this matter is now of world concern and interest.

I hope all hon. members have noticed that I have not been dogmatic on the subject and have not even taken sides on it. I have been careful not to do this because of the importance of the humane treatment and conservation of animals, the necessity for studying the most humane method of trapping fur-bearing animals, and consideration as to whether the Canadian seal hunt should, and could, on a practicable basis be discontinued. We will not get a satisfactory answer to questions through asking questions on orders of the day. This should be a matter of study and representation. First let the truth come out, and then let the all-party committee on agriculture make its recommendations on the basis of evidence.

This leads me to points 1 and 2 in my motion which concern the treatment of animals as pets, and their use for medical research. This is without doubt a most controversial matter and one which should be considered without bias and without prejudice. We must recognize the feelings of animals when we consider their use in medical research in an effort to find methods of helping human beings. We have no legislation that governs this in Canada. Many of us, I think all, if they knew the facts, are vitally concerned.

May I introduce what I have to say on this phase of the subject, Mr. Speaker, by quoting the first paragraph of a submission made to a previous minister of justice. The heading of the submission is "The Protection of Animals Used in Scientific Research," and the paragraph reads:

> Medical research has made great strides in recent years, and one of the contributing factors has been the possibility of testing new techniques and materials on animals prior to applying them to human patients. Many people have accepted the use of animals for this purpose in the belief that man is justified in inflicting some suffering on animals if it leads to permanent relief of human suffering. They have assumed, however, that no more pain would be inflicted than was absolutely necessary for the purpose and that the animals would be given all the care and attention they require. Unfortunately, there is overwhelming evidence that this is not always the case.

In these massive files on my desk, Mr. Speaker, I have reports of investigations by the Congress of the United States as well as a report of the departmental committee on experiments with animals, headed by Sir Sidney Littlewood in the United Kingdom. This report was filed in April of 1965. I have magazines, books and reports from many countries of the world which contain material that is absolutely horrifying. We see here irrefutable proof of the unnecessary pain inflicted in the name of human beings. Evidence was given before a committee of the Congress of the United States about three years ago concerning dogs being kept in small cages without exercise for up to seven years; about intermittent electric shock being applied to dogs over a period of six months in order to produce a state of chronic fear. Evidence was given before the royal commission of the crushing of the legs of over 400 dogs in a press, without any anaesthetic from the time of this procedure until death some 24 hours later.

We read that dognapping reached such proportions in the United States that on March 25 last year the house agricultural committee approved legislation aimed at curtailing the activities of dognappers who sell pets to research centres. The bill gives the department of agriculture in the United States licensing powers over persons who sell cats and dogs for research purposes, and over the institutions which buy them. We hear people say that this cannot happen in Canada. However, we have no licensing control; we have no authority and no knowledge of what goes on. According to evidence given to the committee of the United States Congress, over 100 million animals a year are used for medical and scientific purposes in that country alone. In the light of all these facts, I say this is a matter for investigation by a committee of this House of Commons.

We say it can't happen here, and yet I read this from one of our newspapers:

> Officials from the Montreal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals raided a dog kennel Friday near Granby, 40 miles east of Montreal, and brought back 60 dogs only seven of which were expected to live—
> The dogs, suffering from hunger, distemper, mange and cuts, were brought to Montreal in three S.P.C.A. ambulances along with two dozen rabbits and chickens.

We read also that 13 year old high school students are using animals for experimental diagnostic purposes. This is right in the record. We have no provision whatever for dealing with the matter. I know there may be conflicting jurisdiction, provincial, federal and international, but someone must take the lead. I can think of no better source of leadership than this House of Commons referring the study of this matter to a committee. The committee could study the use of animals in medical research in our country, study whether or not there should be licensing and inspection by federal or provincial authorities, not only of those who catch or raise these animals for research but also of the universities or laboratories that use them.

We have the right, sir, because the animals feel pain, to have an interest and concern in every phase of animal protection, animal use and the conservation of our wildlife. In this way, members may receive the benefit of representations made to the committee, receive knowledge of the use of animals and what we can possibly do about it.

I am not going to speak any longer, except to say this: In the past two or three weeks I and other members interested in this matter have done our best to obtain the opinions of other members. We have yet to find one who does not agree that this is a matter worthy of study or worthy of reference to a committee. I conclude my remarks therefore in the hope that since the motion is not dogmatic, but merely asks for a study, that it will be accepted by all members.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Speaker, would the hon member answer a question, or is his time up?

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Cowan: I should like to adress a question to the hon. member for Vancouver East. His notice of motion makes reference to the method of trapping furbearing animals and asks that consideration be given as to whether the Canadian seal hunt should and could on a practicable basis be discontinued. I should like to ask the hon. member whether he feels that the hunt for defective human foetuses and the murder of babies should be abolished in the same way as the mere hunting for baby seals?

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, if the question were applicable I would answer it, but as it is not I will not do so.

Mr. Andrew Chatwood (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that having given the resolution moved by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) quite a bit of consideration before rising to speak to it, I was impressed by the comprehensive area covered by the hon. member. As he himself mentioned, I think all members are much concerned with the treatment of animals and also with the future wildlife of our country.

Along with this, Mr. Speaker, we have very deep and real concern about assuring the people of our country of the opportunity to live and continue to live a good life. When the hon. member referred to the vast and extensive file that he has on record, he reminded me of the fable of Pandora's box and I kept wondering just what was inside his file. I was hoping that perhaps we were going to be allowed to view some of the material he has in this heavy file. However, if the file were opened perhaps, like Pandora's box, it might cause more harm than good.

I did hope while he was speaking that the house would give this resolution deep and serious consideration because it deals with a matter which is important and of interest to us all. I hesitate to agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East in his suggestion that the question be referred to the committee on agriculture, because certainly some of the matters mentioned are better dealt with by other committees. The seal fishery is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud) and at the present time is well regulated by that department.

The problem of disappearing species, both of bird and of animal life, is something that has been with us since the start of the world. Of course we no longer have the dinosaur or the other large animals; due to the change in world conditions they have long since ceased to exist. On the other hand we have had an increase in certain types of animals which perhaps were not so numerous in the past.

The question raised by the hon. member concerning the use of animals for medical research is one which is of concern to all of us. The question whether or not animals should be used for medical research is perhaps easy to answer; I think that if medical science is to advance at all such research is a necessity. Transplanting of organs from one dog to another took place long before it was tried with humans. There have been many amazing cases over the past years when knowledge gained from experiments with animals has been used for the furtherance of mankind and to save lives.

Mr. Cowan: Think of insulin.

Mr. Chatwood: Yes, the hon. member reminds me of insulin, a very important discovery.

I should like to comment a little further on the third item in the resolution which deals with the most humane method of trapping furbearing animals, and also asks for consideration of whether the Canadian seal hunt should and could on a practicable basis be discontinued. Although the hon. member stated that he had no particular feeling one way or the other on these items, his suggestion that the seal hunt be discontinued grates on me because I feel very strongly that it plays a vital part in the Canadian economy.

First with regard to the trapping of furbearing animals, while this is a matter to be considered by manufacturers of the traps and also by the trappers taking fur, I doubt whether the agriculture committee—and I do not see the connection between the agriculture committee and the trappers in our northern lands—could improve on the method used. The furs that are trapped in my area have been reduced in number over the past years, as has the number of people engaged in trapping. Nevertheless I think it is still well recognized that the Labrador mink is the best and that the quality of Labrador mink is superior to other varieties.

With reference to the seal fishery, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's suggestion that this can be discontinued on a practicable basis amazes me. The whole idea seems impossible to me and I should like to make a few points to illustrate why. The Canadian seal hunt is, of course, tied in with seal hunts in other parts of the world. In various sections of his speech the hon. member for Vancouver East referred to information he has received from many countries of the world regarding other aspects of the treatment of animals, both as pets and for use in research.

I think the Canadian seal fishery is basically divided into three areas that call for consideration. The first geographic area is the gulf, where the whitecoats are taken. The seal fishery in the gulf is limited to the whitecoats and this is closely supervised. Method of killing and quantity taken are controlled by federal government regulations. The amount is set each year and reviewed each year on the basis of size of herds. Over the past years the limit has been kept to 50,000 pelts, and at the present time this appears to be a reasonable quantity so as to maintain the seal fishery in the gulf. Should the herd become depleted the amount would be lowered; should the herd increase in number by an unwarranted amount then the limit would be increased.

The reason for controlling the number of seals taken in the gulf is based on the point made so well by the hon. member for Vancouver East, namely that we must conserve our wild animals, our fish, our birds, indeed wildlife in general in the country. The method of taking seals in the gulf is designed to conserve what is a vital industry to the area. The seals come down to this area to whelp and to breed and are there for a period of 75 days. During this time they are feeding for about 60 days, and in this wild feeding the adult seals eat about 15 pounds of fish a day. If 50,000 seals fed themselves at the rate of 15 pounds of fish a day each, this would have a direct effect on the fishery industry in the gulf area. This would affect fishermen along the coast of Quebec, and Newfoundland, and the other maritime provinces. The industry in the gulf supports approximately 40,000 men. That is not a matter that can be lightly dismissed.

In addition, if seals were not taken in the gulf, they would eat large quantities of fish. That would have a direct effect on the fish that could be taken by our fishermen. The seals that come south also carry an enzyme or disease which attacks herring. If the seal herds were left unchecked, this disease would attack our herring schools and the herring that could be caught would be reduced. All this comes back again to the question of conservation and the balance of nature.

It is all very well to say that if nothing were taken from the sea nature would balance the seal fishery and the growth of other species of fish. But the balance of nature is not left to take place unchecked. Other species of fish are taken from the sea, and they will continue and should continue to be taken. If we did not control the seal herd we would thus reduce the amount of fish that could be taken by our fishermen in the area. In addition, sports fishing in our rivers would be affected since seals, by multiplying, would not find sufficient fish to catch at sea and would come up our rivers to attack and eat our sports fish.

The second area of sealing with which we ought to be concerned is the area of seals which are taken from the shore by fishermen who live on the shore. This area of the seal fishery involves a large area and a great number of men. The income that each individual obtains from this aspect of the seal fishery is not as great as the income of a sealer who goes to the front in a larger vessel to catch seal. At this time I am talking about those fishermen who take seals from the shore. This activity involves the province of Newfoundland and the Labrador coast; it involves also the province of Quebec in its coastal areas and certain areas of the maritime provinces where fishermen take seal from the shore to supplement their income.

The shore fishermen, if there is ice, go over that ice to take seals. If there is open water between the ice and the shore they go off in small boats through the ice in order to get at the seals. The number of seals that they take is not large; the amount of income is not large and these fishermen work hard and often risk their lives in this hard method of earning a living.

This fishery means a great deal to those fishermen at this time of year. The few seals they take mean a great deal to them. The fishery supplies them with meat from the body of the seal, and with furs, which are sold. It also brings in a small amount of income at a time of year when many fishermen have no other income. Thus it is of vital importance to them. The income they derive, at a time when other types of fishery bring them no income, is used in the spring of the year to outfit them for the summer fishery. Thus, taking seals from the shore is of vital importance to our fishermen, since the fishery provides them with food and with income with which to outfit themselves for the summer fishery.

The third aspect of the seal hunt that should be considered is the well known and well publicized seal hunt which is commonly called "at the front". Larger vessels come to the front ice, where the seals are. The sealers leave their ships, kill the seals and bring back the pelts. The dollar value of this part of the seal fishery to the men at the front, in a good year, would be over $1,000 for each man taking part.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he oppose referring paragraph 3 of the notice of motion, that paragraph dealing with the most humane method of trapping fur bearing animals and consideration as to whether the seal hunt should continue, to a committee for study?

Mr. Chatwood: As I said earlier, I feel that the subject matter of that paragraph is not an appropriate subject matter for the committee on agriculture to consider. It is an appropriate subject matter for the consideration of the committee on fisheries. Since the seal hunt presently is well regulated and inspected by officials of the Department of Fisheries, I should not be opposed to seeing that paragraph considered by a fisheries committee.

I have said that the seal hunt at the front brings in over $1,000 to the sealer who works at the front. The value to the Canadian economy of that fishery is about $2 million in one year. That value is derived from the fur of the pelt and also from the fat taken from the seal.

Part of the seal hunt at the front takes place in an international area in which ships of other countries operate. They come to the front, off the northeast coast of Newfoundland and Labrador, to pursue the seal fishery. Canada's interest in the seal fishery, and the vital economic importance of the seal fishery to Canada, has made it possible for Canadian officials effectively to state their case for the regulations which presently govern the seal hunt at the front. They have said that seals should be taken within a certain period, and they have set the dates between which seals may be hunted.

The other countries which take part in the seal hunt at the front are, mainly, Denmark, Norway and Russia. Though Russia has not been a signatory to previous agreements, Canada, Norway and Denmark are members of the international commission for the northwest Atlantic fishery. Over past years that commission has given a great deal of consideration to whether the seal hunt, which is a vital Canadian industry, should be continued. The industry is vital in terms of national product as well as in terms of enabling our fishermen to make a living.

Speaking of the importance of allowing fishermen to make a living, I think that any consideration which is given to regulations with respect to the seal fishery should recognize the basic rights of fishermen, using boats and tools that are most familiar to them, to take seals or, in a larger sense, to take fish and to make a living in their accustomed way, which is their basic right.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, though the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat displayed great knowledge of and interest in aspects of the seal fishery, I hope that the fact that he has made a speech does not mean that the government will not look with sympathy on this notice of motion. Speaking for the official opposition, I wish to add my full support to the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). Knowing the hon. member, as I do, I am convinced that such a motion has been presented before parliament strictly because of his concern, as a human being, for the well being of the domestic and wild animals of this country. I do not think it is put forward in the hope of any political gain which might derive from it, and in these circumstances I cannot but give my full support to this proposal, one which is put forward from the heart as this seems to be.

Turning now to the affairs of this house and the request that this subject be placed before the committee on agriculture, forestry and rural development, let me say at once that out of sheer desperation I would support any reasonable request for a subject to be discussed by this committee, in the hope that the committee might be reconstituted, especially at a time when agriculture is in such dire straits. We on the opposition side of this chamber are becoming very impatient—tired of sitting on our hands simply because the government declines to refer anything to the standing committee on agriculture to enable us to get on with the business of this great industry.

It is not my intention to repeat the arguments so ably put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver East, nor is it my intention to prolong my part in this debate. I would prefer to give the house an opportunity to arrive at a decision on this issue. I am sympathetic toward the motion because it has been presented in the fairest way in which a motion could be presented, that is to say, it does not take sides; it merely asks that the matter should be considered and that the committee in its wisdom, after hearing witnesses, should then propose to the government what action it feels should be taken.

There is no doubt that the public conscience is seized of the way in which animals are treated in this nation. The humane society has been doing tremendous work and has been expending tremendous energy trying to focus public attention on cases of ill treatment which might otherwise have gone unnoticed. There is of course another side to this question. Charges which may be ill founded, or based only on rare instances are often made against individuals or sections of the population.

Under the proposal now put forward these people would have the opportunity to put their side of the question before parliament in order that they might be acquitted of any guilt or condemnation. This is why I am surprised at the attitude taken by the hon. member who has just spoken. He was seemingly preoccupied by a desire to protect the sealers and those who make a living from this particular industry, but I believe that if he were really concerned, following the publicity which has been given to this issue in the last 12 months, he would be delighted at the prospect of a forum which would hear both sides and before which all points of view would be put forward for the benefit of parliament.

I feel that the standing committee on agriculture is the very forum in which these matters could properly be considered. This is tied in with measures to conserve fish, birds and animal wildlife. Especially I should like the committee to deal with a subject which I believe is of great concern to the people of this nation, namely the use of chemicals in the agriculture industry for the control of noxious weds and insects, and the effect of such use upon domestic animals, wildlife, birds and fish.

Such a study might enable us to decide whether we are permitting mass murder by the use of such chemicals, wiping out species which are really of special benefit to us. It might also help us to determine whether there are residues from such chemicals which seep into the soil affecting the health of human beings. The Department of Agriculture is already doing splendid work in its efforts to keep the use of such chemicals under control, and to test them before they are released for general application. But there is always a gnawing suspicion that not enough is being done. From time to time we hear of accidents, perhaps when control has not been sufficiently exercised, as a result of which fish die by the thousands in their ponds or streams, or a particular species of bird life is destroyed over a wide area, and these losses are assessed as being the result of the use of chemicals in agriculture.

In the committee on agriculture we have a forum where these important questions could be studied. The committee would have power, as the motion puts it, to send for persons, papers and reports to help it in its deliberations.

I approve of this prospect. It would give us an opportunity to listen to the views of knowledgeable people on all aspects of this question, and to lay before the parliament of Canada sound recommendations which might clear up once and for all the suspicions to which I have referred and the conflicting claims as to what is being done and what could be done.

Instead of prolonging my remarks I intend to resume my seat in order that we may have ample time in which to pass this motion, since I think its passage would be of great benefit to the people of this country and to the wildlife which we should all appreciate so much.

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Just before he resumed his seat, the hon. member for Kent (Ont.) (Mr. Danforth) told us he intended to do so in order that the house might have an opportunity to deal with the motion before us. He seemed to forget that one of the prerogatives of members who sit in this chamber is the opportunity to speak out on subjects which concern them.

I intend to say a few words with regard to this motion the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) has put forward today. Before doing so I should like to acknowledge the spirit in which he made his observations. I understand his concern. However, I am not sure that this particular notice of motion as worded would secure the results he has in mind.

Looking at the motion I see it refers to the use of animals for medical research purposes, the treatment of animals as pets, the most humane method of trapping furbearing animals, and so on. The notice of motion also refers to the Canadian seal hunt and to consideration of the entire picture relative to the maintenance of fish, bird and animal wildlife and the regulations required for conservation. I am sorry that it does not refer to two other matters which affect Canadian animals.

I refer to animals used for commercial purposes and the manner in which commercial slaughterhouses treat them. Like most hon. members I have visited slaughterhouses, and I have been appalled with the conditions under which cattle, sheep and fowl are treated in them. Yet tonight, before the evening is out, there will be hardly any of us in this house who will not sit down and partake of the flesh of animals which in many cases were not humanely slaughtered.

The notice of motion does not deal with hunters—people who participate in the sport of hunting birds, deer, caribou and other big game. I think that in hunting there is probably more cruelty than there is in the treatment of animals for medical research purposes, or than there is in the treatment of pets. I recall being invited to joint a hunt a number of years back, not far from Ottawa. When we took off early in the morning the idea was to stake out a deer. Being rather fortunate, or unfortunate on that particular day, we came across the tracks of a deer. The party of about 12 or 14 people split up and took off across farmers' fields.

Suddenly a deer, or what appeared to be a deer, shot across a field. Mr. Speaker, it sounded like the Battle of Britain all over again. Rifles and shotguns were being discharged in all directions. At the end of the shoot, fortunately there was the same number of hunters as before it started. The group I was with took off to see if it could find the deer. Unfortunately someone had hit the deer, but where, I have no idea. There was a trail of blood as far as we could follow it, until we reached water. Whether or not the deer was seriously wounded or ended up with a little bit of buckshot in it, I cannot tell.

I admire the spirit of the hon. member's proposal, but I think we should take into consideration all aspects of cruelty to animals. The third section of the hon. member's motion deals with the most humane method of trapping furbearing animals. I believe only the best possible traps should be used by Canadian and other trappers.

When a trapper takes off through the bush and sets his traps, he sets them at certain distances apart, according to his knowledge of the terrain. Then he leaves the set traps for one, two, three or four days. He returns to his trap line after one, two, three or four days, hopeful of finding mink, lynx and muskrat in his traps. The traps are designed so that the animals may be killed immediately when the traps are sprung, in order that the fur of the animals will not be destroyed.

In talking about furbearing animals I think we must take a hard look at the effect of the fur trade on certain parts of the Canadian economy, particularly the economy of the Indian and Eskimo people. Trapping is a rather hazardous occupation. It is one that produces rewards only with hard work. The price of fur varies in wild gyrations. We have had an example of this with respect to sealskins.

Until the unfortunate publicity arose over the seal hunting in the Gulf of St. Lawrence the price of sealskins, which has a direct bearing on the economy of the Eskimo people in the Arctic, averaged in the vicinity of $18 to $24 per skin. Today one can go into the Arctic and buy good sealskins for $2 or $4 each. This publicity has had a fantastic and most unfortunate effect on the economy of the Arctic. I do not suggest there is any relationship between the seal hunt in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the manner in which seals are hunted and trapped in the Arctic. But because the word "seal" is now a bad word, fur manufacturers throughout the world are no longer interested in sealskins. Consequently there is a great deal of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member but the time assigned for consideration of private members' business has now expired.

It being six o'clock this house stands adjourned until ten o'clock tomorrow in the forenoon, pursuant to special order adopted this day.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 21, 1967

The house met at 10 a.m.

HOUSING

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to move, seconded by Mr. MacEachen, that this house do now adjourn. I move this motion, in accordance with an agreement among the parties in the house, so it may initiate a discussion of housing and urban development between this hour and, I believe, one o'clock. I have the privilege of introducing this subject, and I hope to set a good example by giving a very brief statement. Before the discussion is concluded, I hope the minister responsible for housing may be able to wind it up and deal with points which may be raised.

An hon. Member: Why isn't he leading off?

Mr. Pearson: Because I am leading off, which may not be a very adequate reason but is the best I can think of at the moment.

As the house knows, a federal-provincial housing conference was held in Ottawa a short time ago. I had the honour to preside over it, although I was not able to attend all the sessions. It has been described as having been a failure; because it collapsed prematurely and some of the premiers walked out of the conference before it ended. I should point out that the letters to the premiers invited them to come to Ottawa to discuss this subject and to exchange views on this very important and urgent problem at a meeting beginning on Monday, December 11 and continuing perhaps for another day or two.

In my opening statement I expressed the hope that we might be able to complete the discussions by Tuesday night, but that if not we would go on until Wednesday. We did, in fact finish our work before the third day, and the premiers who were here at the beginning were here at the end. Indeed, I recall very well a dinner which was held on Tuesday night, a very useful and friendly dinner at which all the premiers who were here at the conference were present.

So it was not a question of the conference breaking up. Before it completed its discussion, arrangements had been made and agreed on for the federal and provincial deputy ministers responsible for housing in their particular governments to meet in three months to follow up some of the subjects that were raised at this conference, and for the ministers responsible for housing in the various governments to meet together in six months.

The purpose of the conference, as indicated in the invitation, was to examine the very important and serious problem of housing and urban development and to see what could be done co-operatively—because that is the only way in which progress can be made —to improve the situation.

As all spokesmen at the conference pointed out at one time or another, the problem is basically one of urbanization in our country. The process of urbanization in Canada has now reached the point where the concentration of population in urban centres is proceeding apace. At the present time 75 per cent of our people live in cities or towns. I am informed that by 1980, at the present rate of progress, two thirds of the people of Canada will live in 29 urban centres and one third will live in three metropolitan centres.

Housing is only one, but certainly the most immediate and urgent, of the problems rising out of urbanization and urban development. As all hon. members know, the problem is to keep pace with this development in terms of the number of houses required for adequate or better than adequate housing, and to improve the quality as well as the quantity of our housing. Progress has been made in this field. I may have a few figures to give, though the minister will have a chance to go into the subject in greater detail. There has been progress in recent years, of course, but that progress is not sufficient. Perhaps the most impressive indication of the problem, what has been done and what is required to be done, which is more than has been done, is contained in the fourth report of the Economic Council of Canada. This report was often quoted during the discussions.

There are, of course, related problems in urbanization in addition to housing. I will only mention problems such as transportation and pollution. There is also the matter of cost, which has something to do with the whole problem. The fact is that as we all know the cost of housing has gone up 50 per cent in 15 years, in spite of the efficiency of the housing industry. The efficiency of this industry has been increasing, in part at least due to the assistance given and investigations carried out by governments, including the federal government. But while costs have gone up 50 per cent in 15 years it is only right to point out, on the other hand, that incomes have gone up by 100 per cent.

Perhaps the most difficult, the most serious factor in connection with increased costs is the cost of land, both raw land and serviced land. This is a matter of more immediate importance, because it comes under their sole responsibility, to the municipal and provincial governments, although the federal government certainly has a relationship to the problem. One of the difficulties in dealing adequately with the housing problem, a difficulty which was faced at this conference, arises out of the complexity of the government closest to that problem, that is, municipal government. There are 18 cities in Canada now with populations of over 100,000 people, but there are 260 municipal jurisdictions covering those people. This of course makes it much more difficult than it would be otherwise to deal with the problems involved in housing and urban development, urban transportation, pollution and that kind of thing.

Now, Mr. Speaker, of course the immediate question is how best to deal with the problem. More money from Ottawa alone, important though that may be, is not the answer. During the last ten years the federal government has invested in privately initiated housing $3.5 billion. No doubt in future the government will have to invest more as opportunities and resources are available. But that alone is not the answer—that is, federal participation—for the simple reason that the provinces have the primary responsibility in this matter, not the sole but the primary responsibility.

This brings up the question, which is sometimes overlooked, the question of jurisdiction. It was made quite clear to us at the conference, by some provinces particularly, that this whole matter was primarily a provincial one, and that the federal government should be very careful in intervening beyond its jurisdiction in this field. There was no doubt as to where certain provinces stood in that regard. I know there are those who feel that to the greatest extent possible we should go ahead ignoring constitutional difficulties; full speed ahead and damn the constitutional torpedoes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I hear "Hear, hear" from the other side. If we went full speed ahead in this country of ours and said damn the constitutional torpedoes, we would not keep the ship afloat for very long. While this, of course, is of fundamental importance, there is no question, Mr. Speaker, about federal responsibility. This is a national problem as well as a provincial problem. If it were not a national problem the federal government would not have invested those sums I have mentioned in the last 10 or 15 years. But we have attended to our responsibilities in this, and in similar fields, with full regard to the jurisdictional and constitutional rights and responsibilities of the provinces.

We had a discussion on pollution at this conference. If anything could be national in scope and in impact, surely it is pollution. The air does not stop at any provincial border, nor do rivers stop at a provincial border. We were warned, however, in connection with pollution matters that we should be very careful about interfering with provincial action in this field. We do not want to interfere, we want to assist. While the initiation in respect of these matters in many cases must come from the provinces we must help them and work with them within their jurisdiction as is laid down in the constitution.

We have helped. We have taken steps which we expect will improve the mortgage market and get more private money into housing. I am not going to go into those steps because they are well known. There were differences of opinion at the conference about the effectiveness of these measures, whether we had in fact increased the amount of money coming into the market. Perhaps the Minister of Labour will be able to deal with that. However, one thing has been shown. If we had not taken these measures while perhaps they have not increased the amount of money to the extent we would have liked, there would have been very little, if any, mortgage money coming into the market at this time. The results, therefore, while not perhaps as encouraging as we would have hoped, have certainly shown an improvement.

