PRIVILEGE

[Translation]

MR. GRÉGOIRE—SPEECH BY TRANSPORT MINISTER AT AIRPORT CEREMONY

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of certain words the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), who is now taking his seat, uttered two days ago at the opening of the Bagotville airport. On this occasion, he attempted deliberately or otherwise to mislead the population of Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean as well as some members of this house. These words were that:

> Paul Hellyer finally paid tribute to the hon. member for Chicoutimi in the House of Commons, Mr. Paul Langlois who was the main mover of this magnificent achievement—

He was speaking of the Bagotville airport.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the facts prove otherwise. Maurice Côté, member for Chicoutimi at the time, and I, between 1963 and 1965 have exchanged correspondence and raised the question several times in the house, so that on May 19, 1965 the then minister of transport, Mr. Pickersgill, said then that he estimated an expenditure of $300,000 for the new Bagotville airport and of $175,000 for the facilities, and that tenders would be called the following September, that is in September 1965, before Mr. Langlois was even elected.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member. When he gave me notice of his question of privilege, I had then expressed some reservations. I must now inform him formally that there is no question of privilege in the point he has just raised.

A member cannot rise on a question of privilege in the house about a statement made outside the house in such circumstances. The hon. member may have a legitimate grievance against the minister, but I do not feel there is a question of privilege.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is to the effect that the statements of two ministers are contradictory.

Mr. Speaker: Unfortunately, I do not think this is a question of privilege.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if it is not a question of privilege, it is intellectual dishonesty on the part of a minister.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSALS FOR SETTLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Acting Prime Minister could disclose to the house what practical proposals he and his government are making toward a solution of the crisis on the island of Cyprus.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend will appreciate that when negotiations are under way it is not always desirable to give with precision the response sought in his question. But I should like to say, to the extent that it is possible to deal with this matter now, the house will recall I stated last week that before the outbreak of fighting at Ayios Theodoros in Cyprus, Canada had been developing certain proposals for early action through the United Nations security council—designed to enable the UN and its special representative in Cyprus to act effectively to preserve peace on the island.

Since Sunday night we have been involved in a series of contacts in Ankara, Athens, Nicosia, London, Ottawa and Washington, together with representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom, designed to assist in clarifying the positions and proposals of the two main parties to one another so there is no misunderstanding of a kind which could produce a catastrophe, and so that each may consider the ideas of the other with a view to evolving a compromise which is being sought at this very moment.

As the public statements of the parties have indicated, the points at issue with which the Canadian approaches have been concerned—and this deals directly with my hon. friend's question—include such topics as the presence of both Greek and Turkish forces on the island, the extensive military preparations that have been made by Turkey, and the question of the kind of role the United Nations could play within Cyprus to assist the authorities of that island and help bring about peaceful conditions.

The purpose of the consultations is also to see if there is any basis for moving from a solution of the immediate crisis which is before us toward some more large scale solution of the basic issues at a later stage. We are examining this together with the nature of the role of the United Nations at the present time in Cyprus. Consultations that we have had, which I referred to yesterday, in Ankara and in Greece have not yet revealed any agreement, but these contacts are continuing.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the proposals that are being discussed include enlarging the mandate of the UN contingents and enlarging the force so as to make it possible to prevent either side sending to Cyprus further troops and war material.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That particular suggestion is not part of the effort that Canada has been undertaking.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Acting Prime Minister has outlined a three point program and the Prime Minister over in London has outlined a five point program. Is it correct that the Prime Minister is acting as an intermediary on behalf of Turkey and that the five point program is the Turkish one?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, there is no difference between what the Prime Minister is seeking to do and what is being done in Ottawa and elsewhere. I am very grateful, as I am sure the house is, that the Prime Minister is in London discussing this matter with one of the principal countries concerned.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—REQUEST FOR REASSURANCE AS TO STARTING DATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Since the Minister of Finance has now had ample opportunity to report to his cabinet colleagues regarding his discussions with the provincial ministers of finance here in Ottawa last week, can the Acting Prime Minister assure the house that it is the government's intention to proceed with medicare on July 1, 1968, in any province which has indicated its willingness to proceed and qualifies under the legislation?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I would refer my hon. friend to what the Prime Minister said in the house on November 14 in answer to questions put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; what he said on November 13 in answer to a question by the hon. member for Churchill, and what he said on October 25, 1967 in answer to a question by the hon. member for Ontario. The question put by the hon. member for Ontario was as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of reports in the last week or so regarding the starting date of medicare which have created in the minds of the people of this country uncertainty, turmoil and doubt, will the Prime Minister issue a statement or assure those interested that no change is contemplated in the original plan to put medicare into effect on July 1, 1968?

The Prime Minister replied:

> The hon. gentleman should not be disturbed by such reports.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the Acting Prime Minister would want to revert to motions.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point of order is that all answers by the Secretary of State for External Affairs should be made as statements on motions and not be given during the question period.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There is a very easy way of disposing of that problem. My hon. friend does not need to ask any questions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then finally—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I thought the Acting Prime Minister had answered the question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is exactly what I am doing, Mr. Speaker. I am repeating what is the position of the government. The hon. member for Ontario then said:

Then I shall put the direct question, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether medicare is to start on July 1, 1968.

To which the Prime Minister replied:

Mr. Speaker, that is so under the law and the legislation we passed, in which no change has been made.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the statements the Acting Prime Minister has just quoted were all made prior to this matter being submitted by the Minister of Finance to his cabinet colleagues following the federal-provincial conference of finance ministers last week, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether there has been any change in the government's position since these statements were made, and whether we may take it that the government intends to proceed with medicare on July 1, 1968.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister's statement certainly answers that question.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Would he care to advise the house as to the number of representations he has received asking him to postpone medicare?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think this question is in order.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance? Could he tell us whether the federal government is considering a fiscal compensation for the provinces which will not benefit or will not want to benefit from the medicare plan as from July 1?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, there is no provision for any such payments.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Will the method whereby the cost of medicare will be raised be contained in the mini budget which is to be presented early next week?

Mr. Sharp: Until we know which provinces are going to take advantage of the legislation it would be impossible to make an estimate of the amount of revenue needed. Therefore I do not contemplate making any provision in the statement I shall be making next week.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, may I put a further supplementary question to the Minister of Finance? If there is no question of a fiscal compensation, could the minister tell us whether the federal government will grant any compensation to the provinces which do not have at present the financial means to participate in the medicare plan?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, at the present time the federal government has the most generous system of equalization payments this country has ever known to support the position of the provinces, including the province of Quebec.

EXPO '67

INQUIRY AS TO INSPECTION OF FOOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare. Could the minister tell the house whether the food, and particularly the meat sold and eaten at Expo '67, was checked by officers of his department and whether other people besides the inspectors of his department were allowed to use inspection stamp No. 110?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that he should put this question on the order paper.

SHIPPING

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL INTERVENTION IN DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Since the slowdown in the St. Lawrence ports is now being felt all the way back to British Columbia, can he report on the situation there today?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I must regretfully advise the house that the situation on the Montreal docks is not good. As I think hon. members know, efforts have been made over a period of months in 1966 and 1967 to bring about a better understanding between the parties. These activities have taken place before and since the Picard commission.

There is no authority under which the Minister of Labour can intervene in cases of this kind. The parties must learn that they should try to work out their own differences. Frankly it is becoming much too common for the parties to collective bargaining arrangements to turn to government for an imposed solution. The act places the responsibility on the parties to try to work out solutions for their differences.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the lack of agreement on the interpretation of the Picard report as between the ship owners and the unions involved, which according to the Minister of Labour brought about the present chaotic condition—

Mr. Nicholson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I did not say conditions were chaotic.

Mr. Starr: —will the Minister of Labour assume the responsibility, in the national interest, of convening a meeting of spokesmen for both sides in Ottawa at once in order to arrive at agreement on this report?

Mr. Nicholson: At I reported to the house yesterday, I have discussed this matter at length with one side last Friday and offered to do so with the other. Officers of my department have discussed it with that other party. It has even been suggested that if there is ambiguity in one or two passages of the Picard report or at least arising out of the fact that the Picard report supplements and amends the existing agreement, that Dr. Picard himself might be asked to clarify ambiguities. One of the parties, the unions, will not accept that suggestion. They say Dr. Picard is functus officio and they stand on the agreement.

Under the agreements, there is a grievance procedure and there is provision for arbitration. The parties have their rights, but they have not attempted to exercise them in the manner agreed upon. They are looking to the government to impose a solution. I think it is about time they learned they must work out their own solutions.

Mr. Starr: Will the minister use the stature and importance of his office and summon both parties to Ottawa at once in order to help mediate an agreement on the understanding of the Picard report?

Mr. Nicholson: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Johnston: My supplementary question is to the Minister of Labour. Have some steamship companies placed a 25 per cent freight rate surcharge on St. Lawrence port shipments?

Mr. Nicholson: That is my understanding, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): May I ask a supplementary question. Since one of the principal points of dispute seems to relate to the hiring of longshoremen through the hiring hall, will the minister state whether there have been any new proposals to settle this aspect of the problem?

Mr. Nicholson: This is not a practical possibility at the present time, Mr. Speaker, and has not been in the past. It is a well known fact that the stevedoring companies, not only in Montreal but in other Canadian ocean ports, are hired by the shipping companies to load and unload ships. They pay the bill, and in the long run they are the ones who are going to call the tune.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. I welcome his admonishment to the two sides involved, but if I may be a little more serious may I ask the minister whether he would broaden his remarks and caution the parties involved to expedite whatever moves they are going to make before this difficulty begins to affect other already severely crippled ports such as Halifax and Saint John?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I ask hon. members to take my assurance that the minister has admonished both sides and encouraged them to take co-operative action in this difficult situation.

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Could the minister inform the house whether the crisis that is affecting the port of Montreal has extended to the ports of Trois-Rivières and Quebec?

Mr. Nicholson: My understanding is that it is confined to certain of the piers at Montreal, not other ports.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BURMA—REPORTED DETENTION OF CANADIANS IN JAIL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs which I hope is not going to impose upon the house another marathon talkfest. I should like to ask the minister about the welfare of two young Canadians who are reported to have been detained in a Rangoon jail and kept incommunicado for five months. Is this report correct? If so what is the present position, and what assistance is the minister's department giving?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the department was notified on October 26 by the British embassy in Rangoon that Messrs. Lalonde and Pineault had been arrested in Rangoon. The department has not yet been informed of the outcome of the hearing which took place a short time ago. However, an officer from our high commissioner's office in Kuala Lumpur is now in Rangoon and will be looking into the matter. We have done everything we can and will continue to do everything we can.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Did the department receive from the parents of one of the young men in question the payment of a substantial sum to cover his passage home? If so, has this matter been acknowledged?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This matter is now being discussed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As a former minister of justice the hon. member should know that it must be discussed with those in loco parentis. This is the procedure which is laid down. The matter must be discussed with the parents and it is now being discussed. No one should understand that better than one who was a former minister of justice.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, my inquiry is this. Did the department receive from the parents a substantial sum, and has that sum been acknowledged?

NOVA SCOTIA

DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING CONTINUED OPERATION OF STEEL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister, and with your permission may I emphasize the "acting". I should like to ask the minister whether the government has undertaken any negotiations with the province of Nova Scotia respecting the Sydney steel operation.

Hon. Allan J. MaEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to answer that question for the Acting Prime Minister. The government has been in close touch with the government of Nova Scotia since this crisis developed. Yesterday the premier of Nova Scotia sent a communication to the Prime Minister indicating certain terms of settlement and arrangements that had been made between the government of Nova Scotia and the Dosco corporation. In the same communication he suggested that he would like to be in discussion with the Prime Minister, after the returns from London, about these matters. I would conclude, Mr. Speaker, that this whole matter will be the subject of discussion between the premier of Nova Scotia and the Prime Minister in the light of the agreement that has been reached.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the federal government, at this time or at some time throughout these discussions, has given the government of Nova Scotia the assurance that the federal government will be prepared to accept a substantial part of the financial commitment that will be necessary to keep this plant open.

Mr. MacEachen: An assurance was given to the government of Nova Scotia with respect to a particular period of operation. I would conclude that any further period would be a matter for discussion.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It has now been established beyond a doubt that Nova Scotian members can put questions about Nova Scotia to the minister who comes from Nova Scotia, even though the subject matter of those questions may fall outside the purview of his department. I wish to ask the minister if he intends to impress on his colleagues that the federal government should play a part in this matter through the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether I should undertake to answer this question on behalf of the Acting Prime Minister. While I do not object to answering questions affecting the province of Nova Scotia, I wish to contest the point of order that is implicit in the hon. member's comments. I may do that at a later time. For the moment I wish to tell him that all the matters which have been the subject of discussion within the house with respect to the role of the Atlantic Development Board and the Cape Breton Development Corporation have been drawn to the attention of my colleagues, and they are under discussion.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wish to get to the bottom of the minister's answer. I asked whether the minister intends to continue to advocate the takeover by the Cape Breton Development Corporation. He has already advocated that in this house.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have made no such advocacy in this house or elsewhere.

[Later:]

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I rise on a question of privilege arising from the answer of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I referred to the Cape Breton Development Corporation, and the minister made some remarks about the possibility of assisting Nova Scotia in the steel crisis. Though I recall other remarks, Mr. Speaker, for the moment I have only briefly and quickly checked Hansard, and I draw to the attention of the minister his remarks on the matter on October 16, 1967, to be found on page 3158 of Hansard, the right hand column. The minister made a statement there about the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Can the hon. member state his question of privilege? Many hon. members, I note, wish to ask questions and we are quickly running out of time for the question period.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): My question of privilege arises from a statement by the minister in which he definitely denied something I said. In connection with my question of privilege I should like to quote the minister's own words in proof of my statement.

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South).]

Mr. Speaker: This is surely just a matter of debate. Every day of the year, I suggest to hon. members, allegations are made and statements are denied. This is strictly a question of debate; to my mind it cannot be a question of privilege. I cannot see how the hon. member's privileges have been affected by the statement of the minister.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): With all due respect to Your Honour, all members are aware of the fact that when a question of privilege arises it must be brought up immediately. I wish only to quote the minister's own words to back up the statement I have made.

Mr. Speaker: I have no objection. It is the hon. members' time which is being taken up in this way.

Mr. Knowles: Our time.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The minister's own words, as they are to be found on page 3158 of Hansard, are as follows:

> The corporation has the authority by law and will be in the position very soon to determine what it is going to do in relation to the Cape Breton steel problem. This corporation has very wide powers, powers wide enough to achieve the objective recommended by members of the N.D.P., if the directors desire to do so.

Mr. MacEachen: On the question of privilege, I do not see any inconsistency between that statement and the response I gave today. What I was doing was outlining the legal powers which I thought the corporation possessed. It was a matter of law. What the hon. member is concerned about is a matter of policy.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): This is the only one I had the opportunity to find at the moment, but there have been others.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I should like to say a word on the question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: I rule that there is no question of privilege. This is obviously a matter for debate, and I think it is not entirely fair to hon. members who appear to have a question of some moment to ask in the four or five minutes remaining in the question period that they should be deprived of the opportunity to ask those questions.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): This is a new question of privilege. I rise at this time to suggest to you, sir, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has either misled the house today or else he misled the house during the debate on the Cape Breton Development Corporation. I should like to explain why I think this to be the case.

Along with members of the New Democratic party I advocated the takeover of Sydney Steel by the Cape Breton Development Corporation. We pressed the matter in this chamber, and on that occasion the statement was made, not only by the Minister of National Health and Welfare but by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, that the legislation was broad enough to cover almost any contingency, including the takeover of Cape Breton steel. I hear the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond say "That is right". He has a better memory, I think, than has the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In those circumstances the onus is upon the minister to clarify the situation. Either he misled the house today or he did so a few weeks ago when we discussed this important item. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said the legislation was broad enough to cover anything, even the objective desired by the hon. member for Cape Breton—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I think we should hear from the Minister of National Health and Welfare with regard to this matter.

Mr. MacEachen: I do not wish to pursue this question very far, because there is no question of privilege and there is no inconsistency between the position I am taking today and the one I took on the bill. When hon. members opposite, including members of the N.D.P., were arguing that the Cape Breton Development Corporation should own and operate this mill I said I agreed this was a capability and a possibility under that law. That is true; no one disputes it. I have also said that I do not regard this as an appropriate function of the corporation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the exchange which has taken place between the hon. members and the minister has established the correctness of the ruling I made earlier, that there was no question of privilege. I will not take the time of members by reading citation 113 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, except perhaps for the first sentence. No; I will not even read the first sentence.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

RECOMMENDATION THAT PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES BE TAXED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister or any member of the government received representations from the Royal Canadian Legion or other veterans organizations strongly protesting the recommendations of the Carter commission that pensions and allowances under the Pension Act become taxable? If so, what was the response?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think that question is in order at this time.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO MUNICIPAL REPRESENTATION AT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour in his capacity as the minister responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I wish to ask whether the province of Ontario or any other province has indicated that it will bring representatives of municipalities to the federal-provincial conference on housing.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to inquire about what is to be done by the province of Ontario. With respect to the province where I live, I can say definitely that they will have the president of the union of British Columbia municipalities as a member of their delegation. I shall need to make inquiries about the intentions of other provinces.

AGRICULTURE

EFFECT OF CURRENCY DEVALUATION ON EXPORTS TO U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture and ask him whether now or at an early date, preferably now, he can report to the house on the probable effects of the devaluation of the pound on our agricultural products other than wheat. I exempt wheat at this time because the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce gave a preliminary report in that regard.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a detailed answer to such a question can hardly be made during orders of the day. Generally speaking, though, we envisage that there will be a more difficult competitive position for Canadian producers with regard to the more highly processed and finished products of agriculture by reason of the greater competition from other countries, such as Denmark and New Zealand, which have also devalued their currency, as well as from the greater production which no doubt will take place in the United Kingdom.

With respect to most raw agricultural products we anticipate at the present time that there will be no great effect on Canadian exports. With respect to wheat, inasmuch as no other exporting country of hard wheat has devalued its currency I should not think our competitive position will be hurt. Nevertheless, there will be greater productivity of soft wheat in the United Kingdom and quite possibly there will be greater use of soft wheat than now is the case.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister contemplate taking any action with regard to agricultural products that he considers it probable will be adversely affected?

Mr. Greene: At the present time, Mr. Speaker, my department is studying the situation and attempting to keep abreast of it. If it appears that the Canadian producer will be badly affected in any area we shall embark on negotiations with the British to see if the position may be alleviated.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister gave the Leader of the Opposition such a refreshing answer, and since producers of tobacco, cheese, apples and the like are greatly concerned about what is happening, could the minister make a statement next week on motions and deal with a number of specific products such as those I have already mentioned in order to allay the apprehension of many producers in the country?

Mr. Greene: I shall be glad to consider the hon. member's suggestion. With respect to fresh fruits and apples generally, the present value of exports is approximately $6 million and we do not contemplate any great change in this regard. With respect to dairy products, and cheese in particular, where exports are $14 million, it is in this area that we shall face the greatest difficulty. Though no product specifically competes with our old Canadian cheddar cheese, which is our main export—

[Mr. Stanfield.]

An hon. Member: It is the best in the world.

Mr. Greene: It is the best in the world; that is quite correct. Though New Zealand cheese is not of the same brand as old Canadian cheddar cheese, if it is cheaper it will offer us stiffer competition in the U.K. market. Cheese is one area where difficulty is contemplated.

Mr. Nesbitt: Since the minister was able to give the house invaluable information about some products, can he comment about tobacco? Tobacco is of great concern and interest to some.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Greene: The same remarks—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's original question was to ask the minister to make a statement on motions. I suggest to the hon. member and the minister that the statement should not be made now.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Was the Minister of Trade and Commerce expressing government policy when in a speech to the GATT in Geneva he is reported as proposing a positive program to reduce obstacles to trade in agricultural products, such as farm subsidies and support prices, which I take it means the reduction or elimination of subsidies and support prices for agricultural products?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): As the hon. gentleman knows, in order to understand sentences contained in a public statement it is always well to have the context; and since I have not seen the whole speech I would prefer to read the speech in question in its entirety and then confer with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Harkness: Then is it government policy to reduce or eliminate farm subsidies and support prices?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What the government's policy is with regard to this particular matter will have to be analysed in the light of that statement as a whole; and I have not read that statement.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

Is the federal government informed of General de Gaulle's visit planned for July 1968 within the framework of agreements between France and Quebec? And, if so, does the government intend to invite that great man to come to Ottawa?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have not been informed of the matter, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO USE OF NEW APPLICATION FORM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the many articles published in newspapers recently, expressing concern about the fact that there is no mention of the "ethnic origin" since October 1 last on the application form for immigrants, could the minister tell us the reason for such a change?

Mr. Speaker: The question could be put on the order paper.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I take the liberty of pointing out to you that this is an urgent question since newspapers, especially in the province of Quebec, have referred to this problem again and again.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows very well that if he feels this question is urgent, he can discuss it on the adjournment motion.

FINANCE

RECOMMENDATIONS BY TAXATION COMMISSION RESPECTING DEPLETION ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. A few days ago the minister indicated that he intended to make an interim statement with reference to the extractive industries, petroleum and mining, in connection with the Carter commission report. Will he be making that statement before he brings in his mini budget?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I am considering making a statement in connection with my financial statement.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Does the minister count on tabling budget papers at the time of his financial statement, as is customary?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. I do not intend, if the hon. gentleman means this, to table a white paper in the conventional sense, as is usually done at the time of the regular budget.

Mr. Woolliams: In reply to my question the minister said he intended to make a financial statement. Will he tell the house whether he is bringing in a budget or a financial message, as he describes it?

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): A financial mess.

Mr. Woolliams: I asked a supplementary question but I think the Minister of Finance was engaged in talking to the Acting Prime Minister. Is it the minister's intention to bring in a financial message or is it his intention to bring in a budget?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): There is no difficulty about this. It is a matter of discussion among the house leaders, and I am sure they will reach a conclusion which will commend itself to hon. members present.

Mr. Woolliams: There seems to be some confusion on the treasury benches. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether it is the government's intention to bring in a budget or a financial message.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): There is no confusion in the mind of the government. The confusion, as usual, is in the minds of those who sit immediately to your left, Mr. Speaker. The form in which the government expresses financial policy is a matter to be determined by the government of the day.

Mr. Woolliams: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not think the Acting Prime Minister understood my question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Amendments Respecting Death Sentence

Mr. Woolliams: May I put my question in this way, in order to clarify the situation. Would the Acting Prime Minister advise us whether the Minister of Finance, whatever the form of his presentation, will be bringing in budget resolutions at that time?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the word "budget" is a conventional term. It is a financial message we will be bringing in. As is the case at the time of the regular budget, it will be accompanied by resolutions proposing amendments to the taxing statutes. If the hon. gentleman would like to call that a budget, I have no objection. I should like to call it a financial message, which is more in accord with my feelings, but he has his choice.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Does he expect to receive shortly a further report from the B and B commission.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): I do not know, Mr. Speaker, but I should think that this report would soon be available. I cannot say exactly when but I will make inquiries.

Mr. Jorgenson: If it is received shortly will it be the intention of the government to table it immediately or will this be done later?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think my hon. friend recognizes that the usual practice is for a royal commission report to be presented to the government, usually to the Prime Minister, and that the government in accordance with its responsibility decides when publication will take place. That is the course all governments have followed, including the government headed by my distinguished right hon. friend, the hon. member for Prince Albert, a few years ago.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEATH SENTENCE AND LIFE IMPRISONMENT

The house resumed, from Wednesday, November 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pennell for the second reading of Bill No. C-168, to amend the Criminal Code.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I waited to speak until the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) had left, because I would rather speak before his empty seat than his empty head.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call the hon. member for Lapointe to order.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the hon. member should be ignorant in addition to being ill-mannered and stupid.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member keeps on talking as loudly as he is doing, he will have trouble hearing what we have to say.

Mr. Boulanger: I am not interested.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak only a few minutes about that bill, because I have not had the opportunity to do so yet. I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that several problems worried me before I made up my mind about the bill under consideration, and I wanted to find out whether our penitentiary system was organized to receive those who are sentenced to life imprisonment.

That is why, on Friday last, Mr. Speaker, I thought it advisable to go and visit the Saint-Vincent-de-Paul penitentiary—

An hon. Member: I am surprised that they did not keep you there.

Mr. Grégoire: —as well as the facilities available to the prisoners, and I must tell you that although I was pleasantly surprised by all the changes which have been made at the Saint-Vincent-de-Paul penitentiary, especially since Mr. Lecor was appointed warden of that penitentiary—

[English]

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In fairness to the hon. member who is speaking, and others, I suggest that we should be able to hear him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, would you ask the Acting Prime Minister to sit down?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is very difficult to follow the speech being made by the hon. member. I request the co-operation of those who are now engaged in conversations.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, although I was pleasantly surprised to see what improvements had been made, after visiting the cells, the kitchens, the classrooms and the rooms where the prisoners can learn a trade, which rooms are very well kept, although I was also pleasantly surprised to see how well qualified the personnel in charge of the Saint-Vincent-de-Paul penitentiary are, I still feel that our penitentiaries are not equipped, do not have the required facilities, at the present time, to accommodate those who are sentenced to life imprisonment.

I believe the government should, before introducing a bill like the one now before us, take the necessary steps to correct, to remedy the present situation in our penal institutions.

It is true that there have been some great improvements. It is true that the Saint-Vincent-de-Paul penitentiary—that one at least, because it is the only one I have visited—is much cleaner. I spoke with the staff of the Saint-Vincent-de-Paul penitentiary and I was pleasantly surprised to find that they are fully qualified, that the penitentiary is clean and especially that the new warden, Mr. Lecor, is very competent.

However, I think that there is a lack of space and accommodation for those who are sentenced to life imprisonment.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is a point which the Sollicitor General of Canada (Mr. Pennell) should take into consideration.

I also wish Mr. Speaker to speak of the bill itself. I think that the bill in its present wording contains discriminatory provisions.

There is too much difference between the lives of certain police officers or prison guards, and the lives of citizens in general. I think that the life of one is as important as that of the other. I think there should be no discrimination such as contained in the bill.

This bill is something of a compromise which does not solve the problem in any way.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I simply wish to mention the reasons that lead me to oppose the bill. I object to the bill in its present wording.

I cannot agree with the clauses it contains, because they are not seriously relevant to the principle involved. I should like to suggest to the government that before such a principle or such a bill is carried, a referendum should be held, as was suggested yesterday. The reason is very simple. It is because, since the inception of this debate on capital punishment, Mr. Speaker, I have received about 350 letters from the voters in my constituency of Lapointe and hardly five or six support the abolition of capital punishment. The 340 others are openly against the abolition of the death penalty.

Therefore, I think that the government should act by way of a referendum in order to ask the Canadian people to express their opinion. Then the government would introduce a bill in accordance with the ideas or the statements gathered from the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, these are the three reasons why I am opposed to the principle of the bill and to its second reading.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

[And the members having been called in]

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to hon. members that the vote might be taken by inviting members supporting the motion to rise starting with the first row to my right and then proceeding to the rows to my left, as we do in committee of the whole.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

[Translation]

Mr. Habel: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner). Had I voted, I would have voted against the bill.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). Had I voted, I would have voted against the bill.

[English]

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1—Capital murder defined.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, when this bill was debated on second reading I made the statement that I proposed to move an amendment at the committee stage which would have the effect of producing a bill that would provide for the total abolition of capital punishment. At that time I gave the reasons why it appeared to me and several others that the principle which we have just approved on second reading would apply with equal force to the exceptions set out in this bill. I have no intention of repeating at length the arguments made at that time.

The justification for capital punishment, I feel, is based almost entirely on the question of deterrence. There are some people who have been of the view that the maintenance of capital punishment in cases of the murder of police officers and prison wardens would have the effect of deterring a certain type of criminal. It is argued that these are hazardous occupations and they need the special protection afforded by the provisions of the bill as it stands now.

An examination shows beyond doubt that capital punishment is not, in fact, a deterrent even in the minority of cases covered by the bill as it stands. Neither I nor any other person supporting the principle of total abolition is careless or thoughtless of the lives or security of police officers or wardens, but in those states in which capital punishment has been abolished it has been discovered there has been no increase whatever in the risk that applies to those in this special category. It is illogical, it is wrong, to select a special class of persons and give them a protection which is denied others.

There was very little in the speech made by the hon. member for York-Humber the other day with which I agree. However, I do agree with the point he made about the illogicality of one person who may murder seven people at a time not being subject to capital punishment and at the same time providing that if one of the victims happens to be in this special class then capital punishment will apply.

The Solicitor General, in introducing this bill, spoke very eloquently but the very arguments he used apply with equal force to those who murder police officers and prison guards. The Prime Minister spoke with eloquence and feeling on this subject. Every argument he used was in favour of total abolition of capital punishment. The bill itself constitutes a compromise. We were prepared to accept and vote for the compromise because we felt it was the maximum we were able to obtain at that time and we were not prepared to defeat the bill simply because we felt it did not go far enough.

We propose in our amendment, Mr. Chairman, to provide an opportunity for those whose consciences are opposed to capital punishment as useless, barbaric and unnecessary in all cases to register their conviction on that particular point. The amendment which I propose is that we delete or repeal the whole of section 202A of the Criminal Code, the section passed in 1961 which separated the crime of murder into capital murder and non-capital murder. We then propose to amend section 206, which is the section that deals with penalties for murder, and to substitute therefor a simple section reading as follows:

Everyone who commits murder is guilty of an indictable offence and shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life.

When I say life, Mr. Chairman, I mean life, subject to the rule of law passed by this parliament in respect of parole and clemency.

All of the arguments on this question have been fully rehashed and I do not think there is any point in prolonging the debate. This amendment is designed to give those who believe in the total abolition of capital punishment the right to register their opinions at this time. The arguments in favour are the arguments which have been repeated again and again in this house and I am not going to reiterate them now. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move:

That Bill C-168 be amended by deleting therefrom the present clause 1, and by substituting therefor the following new clause 1:

"1. (1) Section 202A of the Criminal Code is repealed.

(2) Section 206 of the Criminal Code is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'206. Everyone who commits murder is guilty of an indictable offence and shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life.'"

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman who has just introduced this amendment quite accurately pointed out that in the debate on second reading which we have just concluded most of the arguments for or against the principle of abolition were placed on the record. Last year I voted for total abolition of the death penalty. However, I intend to vote against the amendment presented by the hon. member for Greenwood and, very briefly, these are my reasons.

One of the reoccurring themes in most of the contributions we have heard in the present debate, one that has a certain degree of justification, is that 18 months ago this house had an opportunity to express an opinion on the first measure presented on the question of total abolition. It was recognized at the time that many people voted against abolition because of the reservations they had concerning the so-called deterrent or psychological factor in so far as law officers are concerned. Many of the people who voted for retention a year or more ago voted for the bill on this occasion because of the retention of the death penalty in so far as law officers being killed.

In all fairness to these people, Mr. Chairman, what this amendment would do if accepted would be to change completely the principle of the bill upon which we have just voted. The principle is not that we abolish the death penalty but that we retain the death penalty in cases of murder of law officers.

While I am fundamentally an abolitionist, Mr. Chairman, I think we owe it to those members who voted a year ago against abolition and who have gone along with the principle of the bill on second reading today, to reject this amendment. Its purpose is to change the principle of the bill and it gives conclusive proof for the eloquent arguments advanced that this bill would then be nothing more than a replica of the measure introduced 18 months ago.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the hon. member who moved the amendment realizes that if it were accepted it would jeopardize the passage of the bill on third reading, because the acceptance of the amendment would change the whole principle of the bill.

The Chairman: The Chair has some misgivings about the validity of this amendment. It feels that it does encroach upon some other parts of the Criminal Code, but the Chair also feels that this is the matter the committee should decide upon. I therefore accept the amendment. Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Brewin) negatived: Yeas, 37; nays, 106.

• (4:20 p.m.)

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, since the house wishes to exact a penalty from those who murder policemen or others as listed in clause 1, the house might also wish to take into account the children of this country who from time to time are murdered by those who have little regard for human life.

The hon. member for Greenwood used an inelegant expression when he said that the arguments in this debate had been rehashed. I think that arguments on a matter as serious as this cannot be too frequently put before the house and the people of this country. I regret that in this debate the arguments of those who do not favour the bill were not answered by those who do. I was disappointed with the way the Prime Minister treated the matter. He said that the sole argument the retentionists were advancing was that of deterrence and then he advocated the adoption of a bill which includes in its provisions a deterrent.

The arguments I advanced a year and a half ago and this year were not based on the theory of a deterrent; nevertheless, I question those who suggest that our populace has no fear of death. I advanced my argument on the basis that those within our society who are unable to protect themselves ought to be protected. I mentioned, previously women and children particularly and suggested that when the state had made adequate protection for its defenceless people it would be high time to abolish capital punishment. I said that when the state can guarantee that a man of criminal tendencies will not be released on parole and given the opportunity of murdering the women and children of the country I will be prepared to consider the abolition of capital punishment, but I will not be prepared to consider it until that assurance is given. That argument was never dealt with by the Prime Minister or those who advocate the adoption of the present bill.

I think it would be wise if we took a few minutes to consider the protection of the women and children of this country. I shall put to the committee an amendment which will ask that Bill C-168 be amended by adding to new subsection 2 in clause 1 a new paragraph (c) reading as follows:

(c) a person 16 years of age and under.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment (Mr. Churchill) negatived: Yeas, 53; nays, 80.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, we are still considering clause 1 which seeks to abolish capital punishment for the crime of murder except when it relates to police officers, sheriffs, wardens and certain others in this category. It seems to me that if these people are to be placed in a special class we should add another group to that class, the womenfolk of this nation. I feel that this must be done in order to protect females against the kind of people who, whether sexual deviates or not, attack females and kill them in the course of such attacks.

I intend to be brief this afternoon because a great deal has already been said with regard to the bill now before us. I realize that hon. members opposite wish to interrupt but I think they should be fair enough to give a fair hearing to others, no matter in what part of the house they may sit. At no time have I ever attempted to shout down anybody speaking for a principle in which he believes. As I say, I shall not be making a long speech. However, I shall move an amendment almost identical with the one moved by my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre. I move that clause 1 be amended by adding the following to new subsection 2:

(c) any female person.

Amendment (Mr. Woolliams) negatived: Yeas, 49; nays, 87.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, this bill has been introduced in the name of the Solicitor General of Canada. Will he answer questions in connection with these clauses as is usually done when other bills are before the house in committee?

I wish to ask the Solicitor General this question. According to this clause, murder is capital murder in respect of any person, where such person by his own act caused or assisted in causing the death of—

—a police officer, police constable, constable, sheriff, deputy sheriff, sheriff's officer or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace, acting in the course of his duties—

Why is this list not extended to include civilians impressed by the police into assisting them in enforcing the law? The Ontario government compensation act which assists victims in such cases is for the benefit of the families of policemen killed in the performance of their duties and, in addition, for the benefit of families of civilians impressed by the police to assist in the performance of their duties. Suppose the police want to use a car belonging to a civilian. They say "Chase that man!" The civilian driving the car is shot dead. The man who has shot him would still get life imprisonment according to this bill, though if he had shot the policeman riding alongside him he would swing for it. Why is the civilian not included in this clause? People impressed into the service of the police are required by law to comply when a policeman makes such a request.

Mr. Pennell: Let me say at once that I appreciate the sincerity and the deep feelings of the hon. member for York-Humber on this question. I realize that in connection with some of these amendments I am open to criticism both from retentionists and total abolitionists. I have to accept such criticism for the sake of the survival of the bill. I made a careful analysis of the vote on the last occasion and I was satisfied that the bill would not survive unless provision was made for the exceptions now contained in it. However, I feel that if we were to extend the categories mentioned in this clause we would be defeating the principle of the bill. I am sure the hon. member understands that it is open to him to put his proposal in the form of an amendment and submit it to the will of the committee. But I had hoped to reduce the categories to the very minimum consistent with getting the bill through.

Mr. Woolliams: I should like to ask the Solicitor General this question. Under the criminal law of Canada, if a policeman calls on a citizen to assist him in making an arrest is the citizen not by law bound to go to the policeman's aid?

Mr. Pennell: I think it would depend on the circumstances which prevailed at the time the appeal for help came from the officer. I cannot give a categorical answer which would cover all circumstances.

Mr. Woolliams: With the greatest respect to the Solicitor General, it used to be that ministers had the benefit of advice from the experts when questions such as this were raised in committee. I think this matter is so important that the hon. gentleman should give us a more specific answer. If he is not completely familiar with this section of the code will he not take a few moments to ask the experts in his department or in the Department of Justice so that the committee may have this information? Is it not the case that if a policeman is seeking to arrest someone who is, shall we say, attempting to rob a bank, an indictable offence, any citizen upon whom he may call to assist him is bound to provide assistance in making that arrest? If the answer to that question is yes and the person who has been called upon to take this responsibility as a citizen and act as an agent for a policeman or guard is killed as a result, where does this bill stand in respect of such a person?

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, in respect of the question which has been brought up by the hon. member for Bow River, I believe it is well known in common law and in our Criminal Code that a person who has reason to suspect that a crime is being or is about to be committed has a right to help prevent the commission of that crime and/or help apprehend the offender. I think the Solicitor

General might direct his attention in this regard to the meaning of the word "employed". Does the word "employed" as used in this subclause mean employment within the ordinary meaning of the word as we understand it, that is, that it constitutes a definite relationship, not necessarily that of master and servant but a relationship implying payment of salary? If the word "employed" means a person not employed as a servant then, of course, the hon. member for Bow River has made a valid point. However, if the meaning of the word "employed" as it is used in this legislation is that which is currently understood, then I think the Solicitor General has his answer there.

Mr. Woolliams: In respect of the interpretation of the word "employed" may I say that when those of us who are lawyers appear before the courts we find that the interpretation of a section in an act is not based on what has been said here in parliament in respect of what is intended. It is the court which interprets what the words mean. When we look at the words in this subclause I think that the least we can say is that the meaning is pretty ambiguous. It says:

> —a police officer, police constable, constable, sheriff, deputy sheriff, sheriff's officer or other person employed for the preservation—

If a police officer in a bank calls upon a citizen who happens to be in that bank to help him make an arrest, I question whether it could be interpreted that this person was employed at that time.

Miss LaMarsh: Of course not.

Mr. Woolliams: I agree with the Secretary of State who is a very able lawyer and who has said, "Of course not."

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Do I understand that if a person is called upon by a law officer to assist him and refuses to do so he would be subject to a penalty?

Mr. Woolliams: That is exactly what I asked the Solicitor General. I think that the answer would be yes to that question.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, may I say that the deputy solicitor general has suddenly been taken ill and has to return to his home. I had anticipated that he would be joining me this afternoon. In dealing with this question I should like to refer to section 110 of the Criminal Code. I agree with the original submission of the hon. gentleman that everyone who omits, without reasonable excuse, to assist a public officer or police officer in the execution of his duty in arresting a person or in preserving the peace, after having reasonable notice that he is required to do so, is guilty of an offence. This brings us back again to the answer I gave to the hon. member for York-Humber. It depends upon the circumstances. If a criminal is shooting, then surely no citizen could be charged for not coming to the assistance of the officer if there is danger to his own life. On the other hand, if the officer asked for help to arrest a person and there was no danger to the private citizen, then I believe there would be an obligation on the part of the private citizen to assist the officer. I am not making the categorical answer that in every case he would be charged with an offence.

Mr. Woolliams: It is 25 years since I studied law but it is my understanding—and I believe the Solicitor General will find there are some cases in this regard—that if a policeman calls upon a citizen in a bank to assist him in making an arrest and the citizen refuses, the citizen could be charged with an offence. Whether it is dangerous or not dangerous is not the question. When he says, "Mr. Brown, will you assist me in arresting this robber who is holding a gun at the head of a citizen" and Mr. Brown refuses, then I think Mr. Brown may have committed an offence in having failed to do so.

The reason for this offence is very obvious. The British have gone a lot farther in this regard than have the United States authorities. Why do the same things not happen in Great Britain which we know happen in the United States? There was a recent case in the United States where a woman walking down a street in New York was stabbed and no one came to her assistance. In Canada and Great Britain it is written into the code that a citizen must accept a responsibility to help preserve law and order and the peace of the country. I am sure that is how the law would be interpreted by any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. Pennell: It would depend on the circumstances which prevail at the time and whether there is a reasonable excuse. The hon. member mentioned New York state. May I point out to him that the bill before us is almost identical in principle with a bill introduced in the legislature of that state in respect of a change in the penal code.

Mr. Woolliams: I am not saying that this bill is not like the New York state bill but I am saying that certainly there is a section in the code which states that a person may be called upon to assist the police. This is what in many cases makes the law in Canada and Great Britain different from the law in the United States. If the bill is merely drawn to get a certain kind of measure through the house we have a pretty weak situation, but if the bill is drawn with the idea of protecting police officers then as a member of this house I want to be assured that, if police officers are protected, anybody else who accepts the responsibility of a peace officer is also protected.

If Mr. A in a bank is called upon to help a policeman make an arrest, has a legal duty to do so and then is shot and killed, then does the accused who is convicted of murder become subject to capital punishment? My answer, of course, is that he does not. This private citizen is not employed. What we are doing by this bill is saying that when someone shoots and kills a policeman that person is subject to capital punishment but that if a private citizen who is called upon to take the same responsibility is killed then the person who killed that private citizen is subject only to life imprisonment. In addition, after he is imprisoned it may very well happen that often ten years, one month and one day or some other period he is out again.

Why should we not write into this bill protection for the private citizen in this type of situation? If this bill is a mere compromise vis-à-vis completely abolishing capital punishment, then I say that in its broader sense—and this is not a reflection on the minister personally or on his intelligence—it is a dishonest attempt. I use that word in the right rather than in the wrong sense. If that is all the minister is trying to do, abolish capital punishment, then putting in these little tidbits of protection is nothing less than a disservice and a departure from the minister's responsibility. That is my position.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, having regard to the argument that has been taking place I should like to suggest that hon. members look closely at this clause of the bill. The whole basis of the argument advanced by the member for Bow River is related to a situation in a bank where a bandit with a gun is holding everybody at bay and a policeman asks John Q. citizen to assist him in making an arrest. It is inherent in the hon. member's argument that the citizen is in terrible danger because the bandit knows that if he shoots the policeman he will swing but if he shoots the citizen he will only get 10 years, eight months and some days. I suggest that this argument is silly and borders on the ridiculous. We should not waste any more time on it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Chairman, the Solicitor General suggested that he does not want to add more categories to the exceptions. I think this difficulty could be solved very easily if we took the time to include a better definition of what "or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace" means. It would be a very simple matter to define that category as including people who are pressed into temporary law enforcement duties.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, speaking as a former police officer I must say that on many occasions I was embarrassed because the law has not been made clear on this point. I think we should take the necessary time now to clarify the law. We can no longer rely on the common law of England since the famous peeping Tom case which went as far as the Supreme Court. At that time the court indicated that the common law of England was no longer valid except by reference in principle. I do not think reference in principle is good enough to satisfy the purposes of this bill.

It is very important that the point in question be clarified. I cannot help but agree with my colleague, the hon. member for Bow River, that the interpretation of the law is in many cases more important than the law itself. I can see no reason for not standing this clause, or doing whatever protocol requires, until such time as this part is clarified once and for all so that the courts will know what we mean by "employed" as a peace officer.

It is my understanding that as soon as I get someone to help me carry out my duties as a police officer, that individual is in fact a peace officer whether or not he is paid. When an individual is called upon to help a police officer to make an arrest to preserve the peace he is in effect acting as a peace officer, and whether or not he is being paid is unimportant. Let me give an example. If I as a police sergeant were wounded in the course of carrying out my duties and I handed my revolver to a private citizen whom I had called upon to assist me, surely that private citizen would become at least a peace officer if not a police officer. I should like to see this bill clearly defined so that everyone will know exactly where such an individual will stand in these circumstances.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Athabasca spoke on a point in which I am very interested. The hon. member for Timmins missed that point entirely, and surely it is not within his prerogative to refer to those arguments of hon. members who are attempting to protect women, children and individuals who have been forcibly drafted into service as law officers as being silly. The hon. member for Bow River was not referring to private individuals who had a reasonable excuse for not assisting a police officer. He was speaking of those individuals called upon to assist in making an arrest. I suggest the hon. member for Timmins should remain in his seat and listen to these arguments rather than make such references to hon. members.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I did not say the hon. member for Bow River was silly; I said he was using a silly argument.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Yes, and who else in the house can split hairs better than the hon. member. You may be an authority on splitting hairs—I do not mean to be personal—but you have to spread it around, Murdo.

As the hon. member for Athabasca indicated, any individual called upon by a law offer to assist is in essence, during the time he is giving that assistance, a law officer. Perhaps I am splitting hairs, but if I am asked by a police officer to assist him in carrying out the law of the country, by giving that assistance I am helping to carry out that law and at least for that time I am a law officer. Under such circumstances I deserve the same protection referred to by the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the points raised by the hon. member for York-Humber and the hon. member for Bow River. After looking at paragraph (a) of new subsection 2 I have come to the conclusion that we should not pass this bill without amending this part. After the word "peace" in paragraph (a) we should make clear who these people are in addition to police officers who might be acting in the course of their duty. A person who has been asked by a police officer to give assistance in enforcing the law or to assist in apprehending a criminal is not covered under paragraph (a), or at least not in my interpretation of it. It says:

> —or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace—

For example, under the present wording a private citizen or civilian would not be classified as employed in the preservation of the public peace. Neither would such a person be acting in the course of his duties. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Bow River, the courts would interpret this in an entirely different way.

During second reading I pointed out the confusing nature of this bill. For this reason the bill did not deserve the support it received in the house this afternoon. In view of the rapid increase in the crime rate it is my opinion that the bill should not pass out of the committee stage until we include the same penalty for the murder of a person assisting a law officer. If the hon. member for Bow River or the hon. member for York-Humber has a suitable amendment I will support it. If they do not have such an amendment ready I have one I should like to put before the house.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I think we are on common ground in respect of the weakness of the new subsection 2. The common ground, is that, first of all, if a person is called upon to assist a policeman to carry out the law, is employed or engaged in the preservation and maintenance of the public peace, or is called upon to assist in making an arrest, that person is acting in the same capacity, with the same responsibility, and is taking the same chances as a police officer.

I must disagree with my hon. friend from Athabasca if he meant that when a person does this he is actually defined as a police officer under this clause. The Solicitor General and I are on common ground, because the answer is no. That person is merely a civilian and citizen and is not a police officer employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace. In that regard this clause is not ambiguous; it excludes the citizen and fails to protect him.

There is another point in this respect, Mr. Chairman. A question was raised by one of my good friends about a citizen's arrest. It is the responsibility of any citizen to assist a police officer in making an arrest. If the hon. member for Peace River and myself were in a public place and saw someone committing an offence, the responsibility would be on us, as citizens of Canada, to make an arrest. If in making that arrest we were killed we would not be protected under this bill.

Mr. Fairweather: If you were killed you would not need much protection.

Mr. Woolliams: My good friend probably takes a different view. Do you think this is a good bill?

Mr. Fairweather: No, I do not.

Mr. Woolliams: All right. This is a very serious omission. I think the Solicitor General is really trying to protect police officers and guards in jails. I would ask the Solicitor General's experts to consider this suggestion. The clause refers to "a police officer, police constable, constable, sheriff, deputy sheriff, sheriff's officer or other person", and so on. Instead of using the word "employed" I would ask that the experts of the Solicitor General think about using the word "engaged" for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace.

To my mind the word "employed" carries the interpretation of someone "employed" as a police officer and receiving renumeration as such. But a person so "engaged" might be any person; he might be a citizen or a police officer. If this suggestion were adopted, the provisions of this clause would apply to all those people exercising the jurisdiction and carrying out the function of a police officer or prison guard.

I should like to hear what the Solicitor General has to say about this suggestion. I should like to know whether he is prepared now to move an amendment to cover this situation. I know he is very sympathetic to suggestions, and I am pleased that he is. We all know that he carries out his duties with a great deal of responsibility. I hope he will consider this suggestion because it is important.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, as a mental barbarian who has been accused of harbouring criminal and savage ideas, I do not mind in the slightest being told that the arguments we are now advancing are silly. We are used to this kind of reply to our legitimate arguments. I listened with interest to the hon. member for Timmins when he presented the case of a possible bank hold-up where a policeman and a man with him were endeavouring to arrest a bank bandit for prosecution. The hon. member said that the argument is silly, that the bandit is not going to stop to figure out whether he will shoot the policeman or the civilian.

I ask the Solicitor General this question, and I am very happy to see that my friend the hon. member for Perth is in his seat because this involves an incident that happened in the town of Listowel in his riding. Some time ago a policeman, in the performance of his duties, called at a farmhouse in the area. This policeman had in his car a long-time friend, a civilian. No one knows to this day whether his friend was impressed to help him in serving a legal document on this person. The person against whom the legal document was to be executed shot them both dead. Under the provisions of this bill, if the crown proceeded against and obtained a conviction for the murder of the policeman the murderer could swing, but if the crown proceeded on exactly the same charge in respect of the death of the civilian the murderer could serve a sentence of life imprisonment which may be only, as has been said, 8 years, 10 months and 1 day. I ask, is this right? Is it fair? That Listowel case is still before the courts. This is not ancient history; it is right at the moment, 1967.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I have listened carefully to the submissions made by hon. members on this point. I believe I should point out that if we are to define a private citizen assisting a policeman as a police officer as far as capital murder is concerned, it might involve a number of other sections of the Criminal Code. I am prepared to give an undertaking to the committee that I will discuss this point with my colleague the Minister of Justice. We now have amendments to the Criminal Code in hand and will seriously consider this point, because if any change should be made regarding a person assisting a police officer, it should apply not only to cases involving capital punishment but to all sections. If any change is to be made, in my respectful submission it ought to be made in the definition section. I am prepared to give an undertaking that I will discuss this question with my colleague the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not want to delay consideration of this bill, Mr. Chairman, but if the Solicitor General is going to consider this suggestion I ask whether he would be prepared to let the clause stand. Otherwise, to have an undertaking such as this means nothing. This is no reflection on the undertaking of the Solicitor General. If the minister is not prepared to let the clause stand, I am prepared to move an amendment in this regard. It will take just a moment to prepare the amendment. This is in my view a serious and important omission in the clause and I hope the Solicitor General will give careful consideration to the suggestion made. We are in the process of enacting law which will be on the statute books for a long time. I hope we do not have this matter before us again soon.

Everybody has spoken very seriously in regard to this problem, whether he be for abolition, retention or a compromise. I hope this provision has not been thrown in as a tidbit in order to pilot the bill through, because this is a serious problem. I know the minister has given it that degree of seriousness that he should. I believe this question is so important that the experts should look at it. We are federal legislators. Those of us on this side of the house do not have the services of experts who may be able to see something we have overlooked in our haste in drawing up an amendment. If the undertaking of the minister means anything from a practical, functional point of view, I would ask him to stand the clause and let us deal with the remaining clauses.

If the minister's experts draw up an amendment it would perhaps be passed without any difficulty. Surely everybody would agree with that. But if we just agree to pass the bill on the undertaking that the Solicitor General will consider this suggestion and between now and third reading something will be done about it, that is straight hogwash.

Mr. Pennell: Without being disrespectful to the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that he should put his amendment. If the amendment is defeated, I still give my undertaking to discuss this question with the Minister of Justice. I appreciate the hon. member's point, that I am not giving a guarantee that the clause will be changed.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether a redefinition of "peace officer" or "police officer" would have anything whatever to do with the exceptions which are contained in the bill. I cannot understand how redefining who is a police officer would make a civilian, acting in the maintenance of the public peace, a police officer, no matter what you do with the other sections of the Criminal Code.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Since this is merely a definition of the persons who are presumably being protected, would it not be more logical to substitute the word "engaged" for "employed" before the words "for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace"? That would surely include any other person. But I cannot agree that changing the definition of a peace officer would have the effect of changing the bill.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Pugh: First, I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether there is any compensation for a peace officer killed in the execution of his duty. Obviously the Solicitor General knows where I am heading. Second, I am wondering whether the family of a private citizen who witnesses a bank hold-up and becomes a victim would be entitled to compensation in the event of his death. This is but one further step in providing protection.

Mr. Pennell: I must apologize to the hon. member. I did not quite catch all he was saying because of conversations behind me. Would he mind repeating the last part of his question? I thought it related to compensation for a person assisting a peace officer.

Mr. Pugh: Yes. Let me put it this way. Let us say a private citizen who witnesses a hold-up is pressed into service by a policeman. At that stage he comes to the aid of a policeman in a hold-up. A gun is produced and the private citizen is killed. I should like to ask the Solicitor General, first, whether there is compensation for the wife and family of the policeman or peace officer, and second, whether compensation would be provided to the wife and family of a private citizen in the event of his death if he is not in the category of people included in this amendment.

Mr. Pennell: I am not aware of any federal law which would provide compensation. Compensation for peace officers depends on whether they are municipal or provincial officers. The R.C.M.P. have provisions for compensation to dependants of peace officers killed in the execution of their duty. However, I know of no federal law that provides compensation for a private citizen.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the amendment about to be moved by my hon. friend for Bow River is completely out of order in that it is a complete antithesis of the whole purpose of the bill. It is my recollection that when the current Criminal Code was amended under the aegis of the present hon. member for Kamloops—I was instrumental then in having the section with respect to police officers and wardens inserted as part of capital murder—there was no discussion or proposal to bring in either the category of private citizens who are pressed into service by a police officer or the other category of citizens who accept their responsibility and take action in emergency situations. Neither of these categories was included. Not having the Criminal Code here and not having dealt with the criminal law for a number of years it would seem to me, nevertheless, that if the kind of amendment being discussed were put into the bill we would be broadening the category beyond those who are in the category of capital murder.

Mr. Baldwin: We have already accepted two such amendments.

Miss LaMarsh: The hon. member means the ones we have already discussed. I did not rise on a point of order to discuss them but I am rising on this particular amendment. It seeks to broaden the category of those included. I think it is against the principle which the house has already accepted.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Would the hon. lady permit a question? She is raising an objection to this amendment and yet similar amendments were accepted by the committee previously. Why did she sit and wait until the third amendment was put forward before raising an objection?