At the very beginning of the conference, and not as a result of provincial pressures as has been sometimes indicated nor in accordance with provincial proposals as has been suggested, the federal government made four concrete proposals which are of great importance and which would enlarge the activities of the federal government in this field. I do not believe sufficient attention has been given to these proposals or the effect they could have on housing in this country if they are taken up by the provinces. I admit that we could probably operate with the provinces to a greater extent in putting them into effect in years to come than we can this year because of financial difficulties; nevertheless even this year there will be more money available for this kind of federal assistance than there was last year.

Now I want to put these proposals, which improve and enlarge the lending procedures, on the record because they are important. They were outlined to the conference in my opening statement and subsequently in the background paper which was circulated. The first proposal provides for federal-provincial participation in comprehensive planning of our urban regions in advance; the acquisition of land for transportation corridors and open spaces for recreation and similar community purposes. This is a new initiative on the part of the federal government for federal action, as are the others I am going to mention.

The second is federal-provincial support for land assembly and development of comprehensively planned new suburban communities within urban areas. This is a very important proposal which in some countries has had very important results, and I am thinking now particularly of Great Britain.

The third proposal is for housing subsidy programs to serve as an integral part of other combined federal-provincial anti-poverty measures in special areas characterized by general poverty, lack of employment opportunities and slow economic growth. This would provide for selling as well as renting housing at below cost in those areas.

The fourth proposal is for a more vigorously supported program to assist growing families to locate homes, many of whom require not small apartments but three or four bedroom accommodation and good community facilities within reach of their moderate incomes.

These are important proposals. As I say, they will require amendment to our legislation and we will be bringing in those amendments as soon as possible. They will also require full co-operation from the provinces so we can work together in these new fields of federal-provincial action. They will require, in due course, massive amounts of money, provincially, municipally and federally. Suggestions have been made, Mr. Speaker, that we will have no money next year, or less money than last year for this special purpose, but that is not the case.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should say a word about the 1967 housing record, and then say something about the proposal we made for a council to be set up in the field of housing.

The record in 1967 is not good enough to deal with the problems that we face, problems which have been exposed to us by, among others, the economic council. To meet these problems satisfactorily we will require 175,000 or 180,000 starts a year. This year housing starts throughout Canada should reach about 160,000, which is 26,000 units better than last year and approaches the highest figure that has ever been reached.

To the end of November of this year total National Housing Act participation in new housing involved approximately $921 million. Of this amount more than $610 million represented direct government loans for residential construction. It is that kind of assistance, especially in regard to certain kinds of public housing, for poor or underprivileged people, the provision of student residences and things of that kind, that will be available next year, I hope in equal if not larger amounts; and this notwithstanding our financial difficulties. We expect more money from the private sector to go into private housing, and this will leave more government money available for public housing.

We also proposed at the conference the establishment on a federal provincial basis —though we did indicate that we would be willing to pay for the establishment and maintenance of the machinery—of a council on housing and urban development, a proposal which did not get immediate acceptance on the part of the provinces. I was a little surprised at that, because I think this can be a very important development.

The case for such a council has been put very effectively, more effectively than I can put it, by a body that is continually being quoted in this and other fields, namely the Economic Council of Canada, which is now an economic body outside government that is investigating and doing research to advise government. I think no one now claims that this is a useless piece of machinery that is getting in the way of the federal government, though there are times when the federal government does think its advice is perhaps not the most constructive in the world from the point of view of our responsibilities. This is bound to occur with an independent body, but its very independence is its value.

Is there no place, Mr. Speaker, for this kind of research and investigation through a federal-provincial council in this other important field? The fourth report of the Economic Council of Canada has this to say at page 268 on the subject of housing and urban development:

> The essential need is for a synthesis, a comprehensive philosophy, a co-ordinated concept of urban development. This applies both to the largest metropolitan areas, where expansion and decentralization need to be framed within the setting of the broad urban region, and to the city complexes of more modest size where rates and problems of growth will nevertheless still be formidable.

The report continues:

> —in no area of government affairs are there more glaring gaps and deficiencies of data, information and understanding than in urban problems and government. This is not to deny the many useful efforts to improve the situation. But there is an immense need for more and better co-ordinated study and research in this field.

It was in an effort to meet this need on a federal-provincial and not merely a federal basis that we put forward what I believe to have been a useful and constructive proposal, one which was undoubtedly considered as such by the economic council when they wrote this report. That is the basis behind our proposal for a Canadian council on housing and urban development to be established jointly.

There is no thought in this proposal, Mr. Speaker, of establishing merely another committee of government officials, federal, provincial and municipal, to create some new bureaucracy to produce new but inactive uses for old papers and reports to meet the problems in this field. This was not the purpose, and it was made clear that it need not be the result of the acceptance of a proposal of this kind. A council of this kind would in a sense have the same relationship to government in the field of housing and urban development as the economic council. It would consist of outside experts in this field. No council of this kind is now doing the job on a national basis.

The purpose, then, was to establish—and I hope this purpose will still be realized—an impartial and influential body that could act as a kind of public conscience, a spur for urban development in Canada, encouraging government at every level to do the necessary things in this field. It could publish reports, it could publish reviews on a regional and a national basis, and it could offer specific suggestions to all governments on priorities and solutions for both the immediate and the long term problems. This kind of reporting and investigation could serve as the basis for the annual meetings which I believe will take place between provincial ministers and a federal minister dealing with housing problems.

This was not an excuse for inaction, Mr. Speaker. This was a proposal to make possible more action, more intelligent, planned action on a national basis so as to help not only the federal government but each provincial government in the field of housing. There is no comparable body in the national field. As I say, I think this was a very useful proposal, and when the provincial governments give it further consideration they may also decide the proposal is a useful one. However, it is up to them; if they do not wish to participate that is their responsibility, and no doubt they will continue to operate through their own provincial bodies in this field.

I have ventured, Mr. Speaker, to indicate some of the problems in the field of housing as well as some of the results from the exchange of views at this conference. In particular there were the four proposals which were put forward and which could lead to very far reaching federal and provincial developments in the field of housing; that indeed could lead, if the provinces so desired and within their own constitutional jurisdiction, to an even greater participation than that which has taken place in earlier years by the federal government in a field of very great and serious importance, one that is likely to become even more so.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, we have three hours only to debate this very important matter of housing and urban development. I intended to keep my speech to the minimum time and to appeal to all members of the house to cut down their speeches, because on our side alone there are seven members who are very anxious to speak. Of this valuable time the Prime Minister has taken something like 20 or 25 minutes, and I am wondering whether we are any better off now having heard his speech.

One result of his speech, Mr. Speaker, is that I will have to spend a little more time than I had intended in order to correct some of the impressions the right hon. gentleman left. For example, the Prime Minister seemed to be quite happy or proud about the fact that this year there will be 160,000 starts, which he said was some 26 per cent more than last year. But what he does not say, Mr. Speaker, is that the number of starts last year was 134,000, which is less than the number of starts in 1955, 12 years ago. Furthermore, the number of starts this year, 160,000, is 4,000 fewer than in 1965. As a matter of fact it is 4,000 starts fewer than in 1958. But apparently the government and the Prime Minister are quite happy with the fact that there was a big increase over the miserable year of 1966.

I agree with the Prime Minister that we cannot rely entirely on government money to finance housing. I agree also that government money primarily is required to provide housing for those people in need. But what the Prime Minister has overlooked is that although it is not essential that government money alone finance housing, it is essential that the fiscal business of the country be so arranged that private money at a reasonable interest rate is available to finance housing. That is the crux of the problem that faces us today. I recognize that the government has put over $900 million into housing this year, but that was necessary because of the mismanagement of the fiscal affairs of this country which has meant that private money at a reasonable interest rate has not been available to those who need housing.

The suggestion of the Prime Minister at the conference, that a council be established to deal with this problem, has a great deal of merit; but I submit that because of the attitude of the government in respect of the growth of bureaucracy there is suspicion in the minds of the people and the provincial governments that any suggestion of the federal government in this direction is made just to enlarge the growth of bureaucracy. I think this is one reason the provinces immediately rejected the idea of such a council. I hope when a government that does not encourage the growth of bureaucracy comes into office the provinces will recognize that this is not just a growth of bureaucracy but might be of benefit in solving this problem, even though the suggestion be implemented in some modified form.

Many times in the past year we have discussed the matter of housing. On October 2 when we were debating a supply motion I made a motion which read in part as follows:

> And this house regrets the failure of the government to recognize the housing shortage as a major crisis requiring immediate and co-ordinated steps for its solution as clearly indicated by the recent report of the Economic Council of Canada.

We had a two day debate on this subject at that time. We also had debates on the matter earlier this year. What has happened since that time? The situation is worse; there has been no improvement. Perhaps I should qualify that and say the only improvement has been a slight increase in housing starts, but the cost of housing has been so high that the average Canadian has been unable to avail himself of the facilities of the money market.

Prices have increased since that time. The Toronto Daily Star of December 13 published an article which quoted the president of the Toronto real estate board as saying that the price of a metro home will go up between 5 per cent and 10 per cent next year "because fumbling governments"—I do not say this government alone is responsible for the mess we are in with regard to housing, but it must bear the major part of the blame—"can't get together on the housing crisis." The president of the Toronto real estate board made many good suggestions in this article. I will not take the time to read them all, but would refer the minister to the article.

The president of the real estate board suggested the elimination of the 11 per cent federal sales tax on building materials used in new homes and in alterations to existing homes. That suggestion has been made over and over again. In spite of the shortage of housing and the increased cost the government persists in contributing materially to the increase in cost by maintaining the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. An article which appeared in the Vancouver Sun of December 13 said:

> Meanwhile, there is no logical excuse for governments, supposedly striving to stimulate home construction, to deter it by taxation.

This article then refers to the very interesting suggestion by Premier Johnson of Quebec that if the federal government would drop the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials he would remove the 8 per cent sales tax in that province. It is estimated that if this were done the cost of a $15,000 home in Quebec would be reduced by $1,300. This is an approach that could perhaps be used with the other provinces.

What else has happened since October 2? The cost of living has gone up. The war on poverty, which I assume would include those too poor to provide adequate housing for their families, has been abandoned. Taxation has been increased; the average Canadian will be paying more taxes starting January 1 next year, which will make him less able to buy a home. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour have confirmed that next year there will be even less government money available for housing. Because of the increase in the interest rate there may well be an increase in the private money available, but the cost will be so high the average Canadian will be even less able to finance a home for himself and his family. As a matter of fact the indications are that in spite of the proposed cuts in next year's budget the average Canadian will find that a house will be even more expensive. Hon. members will recall that in the speech from the throne there was reference to a federal-provincial conference on housing and urbanization. We urged the government to call this conference. The government did not heed our urging at that time, but we pinned our hopes on something concrete coming out of such a conference. I say to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour that in my opinion some of the suggestions made at the conference have a great deal of merit. Some of them are forward looking and in time will be of great help in solving this problem. I admit that.

I do not know how these federal-provincial conferences work. I do not know to what extent there is prior consultation. If I were a representative of a province and such proposals were thrown at me, I could not at that moment give any indication of the position I would take. I would want time to study the proposals. I know the Prime Minister has said there will be a conference of deputy ministers three months from now and of ministers six months from now, but I suggest that a conference of this type would be more fruitful if the provinces had advance notice of the proposals it was intended to put forward. I believe this is one reason the federal-provincial conference did not bring forth any valuable solutions to this problem.

The Prime Minister said the conference was not a complete flop. I do not know what has come out of it that is of value in the present situation. I should like to quote what other people have said about the conference. The Ottawa Journal of December 13 said:

> Not a single additional house will be built in Canada as a dividend from the federal-provincial housing conference which broke up yesterday, a day early.

We find these words in the Hamilton Spectator of December 14:

> The best comment on the federal-provincial housing conference is the silent one given by the delegates themselves: They did not wait for the end but departed one day early. The affair was a washout.

I recognize that the Prime Minister said there was a possibility it would last only two days, but this is what editorials in newspapers across the country are saying. The Charlottetown Guardian of December 14 said this:

> The federal-provincial housing conference has petered out, leaving the housing crisis pretty much as it was, and the country still looking vainly for leadership from Ottawa.

The London Free Press, an important newspaper to certain parties, said in an editorial in its December 14 issue:

> It can hardly be said that the latest federal-provincial conference contributed anything substantial toward the solution or amelioration of Canada's housing crisis.

I said when I began these remarks that I intended to keep my speech short so that other hon. members would have an opportunity to make their contributions. Many suggestions have been made to solve this problem. The fourth annual of the Economic Council of Canada contains a most important suggestion, namely that housing must be given a certain priority and the importance of housing to Canada must be recognized. I suspect that this government has not given due recognition to the importance of housing. It has not sufficiently recognized that this is a social matter of great importance to the Canadian people.

• (10:40 a.m.)

I will not take up the time of the house to say much more, but in a recent issue of a publication which is put out by the Canadian home builders association a number of suggestions are made which if adopted would assist in easing the housing problem. It appears that such suggestions, and others which are made from time to time, fall on deaf ears. It seems that this government is incapable of solving the problem.

This government has lost the confidence of the people. It does not convey the impression that it is capable of solving the problems of Canada; and housing is merely one of this country's problems.

In case the Prime Minister has any doubt about the purport of my remarks, I say that it is essential for the government to comply with requests to make money available for housing. Certainly there are problems in planning, and the Prime Minister has not emphasized them enough, but money for houses must be made available. It need not necessarily be government money. The business of the country must be conducted in such a way that money at reasonable rates of interest is made available to fulfil the important needs of housing.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, may I say how pleased I am to see the Prime Minister here during this debate. At the conference, about which I shall say a word or two, his concern with the problem of housing was very, very evident. I am not convinced that the conference was a failure. Though not too much came of it, those of us who sat through it began to realize, if we did not realize it before, that in the area of housing we face a problem of nation-wide and staggering proportions. If there was any doubt about that before the conference, there was none afterward.

The conference also showed us how tremendously difficult it is to govern this country. The provinces, I think, came there and in effect told us "Give us money, and that is all we want." But the matter is not that simple. All the briefs that were filed and all the statements that were made emphasized the fantastic proportions of the housing crisis. They also emphasized our tremendous regional problems and the regional solutions that will be required.

It is purposeless in a debate like this to put on the record the dreary statistics showing how we failed in housing. I do not want to become partisan. I think we all realize that in the entire area of housing our people, all our governments have failed. Not only has the federal government failed; the provincial and municipal governments have also failed. So in this country we must somehow find 12 million houses before the end of the century just to pick up the slack. How we are to get those houses and how we are to finance them is the question we must ask ourselves.

It is a platitude to say there is no problem. This is a nation-wide problem; it is the most outstanding social problem that we face and as great as national defence. Our housing problem is about as great as any problem today. It is as great a problem as education, we can speak of.

I was glad to hear the Prime Minister say to the conference that the federal government has a wide area of responsibility in this matter. I realize the constitutional difficulties that he and his government face. My impression of the conference was not that those difficulties really created a barrier; instead, I thought the provinces were so desperate that they would welcome strong federal initiative and leadership in this area. The main impression I got from the conference was that the provinces, through their statements, admitted that they are incapable of solving the problem and that they are all desperately seeking a federal initiative in this entire area. There is no other way out of our difficulties. If the federal government will not assume some wide area of responsibility we shall never solve the housing crisis, and future generations will curse us for it.

Taking that initiative is not torpedoing the constitution—and I regret the phrase which had to be used. The provinces are looking for co-operation. No level of government alone can solve the housing problem; it can only be solved by a gigantic partnership of the federal government, provincial governments and municipalities. If we do not do this there is no hope at all.

At the conference I regretted to hear the minister conduct a whining, two day defence of a non-existent housing policy; because that is what we have in Ottawa and that is what we have had in Ottawa for the past 15 years under all governments. There has been no housing policy.

In this short debate we cannot detail a solution to the problem. That is impossible. The housing crisis has been with us much too long and it is much too deeply rooted for us, in a three hour debate, to begin to solve it. If the debate achieves nothing else it will have been worth while if we are able to establish that a crisis exists and that the federal government should assume a large degree of responsibility and leadership for a housing program. This has never been done in Ottawa, and that has been my complaint since I arrived in the chamber.

Housing has always been treated as a pump primer. The government's policy has been that when employment goes down, it will throw a lot of mortgage money into the market. That creates tremendous dislocations in the building industry. There has never been any sustained flow of funds with which those who are interested in this field can operate. The government can make a great contribution in this field. What we really need, as we have been asking for a number of years, is for the government to accept its responsibilities. Then we could try to solve the problem. It seems to me the government must demonstrate that acceptance by creating a ministry—I know the constitutional difficulties that that might pose—of housing and urban affairs, headed by a full time minister.

Mr. Nielsen: Not another department?

Mr. Scott (Danforth): I have been criticized in the house for the things I have said about the Prime Minister, but my remarks were not meant to be personal. The entire problem of housing is so immense, so critical and so national that it can only be solved, if it can be solved, by a minister who devotes his entire attention to it. Even if that were done I do not think we should solve our housing problems for a decade, we have been so neglectful and the problem has become so immense; but that would be a good start. I realize that at the conference the Prime Minister's suggestion that there should be a council was turned down by most of the provinces, but surely this poses a challenge to us here to give the kind of leadership which the people of this country so desperately want. It could be done, it seems to me, without infringing upon the constitution and without creating needless difficulties with the provinces.

• (10:50 a.m.)

The second thing we have to consider—and I am not sure we are capable of doing it—is this. We must take the position that the provision of adequate housing for the people of this country is as important as national defence. We think nothing of automatically providing in our estimates each year about $1.5 billion for national defence. Nobody minds. Nobody worries. Why not do the same for housing? Why not make the same effort to generate resources for the production of adequate accommodation for our people? I propose that for the next five years we so reorganize our financial affairs as to provide $1.5 billion a year for the housing industry.

In order to provide this sum we ought to reorganize our forces. My God, if a war broke out anywhere we would have no trouble financing it; we would find the money somehow. Why not make the same kind of effort to house our people? I know the Prime Minister is going to leave us one of these days. Why not develop this new approach as a great centenary project? The right hon. gentleman would then really exit under full steam. For the first time let us in Ottawa do something properly; let us go all the way in an attempt to provide for our people. I know the minister will get up and announce all kinds of statistics, but this concerns people. We have reached a stage where any young persons marrying today will never own homes as long as they live.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): The minister of national resources says "Oh". It is true. We have reached a point where both young and old do not have the housing they need. We have reached a point at which the National Housing Act helps only those earning more than $8,000 a year. It is not a national housing act but a national hoaxing act. It was designed to help the little man and it is not doing so.

We have been a complete and abject failure in the field of housing, and one of the best things we could do would be to admit it for a change and try to do something about it. I propose we should begin by providing $1.5 billion a year to help meet the needs of this industry. It would not meet all the need; I realize that, but I believe it is within our competence if we really want to make a national effort. The balance required would presumably come from private sources.

In lending this kind of money we should make sure it is made available for specific purposes. This is the way in which we could influence housing policy without interfering with the constitution. This is what is done at the present time. It is a trite phrase to say the C.M.H.C. are just mortgage brokers. Everyone knows that today by laying down conditions under which money will be lent the National Housing Act tremendously influences the types of houses which are built, their location, their services and everything connected with the housing field.

There is no reason for not carrying this further. Consider land prices. There is no hope of bringing down the cost of land except by land assembly on a massive basis. This could be done under our proposal. A strong initiative is needed in the work of rehabilitating our cities, and in urban development. This could come within the terms under which money is lent. Our failure in the public housing sector has been impressive; there are thousands of people in every city in the country waiting for public housing to be provided. This too could be a term under which money was lent. Housing for old people could also be influenced by the lending terms.

There is really no problem, Mr. Speaker. All that is required is a commitment, an acceptance of responsibility. Four years ago when I first spoke here on housing I said I envied the minister because with a little work he had it within his power to change the face of this country. He has been a failure, and unless he can make a pretty good speech today as far as I am concerned there is no hope for a solution of the housing problem with the present minister still in charge. I say this with considerable regret.

I wish to repeat in capsule form what I have said. The housing crisis constitutes the biggest social problem facing this nation. It is far greater than medicare; far greater than any other, even education. It must therefore be accepted as a matter for national concern, national responsibility and federal action. Second, the provinces are desperate for leadership. They do not object to federal initiative in this area. Having listened to the views expressed at the conference I believe there would be no difficulty about working out provincial agreements and regional programs. Third, there must be federal money available, and if the government wishes to make a commitment there is no reason for failure to find the money. It must be made available on a sustained basis. We must get away forever from the pump priming aspect and accept the opinion of the economic council that a wall must be erected around housing to protect it from the vicissitudes of the market. Until we accept this principle there is no hope of solving Canada's housing crisis.

We must take the initiative to demonstrate our sense or responsibility by creating a ministry of housing and urban affairs. Housing shortage is only a symptom. It is only the beginning of the nightmare of the urbanization of this country. We are not equipped for it and we have no program to meet it. Yet in the next ten or 15 years all our people will live in the cities, and this will create problems of gigantic proportions. There is no point in rehashing the conference. The only time it really operated was when the Prime Minister was in charge. But these are the initiatives we have to take. If we do these things there is some chance in the field of housing. If we do not do them, it seems to me there is no hope.

How does one reach this government? How does one get through to it? I don't know; I have almost given up. But these are the things we must do. I hope this debate will impress upon the government both the tremendous social need and the tremendous urgency.

• (11:00 a.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing this morning with the housing problem, and this debate is limited to three hours. It has been going on for an hour and I am under the impression that we have not yet proposed some means likely to solve this crisis.

If the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson), responsible for the administration of the National Housing Act before the house, has no other statement or suggestion to make than that which the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) made a few minutes ago, I think that we will solve very little today, in such a short debate and in view of the Prime Minister's statement.

The Prime Minister said that he wanted to create a federal-provincial council that would deal with housing. Mr. Speaker, there are already quite a number of those boards in various fields. There have been many federal, provincial and federal-provincial inquiries whose sole purpose was to keep the people from getting impatient and to postpone the solution of the problems.

The main reason for that housing crisis is a lack of money to build the houses our people need. I agree with Peter Newman who said in an editorial published in La Presse, on Saturday, May 6, 1967, that the trouble does not come from the fact that the construction industry cannot build enough houses but rather from the fact that credit is hard to get and the necessary funds are still in the hands of big financiers who prefer tc build commercial centres and office buildings. The individual who would like to obtain a loan to build a house is unable to find assistance in financial quarters. Mr. Speaker, I think that it is exactly the point.

A few weeks ago, the government raised the rate of interest for loans granted under the National Housing Act from 7¼ per cent —which was already quite high—to 8¼ per cent, apparently to encourage capitalists to consider the housing problem and to make funds available to builders for the construction of houses. Well, if that was the government's purpose, it did not materialize because what happened was exactly the opposite. The capitalists may have more funds, but can the borrowers commit themselves for 25 or 30 years at such a high rate of interest?

People are thinking seriously before committing themselves, and the demand in the field of housing construction is growing smaller. The solution, in my opinion, would be for the government, through the Bank of Canada, to make credit available to the provinces which request it—the consensus of opinion at the federal-provincial conference on housing was that the provinces want to deal with their housing problems themselves —at a low rate of interest. Those who want to buy a house would then be able to make their monthly payments and pay a reasonable interest rate. Moreover, they could perhaps repay their debt within 15 to 20 years instead of 30 to 35 years and save a considerable amount of money, which would encourage those who want to own their home. As the situation now stands, obviously, it is almost impossible for an individual to buy a house, whatever his age, and to commit himself to pay for it over a period of 25, 30 and 35 years, for it is quite clear that he will never really own his house.

As a result, Mr. Speaker, I think that if the government really intends to solve the housing problem, the first thing would be to make available to the population, at a low interest rate, the necessary credit to encourage home ownership.

When I mention those who have no home, I am thinking precisely of those who would like to purchase a house and who must pay rent. They have a roof over their head, it is true, but the roof does not belong to them and they may be forced at any time to leave such housing for other accommodation which will not belong to them either.

It is clear Mr. Speaker, and social science admits it today, that each family is entitled to its house and that the role of the government is precisely to see to it that this purpose is achieved.

There is another point I would like to bring up also. It was emphasized by Michael Wheeler in a speech to the annual conference of mayors and municipalities held in Montreal on July 24, 1967. Mr. Wheeler precisely dealt with a very important point nowadays concerning the municipality wishing to develop housing projects. This is precisely what he says:

> Promoters and developers are annoyed by the long delays in land development and the allegedly extravagant standards imposed upon them.

From my own experience, the problems of the small town where I live are the same as those of large cities. New housing projects are needed, but since municipalities cannot afford to undertake them, they must borrow to do so.

All those standards imposed on them result in long delays. For some houses built in our area, we had to fight, so to speak, with the C.M.H.C. I must admit that officials of that corporation have been very understanding and I would not say they have eluded the regulations of the corporation, but almost. Had it not been that those civil servants were most understanding, some forty or fifty houses would not have been built in the municipality of LaSarre. They have now been built thanks to them. Here again, I feel that if the government wanted to be efficient, it would give the municipalities easier access to credit, at low interest rates, so that as soon as requests are made for housing developments, they might give the necessary services to ready them for the new owners.

Here is another important way in which the housing problem might be solved: the cost of houses should go down and the first step towards that would be to remove the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. This would lower construction costs considerably and thus encourage more working people to own their own home.

Sometimes, the government or other agencies call for the construction of low-cost housing units for low-income citizens. Mr. Speaker, I object to the use of the term "low-cost" to describe the units offered to disadvantaged people. In view of our building materials and labour costs today, it is not possible to build low-cost dwellings that are adequate and fit for human beings.

There is a considerable number of slum dwellings in our cities, towns and rural communities. To build low-cost houses that are financially acceptable to disadvantaged people, we would have to build slums. However, these slums are already too numerous, and there is no need to build more or new ones. Needy people, those in the lower income brackets deserve and have a right to live in comfortable and decent houses, and we should see to it that they do.

Some also want to encourage more people to own their home. There is another reason only eventual owners hesitate to make long-range commitments: the taxes they have to pay. That is an important point which many think about, in my opinion quite rightly.

To correct that anomaly, several suggestions were made during this session. In fact, one of my colleagues presented a motion providing that individuals purchasing or owning a house be allowed to deduct the amount of school or municipal taxes which they have to pay from their income tax. So, as supplementary taxes seem to be levied all the time, I think that only one tax at a time should be imposed, so that people can become home-owners more easily.