Miss LaMarsh: I cannot comment on the past two votes, particularly the last one, regarding their frivolity or otherwise. However, I am raising the point on this amendment before the committee votes on this matter. We have been sitting here for the last hour debating a point which I think is out of order and is a waste of our time, it being an addition to the law which was initiated by the hon. member for Kamloops who did not seek to extend protection to citizens in that category.

Mr. Fulton: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The point made by the hon. lady might be applicable if this were a bill preceded by a resolution. The well established principle is that one cannot introduce amendments in the house or in committee which carry the terms of such a bill beyond those authorized by the resolution. There is no such limitation on this kind of bill. We are in committee dealing with the category of persons whose murder would attract the penalty of capital punishment if they are killed. It is surely perfectly in order to suggest an additional category or even five additional categories. May I suggest with respect that under our rules there is no such limitation as suggested by the hon. lady.

Miss LaMarsh: Certainly the reason that I voted against the bill on second reading was that the principle of the bill limited abolition to be enforced for a limited period of time with one exception. I think that any extension beyond that is against the principle and therefore should not be received.

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. lady could quote a rule of the house in support of her contention we could come to grips with the matter, but I submit that she is conjuring up a limitation which in fact does not exist.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I say a few words on the point of order raised by the Secretary of State, and perhaps at the same time I might make some remarks on the substance of the proposal.

I think it will be obvious that I will be opposed to the amendment which the hon. member for Bow River may propose, but I defend his right to move it. It seems to me that what has been given to the committee of the whole is a bill which restricts the application of capital punishment to the two categories set out in the bill. I think the committee has the right either to restrict it further or to restrict it less. Therefore I think it was in order—and I hope it is not out of order for me to say this—for us to seek to restrict the application of capital punishment further by the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and others who have moved amendments going the other way were perfectly in order. If necessary, I could produce citations, such as citations 406, 408 and one or two others of Beauchesne's fourth edition. Clearly what is before us is not a bill of absolute abolition, nor one that is legislating de novo with respect to capital punishment. It is a bill that restricts the application of capital punishment to something less than is now the law of the land. The restriction is brought down to the two categories in the bill. We tried to restrict it still further, while other hon. members sought to restrict it to a lesser extent. It seems to me that amendments either way are in order, and the very fact that the house has already voted on three amendments, ours which would have restricted it further and the others which would have restricted it to a lesser extent, makes it in order for the hon. member for Bow River to move an amendment as he may be doing now.

Perhaps while I am on my feet I might say in the same vein that what the Solicitor General has given to us is a compromise bill which restricts capital punishment to two categories. He has stood against making these restrictions any narrower. He did this when he voted against our amendment. That is his right, and he has given us quite clearly his reasons for doing so. I think he and those associated with him should, by the same token, resist the efforts to widen the exceptions. Therefore I think the proposed amendment which the hon. member for Bow River seeks to move is in order, but I think the house which has refused to go one way away from the Solicitor General's proposal should refuse to go the other way and we should vote against the proposed amendment.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, I cannot understand why anybody should object to the fact that we want clarification of what we are voting for. It is not irrelevant for any member of the house, before he stands up to vote, to ask for clarification of the matter upon which he is voting. After reading this clause I do not know whether as a policeman, a lawyer or a civilian I am protected by the provisions of this bill. I think we should clarify the clause here and now. We should not leave it to anybody to interpret the will of parliament because the point is very narrow. If the minister does not wish to broaden the effect of the part of the bill retaining capital punishment, we should know. As I read the bill, I am not sure whether the provision covers a policeman who is paid or whether it means any number of characters who could be covered by various interpretations of the bill.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat disappointed that we cannot get this clause stood until the experts have come up with some ideas. I gathered from what the minister said that he was sympathetic to this argument. Perhaps some of his friends are not, but I thought he was sympathetic. This matter is very important. I am not trying to delay the bill, but I am prepared to move an amendment. I ask the Solicitor General to think about it and let us trade places for a few moments. Here we are, legislating upon a very important matter, and I am asked, in a few seconds with people talking all around me, to change an important piece of legislation. If this change were accepted it would be the law for a long time to come with reference to the very important matter of whether or not capital punishment will be implemented or abolished for a certain class of people. As I say, this is a very important matter.

I recall that when I studied criminal law we studied a famous Irish case and if you put a comma in the sentence capital punishment would be implemented but if you took out the comma the person would get life imprisonment. This is how serious the matter is. It is not what we say in parliament that is important; it is the wording of the act that will be important. The courts look at that wording and say, this is what parliament must have intended.

It is against the law to get up in any court and quote Hansard when you are arguing a point of law. The Registrar General knows that, the Solicitor General knows that, and the Secretary of State knows that. They are all good trial lawyers. I know the Solicitor General is sympathetic to my argument. If he is then I ask him, in all decency allow this clause to stand. I am aware of the pressure. It is being said that somebody is trying to delay the bill, that the debate has been going on for a long time. I have made one speech. I do not mind saying that we have had discussions with various people here trying to bring on the vote. We on this side, and many others on that side have not tried to delay the bill. There may have been some delay, but that is not for me to criticize.

I ask the minister once again, before I move my amendment, if he will allow this clause to stand. Surely this is the time to get the best possible piece of legislation. On many occasions we do waste time in the House of Commons, but now we are dealing with an important subject so let us take the time to give it thought.

Mr. Pennell: As I said earlier, Mr. Chairman, I am in agreement with the hon. member for Bow River regarding the position of a person assisting a police officer. A private individual, even though called upon to assist a police officer in the execution of his duty, is not defined as a peace officer. Therefore if he were killed in the course of assisting a peace officer it would not be capital murder under the bill now before the house. I just wanted to make sure that the hon. member for Bow River and I are ad idem on that point.

Mr. Woolliams: Now we have come to grips with each other on our understanding of the law. Does the Solicitor General not think that by failing to cover this situation in the bill he is increasing the difficulty of the police? I believe we are going to reduce the moral standards of this country to the level of those in the United States where they allow citizens to be killed on the streets of New York without anyone coming to their assistance. If I as a citizen realize that I must take the responsibility of a policeman and exercise his jurisdiction and yet I do not have the protection under this bill that a policeman has, then surely the citizen is being asked to do more than the policeman is expected to do.

What is going to happen? A citizen is going to say: Well, parliament legislated to protect the policeman but they are not going to protect me so the policemen are on their own. This is the reason behind it. Once again, before I move my amendment, I ask the Solicitor General to allow the clause to stand. I have consulted some lawyers over here and I believe the amendment is good. I think I have been asked this afternoon to do something that is beyond the capabilities of anyone. The Solicitor General is now talking to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who is the Acting Prime Minister. I appeal to you, sir, to allow this clause to stand, take a look at it and bring it back after supper. I will take a look at it and then I can move my amendment. You can get your experts to look at it and if you go along with my argument, then you move an amendment. Surely that is not unreasonable. I ask the Acting Prime Minister to discuss it. Surely it is his responsibility to ask that this clause be allowed to stand until after supper. I can only promise one thing, I can guarantee that hon. members over here will give you every bit of co-operation.

We have had the vote on second reading and those who were opposed to the bill voted against it. Surely on this important matter the minister will reconsider, allow the clause to stand and give us time to bring in a proper amendment. You will have time to discuss it with your colleagues. Is two hours too much to ask for?

Mr. Pennell: The hon. member has put his case with considerable force and feeling. I am prepared to suggest that we stand his proposed amendment for a moment and I will entertain any other amendments that may come forward. Then we will come back to the amendment suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. Cowan: As the one who first brought up this question of a civilian being impressed to aid a policeman, I want to thank the hon. member for Bow River for having presented the case so eloquently. I support every word he uttered. I now wish to bring up a question for the Solicitor General along the same lines. I referred to this matter the other day. There was a bank holdup at Downsview by a man named Smith. There was a customer in the bank by the name of Blanc. When Smith left the bank to go to his car in an effort to escape, the customer Blanc took a rifle or pistol from the bank accountant and went outside. He shot two or three times at this chap Smith.

Smith then got out of the car with a rifle and blew off the top of Blanc's head while Blanc was down on one knee shooting at him. By the time the policemen got there Blanc was dead. Blanc was not assisting any policeman; no policeman had asked him to assist him. Blanc was trying to preserve peace and order. Smith was caught and convicted of murder but a merciful cabinet commuted his sentence to life imprisonment. He later committed suicide in prison and cheated the cabinet of its great desire to rehabilitate him into a gentleman.

My contention is that the family of the victim is entitled to some protection. Why should the law make a distinction because the man is a civilian, not a policeman? Why should the penalty be life imprisonment whereas if the man had shot a policeman he would be executed?

The hon. member for Peace River put his finger on this when he pointed out there is a basic law that if a civilian sees a criminal act being performed he should move to prevent it. Blanc moved to prevent such an act, but under the provisions of this bill the man charged could only be sentenced to life imprisonment. If a policeman had come along and had been shot dead, Blanc would have been executed. Therefore I ask the committee to consider cases of civilians who endeavour to preserve and maintain the public peace without being impressed to do so by the police.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, although I still question the advisability of participating in exchanges between lawyers I should like to make one point. It may be all right for the Solicitor General to give assurances to this side of the house as minister in charge of the legislation, but members on this side of the house have had experience of accepting such undertakings. Members have left the house with the understanding that something would be done but when they returned they found that the minister no longer headed the department in question. With all the switching that takes place so frequently on that side, we cannot rely on the Solicitor General being minister of this department on Monday of next week.

Perhaps I am being a little facetious in saying that, but since it is difficult for lay members to understand the actions of lawyers and courts I would ask the minister this question. Since he is having trouble in accepting the suggestion of the hon. member for Bow River to replace the word "employed" with the word "engaged" and since the minister refuses to stand the bill, is it his intention at a later date to amend the Criminal Code to remove the penalty that can be imposed on any individual who refuses to assist a police officer? Each and every citizen of this country could be penalized for not coming to the assistance of a police officer. If a civilian does assist a police officer, those who support the minister are refusing absolutely to give him the same protection they give that police officer. At the same time, if a civilian refuses to help a policeman those same members are imposing a penalty upon him under the law.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, if the minister is unable to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Bow River, which is supported by some members on that side of the house, and give protection to those who assist police officers, then I ask him to remove the penalty that can be imposed on any person who refuses to assist a police officer.

Mr. Basford: I will be brief, Mr. Chairman. It has been said that those who support this provision in the bill are not concerned about private citizens who are either impressed into acting as police officers or who voluntarily serve as police officers. It seems to me the hon. member for Kamloops could be of great assistance to the committee at this point, because the definition in Bill C-168, clause 1, paragraphs (a) and (b), is the same that the hon. member for Kamloops, when he was minister of justice for Canada, put into section 202A of the Criminal Code, in which section he established the distinction between capital and non-capital murder. In section 202A of the existing code capital murder is defined in subsection (2) (c) as follows:

> —such person by whose own act caused or assisted in causing the death of
> (i) a police officer, police constable, constable, sheriff—

And so on. As I say, Mr. Chairman, they are the same words that are used in the bill before the committee.

The hon. member for Kamloops could be of great assistance to the committee by explaining why, when section 202A was incorporated in the Criminal Code, he did not include at the same time in subsection (2) (c) the words "citizens impressed as police officers or citizens voluntarily acting to keep the peace". I think such an explanation from the hon. member for Kamloops could be very helpful.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think hon. members will realize that this section was drafted in 1961, some six years ago, and it is not easy to remember all the details in connection with the reason that certain provisions were included in the legislation and certain provisions were not. My recollection is that it was the hon. lady, the Secretary of State, who raised the matter formally for the consideration of the committee and we conferred on the question at the time.

Concern had been expressed by the association of police chiefs, and the government and the committee felt that as an assurance of their position and as an indication that parliament, on behalf of society, recognized the importance of giving this protection, it would be appropriate to put the provision in the bill.

It has a particular significance now in the context of this discussion when you realize that at the time we were passing the legislation in 1961 ordinary civilians received the protection of the earlier portion of section 202A—the protection of the maintenance of capital punishment for planned and deliberate killing on the one hand, or for the killing of somebody in the course of committing some other planned and deliberate crime on the other.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the provisions of the law which are now being repealed did in fact cover the case of a civilian acting in the circumstances my colleague from Bow River has in mind. Under the provisions of the law as it now stands, if a bandit or a bank robber had the intention of robbing a bank and in the course of committing the robbery he shot a civilian, then he would be guilty of capital murder, he having killed in the course of committing a deliberate and planned crime. So the civilian received that protection under the law as it was enacted in 1961.

I do not think I should go any further than that. We felt we were not making a clear distinction between the position of the civilian and the policeman by the inclusion of the later portions of 202A, such as will be the result of the proposed repeal of the earlier portion of that section. I do not know whether I am making myself clear, but we did feel we were not making a distinction between the actual position of civilians and policemen by the inclusion of that provision. The civilian had the protection of the general law relating to capital punishment. Whereas if we now eliminate that protection and retain only the provisions relating to police officers and prison wardens, then they are the only category of people whose killing attracts the penalty of capital punishment. That is the distinction my hon. friend from Bow River is complaining about.

Mr. Baldwin: May I make one brief comment? As the wording is now I think the meaning is quite definite. Using what is known amongst lawyers as the ejusdem generis rule, we should interpret a section such as this in the light of what has already been suggested. Unquestionably paragraph (a) of new subsection 2 in clause 1 encompasses "a police officer, police constable, constable, sheriff, deputy sheriff, sheriff's officer, or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace." It includes all those who assist in preserving peace and order. To make my point clear, I point out that section 436 of the Criminal Code says:

Any one—

That means any one at all.

—may arrest without warrant a person who, on reasonable and probable grounds, he believes

(a) has committed a criminal offence—

Sometimes certain persons, even though they are not police officers, restrain others from breaking the law. Under the Criminal Code they have the right to arrest.

Directing my remarks for a moment to the amendment which the hon. member for Bow River wishes to move, I may say that I will help him draft it and I shall vote against it. I do not like what is contained in the subsection; I suffer under it and I will not do anything to expand its provisions. Even if the minister or the government were to draft the amendment and bring it forward, I would still vote against it.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder whether the minister would use his customary discretion and stand this clause? Those who are drafting the amendment ought to have a little time to consider it. The minister could discuss with his officials what should be done. We might save time. That has been done hundreds of times in this house. Between 6 p.m. and 8 p.m. agreement might be reached between the minister and those who propose the amendment. On the other hand, if the minister is completely inflexible—and he will have from 6 p.m. to 8 p.m. to consider the matter—from 5.45 p.m. until 6 p.m. myself and others will repeat the arguments which have been made. What other pressure can we bring to bear on an inflexible minister?

I listened to the debate this afternoon on this clause. Very wisely, the hon. member for York-Humber introduced a problem we ought to consider. He gave us an example of a citizen who, acting on behalf of society, participated in an attempt to check those who wanted to break the law. Arguments have been advanced with regard to those who are impressed to assist police officers. Those arguments make sense to me. I intend to vote for the amendment that the hon. member for Bow River is preparing. If the minister wishes me to discontinue speaking I shall be pleased to if he will say whether he will stand clause 1 and continue with other parts of the bill. I pause to allow the minister to answer. Am I to continue talking or will he stand clause 1?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Churchill: The minister wants me to continue talking?

Mr. Flemming: He did not say that. It was some other fellow.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to know whether any further amendments to clause 1 were to be proposed. I agree with the suggestion of the hon. member. I propose to take the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Bow River under consideration and to stand the clause for the moment. I merely wanted to know whether other amendments to this clause were to be moved at this time. If there are no further amendments I shall stand this clause and continue with the next clause.

Mr. Churchill: Then I shall relinquish the floor. My understanding is that unless others wish to propose amendments to clause 1 at this time the minister will stand the clause.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, the Solicitor General suggested a moment ago that he wished to consider any other amendments to this clause. With respect to paragraph (b) of the new subsection 2 I wish to ask why prisoners who are confined to penitentiaries with convicted murderers are not to be given some protection under the law. New subsection 2 (b) reads:

Murder is capital murder—

Where one kills:

(b) a warden, deputy warden, instructor, keeper, gaoler, guard or other officer or permanent employee of a prison, acting in the course of his duties—

Why should fellow prisoners not be afforded protection under the law? I remind the Solicitor General, whom I have always thought a very intelligent officer of the crown, about the Santa Claus murderer, Marcotte, who turned state's evidence and was confined to jail in Winnipeg. The other inmates of the prison there raised hell—that is the only way to describe it—because they knew that he had been accused of complicity in the murder of two police officers.

There is honour among thieves and the prisoners in the Winnipeg jail let it be known that they did not want to associate with a criminal of the brand of Marcotte, whose sentence the cabinet had commuted to life imprisonment. That man has been moved from the Winnipeg prison because of the opposition of other prisoners to his presence. Should not protection be given to fellow prisoners when they have a convicted murderer among them? Why should we be told that when a man kills a warden, deputy warden, instructor, keeper, jailer, guard, or other officer or permanent employee of a prison he will swing for it but if that man kills another prisoner, the cabinet does not mind? After all, they will commute his sentence to life imprisonment. That seems to be the cabinet's job.

I say to you that fellow prisoners are entitled to as much protection as any warden, deputy warden, instructor, keeper, jailer or guard. Do not say to me that attacks on other prisoners do not occur, because they do. This very week there was a reported attack on a Canadian in a Mexican jail. He was attacked by fellow prisoners and may have been seriously injured. Who knows, he may have been killed.

These things do occur; prisoners attack fellow prisoners. If a man already is serving the maximum sentence of life imprisonment, which means eight years, ten months and one day, why should he not murder another prisoner? He will be given life imprisonment of eight years, ten months and one day and the sentence will be concurrent. I say that prisoners are entitled to as much protection as a warden, deputy warden, instructor, keeper, jailer, guard or other officer or permanent employee or any person listed in that subsection.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, if we are to widen the provisions of this clause we must not forget what happened in the House of Commons not long ago when someone attempted to throw a bomb. Unquestionably the man who was killed intended to throw the bomb on to the floor of the chamber. Should we not consider the uniformed officers who are employed by the House or Commons for security purposes? What if one of them had apprehended the man and tried to detain him and then had been killed by the exploding bomb? Should the House of Commons guards not be included in the provisions of this bill?

An hon. Member: They are included.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): My hon. friend who is an abolitionist says they are included. Should not the commissionaires across this country be included? I am thinking of the commissionaires who are hired by the Department of National Defence, the Department of Transport and other government departments. They are employed all over the country. Should they not be afforded the protection that is afforded to police officers, guards and others like them?

I bring up these points because of the concern we all felt when we learned that a man had intended to throw a bomb on to the floor of the house. We have a security staff, and I am told that they are police officers.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Fairweather: They are peace officers, not police officers.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I did not get that information from the Solicitor

General; I will accept it from the authoritative source from which it came. If they are considered to be police officers, then every commissionaire hired by the different departments is performing the same task as is carried out by the guards in the House of Commons.

There have certainly been objections registered to this clause. But then the bill as a whole has been objected to. If the Solicitor General sees fit to provide a couple of categories as he does in this clause, then there are thousands of people who can rightfully claim to be placed in those categories, among them commissionaires and others hired in the capacity of peace officers. But this is not recognized in the bill before us.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I rise briefly to register my protest against something which is creeping increasingly into this debate, namely, the supposition that the death penalty is somehow or other a great protection for anybody. I absolutely refuse to accept that I myself, for example, am protected by the fact that a person who might kill me would be hanged rather than committed to life imprisonment. I cannot accept it and I object to this notion becoming, as it were, part and parcel of the debate, as if by retaining the death penalty in the case of the murder of policemen and prison guards we were providing them with a great measure of protection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I was very pleased to hear the Solicitor General say a few moments ago that further amendments to this clause would be welcomed by him.

Mr. Woolliams: He did not say "welcomed".

Mr. Alkenbrack: I am also pleased to know that he is finally consulting with the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Pennell: On a question of privilege, if I said I welcomed amendments, I apologize. I meant to say I welcomed the amendments being put so I could study them.

Mr. Alkenbrack: My interpretation of the minister's statement has not changed. As I say, I am glad that even at this late stage the minister has admitted he is discussing these questions with the Minister of Justice. He may recall that on November 14, as reported on page 4284 of Hansard, I asked him whether he had discussed the merits of this bill, with all its confusion, with the Minister of Justice. Apparently the hon. gentleman has just come round to appreciating the value of taking the Minister of Justice into his confidence.

Members of the house know that in most of our pententiaries the buildings are so arranged that the staff residences are close at hand. It is not uncommon for the families of the wardens and other officials to live on the premises and on occasions they have become involved in kidnappings and other crimes committed by escaping prisoners. Wives and children have been and could be held as hostages during a getaway.

I suggest to the Solicitor General that in these circumstances further amendment to this clause is required by the addition of a further paragraph (c). Exceptions are presently made in the case of:

(a) a police officer, police constable, constable, sheriff, deputy sheriff, sheriff's officer or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace, acting in the course of his duties, or

(b) a warden, deputy warden, instructor, keeper, gaoler, guard or other officer or permanent employee of a prison, acting in the course of his duties—

A further paragraph, (c), might well be added to read "or any member of the family of any of these persons."

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock it is my duty to leave the chair in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Gray), Pollution—federal representation at provincial conference in Toronto; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), Public Works—Ottawa—Height of proposed national defence headquarters building; the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), Public service—committee report on pensions of retired civil servants.

It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills, public bills. As there are no notices of motions (papers) on today's order paper, the house will proceed to the consideration of private bills.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, there has been some discussion among the interested parties in connection with the bill standing as item No. 5 and I believe there is unanimous agreement among those members—it does not necessarily extend to all members of the house—that item 5 might be called first for the purpose of sending the bill to the committee on transport and communications without delay. Then we could proceed with the list as it stands.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The house will recognize, of course, that this can only be done by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): On the basis outlined by the hon. member who has just spoken, that there will be no debate.

• (6:00 p.m.)

PRIVATE BILLS

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES LIMITED

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-26, respecting Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and referred to the standing committee on transport and communications.

AETNA CASUALTY COMPANY OF CANADA

The house resumed from Thursday, October 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cameron (High Park) for the second reading of Bill No. C-112, to incorporate Aetna Casualty Company of Canada, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Gilbert (p. 1746).

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment on the amendment which is before the house. I recognize, of course, that in the history of the proposal which is contained in this bill the terms of the amendment have been met on more than one occasion in the sequence of events which surrounded the introduction of this proposal at various times during various sessions. I believe that the events of the past, so far as the particular proposal contained in this bill is concerned, were desirable. Therefore in my view the amendment now before the house will further continue a desirable situation in that the bill will not be read a second time.

I realize that at various times during various sessions there has been fairly extensive discussion about the questions involved in the proposal that this company be incorporated as a company under the laws of this country. These discussions have taken place in a scattered and desultory manner and therefore it is perhaps difficult to get the whole picture in one piece, as it were, unless one does a fairly extensive amount of research into the records of the debates in this house.

Perhaps I should recall to the attention of hon. members that this bill, if passed, would enable this foreign owned concern, if its announced intentions and desires were fulfilled, to expand an operation in the insurance field in this country which has been carried on to a point even though not by the company which is proposed in this bill. The proposal would authorize this firm to engage in a very wide range of casualty insurance. In fact, as has been pointed out previously, this is the bill which coincides with the alphabet inasmuch as the classes of insurance listed run from "a" to "zee", if I may use the Americanized version of the pronunciation of the last letter of the alphabet. So in order that the bill may be identified in the minds of members as the clauses come up for discussion, I suppose it could properly be called the alphabet soup bill.

I believe I should point out to the house, as I believe I did during earlier discussions, that this company would merely be duplicating the kinds of insurance coverage that are offered to the Canadian people by an almost innumerable body of insurance companies of various kinds which have been incorporated at both the federal and provincial levels. Apart from anything else, if we accepted the proposition of this company we would in my view be further duplicating the very costly and unwieldy methods under which at the present time the Canadian people are able to secure insurance coverage of the types enumerated. I find it difficult to imagine any procedure for meeting the desire of Canadians to protect themselves against loss more costly and inefficient than the system that already exists in this country because of the multiplicity of these companies with their heavy overhead, duplication of sales efforts and all the rest. These costs are inevitably tacked on to the premiums Canadians have to pay. From this point of view, so far as I am concerned it is a completely unnecessary exercise to assist this company in any way to expand its operations within the Canadian economy.

In addition to adding to the costs to the Canadian people of having insurance facilities available to them, because of the particular nature of the company and the fact that it will be owned outside our borders it will create a drain upon Canadian incomes to the extent that the profits of this company would be added to the actual costs of engaging in the insurance business. Although this is an argument which has been advanced many times, but no oftener than the circumstances which have developed in parliament justify, it does seem to me that the constant barrage of proposals we have been getting for the incorporation of new insurance companies should be an indication to the house and to the Canadian people that as the representatives of the Canadian people we are allowing a state of affairs to continue whereby obviously some people think they must have the opportunity to engage in a very lucrative business.

It is for this reason that I and some of my colleagues have been trying to make it clear that we cannot approve of this state of affairs. I think it is time that the Canadian parliament had a real look at this situation. I believe it is time that the Canadian people should be made aware of how they are being rooked by these people who pose as their benefactors through offering, as they say, the opportunity to be insured against individual loss.

I find it difficult to understand how placidly the majority of the members of this house—and of course as I look around me I note that there great throngs of members who are not in their places—generally are able to accept the continuance of this situation at a time when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) is telling us we are in a position of some economic difficulty and crisis in this country. We hear complaints from members in all parts of the house about the dangers and effects of the inflation which exists in the country today. Yet there appears to be very little or no apparent realization of the real sources or causes of inflation.

The hon. member for High Park, when sponsoring this bill at the second reading stage, suggested that by the passage of the bill we would increase employment in Canada. The more I think about that remark the more I am driven to the feeling that even though employment might be increased so far as this company is concerned it might decrease so far as another similar company is concerned. The house will recall the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron), who said in reply that the number of employees in this country might be increased but there are sufficient facilities and people in the business of supplying insurance services. He suggested there would not be a realistic increase in the number of people employed.

It seems to me that this argument makes it clear that the more people we have in this country engaged in non-wealth producing activities the worse off we are going to be.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): More leeches.

Mr. Barnett: I believe I have used that word on a number of occasions. These people are in effect leeches in our society, and this is the kind of activity which in my view is at the root of inflation. We have people perfectly capable of carrying on this type of activity now engaged in this business. By adding more people we are in effect precluding these people from taking part in a productive activity of some usefulness to the general economy of our society.

There is no better example of that than the entire field of casualty, accident and loss of property insurance. We have heard many debates in this country in respect of automobile insurance, one of the classes of insurance this company proposes to offer. There is an example of how this type of insurance can be made available cheaply and efficiently, and I refer to the publicly operated automobile insurance plan in the province of Saskatchewan. The only overhead involved is the cost of employing an individual in an office where license plates are issued, because the insurance is issued at the same time. There is, of course, the associated cost for the accounting which must be carried out.

The amendment before the house suggests that it is not in the public interest to give second reading to this bill. There have been many debates about a nation-wide insurance scheme to cover the cost of illness. This company is proposing to offer sickness insurance. It would be more efficient and less inflationary if provisions for sickness and loss of income as a result of illness were brought forward by the government as an addition to the medical health plan we hope is put into effect next July 1. Instead, we have the spectacle of the Minister of Finance trying by indirection to defeat the will of parliament regarding that limited insurance program under public auspices. I am sure this scheme will operate efficiently and at less cost. It should not be sabotaged or delayed.

It would be much more interesting if instead of dealing with the proposals contained in this bill the Minister of Finance would stand in his place and say that as part of his battle to fight inflation he intends to extend the medical care insurance plan to cover sickness insurance as a public responsibility. It is my suggestion that if such a plan were developed for everyone in Canada, anyone who was unfortunate enough to be sick or ill would not suffer a complete loss of income. This is the type of thing in which parliament should be interested instead of a passive acceptance of a situation which allows private businesses owned by foreign enterprises to drain the hard-won wealth of Canadians from this country. Somehow I get the impression that hon. members think we are just being ornery when we stand here making speeches in opposition to the passage of this type of bill.

An hon. Member: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. Barnett: We are trying to make it plain that in respect of bills of this kind we have nothing against the particular company involved but we feel there are sufficient companies engaged in this type of activity. The company named in this bill is no better or worse as far as we know than any other foreign company which attempts to gain control of the financial resources and savings of this country in order to use them somewhere else for the benefit of someone else. I cannot understand why parliament is prepared to carry on this procedure just because it was done 100 years ago. We should not accept this ancient ritual or mumbo jumbo in relation to private enterprise. We should not carry on placidly accepting this type of proposal which will allow the exploitation of the people.

The idea of pooled risk insurance is good but why should the present situation be perpetuated? The Canadian people are being forced to obtain protection through pooled risk insurance in a slap-dash, haphazard, inefficient and expensive way. This is the reasoning behind the amendment that this bill be not now read a second time but be read this day six months hence. Everyone is aware of the intent of such a motion. While it suggests a period of six months, members of the house realize that it means the proposal should not be accepted by parliament during this or any other session. That is the proposal we have before us in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Fawcett).

I would like to see members in other quarters of the house participate in debating this whole issue because in my submission this question is coming closer to home all the time. I think hon. members should realize that in this respect we cannot forever delay a decision on whether we are going to move toward the efficient operation of pooled risk as protection against individual loss under an efficiently operated public plan.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on a couple of points that have been raised by my colleague the hon. member for—

Mr. Barnett: Comox-Alberni.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Yes, Comox-Alberni. I keep getting these double and triple name constituencies mixed up. It seems that almost every hon. member from that far province has three or four long and tongue-twisting names to his constituency.

I should like to dwell for a few moments on one of the points raised by the previous speaker. If this bill is passed by the house and the company is incorporated, all it will really do is add one more to the great conglomeration of such companies that we have at the present time. I should also like to dwell for a few moments on some of the implications involved in this proposal. If this company is to operate successfully once it is established it will have a tough row to hoe. It will have to start a great advertising campaign to make itself known. It will have to buck the other companies. It will have to take advantage of the various advertising media—newspapers, radio and television. It will probably have to compete with some of the companies that now bring us all this great, free entertainment about which we hear so much, those that bring us free shows and hour-long television broadcasts. Of course, we are told that this is all for free but we must take that at its face value.

Unfortunately the unsuspecting public in this country far too often does not realize how dearly they have to pay for all this supposedly free entertainment that they receive. This is one thing which, unfortunately, is not brought home to the people. Far too often we tend to go along unsuspectingly and believe in the Santa Claus concept that we are getting all these things free.

If this company is to be successful it will have to get the ear and the eye of the Canadian public. It will have to spend a great deal of money to do this. This expenditure will, of course, be passed on to the customer and be paid by him as is the case with all advertising expenditures in our society. If the company does become successful it will stimulate all other such companies to try to recoup their losses and offset the inroads made by the new company. Other companies will have to increase their advertising budgets, sponsor bigger and better shows, and what have you. Who pays the bill for this? The same people, namely, the poor customers who have to turn to these companies to obtain for themselves and their families protection against loss from fire, death and so on. Thus, all we are doing by incorporating this company is adding to the rat race and compounding the situation.

I recall saying some years ago, when speaking on a similar subject, that it appeared the advertising and promotional organs of our society seemed to be working toward one end, to make the public buy what they do not need, with money they do not have, to impress people they do not like. After watching our society progress, if one can call it progression, over the years since making that remark I am reinforced in this belief.

As I say, the passage of the bill before us will result in adding one more to the great proliferation of companies that we have at the present time. Once more the general public, who will have to support this company when it becomes operative, will be inveigled into buying what they do not need and will possibly have to divert badly needed funds to pay the tariff for this protection, forgetting all the while that written right into the premium they will have to pay are all the costs that have been mentioned, the tremendous advertising costs which the company will have to incur in order to make its mark in the sun, so to speak, in the Canadian field.

The hon. member gave a rather good description of this company. He likened it to alphabet soup and said one of the letters of the alphabet was "c" and referred to "car" insurance. This company is apparently desirous of getting into the car insurance field. That seems rather strange in this day and age when all we hear from those companies already in the car insurance field are great screams of anguish because they are losing money. They would all like to get out of the field and are raising insurance rates at a terrific pace year by year. It seems rather strange that a company which has never been in the field would want to get into this type of money-losing proposition.

The time of this house would probably be put to much better use if we devoted our energy, effort, intelligence and brains to trying to devise ways of cutting down the rapidly increasing cost of car insurance rather than passing a bill of this nature which will create another creature that will add to the bloated cost that the long-suffering Canadian driving public has to bear. We would be far better employed looking into the whole concept of car insurance in this country and trying to reduce some of the great, unnecessary costs that we have to bear at the present time, not the least of which is the tremendous cost of litigation which is so rampant in this particular field. Many of my constituents have asked me why this continues. Is it because so many members of the legal profession are passing the laws in the House of Commons, and is this why they retain such a bonanza for the legal profession in this particular field? Frankly, I do not know. I do not like to accuse any of my colleagues who may belong to that profession of any such ideas, but it certainly does make the public wonder if in fact this is one of the reasons.

When we realize how little the paying public receives in benefits out of the premium dollar that they pay for their protection, we are made aware of the tragic and vicious situation. I recall a silicotic pensioner coming to me to see whether I could assist him because his young son at the age of 18 had become involved in a car accident. After two years of running through the courts, a decision was handed down requiring the young man to pay something in the neighborhood of $37,000. The father and the son had to go to the courts twice, first to establish the liability and then because the young lad was unemployed and his father had no money. Then they had to make application under what is known as the unsatisfied judgment fund. Here was this young fellow of 18 having to pay some $37,000, with interest accruing month by month. His father asked for my advice. Having had experience with one or two similar cases which I had investigated on behalf of my constituents, I gave him some frank advice, telling him that the only thing I could recommend was for his son to take the first boat to Australia, because he would never earn enough to get his head above water in such a situation.

It seems to me that surely, in view of the great number of insurance companies dealing with car insurance in this country at the present time, we will not improve the situation nor give better protection to the Canadian people by adding one more such company to the list. Our goal should be to work on behalf of our constituents and on behalf of the Canadian people so as to improve their lot, and not to pass a bill like this one which throws another yoke around the neck of the Canadian taxpayer.

Another point was raised by the previous speaker when he spoke about some of the problems a bill such as this one raises. He pointed out that the company we are discussing is foreign-owned, and that the profits it makes—let us face the fact that these companies are in business to make profit; they are not benevolent organizations—will be a drain on our country and will continue to add to the problem the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) has to cope with from time to time with regard to the balance of payments between Canada and the United States. If we pass this bill, what we will be doing in effect is to aggravate the situation.

Not long ago we had a bill before us—I am not sure of the date we discussed it, nor the number of the bill—for the incorporation of a company somewhat similar to the one we are now discussing, which undertook and guaranteed to become all-Canadian within ten years. I will be prepared at the appropriate time to propose an amendment requiring the same in this instance, because it appears to me that this is a very reasonable suggestion. After all, these companies come into Canada and ask the parliament of this country to pass a bill which would incorporate them, thus enabling them to ply their trade here. In view of the fact that, as I have said, they will add to the problems, trials and tribulations of the Minister of Finance and of the Canadian government I think it is only fair that we should have some guarantee that this will only be a temporary situation, and that we can look forward to a day in the not too distant future when this problem will be resolved.

This is about all that I have to say on the bill at the present time. I suggest that hon. members should consider with greater care bills such as this one, and should not automatically let them slide through —because this is what we have been doing for many years. I think certain aspects of this bill should receive close scrutiny from all hon. members, if we are to carry out our responsibility to our constituents and to the people of this country.

Mr. Bud Germa (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I think the concept of insurance is universally accepted by the majority of the Canadian population. We realize insurance is particularly necessary for the people who do not have the financial means to protect themselves from inadvertent loss, injury or damage. Therefore I believe that the concept of insurance is accepted by all of us. We hope this will continue, so as to enable people in the category I have mentioned to protect themselves. At the same time I think that those people who are less secure financially than the average person are entitled to protection at the minimum possible cost. Basically this is the reason why members in this corner of the house have for many years proposed that certain types of insurance, such as health insurance, automobile insurance and various other types of protection, should be supplied by the government at a basic cost.

In Canada there is a sufficiently large number of insurance companies to supply the protection which we require at the present time. If we add to their numbers we will be increasing the cost of insurance to the people requiring coverage. I believe that in Ontario there are 125 companies selling medical insurance. Each one of these companies, of course, has to have a president, 10 or 12 vice presidents and a couple of hundred salesmen scattered through the province, thus wasting time and money. I do not consider these people to be on the productive side of our economy. I feel they are more on the consumer side or the parasitic side, because in my view all things are paid for by those who produce the wealth. I do not believe selling insurance policies creates any new wealth; it is just using up the wealth that has been created by others who see fit to make that sort of contribution to our country.

• (6:40 p.m.)

At the moment there is a shortage of funds in Canada with which to carry out those measures we believe are important to the social aspects of this country. The incorporation of another insurance company would drain from our capital market funds with which the company would probably put up a 50 storey office building in the city of Toronto. The money expended on this air conditioned skyscraper could be used to build 10,000 houses for those people who see fit to produce the wealth, but who cannot get their hands on the material or money to enable them to obtain decent housing.

The building of more insurance company offices would not only be unwise, but it would detract from those projects we feel the country most sorely needs.

There is another threat in Canada today. The popular theme is that we cannot improve our standard of living until we increase our productivity. For the past eight or nine years, our productivity has risen from 3 per cent to 7 per cent. These people urge that if we are to increase our standard of living we must increase our output of goods. If we use this as a yardstick, then we must say that the more of us who contribute our time to production the more our productivity level will rise. Perhaps this is one of the reasons our productivity level has not risen as we think it should have, or as the economic council has recommended.

We see that there are some sectors of our society who are certainly doing their best to increase productivity. The steel workers, for example, are working hard to hold up these productivity figures. In fact they are working to such a degree that the productivity increase effected by steel workers in Canada is higher than for steel workers in the United States. This brings us back to a consideration of the question of wage parity. Why should not those who make steel in Canada get higher wages than those who make it in the United States, since the Canadian workers are producing more? As I say, therefore, the question of wage parity comes into this problem. When a man produces, certainly he should receive his just reward for that production.

By pulling all these insurance salesmen out of the production side of our society and putting them on the parasitic side, we are going to reduce our productivity. This would be bad for the entire population. Not only does it throw a heavier burden on those who have to try to hold up the productivity level, but I think everyone has to accept a certain degree of responsibility for the production of wealth in this country of ours.

During the last 31 years I have been on the production side of our society, and then six months ago I joined the parasitic side. I sit here tonight and feast on those who go down in the mines, in the mills or smelters, or wherever they are. Certainly, I did not want to come here to join this non-productive group of people. I think the main reason for my coming here was to help the ones who are carrying the load—and I am referring to the individuals who would have to go out and buy insurance at inflated prices. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, we have to look further than merely creating another insurance company; we have to think how this will affect Canada.

This company seeks to conduct business in many fields, one of which is fire insurance, one of the most important aspects of the insurance industry. Regardless of how poor a man is, he has to have a dwelling wherein he may find shelter. Certainly if this building, regardless of its value, is devastated by fire, he is out in the cold. He has to protect himself; so he has to go out and buy this type of insurance, regardless of price. I believe he has to pay a price which bears no relationship to the protection he receives.

The hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) cited some of the excessive costs, including television programs, which insurance companies have incurred. We all know the cost of these things, and we all know who ultimately bears the cost. It is the person who has to go to the marketplace and buy insurance. When these people are watching television at night, they do not realize they have paid for the program ten times over, and could probably go down to the corner theatre and see the same show for less. This is an expensive advertising medium. The insurance companies show no restraint, in the knowledge that, regardless of what they spend on programs—$30,000 or $40,000 their salesmen will be out on the street tomorrow recouping that loss from the poor, innocent, unwashed victims who are on the productive side of society.

There is one other aspect of insurance with which this company proposes to deal, and that is insurance on motor vehicles. In Ontario alone there are approximately 400 companies selling automobile insurance. I am sure you are aware, Mr. Speaker, in fact I believe everybody in Ontario is aware of the high cost of protecting an automobile from accident or protecting yourself from a damage suit. The other day I saw a figure indicating how much the people of Ontario spend for this type of insurance, and if I remember correctly it was about $600 million that was being spent for dubious insurance protection.

One inherent weakness of all automobile insurance policies in Ontario is that the policyholder must prove negligence before he can recover damages. Let me explain this further. I have paid my insurance premium of $200. Car drivers in Ontario who are not insured must pay into what is called the unsatisfied judgment fund. This is the best name for it, because everyone who goes to the fund comes away unsatisfied. So it was not a misnomer when it was called the unsatisfied judgment fund. Either people pay their contributions to the fund, or they are forced into an insurance office.

Let me suppose, to illustrate my point, that while I am walking down the shoulder of a road tonight a hit and run driver runs me over and breaks both my legs. I am left lying in the road in the dark. There is no way I can secure compensation for the damage done to my body, let alone the loss of income, the inconvenience and the pain and suffering. Even though this hit and run driver may have paid an insurance premium and I have paid mine, and even though I have suffered physical damage in that my legs are broken —damage which might be worth $5,000 or $6,000—the insurance companies are not obligated to accept any responsibility because I cannot identify the driver who ran over me.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, I cannot chase after the car if both my legs are broken, and obtain some sort of compensation. Therefore I suggest I am paying for a protection that I am not receiving. Each and every one of us walks along the streets of Ontario today at his own risk, even though collectively we have spent $600 million or so on insurance coverage.

I suggest we should be considering situations of this kind instead of proliferating insurance companies that do not seek to insure us. The last thing in their minds is to provide anybody with protection from loss; they are motivated only to make money. They even write into their contracts, in fine print all sorts of exemptions. A bill was introduced the other day which sought to remove fine print clauses from such contracts. It was suggested that certain clauses be written in red, blue, green or purple ink, but I suggest that this would not solve the problem. We should strike at the root of the matter.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, insurance companies are not in business to protect me. They would not care two hoots in hell if I remained on the road with broken legs all night, as long as this did not cost them any money. They make their money by failing to give protection that collectively we have contracted with them to provide. Some people might say that $200 a year is not an enormous sum, but collectively we contribute a tremendous amount of money by way of insurance premiums.

Automobile insurance companies in Ontario also use gimmicks to raise their rates. Each and every year they invent a different story. One gimmick that was used downgraded their income, so they could go to the public and ask for what they considered to be a legitimate increase in insurance premiums. These premiums, as you know, Mr. Speaker, are paid in advance. I pay my premium for a 12-month period, even though I do not receive the benefit of the insurance until the 365th day. I prepay my $200, or whatever it is, 365 days before the policy falls due. Some people who understand finance prefer to make quarterly premiums or half yearly premiums. I think the only way to deal with these people is to pay each day's premium the night before. In addition, you do not receive any discount or interest on prepaid premiums, so under the present system it is therefore impossible to get value for your money. These insurance companies use your money free of interest, and hundreds of millions of dollars are involved. I remember I borrowed some of this money that I gave them free of interest to finance some construction on my house, but I had to pay 8½ per cent interest.

This aspect of the matter is bad enough, Mr. Speaker, but according to the figures supplied by insurance companies, prepaid premiums produce revenue for these companies. However, this earning does not show in the balance sheets of insurance companies. I suggest that the returns made by these companies should be straightened out and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired. Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Seven o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being seven o'clock, the hour appointed for the consideration of private members business has expired. The house will now resume the business interrupted at six o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEATH SENTENCE AND LIFE IMPRISONMENT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-168, to amend the Criminal Code—Mr. Pennell—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1—Capital murder defined.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-168, to amend the Criminal Code. It being seven o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At seven o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: The house in committee on Bill No. C-168, to amend the Criminal Code. Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Woolliams: Before I proceed, and possibly to shorten the time that need be spent in discussion, may I ask the Solicitor General whether he has discussed with his advisers and experts the matter that was raised before the supper break? Has he discussed it with other members of the government, and is he prepared to accept the amendment of which he was informed in the house, and about which I talked with him privately?

Mr. Pennell: I have given the hon. member's proposed amendment serious consideration. Speaking for myself, and only for myself, I must advise the hon. member that I cannot support the amendment.

Mr. Woolliams: Then, Mr. Chairman, I shall not delay. I may point out that I shall move an amendment at the end of my remarks.

The bill we are now discussing in committee of the whole abolishes capital punishment except in the instance where a police officer, or a warden or guard in a penitentiary is murdered. As I say, in all other instances the death penalty has been abolished. This afternoon I asked the Solicitor General to consider that certain sections of the Criminal Code put ordinary citizens into positions occupied, at certain times, by police officers. In my hand I have the 1967 edition of Martin's Annual Criminal Code. It is up to date; I know that the Code has been changed. According to Martin's Annual Criminal Code, section 110 of the Code, in part, reads as follows:

> 110. Every one who—
> (b) omits, without reasonable excuse, to assist a public officer or peace officer in the execution of his duty in arresting a person or in preserving the peace, after having reasonable notice that he is required to do so, . . .
> is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

I raised the question this afternoon about the citizen who is in the bank while a bank robbery is committed. Let us say that a policeman comes in, turns to the citizen and says, "Help me to arrest this bank robber." The citizen must help the policeman, because that is his legal duty under the Criminal Code. He then accepts the full responsibility that is the police officer's, and takes the chances that the policeman then takes. Under the Criminal Code the citizen is the equal of the policeman, but he is not the equal of the policeman under this bill. Under the bill, if that person, whose legal obligation is to help the policeman, is killed, then his murderer may not be sentenced to any more than life imprisonment. If the accused, the murderer, were to kill the police officer, on conviction he would be liable to the penalty of capital punishment.

Let us take the matter further and look at section 434 of the Criminal Code which says:

> Any one may arrest without warrant a person whom he finds committing an indictable offence.

Supposing that we leave our home one evening and go to a local store; supposing that on our way we find someone trying to break into another store. This other store is locked, and the man trying to break in is committing an indictable offence. Our legal obligation under the code is to arrest that person who is committing the indictable offence. If we assume that obligation, which it is our responsibility under the Code to assume, and if we are killed while exercising that responsibility, the murderer, in this case the accused, will be sent to jail for life. Had a policeman come along and been killed, the accused, on conviction, would have been sentenced to death. What kind of nonsense is this?

Taking my argument further, section 436 of the Criminal Code reads:

> Any one may arrest without warrant a person who, on reasonable and probable grounds, he believes > (a) has committed a criminal offence, and > (b) is
> (i) escaping from, and

The provisions of sections 434 and 436 are almost identical. In other words, to come to grips with the subject quickly, if a person who accepts his responsibilities under the Criminal Code arrests someone who is committing an indictable offence and is killed, the murderer, under this bill, will be sentenced to life imprisonment. On the other hand, if the accused kills a policeman, he will swing.

The Solicitor General said the only way in which he could get this bill through the house was by moving it in its present form. I say to the abolitionists that for those who really want to abolish capital punishment, this bill is a hoax. The minister is telling us, in effect, that he has had to play ducks and drakes with the House of Commons by getting the bill drafted in such a way that if a person kills a police officer, and is found guilty of capital murder, he receives the penalty of capital punishment, whereas if he kills a civilian who is doing the same job as a policeman, the penalty is life imprisonment. Hon. members opposite have created second class citizens; that is what they have done.

The Solicitor General knows I have a great deal of affection for him, and I respect his sincerity and his honesty. But he is telling us, in effect: I know this is a bad bill, but I cannot get it through unless I put these titbits in to win over retentionist votes. I say he and his friends are making a complete mockery of justice. This is the strongest argument I can make. If there is any moral, legal or logical idea in this bill in favour of singling out any particular class, then it is right to follow the same course with respect to everyone taking on the same responsibilities. Let us have no second class citizens in Canada.

An hon. Member: Question. You are wasting your energy.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Woolliams: I may be wasting my energy, but it is time someone stood up and said these things. I voted against abolition, but I would prefer to vote for complete abolition rather than vote for the bill before us, because it is a bad bill and it makes a complete mockery of justice. The only reason the Solicitor General and his friends will vote against this amendment is that they want to pilot this bill through, no matter how bad it is and no matter what it does to the administration of justice.

Surely, when we are dealing with a matter as important as the administration of justice we ought to be men of principle, men of sincerity. If hon. members opposite believe in abolition, let them be sincere in expressing that principle. This is a democracy. If a bill in favour of abolition goes through the house I am prepared to accept it 100 per cent. But I would prefer to see complete abolition, than support a bill the effect of which is to throw out a few crumbs with the object of getting it through. Does not this prove what I said at the opening of this debate? What the government is really doing is this: It attempting to legalize what it has done illegally. It is designed to help the consciences of hon. gentlemen opposite. Justice cannot be administered on this basis; I say this in all seriousness.

We criticize what is going on here and there among young people today. If there is anything wrong it is we who are responsible. As long as we implement such laws as this in parliament, how can young people have any respect for parliament or for the Prime Minister or for the Solicitor General? We have made a mockery out of justice and we are responsible if we fail to invest law and justice with the dignity they deserve. We are in danger of eroding the morality upon which a great democracy is built. This is so important that I have decided to say a few words about it tonight.

An hon. Member: About democracy?

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member is a friend of mine. I did not think he would want to heckle me while I am speaking on this important subject. I realize he is an abolitionist and I respect his views. He is in favour of complete abolition and I know he would want good laws.

What the Solicitor General is arguing is still worse. It is likely to bring society down to a level which we would all abhor—a women murdered in broad daylight on the streets of one of our cities, and no one coming to her protection. This is what may happen in Canada. When the policeman calls "Assist me because I am unable to tackle this gang", do you know what a citizen is going to say? He will answer that he refuses to assist because of a law which was passed in parliament. How can we have any respect for this law? Better to make it entirely in favour of abolition, because this is a bad law and hon. gentlemen opposite are making a mockery of justice.

If a citizen fails to come forward and assist the police when requested, he can be charged and sent to gaol for two years. Will the minister tell us that he intends to see that this law is carried out, or that the attorneys general of the various provinces will implement this particular provision? I question it. As far as I am concerned, there is no foundation for such a bad law. If it is intended to make an exemption, let us make a logical and reasonable exemption. Otherwise this is just a device used to get a measure through this house, no matter how bad it is, no matter that it lacks all principle. It is simply a matter of expediency.

I heard one hon. member say "oh". I do not believe the Acting Prime Minister will take that attitude. I believe he realizes that my stand is a correct one. When we pass laws, let us make sure they are reasonable laws. I have voted in favour of retention but I am prepared to vote for complete abolition rather than vote for such a version as this.

An hon. Member: Why didn't you?

Mr. Woolliams: I will answer that question. I thought the Solicitor General would accept the amendment—that he would appreciate the weakness in the bill as drafted. I do not think this weakness was realized until I raised the point, and the hon. gentleman's colleagues are now saying to him: "Do not change it; we will railroad the bill through, bad or not." They say it is to be a free vote. I leave that to the consciences of everyone here. I have read out the relevant sections of the code, and I say the government is legislating to establish two classes of people tonight. Remember, we are not dealing with unimportant situations; we are dealing with a matter which affects the morality of the country, the criminal law and the administration of justice.

• (8:20 p.m.)

If the citizens of the country do not respect law, then the first seeds of that which brings about riots and other conditions in society have been sown. This is what has happened in the United States. Therefore, I intend to move my amendment now. I move:

That after the words "employed for" in the eleventh line of section 1 subsection (2) (a) will be added the words "or engaged in" and the word "duties" in the same subsection line 13 be deleted and the word "duty" be substituted therefor.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, it is with reluctance that I again enter into this debate. It was with reluctance I discovered that the subject of capital punishment was to come before us again this year, after having been decided by the house a year and a half ago. Two weeks ago when I on short notice participated in the debate on second reading I was reluctant to do so because of the subject matter. Well, despite that feeling on my part, I am obliged tonight to enter into the discussion because of the nature of the debate generally and the way in which the Solicitor General is resisting a reasonable approach on this occasion.

Before the adjournment for the supper hour I expressed some regret at the nature of the contribution that was made by the Prime Minister when he spoke on this bill, and when he emphasized that retaliation was one of the main points, apparently, of those who favoured retention, and that deterrence was the other. He gave the greater emphasis to deterrence. I pointed out how he had failed to deal with the other arguments which had been produced in this house, and certainly the argument which I made concerning the protection of society.

I am not at all concerned about retaliation; I reject that. On the subject matter of deterrence I have said in the past that I thought the statistics quoted on each side of the problem were not convincing. I rejected the statement of those who said that fear of punishment or fear of death was not a factor with regard to those who committed crimes. I still remain unconvinced with regard to that argument.

I notice, sir, that over in Great Britain where the abolition of capital punishment has been in effect for two years there has been an increase in crimes of capital murder. I think the Solicitor General, when he was giving us figures the other day, should have drawn that to our attention. I happened to be in England a month ago. In the newspapers I read a public letter by Duncan Sandys, member of parliament, which pointed out that the five year experimental abolition of capital punishment in England was to come to an end in 1970, at which time parliament would have an opportunity to take further action. He has called upon people to sign a petition urging the re-introduction of capital punishment at the end of the five year experimental period. In that letter he drew attention to the increase in the crimes of capital murder. Those who have argued for and against the deterrent value of capital punishment should have brought this to our attention. I think the Solicitor General, who is quite a fair person, might have done so.

I should like to quote now from the Stornoway Gazette and West Coast Advertiser of October 28, 1967. Mr. Duncan Sandys pointed out that there have been 71 capital murders in the two years, since the deterrent of capital punishment was removed, and that this compares with 41 such murders during the two previous years. He said that in other words the rate has risen by no less than 73 per cent. Then he goes on to point out the offences in which firearms were used, any of which might well have resulted in murder. The number has risen from 731 in 1964 to 1,511 in 1966, an increase of over 100 per cent. It is not only in respect of England that we are aware of the increase in serious crimes.

When I spoke on this subject previously this fall I suggested a compromise which passed unnoticed by those who argued for complete abolition and those who now are arguing for partial abolition. I said, why not leave the statute as it is, in case we have to make use of it in the future because of the development of organized crime and the rising crime rate in our country, in the United States and in England? I was very charitable toward the present government. I know they have been commuting all the cases that have come before them. I did not criticize them severely for that, because of my experience while on the government side. I said that with the prerogative of mercy resting in the hands of the governor in council I was not prepared to offer criticism in respect of any particular case which has come before the cabinet. I know they have more information in their possession than I have in my possession, because I can go only by what I read in the newspapers concerning these crimes.

• (8:30 p.m.)