I think that the federal government should authorize any Canadian citizen who buys a new one-family dwelling for himself to deduct the property taxes in full for income tax purposes. In my opinion, he should get an exemption for the following expenditures, or rather he should deduct from his taxable income the amount paid on the price of the house and land, including the municipal and school taxes, as well as the monthly mortgage payments, including the interest.

Mr. Pepin: For how long?

Mr. Laprise: Until the house is fully paid for.

In my opinion, such steps would enable Canadians to become quickly the owners of their home without mortgaging part of their income. We know that 100 per cent of the income of most workers, whether they are labourers, miners, lumbermen or workers in the construction field or any other industry and service, goes to discharge the monthly instalments on their house, to purchase furniture or any other item or to pay medical fees. We know that municipal taxes and especially school taxes are liable to go up, I would say, almost every year. Each tax increase means a decrease of income for the taxpayer and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) recently raised the income tax by 5 per cent. That new increase creates problems for those people because, with a decrease of income, and mortgaged as they are up to the hilt, they cannot meet their numerous payments.

Therefore, I think that steps should be taken to prevent those too frequent increases and I am of the opinion that exemptions on capital expenses of a house would be welcome by the people. Furthermore, if the present Prime Minister took measures of this kind before he leaves the leadership of his party, I am sure that this would meet the wish expressed earlier by the hon. member of Danforth (Mr. Scott), I think, when he said that the Prime Minister would leave the leadership of his party under very favourable conditions, and it would help his successor in his task if he solved that problem.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong the debate any further and will close my remarks with the few recommendations made to the Minister of Labour on November 20, 1967. I am referring to the recommendations of the National House Builders Association and more specifically to the most interesting points that warrant mention, and should be recalled to the readers of Hansard, and I quote:

1. Lower the initial amount required to buy a house.

2. Reduce the monthly charges required from the purchaser of a house.

3. Reduce N.H.A. mortgage insurance fees and mortgage application costs to a reasonable level.

4. Eliminate the 11 per cent federal sales tax on building materials or pay back the same amount to the home buyer, with provincial governments taking similar steps where needed.

5. Facilitate private and public financing for a greater number of rental dwellings.

6. Ease the terms under which limited dividend homes could be built for low-income families.

7. Find new ways of eliminating high costs of land development, and reducing education financing and community services.

8. Remove all impediments that delay, at this time, the approval of land zoning plans, so as to provide an adequate number of serviced building lots.

Recommendation No. 8 agrees with a statement given by Mr. Wheeler during his speech before the municipal authorities in Montreal, last July.

9. Establish uniform building standards and regulations.

Mr. Speaker, I think those recommendations should be thoroughly considered by the government, and on the occasion of future federal-provincial conferences, I believe all levels of government would be able to enter into adequate agreements to ensure the welfare of all the Canadian people, in brief, of all future Canadian home-owners.

• (11:20 a.m.)

[English]

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, it has been alleged that the recent housing conference would not bring about the construction of one additional house. I have been wondering whether the debate today will be any more effective in this regard than was the recent conference. In recent times we have had a number of debates in the house on this important question, many questions have been raised on orders of the day, the matter has been constantly brought to the attention of the government and we have been reminding ourselves of its importance, but we still find ourselves in a very difficult situation as far as housing in Canada is concerned.

Food, clothing and shelter are the three basic needs of man, and of course in this debate we are dealing with the third. There has been a growing awareness in the past several years that we would be faced with a serious problem in the area of housing, but as usual the governments concerned waited until the problem reached crisis proportions before making any really earnest attempt to face and try to resolve it.

It is our contention that if positive measures had been taken in the way of monetary and fiscal policies we would not be in the position we are in today. But this was not done, and today we find ourselves in the position of once again discussing this important issue. It has been described as our worst crisis since the depression. This observation was made by Professor A. J. Diamond of the University of Toronto school of architecture. When we view the problem from this angle it should spur us on to the realization that if we are in any way to meet the challenge of the next few years there is no time to be lost; we must move forward with resolution and determination. Even though measures taken may be out of the ordinary, I believe circumstances develop from time to time that make it absolutely necessary to take such measures.

There is no need this morning to discuss the importance of adequate housing to the people of our country. This has been dealt with in various debates in the past. After all,

[Mr. Laprise.]

I think it is one of the basic rights of our people to have access to adequate housing. Housing has a tremendous impact as far as the social problems which face us are concerned. I believe all of us recognize the importance of Canadians having adequate housing. It has also been placed on record on a number of occasions that the housing situation today is very serious. It has been indicated that in order to meet the need in this area, 160,000 or more housing units are required each year. This is necessitated by increased immigration, by the formation of new family units and by the necessity of replacing obsolete and inadequate housing. I believe that substantially more than 160,000 units will be required to adequately meet the problem in the days that lie ahead.

A great many families are living in substandard units today. Many families are living in units that are far too small for the size of the family. In fact, it has been pointed out in recent communications and news articles that some families have no housing unit of any kind. I think this is a deplorable situation in a country that is so blessed with material goods, with everything that is necessary for the construction of adequate housing units. Depite this we find people living in types of accommodation that are far beneath the dignity of any individual in any part of the world.

The United Church of Canada, at page 163 of a book entitled "Canada and its Future", published an article dealing with housing. I should like to read part of it as follows:

> Canada's housing program, both public and private, is a failure. Experts have different opinions on what to do about it. But almost all of them—public enterprisers, private enterprisers and middle of the roaders—agree that the housing program has failed in the following ways:—

I shall indicate what the various paragraphs contain. They are as follows:

> Housing construction is falling behind the population increase.
> Housing is not being built fast enough to substantially reduce the backlog of slums and overcrowded dwellings.
> Decent housing is too costly for an increasing number of middle income families and poor families.
> Public housing exists for only a fraction of the low income families that need it.
> At the 1961 census, an estimated 923,000 Canadian households were lodged in broken down, crowded or unsanitary houses or were straining their budgets to the limit and running into debt in order to pay the rent.

I think this is a sad commentary on the housing situation in a country that has been so signally blessed by Providence. It has been suggested that this is not the time to lay blame on any government or agency, but a time when we ought to try to face the problem objectively and realistically and come up with some satisfactory answers. I suggest it is rather difficult to do this in the light of the government's record with regard to housing.

I have stated before in debate that the present government has subscribed to the concept that every Canadian should have the right to live in his own home, or have accommodation that is adequate for his needs, but again we find that the government has been working against itself in trying to implement this philosophy. On one occasion, even though it was to serve another purpose altogether, the government introduced the winter incentive program whereby those who had homes built in the winter months received a bonus of $500. This program had a very salutary effect upon our housing picture, a great many people availed themselves of this provision and had homes built during the winter. However, not very long after this program was introduced the government imposed the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, which more than offset the $500 winter bonus program.

Then just recently measures were introduced which permitted the interest rate on N.H.A. loans to rise to a maximum of 8¼ per cent. It was pointed out that this would have a beneficial effect in making more mortgage money available for housing. It may have had some such effect, but as far as expert advice is concerned it has not resulted in any appreciable difference in the availability of mortgage money.

In addition the increase in mortgage rates, which we are now told is reaching the maximum, has placed housing beyond the capacity of a great majority of Canadian citizens. So we find that the 11 per cent sales tax, interest rates which are constantly rising, and increased municipal taxes all put together are forcing a great many home owners to sell their houses because they believe it is far more economical to rent accommodation than to build and own homes.

So we find that our policies are working against each other, and instead of achieving the desired result and meeting the need the situation is improving very little, if at all.

It has been pointed out that the great need in this particular area is for money. I do not think there is any shortage of lumber or other types of building materials. As my hon. friend from Vancouver East indicated, there is a surplus of lumber in British Columbia and we who are from that province know this. So it is a matter of money and I believe, in spite of what has been said in days gone by about the necessity of cutting down on expenditures priorities must be established. I do not think we should economize in an area such as housing, which is so important to the welfare of Canadians.

My colleague the hon. member for Red Deer, speaking in debate on October 2 here in the house, pointed out the necessity of establishing a far larger revolving fund. He was checked by the Minister of Labour, who said this had been done. My colleague went on to state that it had to be vastly expanded if it was to meet the particular need at this time. I believe a fund should be established which would provide the necessary capital to enable Canadians from coast to coast, if they so desire, to build their own homes and enjoy the security which only home ownership can give. Some incentives must be provided. The first would be to make capital available at reasonable rates of interest. This was pointed out by my colleague from Red Deer in the speech to which I referred. I would like to quote his statement because I think it is important. This is what he said:

> Even at 7 per cent, Mr. Speaker, a $12,000 mortgage, which we will say is the average mortgage for the average home, will in 20 years cost the home owner more than $10,000 by way of interest, or a total of $22,000. In 30 years the interest charge alone is more than $16,000, or a total of $28,500. But when one takes the present rate of 8¼ per cent one finds that in 20 years a $12,000 mortgage will cost $13,000 more than the cost of the home itself, or a total in excess of $25,000. In 30 years the cost of the $12,000 mortgage at 8¼ per cent, will exceed the cost of the home by $18,000 or a total cost of more than $30,000.

There is something drastically wrong when in order to build and own a home a Canadian citizen must pay the value of his home two or three times over because of interest charges. Either there is something drastically wrong with our legislation dealing with rates of interest or there is something drastically wrong with an economy which forces our people to mortgage 30 or 40 years of their future in order to own their own homes, by which time most of them are so old they do not enjoy them for very long.

We have operated on monetary and fiscal policies in Canada which penalize our people to the point of desperation. So, as I said, we must provide as an incentive some way of obtaining money at reasonable rates of interest, and this should be one of the major concerns of the government at this time. Think about lower income families having to buy homes under these circumstances. I suggest that housing should not be considered as other forms of investment such as commercial investments, and so on, because it vitally effects the welfare and health of our people.

I suggest also that there should be an incentive in the form of grants to those who desire to build their own homes. I have before me the British Columbia Government News of January and February, 1967 in which the budget of British Columbia is discussed. I should like to read from this article one of the highlights of the budget, namely:

> Home acquisition grant fund of $25 million set up. The individual grant to be $500 retroactive to April 1, 1966.

So the province is setting up a fund of $25 million called the home acquisition grant fund from which individuals can obtain grants of $500 in order to assist them in home construction and home purchase.

In his statement this morning the Prime Minister referred to the possibility of subsidization in the future by granting some type of assistance to those in lower income brackets for the purchase of homes, particularly in areas of slow economic growth. That is all very well, but I think people should have access to some form of grant no matter where they live, and I suggest that $1,000 or even $2,000 would not be too much for this purpose and would be a good investment so far as the Canadian nation is concerned.

Mr. Barnett: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he not agree that in effect the proposal of the British Columbia government for a home acquisition grant fund might be considered to be a refund of the sales tax which the government has already collected from prospective home owners?

Mr. Patterson: Does the hon. member mean the 11 per cent sales tax?

Mr. Barnett: No, the British Columbia 5 per cent tax.

Mr. Patterson: I should like to point out that the money to which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni referred is used to cover the cost of the hospitalization program. We have a hospitalization program there for which the people pay no premiums directly. The sales tax is used for that specific purpose, as well as other revenues, and all the people of British Columbia are very happy to have that program at this time.

• (11:40 a.m.)

I suggest also, Mr. Speaker, that in order to assist those who are desirous of having their own homes there should be a depreciation allowance applicable to income tax. This provision is made in so far as business and industrial properties are concerned. If the principle is applicable in those particular areas, why could it not apply to home ownership? I think this is desirable and necessary. I believe it is something that is warranted. We urge the Minister of National Revenue therefore to take this particular suggestion into consideration and endeavour to devise a provision that will permit home owners to enjoy the privileges enjoyed by others in the form of depreciation allowances.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are many others who would like to speak today, and although there are many other things we would like to see done we do not want to monopolize the time. We do want to impress upon the government once again the importance of this issue, not that they are not aware of it. However, we hope the government will be able to do something positive by way of a solution to encourage home ownership in Canada and provide more adequately for the housing needs of Canadians. I hope the suggestions that have been made will receive careful consideration.

Mr. Ian Wahn (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, those of us on this side of the house recognize, of course, that we have a housing problem in Canada. We recognize our responsibility to deal effectively with it. In his remarks the Prime Minister outlined certain of the new initiatives which we are taking to meet the housing problem. The fact that the Prime Minister intervened in this debate indicates how seriously we on this side take this particular problem. In view of the fact that the debate was demanded by the opposition parties it strikes me as a bit peculiar that the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic party have not seen fit to attach the same importance to the subject as the Prime Minister has done.

Mr. Brewin: We have ability all round.

Mr. Wahn: Of course we have a housing problem in Canada. We have a housing problem because in Canada we are growing rapidly. People are flocking to Canada from every part of the world. Our problems, Mr. Speaker, and our housing problem in particular are problems which arise from rapid growth. This is a problem of success. It is very different from the problem which faced members of the opposition when they formed the government. At that time they had no housing probem. The population was not growing rapidly. They had the problem of mass unemployment. They had the problems of economic slowdown. Their problems were problems of failure, not problems of success.

Naturally we would prefer not to have any problems. However, if we have to have problems we on this side of the house would much prefer to face problems arising from our success rather than from our failure. The housing problem we have today in Canada arises from the fact that we have a successful and expanding economy in Canada. People are flocking to this country from every country in the world. During the year 1967 over 200,000 immigrants will have come to Canada. This is quite a different situation from the one which faced members of the opposition when they formed the government.

We are aware of the problem and we accept our responsibility to deal effectively with it. During recent months those of us in this house who represent ridings in metropolitan. Toronto have become more and more alarmed at the rapid build-up of the housing crisis in our own area. I believe I can speak for most Toronto members when I say we have a serious housing crisis there. I don't apologize for using the word "crisis", because that is exactly the right word. Nor do I apologize for emphasizing the situation in Toronto. It is merely an example of the problem which we face in all our large urban areas. It is a problem of national magnitude resulting from our success and an expanding economy.

I do not want to deal in generalities, Mr. Speaker, but in hard facts. In this perhaps I differ from the hon. member for Danforth, who preferred to avoid statistics and instead, in sanctimonious and dismayed tones, levelled harsh and unfair charges unembarrassed by any consideration of our real accomplishments in this field. I prefer, Mr. Speaker, to deal in hard facts, not in unjust accusations.

The hard fact is that at the present time in Toronto, due to our economic success and growth, there is just no housing accommodation available. Our actual vacancy rate in Toronto is at the unbelievably low rate of 1 per cent, the lowest vacancy rate in North America. Our metropolitan Toronto housing registry has 11,000 families on its waiting list, and that number is rising at the rate of 1,500 families per quarter. Yesterday, in this Christmas season, there were ten families including 35 children living in the city's emergency family hostel. At this time last year there was one family. In Toronto city proper—I am not speaking of metro Toronto—out of 185,000 housing units we have only 2,400 housing units geared to income, that is to say, public housing units. A recommended percentage is 8 per cent of the total, or about five times as many as we now have. Since 1962 the city of Toronto proper has built and acquired less than 1,200 housing units geared to income.

In the metro area outside the city proper the record is much better, but far from good enough. In June 1964 there was an accumulated stock of 2,310 geared to income family units. This figure does not include housing for the elderly or student housing. In 1965 we increased this stock by almost 1,100 units. In 1966 the increase was about 1,634 units and in 1967 to date over 1,300 units, for a total increase during the three year period of over 4,000 units. In addition we have under construction over 5,000 units; we have completed loan commitments for 293 and commitments are in process for an additional 635 for a total of 5,955 additional public housing units.

We are doing a great deal, but we have a long way to go to meet our objectives. No one on this side of the house has ever denied that fact. My point is this, Mr. Speaker. Although it is not usually recognized, by far the greater part of this public housing to which I have referred was built under the provision of our National Housing Act under which the federal government pays 90 per cent of the capital cost and undertakes to pay 50 per cent of any operating deficits.

An hon. Member: Big deal.

Mr. Wahn: It is quite clear that the federal government has borne by far the largest financial responsibility in this field. As members of the opposition have said, it is a big deal and it is a good deal. We believe it is right that the federal government should bear this responsibility in this field. Canada is not a group of independent provinces, loosely federated. It is a modern, dynamic, young but rapidly growing nation which must have a national housing policy. The Toronto housing crisis is not caused by local conditions or by internal growth. As I have said, people are flocking to Toronto from every part of Ontario, from every part of Canada, from every part of the world. During the last six years one quarter of all immigrants to Canada have come to metropolitan Toronto. No wonder we have a housing problem, Mr. Speaker.

Clearly this problem cannot be solved entirely at the municipal or the provincial level. We recognize our responsibility and are doing something about it. The housing problem in Toronto, I repeat, is not a local problem, nor is it an isolated problem. It is just one aspect of the national, indeed the global problem with which we have to cope resulting from the inevitable growth of great urban areas. Such development gives rise not only to housing problems but to the closely related problems of the disposal of sewage and waste products and the pollution of water and air.

All these, Mr. Speaker, are major problems which result from our rapid growth which in turn stems from the very success of our efforts in Canada. It has been estimated by some that by the end of this century almost half of Canada's population will live within 50 miles of Toronto and Montreal unless effective action is taken to stop the present trend.

Mr. Chatterton: Would the hon. member permit a question. If the housing crisis cannot be solved in good times, when will it be solved?

Mr. Wahn: Mr. Speaker, that question really does not make much sense. We are making rapid progress and we will continue to make rapid progress. The facts I have mentioned make it entirely clear that there is a certain federal responsibility for housing and that we must have a national housing policy. But we cannot overlook the fact that the provinces and the municipalities have their responsibilities as well.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Would the hon. member permit a question. Are we to take it from his remarks that what he is really saying is that we are all so prosperous that we cannot afford housing?

[Mr. Wahn.]

Mr. Wahn: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member for Danforth recognizes that that is not the proper interpretation to put upon my remarks. There is a clear federal responsibility in the field but, as I say, we cannot overlook the fact that the provinces and the municipalities have their responsibilities as well, and we cannot completely disregard them.

In the last housing debate in this house in September the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi and the hon. member for Danforth, who participated again today, urged us to proceed full speed ahead. There would be no difficulty in getting co-operation from the provinces, they said. As reported at page 2611 of Hansard, when referring to the policy of his own party, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi had this to say:

> There was also no doubt in our minds that housing was a national consideration and concern—
> Let us be clear now that while we require the co-operation of the provinces and the municipalities the ultimate responsibility for housing, or the lack of it, rests with the federal authority.

What did the hon. member for Danforth say, Mr. Speaker? In prophesying what would be the attitude of the provinces he had this to say, as reported at page 2597 of Hansard:

> Housing is of national concern—

I agree with that.

> —no matter under whose jurisdiction it lies. The people in the provincial governments are eager to co-operate with the federal government. They are looking for help, leadership and co-operation. They are not worried about the B.N.A. Act; they are worried about their people.

Since that time, Mr. Speaker, we have had federal-provincial co-operation, and what false prophets hon. members opposite have proved to be. The provincial leaders were anxious to co-operate all right; they were anxious to co-operate in receiving federal funds but not prepared to tolerate any further federal initiatives in the field of housing.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege.

Mr. Wahn: Mr. Speaker, I will be prepared to answer any questions—

Mr. Scott (Danforth): I am rising on a point of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) on a point of privilege.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I cannot permit that type of distortion to remain on Hansard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There is no point of privilege about a disagreement of fact. The hon. member for St. Paul's.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): With great respect, Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of fact. The hon. member has quoted a previous speech of mine and has placed a completed distorted construction upon it. Surely that is a matter of privilege. He quoted a previous remark of mine to the effect that the provincial governments came to the conference in an uncooperative manner. That I have never said. We all know, even if the government will not admit it, that the conference died because there was no leadership from the government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for St. Paul's.

Mr. Wahn: Mr. Speaker, I should merely like to point out that I did not say the provincial leaders came to the conference in an unco-operative mood. On the contrary, I said they came to the conference prepared to co-operate and to accept federal funds, but not to tolerate any further federal initiatives in the field of housing. I think that is a statement of fact. I sat through the conference.

In the result, Mr. Speaker, it is entirely clear that the federal government was right in its decision to concentrate available federal housing money in areas of greatest need. In 1968, as announced at the conference, there will be no federal money for speculative building but federal money will be increased by $150 million over 1967 in the areas of greatest need, that is to say in the areas of housing for students and senior citizens, limited dividend housing under a new limited dividend housing policy, urban renewal and, most important of all at the present time, public housing.

The hon. member for Danforth urged what might be called a five or six point program of which the main proposal seemed to be the establishment of a new department of housing affairs. There may be some merit, Mr. Speaker, in setting up a new department of housing, but at the present time I do not think a new department of housing would add a single housing unit to our housing stock. We have a crisis, and more effective action is needed than the creation of an additional department at additional public expense.

Federal money will be available for public housing. As has been pointed out on numerous occasions, no legitimate application for public housing funds has ever been refused by C.M.H.C. More money will be available for that purpose this coming year than in 1967. But that is not enough. The federal government must continue in the future, as it has in the past, to develop new initiatives and programs. The Prime Minister outlined certain of these which are now proposed. We must induce the provinces and municipalities to use effectively the money, which certainly is available, to provide the housing which we in Canada undoubtedly need at the present time.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I intend to take up a very short time because there are a number of members of the house who desire to speak and to make useful contributions. I will speak for but a few moments.

The Prime Minister told us that by the end of this year we can expect to have made no more than 160,000 housing starts. According to Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures, during the second quarter of this year the number of housing starts was at a seasonally adjusted rate of 192,000 for the year. In the third quarter of this year the number of housing starts was down to 178,000 for the year, seasonally adjusted. We have now dropped to 160,000 on the admission of the Prime Minister this morning. In other words, in the past six months housing starts have been reduced by 17 per cent. The number will be 4,000 less than two years ago. The hon. member for St. Paul's has just told us that the government was making progress. It seems that the Liberal government's idea of progress, Mr. Speaker, is to construct less and less and less and less housing.

• (12 noon)

These figures represent a shameful admission of failure on the part of the government. This is no more than a housing policy in reverse. We are going steadily backward. We shall produce at least 30,000 fewer houses than the minimum number the Economic Council of Canada has said should be produced in order to provide for the housing needs of Canada in one year. We shall, because we are going in reverse so far as house production is concerned at the present time, produce less than 160,000 houses next year.

Mr. Lind: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hees: At the end of my remarks I shall.

Mr. Rapp: At the end of the speech.

Mr. Hees: At the end of my speech I shall permit questions. When the Prime Minister spoke this morning he tried to minimize the catastrophe which the housing conference two weeks ago was. It is well known that the cabinet was divided on whether a conference on housing should be called. Many in the cabinet believed that the conference should be held at the officials' level and that there was not sufficient information to pass along to the provincial premiers for a full-fledged conference involving the Prime Minister, the provincial premiers and federal government ministers to be called.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) persuaded the cabinet that the conference should be held. Typical of the descriptions of this conference, which appeared in nearly all the newspapers of this country, was the one written by Mr. John Dafoe in the December 15 issue of the Globe and Mail. The column is headed, "The Housing Talks Fizzled While Homeowners Burned". I shall read only the first paragraph because it describes the situation adequately:

> This week's federal-provincial conference on housing probably came closest to producing unanimous agreement of any conference in recent memory. Almost everybody agreed that it was a flop.

Then he describes in detail what kind of flop it was and why it was a serious mistake to have called the conference in the first place. In my opinion, the speech which the Prime Minister delivered at that conference must have been prepared by someone who works in the Department of Labour. The Prime Minister must have delivered it without having read it first; otherwise I do not think he would have made the speech. It was not a speech that an intelligent man would have made.

At the end the main suggestion for solving the housing crisis was that another committee should be formed, another consultative council which from time to time would report to the provincial premiers and provincial governments and advise them of the housing situation. The provincial premiers who came here, Mr. Speaker, are fully conversant with the housing problems of their provinces. They wanted leadership from the federal government. They wanted to hear the government's housing policy. These busy men took time out from their other duties to come to the conference, and when they got to it they heard the Prime Minister say that the problem would be solved by appointing yet another committee. This is a government of committees, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: And task forces.

Mr. Hees: This government does not know how to make decisions. It has had a committee deliberating a matter that has been discussed by many other Canadians for the past five or six years. I refer to the question of foreign investment. That committee cannot make up its mind. At some time in the future we will hear the result of the deliberations of yet another committee.

When the provincial premiers heard the Prime Minister make his speech that day—and I talked to a number of them—they did not know whether to laugh or cry. It was the most pathetic performance, they said, that they had seen in many a long year at Ottawa. This is the kind of performance we are getting from this government. It is inexcusable having this kind of flop with respect to housing; in fact, it is very serious indeed. But it would have been a catastrophe if such a fiasco had been perpetrated on the busy premiers who spent three or four days at that most important conference which took place in Toronto, a conference conducted under the auspices of the premier of Ontario, a conference that will produce something concrete. These busy premiers came here hoping for an answer to the housing crisis and they got absolutely nothing.

When the conference ended on the second of its proposed three days, only two of the ten premiers were still in attendance. The second day of the conference was like the second night of a bad play when there are very few people in attendance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: The housing conference was a fiasco. What we in the opposition are afraid of is that if the housing conference could be such a flop, what will happen to that conference which is to be held at the beginning of February to deal with the most important matter that this country has probably ever dealt with, the constitutional crisis. If at the coming conference we see evidence of the same lack of preparation as was evident in the housing conference and if fatuous speeches are made by ministers of the government, the constitutional conference will prove to be a calamity from which this country may never recover. I say to the government, for heaven's sake, pull up your socks. Act like a government. Stop perpetrating fiasco after fiasco on this country. Let us see some leadership or, for heaven's sake, move over and let others who can give leadership take office.

Mr. Lind: May I ask a question?

Mr. Hees: I shall be glad to answer all questions a little later, Mr. Speaker. I should like to continue my remarks, if you do not mind, sir.

I want to say a word about our two northern territories. When the Prime Minister spoke this morning he said, quite rightly, that a great deal of the responsibility for housing rests on the shoulders of the provinces. They carry out the actual policies. Our two northern territories face a grave housing crisis, as grave as that in any province. The territories were not even invited to the housing conference. They wanted to be invited but because of problems of jurisdiction they were left out. That was one of the results of calling a conference without being better prepared to deal with the subject. The government did not have the courtesy and good sense to invite to the housing conference representatives from our two northern territories in order that they might inform the government of the problems of the territories and in order that the government might become conversant with the housing problems there. I say that those territories ought to have been represented at such a conference in order to have been able to bring forward their problems.