On the basis of the superficial evidence I have I think the cabinet has been wrong. Again let me say this is not an accusation I am making, but I do suggest that we should let the law stand as it is now on the statute books, in the event we may need it. Let us not be put in the position of having a serious outbreak of crime and being forced to reverse the process by reinstating capital punishment. That is precisely what is going on in Great Britain. Having abolished capital punishment they now wish to reinstate it on the statute books. The petition of Mr. Duncan Sandys has the support of a number of members of parliament in all parties. This situation cuts right across party distinctions.

The other day I asked the Solicitor General a question regarding a public opinion survey that was carried out at Expo.

Mr. Byrne: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Without quoting the appropriate citation in Beauchesne's, I should like to direct your attention to the fact that the hon. member is now reflecting on a decision—

Mr. Monteith: Will you please sit down?

Mr. Byrne: This is a question involving—

Mr. Monteith: I mean it. Will you sit down and let the hon. gentleman speak?

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, since when has it become improper for an hon. member to raise a point of order?

Mr. Monteith: Any point of order that you might raise would be redundant.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, I certainly intend to ask you to make a ruling as to whether the house has made a decision in respect of the principle of this bill, and whether the argument now posed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is a reflection on the decision this house took earlier today.

Mr. Monteith: We are on clause one.

Mr. Churchill: I understand we are dealing with clause one of the bill, and it has been the practice in this house to hold a general discussion at this stage. When could a general discussion be held, except when we are discussing clause one?

Mr. Byrne: You had an opportunity during second reading.

Mr. Churchill: If I am out of order I expect the Chairman will so instruct me, but he has given no indication of that.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

An hon. Member: Why don't you go back to sleep again?

Mr. Byrne: I should like to ask the Chair to rule as to whether or not the hon. member is making a reflection upon a decision of this house, and I refer to the acceptance in principle of this bill.

The Chairman: The Chair is familiar with the substance of clause one. It is my opinion that it is close to the substance of the principle of the bill which was discussed at the second reading stage. However, it is a little difficult to decide that what is being said now is not in accordance with the substance of clause one. In any event, I would ask the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre to continue.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: I think he is out of order.

Mr. Monteith: He is nothing of the sort; he is not out of order.

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman, I think the member has just reflected on the ruling of the Chair, and that he should be ruled out of order.

The Chairman: Perhaps the best thing for the committee to do is allow the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre to continue with the bill.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I was drawing attention to the fact that I posed a question the other day based on a statement I read in the newspaper to the effect that an opinion poll had been held at the Canadian pavilion at Expo regarding the abolition of capital punishment. Hansard has recorded my question based on the report, which indicated that 19,000 voted in favour of abolition and 5,500,000 voted against. I now ask the Solicitor General whether this poll was conducted at the Canadian pavilion and, if so, by which department, and are these figures accurate? The Solicitor General did not answer that question, although he said he knew nothing about it. Since I asked the question two days have elapsed and I have not yet received and answer. This whole matter has been referred to in letters carried by various newspapers, and it has been brought to my attention by a citizen who wrote me. If this report is accurate I suggest that parliament is now attempting to accomplish something which is not in accord with the general feeling of the citizens of this country.

I am prepared to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bow River. His argument was very ably presented, and I should like to reiterate his surprise that the Solicitor General would not accept the principle of the amendment. Its purpose is simply to place a citizen who is acting to protect society, in accordance with the law, in the same position as a police officer and others mentioned in the bill. Surely there is nothing wrong with that suggestion. As mentioned by the hon. member for Bow River, it will soon become known that a citizen acting conjointly with an officer of the law, or on his own, in upholding the law, might be in serious danger because he is not protected. I presume that these citizens will wonder why they should co-operate with our police forces or attempt to assist in upholding the law. Surely it would be wrong to create this feeling among our citizenry. I suggest we should do the opposite. We should encourage our citizens to help uphold the law by supporting our police forces. Unless this amendment is accepted the reverse will occur.

A criminal who kills a citizen who is assisting a police officer should be subject to the same penalty as a criminal who kills a member of a police force. That is all we are attempting to accomplish by this amendment, and it is inconceivable that the Solicitor General and the government would not accept that proposition. If the government is not going to accept the amendment we should be told why. We have not put this amendment forward as a delaying tactic, as some people might argue. It has been put forward in all seriousness, because there is an omission in the bill. We are not unfamiliar with omissions in bills placed before this house during the last four years. If someone listed the bills of major importance this government has introduced which have not been subject to amendment, it would be very small. Every bill of major importance brought before this house in the last four years has been amended because of loose drafting, omission of something of that nature.

All we are suggesting is that this point has been overlooked. We are finding no fault with anyone. We are finding no fault with the drafters, no fault with the Solicitor General. We are simply saying that when many minds are applied to a bill in this house, someone very frequently discovers there has been some error or omission in the bill. That is what has happened in this case. We say to the Solicitor General, correct this error and then we will proceed.

It is on that basis that the amendment has been presented tonight. I can certainly go along with what the hon. member for Bow River has said with regard to the bill in general, which is partially for abolition and partially for retention of the death penalty. I do not like it. There are many people in the house who do not like it. Part of my reluctance earlier was just because of the nature of the bill.

I expressed my regrets that some very close friends of mine who are and have been eloquent advocates of the abolition of capital punishment have been placed in the position in which this government placed them today, namely that the bill compels people to vote for abolition with respect to certain categories of murder and retention with regard to others. I honestly cannot understand how a bill of this nature can be supported.

I agree with the hon. member for Bow River that it would be far better to vote either for or against abolition, so that one's decision is clearcut and definite. But the Solicitor General has indicated to us that the bill would have failed unless he had introduced these extra clauses which exempt most categories of criminals, but place a severe penalty on those who are so foolish as to kill an officer of the law.

The Solicitor General says that only by introducing this type of bill could he gain sufficient voting support to get his bill through the house. I have respect for the Solicitor General, but wonder whether his conscience is very easy over this method of approach. I do not think it can be. Certainly as far as I am concerned, I believe we should continue to press him now to make the modification that we are suggesting. If this bill is eventually to become the law of the land, let us fix it up in those areas in which it is deficient in its wording. Here there has been an omission which the Solicitor General should correct. That is my submission, Mr. Chairman, with regard to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bow River, which I shall have great pleasure in supporting.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, I quite accept the view of the hon. member who spoke last, that this is not an amendment to delay or water down this bill in an attempt to make it meaningless, although the spate of amendments that has been presented to the house today might indicate that there was some such tactic or plan.

Mr. Churchill: That is unfair, Mr. Chairman. May I ask the hon. member a question? Is he suggesting that when I introduced the amendment with regard to children, that was done as a delaying tactic, or was it done with a sincere desire to protect the children of this country?

Mr. Greene: I say, Mr. Chairman, that the spate of amendments that has been presented here today might have been an indication that some hon. members wished to delay the passage of this bill or water it down to a point that would not bring it as close to abolition as the bill attempts to do. However, the hon. member has said that this is not his intent, and I have stated that I accept his view in that regard.

Mr. Monteith: That is nice of you.

Mr. Greene: I wish to draw one or two points to the attention of the committee with respect to the amendment of the hon. member for Bow River. I feel sure that as an experienced counsel he would not wish to mislead or leave anything on the record that was not very clear according to the law as it exists, and not the law as he would like it to be for the purpose of his argument.

I believe the hon. member for Bow River attempted in his argument to propound the proposition to the committee that irrespective of the circumstances, under section 110 of the Criminal Code there is a duty on a citizen to obey the order of a peace officer with respect to aiding him when a crime is being perpetrated. I think the hon. member tried to leave the inference that if a crime were being perpetrated under such circumstances that might indicate that murder or killing would occur, an order of a peace officer should be obeyed willy-nilly.

In the first place, of course, whether any peace officer would give such an order to a citizen to aid him in circumstances where the citizen might lose his life is highly questionable. But in any event, I think the law should be made very clear so that hon. members may clearly understand the argument before the committee.

Section 110 of the Criminal Code says very clearly that a citizen must obey such an order only where the circumstances are such that he does not have a reasonable excuse for not obeying the order. Certainly to my mind that indicates very clearly that if the circumstances are such that the citizen asked to help a peace officer might lose his life, the citizen would have a reasonable excuse for not obeying such an order.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What good would that be, if he lost his life?

Mr. Greene: So the law is not, as the hon. member for Bow River appeared to me to indicate in his argument, that the citizen has to obey such an order whether he likes it or not. The law is quite clear, that if the citizen has reasonable excuse for not obeying such an order, it is not incumbent upon him to obey the order.

This of course is what the Solicitor General in his opening remarks to the committee tried to make very clear, namely that in each set of circumstances the duty of the citizen differs, depending upon those circumstances. I think this should be made very clear in the argument put forward on this point.

I think the hon. member for Bow River, I am sure inadvertently or out of enthusiasm in making his argument, did not very clearly bring to the attention of the committee that the words of sections 434 and 436 of the Criminal Code are that a citizen "may" arrest without warrant a person under the circumstances envisaged in these sections of the Code.

There is no duty upon a citizen, as the hon. member for Bow River tried to indicate, to make an arrest without a warrant. This is quite clearly within the purview of police officers or peace officers and is not within the purview of an ordinary citizen. The ordinary citizen has the right to do so if he wishes. He can do so, as the sections say, but there is no duty upon him, and it is not incumbent upon him to do so. I think this should be very clear in the record of the house and should not be left in the context of the argument of the hon. member for Bow River, who suggested that there was a duty upon the citizen to make an arrest under those circumstances.

I should like to say in conclusion, because I wish to be very brief in this argument, that the hon. member for Bow River remarked that the Solicitor General was playing ducks and drakes with the house, that he was using this approach as a matter of expediency, that irrespective of the nature of the bill as he is presenting it he is just using the device of adding "a few gimmicks", as the hon. member put it, in order to get the bill through the house. I think this is a very unfair criticism and an improper argument. To those who believe that any movement away from the original concept that an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth and a life for a life, is progress; to those who believe that the state no more than anyone else has the right to take a life; to those who believe that movement in that direction is progress; to those who believe that humanity in any society is improved when it comes to the point where it no longer takes a life—surely any step in this direction is a step toward progress.

I should like to remind the hon. member for Bow Rover, who has great respect and reverence for the house and who urges the government continually to heed the dictates of the house, that the last time a vote was taken on this issue it appeared from the record that the majority of the members of the house would have supported a bill worded in the terms of the present one. This appears to be the consensus of the house at that time when we analyze the statistics of the voting. Therefore this bill is couched in terms which represent the last views of the house, according to the analysis of the voting at that time. I do not think this is playing ducks and drakes with the house in any way, shape or form. It is an attempt to bring before the house a bill which is worded in the very terms that the house would have approved at that time.

To those who believe any movement toward abolition is progress in human terms and is the building of a better society, there is a duty to bring before the house a bill worded along the lines which the house would have supported when it last dealt with the matter, and which would indicate the maximum degree of abolition the house would appear to have supported on the last occasion when it had the opportunity to vote on this subject.

Mr. Pugh: The Minister of Agriculture has supplied us with a good deal of information. I have always considered him to be one who tries most often to plow a straight furrow; but at the same time I believe he is a little off beat on this whole matter. The amendment now before us deals with the citizens who come to the aid of a police officer and who do their duty as citizens of Canada. What happens to their families and their dependants if they are killed?

Reference was made to bank hold-ups and the use of guns. The minister has said that if a citizen saw a gun being used he could excuse himself by saying "I do not want to get mixed up in this affair, because I might get killed". But what about a parallel case in which a police officer comes running out to a citizen whom he knows well and says to him "Joe"—he might be speaking to the Minister of Agriculture—"the bank robber has gone that way; you have your car here with its motor running, take me along and let us pursue him". Let us suppose that in the course of that pursuit the citizen is killed. What happens then? I think this shatters the minister's argument because, as the Solicitor General said in his opening speech, different sets of circumstances face the citizen who might be called upon to aid a police officer. Let us not consider only one individual circumstance, if there is any possibility of the citizen coming to some harm as the result of having aided a police officer.

As has been said by the hon. member for Bow River and as has been mentioned on several occasions this afternoon, we are considering legislation which we hope will stand fast for many years. However, whether or not it stands fast, until a change is made it will be the legislation governing all citizens of Canada. Let us therefore not take a stop-gap measure but let us prepare for the future. I believe this is a common sense attitude.

Many reasons have been advanced for voting in favour of the bill, and for the preponderance of members to vote in favour of this legislation. Let us admit the fact that this is a compromise bill. The Prime Minister has said that it is better to have three quarters of a load than nothing. If it is a compromise bill, then we should examine it carefully at this stage to see whether or not additions should be made to it. There is a perfectly reasonable amendment before the house at the present time which is based on the fact that a different law will be applied to the murderer of a police officer or of a private citizen assisting a police officer.

There is another point which I should like to make. I believe that we are faced with the paradox of having a free vote on a bill introduced by the government. In view of this, I suggest the government should bend over backwards to consider any amendment or addition that might be made to the bill. The fact that the government accept amendments does not mean that their ideas are being defeated. Since this is to be a free vote on a government bill, amendments to it should not be turned down with no consideration being given to them. I believe that the hon. member for Bow River has proposed a very good amendment, which does not change the principle of the bill. This afternoon the Secretary of State tried to rule out previous amendments by saying she had voted for the bill in principle and therefore it should not be changed. However, I would point out that the Secretary of State voted in favour of the first amendment, which included children.

So, let us not just curtail this provision without giving it a good deal of consideration. What you are adding to this bill, if the Solicitor General would agree, is not all that extensive. It would only impress upon us the fact that a private citizen who has been commanded to come to the aid of a peace officer, puts himself in a slightly different position. Mention has been made this afternoon by the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that there will be a deterioration of the willingness of a private citizen to assume the duty of coming to the aid of a peace officer. I think this is probably the most important point. You can utter all the words in the world in the House of Commons, make all the explanations you like, but the private citizen will only get one message, namely that he is not considered the equivalent of a peace officer. He will therefore try to avoid coming to the aid of a peace officer, for any excuse at all.

While we are making excuses, let us face the fact that a policeman does not write a letter to a man requesting help because he is going to make an arrest. This is something that happens on the spur of the moment, so there must be an instantaneous decision made. If the citizen has imbedded in his mind the fact that if he helps the peace officer he is in a different position from the peace officer, then perhaps his instant reaction will be to do nothing whatever to aid this peace officer in time of need.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the law is at the moment with respect to a citizen assisting a police officer. I believe a citizen is obligated to assist a police officer in his duty of enforcing the law. If a citizen does not carry out this function, he may be charged. Perhaps I could ask the Solicitor General if he can clear up these points. In my opinion the provisions of this bill, which are described as a deterrent, are at the opposite ends of the poles when considered in conjunction with the directive given to the people of Canada to aid a peace officer. Surely, it is evident to anyone that this same experiment was conducted in Great Britain. It was an all-party decision, and it has been tried for a few years; but today there is a desire for the return of capital punishment. I ask the Solicitor General to consider these points.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the duty of the public to assist a policeman, I may say I do not believe there is any doubt about it whatever. Section 110 of the Criminal Code, subsection (b) reads:

> Everyone who omits, without reasonable excuse, to assist a public officer or peace officer in the execution of his duty in arresting a person or in preserving the peace, after having reasonable notice that he is required to do so, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

The Minister of Agriculture says that a reasonable excuse would be that he did not want to risk his person. In my opinion this is absolute nonsense. On many occasions during my work as a policeman, I not only asked the public to assist but I demanded this assistance, not only with their person but with their property. On more than one occasion I have commandeered automobiles to try to apprehend persons who had recently broken the law. Any member of the public who had an automobile in running order would be expected to use that automobile, or I would have arrested him then and there for having committed an indictable offence by refusing to co-operate. I would have put him under arrest and commandeered the automobile.

I am an abolitionist, and I am therefore anxious that this bill pass, either amended or not amended. However, I am going to support this amendment to this bill because I think it will clarify the law. This provision gives very narrowly limited protection to policemen. I believe any judge could very well say that if I had been commanded to aid a policeman, then to all intents and purposes I am a policeman. I want to vote for this amendment particularly because I, for one, hate to live in a country where the law is ambiguous. I want to know what my duty is both as a citizen and a policeman. My attitude as an abolitionist, I hasten to say, does not stem from a soft attitude toward criminals. I believe that the laws of Canada, fully respected and fully carried out by an efficient policeman, with an alert public that is willing to co-operate with that force, is the only real protection we have against crime, organized or otherwise.

Mr. Stanfield: I just want to say one word. I have been voting against the amendments, but I think this is a logical amendment within a logical situation. I propose to vote for the amendment, and if I may say so without offence, I hope we can come to a vote.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I have tried not to overstep the mark in this debate and I have kept my interventions to a strict minimum, but on the amendment moved by the member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) and after all the remarks I have heard this afternoon and this evening, I can no longer refrain from setting certain things straight.

First, I support unreservedly the amendment of the member for Bow River, because I find it much more consistent or at least it completes the logic of this bill for which so many members of the house showed concern.

I do not have the text of the amendment, but if I understood correctly, it provides for taking into account, among the victims of murderers, those who go out of their way to help constables, police officers, to prevent the commission of crimes, whether on request or on their own initiative to maintain order. An argument was added saying that if they fail to do so when they are faced with a situation where they can prevent a crime, they might be liable to legal proceedings.

I have listened with particular attention to the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) and I say they are symptomatic of all other interventions by members of the cabinet on this ill-conceived, ill-defended and ill-presented bill.

When I am told that it was a free vote, it might be true for the opposition parties, I believe it because the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Stanfield) had a different opinion from his colleagues at the time of the vote, but on the government side, I think the free vote should no longer be mentioned, because even if it is claimed that no pressure was exerted I should say—without naming names, because I want to be discreet, as is customary between gentlemen—that pressures have been exerted, otherwise the result would have been different from what it has been tonight.

When the Minister of Agriculture spoke of opposition—I think he was referring to all those who oppose the bill moved by the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell) and that is why I felt I was being attacked—I think he struck below the belt when he said that the opponents of the bill were using time-wasting tactics, that we simply wanted to delay the passage of the bill. I think that, if dilatory tactics have been used, members of the cabinet must accept full responsibility for them, because 18 months ago, we voted on this bill and the results of the vote were perfectly clear: more than 40 votes for the retention of capital punishment. Now, of his own admission, the Solicitor General proposes a bill which is based on camouflage and false representations. Besides, he said himself that if he had not agreed to such compromise—I call that electoral compromise, since he admitted that he wanted a majority vote in the house—he would not have put such a bill before us.

The principle involved is this: Are we for or against the death penalty? It is not a matter of pricing the value of human life just as meat in a butcher shop at so much a pound, but rather of knowing if we are for or against capital punishment.

Personally, Mr. Chairman, I am an abolitionist as a matter of principle. However, I shall be an abolitionist when somebody will have given me proof that the penitentiary system is what it should be in the circumstances, that it serves to protect society, that it provides true rehabilitation for criminals. But until then, I say that these are false representations and I tell those who charge us with obstruction that they are not sincere, because obstruction was forced upon the house by this bill. It is brought back 18 months later, after the house had decided rather categorically and after we had seen the cabinet commute the penalty of all those who had been sentenced to death.

Mr. Chairman, this afternoon I was paired with the right hon. leader of the government (Mr. Pearson). I considered it an honour and a gesture of courtesy a gentleman could not refuse. But if the government side continues to use arguments such as the ones we heard this afternoon and this evening, I shall have to go back on my word and endeavour to use all possible means to amend the bill because I feel that false representations are being made on the government side. I think that pressure was also exercised not only upon the members of the party in office but also upon members of the opposition by accusing them of things such as those we have heard.

Mr. Chairman, they have tried to split hairs. Mind you, I am not a jurist or a lawyer and I have listened with great respect and consideration to the arguments put forward by all the learned lawyers who took part in the debate this afternoon and this evening.

However, I think the time has come for ordinary people like us, who have but our small judgment and conscience to bring to bear on such a matter, to speak our minds.

I think there are too many lawyers here who pass the time splitting hairs, though they do not appear very confident of being right. Now, I believe most of the blame should be laid at the doorstep of the government's legal minds, who are pleading a bad case. It shows plainly on their faces. It seems to us their case is wrong when they ask us, for instance: Why do you want to protect a citizen who has agreed or refused to help a police officer, since the law, after all, does not force him to help; he can refuse, providing he has any reasonable motive?

But will an ordinary citizen, an illiterate who has no education and has not studied law, ask himself such questions when faced by an emergency? Usually, wrong-doers do not warn us in advance, they strike suddenly. The man will simply listen to his conscience and he will spring up immediately or run away, according to whether or not he is brave.

Must we then split hairs to decide if we will pass a legislation to protect him? On the contrary, we must take into account all the weaknesses and deficiencies of human nature. I think this is our duty as legislators, and that is why I will support wholeheartedly the amendment of the hon. member for Bow River.

When people say that, according to section 434 or 464 of the Criminal Code, a citizen can or cannot make an arrest, they are splitting hairs. The question is simple: are they for or against capital punishment? That is all. All the subterfuges, all the camouflage and stratagems used to get us to pass a bill as bad as this one are, in my opinion, a misrepresentation whose consequences will be suffered by those members of the government who try so hard to defend it and do such a pitiful job.

I listened to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) mention the old saying "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth". As citizens, we all know that this saying is true. But that does not apply today in the advanced civilization in which we live.

I know that the Minister of Agriculture is intelligent enough to think, before I say it to him, that an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, between two citizens, applies, of course, but that the state has been entrusted by citizens with the responsibility of the nation's business. It has a responsibility which, according to the Catholic doctrine in which I was brought up, comes from God, and it has the right to demand retribution and sanctions for citizens who do not comply with the general law, and especially those who disregard this most sacred right, the right to life. The saying "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" does not apply in the case of the state, far from it.

And the proof is that the state is not concerned, for instance in crimes of treason when those who have betrayed the nation are put against a wall and shot. Therefore, it is a false argument, a trick easily seen through.

The Minister of Agriculture said earlier that the last vote, the one taken here eighteen months ago, had not been a very clear vote, because it became clear in the following months that some hon. members would have agreed to a compromise if the bill had been drafted differently. I feel that is a gratuitous assumption, totally unfounded, because that vote taken eighteen months ago, and which to me seemed so clear, asked: Are you for or against maintaining the death penalty in the case of capital murder?

The question was very simple. The house could not be convinced at that time because precisely it was sure that a very great majority of Canadians wanted to maintain the death penalty.

Until parliament guarantees to all Canadians that we have a penitentiary system which can protect the citizens of Canada and help to find the means and the people to rehabilitate the murderers, and which can set up institutions adapted to the conditions of the times so that they do not have to wallow in cages for wild animals where they will eventually think of taking their own lives by hanging themselves, as happens too often every year, until we have a proper system of rehabilitation, in short, until we have all these things, Mr. Chairman, I think the majority of the members, had they not been morally molested and influenced would not have voted this afternoon to pass the motion for second reading.

This is why I say that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bow River is at least an improvement on this bill which is badly presented and badly defended, and that we should support it, because it is the result of an implacable logic.

I heard this afternoon an hon. member who said that capital punishment should not be considered as a protection against future crimes. I think that he is entitled to his opinion, but it is completely unfounded. Mine is as good as his, because they are not supported by figures and I think that there is a natural law which states that if I think that my life will be endangered because I commit a crime, I will be less inclined to commit one than if I am told: "My friend, you may commit a crime and you will be paid a pension during your lifetime, you will be well housed, fed and made comfortable; you will be paid a rehabilitation course, so that after eight years, ten months and one day, you may go and earn honourably your living anywhere in the world."

Mr. Chairman, I think that if the government does not agree to add certain amendments as logical as the one moved by the hon. member for Bow River to such legislation which was so badly drafted, presented and defended, it will throw regrettable discredit on this government. Mr. Chairman, I do not usually use such stern language when I speak about the government. As a rule, I would rather support the government than fight it, because I have not been sent here as a member of the opposition who must try to take the place of those in power. I have been sent here to try to co-operate with them, whatever the party to which they belong, but under the circumstances I say and I repeat that if the government wishes to re-establish its good name with this legislation which is badly drafted and defended, it will have to accept a few proposed amendments in order to show its goodwill. It should, as is commonly said, meet us half-way when there is such evident contestation about the bill now under consideration.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

And the yeas and nays on the amendment having been taken:

Mr. Webb: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, at least six members on the government side of the house came in after the vote had begun. There were at least six, and I wish to bring that to the attention of the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Chairman: I thank the hon. member for his clairvoyance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Chairman: I have bifocal glasses and I saw no member coming in. Sometimes shadows may interfere with my vision. Perhaps it is time to bring to the attention of hon. members of the committee standing order 12(2) which reads:

When Mr. Speaker—

And this applies equally to any chairman of the committee:

—is putting a question, no member shall enter, walk out of or across the house, or make any noise or disturbance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Amendment (Mr. Woolliams) negatived: yeas, 39; nays, 78.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On clause 2—Approval by governor in council of release after commutation of sentence.

Mr. Brewin: I do not intend to delay the committee but I wish to ask the Solicitor General something. Clause 2 provides for the prior approval of the governor in council with respect to release or parole in all cases where the sentence of life imprisonment has been imposed as a minimum punishment. The law previously, as I understand, said that the cabinet or governor in council were to be asked to deal with only those cases where capital murder was involved. I think, from my reading of this clause, that the governor in council will be required to review the release or parole of all convicted murderers. That I think is a substantial extension of the responsibilities of the cabinet or governor in council.

I say to the Minister of Justice that, not having been a member of the cabinet, I am not fully aware of all cabinet responsibilities. Nevertheless I ask the Solicitor General whether, in his view, the cabinet is able to undertake, in addition to its multifarious other duties, the added burden that is implicit in this clause. We have been assured that the cabinet does not deal with these matters without giving them serious attention, and I am wondering whether the cabinet which, after all, is not a judicial body but the main executive of this country dealing with a large variety of subjects, is really in a position to undertake the review which is mentioned in this clause. Is this not another sop in an attempt to satisfy people that the cabinet will be doing something which, in my view, ought to be done by a judicial or at least by an administrative body?

Mr. Rynard: I am concerned about the same point as is the hon. member for Greenwood. What precautions are taken by the governor in council in these cases? I am further concerned about what happens after prisoners have served ten years and they come up for parole. How many psychiatric examinations will these people have received? I believe that in Kingston penitentiary there is one psychiatrist to serve around 900 prisoners—the Solicitor General can correct me if I am wrong. This is far too heavy a workload for one psychiatrist.

How will it be possible to base conclusions upon facts when there are not enough psychiatrists to go round? What provision is to be made for this situation in this bill? I could very well vote for this provision if I were sure that by the time a prisoner came up for parole sufficient psychiatric examination had been carried out to show, as far as humanly possible, that the man concerned would not go out again and commit murder.

Many in this chamber will remember the case of Red Ryan who was released after by I believe, one psychriatric examination. He went out and committed murder—it was felt that he committed at least three or four crimes—and was finally shot down in the city of Sarnia. It was only after this that the psychiatrist disclosed that the man had paranoid tendencies. This was clearly a case in which insufficient psychiatric examination was carried out. I suggest that prisoners coming up for parole should be removed to a mental institution for a period of three months where they would be subject to staff supervision and staff consultation, so that when the question of parole arose both they themselves and the public in general would be protected.

I had some conversations with the Solicitor General and I know he shares my views on many of these points. But I wonder how the bill will make provision in this direction. At present I must say that our penal institutions do not have adequate staff and equipment to assess the condition of prisoners and make a useful report to the governor in council.

Mr. Fairweather: I have not taken part in this debate so far, but I have a crucial question to ask and I hope the minister can answer it at this stage. It is this: How many murders have been committed by persons out on parole after serving a sentence for murder? In other words, how many second murders have been committed, say, in the last 50 years?

Mr. Pennell: Perhaps I may deal with the last question first. To the best of my knowledge, since records have been available there have been two. One was committed while a convicted murderer was inside a penitentiary. It involved another inmate. There was another in which a convicted murderer committed a second murder while on parole. I would point out that under the present law a person could commit two non-capital murders and still not attract a death sentence. The verdict likely to follow a murder committed during a fight between two inmates is one of non-capital murder. Those are the facts to the best of my knowledge.

Mr. Pugh: The minister means that two have been caught.

Mr. Pennell: The answer I gave reflected the position to the best of my knowledge.

The hon. member for Simcoe East was kind enough to remind me that we have privately discussed the suggestion that people sentenced to life imprisonment for murder ought to be committed to an institution other than a penitentiary for a complete psychiatric check. I am agreeable to that suggestion and I hope the Parole Act will be before us very shortly. The amendments to the Criminal Code which the Minister of Justice will be introducing will be in the form of an omnibus bill, and they do open up the Parole Act for discussion. I hope the point will be dealt with at that time.

As to the point raised by the hon. member for Greenwood, I agree that the work load on the cabinet would be increased. However, before 1961 it is my understanding that all murder cases had to be dealt with by the cabinet. This was before the division of offences into capital and non-capital murder. They were all brought before cabinet when commutation of sentences was being considered. Since we are now reducing the number of crimes attracting the death penalty, the number of cases will be considerably reduced and it is felt that as we envisage a trial period of only five years the governor in council should continue to be involved in cases where parole is being granted to convicted murderers. I cast no reflection of course on the members of the parole board. Three cases have been brought to my attention since I have been Solicitor General. One was approved and the others deferred for further consideration. Consideration by cabinet is a further indication of the care which is taken before parole is granted to a convicted murderer.

Mr. Pugh: I have had a number of talks with the Solicitor General on this matter of life imprisonment. What does life imprisonment mean? I think this has been a bother to all hon. members. We are concerned to know exactly what the government has in mind when the bill talks about life imprisonment. The result of our vote means that in capital cases the sentence now is to be life imprisonment. We tried to bring in an amendment to provide for the retention of hanging in the case of sex offences against women and young children in the course of which murder is committed. Have any studies been made by competent medical authorities which would throw light on such crimes? What conclusions have been reached with regard to them by any authoritative body, either here or elsewhere in the world? What are the conclusions?

Perhaps I should now ask the Solicitor General whether these are the conclusions: In cases of sex offenders, regardless of the psychiatric treatment they have had during their incarceration, there is the possibility of the same thing happening again, even murder. Also there is the fact that any body of psychiatrists meeting together can come to only one conclusion; that is, that they cannot guarantee to society what the actions will be of such men if they are released again into society.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, every care is taken, of course, by the parole board when preparing a case for presentation regarding parole. We do not claim infallibility either on the part of the parole board or the governor in council. I think, however, that the excellent record which has been maintained by the board in respect of screening these people and recommending their parole reflects, I think beyond any word of mine, that the greatest care is taken.

I understand that if there is any indication to the penitentiary psychiatrist that there may be a disorder of the mind, the subject is referred to three independent psychiatrists who make an assessment of the individual. We look at the recent record, the circumstances surrounding the offence, the age at the time of the offence, the relationship of the individual with the inmates and the staff, and his general progress over a period. Then, using all our resources, we come to a conclusion. As I said a moment ago we are not infallible. We screen them very carefully and no decision is taken with a greater sense of responsibility and care.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether he has at hand a record of any study made here or elsewhere in the world in respect of this. I am restricting my remarks not only to the parole board but also to the matter of sex offenders. Like the minister, I believe the parole board, and any other agency which has a connection with the matter of parole, have carried on in a model fashion. They are not swayed by emotion but rather by the facts and the presentations placed before them.

I am interested in learning what life imprisonment means in respect of sex offenders. I should like to know what records are available to the government in respect of the studies made by psychiatrists on this subject.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, the parole board of course has consulted with other jurisdictions in an effort to find out how they deal with people who are under the sentence of life imprisonment. However, they must base their own decisions on their own experience, and upon the advice of the experts who are available to them. I should like to point out to the hon. member that those who are the gravest danger to society are often those prisoners who serve a definite sentence for a period of years. These people cannot be kept in the institutions, even though we may feel they present a real danger. They have served their sentence and then go out. We give them the best possible treatment we have available, but after they have served their sentence there is no way the parole board or the penitentiary service can keep them in prison. These are the people who may constitute the greatest danger to society. We hope that the amendment to the Parole Act may bring about some relief on this point. Of course, the house will have to wait until the omnibus bill is brought in.

The man serving a sentence of life imprisonment is there for life, subject to being released on parole, but even if released on parole he is still under sentence and the parole can be revoked and he can be brought back.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I have a question for the minister which is also on the subject of life sentence. I wonder whether he has any statistics which show how many convicted murderers have died in prison, except through the normal process of hanging, which has been mandatory for capital murder.

Mr. Pennell: I am advised by the officials that since 1921 there have been 117 convicted murderers paroled. Eleven of these have had their parole revoked. Twelve have died whilst on parole. Six were deported and there are 88 still on parole. There is one further question which I believe I have not answered. I am unable to help the hon. member concerning the number who died while serving their sentence of life imprisonment in prison.

Mr. McIntosh: I have a supplementary question. Would the minister not agree that the term "life imprisonment" should be changed to what it actually means, because it is a fallacy to call it life imprisonment.

Mr. Pennell: There is no member of this house for whom I have greater respect than the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek. I am sure he knows that; but I cannot agree with him on this point. My own personal feeling on this is that I believe we can rehabilitate some of these men who have been sentenced to life imprisonment. I think the record has proven this. It is not only the belief of this administration. This belief is shared by others. It has been proven that there are life prisoners who have been rehabilitated after serving time and who have come back to be useful citizens.

Mr. Pascoe: I believe the minister said that 11 persons who were on parole had had their parole cancelled. Could he give the reason for the parole being cancelled?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, the information passed to me now shows that there was one whose parole was revoked because of excessive use of alcohol and because he was breaching the conditions of his parole. Another case involved repeated use of alcohol and leaving the area without permission. In this case parole was revoked. Another one was judged to be very unstable; he was suspected of having mental illness. He breached his parole conditions, and therefore in order to protect his wife and society his parole was revoked. One was convicted of robbery and sentenced to two and a half years. Naturally his parole was revoked. Another case was a breach of parole. In this instance he had threatened his common law wife and was considered to be unstable. Another was a case of breach of parole conditions and assault of a police officer. There was an automatic forfeiture. Another became hostile toward his wife and children and his parole was revoked. Another one involved a breach of parole. The individual left without permission and was involved in five charges of drunk and disorderly conduct. That is the information I have available at this moment.

Mr. Webb: I should like to ask the minister whether he can advise the house as to the number of murderers whose sentences have been commuted broke out of prison and committed further murders or offences, as outlined by the hon. member for Simcoe East?

Mr. Pennell: I am advised by my officials that they are not aware of any convicted murderers who escaped from an institution and committed a further murder.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, section 2 of the bill reads as follows:

> Notwithstanding any other law or authority, a person in respect of whom a sentence of death has been commuted to imprisonment for life or a term of imprisonment or a person upon whom a sentence of imprisonment for life has been imposed as a minimum punishment, shall not be released during his life or such term, as the case may be, without the prior approval of the Governor in Council.

I wonder, therefore, why the governor in council, that is, the cabinet, the government, regardless of the party in power—at present we have a Liberal government—insists upon retaining the right to approve the release or the commutation of a death sentence to life imprisonment. I wonder why this whole matter should not be put in the hands of the National Parole Board, because in some cases —I am speaking in all objectivity, and I would not want the minister to be offended by my remarks, because they would apply to his government or to any subsequent ones—a very rich man sentenced to life imprisonment could hire very competent, popular and influential lawyers to plead his case? I also see cases which might constitute what is generally called political crimes when governments might be concerned over electoral consequences, over the penalties they might mete out to those responsible for political crimes. There might be some even now and the rumor is rampant. Mr. Chairman, I am not inventing anything. It is currently being repeated at least in my province—I do not know whether it is being said in the rest of the country—that if the government is so insistent in having this bill carry, it is because they do not dare allow the death sentences against the two separatists who have been guilty of murder, lest a scandal result along the lines of the Louis Riel affair in the political history of the province of Quebec. So I wonder if the cabinet—which is very busy today and getting more so every year with all kinds of complex problems while ministers are required to work 12 to 15 hours a day and sometimes more—has really the time to consider questions in depth and if it is not likely on occasion to be influenced by situations such as I have mentioned and to slant an objective decision.

Mr. Chairman, I put the question most objectively to the minister.

[English]

Does the minister not think it more appropriate to leave this decision to the parole board? I expect that in some cases the governor in council might have the last word, but in respect of these cases it is my opinion that the decision should be left in the hands of the parole board. I have not the time to outline these cases, but I do not think there should be any possibility of cabinet influence, or influence from outside having regard to money, politics or other angles. I should like to know the reaction of the minister in this regard.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I believe I can set the hon. member's mind at ease regarding the possibility of political influence. The national parole board still must recommend the parole of an inmate before the case comes to the governor in council. If the national parole board does not make a favourable recommendation, the case is not dealt with by the governor in council. The safeguard suggested by the hon. member now exists under the legislation.

Mr. Mongrain: Why is this not set out in the law?

Mr. Pennell: This is set out in the Parole Act.

Having regard to the two separatists mentioned by the hon. member, it is my understanding that the Quebec court of appeal quashed the conviction and ordered a new trial. At the present moment they are not under sentence of death. The attorney general's department of that province has appealed the cases to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Cowan: During the discussion of clause 2 I should like to ask the Solicitor General several questions. I hope he will answer my first question before I pose the remainder. When I proved by the record the Solicitor General produced to this house that the cabinet was granting parole under the present administration after individuals had served a life sentence of eight years, ten months and one day, a member of this house jumped to his feet in an attempt to get Steven Truscott, a convicted murderer of a defenceless girl, out on parole. He was advised by the Solicitor General that it is now necessary that convicted murderers serve at least ten years. I should like to know what section of what law makes it mandatory that ten years be served. Is this a law or a regulation, and when was it adopted?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. member for York-Humber I would suggest that I made it clear in answering the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that this was a new regulation under the Parole Act. It is my understanding that this regulation was brought into force in 1964, and it applies to all persons convicted of capital murder whose sentences have been commuted.

Mr. Cowan: If I understand the Solicitor General correctly, this is required by a regulation under the Parole Act, which I presume was drafted by officials of the parole board.

Mr. Pennell: I am informed that the regulation was drafted by officials of the Department of Justice.

Mr. Cowan: Does that mean that officials of the Department of Justice thought the cabinet was being altogether too lenient in paroling these individuals after they had served eight years, ten months and one day, and felt the ten year sentence should be mandatory?

[Mr. Pennell.]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause two carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Cowan: I have other questions to ask. May I call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I am advised—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It being ten o'clock, shall I rise and report progress?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Cowan: I have other questions to ask, sir.

Mr. Pennell: I was attempting to answer the hon. member for York-Humber. I was not a member of the ministry at the time this particular regulation was put into effect, but I am advised by one of my colleagues that it was adopted at the request of the governor in council in 1964.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Cowan: May I call it ten o'clock?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. It being ten o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether this is the proper time for me to ask the government house leader if he can tell us the business of the house for tomorrow, and Monday and Tuesday of next week, if possible.

Mr. Monteith: And Wednesday and Thursday.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would ask my hon. friends not to test their luck too far. Tomorrow we will begin with item No. 33 on today's order paper, the resolution to amend the Post Office Act, followed by third reading of the Industrial Development Bank Act, committee study of the C.N.R. bill, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act and the department of corporate and consumer affairs legislation. This will be the program for tomorrow and probably Monday. We will announce further business next week.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the government house leader that instead of taking the first item that he listed, having to do with the post office, it would be more expeditious to consider the second and third items first, and then move into the post office resolution?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is agreeable to us. I gather that hon. members feel they can deal with these items relatively quickly. We will agree to that, and will then continue with the post office resolution.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, can the house leader say when we will return to committee of the whole stage on the capital punishment bill?

Mr. MacEachen: I am not certain when we will return to the committee stage of the capital punishment bill,—perhaps Monday or Tuesday.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

POLLUTION—FEDERAL REPRESENTATION AT PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE IN TORONTO

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, on November 16 I asked this question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen):

> Have federal officials been invited to attend the provincial conference on pollution which will be convened by the government of Ontario between December 3 and December 5 in Toronto?

The minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, there is to be a meeting held in Toronto as a sequel to an earlier meeting in Montreal of the conference of resource ministers.

He concluded:

> Federal officials have not been invited to attend.

On the following day, November 17, I therefore asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare this question:

> Yesterday, in answer to a question of mine, he informed the house that federal officials had not been invited by the Ontario provincial government to attend the conference on pollution which is to be held between December 3 and December 5 in Toronto. In view of the urgent need to continue active co-operation between these two levels of government, would he advise the province of Ontario of the availability of his officials to work with the provincial officials on this matter?

According to a report which appeared in the Windsor Star on November 9, the province of Ontario is convening a conference on the date I have mentioned covering air, water and soil pollution. It is being organized by its provincial advisory committee on pollution control which is made up of deputy ministers of various Ontario provincial departments which deal with individual aspects of pollution.

The jurisdiction over pollution problems is divided between the federal and provincial levels. As I have said, to tackle these pollution problems successfully there must be co-operative action between these two levels of government.

When I asked these questions it seemed to me, and it seems to me now, that the Ontario government should have recognized immediately that for the conference to be truly effective the participation of experts from the federal government would be necessary. After all, there are matters linked with these problems of pollution which cannot possibly be discussed much less dealt with effectively without the participation and the co-operation of officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare and of our Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. For example there are problems of trans-boundary air pollution which is of great concern to my own community in Windsor. There are matters involving the development of national standards for testing the degree of pollution in the air and in the water. In fact at present, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare pointed out in the house only a few days ago, for the first time we are developing and carrying out a national program of air sampling.

There are questions as to whether further tax incentives under federal, and under provincial statutes as well, would encourage industry to accelerate its work to eliminate air and water pollution caused by its activities. There are also questions as to whether the time has now come for the federal criminal law to be amended to provide new sanctions against pollution of air and water by industry and by individuals as well. The Minister of National Health and Welfare pointed out in the house recently that there is in his department an environmental health centre devoted to working on solutions to air pollution problems—in fact to identifying problems not just with regard to air pollution but to water and soil pollution as well, and to working out methods for their control. This centre is considered to be the best in the entire country if not one of the best in the world.

The federal government, in spite of the divided jurisdiction which exists with respect to problems of pollution, has a responsibility to show leadership in working out and implementing solutions to these problems. I think it was a serious oversight, to say the least, for the province of Ontario to fail to invite federal experts immediately on putting together the agenda and program for this conference on pollution. I say that the federal government should be in a position to make known to the provincial governments the availability of its experts, to work together with officials at similar levels in the province of Ontario and throughout Canada to reach, as quickly as possible, solutions to problems of the pollution of air, water and soil, solutions which are necessary if the quality of life in Canada as it moves into this second century is to be worthy of the future of this nation and its people.

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member asked this question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, there had not been an invitation extended to any federal officials to attend the conference. However, I am pleased to tell the hon. member that since that time an invitation has been received by federal government representatives to attend the conference on pollution being held in Toronto, beginning on December 3.

The following federal representatives have been invited: from the Department of Agriculture, Mr. S. B. Williams, deputy minister; Dr. Robert Glen, assistant deputy minister, research and Dr. C. R. Harris, London, Ontario; from the Department of National Health and Welfare, Dr. Ross Chapman, director general, food and drugs; Dr. J. Sulliven, occupational health; from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. A. T. Davidson, assistant deputy minister, water. Dr. Robert Glen, assistant deputy minister, research, of the Department of Agriculture and Dr. C. R. Harris, London, will be active participants at this conference.

PUBLIC WORKS—OTTAWA—HEIGHT OF PROPOSED NATIONAL DEFENCE HEADQUARTERS BUILDING

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, November 2, as recorded in Hansard at page 3783, I asked this question:

> Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Now that the commencement of construction of the national defence tower in Lebreton flats has been postponed, will the government reconsider the question of the height of this proposed building in the hope that it will not be as high as the peace tower?

At that time Mr. Speaker thought this was a question for the order paper, and that is why I posted it for this adjournment debate. It is not necessary for me to use my full seven minutes on this question, and I am also interested in the one that is to follow.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): As I am in the one that is going on now.

Mr. Knowles: May I just remind the minister that in June, 1966, we were given indications with respect to the proposed national defence tower, according to the plans at that time, that the very top of the proposed tower in Lebreton flats would be about 67 feet higher than the top of the peace tower on this building. I need not repeat the comments that I made in June, 1966, and on one or two other occasions as well. I do not like the symbolism of a national defence tower being higher than the peace tower. I do not like what it does to Ottawa to have so many buildings in this area taller than this building, which ought to be the most important building in this country. It seems to me, in fact, that mistakes have been made already in permitting some buildings in this area to rise as high as they are. I am referring not just to government buildings, in fact not so much to government buildings as I am to private ones, such as hotels and office buildings in this area. I think this is a mistake. I think it is unfair to future generations to mar the beauty of this city, which belongs to all of Canada.

Now, if I am in a less argumentative mood than I sometimes am, it is because I hope the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith) agrees with me and that he will now assure me that reconsideration will be given to the question of the height of the proposed national defence tower in Lebreton flats.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, all members who think much of the development of the national capital agree on the importance of the subject of height control of buildings in the central part of the city. The city of Ottawa has a by-law governing height control and the federal authority tries to work within it.

The whole subject of height control is of such concern that I expect it will be dealt with by the committee that will be examining into the operations of the national capital commission. Rather than try to develop in an extended way—it is impossible to do so in three minutes—what the situation is, I hope that the subject will be dealt with by the committee, which will have plenty of time to do so before the building is proceeded with. The subject can best be examined by this body representing the House of Commons.

I should add that the question of height of buildings is also related to distance from the Peace Tower. The concept of height cannot be in absolute terms across the whole city. Heights of buildings in close proximity to the Peace Tower are lower than would be tolerated for buildings farther away from the Peace Tower. The particular building under discussion will be some 4,450 feet from the Peace Tower, which is close to a mile, and it will be erected on low ground. It is true that the plans call for the building to be higher than the Peace Tower by some 38 feet, but as I say, I am quite agreeable to having the whole subject examined by the committee when it is set up, which I hope will be very soon. In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, nothing will happen to affect the position in any way.

PUBLIC SERVICE—COMMITTEE REPORT ON PENSIONS OF RETIRED CIVIL SERVANTS

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, never have I been more sorely tempted to breach the rules of the house and discuss the subject which has just been concluded, but I must refrain from so doing and deal with the question of increased pensions for retired public servants, including the R.C.M.P. and the armed forces. This was the subject of my question on Monday last to the Prime Minister and is the subject upon which my complaint is focused tonight.

Tonight the Prime Minister is in London becoming a freeman of that great city. I am sure all of us extend to him our congratulations, coupled with the wish that he will understand the position of some of those who are, as he is, a retired civil servant but are less fortunate in respect of the honours and emoluments that are his.

In his absence, Mr. Speaker, under normal circumstances the President of the Treasury Board would reply. I want to thank that genial gentleman for having indicated to me at 9 p.m. this evening that he was about to leave for Vancouver and could not be in the chamber to reply to my representations.

As you are aware, sir, on May 8 of this year, which was the last day of the first session of this parliament, a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons reported unanimously in favour of an increase in the pensions of retired civil servants. In their report the committee said:

> In the committee's view, the government should do what it reasonably can to protect and preserve, or failing that, to restore in some measure the original purchasing power of the contributory pensions which, under the Public Service Superannuation Act, and similar enactments, it has provided for its retired employees.
> With this consideration in mind, your committee recommends immediate action by the government, to up-date and extend the provisions of the Public Service Pension Adjustment Act (1959).

Then it went on:

> The committee recommends that any plan to improve the position of these retired employees should conform to the following requirements:
> (a) it should be capable of quick and early implementation in the form of legislation in the next session of this parliament;
> (b) any adjustment in pensions should not be limited to a particular date of retirement and should be in addition to any other increase already granted under the Pension Adjustment Act of 1959;
> (c) it should maintain the principle contained in the present legislation that benefits should be related to length of service;
> (d) it should conform to the principle that any adjustment formula should take account also of the time which has elapsed since retirement;
> (e) it should take into account the increase in living costs during that period of time; and

Sir, as you well know, the expectation of members of the special joint committee was that early action would be taken in accordance with the unanimous recommendation. A decision one way or the other ought to have been anticipated. What has been the subsequent history of this unanimous recommendation. Sir, to all the questions that have been asked about this matter the answers have always been in the same context —"under consideration", "decision in due course", "still under advisement". That, sir, is a contempt of parliament and a denial of the role of committees and the rights of the private members in this parliament. The time has come when the government ought to stop this contempt of parliament.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Speaking for myself, I have tried every technique known either to an advocate or to a parliamentarian. I have tried coaxing, cajoling, persuading, becoming indignant and angry—as I did the last time this matter was discussed—but all moods have been without avail. I put it to the parliamentary secretary, could he not convey the message to cabinet that the time has come for a decision? There is no more time for stalling or contempt. While the decision is pending some people are suffering.

Mr. Knowles: Dying.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): As the hon. gentleman says, some persons are dying. Many, many retired public servants who would have been entitled to benefit from the recommendation have died since May 8, without receiving the benefits that the unanimous committee recommendation said they ought to receive. I know that the hon. gentleman for York Centre (Mr. Walker) concurred in the unanimous recommendation of the committee. Retired public servants have died, and others have suffered. I ask the hon. gentleman, and tonight I am being as reasonable as I possibly can be, can he not, from his vantage point on the government side, bring some influence to bear on the ministers? Can he not influence the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith) and ask him to go to the cabinet tomorrow morning and say, "We will do something; we will decide this matter one way or the other"? That is all I ask, and it is a simple request. I hope that the request will not be denied by the hon. gentleman who represents Ottawa West and who has more influence, Mr. Speaker, than you or I have on any particular topic within the jurisdiction of cabinet. I am sure that if my hon. friend from York Centre goes to his colleague for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) and puts the request in the mild terms I am trying to put it in this evening, we shall have some decision soon.

Sir, this is a desperately serious matter for many persons in this country. Let the government stop stalling and decide something.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am very impressed by the hon. member's presentation. Frankly I find it easier to answer him when he is in his normal wild and rambunctious mood than when he is in the suppliant mood he has displayed tonight.

I do not criticize the hon. member for Carleton or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I do not criticize them for their deep concern and for their eagerness to have the government decide on this most important matter. I do ask them to give government members who served on that committee, my minister and the government some credit for concern. I ask them to give my minister, I ask them to give the government, some credit for concern and eagerness to do something to make a decision and to make that decision as quickly as possible on this whole question of the superannuation fund. I should like to point this out, in case the public feel that parliament and the government are not aware of this problem.

On Monday, November 20, just two days ago, this question was raised in the house by the hon. member for Carleton. The Prime Minister at that time said the matter was still under consideration. I draw attention to this because I do not want the inference to be drawn from the continuous representations which are being made in the house that the government has decided to do nothing, to shelve the project and delay rather than say yes or no.

On November 9 the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked this same question, as reported at page 4118 of Hansard, and the minister gave an honest, truthful reply at that time, pointing out that this question was on the cabinet agenda and that the minister himself was looking forward to having it dealt with as quickly as possible. I go back to September 26, when again the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre brought this matter to the attention of parliament as reported at page 2534. I have been trying to look up two other references—occasions upon which this question has been raised and when I personally have replied on behalf of the minister.

I can say nothing further than has already been said by the Prime Minister and by the minister on this question, but I will undertake to clip out from tomorrow's Hansard the most eloquent remarks of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) and bring them to the personal attention of my minister.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the sixth report of the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, in which we are referring to the house Bill No. S-20, respecting the Co-operative Trust Company Limited. As usual, this report has been prepared in English and French.

LABOUR DISPUTE AT MONTREAL—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26, in order to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the stoppage of activities in the port of Montreal, the consequences of which threatens to seriously affect our exports and to interfere with our economy, particularly in view of the dangerous situation brought about by the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson), when he said that the government declines all responsibility concerning this very important matter.

Mr. Speaker, I have here a copy of the motion in French and in English.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot please comment on the urgency of the debate?

Mr. Ricard: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I placed this matter before the house today because we will not have the opportunity to discuss it in the near future. I do not intend to dwell on the urgency of debate at any length, but I know it will not be difficult to win the consent of Your Honour to allow the matter to be discussed immediately.

Mr. Speaker, there are numerous reasons to justify a debate on the matter today. Right now, there are huge quantities of fruits and vegetables on the docks of Montreal harbour which are awaiting shipment to England, and unless immediate steps are taken, they will be a total loss. Their value is roughly the same, namely, $500,000, so that $1 million worth of fruits are now stocked in warehouses outside Montreal, there are also large quantities of fruits now in freight cars, and these are in serious danger of being utterly spoiled, apart from creating problems for the railways.

As I said a few moments ago, huge losses will surely result if this situation is allowed to continue even for a short while. Moreover, it should be considered that 3,000 workers, at least, are thus left without work for an indefinite period, and these people increase the already large number of unemployed in the Montreal area.

It's also to be expected, Mr. Speaker, that the other ports on the St. Lawrence will, sooner or later, be affected by this situation, unless the present government and the Minister of Labour in particular decide to accept their responsibilities and take the necessary steps to remedy the situation.

In the long run, considerable damage may result. The reputation of Montreal harbour is sure to suffer abroad because of those delays. There are ships now being rerouted away from Montreal, because the shipping companies feel that they would stand to lose money and they cannot afford any further losses.

For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, and for many others, I think that we should immediately adjourn the business of the house to deal with this matter.

The government and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) certainly cannot plead that they were not aware of the facts because, for two weeks already, useless and futile discussions have been going on between the two parties without any intervention whatsoever by the minister or the Acting Prime Minister. It seems, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. members opposite should assume their responsibilities and settle his matter once and for all.

[English]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has just made two statements that are not in accordance with the facts. He said the minister has not taken his responsibility and that the government has not shown any interest in this matter. Both these statements are erroneous. The government does take its responsibility seriously, and, in fact I have met with one of the parties. My officials have met with the other side, and I have offered to meet them. I welcomed the opportunity to do so. So when the statement is made that the government is not taking its responsibility seriously it is completely erroneous, and the record should be put straight.