One of the principal difficulties facing house construction is the high cost of money as represented by high interest rates. This government must get its financial house in order, control its expenditures and restore public confidence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: What is the record of the government in this regard? Since taking office just four and a half years ago the government has increased government expenditures by no less than $3 billion, or 47 per cent. That is a fantastic performance in overspending the public's money. The government has had to go to the bond market many times, far more often than any government in the past. The Canadian people have seen the government returning time and again to the bond market and have held back from buying the bonds that the government has issued from time to time. Members of the public have known full well that if they wait for the next issue or the one after that they will be able to demand a higher rate of interest on the money they lend. This has driven interest rates up. It has made mortgage money in short supply. It has driven building costs up and made it almost impossible for many Canadians to obtain the housing they need.

What has the government done to put its financial house in order and to cope with this situation? It has done absolutely nothing. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) the other day told us several times that he intended to bring about drastic cuts in the present budget. I am speaking of the 1967-68 budget. He told me that when the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) spoke he would announce what cuts were to be made. You and I know, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of National Revenue did not mention once in his speech any cut that the government intended to make in its 1967-68 budget. What was said by the Minister of Finance was a complete misrepresentation of the facts. Nothing in that regard has been done up to the present time. Nothing is being done to cut expenditures between now and when the next budget is presented in April.

We have the ludicrous assurance by the government that they intend to take the extraordinary step of cutting $1.2 billion from government expenditures. Every member in this house who has served as a minister knows that when a budget is prepared every department brings forward everything that it wishes to do for the public. They are all good and desirable measures. They place them before Treasury Board and then it is determined whether the government can afford to carry out all these measures at that time. Invariably the government cuts off about $1 billion in proposed expenditures because there is not enough money to do everything. This is nothing new. The government has done nothing new.

Mr. Nielsen: It is a fraud.

• (12:10 p.m.)

Mr. Hees: It is simply fraud. The government has done nothing to cut real expenditures or to restore public confidence in its financial responsibility. As an example, in the first seven months of this year—and these are the only available figures—the government has increased expenditures by no less than 15 per cent. I say in conclusion—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: Yes, I realize that hon. members on the other side are glad to hear that I am about to finish my speech because they do not like what I am saying. As the old saying goes, it's music to the gambler's ears to hear the suckers roar. That is what they are doing, and it is music to my ears. They do not like what I am saying because I am telling them a few hard truths. I say, let the government get its house in order, cut expenditures, revive confidence, bring interest rates down as a result, and enable the Canadian people to acquire the houses they need to put over their heads.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I heartily welcomed this debate in the hope, perhaps unwarranted, that not only constructive criticism but some constructive suggestions would be forthcoming. As I have said more than once, I think criticism is necessary on occasion and that where warranted it should be forthcoming without any punches being pulled; it should come not only from the opposition but from the news media and any other sources which can make worth-while contributions.

In the light of the actual facts, however, I must say I have been perturbed not only by the nature of some of the debate which has taken place this morning but by some of the press comments which followed the housing conference. Some of the criticism may well have been justified. The conference probably would not have been a success if some criticism had not emerged. On the other hand, after hearing views loudly voiced by people who were not at the conference and by others who did not take the time to inform themselves adequately of the facts, I think it might be prudent at the outset of my remarks to refer briefly to the reasons the recent conference was held and the nature and extent of what actually took place there, so that these matters can be kept in proper perspective and adequately set down in the records of this house.

Mr. Hees: Was Premier Robarts not at that conference?

Mr. Nicholson: Yes, he was, and I shall have something to say about that in a moment. Last March, speaking about the importance of inter-governmental co-operation in all branches of governmental activity, the Prime Minister had occasion to refer to housing. He said at that time:

> This is an area where the primary constitutional responsibility for action lies with the provincial and municipal governments, but in which all governments must work together.

He then went on to say:

> Certainly the federal government cannot ignore the rising dissatisfaction among Canadians with our urban environment not only as to the availability of adequate housing for everyone but as to the human equality of our community development.

Hon. members will also recall that in the speech from the throne read in May it was announced that the federal government proposed to consult with the provinces on problems and prospects in connection with housing and urban development. The conference was called against this background. The Prime Minister has referred to the letter which went out to the provincial premiers inviting them to meet to discuss problems of mutual interest. These invitations were extended to provide for the first time in Canada's history an opportunity for an exchange of views on this critical and, perhaps I should say, very sensitive subject. This was the objective of the conference and it was so set out clearly in the letters of invitation which went to the provincial premiers.

Mr. Nielsen: Not all governments received them.

Mr. Nicholson: All provinces received them. The conference was designed to stress the need to pool our thinking in planning for the future and this was made clear in the advance publicity. It was pointed out that money was not the only consideration but that other major problems were involved and other challenges had to be met if we were to make urban Canada the attractive environment we would wish to see.

This becomes all the more urgent when we realize, as has been stated in this house more than once, that within a relatively few years, 12 or 13 I believe, 80 per cent of the people of this country will be living in fewer than 30 city or metropolitan areas and that one-third of the people will be living in three metropolitan areas. In these circumstances we thought it was about time that a conference on housing and related matters should take place.

Unfortunately, since that conference there has been a great deal of loose talk and loose writing about the premature termination of those meetings and a certain provincial premier walking out. Remarks of this sort were made this morning by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees), who does not know what he is talking about because he was not there. The conference did not collapse. On the morning the conference opened, the Prime Minister was advised by at least two of the heads of provincial delegations that they hoped it would be possible for them to get away on the evening of the second day rather than have the conference extend to a third day. With this in mind we extended the length of the sessions on both days. On Monday we not only sat until 5.30 in the afternoon but we also had a very important evening meeting which was not on the original agenda. At that meeting we discussed housing in rural areas, one of the items which would normally have been discussed on the second day. The hours were also extended on the second day. By agreement the conference opened at 9.30 a.m. and we sat until about 7.20 p.m. in line with the expressed wish of heads of delegations.

The suggestion that all premiers walked out is absolutely absurd. One provincial premier did walk out but I understand he walked out to revise notes he had prepared. They were quite different from the ones he tabled at the beginning of the conference. I say the conference did not end prematurely. It ended having sat roughly the same number of hours that were originally contemplated would be spent and it ended with a very useful discussion in which the leaders of some of the provincial delegations who had a special interest in rural housing took part. The conference sat until approximately 7.20 p.m. on the second day. The premier of Nova Scotia had to leave about 6.30 because he had an appointment with the Prime Minister, but he took an active and helpful part in the discussion until he left. The representatives of Newfoundland and British Columbia, the premier of Prince Edward Island—they were all there as well as others taking part in the discussions.

It is more important, in my opinion, to talk about what was actually accomplished than it is to talk about failure or collapse. There were two concrete, positive achievements at the conference. First, as mentioned by the Prime Minister this morning, there was general agreement among all ten provinces with the four broad and very significant proposals put forward by the government of Canada in its wish to assist in meeting the long-range challenges that confront us. These four items will appear in Hansard, since they were referred to by the Prime Minister in his remarks this morning. The second one, however, federal financial support for land assembly and development of comprehensively planned new suburban communities within urban regions, warrants a supplementary word because we are making progress in this very important field.

In answer to a question put to me in the house on Monday I referred to the very effective work being carried on by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Ontario Housing Corporation in the development of a federal-provincial land tract at Malvern. This is a very strategically located and valuable tract of land, and the project shows what can be done if federal-provincial partnerships are to be effective. It has a potential of a highly desirable community of 30,000 or perhaps 32,000 people, with schools, churches, supermarkets, houses, and industries. It will be a suburban community or, if you like, a satellite community similar to several such successful communities that I have seen in England. Progress had been made on this project before the conference opened. We want to see more of the provinces undertaking this type of thing, and we want to see more of this activity in Ontario.

Mr. Brewin: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Nicholson: At the end of my remarks. In the editorial aftermath of the conference it came through loud and clear that although the federal government had put forward these four progressive, important proposals, all of which were accepted by the provincial delegations, the federal government, according to editorial comment, did not seem to have the funds with which to implement them. What failed to emerge in even a single newspaper that I have read or in any news comment that I have heard was the fact that the government of Canada had already indicated that it was and is prepared to commit to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, for investment in 1968, funds substantially in excess of those budgeted for 1967 in these areas of greatest need, including those to which I have referred.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): How much more?

Mr. Nicholson: I will deal with that in a minute or so. The second encouraging development arising out of the discussions last week was the agreement reached on a form of continuing study and assessment of the problems, to which reference was made this morning by the Prime Minister and other hon. members.

Criticism, Mr. Speaker, is always welcome if it is criticism of the right kind, and I will gladly accept some criticism here. Possibly it is deserved, probably it is deserved in some respects, but when people with a relatively superficial knowledge of all the factors that come into play in the current housing situation pose as experts, just like people who make a one week visit to Europe or Japan and return as experts on those countries—

Mr. Nielsen: Or the north.

Mr. Nicholson: —or the north, then I think we who have the responsibility should take issue with their superficial criticism. Many writers suggest in a superficial vein that the government has not provided effective leadership, or the leadership demanded by the circumstances. I would like to dispell that myth once and for all.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): That will be a good effort.

Mr. Nicholson: And you will get it. This year housing starts throughout Canada will reach about 160,000, some 26,000 units above last year's total, the fourth largest number of unit starts in any year in Canada's history. The largest was in 1965, the second largest in 1964 and the third largest in 1958.

But that figure of 160,000 for 1967 starts does not include new housing accommodation that takes a form other than self-contained dwelling units. For example, much has been done to provide needed housing in the form of hostel accommodation in our large cities. Approval has been given in this year, 1967, to the provision of hostel accommodation for approximately 10,000 elderly people and students. Taking these into consideration, 1967 has been a record year for starts in housing accommodation, and this in spite of the fact that we had relatively few starts in the first quarter of the year. It has been achieved virtually in a period of nine months.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I would be less than candid if I failed to express disappointment about some of the things that happened, or rather failed to happen at the recent housing conference. There was provision on the agenda for the discussion of a large number of urban problems that fall mainly within provincial jurisdiction. Some of these problems—pollution, urban traffic congestion, suburban resistance to low cost residential development, urban land costs, and the fragmentation of urban government planning—were on the agenda for discussion. One or two of them were discussed, but not in great depth.

I myself drew attention to these problems, as did several of my cabinet colleagues. I did so on at least two occasions, but to say the least it seemed to some of us that at least some of the heads of provincial delegations were not too anxious to discuss these sensitive matters. They seemed to feel that the federal government should not take anything but an academic interest in these questions.

One might conclude from some provincial comment made at the conference that these problems are well in hand, but I can assure hon. members, having lived with these problems for a number of years, that they are far from being well in hand. To give one instance, in the province of Ontario in certain circumstances you have to go through 42 different agencies in order to get permits to proceed with building of housing. It may well have seemed silly to one provincial premier to have a conference about questions where so much of the responsibility lies heavily on the provincial governments, but in my opinion certainly not nearly as silly as refusing to take advantage of the opportunity to discuss what could be done to bring down land costs, which is the largest single factor in housing in this country, particularly in our metropolitan areas. They did not try to come to grips with that problem.

• (12:30 p.m.)

Housing is not just the problem of land assembly, because some encouraging progress is being made in some of the provinces in this field. More important than that is the problem in respect of the taxation structure and procedures. Surely the provinces should come to grips with the type of problem which was developed by reason of the fact that at the end of the war, or five or ten years following the war, entrepreneurs or land developers picked up lots for $1,000 to $1,200 and are now selling them for $10,000, $12,000 or $15,000 without any tax being involved. The representatives of the provinces should not have been afraid to state their position openly in this regard before the television cameras here in Ottawa.

Believe me, there are many difficult, complex and massive problems which confront us with regard to the growth of our cities. If there is a reluctance on the part of some of the provinces to go beyond the exercise of their primary constitutional jurisdiction and reluctance to discuss the plans they have for exercising their prerogatives, then something is wrong and this is where the conference failed. If it failed it was because it was a federal-provincial conference and at such a conference one must expect contributions at both the federal and provincial level.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): They did not get any from you.

Mr. Nicholson: They may not have, in your opinion, but I must say, however, that we did put forward a few good views which they accepted. To put it in its simplest terms, while 1967 may not have been as big a year as all of us who have given serious thought to this problem would have liked to see it still was a big year in respect of housing in Canada. The significance of the government's leadership or, if I may put it another way, government action is manifest not only in the total volume of housing production for the year but in the fact that the proportion of accommodation for low income families and elderly citizens is considerably higher than ever before.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nicholson: Indeed, housing for those whose needs are the most urgent has become such an important part of our total housing program that there is now available to these families a record number of dwellings. This has become more and more important. In my opinion there is nothing more important than the provision of homes for those who face difficulty in building their own homes and those who cannot relate a home of their own to their limited incomes.

Undoubtedly the most acute problems associated with rapid urbanization in Canada are being experienced in the province of Ontario. In that province, dwelling starts in Toronto in 1967 will set a new record over any other year. Perhaps we should do more, but do not say that we are not making any progress when we have moved from the low level of 1966 to a record level in 1967. About 50 per cent of these starts in Toronto were financed under the National Housing Act. Close to 10 per cent represent accommodation for low income families, elderly citizens and students. In metropolitan Toronto alone more housing units will be started this year than the 32,000 produced in the record year of 1965 to which reference has been made.

While filling the leading position as the source of N.H.A. mortgage financing for accommodation produced on the market, the federal government has also been called upon throughout 1967 to increase sums for more specialized forms of housing such as public housing, housing for the elderly and housing for students. I should like to make clear that not only has there been no curtailment but also there has been no refusal of applications for funds for use in this way. We have every confidence that there will be an increase in 1968 of approximately 50 per cent in allocations of this nature. Listen to these figures. Ten years ago parliament voted some $35 million a year for public housing. When it became my responsibility to answer for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in this house its total annual budget was $350 million. Only a niggardly portion of this was used for public housing, because the initiative in these fields rests at the municipal and provincial levels. There has been, however, a remarkable change as a result of the legislation passed by parliament in 1964, which I had the honour to introduce.

In the area of public housing alone in the year 1967 approximately 9,000 units will have been authorized. This is more than double the number in the year 1966. I would have liked to see twice that number, but we are making encouraging progress in that direction. What has been done in the year 1967 represents in one year one third of the total number of public housing starts provided in the whole of Canada in the last 20 years. I believe that is a record for which I do not have to apologize.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nicholson: Public housing for low income families, for the elderly and for students is now a very significant part of Canada's annual building program and, as has been said by the Prime Minister, can be expected to have an even greater impact in 1968 and in the years ahead.

I should now like to review the prospects for the coming year in terms of anticipated federal financial commitments for housing programs which will continue under current provisions of the National Housing Act. As I have already said more than once, we expect that the freeing of the interest rate on insured home-owner and rental loans will provide necessary flexibility and result in greatly increased participation by approved lenders. Having in mind the comment made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) this morning, I should like to put this on the record. He said hopes had been expressed that there would be improvement in the number of loans under the N.H.A. I am glad to assure the house that in a period of just under 90 days there has not just been a hope of this happening but rather in October and November by means of N.H.A. loans four times as many dwellings have been started than in the corresponding period of last year—four times as many.

At the conference last week the Prime Minister stated that we were following this situation and that if we did not obtain satisfactory results we might have to take other action. There is not the slightest doubt that we are now getting these results. Anyone who believes in free or private enterprise will realize that if they can obtain a certain interest rate from a company which wants to build a factory, a pipe line, an office building or a warehouse, they are not likely to put this money into housing if the interest rate in respect of housing is one per cent or half a per cent lower. I think we did what was the realistic thing to do. We did not fix the interest rate at 8¼ per cent. We did what parliament authorized and said that approved lending institutions—and they have to be approved before they can obtain the benefits of the act—could make loans at an interest rate up to that ceiling. I am happy to say that some of the lending institutions, including insurance companies and at least one of the larger banks, are lending money at an interest rate substantially below the ceiling, one half of one per cent below.

This flexibility is bringing more money into the field of housing and accounts in part at least for the fact that the last nine months of 1967 we have had a record period for housing starts in Canada. In addition, the government is making more money available in the areas of greatest need, for public housing and projects of that kind. Not only the proportion but the level of commitments in these areas of greatest public need will increase. At the same time—I want to make this clear for the record at this time—that not only will there be more funds available for the areas of greatest social need but a substantial sum has been earmarked for 1968 for those who wish to build their own homes and may not be able to arrange financing through direct loans.

We have cut back on speculative builders' loans, those who build for profit. Let them go to the private lending institutions to borrow money and make their profit in the usual way. There is nothing wrong with that in a country like Canada. There has been and will be in the rural parts of Canada greater difficulty in getting loans from the traditional lending institutions because they do not have offices and inspectors there, so C.M.H.C. will have funds available for direct loans to people who want to build their own homes.

Reference was made this morning, and I referred to this matter during the conference, to the revival of the limited dividend program to provide rental housing for moderate income families. Provision is being made for a renewed, a wider, program of this type. This program, as I am sure most hon. members know though others may not, was very successful in the first few years of its operation. Today, however, if you have an income of more than $5,400 in some areas—I think it is $5,500 in one—you are not eligible to acquire a house under the limited dividend program. The program is tied in with one's income. The private speculator puts up a portion of the money and C.M.H.C. is prepared to finance the balance, but the return to the private speculator is limited to 5 per cent. This is not very realistic when you realize that in Ontario the rate on government loans is about 7½ per cent, in Quebec it is about 7½ per cent and in my own native province of New Brunswick it is 7½ per cent. The federal government is paying about 6 per cent. Therefore a 5 per cent interest rate is realistic in respect of limited dividend housing.

We propose to make changes by way of regulation or legislation, if necessary, to put the limited dividend program back into effect. C.M.H.C. is now ready to receive applications from entrepreneurs, land developers, builders or anyone else. This money will be available on attractive terms that are being widely announced throughout the country, which I believe will put this program back on its feet. It may take time to get limited dividend projects under way on the scale we would like, because it must be remembered that the program has been inactive for years and it will take a little time to revive it.

One of the major areas of investment of federal funds in 1968 will be loans to provinces and municipalities for public housing projects, land assembly for housing, sewage treatment plants, and this type of project. There was a slight disagreement at the housing conference between the prime minister of Quebec and myself with regard to amending the legislation, but when I explained to him that the federal government was quite prepared to recommend to parliament that funds be made available for the acquisition of land for housing, provided it would not be held by the province for 50 years and would not become the property of the province, with the taxpayers of Canada paying the shot and the asset being turned over to the province, the disagreement was resolved. We will make loans for these projects on a short term basis of 10 or 15 years at low rates. This money will be available to provinces who wish to acquire land for housing. There would be no profit in it. The prime minister of Quebec said that was fine, that was what they were asking for, and I got the nicest note anybody could get from the prime minister of Quebec when he left the conference. And he did not leave before the conference was over. Admittedly he did not stay for the discussion on rural housing but he stayed right through until that item came up. He left his minister or officials behind to participate in that phase of the discussion.

We are prepared to listen to any reasonable requests. In fact, we have discussed with several of the provinces, including Ontario and Quebec, what funds we will make available out of the C.M.H.C. budget for 1968. We discussed with them what they might reasonably expect to need during 1968. The representatives of those provinces both went away satisfied with the assurances we had given.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, is the minister prepared to say anything more about the intended program for speculative building?

Mr. Nicholson: I can only say that it is not the government's intention at this time to introduce any speculative lending program for 1968. The requirements for money for public housing were $35 million a few years ago. They are now nearly $350 million for the year 1966-67 and they will probably exceed $500 million for the year 1968. This is the reason; it is as simple as that. If we are to make provision for the money needed for public housing, student housing, land assembly and urban renewal in areas where urban renewal is vital, we cannot put money into speculative building, much as I might like to.

Reference was made, again by the hon. member for Fraser Valley for whom I have very high regard, to the winter building bonus of $500 but there is one thing that the hon. member overlooked. He referred to the $500 winter house building bonus that was instituted in 1963. This bonus was paid on each unit built during the winter months and was carried on through the winters from 1963, 1964, and 1965, dropped last year.

I would like to make this clear so there can be no dispute about it. The $500 bonus would have been largely meaningless had it not been for the almost unlimited funds that were made available to speculative builders who were building for profit. They were building on speculation and the federal government was providing the funds for that purpose. If it is a choice between providing funds for that purpose or for areas of greater need, we certainly will go to the areas of greater need.

Our policy in this respect seems to be working. There is a reasonable level of interest rates. If with our concentration of effort on public housing and allied problems we do not obtain the results we expect, I am not prepared to say that we will not take another look at the speculative lending program, but our present program does not contemplate any speculative lending for 1968.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would answer a question?

• (12:50 p.m.)

Mr. Nicholson: I am nearly through, Mr. Speaker. I should like to complete my remarks.

Mr. Gilbert: Can the minister say whether the government is prepared—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Nicholson: I should also inform hon. members and the Canadian public that provision is being made for greater activity in the important urban renewal program. If one is to proceed with intelligent planning in the use of public funds for such purposes in cities such as Halifax, Saint John, and even some of the smaller cities in the Atlantic region, and certainly the cities of Quebec,

Toronto, Hamilton, Vancouver and elsewhere, one cannot ignore the problems which arise out of the regeneration that takes place when some of the slum or near slum areas have been or have to be improved.

Last week I picked up a beastly cold, a form of pleurisy, when I was in Winnipeg attending a public housing ceremony, but it was worth it. At one time the area in which the ceremony was held was one of the worst slums in the prairie region, and the hon. members for Winnipeg will agree with me on that I am sure. They will remember the deplorable Jarvis Street slum in Winnipeg. Five years ago one was not safe going along that street. After it was torn down a housing project was built into which the people living in the former slum were moved and for which 75 per cent of federal funds were used and 25 per cent of provincial and municipal funds. Last week we opened up on this former deplorable slum area one of the finest public housing projects in Canada which will provide accommodation for 1,100 people. That is the type of work to which we should allocate more and more funds rather than for certain other purposes.

To the extent that provincial governments are willing to respond to our offers of financial assistance, the capital budget for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in 1968 will provide approximately $500 million for these special purposes to which I have referred, compared with $250 million allotted for 1967. I was able to persuade my colleagues in the cabinet later to stretch this sum to $335 million in 1967. Next year will be more than double this past year's figure. In view of these facts how can anyone seriously suggest that we have pulled out the props?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister but the time allotted to him has expired. Has the minister leave of the house to continue beyond his time?

Mr. Knowles: Yes, provided he will answer a question or two.

Mr. Nicholson: I will be glad to do so. However, let me ask: How can people who have done any research in this field, and primarily those in the news media who were not in attendance at the meeting, seriously suggest that the props were pulled out in the light of the facts that I have just mentioned?

In summary, I can assure hon. members of substantially increased federal response to provincial and municipal needs in meeting all of the problems of urban development for which the current national housing legislation is designed to provide assistance. The new kinds of federal assistance, as I have said, require some amendments to the National Housing Act. As the Prime Minister has stated, they will be introduced at an early date in the new year.

In closing I should like to express my sincere appreciation not only to those who have made useful contributions in the house today but on earlier occasions and to the many other individuals and organizations who have come forward with studies during the past year and a half when this crisis developed—and the problem certainly has reached crisis proportions in cities like Toronto, Windsor, Montreal, Vancouver and other places. Some very worth-while and instructive suggestions have been put forward. They are all appreciated and we will continue to welcome them and to act upon them.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that the hon. member for Greenwood has a question to ask?

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the minister referred in his remarks to the land assembly at Malvern in the neighbourhood of Toronto, and I think he said about 30,000 persons will be housed there. I should like to ask the minister whether he agrees that the major obstacle to proceeding with that project seems to be the servicing of the land which has already been assembled. Will the federal government make a contribution so that services can be made available? There is another question which I should like to put to the minister at the same time. Can he give us the assurance that when the land is serviced it will be made available for low cost or public housing and not just turned over to speculators to sell to the well-to-do?

Mr. Nicholson: These are two very good questions. On the first one I can say that the C.M.H.C. and the Ontario Housing Corporation have been working on this matter together with the municipalities in that area, including the chairman of the metro Toronto council. Arrangements have already been made to bring water and certain other facilities to the area in question, that is, the land owned by the federal-provincial partnership. The federal-provincial partnership has agreed to the appointment of top-notch engineers to co-ordinate the work for which it will provide the funds.

On the second question I can say that in the new development, some of which will be used for apartment blocks or multiple dwellings, some for private dwellings, supermarkets and churches, some space certainly will be reserved for public housing. There was agreement on that.

Mr. Valade: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I should like to draw your attention to citation 119 in the fourth edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, especially to subclauses 1 and 2 which read:

119. (1) One of the main functions of the house consists in debating public issues—

[English]

Mr. Nicholson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the point raised by the hon. member for Saint-Marie certainly should be dealt with this afternoon. The time this morning was reserved for a debate on housing.

Mr. Speaker: There is a question of privilege before the house. Perhaps we should hear what it is.

Mr. Valade: Do I understand the minister correctly? Will this debate continue this afternoon?

Mr. Nicholson: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Valade: That is why I raise a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am coming back to the citation:

119. (1) One of the main functions of the House consists in debating public issues, a function which can only be filled by complete freedom of speech.

I come now to subsection 2:

(2) The mere object of shortening sessions may lead to an undue curtailment of the freedom of speech. The duties of a representative Parliament are too important to be performed in a hurry. No question should be decided until it has been fully discussed. Although some effort ought to be made to economize time,

Mr. Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr. Valade: I am quoting, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member come to his question of privilege?

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I simply had to quote citations from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms to substantiate the question of privilege I intend to invoke.

Because of the way in which this urgent debate was organized, many members have been unable to express their views freely on matters which interest them personally, and as a member from an urban area—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have no explanations to give the Liberal members who try to gag parliament and tamper with the freedom of speech of the members on this side of the house. I would have had remarks to make.

Here is my question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Because of the procedure, the house has been gagged on a matter as important as housing. I should have liked us not to have been subjected to last minute pressures.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that it will not now be possible to call on the hon. member for Yukon.

It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, December 21, 1967

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Gérald Fauteux, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, December 21, at 3.15 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. G. Cherrier,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

Inquiries of the Ministry

DRUGS

PROHIBITION AGAINST PUBLICATION OF NAMES OF PERSONS CHARGED

Mr. M. L. Klein (Cartier) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-194, respecting disclosure of names of drug addicts.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Klein: Mr. Speaker, the publication in the newspapers or in any other news media of the names and addresses of persons charged with possession of narcotics, including marijuana, tends to destroy the character of the accused, often in his late teens or early twenties, as well as his career as a student, to the anguish of parents and family and makes rehabilitation almost impossible. The purpose of this bill is to prohibit the publication of the names and addresses of the persons so charged without special leave of the court so that, among other things, a distinction may be made between a user and a pusher.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act (inter alia to increase the maximum number of members of the National Parole Board from five to eight), the Penitentiary Act, the Prison and Reformatories Act, and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act and the Customs Tariff.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this bill is of great importance and in order to give us an opportunity during the Christmas recess to study its contents, may I suggest to the government that we pass the resolution as the first order of business and give the bill first reading? This will give us the opportunity of reviewing the bill during the Christmas recess.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, that is quite agreeable to us on this side.