Mr. Ricard: I rise on the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I fail to see that there is any question of privilege in what the Minister of Labour just said.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I agree with the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words to say. Your Honour must be so familiar with all the citations regarding standing order 26 that you can rattle them off by heart. The members of the house must know them all by now as well, so I will not repeat them today. Surely, Mr. Speaker, there are times when it is obvious that the question which has been raised under standing order 26 is one that the house ought to discuss. I put it to you very simply. In view of the seriousness of this matter in the Montreal area, and in view of its repercussions across the country, is this not the kind of situation that standing order 26—

Mr. Nicholson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It it is of any help, may I make it clear that so far as the government are concerned we welcome the opportunity to have a debate on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister may have an opportunity of indicating this fact after I have heard the representations of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

[Mr. Ricard.]

Mr. Knowles: I had just about completed my remarks, Mr. Speaker. The only other thing I was going to say is that since the Minister of Labour has already entered the debate it might as well be continued. I do believe that this is the kind of matter for which standing order 26 was designed.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we may abbreviate the debate.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) was kind enough to give me notice of this motion so that I was able to consider it and to look into the circumstances mentioned. The only difficulty I encountered, and which still remains, is that, according to the information I obtained this morning before coming to the house, this litigation is now in a way and up to a certain point before the courts, because of an application for an injunction made this morning. This has created some difficulty.

I understand perfectly that there must be a distinction between an injunction and the procedure usually followed under the Industrail Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. However, in view of the particular circumstances which the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot brought to the attention of the house, I believe I must answer the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in the affirmative and accept the motion.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to add further remarks to those I have made already. I should like to thank—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will now have to introduce his motion.

[English]

We will attempt to be of assistance to the hon. member in a moment. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot, seconded by the hon. member for Ontario moves that the house do now adjourn.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): All these crises, Mr. Speaker, have occurred as a result of the ineptness of this government in the performance of their duties. These are always laughing matters on that side of the house. Well, I say to them that they have to take their responsibilities more seriously than they have up to now.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a very serious matter.

Mr. Starr: Of course it is.

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps we should try to limit the debate to the substance of the matter brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot.

Mr. Starr: I agree with you entirely, Mr. Speaker. This is a very serious matter. I was only referring to the attitude of the government with regard to it.

• (11:20 a.m.)

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not know why my hon. friend should begin what I hope will be a constructive submission in this tone. The government are not opposed to this motion; we welcome it. We recognize that this is an important matter. That is the reason the Minister of Labour intervened. I would ask my hon. friend, for whom we all have the greatest regard, in view of the fact that his leader is now with him and that his leader wants to set a new tone in debate in this house, to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ricard: Remember what happened in 1960.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I now ask the co-operation of all hon. members so that, from now on, they try to deal only with the motion introduced by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard), that is the important matter of public urgency, the stoppage of activities in Montreal harbour.

[English]

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious matter. Recognizing its seriousness, we on this side feel it should be discussed in the house at this time. We feel very strongly that the situation which now prevails on the Montreal docks has been brought about by the ineptness of this government in dealing with the matter.

I want to refer back to July of last year, specifically to July 14, 1966, when the government introduced Bill No. C-215, an act respecting certain conditions of employment of dock workers at the ports of Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec. This bill was discussed on that day and we pointed out to the government the error it was making in taking that step. We objected in particular to the preamble to the bill, part of which read as follows:

> And whereas an industrial inquiry commission to inquire into those certain matters has been appointed under the said act, and it is in the national interest that the conclusions of the said commission with respect thereto be carried into effect without delay following receipt of the report of the said commission—

I pointed out during the debate on the bill, Mr. Speaker, that this was contrary to the collective bargaining arguments that the government has always hidden behind. As recorded at page 7674 of Hansard for July 14, 1966 I said:

> A commissioner can be appointed. No one will object to that. The commissioner can go to work and eventually, upon hearing both sides and investigating the situation completely, he can make a report to the Minister of Labour who in turn should refer that report to the interested parties as a basis for collective bargaining.

The government ignored this suggestion, even though the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), the next speaker for the New Democratic party, agreed that this was the proper procedure to take.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what has happened? A report has been made by the commissioner of inquiry, Mr. Picard. This report was made to the Minister of Labour. Did the Minister of Labour feel there should be ample opportunity for the interested parties in the dispute to sit down with him or to consult amongst themselves before the report was implemented, to see whether they would interpret the report in the same way and agree on what should be done? No; the minister arbitrarily imposed the report on both parties without reference to them at all.

We now have a situation where the parties interpret the report differently. One party reads it one way and the other party reads it another way. Consequently there is a tie-up in the port of Montreal, where some 40 ships are standing idle waiting to be unloaded. Fruits, vegetables and other commodities of this country are being allowed to rot while the government sits quietly by contending that someone else should see that this national crisis is resolved.

I know the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Martin) has a tremendous responsibility and is trying to show his concern for the country. Surely in his wisdom he could prevail on the Minister of Labour and ask him to forgo his obstinate, arrogant attitude that the government is not responsible and that it is up to someone else to decide what is to be done. The government in this crisis surely has a responsibility to rectify the situation at once.

We said the legislation was based on an assumption; how were we to know what the report would be? How could we agree to that report being imposed as part of the collective bargaining agreement? We voted against this bill because of that. On page 7674 of Hansard for July 14, 1966 I am reported to have said:

> This legislation is based on assumption. The government is assuming that the recommendations will be acceptable to both parties.

The recommendations are not acceptable to both parties, and we were right. Continuing:

> What will be the situation if the recommendations are not acceptable?

We have that situation now. There is chaos on the Montreal docks, and that chaos will probably spread across the country to other docks. The union members will not sit idly by and see this type of recommendation imposed on their fellow members. Sympathetic gestures by other union members will be made, as the Minister of Manpower and Immigration well knows. Continuing to quote, I am reported to have said:

> Will that tend to a happy and harmonious situation between these two parties for the duration of the present agreement?

There is no happy and harmonious situation which at that time the government thought there would be. Continuing:

> This is almost prophetic legislation. We do not know what is going to be recommended but we are being asked to put unknown recommendations into effect.

After that warning the government, on receipt of the report, without consulting both sides as is the normal practice under collective agreements, imposed an arbitrary piece of legislation. Surely that was the most arbitrary decision that could have been taken. I say the present crisis on the Montreal waterfront arises directly from that legislation which the government passed on July 15. Consequently I and many others feel that the government has a responsibility in this situation, but the government does not accept that.

In the legislation the government imposed on unions and management the terms of the Picard report, which then had not been written. In July 1966, during the debate, we were assured by the Minister of Labour and the present Minister of Manpower and Immigration that the unwritten recommendations of the Picard report, which were to be included sight unseen in Bill C-215, would be acceptable. That assurance was given in this house, but the fact is that those recommendations are not acceptable.

By its mismanagement the government in this instance has occasioned the spoilage of hundreds of millions of dollars worth of goods. I mention this because I wish to show the insubstantial and contradictory nature of the minister's position. He cannot be allowed his attitude of being almost a hundred light years away from what is taking place on the Montreal docks. Yesterday I asked him whether he would assume the responsibility of calling both parties to Ottawa at once to try to bring about some understanding and acceptance of this report. That is all that can be done in the circumstances. The government cannot sit idly by and allow events to develop without taking action. Calling the parties to Ottawa for consultation is the only reasonable and the only responsible approach the government should take at this time. After all, they introduced the bill and imposed the terms of the report.

At the time the bill was passed the union had never agreed to the incredible proposal of accepting something which was as then unwritten. Nevertheless the government went ahead, and it went ahead without the agreement of the union or management. The government shoved the bill through and we voted against it. The government have a responsibility to act, and they must exercise that responsibility.

I wish the Acting Prime Minister would not adopt a light hearted attitude and smile. The situation is most serious.

• (11:30 a.m.)

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a question of privilege, the government is taking this matter very seriously. The government wants this matter discussed today. I was just exchanging friendly glances with the right hon. gentleman who sits to the hon. member's left.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: I thought when he was smiling the Acting Prime Minister was looking at me. Maybe I was wrong.

This is not only a matter for discussion, Mr. Speaker. There is a responsibility which lies upon the government and the purpose in drawing attention to the situation is to get them to take some action. It is not sufficient that we should discuss this matter for the next two or three hours or for the balance of the day. The government must realize that it has a responsibility. Hon. gentlemen opposite must take action. They cannot allow this situation to drift as it is drifting at the present time, though it is true it has been the habit of this government in the past to allow strikes to drag on without making any attempt to bring about a settlement. They have sat week after week and month after month waiting for some miracle to take place because they had no solution to the problem with which they were faced.

The present situation at Montreal is another of the tie-ups which have occurred simply because hon. gentlemen opposite have failed to govern this country, have failed to accept their responsibilities. In view of the fact that the Picard report was made directly to the minister I suggest he should call both parties to Ottawa at once, sit down with them and try to bring about agreement on the terms of this report so it may be implemented in collective bargaining between the two parties and the port may resume operations as soon as possible.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I welcome this opportunity to discuss the important question now before the house. We believe the work stoppage will do incalculable harm to the whole of the Canadian economy. The immediate pressure arises in connection with the perishable merchandise to which the mover of the motion has already referred, but we are so close to the end of the shipping season in Montreal that the cost of this stoppage to the Canadian ecoonmy, if it continues, is something which cannot be calculated.

I say on behalf of our party that this stoppage cannot be permitted to continue. Yesterday, when he was asked about this situation, the minister said as reported on page 4598 of Hansard:

> There is no authority under which the Minister of Labour can intervene in cases of this kind. The parties must learn they should try to work out their own differences.

I personally have always said that free collective bargaining means negotiation between labour and management, and that governments cannot and should not intervene in every dispute. But consider the circumstances in this case. Here is a stoppage which is taking place because the government of Canada did intervene at an earlier stage. Last year when there were problems and stoppages the government of Canada put forward legislation with which many of us disagreed violently. It put forward legislation appointing an arbitrator and making it a condition of the law that the award of the arbitrator should be binding on both parties. It is as a result of that legislation and of an award by Mr. Picard, the wording of which is apparently unacceptable to either side, that we are faced with this stoppage.

It is not a sudden or an unexpected stoppage. For weeks the signs have been apparent. For weeks it has been obvious from press reports, messages and telegrams from the union to representatives of the various parties in this house, that all was not going well. I am sure the shipping federation has been in communication with the minister for some time. For weeks it has been obvious that the arbitration award was giving rise to difficulty, that the understanding of both parties as to its meaning was different. It was obvious that there would be trouble.

The union claims the companies are implementing only those portions of the award which suit them. I shall not go into details, but as I understand it one of the major sections of the arbitration decision provided that there should be a reduction in the number of people working in each gang. The arbitrator obviously based this part of the award on the fact that with the use of more modern equipment the work could be done by gangs containing fewer men than in the past. I believe the number of men was cut from 21 to 16. This is a sharp decrease but, as I understand it, the union and the men are not disputing this decision. They recognize that the advance of technology cannot and should not be stopped.

However, as I understand their case they take the position that in return for agreeing to this reduction in the size of the work force the award contained provision for certain guarantees in connection with the minimum hours for which the men would be paid each week, and so on. As I understand the position the companies have refused to implement this part of the arbitration award. Under these conditions, believing that the companies are unfairly using the law passed by parliament and using unfairly an award made by an arbitrator, and faced by the refusal of the companies to discuss these matters in any kind of amicable and open minded way, the union and the men have resorted to work stoppages.

To me it seems obvious that since the dispute has arisen as a result of differences of opinion as to the report of an arbitrator appointed by the government following a decision by this parliament, the position taken yesterday by the Minister of Labour that there is nothing he can do is completely untenable. After all, parliaments and governments have intervened in many labour disputes. We intervened in this dispute in 1966. We intervened in the railway strike and passed legislation imposing binding arbitration on the railway workers. I am sure the minister knows that the railway workers and their unions did not want that binding arbitration and are not happy with the awards the arbitrators made. We have intervened in such disputes in the past, and I suggest we have no alternative but to intervene now.

What can the minister do? It may be that he is legally and technically correct in saying he has no legislative power to intervene, but I am sure if he asked representatives of the shipping federation and of the union to meet with him here in Ottawa or in Montreal, those representatives would not refuse to attend such a meeting. I suggest that at such a meeting the areas of disagreement could be discussed and clarified. If at that meeting agreement could not be reached between the two parties on what the arbitration award actually meant, then it seems to me further arbitration would be necessary immediately.

I suggest to the minister and the government that if we are to have labour-management relations which work, if we are not to be plagued with strikes, illegal stoppages or lock-outs, conciliation and arbitration must be performed by a person or persons acceptable to both sides. If either side believes the particular arbitrator or arbitrators are not fair and that that side will not get a just hearing, then when the award is made it will not be accepted.

I suggest to the minister that in Canada there are quite a number of people who are acceptable to both labour and management. If Mr. Picard is not acceptable to one side or the other—I pass no judgment on Mr. Picard; I do not know too much about him or his record—then I suggest to the minister that he appoint another arbitrator. Mr. Carl Goldenberg has acted as an arbitrator in a large number of disputes. There is also Mr. Justice Laskin, and a large number of other people acceptable to both sides.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the minister convene a meeting of the parties immediately. If agreement cannot be reached at a direct meeting between the union and management in the presence of the minister and his officials, then the minister should immediately appoint an arbitrator acceptable to both the union and management to settle the issues which are still in doubt and which have caused this stoppage.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot for moving the adjournment motion. What we are engaged in is our annual exercise in attempting to free the flow of exports through our dock facilities. We have not quite landed on the anniversary of the last time the business of the house was adjourned to discuss a dock tie up, but we are only a week away from it. This means that an entire year has elapsed during which legislation could have been introduced to deal with this area of the economy, legislation which would have been more than a patchwork solution to an immediate problem and which would have provided some different means of settling this sort of dispute that would not involve the disruption of the flow of exports.

We can expect that if such legislation is not introduced during the coming year then in exactly one year's time, give or take a day or two, we shall be engaged in this same exercise. It seems that annually we pass legislation to deal with emergency situations, to get goods flowing again, but we do not compensate industries thousands of miles away from the work stoppages that suffer not only in the immediate year of the stoppage but in successive years, due to lost markets caused by lack of confidence in the ability of those industries to move their goods on time.

I would use the same example I used a year ago. I have received the same sort of telegram that I received a year ago. The only difference in this case is that the east coast ports are substituted for the west coast ports. I realize that the dispute itself is of a slightly different nature, but the effect on the particular industry in my province, my constituencey, is exactly the same. Such a situation as this produces in that industry, and I am sure in hundreds of others clear across the country, an absolutely scalding frustration at the inability of this parliament to move effectively to prevent this becoming the annual occurrence that we all know it has become.

Looking at the example of the fruit industry in British Columbia, I would point out that this year import restrictions in the United Kingdom were eased for the first time in many years. This meant a larger market than usual available to an industry whose export markets are absolutely vital. In this context we must look at the things which have happened in rapid confusion over the last few weeks.

The pound sterling has been devalued. While this may not have an immediate impact on the export market this year, the future implications are very serious. In addition a surcharge has been imposed on freight rates from the St. Lawrence ports, a very significant surcharge of 25 per cent clear across the board on all goods moving through those ports, because of the frustration of the shippers who have learned that they cannot move goods freely through those ports. On top of that we have had virtually a complete shutdown of the docks, as a result of which goods that have already moved to the port of Montreal for shipment are in danger of spoiling there before they reach market. The implications for the future are very great.

I sympathize with the minister in the statement he made yesterday, when he suggested that both sides to the dispute act responsibly and use the grievance procedure available to them and attempt to make it work. But we realize that by means of a great variety of legislation during the last several years we have been engaged in the process of chipping away at individual and private responsibility in many fields. We have now reached the point where we cannot expect a prompt and decisive result to spring from the minister's hopes, hopes with which I have every sympathy.

The industry of which I have been speaking made a remarkable drive in recent years to bring its operations up to date. It did this with the full co-operation of the provincial and federal departments of agriculture. The Minister of Agriculture who is listening to this debate, knows the concern of the individual producers throughout the valley to modernize their operations, and he knows the measures this house has taken in areas such as crop insurance—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe I should remind the hon. member and perhaps others that we are now debating an allegedly urgent situation at the port of Montreal. The hon. member does not seem to be dealing with that matter at all.

Mr. Johnston: With all deference, Mr. Speaker, I think the relevance of my remarks will be clear in a moment.

The industry in the province of British Columbia has improved its operations to the point where it can compete with any in the world. It is on top of this particular competitive field at this time. However, the shipping industry in the ports of Canada is still in the dark ages. The frustration is compounded when any industry in this country which is competitive is impeded at the point where the goods leave this country. That is the relevance of my remarks, and I am sure they will be repeated by spokesmen using other industries as specific examples during this debate.

I would urge the minister to intervene in this debate. If the necessary legislation does not exist to solve this problem it should be brought in as emergency legislation, and brought in quickly. In addition, during the course of the next parliamentary year and prior to the month of November next we should have legislation sufficiently comprehensive and compelling to prevent this annual occurrence.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I think that I will just be making some brief remarks on this occasion.

I thank the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe Bagot (Mr. Ricard) for having moved this adjournement motion to discuss such a serious and important matter. Our group would have preferred it if the debate had originated on the other side of the house, and I think that the minister should have taken the opportunity yesterday or today to make an important statement on the present circumstances in the Montreal harbour.

I think that the minister should take the opportunity this afternoon to make a statement on what he intends to do to end this crisis which affects not only the longshoremen but also the export-based economy of the province of Quebec. We want to export our surplus products to give impetus to business in the area served by the port of Montreal, and if we cannot do so because of crises which are more and more frequent, the economy in this area will get worse and worse.

From the court injunction of this morning, it is obvious that one of the parties concerned has not respected important clauses of a contract. If it is so, I think that the minister should have seen to it that they are respected.

Had strong measures been taken, that crisis could have been avoided. Therefore, if the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) cannot have all the terms respected through adequate legislation, the government should consider a cabinet reshuffle as soon as possible without waiting for the next elections.

I hope that the minister will make an important statement which will reassure all the people who are more or less affected by the present crisis in the port of Montreal, telling them that it will be possible to solve it immediately. The minister should use all his influence to help both parties to come to an agreement and respect their contract.

[English]

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be very brief, but I should like to make use of the opportunity to speak during this adjournment motion on the point in question. I can indicate my interest in this subject because of the general transportation picture in eastern Canada. The ports of Halifax and Saint John, which are undergoing a difficult transformation period—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I should not interrupt the hon. member immediately, but I must remind him as I have reminded others that the only reason this motion was granted was that there is an allegedly serious situation in the port of Montreal. Had the motion dealt with general transportation policy I assure the hon. member it would not have been allowed. The only term of reference the hon. member has is the motion itself.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You are quite right of course, Mr. Speaker. I intended to indicate my general fear that this strike might spread to other ports. Reference was made to the fact that two or three days ago the effect of the strike had been felt in Three Rivers and Quebec. These effects are now moving substantially into these ports with dislocations there. I want to put on record my fear that these dislocations may occur in other ports. The ports of Halifax and Saint John are operating under old agreements and may not be affected, but we know that once these things get going they spread rapidly.

I want to express my hope that the minister will act in this regard. He admonished the different parties yesterday in respect of this matter, but this evidently had little or no effect. We have received representation from the Montreal port council and from the Canadian Export Association through Mr. J. M. McAvity, who in no uncertain terms urged the minister to take action. It is my hope that the minister will not sit back any longer in the hope that by some miracle the court will find a solution, or action will be forthcoming that has not already become apparent.

I listened to the minister on the radio this morning when he suggested this strike was akin to another situation in Vancouver. He said that situation was waited out and finally resolved. I should like to remind him that there is great urgency at this time, with the Christmas season approaching and because of the perishable nature of many goods being transported at this time of the year. The minister cannot wait any longer to take action. As one who for many years has had fears about general transportation in eastern Canada I should like to express my hope that the minister does not let this situation continue.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker I just have a few questions I should like to put to the minister. I hope he will be able to supply the answers. The core of this dispute seems to be related to the interpretation of the Picard report, as to what certain provisions mean. I see that the Montreal port council and others have suggested that if necessary these interpretations should be made by Commissioner Picard in order to clarify his own conclusions and recommendations. However, the unions have rejected any further clarifications by Mr. Picard because they say he is a party to the arbitration report, and therefore some other interpretation formula must be found. I have here a recommendation by Mr. Cutler, which is that another arbitrator should be appointed to interpret the differences in the report.

I understood from the minister's reply yesterday that there were grievance and arbitration provisions in the collective agreement. I want to ask him this question. When he met with the parties on Friday did he suggest that they have these differences in interpretation worked out under the grievance provisions in the agreement; and if so, what was the response? Also, what has been the response of the unions to settling these differences in interpretation by the grievance and arbitration provisions in the agreement?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, just before the minister outlines the government's position I would appreciate the opportunity of saying a few words, partly by way of representation and partly by way of suggestion. I intervene at this stage and take advantage of the opportunity given by the adjournment motion primarily because of my concern, as a member from British Columbia, for the welfare of the fruit growing industry there, but also a number of other primary producers who are affected.

The position of the British Columbia fruit industry is, of course, that it has had an old and traditional market for its produce in the United Kingdom, that this produce customarily is moved through the port of Montreal, and that this time of year, approaching Christmas, is the height of that movement. Therefore any interruption or slowing down of the movement of this perishable commodity represents in itself a very serious set-back for the industry, the kind of set-back to which sensitive markets are accustomed to react rather badly.

Those who handle this kind of produce on the other side need the assurance that their trade requirements will be met, and if there are interruptions in the supply it gives the British Columbia fruit industry a bad mark. So there is an understandable sensitivity and concern on their part for an interruption such as that brought about by this slowdown. The concern is heightened now by the fact that the United Kingdom market, as a result of devaluation, is made a much more difficult market on that ground alone. That situation is difficult enough.

There are no alternative supplies of as good quality apples, but there are alternative sources of supply of apples. When you have the situation where because of devaluation our hazards in the United Kingdom market are increased, and you add to that the difficulty in transporting the goods, in other words in meeting the commitments, you realize that firm contracts are jeopardized by the situation in the port of Montreal. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will agree with me that the concern and urgency with which the British Columbia fruit industry regards this situation are entirely justified.

On that basis they feel, and I support them, that the minister can no longer refuse to intervene directly. After all, it was the government, on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, that introduced into this parliament and had passed the bill setting up the first arbitration process, so the government has an inescapable responsibility to see that the terms expressed and implied in that statute are carried out. We opposed the bill at the time. We said it would make difficulties. The hon. member for Ontario pointed out clearly the kind of difficulty it would create. But the government insisted and were successful in having the bill passed by the house.

The bill says the findings of the arbitrator shall be incorporated into the collective agreements. That is the expressed provision of the bill. I say this means by implication, and by necessary implication, that those findings must be carried out. I say the government cannot drop the matter at this stage and say "There is a dispute as to their terms and it would be really most improper for us to take any further action by way of intervention either directly or indirectly". I say the minister must bring the parties together and keep them together until they arrive at agreement as to the meaning of the terms.

The minister must impress upon the parties their national responsibility. I know he is reluctant to go further than what he thinks is the general guiding principle with regard to direct intervention in matters of this kind. I respect that principle and appreciate his reluctance, but I say that having picked up this hot potato, he cannot drop it now.

I appeal also to the Minister of Agriculture. I am quite certain he is aware of the seriousness of this situation for primary producers without the necessity of my further elaboration. I suggest he should join the Minister of Labour in meeting the parties to the dispute and impressing upon them that while they have understandable concerns, which are respected, nevertheless there is an overriding concern which they too must respect; and that is the concern for the national good and for the welfare of parties who are powerless to intervene directly. Those parties being powerless to intervene directly, they must be represented by and action must be taken on their behalf through the ministers of this government.

I know the government are concerned about this matter, and my suggestions are not made on the basis that they have not thought about it and expressed their concern. I believe the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Agriculture should form a team and meet with the parties to this dispute. They should meet with them without delay, and insist upon their being called together and kept together until they have arrived at agreement, so that in the national interest the full measure and pace of the transportation of goods through the port of Montreal can be resumed.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish very briefly to support this motion of urgency. I support the remarks made by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke and the hon. member for Kamloops as to the effect this situation is having on the fruit growers of British Columbia and on certain other primary producers. The ones who suffer immediately and to the greater extent are the fruit growers themselves, because they are not in a position to adjust to certain circumstances as are other large scale primary producers, particularly in industry.

Telegrams I have received indicate that this is a matter of increasing and growing concern to many of the people we have the honour to represent. In this connection I should like to place on record the text of a telegram I received, as did the other hon. members who have spoken. The telegram reads as follows:

> Deteriorating slowdown St. Lawrence ports and 25 per cent surcharge imposed by steamship companies on ocean freight rates threatens losses our growers disruption shipping schedules and serious additional financial burden United Kingdom importers already hard pressed by sterling devaluation.
> Please confer ministers agriculture and labour for appropriate action as complete tie up St. Lawrence ports could result cancellation our firm orders and serious losses Canadian exporters. Eric W. Moore, general manager, B.C. Tree Fruits Ltd.

• (12:10 p.m.)

Since I have received that telegram they have become more concerned than ever. I have discussed this matter with the Minister of Labour and his officials, and with the Minister of Agriculture. Because of the more serious impact upon the agricultural producers, particularly at this time of the year, and the possibility of losing Christmas and winter markets which have been established throughout the years in Great Britain, I do urge that the ministers take action to bring these parties together and resolve this dispute in the national interest.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on this subject because, as has been expressed previously by the hon. mmeber for Saint John-Albert, we do have some fears in Halifax and Saint John about the course that is being followed here. I am afraid a rather big chicken has come home to roost on the shoulders of the government. We all recall that last June the house passed Bill C-215, which settled the dispute between the longshoremen and the shipping federation of Montreal. One of the provisions of the bill—and I suggest it is the one that is causing the difficulty, and indeed the crisis, on the Montreal waterfront and on other waterfronts on the St. Lawrence river—required the commissioner to report on certain problems. At that time the hon. member for Ontario pointed out that this was a rather grave departure from the established labour practice in that this was the imposition of a formula on the parties concerned rather than something that could be studied by both sides and on which agreement could be attained through the normal processes of collective bargaining.

My concern is that the Picard report obviously not only covers the situation in Montreal but will also affect other ports in Canada, including the one I have the honour to represent in parliament. We know only too well that our longshore operations have dwindled over the years, and that we are in a serious position with regard to these operations. I would not like to see them further affected or worsened by what we are going through as a nation in the port of Montreal.

I should like to say to the minister, with all due respect to his position and the statement he made yesterday, that he should now admit to the house that he is wrong and express a willingness to use the vast prestige of his office to get both sides together with him, instead of meeting with one or the other or having his officials meet with one or the other. I believe he should go over the situation to see whether it cannot be resolved to the satisfaction of both sides.

The hon. member for Kamloops has suggested a ministerial team which should work on this problem. I do not believe he mentioned the Minister of Transport as a possible member of that team, yet transportation problems in large measure are at the heart of the difficulty, as well as the more immediate labour dispute with which we are seized.

Again I say that I hope the minister will be inclined to change his mind so that instead of having a bloody battle between employers and employees, over an issue in Montreal, any differences on the Picard report will be worked out; because sooner or later they are bound to affect every other port in Canada.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a very few, short remarks on this most serious problem. I think what has developed in Montreal highlights the growing problems and difficulties which our country and the house have had to face in the past two or three years. It is not my intention to recriminate against the government, the shipping federation in Montreal or the trade unions, but for a long time I have been feeling that something of a very specific nature must be said, whether it is popular or unpopular.