Mr. Knowles: That was what I was going to suggest, Mr. Speaker. So we are all in agreement.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house that this be done now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Trudeau moved that the house go into committee on the resolution.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dubé in the chair.

Resolution considered in committee, reported and concurred in.

Mr. Trudeau thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-195, to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act and the Customs Tariff.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, if it is not against the rules, may I be permitted to ask whether the bill is now ready for distribution?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is ready for distribution in both languages.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Since this is the last question period before the recess I wonder whether the Prime Minister can give us any further information about possible assistance from the government to the government of Nova Scotia in connection with the Dosco problem, in addition to what he has already said regarding the period up to April 30 next.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I received from the premier of Nova Scotia the communication which we had discussed and which he said he would forward the day before yesterday, I think. I have discussed this communication with my colleagues. I have written to the premier this morning. We want to clear up one or two points. We also wish to secure from him the text of the legislation. We shall be discussing this matter probably at this evening's cabinet meeting or early next week. We are anxious to proceed with a decision on this matter as quickly as possible.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR PAROLE OF FISHERMEN'S UNION OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Justice or to the Solicitor General. I am not sure to whom I should address it but perhaps I might direct it to the appropriate member of the government. Inasmuch as Christmas parole has been denied to two officers of the fishermen's union because their case is before the court of appeal, could this matter be looked into?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether I could take up that matter with the minister immediately.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I make a personal request of the Prime Minister and ask him to review this case himself? The minister who is involved will find himself in difficulties because of the legal aspects of the case. In view of the season of the year, could the Prime Minister see to it that these two men are given Christmas parole, not on grounds of humanity alone but on the wider grounds that a number of men of good will on the west coast are trying to open up new aspects of labour relations? This would do a great deal to show that there is good will in Ottawa toward efforts in that regard.

Mr. Pearson: I shall be glad to look into the matter personally, with the minister. I shall take my hon. friend's observations into consideration when we are doing that.

AGRICULTURE

BUTTER—INQUIRY AS TO NEED FOR IMPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture, but in his absence I will direct it to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Could the minister tell us whether the butter supplies in Canada are sufficient to meet the demand during the winter or whether we will have to import butter or other dairy products during 1967-68?

[English]

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think I had better take that question as notice and discuss it with the Minister of Agriculture.

TRADE

PROPOSED FREE TRADE AREA WITH WEST INDIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker. Now that the centennial issue of the Canada Year Book, a publication of the minister's department, has come out in favour of free trade, will the department be studying the report of the Canadian trade committee of the Private Planning Association of Canada, which advocates a free trade area with the West Indies?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think there may be some misunderstanding here. The misunderstanding may stem from two press stories this morning which referred to an article in the 1967 Canada Year Book. In fact, the article in question was in the centennial publication entitled, "Canada One Hundred, 1867-1967." The article was contributed and did not necessarily reflect government policy.

Mr. Johnston: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister comment on the possible study of the report of the Canadian trade committee of the planning association?

Mr. Winters: Which aspect of it, Mr. Speaker?

POSSIBLE RESTRICTION OF MINERAL IMPORTS BY U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement made in Toronto yesterday by the general manager of the Mining Association of Canada to the effect that a possible limitation by the United States with respect to imports of Canadian minerals, which is causing great concern in the mining industry of this country, may I ask the minister whether he is aware of this possible action and, if he is not, will he look into the situation and make sure that the United States government is advised that we would not take such action lightly?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are looking into this matter currently.

RESEARCH

TRANSFER TO U.S. OF HARP PROJECT AND PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. In the light of answers given to me by the Minister of Industry yesterday concerning the space research institute, the HARP project, could the hon. gentleman tell me whether he himself or his officials have done anything to see that this complex is kept in Canada?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I personally had some discussion with the representatives of the board, I think, and I directed these people to the chairman of the Defence Research Board. I believe a tentative arrangement was arrived at whereby we could ask on a competitive basis for contracts from these people for particular types of research. These contracts would, of course, have to be approved by us. For instance, they would have to be concerned with high priority defence projects and so on.

Mr. Lambert: I wonder whether the Minister of National Defence could get together with the Minister of Industry and review the positions they have taken on this question in order that we might retain this space research institute in Canada and not let it go by default to the United States.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GREECE—CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH MILITARY REGIME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the military regime in Greece. It is related to one which was addressed to the Prime Minister last week in the hon. gentleman's absence. The Prime Minister said then that the matter was under consideration. My question is: does the government of Canada consider the junta to be a government legally constituted and worthy of continued support by Canada?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give a definite answer to that question because our policy in this regard is not yet at a point at which it can be definitely stated. We are holding consultations with certain other governments. There is a constitutional problem in Greece which has to be examined as well.

CAMBODIA—EXTENSION OF ACTIVITIES OF CONTROL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question based on an announcement contained in a news broadcast this morning to the effect that Canada had indicated its readiness to extend the activities of the International Control Commission along the borders of Cambodia. Did Canada make such a offer and, if so, was it discussed with our colleagues on the commission, the Poles, who are reported to have opposed the suggestion?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions about the utilization of the commission in connection with the border question. The government of Cambodia has made a formal request to the commission. The Canadian government through its representative there has indicated its willingness as a member of the commission to use its offices for the purpose requested.

A decision by the commission would, of course, involve not only agreement by Canada but by the two other members of the commission. There can be no doubt about the desire of the Canadian government and its representative on the commission to comply with an obligation which they accepted when the commission was set up.

Mr. Fulton: I think the minister has misapprehended my question. I am sure there would be no disagreement as to the desirability of the International Control Commission acting in this manner. But my question was: has the government discussed this question with its fellow members of the commission before making an offer which we are told has been turned down by the Poles?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did not say Canada had made an offer but that Canada had indicated its willingness to pursue this application. Nor did I state which country or countries on the commission had refused to accede to the Canadian view.

Mr. Fulton: Has Canada discussed this matter with its partners on the commission and, if so, what has been the attitude of those partners?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Having in mind the interest which the hon. gentleman and I share in this question, I do not believe I should go any further than I have done.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could add to my reply to a question put by the hon. member for Kamloops a few moments ago. I do so because of the importance of this matter. I should like to say, in addition, that the Canadian delegate on the commission has been trying, without success, to have what in effect is a proposal made by the government of Cambodia as early as 1966 considered by the commission. Our efforts in this regard have not thus far met with success.

Mr. Fulton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I take it, then, that the matter is still open for discussion. In other words, it is still open for decision and no final decision has been made; is this correct?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Canadian government continues to endeavour to have this matter considered by the commission. We feel strongly that if it were and if the commission were able to deal with the question involved, we would be able to take steps to more effectively guarantee the neutrality of Cambodia.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): A related question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member later.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MONTREAL—STEPS TO DEAL WITH STRIKE OF DOCK WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roger-E. Régimbal (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour, and I hope his voice will last long enough to answer it. In view of the fact that Montreal port manager Guy Beaudet reported today that 32 shipping lines have indicated they will not return to Montreal until the current dispute is resolved, and in view of the fact that at this point the amount of cargo handled has decreased by more than 4 million tons this year, is the minister now ready to propose some new initiative to bring the parties together to find a solution?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): I will take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Régimbal: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether by taking my previous question as notice he meant he will not indicate any kind of action or initiative on this urgent matter before January 22?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

HARBOURS

MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR GREATER LOCAL AUTONOMY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put question to the Minister of Transport. I apologize for not having given him notice.

In view of the news we have learned from the newspapers and radio that Montreal authorities would ask to take over the administration of national harbours in Montreal, has the minister received official correspondence from the city authorities on this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I point out to the minister that in its present form this is not an urgent question, but if the minister wishes to answer, in view of special circumstances and the fact that we are adjourning today, the question may possibly be allowed.

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): To the best of my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, there has been no communication, although there may have been some earlier which gave rise to this entirely new idea. I cannot remember seeing anything in this regard within the last few days but to be certain I should like to check my files. This idea of local autonomy is not new. It is part of a greater and very difficult policy question. I realize this is not the only place in the country where local people are interested in taking part in the affairs of the port authority, and I will check my files before saying definitely whether there has been any recent correspondence from people in Montreal.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Could the Minister of Transport inform us whether his department has any objection to turning over to the Montreal city authorities jurisdiction over Montreal harbour, and has an investigation been made on this?

[English]

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, this is part of the very great and complex policy question about which I was talking. I do not think my hon. friend would want me to give an off the cuff answer to anything as significant and with as far reaching consequences in an answer to a question on orders of the day.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ABOLITION OF SECRETARIAT DEALING WITH WAR ON POVERTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, last Monday I asked the right hon. Prime Minister a question relating to the disbanding of the special planning secretariat and he stated that the work of the special secretariat had been given to other departments. I then asked the right hon. gentleman for information as to which departments had been asked to do what part of the work of the secretariat and he was good enough to say:

> Yes, I shall be very glad to do that, Mr. Speaker.

Since this is the last day before the Christmas recess will the Prime Minister give us that information?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I have not received the report for which I asked and I apologize to my hon. friend for not having this information. I will get it to him as soon as I receive it later this week—tomorrow, I hope.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister is answering the question posed by the hon. member for York South perhaps he would also indicate to the house which group will be doing the co-ordinating and planning in respect of any action on the poverty program which the secretariat was doing.

Mr. Pearson: That will be done in the privy council office which has the general co-ordinating responsibility in this field.

FINANCE

INTERNATIONAL GOLD TRANSACTIONS TO SUPPORT DOLLAR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on December 19 the hon. member for Edmonton West asked me whether Canada had been asked to render any other assistance in support of the United States dollar on the international exchange or whether we are to stand idly by as an apprehensive watcher. In reply I said:

> I believe the United States government, which is the primary supporter of gold, is very happy with Canada's role at the present time.

I should like to supplement that answer today by advising the house that as a measure of international monetary co-operation Canada has today sold the United States $100 million worth of gold. The proceeds from this sale will be invested by the exchange fund account in short term interest bearing securities.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is this sort of participation in the gold pool on an open end basis or is it an exclusive transaction?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we are not a member of the gold pool. This is action by Canada very similar to the action we have taken in the past when we have sold gold to the United States, but this is a rather larger transaction than usual.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

When the Minister of Finance says that the revenue or proceeds from the sale of this gold to the United States will be invested in bonds, can he tell us whether the interest on these bonds will be at least equal to the interest which the government pays in respect of its own bonds?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I should advise the hon. gentleman that when we hold gold we are earning nothing and that therefore this is a net addition to our earnings as a government.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, that was not my question. I asked whether the interest on the bonds bought by the government will be equal at least to the interest which the government pays in respect of its own bonds.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that whenever the government invests money it invests it at the market rates of interest which presumably apply to all borrowers as well as lenders.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that Canadian gold mines are subsidized, can the minister indicate just how much this sale of gold will cost the Canadian taxpayers?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, all sales of gold, as long as the United States is supporting the dollar, are at $35 an ounce. That is the prevailing international price. There is no other price in international markets.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

INQUIRY AS TO TENDERS FOR DESTROYER ESCORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. Would the minister be good enough to give us a progress report, if one is available, on the analyses which are being made of the tenders for the four D.D.H.'s and particularly whether Halifax is in the running for one or more of them?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): As I pointed out the other day, Mr. Speaker, the tenders were officially opened on December 12, a relatively few days ago. Although the work is progressing as rapidly as possible it is not expected that the analyses will be completed until early in the new year.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister advise the house whether in considering these tenders the difficult position of the west coast shipyards will be taken into consideration?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to the Restigouche shipyard I am not sure whether that shipyard is on the list of tenderers.

An hon. Member: The west coast shipyards.

Mr. Drury: There is a bid in from the west coast which will be examined.

Mr. Chatterton: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not think the minister understood my previous question. In deciding which tender should be accepted, will the minister consider the difficult position of the west coast shipyards?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the difficult position of the west coast shipyards. I should like to remind the hon. gentleman that in order to take care of this a program has been arranged of what I might call transitional assistance to enable the west coast shipyards to make an adjustment.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Prime Minister but in his absence perhaps I might direct it to the minister as a supplementary question following the answer he just gave. Can the minister advise the house whether immediate assistance will be given to the Vancouver drydock in view of the fact that 500 out of 800 men have been laid off already?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned, the analyses of the bids received for the D.D.H.'s will take some time to complete. It will not be possible to allocate these contracts until some time next year.

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the size and complexity of the bill we have just received dealing with the Criminal Code and other statutes, is it the intention of the hon. gentleman to have it sent to the appropriate committee of the House of Commons? Perhaps someone on that side of the house would take this question as notice, since I see that the minister has just left.

[Later:]

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. A brief perusal of the bill which he has introduced does not reveal any reference to section 150 of the Criminal Code relating to birth control. Is this matter dealt with in the bill or will it be treated separately?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think this question is out of order, but since other out of order questions were accepted this afternoon perhaps the minister can answer this one too.

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Since you allow me to speak out of order,

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker, I will say that this matter is not in the bill for the simple reason that it is in another bill dealing with contraception. I believe it is in the drugs and food bill which is now being considered in the other place. That is the only reason it is not in this bill.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INCENTIVES TO ENCOURAGE EARLY RETIREMENT OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, notice of which I sent him this morning. Will the additional benefits offered by the C.N.R. to its employees taking early retirement continue until the death of the employee or will they terminate at age 65? Also, why did the company not offer to continue the health and welfare benefits of the employees being urged to retire early until they reach the age of 65?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think this question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, if I may say a word on the question of urgency, I understand that the employees who have been offered this proposition have been given a date by which they must opt in or out of the program. I think it is important that they have the information so they may arrive at a proper judgment in this respect. If the minister has the information I do not think it would take long to give it.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO FINAL PAYMENTS FOR 1966-67 CROPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, especially because this is the last day before the Christmas recess. Could the minister advise the house whether the Canadian Wheat Board has advised him when they will have the calculations made and be able to issue the final payment cheques to farmers in western Canada for the 1966-67 crop year?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, I am sorry that I am unable to be precise in my answer to this question, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REQUEST FOR INCREASED MEDICAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the light of new evidence indicating a drastic and soul saddening increase in the number of Vietnamese children war wounded and war burned, can the minister say whether the government has any immediate plans to make its medical assistance more substantial in that part of the world?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I announced a few days ago that we are planning substantial additional medical assistance based on the recommendations of the Canadian team that was sent to South Viet Nam about two months ago.

STEPS TO IMPROVE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS ABROAD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of his statement in Brussels last week to the effect that our relations with France have never been better, is he planning to initiate similar approaches to other heads of state with a view to generally improving our international relations throughout the world?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, what I said, and I repeat it now, is that relations between Canada and the government of France are normal. I had an opportunity a few days ago of the fullest discussion with the French foreign minister. We are engaged in a number of negotiations with France. I detect no difference whatsoever in the relations between those representing the government of Canada and those representing the government of France. That is the statement I made the other day in Brussels.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INDUCTION INTO ARMY OF NEWSPAPER REPORTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. I have given him 24 hours' notice so he will be well prepared. It is based on an article published in a recent issue of the week end supplement called The Canadian Magazine. The editorial comment reads as follows—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he cannot quote directly when asking a question. The question should be asked directly.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if you would listen to the quotation you would make a different decision. However, I will ask the minister whether the magazine is correctly stating the case when it says that this reporter was admitted into the army secretly and given a regimental number and a uniform. Was that done without formal attestation?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that my hon. friend gave me this article yesterday, which I read and enjoyed very much. I think he is gratified to find out that recruit training is just as rugged today as it was in his day. I am told that the unit into which Mr. Alderman was recruited is very happy about the article. I would like to coin a proverb, if I may: "Thrice armed is he who can laugh at himself."

Mr. Churchill: I am not objecting to the article, Mr. Speaker. The minister has not answered my question, which I regret very much. I thought he was different from his predecessor.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Sometimes an army unit will take on strength a mascot such as a goat and give him a number and a rank. Do reporters now qualify for this distinction?

Mr. Benson: Most reporters are goats.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): That was not my remark, Mr. Speaker. All I can say is that the recruiting of Mr. Alderman was carried out with our knowledge and in the proper way.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PRESENTATION OF PEACE PROGRAM ON CHRISTMAS AFTERNOON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. It arises out of the plans of the C.B.C. to televise nationally this Christmas afternoon a program called "Peace On Earth", a one hour special report on Pacem in Terris II, a convocation held in Geneva last spring on the problem of achieving peace in the world. My question is, can the minister tell the house why the decision was made to televise this program at this time, seven months after the event?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker. The people in management get paid to manage.

Mr. Sherman: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that most of those appearing on the program are well known for views that are opposed to United States foreign policy, would the minister, in the interests of good Canadian-United States relations and objective broadcasting, undertake to watch this program so as to satisfy herself that objectivity is being achieved?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I remind hon. members that we are soon going to run out of time, so I shall have to watch the questions a little more closely.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING SUPPLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would the minister not like to take this opportunity to wish a Merry Christmas to all the old age pensioners of Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: —and would he do this by finding a way to increase the cost of living supplement to be added to the pension in January by an amount in line with the increase in the cost of living which has taken place since the pension was fixed at $75 a month?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will be very happy to respond to the suggestion made by my hon. friend and wish the old age pensioners of Canada a Merry Christmas. Just about a year ago the House of Commons passed an important piece of legislation, the guaranteed income supplement, which in the past year has resulted in payment of additional support to the old age pensioners of Canada of an amount in excess of $200 million.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: This money has been put in the pockets of the neediest pensioners. I am sure that my hon. friend, who used the expression "Scrooge" a year ago with reference to myself, would like an opportunity now to withdraw it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has commented on the guaranteed income supplement. My question related to the cost of living supplement of only $1.50 a month which is to be paid starting in January. Will he find a way to increase that amount in view of the fact that the cost of living has gone up by 13 per cent since the old age pension was set at $75 a month?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we have fully complied with the law passed by parliament in granting this cost of living adjustment. As I recollect it, all members of the house thought it was a very important step when we adjusted the old age pensions and the guaranteed income supplement to the cost of living. This cannot be altered in any way except by an amendment to the act.

Mr. Knowles: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please, We have just a few minutes left and questions have been asked on this subject by five or six other hon. members.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Veterans Affairs found a way to do it yesterday, by a supplementary estimate.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs but in his absence perhaps the Acting Prime Minister could answer it. Pursuant to the announcement made yesterday by the Minister of Veterans Affairs with regard to the increase in veterans disability pensions, is the government giving consideration to an increase in the war veterans' allowance payments?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I will bring this question to the attention of the minister at once.

MEETING WITH RAILWAYS TO DISCUSS NEW L.C.L. RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport in view of the fact that we may not be here for a few days. Has the minister been able to use his well known initiative to arrange a meeting with the railway officials to deal with the l.c.l. problem? If not, will he undertake to make sure that such a meeting is arranged even though it may be held while the house is in recess?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the railways are ready yet to discuss with me their position relating to the several questions raised by the Atlantic provinces premiers. I can assure my hon. friend that if they can do so during the recess the meeting will certainly be called expeditiously. We will not wait for parliament to reconvene just for that purpose but will endeavour to obtain the answers as quickly as we reasonably can.

Mr. Nowlan: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister use his initiative at some stage to set a date for the meeting, or is he going to wait for the railway officials to express their readiness for it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making a representation.

TRANSPORT

NORTHUMBERLAND CROSSING— CORRESPONDENCE WITH COL. CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Public Works. I have given him notice of it. In the light of the fact that motions for the production of papers cannot be dealt with before the Christmas recess, may I ask the parliamentary secretary whether any significant documents have been exchanged between Colonel Churchill and the government of Prince Edward Island relative to the Northumberland crossing since Colonel Churchill became an employee of the Department of Public Works?

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this question could be dealt with more fully when the notice of motion is called. However, the brief answer is that at present it appears that the papers which would be required by the motion could not be produced because they are interdepartmental.

[Translation]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of National Defence.

Can he tell us if a decision has been reached with regard to the Canadian troops stationed in Cyprus?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, that decision is incumbent on the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Personally, I have nothing new to say about the matter.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I may add that the security council of the United Nations is to consider the matter this afternoon, I believe, and the position of the Canadian government will depend entirely on the decision reached at that time.

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

AGREEMENT TO DISPENSE WITH ADJOURNMENT DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader a question related to the business of the house tonight. Would the house leader not consider it appropriate to abandon the adjournment debate tonight so that members of the staff may get away a little earlier than would otherwise be the case?

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps we could have it at six o'clock.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be a good idea to abandon the adjournment debate tonight.

Mr. Speaker: Is it so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT DESCENDANTS OF FATHERS OF CONFEDERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. As this is the last scheduled day on which this parliament will be sitting in the one hundredth year of confederation, I should like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that there are two men sitting in the House of Commons who are direct descendants of the fathers of confederation. I believe that December 21 is observed as the anniversary of the death of one of these gentlemen, namely Hon. Edward Whelan, of whom Eugene Whelan, the hon. member for Essex South, is a direct descendant. May I also say that the hon. member for Lotbinière, Mr. Auguste Choquette, is a direct descendant of Sir Pascal Taché who at one time was the prime minister of Canada and who was the hon. member's great-great-grandfather. The French have a knack for keeping track of their family connections and can trace back their forbears for many generations. There is no question that the hon. member for Lotbinière is a direct descendant of Sir Pascal Taché.

The Irish were more of a wandering type, but it can be proved that the hon. member for Essex South is a direct descendant of Hon. Edward Whelan who represented Prince Edward Island at the second Quebec conference and who also attended the Charlottetown conference. Sir Pascal Taché presided over the first Quebec conference but unfortunately passed away before the other two meetings were held. Hon. Edward Whelan was a printer, a man after my own heart, and to prove that there is a direct connection between him and the hon. member for Essex South may I quote a few words from an editorial in the Saint John, New Brunswick Globe of December 21, 1867. Speaking of the Hon. Edward Whelan, this is what it said:

> Mr. Whelan enlisted with ardour on the side of the people, and soon drew down upon himself the stern opposition of the old and powerful family compact which ruled the island.

Royal Assent

May I say that this is in keeping with the cool breezes now blowing in this direction from the other place. It continues:

His long public career has been characterized by a firm and eloquent advocacy of measures calculated to improve and elevate the people. He was a man of large sympathies, of quick and generous nature, of ready wit, and with an eye always to the humorous side of a question. An extensive and varied reader, a man of excellent literary and of considerable natural eloquence, he was a flowing and imaginative speaker.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

• (3:30 p.m.)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act respecting Co-operative Trust Company Limited.

An act respecting Principal Life Insurance Company of Canada.

An act to establish a corporation for the administration of the National Museums of Canada.

An act to amend the Judges Act.

An act to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

An act to amend the Criminal Code.

An act to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act.

An act to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act.

An act to establish a Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

An act to establish a Canada Manpower and Immigration Council.

An act respecting the boundary between the Province of British Columbia and the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

An act respecting interprovincial and international teleferries.

An act respecting the armed forces of countries visiting Canada.

An act to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways System for the period from the 1st day of January, 1967 to the 30th day of June, 1968, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

[Mr. Cowan.]

BROADCASTING

IMPLEMENTATION OF CANADIAN POLICY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, December 20, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-163, to implement a broadcasting policy for Canada, to amend the Radio Act in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential and related provisions—Miss LaMarsh—Mr. Tardif in the chair.

On clause 2—Broadcasting policy for Canada.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, when the house adjourned yesterday I had just started to make a few remarks about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and this proposed legislation, Bill No. C-163. The bill is divided readily into three parts. We are now discussing clause 2 of part I which in essence sets out the objects of a broadcasting policy that the government hopes to project across Canada.

I came to Ottawa ten years ago, Mr. Chairman. If I were asked to look back and to single out a subject that has continually caused more concern to members of parliament and to this and the previous government I would have to say it was the C.B.C. and its administration and management. During those ten years the broadcasting committee has held meetings and studied broadcasting legislation from time to time. We have had the C.B.C. management on the mat, so to speak, time and time again. The point I am trying to make is that there seems to be no way in which the government and members of parliament can control this communications system and at the same time keep out of the field. And one really has to have control over this mammoth giant which continues to spend the taxpayers' money at an amazing rate. The taxpayers are not completely happy with the way the corporation is run in that no one seems to be able to control it, and no one in the corporation seems to take responsibility for some of the things it does.

The bill before the committee, seeks to set up a Canadian radio-television council, which will be a completely independent body. In other words, the management and operations of this mammoth giant will be removed that much farther from the people who pay for its operations and from their representatives. Members of parliament and the people generally will have little or no influence over the controlling of the C.B.C. or over the projection of a Canadian content and a Canadian culture in its programs.

According to the objects outlined in the clause, it appears that the council will have to go further and contribute to the unity of Canada and assist Canadians in developing a national identity. In other words, it seems that the council is going to be a very powerful board which, if it takes its work seriously, will have the ability to brainwash Canadians all across Canada in such a way as to shape our unity and identity. I question whether this is right, Mr. Chairman. One hon. member speaking in the debate yesterday likened the C.B.C. as a means of communication to something not very different from a newspaper. Certainly the corporation is not too different from a newspaper. A government should not become involved in the publication of a daily or weekly newspaper, so why should it become involved in a now established television network or even, for that matter, a radio network?

In 1932 when the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was first set up it was the duty of the government to foster the development of a broadcasting network for Canada. We now have one network established with perhaps more on the way, and I suggest that at this point government should attempt to phase itself out of the operations of the C.B.C. Certainly, parliament should phase itself out of controlling the C.B.C. or we should put the corporation up for sale and let someone else run it. Some body similar to the Board of Broadcast Governors must impose regulations to control broadcasting.

The Minister of Finance has said that we are in a difficult financial position and that certain cuts must be made here and there. Not long ago the Prime Minister said that all the money which might have been available for housing had been completely absorbed by other expenditures. The Minister of National Revenue has cut agricultural payments to farmers because there is a shortage of money. Yet under this bill another large governing council is to be set up. In her opening remarks when introducing the bill the minister said that this council would need to employ more civil servants than any similar body has ever employed before. Instead of cutting down on the number of new employees the minister, through this bill, is seeking to increase their number.

Canadians are asking that government be simplified and that costs of government be reduced. Statistics show that one of every eight Canadians works for government at some level. In effect, our society has become so complicated that out of every eight people one controls the other seven. We should attempt to simplify our society and cut government expenditures instead of increasing them. The Minister of National Revenue said that the government will make a concerted effort to limit the growth of the civil service. Yet the Secretary of State under this bill is seeking to employ an ever-increasing number of civil servants.

Parliament must control this giant, the C.B.C. The minister quite obviously has found it almost impossible to control the giant. The bill says that the C.B.C. is to have a five year capital budget and that the minister will review the budget from time to time. That budget will only come before the house, for members of parliament to scrutinize, every five years.

Clause 2 of part I of the bill suggests that the council shall be called on to determine what programs are in good or bad taste. I sat on the broadcasting committees some years ago and we studied the question of broadcasting. What tests is one to apply to taste? Who can judge what is in good taste and what is not? If this is a free society, as I hope it is, then economics must be the judge. As the hon. member for Kindersley said yesterday, surely no one would buy a film like "Waiting For Caroline", broadcast it across Canada and expect to make money on it. The corporation spent $319,000 making that film, and the Minister of Finance has increased taxes by 5 per cent. How can one reconcile the 5 per cent tax increase with the expenditure of $319,000 to produce one film? I have not seen it but I have heard that it was completely and utterly in poor taste.

Mr. Dinsdale: Indecent.

An hon. Member: I liked it.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Someone says he liked it. Bully for him. I can tell him that many Canadians did not. For another program, "The Ernie Game", the corporation spent $320,000. Yet the government says that it has no money for housing or for agricultural payments to farmers. No voting taxpayer will believe the Minister of National Revenue when he says that the government is going to limit the growth of the civil service in face of the fact that this bill will increase its size. Certainly any voting taxpayer who hears, on the one hand, that he must pay 5 per cent extra in taxes and, on the other, that the corporation spent $319,000 in making "Waiting For Caroline", will tear his hair out.

Though certain films that are produced for "Festival" may be very good, I do not think the government should be involved with them. I do not think we should compete with Hollywood. The government has tried to promote a private film industry in Canada—

Mr. Dinsdale: It has not been set up yet.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I know that, but I do not think that we should compete with Hollywood. We should not use taxpayers' dollars for a risky enterprise like the film business. Nor should we compete with Hollywood. Certainly the government must enact broadcasting legislation, but I think that the government should get out of broadcasting. If the C.B.C. is a going concern we should put it up for sale. Let someone buy this Canadian corporation about which everyone is talking. I do not care who buys it. I do care about the taxpayers and the way their money is spent. The government should not be involved in a risky, gambling type of enterprise such as the film business. As I said, we should not compete with Hollywood and the government should not attempt to brainwash the public.

The purpose of this legislation, we are told, is to safeguard, enrich and strengthen Canada. How can you safeguard, enrich and strengthen Canada without brainwashing people? It cannot be done otherwise. We are also told that those with conflicting views will be allowed to express those views on C.B.C. networks. Sometimes, I have the impression that only one side of a picture has been presented on certain programs. The other side has been ignored. Both sides of an argument ought to be fairly presented.

The bill is to contribute to the development of national unity. How can any piece of legislation or any council that is set up contribute to the development of national unity? How is that possible without somebody trying to brainwash the people? That just does not make sense. Since we live in a free society, and I think we do, when a private entrepreneur is given the right to use the airwaves his right ought to be regulated by the government. That is only fair since in some instances he is being allowed a monopoly use of certain airwaves. As I say, we should not be in the broadcasting business because it is risky and requires a great deal of capital.

The setting up of a council will remove the corporation even farther from parliamentary control. The cry in parliament for many years has been that nobody has any control over the corporation. Yet this bill will remove it still farther from control by the people's representatives. The provision for capital expenditure to be on a five-year basis is another feature which will lead to the further weakening of control. All we can hope for is that those appointed to the council will be fair-minded men who will remain so forever and a day, because this is our only hope that any solution will come out of this legislation at all.

The bill provides every escape route feasible for C.B.C. management as a way out should any complaints reach them. The minister told us that the corporation would be answerable to the council and that complaints directed to the council will be brought to the attention of the C.B.C. in accordance with the objectives set out for the corporation in the bill. In that regard the corporation is required to promote, somehow or other, a sense of Canadian identity. In doing so, of course, it has to project conflicting views. So we are giving the corporation in effect a blank cheque covering anything they may wish to disseminate.

This giant has grown so big that instead of trying to limit its size we are washing our hands of it and handing it over to someone else to run. In my opinion we are going about handling this mammoth giant, which each year is gobbling up more money and creating disharmony rather than unity in Canada, in the wrong way. It will continue to do so after this legislation is passed.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, before the vote on my amendment could I ask the minister who brought in the measure if she could tell us, still in accordance with my amendment, who are the owners or the shareholders of the Quebec private television stations belonging to that same company? Could the minister provide an answer in this connection?

[English]

Miss LaMarsh: On May 4, 1966, there was tabled in the house pursuant to an order details of the ownership of private broadcasting stations including CFCM-TV, Quebec city.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, could we know when it was tabled in the house and could the minister send me a copy?

[English]

Miss LaMarsh: As I say, it was tabled on May 4, 1966.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Could we have a copy, Mr. Chairman?

[English]

Miss LaMarsh: I will be happy to send my copy to the hon. member.

Mr. Cowan: In rising this afternoon to speak on this proposed broadcasting bill I can tell you, Mr. Chairman and members of the House of Commons, that I do so with a heavy heart. I consider myself a Liberal. Some people call me a Liberal of the Liberals. I have been working on behalf of Liberal policies and Liberal positions for over 40 years and I did not play an inactive part in the editorial stand taken by the Toronto Star on many matters.

I am one of the privileged men of this country in that I was able to enjoy a close association with the late Joseph E. Dickinson, publisher and editor of the Toronto Star to the date of his death in 1948, and if there is anyone in this house who wishes to question the Liberal antecedents of the Toronto Star I am here to answer him.

It is true that the Toronto Star took a stand with regard to Liberal policy in 1917 and that the Star proved to be right, even if it did support a unionist government. It was Liberal in its viewpoint, Liberal in its stand. The Toronto Star broke with declared Liberal policy provincially in 1937 during the provincial election and it was never more right than it was in its stand at that time. I happened to be in Oshawa when the late Mr. Hepburn, so-called Liberal prime minister of Ontario, declared he intended to devote the rest of his life to keeping the Congress of Industrial Organizations out of Canada. The Toronto Star broke with Mr. Hepburn over that question and I could not have agreed with that stand more.

I have taken part in every election campaign provincially since 1919 when I scrutineered for the late George A. Gillespie, Liberal candidate for re-election in Peterborough that year. I cast my first Liberal vote in Toronto in the early twenties upon reaching the age of 21. I voted C.C.F. in the days when Hepburn was premier.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I was under the impression that he was leading up to a speech on the broadcasting bill, clause 2 of which is presently before the committee.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I am anxious to find out whether this is Liberal doctrine. In my opinion it is not. There are two features of this bill which I cannot and will not support and I intend to elucidate them, I assure you, before I finish.

I have in my hand Bill C-163. I could not disagree with anything more than I disagree with certain of these clauses. We have clause 2 before us now but I know that at this time we are allowed considerable freedom to discuss the bill generally before we go into it clause by clause and phrase by phrase. I cannot subscribe to clause 47, and I will say so long before we even get to it. I was hoping the country as a whole would make its views known on this aspect of the bill.

Clause 47(2) reads:

> (2) Upon the coming into force of the Act and every fifth year thereafter, the Corporation shall submit to the Minister an operating budget for the next ensuing five financial years of the Corporation for approval by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister and the Treasury Board, and the Minister shall lay before Parliament each such operating budget of the Corporation as approved by the Governor in Council within fifteen days after the approval thereof or, if Parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first fifteen days next thereafter that Parliament is sitting.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I would point out that we are not discussing clause 47. The clause under study is clause 2 of the broadcasting bill.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I believe we are discussing a bill designed to implement a broadcasting policy for Canada and I presume that clause 47 is part of that broadcasting policy for Canada as set out in this bill. If you wish me to drop discussion of clause 47 at this time I will gladly do so and move on to the second feature of this bill which I can never support, namely, the provision for community antennae television regulation by whatever board is set up to govern broadcasting. I disagree 100 per cent with that provision. The bill suggests that broadcasting undertakings in Canada make use of radio frequencies that are public property. Community television systems do not make use of radio frequencies; they involve nothing but receiving sets. Yet they are included in this bill.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Let me return to clause 2 (c) which reads as follows:

(c) all persons licensed to carry on broadcasting undertakings have a responsibility for...the programs they broadcast—

Note these words:

—but the right to freedom of expression... is unquestioned.

Did you ever hear of a more mouth-filling phrase that meant nothing than "the right to freedom of expression is unquestioned"? I ask you, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, what is the use of having the right of freedom of expression if the public has not got the right to listen?

I have here in my hand a XEROX copy of a judgment handed down by the supreme court of British Columbia in a celebrated case regarding the Public Utilities Commission of British Columbia and Victoria Cablevision et al. There were some other cablevision companies involved in this case but Victoria Cablevision Company Limited was the defendant. This particularly interesting case bears on cable television in the province of British Columbia and involves an endeavour to place the cablevision people under the control of the province. The cablevision people took the case to the supreme court of British Columbia where it was ruled that cablevision was within the federal domain rather than provincial jurisdiction. This decision was rendered by the supreme court of British Columbia. The decision rendered there and the opinions of the various justices are worthy of study. There is one part I should like to refer to in particular. It appears at page 722 of Dominion Law Reports. I suppose the lawyers will know what 51 D.L.R. means.

They quoted Viscount Dunedin at pages 85-86 and again quoted His Lordship at pages 87-88 as follows:

Now, a message to be transmitted must have a recipient as well as a transmitter. The message may fall on deaf ears, but at least it falls on ears.

[Mr. Cowan.]

That covers the case in respect of efforts to regulate community antenna television.

I have the annual reports of the Board of Broadcast Governors for the last four years in my hand. In March 1964 the minister of transport—and mark my words, he knew what he was doing—did not have the approval of the house nor the Liberal caucus but decided to ask the Board of Broadcast Governors informally to advise him on C.A.T.V. applications. As I read the reports of the Board of Broadcast Governors it is interesting to note how they cling to the word "informal". They reported "informally" on this and that and they advised "informally" on one thing and another. Surely this is a case of the minister using the back door because he knows the front door is shut. I do not think I can give a better example than the 1967 report in which I find the following two paragraphs at page 14 of that report for the year ended March 31, 1967:

Other Matters of Concern to the Board
C.A.T.V. Applications

Under the policy and procedures announced by the Minister of Transport on July 22, 1964, the board continued to advise the minister on the possible impact of C.A.T.V. applications on existing broadcasting stations or on the provision of alternative service.

In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967, the minister referred 91 C.A.T.V. applications to the board. The number included applications for new licences, extensions of existing systems and changes in the channels carried. The board found that 84 of them, in its judgment, would not make the operation of existing television stations uneconomical or inhibit the provision of alternative service.

That is a very interesting report. Let me point out that there were 91 referrals, on an informal basis, of course, and of the 91 the board found that 84 of them would not affect the economical operation of existing television stations. The report does not say what happened to the other seven applications. This report was received about two months and a half ago and I decided to find out what happened in respect of the other seven applications. It is about two and a half months since that report. The present administration seems determined, even at the expense of the viewing public of Canada, to protect certain stations. I asked the minister to advise me what seven applications were refused. I have been told in reply on many occasions that I will receive this information next week, or shortly, or at some time. I have been told that the department is working on my question and if I wait a week or so I will get an answer.

Because this also involves the Minister of Transport I asked him if he could give me some information. I asked this question during meetings of the committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts. I was assured by another minister that the information was readily available and I would be supplied with it in a couple of days. Two and a half months passed and I still did not have the information. I finally made the comment that I was not particularly anxious to get the information and suggested I would refer to the fact I could not get it when speaking in the House of Commons. The other day I received the letter dated December 13 which was addressed "Dear Ralph" and was signed "Judy". I should like to read this letter because it relates to the freedom of expression. It does not contain any comment about the freedom to hear. It states:

During the hearings of the broadcasting committee on Bill C-163, you asked for detailed information in regard to the seven C.A.T.V. applications turned down by the Board of Broadcast Governors as noted in its last annual report.

I have been in touch with the board on the matter and the information is as follows:

Perhaps I should deal with this paragraph by paragraph, always bearing in mind that we are discussing clause two of Bill C-163. The letter then states:

Two applications—one by David R. Graham of Ottawa and the other by Murray L. Sweigman of Toronto—for the establishment of a new C.A.T.V. system at Pembroke, Ontario, were rejected on grounds they would adversely affect the economic position of the existing T.V. station in that community.

Since when did the government of Canada adopt the attitude that it has to guarantee a profit to a T.V. station in what we are told is a competitive market? I wonder how many members in the house this afternoon recall the tremendous applause we received when we set up the department of consumer affairs which would see that prices go down? I can still hear the phrase to the effect that "the free play of the market place" will knock the prices down because the market is going to reverse itself and we will be living in paradise. The fact of the matter is that as long as monopolies continue the prices on the market place will be exactly those the people want to charge for the products they want to sell.

Why should the cabinet refuse to give licenses for C.A.T.V. stations on the basis that such a station might adversely affect the economic position of a television station in existence, particularly when we are told we are living in a free economy where people can participate in free enterprise? It seems to me that we are moving into a state-controlled democracy, under terms which will require limitation in respect of various private enterprises, particularly C.A.T.V. stations.

However, the interesting thing about Pembroke is the fact that these two applications were turned down on the ground that they would adversely affect the economic position of the existing television station in this community. This letter is dated December 13 and refers to the year ended March 31, 1967. I made inquiries and learned they were rejected on the ground that they would adversely affect the economic position of the existing television station. I should like to advise you, Mr. Chairman, that since March 31 the Department of Transport has granted a C.A.T.V. licence in Pembroke. Well, if they were not going to grant a licence in Pembroke because it would adversely affect the economic position of the existing television station, why have they now granted permission to an applicant to establish a C.A.T.V. system in Pembroke?

The other day I spoke about duplicity. Do I have to repeat myself? I hope my remarks do not need to be repeated but if it is necessary I can repeat them. These licences were not granted because they would adversely affect the economic position of the existing television station, but then I find that an applicant has been given a permit and that the installation work is now 93 per cent completed. This applicant should be able to take signals out of the air and distribute them to the individual homes of his subscribers by March 1. Why could all three applicants not have been granted licences? Why could they not all have been allowed to go in there and let the best man win, somewhat like the situation in Ottawa where there are two stations which are not competitive, or like the situation in Hamilton where there were three stations which were competitive? In Hamilton they certainly let the three of them go to it. If these other applicants want to get into Pembroke, give them the right under the competitive economy in which we are supposed to be living rather than turn them down and then grant a licence to a third applicant. To move on, the next paragraph of this interesting letter, referring to the right of freedom of expression but evidently not to the right of freedom to hear, states that three applications by John Albulet of Ottawa for C.A.T.V. systems at Prescott, Gananoque and Napanee were turned down on the ground that they would inhibit the provision of alternative television service in that general region. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, this is quite interesting. Three applications by John Albulet of Ottawa for C.A.T.V. systems in Prescott, Ganaboque and Napanee were turned down on the ground that they would inhibit the provision of alternative television service in that general region. I made inquiries and found that the people in Gananoque and Napanee pick up the Kingston station which is privately owned.

I do not know how familiar hon. members are with the operation of C.A.T.V. installations, but the point one must bear in mind is that if you are the owner of a television station and have a licence from the government you possess a very valuable franchise. The more viewers you have, the higher the advertising rates you can charge the people who may wish to make use of your television station. But if any influence comes into play which reduces the size of your audience, the advertisers will not willingly pay any rate which you as the owner of the station wish to charge. They will argue with you; they will show you that your audience of viewers is not as big as you claim it is, particularly if there are C.A.T.V. installations in the neighbourhood. I say to you quite frankly, honestly and without fear of contradiction that the television station owners do not want the people in their immediate territory looking at the programs of other stations because when they look at other stations' programs they reduce the size of the audience the local T.V. station operator is seeking to sell to advertisers.

I have mentioned in the house before today the interesting set-up at the lakehead at Port Arthur and Fort William where they have a T.V. station. I believe there are about 24,000 or 25,000 homes at the lakehead and there is one television station. The people at the lakehead are so pleased at the fact that they can look only at the one station that more than half of them, over 13,000 subscribers in Port Arthur, pay $5 a month so they will not have to look only at the Port Arthur station and can have their choice of Duluth-Superior or Marquette in Michigan. When over 13,000 families are willing to pay approximately $5 a month for C.A.T.V. service because there is only one station in the area, what better commentary do you need in respect of whether or not the Canadian station is meeting the desires and wishes of the people of Canada?

[Mr. Cowan.]

The C.A.T.V. applicant was denied licences for Gananoque and Napanee. One can realize that if there were C.A.T.V. franchises in those places the people would be picking up stations such as Watertown, New York. No doubt you have heard over the years that the Americans have a tremendously deteriorating influence on anybody with whom they come in contact and that we must protect ourselves against the terrific influence which the Americans exert on such naïve and innocent people as we pristine, pure Canadians. If it is possible to keep Canadian citizens in Gananoque and Napanee from looking at American stations—only incidentally would they look at the Kingston station, you understand—it should be done because one never knows what ideas they might get. So these applications for C.A.T.V. franchises were denied and, of course, the television station owner in Kingston is quite happy because possibly his audience will be bigger if they have to look at his station without having the choice of stations which the C.A.T.V. system could bring in.

To return to the matter of Prescott, we are told that this application has been denied on the ground that it would inhibit the provision of alternative television service in this general region. That is a good mouth-filling phrase; it almost equals the right of freedom of expression—period. It was turned down on the ground that it would inhibit the provision of alternative television service in this general region—Prescott, Gananoque and Napanee. I telephoned Prescott and spoke to a very knowledgeable man there. He informed me that in Prescott the people are able to bring in on their sets the independent station here in Ottawa and are also able to receive Kingston. He said that because Cornwall is a relay set-up from the privately owned station in Ottawa they do not bring in Cornwall but bring in the French station out of Ottawa, the privately owned station out of Ottawa and the Kingston privately owned station. They do not get the C.B.C. very clearly in Prescott. But he says they spend all their time watching Watertown.

The C.A.T.V. applicant wanted to bring in all the Canadian stations I have mentioned with a clearer picture and of course pick up some United States stations as well. However, it was pointed out that this would inhibit the provision of alternative television service in that general region. You probably know that the television licensee in Cornwall fell on hard times and instead of continuing to operate an independent station sold out to Ottawa interests and the Cornwall station is now a relay station out of Ottawa. If Cornwall, a great big bustling community on the seaway, cannot support an independently owned station, imagine how Prescott could support an alternative television service in that general region encompassing Gananoque and Napanee.

The report of the Commons broadcasting committee is interesting. I shall pay my respects to that tremendous organization in the course of the debate on the broadcasting bill if I am advised under which clause I shall be able to discuss the broadcasting committee. The report of the broadcasting committee states that it is their opinion that wherever there is a C.B.C. station the second station to be erected should be an independently owned station or that if there is an independently owned station the second station must be a C.B.C. station. In Kingston, Ontario, there is a privately owned station. I wish to quote from the minutes of the standing committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts for the meeting of November 16. Before the committee appeared the Secretary of State on page 55 of the minutes we find the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond saying the following:

● (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Wahn is bringing up two points. One has to do with programming and he is concerned that the same type of programs are on both networks at the same time. Then the other point is the extension of the network and the white paper and the broadcasting committee both clearly stated that:

"The committee concurs with the statement on structure appearing in the white paper, particularly with reference to extending coverage to all Canadians and to full network services in both official languages. We recommend further that, wherever practical, in areas now receiving only one Canadian service, if the service is through a private outlet, the alternative should be provided by C.B.C. If C.B.C. is now the sole service, the second service should be private. Where there are serious obstacles to such parallel development, however, these should not prohibit the extension of alternate service by other means, at least on a temporary basis. We urge that the introduction of dual service proceed as rapidly as C.B.C. finances and local market conditions permit."

If I remember correctly, the C.A.B. also agreed with that, too, so it did envisage that in every area in Canada where there are to be two stations, one would be C.B.C. and one would be private.

This means that because there is a privately owned station in Kingston at the present time, any second station that is granted a franchise there will be C.B.C. Why do we worry about protecting the provision of alternate television service in the Kingston area? Since when did the C.B.C. ever start to worry about money? They simply say: Send us some more over, we are short today, and over it comes. What are we protecting in the Kingston area? The television station will be a C.B.C. one, according to the white paper and the report of the committee of the house if it is adopted.

So in the Kingston area applications for C.A.T.V. service in Prescott, Gananoque and Napanee are being turned down in order to protect a C.B.C. station that may be erected there in the future and which does not need financial protection, because the way money is spent by the C.B.C. they would not know what to do with the limited funds available to them from private sources if they were privately owned.

I move on to another refusal. This is in the same letter:

The board turned down an application by Mr. Claude Lemieux, of Baie St-Paul, Quebec, for a system at Clermont, on grounds it would adversely affect the existing T.V. station there.

Once again we have the cabinet stepping into the breach. Here is a privately owned station. They say the television audience is not to look at any station other than the one they have. It took a considerable number of phone calls to find out what existing T.V. station was being protected. I thought for a while that they were the privately owned stations in Quebec city, but I have in my hand a map of Clermont and found after some research that the station that was objecting to the C.A.T.V. in Clermont is at Rivière-du-Loup and is privately owned. Clermont is 85 miles from Quebec city and only about 40 miles across the St. Lawrence river from Rivière-du-Loup.

When the application came forward from Mr. Claude Lemieux of Baie St-Paul in the year ended March 31, 1967, the owners of the T.V. station in Rivière-du-Loup, having learned that all owners of T.V. stations oppose all applications for C.A.T.V. licences—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman again but this time I must advise him that the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Lapointe.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I had this information from the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) about those two private television stations in Quebec city, namely, CFCM-TV on channel 4 and CKMI-TV on channel 5, both of which are owned by Télévision de Québec (Canada) Limitée, and my remarks are in connection with clause 2(b), which states that:

(b) the Canadian broadcasting system should be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians so as to preserve, enrich and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada;

The previous law similarly provided that majority ownership of radio and television stations in Canada be held by Canadians. Now, majority ownership of the two Quebec city stations I have referred to is not held by Canadian residents; this is why they operate under an order in council dating from 1965; in fact, although majority ownership of those stations is held by foreign interests, they operate in Canada nevertheless, under an order in council which protects their majority shareholders and empowers them to do so.

The minister sent me the list of the directors, where interesting things are to be found concerning what is happening in the field of television in Quebec.

The president of the Quebec city TV station, Télévision-Québec-Canada Ltée, which controls and owns both Quebec stations, is Mr. Gaston Pratte, president and director, who holds one common share on the 10,000 existing shares. Those are voting shares and the president holds only one. The vice-president is Mr. J. J. Fitzgibbons, also a director and holder of one single share out of 10,000. The treasurer is a Mr. R. W. Boldstad. I do not know where he comes from, no address is mentioned, but he is also holder of one single share, as treasurer and director. The secretary, Mr. Henri Lepage, from Quebec city, is also a director and holder of one single share of the 10,000. So it all means that the president, the vice-president, the treasurer and the secretary each own one single share out of 10,000. The controller, Mr. Lapointe, is not a director and has no shares. There are three other directors, and I will return to the general manager later. The three other directors also only hold one share each; they are Mr. Angus McCunn, Mr. Hervé Baribeau, also from the Quebec region, and Mr. E. E. Fitzgibbons—who, I believe, is the son of the vice-president and also comes from Toronto. The general manager, however, Mr. Jean A. Pouliot, holds 500 shares. This means that there are seven who only have one share each and one who has 500 of the 10,000 shares.

[The Assistant Deputy Chairman.]

The other shareholders are: CHRC Ltd, 1999 shares; CKCV-Quebec Ltd, 1998 shares; A. C. Picard, deceased, 10 shares; the Mont Saint-Jean Investments Inc., 490 shares. I do not know where this corporation is nor where it comes from. Finally, there is the Famous Players Canadian Corporation Ltd, which holds 4996 shares, or 50 per cent of all the shares. What is this Famous Players Canadian Corporation Ltd?

The capital stock of the Famous Players Canadian Corporation Limited consists of 1,737,072 shares, of which 900,390, that is 51.834 per cent are controlled by United States and owned by American residents.

And, Mr. Chairman, even if these 51 per cent of the shares—it is more than that, it is 51.8 per cent—are controlled by American citizens, we call that the Famous Players Canadian Corporation Limited.

And there, it is well said: Télévision de Québec (Canada) Limitée, that is Canadian; it is Famous Players Canadian Corporation Limited. But, we forget to say that 51.8 per cent of the shares of Famous Players Canadian Corporation Limited are owned by American residents. There are also 803 shares owned by Britishers, 4,175 shares held by citizens of others countries and 831,704 held in Canada. This means that Canadians control 47.8 per cent of the shares of the Famous Players Canadian Corporation Limited, the remaining 52.2 per cent being controlled by foreigners. And this is called Canadian ownership.

The wording of the act is as follows:

It is hereby declared—

I am referring to clause 2 (b),

—that the Canadian broadcasting system should be effectively owned and controlled—

It does not say indirectly or in any other manner, but effectively. It is a very specific terms: "should be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians."

But this is not the case of our two television stations in Quebec city. The previous act stipulated the same thing: "that the Canadian broadcasting system should be controlled by Canadians." But such was not the chase. This is what is irregular. The cabinet comes in later on, and the ministers pass an order in council. The one I referred to earlier was passed in 1965, and allowed a television station to be owned by foreign residents.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, I know the minister has good intentions but in the past good intentions were not respected. We, in Quebec, would like to see and end to Americans ingrafting their ideas into our heads. We would like our two t.v. stations in Quebec city, the only two—if others are requested, the reply is "There are enough t.v. stations —to become the property of Quebec citizens. The minister must agree with me that the request is legitimate since paragraph (a) of clause 2 reads as follows:

It is hereby declared that

(a) broadcasting undertakings in Canada make use of radio frequencies that are public property and such undertakings constitute a single system, herein referred to as the Canadian broadcasting system, comprising public and private elements;

Mr. Chairman, it is said that the Canadian broadcasting system uses frequencies that are in the public domain, in short that a licence is required to operate a television station.

Three or four years ago, Mr. Jacques Laroche, of Quebec, owner of radio station CJLR, applied for a license for a television station in Quebec. He was refused, because he already had three. It seems that they are limited, and if no more can be given in Quebec, I would ask the minister at least to enable Quebecers to regain control of the two Quebec television stations instead of leaving them in the hands of American citizens.

I see that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) is now in the house. He is a resident of the province of Quebec, a citizen of Quebec who should also be concerned with the problems I am bringing up. I see him speaking with a neighbour, yet this is a Quebec problem with which the minister should be concerned. He should see to it that changes are made and that Quebecers become owners of their television stations.

I ask the minister to believe that there are many people in the province of Quebec who ask nothing better than to buy shares in one of the Quebec television stations, since they are probably among the stations which make the most money in Canada. Both the French and the English stations belong to the same company. They make a great deal of money. In fact, since they have no competition, the administrators raise the rates as they wish, and the people of Quebec would like to invest money in this concern.

Therefore, the amendment I introduced did not ask for very much. I simply asked instead of the words:

—the Canadian broadcasting system should be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians—

I should like the word "should" to be replaced by the word "shall", so that the clause would read rather this way:

—the Canadian broadcasting system shall be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians.

I should like the minister to answer my question and to tell me whether or not she intends to do anything in that respect? Is it her intention to accept the amendment which would include the word "shall" be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians rather than the word "should". I am not asking for much. I simply ask her to change one word which would reflect in the text the good intentions she has shown and which do not appear in it at the present time.

I should like to ask the minister if she intends to accept the amendment and to see to it that the present situation changes so that the ownership of the two private Quebec city television stations be controlled by Quebec and by Canadian citizens. I am convinced that many Quebecers would ask nothing better than to have an interest in their own television stations. Is the minister ready to accept that amendment and to change the words in the text?

[English]

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I doubt that this is the appropriate time to make any comments on this matter. I know that a number of general suggestions have been made. The other day my hon. friend suggested an amendment. We have not been debating that amendment, but general speeches have been made with respect to clause 2.

I should say to my hon. friend that I feel I will not be able to support his amendment when the appropriate time comes by virtue of the fact that this is a declaratory clause and we have tried to use appropriate language throughout. The matter has been discussed at some length during the meetings of the broadcasting committee, and I should like to refer my hon. friend to those discussions.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, during the committee discussion, I raised the matter, and the minister told me then that she did not object to T.V. stations being controlled by Canadians, as it is in fact printed here. But the big problem is that this is not the present situation, and she should change it.

Now, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand), could perhaps, as a fellow Quebecker, support my suggestion to that effect. The minister could perhaps second my proposal that the Quebec city television stations become truly owned by Quebeckers. He does not appear very interested, perhaps because he is too engrossed in his conversation, but I am asking him if he would perhaps second my proposal to give effective control of T.V. stations in Quebec city to Canadian citizens, perhaps even Quebeckers.

A minute ago, I named the actual owners of those two private stations; indeed, they are Americans, and they have majority control of the voting shares. I fail to understand why such control is left in the hands of American citizens, especially when clause 2(b) states that:

—the Canadian broadcasting system should be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians—

Now, the amendment I suggest is as follows: the term "should" would be removed and replaced by the term "shall". At this time, there are two private stations in Quebec city, and they are the ones I am concerned with—and they should also be the concern of the minister of manpower, since he is a Quebecker—because their majority ownership is held by two American residents who make the decisions about station policy.

I do not think it is decent when it comes to the point where Famous Players Canadian Corporation Limited, of which 51.8 per cent of the shares belong to American residents, decides of the programmation for us.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Then I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration whether he would support my amendment to replace the word "should" by the word "must" so that the Canadian broadcasting system is effectively owned and controlled by Canadians. Would the minister of manpower be ready to support my request for that?

I put the question to the minister of manpower: Would he be ready to second the amendment I now move?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I am among those who favour Canadian control of all undertakings and I would surely like to have television stations as well as any other undertaking under the control of Canadian citizens. But I do not believe the way to achieve this is by an amendment to the clause, as the member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) has suggested. There are much more effective and democratic ways of proceeding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grégoire: If the minister of manpower permits, I should like to point out to him that it would not be creating a precedent and I should like to remind him of a case which occurred here in this house less than a year ago during consideration of the Bank Act.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) moved an amendment to the Bank Act providing that any chartered bank wishing to operate in Canada shall be owned—there was then no question of "should", the word he used was "shall"—be owned to the extent of 75 per cent of the voting shares, by Canadian residents and citizens. This is a precedent that was adopted here and for which the minister himself voted. I also voted for this amendment which was agreed to and which set the precedent.

At the present time, in the field of television in Quebec city—perhaps the minister is not aware of it—there are quite a number of people who ask nothing better than to buy shares in those television stations because they are probably the most profitable in Canada. There are two private stations in Quebec city and they both belong to the same company, namely the Télévision de Québec (Canada) Limitée, which is controlled by Americans. They are probably the most profitable television stations because they have no competitors.

Two or three years ago—I repeat it because the minister was busy earlier—a Mr. Jacques Laroche applied for a license to operate a television station in Quebec city. His application was turned down and he was told: There are two already, that is enough.

Mr. Marchand: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. It was not refused on those grounds but rather because C.B.C. had also made an application and, at the time the hon. member for Lapointe was not there, but with a great many Quebec citizens I fought so that the license be granted to C.B.C. and not to private enterprise.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I was there. I also fought so that the license would be granted to C.B.C. but I carried on another fight. I went further and I said: you already have two stations, let C.B.C. take over one and let the other in the hands of private enterprise.

At the time, I also pleaded the cause of C.B.C. but I added that both private stations which were owned by Americans should belong to Quebec residents and this is my suggestion: Since both private stations do not operate according to the legislation, let them be taken over by C.B.C. and if there is a license left over, let private enterprise have it. Under such circumstances, C.B.C. would have taken over both, a French station and an English station.

This is what I suggested at that time when I testified before the B.B.G. I wonder if the minister was a member of the house at that time?

Mr. Marchand: No.

Mr. Grégoire: No? Well, I testified before the B.B.G. and suggested that the two private stations which were not at that time operating according to the provisions of the law should be nationalized by the C.B.C., precisely because they were not operating according to the law, so that the C.B.C. would have had both the French and the English networks. And if that left an opening, let it be filled at least by Quebec citizens, and Mr. Jacques Laroche was one of those who had made an application. This means, Mr. Chairman—and this is what I wanted to point out to the minister—that some Quebec citizens are interested in television at present. I am not referring to Mr. Laroche specifically, because this could be an open competition. Let the station sell its shares on the open market, but to Quebec residents, so that no foreigner could control anything as vital to the life of the people. For instance, a television or radio station is not like a paper. A paper can be started by anybody, unlike a television station. If the minister of manpower, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) or I, for instance, applied for a license to operate a television station in Quebec city, and we were told that there were already enough, we must not prejudice the interests of existing stations, licenses must not be granted to just anyone, I would understand that. Since there is a limit, since there is control, since licenses are not granted to just anybody, there is all the more reason not to grant them to foreigners. On the other hand they must be granted to Canadians when they are willing to buy them, and that is the case now. There are Quebeckers who are willing to buy shares in the Quebec city television station so that it might become a Quebec or Canadian station. These two arguments should change the mind of the minister of manpower.

First, the Minister of Finance set a precedent over a year ago by proceeding in similar fashion with regard to the Bank Act.

Secondly, I can tell him that there are Quebeckers who would be most willing to buy shares in those t.v. stations. I feel my argument about frequencies is important. If they are to be hard to get, they should at least be given to those Canadians who want them, and if they do not want them, we can always give them to foreigners. But there are Quebeckers who do want them.

So, I wonder if those three arguments do not induce the minister to change his mind, and if he would not be ready to support my amendment or to change one word in that clause.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, if I may, a few months ago, the cabinet formed a task force which should submit shortly a comprehensive report on the impact of the United States economy on the Canadian economy, and on the effect and impact of American investments in Canada.

At the time this report will be studied, I think we might perhaps be able to develop a comprehensive philosophy or policy in respect to American ownership or investments here in Canada, and to my mind, an accidental side approach to the problem, through some legislation, as was suggested by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) is not actually sound and could lead to extremely serious prejudicial effects.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out to the minister that the question here is not an economic one—

The Deputy Chairman: I recognize the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Grégoire: Do I have leave from the Chair to reply to the minister? I only want to point out that the question here is not, by any means, to determine what impact the American economy may have on our Canadian economy.

It is rather a law to check, as the bill says, the influence of the American way of thinking, of the American mentality, in the field of the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada. That is especially what was used, namely the cultural and social fabric, because forcing, for instance, the Americans to sell say fifteen or twenty per cent of their shares in the Quebec city station, that does not constitute an invasion in the economic field, but that provides, for instance, protection in the cultural and social field. This aspect is much more important than the other, for us, because even if we ask the Americans to sell fifteen or twenty-five per cent of their shares to Quebeckers, that does not represent a fortune. That is not what costs a fortune and that is not the field of investment I am considering here.

I should like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to see things from my angle and not to think only of investments. There is something more important, more vital in that and it is the cultural and social field. The legislation says—I am not saying it—effectively controlled by Canadians. I do not want to replace the word "Canadian" by the word "Quebecker"; I leave the word "Canadian" as opposed to "American", for instance. I say that it is much more important to consider the cultural and social point of view rather than the economic point of view as far as a television station is concerned. I think the minister will admit that I am right on that point.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, if I may answer the hon. member immediately, I will say to him that the legislation governing private stations contains means of control. If there are abuses, the Board of Broadcast Governors can suspend the licence of a station, and I do not think there is any danger of an invasion by American culture through channel 4 in Quebec city. If that channel, which the hon. member looks at and which is as Canadian as any other station is guilty of abuses, the Board of Broadcast Governors has the means to take action to remedy the situation.

However, I know that some Quebeckers would be interested in making profits, in having that station under their control, but I do not think that it is the responsibility of the government to decide which member of the company is going to make profits.

Mr. Grégoire: Is it about the same thing?

Mr. Choquette: I could perhaps point out to the hon. member that I am not convinced that when channel 4 was opened in Quebec city, the Quebec interests were entirely willing to invest in a television station. I am not convinced that Quebec city would have had its television station especially without the financial support which did not essentially originate from Quebec. I think that we would then have been deprived of the benefits of a television station which has rendered great services to the Quebec population. I am fully endorsing what the hon. minister of Manpower and Immigration has just been saying, that from a social and cultural point of view, Quebec channel 4 is a station extremely representative of Quebec, especially as it rebroadcasts the major part of the programs of channel 10, a station controlled by Mr. De Sève, in Montreal. As the hon. member is from the area of Jonquière, Arvida and Chicoutimi, he does not have, of course, so many opportunities of watching all the programs on channel 4, otherwise he would have noticed that the programs broadcast are typically programs of interest to Quebeckers. Consequently, I do not believe that from a social and cultural point of view, the threat is as great as the hon. minister would lead us to believe.

As for the editorials, I tend to agree with him. They are certainly written from a capitalist point of view. However, private enterprise is essentially capitalist. Whether they concern investments in Quebec or elsewhere, you can be sure that editorials written by a station with Quebec interests would probably, if not certainly, be essentially the same as those heard on channels 4 and 5.

Mr. Chairman, the comments I wanted to make are not exactly related to the objections raised earlier by the hon. member for Lapointe. I wanted to call the attention of the hon. minister (Miss LaMarsh) or her distinguished parliamentary secretary (Mr. Béchard), to paragraph (e) of clause 2, which says:

> —all Canadians are entitled to broadcasting service in English and French as public funds become available;

I think the wording is so vague that we do not know exactly where it leaves us.

Mr. Chairman, I have had occasion before to make representations and, even if I repeat myself, let me insist to the minister that relay stations of the French network be set up throughout Canada, until we can have stations which will originate local programs, in the urban centers where it would be possible to establish them.

The great problem of Canadian solidarity is based precisely on the existence of a sound barrier. In some regions of Canada, French consonances seem as strange as Hebrew or Arab consonances and this gives rise to frustrations and often to deplorable acts of extremism. It would be quite interesting, especially for the younger generation of English speaking Canadians who are unusually open-minded, to recognize more and more that the French fact is valuable for Canada and helps us precisely to distinguish ourseves from Americans and to check growing Americanism.

In school, youngsters are given some notions and rudiments of French and after leaving school, they have no opportunity to improve their knowledge. That is the reason why I should like, with the same emphasis, ask the hon. minister to act promptly, in order to establish everywhere, in Canada, relay stations of the French network, which would cost very little.

The clause becomes a matter for concern where it says: "as public funds become available".

Mr. Chairman, public funds are available. Just a little inquiry would suffice to reveal the extravagances of the C.B.C. For instance, and without indulging in personalities, when a Quebec interviewer is sent to Paris, on an expense account, to interview a French personality, while the C.B.C. representative in Paris is asked to cross the ocean to come to Canada and interview a Canadian personality, I say that is the type of abuse you find in the C.B.C. and which explains that funds are not available.

Mr. Prud'homme: Would the hon. member allow me to ask him a question? Could he tell us the name of the person sent to Europe to interview a famous Frenchman when we already had one interviewer in Europe?

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman, I have already mentioned his name once. Mr. Lévesque was asked to go to Paris to interview Mr. Pompidou, although one of our most brilliant radio and television interviewers was already there at that time. The hon. member for Lapointe was in Paris recently, where he met Pierre Nadeau, one of our most brilliant announcers and most dynamic commentators. He is the Paris correspondent. However, the C.B.C. paid René Lévesque to go to Paris in order to interview Mr. Pompidou. That was a considerable and unjustified expenditure.

That is why there is no money to build relay stations in order to promote the French language in Canada. The only way to solve the problem of Canadian solidarity is to make the French fact a part of the Canadian heritage. If the French fact is not a Canadian heritage, it is because in certain areas of the country, due to the weaknesses I pointed out, due to the absence of relay station which would enable the diffusion and the propagation of the French language in the country, there are areas of the country where French is just as foreign as Hebrew, Arab or Japanese. That is the major obstacle to Canadian solidarity. So, I appeal most urgently to the minister, so that relay stations may be built. It would cost less than the Laurendeau-Dunton commission and would also allow French to spread throughout the country without extravagant expenditure such as were noted at the C.B.C.

That is the suggestion I humbly make to the minister.

[English]

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief. I have been occupied with other matters and not able to listen to much of the debate this afternoon. However, regardless of the differences of opinion I think it is quite correct to say that the C.B.C. is an institution which, generally speaking, Canadians are proud of, even though it has made its mistakes and blunders.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that some hon. members brought to the attention of the minister certain matters that should be given consideration when everything is running smoothly again. I wish to bring to the minister's attention the fact that there have been numerous complaints from the Rossland and Trail area about timing of programs. Programs are received from Calgary instead of from Vancouver, and this causes certain inconvenience. Some interesting programs are not even received at all.

There have been numerous complaints from organizations and individuals in this regard, Mr. Chairman. I know Dr. Caple from Vancouver has visited the district, but apparently there is a technical problem which has not yet been solved. I urge that the C.B.C. do everything possible in the future to make certain that in the Kootenays, particularly in west Kootenay, programs are received from Vancouver for the same length of time as they are being transmitted over the station in Vancouver.

I have also had complaints from various organizations and persons with respect to the content of programs. This is to be expected and people should have a right to express their preferences, and so on. I hope that more consideration will be given to the reaction of ordinary people to the content of certain programs with which at the present time they express a great deal of dissatisfaction.

I also hope that the C.B.C. will make certain that all of the Kootenay lake area is serviced by the C.B.C., even the smaller communities. I realize this is not an easy job in mountainous country, but I hope that areas such as the Slocan lake area, to which Canadian stations are not available at the present time, will be served in future by some form of satellite. People in certain areas around Salmo receive programs from the United States, but they would like to receive Canadian programs through some form of satellite such as that now provided for radio programs by certain co-operative societies in my constituency.

I should like briefly to give my opinion of C.B.C. management. In the first instance, I think the C.B.C. needs an administrator with sound business ability and the opportunity, through civil service experience or experience in other positions, to understand how to administer large corporations such as this, and to do so efficiently within the budget permitted. He should be an administrator with a wide knowledge of Canadian life and conditions, as a result of prior experience in the service of the people of this country. I noticed in the paper recently that Dr. Davidson's name was mentioned. I guarantee that if he is appointed to this position he will turn out to be a very sound administrator. He has had some experience and knowledge of business administration, and that is very necessary in an organization of this type.

I think that the second person to be appointed, or his co-partner, should be a creative person who is able to communicate with those who are engaged in the creative work. He should be able to communicate with employees almost from day to day in order that he might acquire a close knowledge of programs being undertaken, of artists working on those programs and of all the interrelationships, shall I say, that come into play between the creative end and business management. I think he should have knowledge of Canadian habits, tastes and preferences with respect to television.

In this matter I think the public response ought to be sampled and consideration given to those persons who pay for broadcasting services throughout the country. Now that can be done more efficiently than in the past. I must say that though I have received complaints regarding the lack of C.B.C. television service in certain areas, I have had far fewer complaints from organizations and individuals about program content. The greater part of program content is very acceptable to most people I have talked to. Some persons take exception to this, and some to that. I suppose that that must be expected but, on the question of selecting the person I am speaking of, that question ought to receive consideration by management and by those who organize the production, ultimately, of C.B.C. programs.

I wish to mention another matter. We had one or two co-operative television stations which invested from $10,000 to $15,000 in order to receive broadcasts from United States stations. The area in which those stations are is to be serviced in a few days by the C.B.C., and the people are very pleased about that. The people are also interested to know if they will be able to continue with their co-operative television stations which were erected to meet certain conditions some years ago, and to enable them to receive broadcasts from United States stations. I understand that this matter is for the Board of Broadcast Governors and for the Department of Transport to decide.

Before I sit down, I wonder if the minister would tell the house how many letters and telegrams she has received from people in various parts of Canada who, in general, or to some extent supported her contention with respect to the management of the C.B.C.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I think there were several hundred in support of the C.B.C.

Mr. Stafford: Mr. Chairman, television and radio can only be measured by what comes out of the receiver and into our homes. It is the program which influences, gives us ideas and educates us one way or another. It is the program, also, which provides us with facts and material to help us to make up our minds on public issues and on the role the government must play. I am referring of course to news broadcasts, and especially to public affairs programs.

I am concerned about this bill, as we must ensure that this powerful medium of broadcasting is placed in the hands of sound men. They must be provided with sound policy guide lines.

I note that clause 2(c) of Bill C-163 reads:

(c) all persons licensed to carry on broadcasting undertakings have a responsibility for the public effects of the programs they broadcast but the right to freedom of expression, subject only to generally applicable statutes and regulations, is unquestioned;

I also note that clause 39(1), which we shall be discussing later, reads:

The corporation is established for the purpose of providing the national broadcasting service contemplated by section 2 of this act,—

And so on. Here the bill stipulates clearly that clause 2 applies not only to all licensed broadcasters but to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as well.

Here we are dealing with a matter of accountability: Who shall be held accountable for the programs which come out of the television tube or the radio receiver? The bill is quite clear—as it needs to be, and it is vital that no one misunderstands its meaning—that persons who are licensed, and the management of the C.B.C., are to be held accountable. I raise this point because of my experiences during the past two years on the broadcasting committee as well as a result of my own researches.

Those of us on the broadcasting committee last year saw a bitter war raging within the C.B.C. between the producers of "This Hour has Seven Days" and some of their immediate superiors, and the management of the corporation. A small but determined group of producers made a bare faced attempt to destroy the corporation's top management, because top management had had the temerity to suggest that, in the face of public demand and demands made in this house to end serious breaches of good taste and the flagrant slanting of programs, a slanting which was against the best interests of the country, the program be toned down.

Not content with trying to unseat those in authority, these people at public expense instituted a telephone campaign from a hotel room opposite the C.B.C. offices in Toronto, to try to stir up protests on their behalf. One may read the details in the committee's reports. Mr. LaPierre, Mr. Watson and Mr. Leiterman also engaged in speaking engagements and in radio and television performances to build up their campaign against their so-called tormentors in C.B.C. management. Last year, following this extraordinary performance, I wrote in Canada Month:

Only forty people worked on the staff of '7 Days' —8,500 are employed at C.B.C. Yet the producers and performers of this relatively small group were able to resist and test the strength of the entire C.B.C. management while attempting to force the Canadian government and parliament to act on its behalf. Their strength was multiplied dangerously through the astonishing power of T.V. and by a carefully manipulated campaign in the press and on Parliament Hill. Seldom have Canadians seen such an occurrence that so occupied the country's attention and so scarred the image of the massive C.B.C. operation.

Unfortunately, press, radio and television supported the producers at first, but management of C.B.C. was given its right to manage and Mr. Leiterman, Mr. Watson and Mr. LaPierre left for politics and other fields. I note that Maclean's magazine pictured Laurier LaPierre on a recent cover as Canada's first socialist prime minister. May I ask this question: Did Mr. LaPierre's left wing politics start immediately after he left the C.B.C. or were Canadians who watched his program treated to a barrage of his thinking and ideas and the special ideas that his friends had? That program was supposed to be an objective but startling look at the world today. I think you know the answer, and I shall provide some specific evidence when we deal with the clauses of the bill.

A meeting of the broadcasting committee was held on June 27, 1966. Only twice had there been a larger attendance. We passed the following paragraph 21, amended to read as follows:

The committee deplores the manner in which public opinion was injected and drawn into the Seven Days crises by the producers. To prevent such incidents from becoming public issues in the future and to contain them within the C.B.C., it is imperative that a grievance procedure be set up in all centres of production. Grievances could thus be dealt with promptly and equitably, thereby preventing the dispute from becoming a matter of public controversy.

• (5:10 p.m.)

On only two occasions in 32 previous meetings of the standing committee had there been a better attendance, and this amendment was carried. The vote indicated majority criticism of the producers.

I was most concerned that at the last and much smaller meeting of the committee prior to the presentation of the report, this paragraph was ruled out by this minority, who refused to believe there was anything wrong in the producers' set up. I note that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River got the impression from reading the committee's report that we had exonerated the producers, and that he took exception to our whitewash of the situation. May I assure him that the majority of the committee began to realize that all was not well in the C.B.C., and that the final report did not properly reflect the thinking of the majority.

We must make certain that this bill gives the new management of the C.B.C. a clear mandate to enforce a policy which is also clearly stated in the bill, and that the C.B.C. management, not the producers, are accountable and responsible for what comes out of the T.V. tube or over the air waves. This does not mean, nor should it mean, a continuing war between both sides of broadcasting, but what it does mean is that when management says "do" or "don't", producers "do" or "don't"—or leave the corporation. Of course producers and artists are sensitive people and must be worked with carefully so that their talents are brought to bear on suitable subject matter. But let me remind the producers that the listening audiences of Canada are also sensitive people, and they elect members to parliament to see that in certain respects their wishes are carried out.

Section 2 of the Broadcasting Act states in paragraph (i) that the national broadcasting service should be among other things, a balanced service of information. It is essential that members of this house and the country at large should understand how badly unbalanced a performance we have been given in certain areas of broadcasting. Let me say right away, however, that there has been a noticeable improvement since this fuss was made in parliament. But not enough. The nature of the problems Canada faces in its broadcasting system and the serious nature of these issues can only be evaluated when we understand the power of broadcasting itself.

This power of broadcasting was thus ably described by the British broadcasting committee of 1949 in a report to the British parliament:

> Broadcasting is the most persuasive, and therefore one of the most powerful agents for influencing men's thoughts and action, for giving them a picture, true or false, of their fellows of the world in which they live, for appealing to their intellect, their emotions and their appetites, for filling their minds with beauty or ugliness, ideas or idleness, laughter or care, love or hate.

[M. Stafford.]

Some of these problems are glaringly evident. Some time ago when Tom Gould resigned from the C.B.C. over the breach of good faith in using a story taken from a closed meeting at which the former leader of the opposition spoke, Dennis Braithwaite wrote in the Globe and Mail:

> Ton Gould's resignation in protest may seem a drastic step in the circumstances, but Gould has been dissatisfied with the C.B.C.'s Ottawa news set-up for some months and simply flipped over what he considered to be a final lapse of professionalism. What ails Gould anyhow? What, for that matter, ails Stan Burke and most of the other top commentators in C.B.C. television news?

I have been doing a little study on this matter and I think the writer has put his finger on the point—lack of professionalism in the journalistic area. And where does most of the trouble lie? It lies with our old friends in the public affairs field who try to usurp the news field and give Canadians twisted versions of the facts, or, as the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister stated earlier in this debate, try to influence us through the process of distortion by omission. The news editors, too, share in this criticism. For instance, some recent examples of the anti-American bias of a number of broadcasters is strongly and tragically apparent.

On November 17, 1967, probably as a result of pressure from very top management in C.B.C. and the influence of statements made in this house, television carried the entire news conference of President Johnson of the United States. Let me quote some of the press comment on the president's performance. The Montreal Gazette of November 18 describes him as being "self assured and unusually forceful in his first formal White House meeting with newsmen since August 18." The Ottawa Citizen of the same date commented: "It was like the L.B.J. of old—the master performer, cool, suave, in command." The Ottawa Journal, also of November 18, had this to say:

> The President was exuberant as he told the television press conference over-all progress is being made in the anti-communist war. Many observers regard his dynamic performance as a preview of his 1968 presidential election campaign.

The Globe and Mail of November 18 prints a headline across seven columns on page 1 reading: "The Real Johnson Stands up on T.V. and Draws Raves." The comment was:

> It appeared that Mr. Johnson had at last discovered how to be as effectively persuasive with a mass audience as with a private gathering.

By contrast here are the key words used in describing the president's performance by our C.B.C. Washington correspondents immediately after the broadcast: "At last the attacks are getting to President Johnson", and "he is running scared."

I would call this deliberate anti-Americanism. Anti-Americanism is not a new phenomenon in C.B.C. and on Canadian television. I quote the following from an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on March 3, 1966:

The impression left by some reports—notably by some C.B.C. commentators—of the "great" U.S. debate over Viet Nam has been that President Johnson was a man beleaguered on all sides by dissenters from his policies...

What we have not always had is a proper perspective on these dissenting views. The implication was often left that these men represented widespread attitudes in the U.S. Congress (Senators Morse and Fulbright).

This week's votes—932 to 6 in the Senate and 392 to 4 in the House of Representatives—approving another $4.8 billion to finance more forces in southeast Asia should adjust the perspective.

It is significant that 41 per cent of those interviewed in a nation-wide poll approved the way in which Mr. Johnson is handling his job, a rise from 38 per cent recorded in the Gallup polls of September and October. I say this to hon. members: None of you saw this on C.B.C. from our Washington correspondent, but every time public opinion polls dropped against the president, James Minifie or his friends quickly made Canadians aware of the fact.

Even worse, the strong bias of some of the C.B.C. public affairs crew against the United States position in Viet Nam shows up time and time again. Tom Gould, who recently spent two years in Viet Nam, expressed his views at a faculty dinner speech reported in the Carleton University newspaper of November 17 as follows:

Today's prevalent anti-American feeling is caused by television, Gould said. Cameramen in Viet Nam are only photographing the sensational, even if it is irrelevant to the war effort. He told of one instance where a group of laughing marines were filmed setting fire to so-called South Vietnamese peasants' huts. People sitting back in the States nice and comfortable in their $35,000 homes, naturally think these fellows are savages. "Sure they are laughing" says Gould, "they were alive." A couple of hours later these same marines were almost wiped out—that was a Viet Cong village that they had destroyed. The television commentator neglected to mention this point, he said. With television, film coverage is a necessity; if there is no film clip to go with a story the story just doesn't get told. Gould urged the audience not to rely solely on television for their information on Viet Nam, but to also read newspapers, magazines and books on the subject.

Further on the article reads:

"The number of innocent people being killed by the Viet-Cong is far greater than the number being killed by the Americans", he said.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Later it states:

He also had criticism for the Chester Ronnings and other "self-appointed" Viet Nam experts. He explained, "I used to be intimidated by these people but when I returned from Viet Nam I realized how little they know.

Mr. Brewin: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is he associating himself with these remarks about Chester Ronning, a very distinguished Canadian diplomat?

Mr. Stafford: I am simply reading certain excerpts, and there are thousands, to show the bias and imbalance of these programs. I think this will be self-evident if the hon. member will listen for a moment or two.

I have here another serious area of concern—an area of blatant propaganda. I will read the key parts of the statement made by one Gerry Sperling over C.B.C. "Viewpoint" on November 27, 1967. Let me begin with a quote:

"Our every action is a battle cry against imperialism, and a battle hymn for the people's unity against the great enemy of mankind: the United States of America. Wherever death may surprise us, let it be welcome, provided that other men intone the funeral dirge with the staccato singing of the machine guns and new battle cries of war and victory."

This is the concluding paragraph of Ernesto Che Guevara's last published work, his message to the tri-continental congress. It is clear that Che's attitude towards revolution in Latin America has also been the attitude of the Cuban government...Cuba says—and I must say I agree—that the only way to change this situation is through violent revolution. The entire rotten social structure must be overturned and in its place states must be set up on the Cuban models.

Further on he says:

The Cubans believe, as I have said that these changes can only be brought about by violent revolution. Dedicated guerillas such as Guevarra will be the trailblazers.

And again:

The United States' puny efforts on behalf of social reform through the Alliance for Progress and its hysterical reaction to the possibility of a mildly reformist regime in Santo Domingo has convinced Cuban and other Latin American revolutionaries that no meaningful change can be brought about in Latin America through peaceful democratic means.

Cuba will support revolutionary movements in Latin America morally, materially, and by example.

Then further down it says:

> Fidel Castro has made this abundantly clear in his eulogy to Che: "They are mistaken", said Fidel "when they think that his death is the end of his theses. Che's political and revolutionary thinking will be of permanent value in the Cuban revolutionary process and in the Latin American revolutionary process".
> So says Fidel Castro, and I believe policy will not change because there is no alternative. Once you become committed to radical social change in Latin America, the only course of action open to you is violent revolution.

I note that a question has been raised by the hon. member for Villeneuve addressed to the hon. member for Essex East about the French Canadian students who have been secretly going to Cuba for alleged revolutionary training. We need to know if Cuba considers Quebec to be Latin-American in the same way as this C.B.C. program describes, and is a target for Cuban-style revolution—and we need to be very certain that no help for such an effort comes from the C.B.C. The C.B.C. public affairs programs also rushes to expose Canadians to all those teach-ins which end up giving strong support to anti-Americanism, but you do not see them searching out men to give the other side for balance.

Two years ago we were saturated by C.B.C. public affairs programs, with a vast documentary done by Patrick Watson and his allies on the wondrous advances being made by Red China. I have not noticed the rush of these same producers to give us another vast documentary on the tragic terrorism of the Red Guard which has engulfed China. Why have they not been interviewing the thousands of refugees who have fled the terror of that upside down world into Hong Kong, Formosa and elsewhere? Why have they not sent a camera crew up to the Northern borders of India where almost every week the Chinese army conducts raids into India? And, even more important, why have we not had from Patrick Watson and his friends a full documentary on the rape of Tibet—which still goes on—and which they conveniently left out of their China documentary? Tens of thousands of Tibetans have escaped, and do so daily—and now live next door to starvation in northern India.

Canadians need to know the full truth from the C.B.C. To add further fuel to the fire, let us examine how accurate a picture we are getting on the serious racial problem in the United States. We have been deluged with one-sided views of the American racial issue on the C.B.C. The much advertised one-hour presentation a few weeks ago on American police preparation for riot control was a clear endeavour to create an anti-U.S. atmosphere. Then again, a veritable orgy of hate came over our T.V. screens when on September 24th this year the program "The Way It Is" interviewed extremist negroes.

Why do we never see the other side of the story—the very extensive improvements which have been made in a number of areas in race relations across the border? This year for example, on American television on November 15 came an excellent presentation of a successful desegregation experiment at the elementary school level in Evanston, Illinois. The vast majority of schools in the United States have been integrated. But this great success story is never told to Canadians. Why have we not been told that in western Europe only 8 per cent of all its youth enter university, but 15 per cent of all United States negro youths enter university. And there are many more statistics of this kind. You have heard Rap Brown, Stokely Carmichael and other extremist negro leaders interviewed over C.B.C. Why have we not heard the moderate majority leaders over C.B.C.?

And last but not least, I have a statement by Rev. Garth Hunt, dated Ottawa, December 17, 1967. Rev. Garth Hunt is a Canadian missionary, who has been in South Viet Nam for ten years and was back in Canada for five months prior to his return to South Viet Nam. He knows the country intimately, facilitated by his excellent working knowledge of the Vietnamese language. This devoted Canadian missionary has been travelling across the continent on a speaking engagement since his return, and was interviewed numerous times by commentators on T.V. and radio in different Canadian cities regarding his experience in Viet Nam. I met him in Viet Nam last summer. He has given me this statement:

> The great bulk of the news and information about Viet Nam which I have heard and seen particularly on Canadian radio and T.V. programs since returning to this country, closely approximates the propaganda emanating from North Viet Nam. It is not only misleading, but a great deal of the time is in direct contradiction with the realities I saw and experienced myself during my ten years in South Viet Nam and especially during the past year when I covered more than 10,000 miles of that country examining the situation at close hand.
> Furthermore, many of the news commentators with whom I have appeared on my Canadian trip have, following the broadcast when I have presented the facts from Viet Nam, asked this question—"Why are we not getting this other side of the story from C.B.C. news commentators and commentators"?—I can only come to this conclusion that Canadians are being misled by the news gathering and communications media in only getting one side of the story.

This act must be so clear in its mandate to the management of C.B.C. and the private stations that never again will Canadians be plagued with barefaced distortions and serious omissions over the air waves. If we are to play our part in shaping a workable world, we can only do so if we are given factual, balanced and fair presentations of news, information and viewpoints. Unbalanced presentations also lead to pressures on government that can be dangerous to the democratic system. Freedom is a precious jewel and it is our job to preserve it. This act is an important weapon in the continuing battle.

Mr. Patterson: May I ask the hon. member a question? To his knowledge has this Mr. Garth Hunt been asked to appear on the C.B.C. to present the other side of the story?

Mr. Stafford: I can find that out.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Sherman: Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the contribution which has been made in this debate thus far. I might say that although my hon. friend from Elgin and I sit at almost diametrically opposite ends of the political spectrum there is no contribution to this debate which has been made to date in which I concur more heartily or with which I agree more fully. From time to time I have had the opportunity to discuss the question of C.B.C. news and public affairs coverage with the hon. member from Elgin. This has arisen as a consequence of our mutual interest in the subject and through our good fortune in having had an opportunity to travel to the Far East last spring together.

I wish to say at this point that I do not intend to subject members of this committee to repetition or tedium with regard to many of the points he raised. I think it might suffice if I were to say at this point, and let it go at that, sir, that he has stated what I believe is a very compelling and cogent case and one which should be of extreme concern to all thinking Canadians. It is one which certainly is of great concern to me and I know to many other members of this house on both sides of the Chair.

I have a good many suggestions and interpolations which I intend to inject into the examination of this legislation, as the examination exercise proceeds. When we reach the clause by clause study there are a number of suggestions I should like to make, and one or two amendments which I should like to propose. I appreciate, however, that at the moment we are deliberating in respect of clause 2 and I shall confine my remarks to the general coverage of that umbrella at this stage of the debate. In that regard may I say that I believe my colleague the hon. member for Acadia earlier today made an excellent case for control of C.B.C. programming decisions and decision making. He pointed out serious and in fact critical weaknesses in the proposed legislation. One portion which concerns me to a great extent is paragraph (d) of clause 2 which states that——the programming provided by the Canadian broadcasting system should be varied and comprehensive and should provide reasonable opportunity for the expression of conflicting views on matters of public controversy—

I think that this provision, sir, although philosophically one with which I can agree, is neither clinically nor mathematically strong enough, nor is it clinically or mathematically deserving of the endorsement of this committee in its present form. It pays mere lipservice to an idea. It does not go half far enough in laying down firm guide lines for control in the area of programming decision making, guide lines which I think are demonstrably necessary in C.B.C. broadcasting today as a consequence of the many controversies which have arisen in the past two years where public affairs programming, in particular of the C.B.C., is concerned. I believe the wording of that clause is simply the wording of a hollow pledge.

I should like to see a much more compelling safeguard against the one-sided coverage of controversial issues than that which is provided by the words in that paragraph. Later on in the deliberations I intend to move an amendment which contains wording which will meet my case and my point. The amendment will provide not only that programming by the Canadian broadcasting system be varied and comprehensive, and provide of course an opportunity for the expression of conflicting views on matters of public controversy, but also that responsible and balanced treatment of matters of public controversy should be guaranteed. It is not sufficient to say that we should provide only an opportunity for the expression of conflicting views on matters of public controversy. That opportunity has been provided since the C.B.C. was created, but this has not made any difference in the programming of public affairs by the C.B.C. The fact that a C.B.C. station exists in a given area is sufficient proof of the provision of reasonable opportunity. All one need do is open a C.B.C. station and then it can be argued that a reasonable opportunity for the expression of these conflicting views has been provided. That is not good enough, sir. I think we have had ample demonstration of that, particularly during the last two years.

What we should like to see is a guarantee that conflicting views will be articulated so that issues and problems of public interest will be aired and examined in a balanced, fair, objective and impartial way so that we do not have just one side of a story, such as has been the case in respect of C.B.C. public affairs programming. This is one area therefore where I intend to move an amendment.

Another area which distinctly disturbs me is that covered by paragraph (h) of clause 2 which reads as follows:

> Where any conflict arises between the objectives of the national broadcasting service and the interests of the private element of the Canadian broadcasting system, the objectives of the national broadcasting service must prevail;

I know that my good friend and colleague from the broadcasting industry, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, who has made in this house a number of eloquent contributions to the cause of broadcasting since he entered the house, agrees with me in this regard. Perhaps I should put it the other way and say that I agree with him, because I believe he has carried the torch in the area I am discussing, and in respect of the argument I intend to put in the next few moments. He has already carried the torch, and I endorse his position and argument in support of it. In any event, we are agreed that that specific wording contains great danger and peril where private broadcasters are concerned for the future, sir. We know what the drafters of this legislation intended by that wording. We know that philosophically they are giving expression to a principle which, on one certain superficial level, I believe would find support from the majority of Canadians.

What the drafters of this legislation are trying to say, in the event of a national emergency or in the event that the public good or interest is at stake, is that the conflict shall be resolved in such a way that the objectives of the national broadcasting system shall take precedence over the interests of the private element of the Canadian broadcasting system. But, that is not what the paragraph says, although it may be what it means. It may be what the drafters of the legislation meant, but it is not what they say. Two days from now, two weeks from now and certainly two years from now all this debate will be forgotten, all the argument, all the exchange of views will be buried and forgotten; they will be part of ancient parliamentary history with regard to broadcasting. What will remain, like the laws of the Medes and the Persians, will be a codified, rigid, authoritative statement of policy in the sphere of broadcasting to which all parties to a conflict, including the arbiters of the conflict, will turn for the purposes of reaching a decision and coming to a conclusion.

What they will base their decision and conclusion on will be the words of the statute, not the arguments that had taken place in committee of the whole house or the broadcasting committee, not the free, moderate, temperate exchange of views between those of us on all sides of the chambers who are interested in this question. Their decision and conclusion will be based on the codified, rigid words that will be down in black and white, and will say for all time that—

> —where any conflict arises between the objectives of the national broadcasting service and the interests of the private element of the Canadian broadcasting system, the objectives of the national broadcasting service must prevail.

I submit that that is unCanadian, it is undemocratic and it is definitely not in the interests of the private enterprise tradition which has played an integral part in building this country and this continent. The objectives of the national broadcasting service can be very broad indeed when it comes to interpretation. What are the objectives of the national broadcasting service? It may be that should a dispute arise in my city or in the constituency of anybody in this chamber between a private company and the national system, with regard to an available television channel or an available radio frequency, the C.B.C. will be competing for that channel, that frequency, that location and that privilege of serving the public and contributing to the broadcasting industry, and in truth also making a profit if it is possible to make one.

In the context of a situation such as that, which is certainly common in twentieth century life, the objective of the national broadcasting service is to obtain that frequency or that channel, and the broad, philosophical, visionary concept that is embodied in this wording that was placed there by the drafters of the legislation, which by itself is intrinsically of great value and merit, would no longer exist.

The litigants in a case like that would not be talking about service to the Canadian nation, the idea of Canadianism, the concept of national unity and all the other philosophical arguments which the drafters of this legislation attempt to anticipate, but would be talking about the facts of life in the marketplace, dollars and cents, the right to operate, the right to serve a certain area, the right to obtain a certain frequency, channel or station where they are denied that right. The objective of the national broadcasting service in that context and that situation would be to obtain that frequency.

On the basis of the wording of this proposed legislation the private broadcaster has no opportunity for his case to be heard, no hope whatever of a fair adjudication and dispensation of the case, and no hope whatever of obtaining that available frequency or channel because it says right here in the codified legislation, among other things, that where any conflict arises, the objectives of the national broadcasting service must prevail.

So the decision is made for all time that you must not come, as a private broadcaster, into an area of competition with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for anything that could be interpreted or construed in any way as an objective, whether it be the obtaining of an available channel or frequency or a certain kind of esoteric service to the people of Canada as part of the exercise of nation building. Just don't bother if you are a private broadcaster, because it is stated definitively and conclusively for all time that it is the C.B.C. objective that shall take precedence, and the desire of the C.B.C. for that channel or frequency shall be the one that prevails.

So I am not happy with this clause and, as I suggested a few moments ago, neither is the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo who in my opinion knows more, and has demonstrated that he knows more, about broadcasting than anybody in this chamber at the present time. He raised the issue at the time we were examining these clauses in the broadcasting committee, and with my support. We got nowhere with our objection at that time; but I can assure the house that one of us will raise it again and he will have my support, and I hope the support of a great many members of this chamber. There is a serious oversight in the wording of this paragraph. The drafters of the legislation have not considered what will happen two years from now when conflict arises in the area of specific market ambitions.

So I intend, and I am joined by my colleagues in this party, to move an amendment to this paragraph when we come to it. The amendment will say, not that when such and such a conflict arises the objectives of the national broadcasting service must prevail, but that when such and such a conflict arises the general good of the viewing and listening public shall take precedence over all other considerations. I see no legitimate grounds on which anybody in this chamber could take exception to that kind of amendment.

I hesitate to anticipate the fate of the proposed amendment—I have been here long enough to know better—but I say at this juncture that if it is defeated it will disappoint me greatly. I think what the drafters were trying to do, the interests they were trying to protect, will be protected by an amendment which provides that the general good of the viewing and listening public shall take precedence. The right of the private entrepreneur will similarly be protected by eliminating the offensive wording in the legislation as it now stands, and to which I have already referred.

In the few minutes remaining to me may I also, since it is the Christmas season and many of us have paused to pay tribute to various members of the house this afternoon regardless of their political persuasion, say that I was distinctly impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for York-Humber who spoke in this debate a short time ago. I think he made a succinct and extremely vital contribution to the debate. I always listen with great interest to the hon. member and at no time was I more interested than during his contribution to this debate, because it is a subject that is close to my heart and close to my background.

I would say at this juncture that I think the position which the hon. member for

York-Humber has taken with regard to cable television is absolutely and emphatically the right one, the only honest one and the only legitimate one. This is a subject on which I have expressed myself in the past. I see no legitimacy, no democracy and no morality in discriminating against Canadians because of the particular area in which they live. I say that Canadians, no matter where they live in Canada, can read American newspapers and magazines, can go to American movies and can drive American cars, but if they live out of range of the United States connected microwave, a little too far north of the border, they cannot watch American television because it will corrupt them, and it is not Canadian to do that sort of thing. I say this is hypocrisy and poppycock. We have a great northern half of the continent to populate, to cultivate and to develop, and one of the little luxuries and comforts of life nowadays is television.

Television brings us many forms of entertainment, excitement and information, and if we want to encourage people to go to the northern part of our country, to dig for the riches of our northland and to develop the vast expanse of territory which lies fallow and ignored at the present time and on which our very future in this world depends —if we want people to go into these areas and to live under conditions of relative hardship, why should we deny them the one or two simple pleasures and luxuries which can be made available to them so easily through the system of communication which exists, or could exist, in this country linking us with the communications media in the United States?

I know the hon. member for York-Humber was talking about a slightly different matter when he spoke about people living in areas served at the present time by C.A.T.V., who made their choice as to what they want to watch by paying a fee. I am going a little further than that and saying that in the northland—and one does not need to go to the far north; he can go as far as the cities of Calgary or Edmonton, or indeed any city which is out of range of the United States connected microwave—the people cannot watch and be entertained by, and have the range of choice of, the same king of television entertainment as is available to those Canadians who live in Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal and even my own city of Winnipeg, which is served by one United States outlet.

[Mr. Sherman.]

This is discrimination and hypocrisy of a dangerous form. Why is it that when it is technically feasible, and when our Canadian brethren in all the major centres along the border are free to tune in to American television with great frequency and regularity, as is borne out by the ratings, a person in Calgary, Edmonton, McMurray, Churchill, Aklavik or anywhere in the north is denied the same opportunity?

So in sharing the position that the hon. member for York-Humber has taken, I go further geographically in my appeal for some kind of reasonable, fair and equitable approach by the Secretary of State and by the authorities in the C.B.C and the Canadian broadcasting system to all the other Canadians who are penalized by virtue of their place of habitation.

It has often been argued that if two Canadian channels are available in a given area, Canadians have the necessary choice and are given the necessary opportunity to express their preference. This kind of argument is semantical nonsense when examined in the light of the situation in areas served by C.A.T.V., such as have been mentioned by the hon. member for York-Humber this afternoon; because as he stated, the decision is made in very clear, articulate and unarguable fashion by the viewers in that area when they sign up for a C.A.T.V. subscription and pay their fee. That is the casting of the ballot. If the C.B.C. needed a clearer expression of choice or preference, I am sure the exercise would be purely academic because it is clearly stated, by viewers who subscribe to that service, that their preference is for variety and freedom of choice, not that they are going to watch United States entertainment all the time, but that they want to have the option and the choice in the swing of the dial.

There are a number of other areas on which I should like to comment at this stage of the debate, but I will not have the opportunity. I can see by the clock that I am down to the last minute and a half of my time in this sitting of the house, and under the orders that have been adopted for the Christmas recess I realize that I will not have an opportunity, nor will other hon. members, to speak on this subject until some time in January. At that time I will make some other suggestions and interpolations, and I intend to press for the two amendments to clause 2 that I have mentioned are being prepared by us.

At that time I intend also to take up the cudgels on the points which were raised earlier by the hon. member for Elgin concerning anti-American public affairs programming. I believe this is an extremely serious and critical problem which affects Canadian-American relations, which militates against Canadian-American progress, and social, economic and military progress in all forms. It is one that is demeaning to us as a nation and one that has reached a crisis point and must be controlled or eliminated before Canadian-American relations are damaged beyond repair.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

The Chairman: Order, please. It being six o'clock and in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members business, shall I rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper. As there are no "notices of motions (papers)" on today's order paper, the house will proceed to the consideration of private bills and public bills.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Before this takes place, Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt to ask the house leader to resolve some of the rumours which have been going around the lobbies. Are we to continue until ten o'clock tonight or do we cease operations at 7 p.m.?

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Choquette: We are here to work, so let us work.

Mr. Churchill: I am agreeable.

Mr. MacEachen: The proposal was to sit until seven o'clock and then move the adjournment until January 22. If the house deals quickly with the bill that will be called, we will move the adjournment immediately after dealing with that bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE BILLS

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES LIMITED

The house in committee on Bill No. S-26, respecting Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited—Mr. Olson—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1—Capital stock.

Mr. Olson: First, I should like to thank the house as well as the standing committee on transport and communications for the manner in which they have dealt with this bill. Inasmuch as the bill passed second reading without debate, I should like very briefly to outline its purpose. The main purpose is to increase the capital stock of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited from 10 million shares to 25 million shares of common stock and from 1 million to 5 million shares of preferred stock. This will enable the company to do the financing necessary to meet its commitments to the government, as well as the gas users in eastern Canada, by building the loop of the pipe line, particularly through northern Ontario.

There are some other clauses, Mr. Chairman, that I would be happy to explain as we get to them. This is the main purpose of clause 1. In addition I have given an undertaking that I will move an amendment to clause 3, when we get to that clause. The purpose of the amendment will be to confine the powers and authority given to the company in clause 3 to the purposes of the company's undertaking. The reference here is to telecommunications and other things. There was a request that the amendment be added so the power could be limited to the purposes of the company's undertaking. I will move that amendment when we reach that clause.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, if the hour of adjournment were not so close, I would have something to say about Trans-Canada Pine Lines in general. However, I will forgo that privilege and merely say something about the capitalization. My knowledge of how this takes place is not too good, but it would appear that the capitalization will take place by the sale of shares. This is a worthwhile method of asking Canadians to again support a pipe line which has, over the years, been mainly sponsored by Canadians and is controlled by Canadians.

I would, however, be remiss if I did not point out that if this company had not made commitments in the United States through partnership in the Great Lakes Gas and Transmission Line, which is going through the United States and back into southern Ontario, it would have had sufficient money from company operations to provide at least a portion of the money needed to construct this loop. There would have been no necessity to raise this capital. In looking over the statute setting up this company, I was interested to find that the company has some of the powers that were granted prior to the implementation of the National Energy Board Act. I note that clause 5 of the original act, which has not been changed, states:

> The company shall have all the powers, privileges and immunities conferred by, and be subject to all the limitations, liabilities and provisions of any general legislation which is enacted by parliament relating to pipe lines for the transmission and transportation of gas or oil or any liquid or gaseous products or by-products thereof.

I believe a clause of this type would be advantageous in some other pipe line bills that we have. In so far as the provision in the bill which would enable Trans-Canada to establish its communications system is concerned, we note that the sponsor of the bill is prepared to make the amendment which will impose a limitation on this company's operations. This part of the company's operations will therefore come under the National Energy Board and be controlled by that board.

I think there is a great deal more that could be said about the company and its operations in the past, most of which would not be complimentary. However, I believe all Canadians are of the opinion that the looping of the pipe line should take place so that developments at the head of the lakes and in the Sault Ste. Marie area could take place as soon as possible. These facilities are needed in the area at the present time. I am sure all who are concerned with the twinning of this line, as it is commonly called, understand that a large amount of gas will be provided majority of the committee began to realize for southern Ontario.

With these comments, I am reluctantly of the opinion that, in the interests of the development of this company, the recapitalization should be undertaken as soon as possible. I express the hope the company will be successful in its endeavour to maintain Canadian ownership and Canadian control in this process of recapitalization.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

[Mr. Peters.]

On clause 3—1951 chapter 92, repeal.

Mr. Olson: I have an amendment to move in connection with clause 3. It would be amended as follows:

> Clause 3 of Bill S-26, is amended by inserting the words:
> "for the purpose of its underaking" in line 39 on page 3 immediately following the words "communications systems" and by inserting the same words in line 44 on page 3 immediately following the words "communication facilities".

• (6:10 p.m.)

The Chairman: Perhaps I should suggest to the committee that some member other than the member for Medicine Hat would have to move this amendment.

Mr. Reid: I will move it, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 as amended carry?

Mr. Germa: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the sponsor of the bill what is the intent of the slight change in wording in line 29, which reads:

> —provided that the main pipe line or lines, either for the transmission and transportation of gas or oil—

And so on. The wording differs from that in the original act, which reads:

> —provided that the main transportation of gas or oil shall be located entirely within Canada;—

Could the hon. member explain the reason for this change in wording in clause 3?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I did not quite follow the hon. member. Which word or words have been changed? I have not found the previous wording at this moment.

Mr. Germa: Starting at line 29 with the word "provided", the wording in the original act was:

> —provided that the main transportation of gas or oil shall be located entirely within Canada—

The clause now reads:

> —provided that the main pipe line or lines, either for the transmission and transportation of gas or oil shall be located entirely within Canada—

The words "pipe line or lines" are not in the original wording of the act.

Mr. Olson: The only explanation I can give for that, Mr. Chairman, is that there is an undertaking by the company that the main pipe line or lines shall be in Canada. When this bill is passed and the company completes construction, this will be the case.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, perhaps on a point of order I might be able to help the hon. member for Medicine Hat. From memory I thought it was so and I have just looked at the statute. I think some words have been left out in the quotation from the statute in the explanatory notes. The statute does refer to "pipe line or lines", when it says:

—provided that the main line or lines, either for the transmission and transportation of gas or oil shall be located entirely within Canada;—

I do not think there has been any change in wording.

Mr. Olson: I was a little surprised, Mr. Chairman, because I was not aware of any change.

Mr. Lewis: There was no change. Words were left out.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles: By leave, now.

Mr. Olson moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, before moving the adjournment of the house I should like to take this opportunity to extend to Your Honour and to members of the house the very best wishes for the holiday and Christmas season. As house leader I should like to thank hon. members for the help and co-operation that has been extended in the management of the business of the house. I believe the house has worked efficiently and productively and that members are entitled to return to their constituencies with the feeling that they have really done an excellent job since we began the session.

Mr. Lewis: Shall we applaud ourselves?

Mr. MacEachen: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout):

That pursuant to the special order made Wednesday, December 20, 1967 the house do now adjourn until Monday, January 22, 1968.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 6.21 p.m.