The fact that we are discussing an urgent motion to adjourn highlights the problems and brings me to my feet. We have reached the stage now where the economy of Canada is being increasingly endangered by the inability of companies and trade unions to come together, and the failure of the government to intervene to bring the two parties together. Our position as a trading nation is being endangered by an expression of selfish interest by the particular groups concerned.

I am afraid that in this most serious problem which is now before us somehow or other, whether from the viewpoint of the employers or that of the employees, it must be made clear to all Canadians that in the interests of our economy if certain groups cannot get together, eventually parliament will be forced to act, although in my opinion it does not wish to act in regard to the free collective agreements in Montreal, Vancouver or anywhere else. Speaking as a former trade unionist and as a member of the New Democratic party, it seems to me I would not be acting as a responsible member of parliament, at a time when our economy is being endangered by lockouts, strikes and disagreements on interpretation, were I not to say that now is the time to tell everyone in Canada individually and collectively that we have to think more as Canadians and less as individual groups expressing their selfish interests.

I feel very strongly about having to rise and make the statement that I would be a completely irresponsible member of parliament if I did not say that we have reached the point when something like this must be said. Therefore I appeal to the minister of Labour through you, Mr. Speaker, for heaven's sake to try to bring the opposing groups in Montreal together both in their interests and in the interests of our trading position. Let the port of Montreal be opened as speedily as possible. Then, once it is opened, we should immediately bring these groups together to see if we can bring to a halt this impeding of our Canadian economy.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the remarks of the last speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver East. When the hon. member referred to selfish interests, he neglected to name them. I do not know whether he meant the employers or the employees. Representing an agricultural constituency as I do, this situation does not concern me except that I should like the minister, in the course of his remarks, to say what effect it will have on the export of prairie grain, I am not so sure the effect on grain shipments is serious at the moment, but I recall the situation of a year ago which caused the loss of markets for prairie grain which meant so much to the economy of Canada.

I am quite sure the government, since they have no members from western Canada, will say they are not aware of this situation. However, it has been brought to their attention time and time again. I could almost repeat word for word the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops when he was referring to the problems of the fruit growers. There are certain times of the year when the fruit crop has to be moved, otherwise it will spoil. The situation is not quite that serious with regard to grain, but it is a serious matter to western farmers if this grain does not move.

If we do not take advantage of the markets which are available at certain times of the year, then we will have lost those markets. I suggest to the minister that at the present time Canada is in difficulty because we have lost grain markets. This fact does not concern the grain producer on the prairies alone but is of concern to the whole of Canada.

The hon. member for Vancouver East did say this situation presented a danger to the economy of Canada, and I certainly agree with him. In fact I would go further. I suggest that about a year ago, I believe on June 8, a bill was introduced by a member of the New Democratic party, and why it was withdrawn is beyond me. The bill introduced by the hon. member for Skeena was entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of loading and unloading at the ports of Three Rivers, Montreal and Quebec." For some reason or other this bill was withdrawn on June 14. The leader of that party appeared on television just before that; then the bill was withdrawn for reasons which are beyond me, unless there was pressure from some of the labour groups from whom that party gets support.

I have not very much to say about strikes. As I said before, I am from western Canada and I do not represent a high percentage of labour. I am opposed to strikes when they affect innocent people, and I am afraid this is one of those cases. If the longshoremen and the shipping companies have a dispute, then certainly there must be some means of settling that dispute. I believe the fact that this strike is affecting innocent persons is one of the most important reasons for the minister to step in and take some action. This is the only way these innocent people can be protected. I hope that in the course of his remarks the minister will say something about the effect of this strike on western grain shipments.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): As a western member and the representative of a grain growing area, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments at this point. I will be brief since the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek outlined the situation fairly well. However, there are a few more points I should like to make. I want to join with other speakers in urging a quick settlement of this dispute which is tying up shipping in the port of Montreal. The hon. member for Ontario posed some very important questions which I hope the minister will try to answer.

I wanted to mention the latest report of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. I feel this is in order, Mr. Speaker, because the report refers to wheat shipments through the port of Montreal. Reference has been made already, of course, to the fact there has been a slump in grain exports this year. I am sorry the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not here because he always has a cheerful outlook on the situation. He says it is going to improve. Perhaps it will improve, but it cannot improve unless the dispute at the port of Montreal is settled, because a lot of grain does move through that port.

I should like to refer to this report by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for November 1, 1967. The period covered is from August 1 to November 1 of this year, during which time we shipped through St. Lawrence ports, that is Sorel, Trois-Rivières, Quebec but mostly Montreal, and through other Canadian ports, just over 60 million bushels of wheat.

Last year was just an ordinary year, but during the same period from August 1 to November 1 we shipped nearly 156 million bushels. I do not blame the present dispute in the port of Montreal for this drop in exports; I blame a lack of effort on the part of the government in getting out and selling our wheat.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce says he is going to sell wheat in the near future; that is the hope he holds out. If he does, then the operation of the port of Montreal will become very necessary in order that this wheat may be moved. I just wanted to emphasize the interest of western members in the settlement of this dispute. I hope the questions posed by the hon. member for Ontario will impress upon the government the seriousness of the situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on the present crisis in the port of Montreal and mention especially that I am surprised at the attitude of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) concerning the conflict.

Indeed, the Minister of Labour seems to approach this problem in a rather surprising way. Yesterday, he stated in the house, and I quote his own words reported on page 4598 of Hansard of Thursday, November 23:

> The parties must learn that they should try to work out their own differences.

That is what the minister said.

That is not a labour conflict that was created by the parties, it is rather a conflict that arose from the report of a commission appointed by the government and the Minister of Labour.

If there is a conflict at the present time in the port of Montreal, it is due to the report of a commission appointed by the government and the minister is trying to evade the responsibility by saying:

> The parties must learn that they should try to work out their own differences.

A little further down the same page, the minister added:

> The parties have their rights, but they have not attempted to exercise them in the manner agreed upon. They are looking to the government to impose a solution. I think it is about time they learned they must work out their own solutions.

The minister says: "It is high time the parties should learn they must work out their own solution."

Then why do we have a Minister of Labour? What is the minister doing? What is his role if it is not to solve problems? The minister simply says that it is about time the parties should learn they must work out their own solution. Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour has nothing else to do here, the only thing he has to do is to resign and since he will no longer be available to help to settle disputes, the parties themselves will find their own solutions.

Why would the minister continue in office then? What else does he have to do? Mere red tape.

Yesterday, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) asked the minister the following question:

Will the minister use the stature and importance of his office and summon both parties to Ottawa at once in order to help mediate an agreement on the understanding of the Picard report?

The minister answered:

No, Mr. Speaker.

So, the minister does not want to use the stature of his office and summon both parties in order to try to mediate an agreement on the understanding of the report.

What is the role of the minister in this case? Is he minister in name only and has nothing to do here? What is his role? The minister should give us an answer to that.

Mr. Speaker, if the Montreal harbour is at a complete standstill today and if everything is stopped, it is precisely because the minister did not take the matter seriously and preferred to tell the parties: I am non-existent, find your own solution yourselves, do not rely on me, I do not want to act in this case. Or, as he said yesterday: Both of you, management and labour try to settle your own differences alone, I do not want to assume the duties of a Minister of Labour any longer.

The results measure up to our expectations. Is the minister losing interest in the whole matter like he said himself yesterday, as shown clearly by the quotations I have just referred to.

Well, if the minister is completely disinterested in the matter, he has only one thing to do, that is to tender his resignation, since he is unwilling to play his role seriously.

I remember very well that last year, at the time of the strikes in British Columbia ports, the Minister of Labour had made a rousing appeal, asking everybody to settle that strike as quickly as possible, since the ships were loaded with perishables.

You remember, Mr. Speaker, that over a few hours delay, the minister had made charges of irresponsibility and called me irresponsible for refusing to accept one of his proposals with regard to the strike in British Columbia ports. He had called me irresponsible because those ships were loaded with perishable cargo, and the same situation prevails today. As the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) said so well, there is one million dollars' worth of perishables sitting there, and the hon. minister does not want to do anything.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am forced to turn on him the charge he levied against me last year and tell him in his turn that he is irresponsible in not wanting to do anything—since he used that expression last year—about the perishables which are piling up in the port of Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister does not want to act; he remains idle. It must be recognized that he is the one who used the word "irresponsibility" which applies so well to him today.

In the light of those facts, I feel that we are justified in requesting the resignation of the minister. Mr. Speaker, might it be that the hon. minister was eager to solve the problem in the ports of British Columbia last year because he comes from that province? However, when it is a problem concerning Quebec, the minister is no longer in a hurry, he merely says: "Let the parties learn to work out solutions among themselves; as for me, I will not get involved". When British Columbia is involved, special measures, special bills are quickly introduced before anyone can turn around. But when Quebec is involved, there is nothing to be done, and the minister says so: "I have no intention to step in." He also stated yesterday, and I quote:

I think it is about time they learned they must work out their own solutions.

Quebec is treated differently than the province represented by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Speaker, such an attitude is unthinkable and unwarranted, and in closing, I call for the resignation of the Minister of Labour, who cannot do his job and who prefers to let things go unchecked rather than try to find solutions to the problems within his department.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in this debate, since quite a few members, from my party as well as others, have expressed their opinion.

However, I have been struck by something on which I particularly wish to insist. Up until now, not too many members from the island of Montreal have expressed their opinion in the course of this debate.

I have no ulterior motive in saying that, Mr. Speaker. However, those members are right on the spot and should be more familiar with the problem than we who are further away. For example, I would like to know the opinion of the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey), to whose services the government constantly has recourse to settle certain problems or to get out of tough spots. I know that the hon. member for Verdun is a rather serious man, whose judgment can generally be trusted, and I think his opinion would be most appreciated at this time.

[English]

I hope the hon. member for Verdun will not hold it against me if I make this request of him. In the circumstances his participation in this debate as a member from an area close to the Montreal docks would be most helpful in view of his knowledge of the subject. It would help not only to get the government out of trouble but also to get some of his constituents out of trouble.

• (12:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member for Mégantic whether he has noticed that only three members from the island of Montreal are here today, for this important debate, and that the others are not interested at all—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Grégoire: Has the hon. member noticed that too?

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I had indeed noticed it. I am not as blind as some hon. members opposite who do not see the importance of that problem as other hon. members do.

I know that the minister does not intend, according to the answer he gave yesterday to the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), to intervene in the conflict, and that he leaves it to the parties to work out a solution to their problem.

Mr. Speaker, I have noted a fact which is often distressing; before taking action to settle a dispute or a problem, the government waits until it degenerates into a serious crisis and then, when there is practically no way to settle it, administrators, arbitrators, etc. have to be appointed. Why does the minister not intervene at this time to settle the dispute? Why is the minister afraid to become involved in this? It is his job, why does he not do it?

Mr. Speaker, what kind of occult forces are at play behind those strikes, those conflicts, particularly this one, to make the minister refuse to deal with it. He knows very well that the economy cannot afford another strike. There have been enough, why wait until that conflict becomes worse before intervening directly?

What the minister said yesterday is true; we do not have time to deal with all those problems. But if parliament does not have time to consider them, it is the minister's duty and role to do so. It is up to the minister to act immediately so that parliament may not be compelled to take steps in the near future.

When the minister is discharging his duties off-handedly, the government is compelled afterwards to pass legislation to settle those problems. As those responsibilities are not discharged, because nobody cares about the matter a crisis breaks out. The house must then be adjourned to settle the problem.

Due to the problems which we are facing at the present time, such as credit restriction, the rise in the cost of living and all the other factors giving rise to inflation, the risks of a recession which are evident for those who have insight, the economic difficulties, especially in the eastern part of the country—it must not be forgotten that the dispute in the Montreal harbour does not only affect the province of Quebec, but also all Canadian producers who use the port of Montreal and the St. Lawrence seaway—I think that the minister cannot afford to ignore a problem and to let it develop into a national or serious crisis. If the house adjourned today under standing order 26, it is because this problem is of national concern, otherwise Mr. Speaker would not have accepted the motion. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I do not question your judgment, but that of the minister.

I readily believe that the minister does not have to worry about such matters ahead of time. However, the answer he gave yesterday to the effect that he had no intention to settle the problem or to intervene was rather clear. It would have been better for him to say: let us wait a while and see how things develop. But it is absolutely false to tell us that he will have nothing to do with it, that it is none of his business.

I should like to ask the hon. minister to intervene, to summon the two parties and see where the trouble lies, where the problem or difficulty started. We had an arbitrator and a commission last year, in 1966, to do so: the Picard commission. Who has failed in applying the recommendations of the report? Who is responsible: The employees or the employer? We should know. Why should the minister, who endorsed the Picard report, now wash his hands of the whole matter, when it may well be that something is lacking in the report or in its implementation?

It is his duty as minister to look the situation over and to correct it. The minister is the only one who can solve it; I am quite familiar with problems of this type; quite a few of them have arisen in the past. Instead of ironing themselves out, they get progressively worse. We are reaching the point where nothing can be solved. The two parties take up their positions and, finally, parliament is compelled to step in through legislative action.

So, Mr. Speaker, the minister cannot afford to let the situation deteriorate in this economic area. Then, some people wonder why grumblings are being heard in some provinces, particularly in Quebec. We voice our concern over separatism, the fate of Canada, we discuss changes in the constitution, bilinguism, anything you want. In the last analysis, it is simply—

Mr. Speaker: I would remind the hon. member that we are now considering a motion concerning the port of Montreal. The hon. member is talking about separatism. It seems to me that we have wandered away from the question under consideration far enough for us to come back to it.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I readily accept your remarks and the point you have made. However, if some hon. members see no relation between separatism and the economic troubles we have in our part of the country, I must say frankly and sincerely that I do. Moreover, I believe it is my duty to express my opinions in the house. The minister may not express his, but I do mine, and in good faith. I am convinced that it is my duty to do so.

The Chair may hold a different view. I may perhaps hope that my views are not justified but complete work stoppage in the port of Montreal is something that the economy neither of Quebec nor of Canada can afford at this time.

I make the connection with separatism because that may be remote but it is effective and dangerous. And possibly if more strikes were settled and fewer problems arose, or if more security were available for Montreal longshoremen, as well as elsewhere in the country, because such a strike affects all producers, possibly there might be fewer problems in Canada, problems of separatism, independence and all you can wish for.

In closing, I should ask the minister to kindly reconsider his position and to intervene in the conflict, not to impose a solution, but at least to try and discuss with the parties involved so as to arrive at an agreement before it is too late and before parliament is forced to take the situation in hand.

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, I understand very well the reasons why the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) moved the adjournment of the house this morning to deal with the situation in the port of Montreal.

I am sure that everyone, and that is obvious from the views expressed here, is concerned about the long and short term repercussions that this situation might have. Hon. members from the various parts of the country are asking themselves questions. The newspapers have told us that the National Harbours Board has asked the government to intervene. The Canadian Exporters Association is worried. People worry about what is happening to the image of the port of Montreal throughout the world. But, in short, what is the problem?

It is said that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) does not want to assume his responsibilities, but I can tell the house that we have in the person of the present Minister of Labour a man who, during the last few years, has done a great deal to settle disputes and has taken unusual steps to prevent situations such as the one we are facing today. I shall even congratulate him for everything he has accomplished in that area over the years.

In 1966, he took position on that question by way of ministerial action, an action in conjunction with the government; it was then found possible to give longshoremen a substantial wage increase and settle differences which went beyond monetary consideration.

Mr. Picard was appointed to help settle the various points at issue, and the situation prevailing at this time is no more and no less than a misunderstanding between both parties, the Montreal longshoreman and the Shipping Federation, as to the interpretation of the Picard report. What I find strange, Mr. Speaker, is that this report was accepted by both parties; yet, they failed to agree as to its interpretation. It is admitted practically by all that some recommendations or suggestions in the report are not very clear, and during the debate this morning, it seemed that all sorts of things were being added.

A few moments ago I heard the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) say that—I am sorry for bringing this up, but since this gentleman raised the matter first, I would like to make this point—in the case of the dispute involving the port of Vancouver, the minister shouldered his responsibilities, and if the present dispute involved any harbour other than Montreal, he would act much more quickly.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the minister and I approve his answer to the question which was put to him yesterday in this house. Words should not be misinterpreted. As is shown on page 4598 of the Hansard of November 23, this is the answer given by the minister to a first question asked by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Johnston):

> There is no authority under which the Minister of Labour can intervene in cases of this kind. The parties must learn that they should try to work out their own differences.

I agree with that in principle. It does not mean that there is not a little more to be done in the present case. However, I will read the answer given by the minister to a supplementary question put by hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), and I quote:

> As I reported to the house yesterday, I have discussed this matter at length with one side last Friday and offered to do so with the other. Officers of my department have discussed it with that other party. It has even been suggested that if there is ambiguity in one or two passages of the Picard report or at least arising out of the fact that the Picard report supplements and amends the existing agreement, that Dr. Picard himself be asked to clarify ambiguities. One of the parties, the unions, will not accept that suggestion.

[Mr. Laniel.]

Nevertheless Mr. Speaker, I wonder to what extent the Minister of Labour, the government, will always be asked to intervene and dictate solutions?

Personally, as a taxpayer, as a citizen believing in democracy, when I hear labour unions and various organizations make demands on the authorities or secure the right to negotiate, I do not know what to believe because as soon as a conflict arises, we see what happens.

As a matter of fact, we have seen what happened in Montreal at the time of the Transport Commission conflict. At that time, the member for Lapointe did not make charges against the Johnson government as he did against the federal Minister of Labour, because it is not helpful to his cause of Quebec independence. Nevertheless, and as a citizen of the province of Quebec who sees people act and looks at the existing organizations and the means available to settle these differences, I consider that the reply of the minister is fair and that, on the whole, it represents a solution that was not accepted by one of the two parties.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the situation which prevails now cannot continue. However, nobody in this house can deny that Mr. Picard is away on holidays at the present time and that he will be back on Monday. I think that a solution may then be found, because if there is a man who can interpret the contents of the Picard report, I feel that it is not the federal Minister of Labour but Mr. Picard himself and if, following that interpretation, a practical solution cannot be found, then the minister might review his stand.

The minister wanted this debate and he can tell the house this morning to what extent his views may have changed. In the meantime, I trust him, and I am convinced that if the house continues to take positive action, we shall find a solution to this problem in a very near future.

[English]

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be very brief; it is getting close to one o'clock and I will try to conclude them before the break if possible.

First I should like to join with my hon. friend the senior member for Halifax and support the suggestion he made in furtherance of the remarks of my hon. friend from Kamloops with regard to a task force. I urge the minister to give serious consideration to uniting with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and bringing into that group the Minister of Transport in an attempt to overcome this problem.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Where would you find the Minister of Transport?

Mr. Forrestall: He has not been in the house, I grant you, but he must be afoot somewhere. In any event the suggestion made by my hon. friend from Kamloops is sound and should be pursued.

The second point I wish to raise is connected with the difficulties which seem to be arising in the interpretation of the Picard report. I would simply draw the minister's attention to the fact that for some two years the basic recommendations in this report have formed a very satisfactory working arrangement in the ports of Halifax and Saint John. In these circumstances, even if the minister is not legally able to intervene he can at least make clear through his actions in the House of Commons and through those of the officials of his department that on moral grounds there is an urgent necessity for the parties concerned to come together and stay together until the present difficulty has been resolved. It would be simple for me to stand up here and say don't do it. We welcome the business in the port of Halifax but, unlike Montreal, we do not welcome business at the expense of the other ports of Canada; we like to do business in other ways than that.

Third, I would be grateful if when he speaks later the minister would give us some idea, as to what the situation is likely to be in view of the proceedings before the courts in Montreal today. Just what will be the repercussions of this in terms of disruption not only in Montreal but possibly throughout Canada, bearing in mind that there is an obligation on the part of the unions to support each other when, in their view, an issue is just?

In summary, I join with my senior colleague in urging the minister to bring under his wing the new Minister of Transport; it would do him good to get his feet wet. Then, as I say, for some two years the ingredients of the Picard report have formed the basis of working arrangements in Halifax and Saint John. We have experienced absolute stability there and we can tell the world, if it wants stability, to send its goods to Halifax and Saint John. And this stability has been achieved on this basis of the report which seems to be causing the difficulty.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want briefly, to add my voice to those of members who have already spoken during this important debate. I feel I would be derelict in my duty if I did not take advantage of this opportunity to support my western colleagues in particular, and hon. members in general with respect to the emergency situation that has arisen in the port of Montreal. Various hon. members have mentioned the general effects of this emergency on our economy as a whole, but coming from Saskatchewan where our economy depends to a large extent on the welfare of agriculture I wish to say, as was said by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Pascoe) and the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh), that we in the west are naturally concerned about the loss of markets, slowdown of shipments of grain and the resulting loss to the economy as it affects the farmers of western Canada.

I must compliment the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) for introducing the adjournment motion and also you, Mr. Speaker, for your discernment in granting this debate under the rules. I would like to suggest to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) that he take a leaf out of the book of the former minister of labour, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), with respect to the way he handled similar emergencies during his term of office. If the minister would look over the record he would find that the former minister's record was an excellent one. The former minister adopted practices and policies that worked out very successfully, and I think this would be the logical thing to do in the present emergency.

I would also agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) that the setting up of a ministerial task force might be the best way to get us out of this altercation. It is said that two or three heads are better than one under circumstances such as the present, and having such a task force might influence both labour and management and help them to get together as soon as possible.

I know that members of parliament will receive strong representations about this matter. It has already been mentioned that the Canadian Association of Exporters, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Western wheat pools, the Federation of Agriculture, the National Farm Union and other organizations across Canada are going to be vitally interested and will be expressing their alarm with respect to this state of affairs if they have not already done so. It is interesting to note that the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, meeting in Regina last week adopted a resolution in these terms:

—that they should continue to seek changes in Canadian labour legislation to prevent disruption of unrelated economic activities through work stoppages in major industries.

It was suggested that some form of labour-management court might be required.

So, Mr. Speaker, with these very few remarks I would like to endorse what has already been said, namely, that we are in a state of emergency and that the government, which is responsible for alleviating it and solving the problem, should take the urgent steps that are being suggested.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, there was one remark made by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) with which I can agree. I may not agree with some of the extravagant language that he used when moving his motion, but when this matter was being put to the house I made it quite clear that I am in complete agreement with him that the situation is a serious one. It certainly is not one that can be passed over lightly and I would not want him or any other hon. members to think that it has not received serious, careful consideration and action over a period of several weeks not only from me and my department but from the government generally.

As I listened to the speeches this morning, Mr. Speaker, I felt that at least some of the hon. members who participated in the debate had short memories. There was not a single reference to the fact that the very first day this dispute was raised in the house I, as the minister, outlined a course which I thought was the sound and proper one to be followed.

The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), who participated in the debate this morning, did interest himself several days ago when he first asked about the dispute on the docks. He referred to it as a wildcat dispute. On that occasion I said that I had received certain representations in a telegram from the Montreal port council. As recorded on page 4181 of Hansard for November 13, some 11 days ago, the telegram which I sent in reply to one received from

Mr. William Baatz, the president of the Montreal port council, read as follows:

• (2:40 p.m.)

Referring your telegram tenth the collective agreements governing longshoring activities in the Saint Lawrence ports provide for arbitration of grievances. The fact that the agreements have been amended as a result of the Picard report does not affect said arbitration provisions. In view of this and of the urgency of the situation I have sent the following telegram to the Shipping Federation of Canada and the International Longshoremens' Association.

"I am proposing herein to the Shipping Federation of Canada and the International Longshoremens' Association that they agree to the appointment of an arbitrator to be chosen by me to make final and binding decisions with effect until December thirty-first nineteen sixty seven on the issues which have affected shipping operations at the port of Montreal... With the end of the active shipping season near and the year-end holiday season fast approaching, it is imperative that full waterfront operations resume at the earliest time. I would appreciate your immediate advice so that arbitration can proceed."

That telegram went out, as I have said, about 11 days ago to the interested parties. The reason I suggested arbitration will be obvious to anyone with any knowledge of collective bargaining procedure, several of whom I see in this house.

Mr. Starr: Would the minister permit a question at this point? What replies did he receive from the parties to whom he sent the telegram?

Mr. Nicholson: I will be dealing with that in the course of my remarks.

Mr. Starr: I thought you might deal with them now to complete the picture.

Mr. Nicholson: I will deal with them in an orderly way.

Mr. Starr: It would be orderly to deal with them now.

Mr. Nicholson: The reason I suggested arbitration should be perfectly obvious to anyone with any knowledge of how the collective bargaining process works in this country. My remarks will also make it clear why the position of the Minister of Labour differs in this dispute from his position in most disputes which attract headlines in newspapers and the news media in this country.

The ordinary dispute between labour and management usually comes about after a collective agreement has expired and there is no agreement in force. That was the situation we were dealing with in the spring or early summer of 1966. The collective agreements between the shipping federation and the longshoremen in the St. Lawrence ports had expired on December 31, 1965. The parties had some discussions and in April, 1966 they asked for the establishment of a conciliation board. The minister has not only the right but the duty to establish a conciliation board when such action is requested. Within a matter of hours of the time that request was received a conciliation board was established. On the very day that the representative of management and the representative of the workers asked for the appointment of a chairman I appointed a chairman. The hearings began but quickly broke down. Hon. members will recall that within a matter of hours of the breakdown of negotiations in early May of last year I was able to persuade the man I regarded as best equipped to mediate the situation to step in. I refer to Judge Lippe. He knew the problems and he had acted in a similar situation in 1963, at which time he had done an outstanding job.

Judge Lippe took this job on and after he had been at it a few days—this is of importance to those people who are so critical, and I am not referring to hon. members only but to the public generally—he said that the longshoremen had asked for a substantial increase in wages to be incorporated in the new agreement. He said that the employers seemed prepared to give them what they were asking for the year 1966 and that they would extend this into the year 1967 in return for an assurance of greater productivity during the second year.

Judge Lippe in his capacity as mediator worked on this dispute trying to bring about some assurance of increased productivity. When those efforts failed I, as minister, moved in again within a matter of hours of the time Judge Lippe asked me to do so. I invited the parties to come to Ottawa to see me. They met with me and others of my colleagues, and we were in session for several hours one afternoon extending into the early part of the following day. We met again on Sunday and again the matter was adjourned, but progress was made in narrowing the issues.

Let me indicate how difficult it is for a minister of labour, particularly a minister with my background—the only small bit of work I have done on the labour side was done when I was a lawyer acting for labour, and my association with labour-management negotiations was on the management side—to settle these matters. When I was reporting to the house that progress had been made we ran into great difficulty because someone during our talks said that the demands of the union without increased productivity were fantastic. I did not say they were fantastic, but this was the view taken by some responsible people.

The issues had been narrowed and some two weeks later along with three of my colleagues I met with representatives and we were in session with them at separate caucuses and jointly from nine o'clock in the morning on Saturday until nearly six o'clock the following morning, twenty and three-quarter hours without a break. We still were not able to bring about an agreement.

We held a further meeting the next day, on the Monday, when a proposal was made that if the parties could agree on the monetary points—wage increases and fringe benefits—there would be nothing left to settle except job security, which presented a difficulty, and we indicated that we would consider at a later date the introduction of legislation to appoint a commissioner who would take his time in inquiring into this whole matter thoroughly. He was to deal with job security and his findings might be binding and made part of the collective agreements.

When that settlement was reached the minutes drawn up in my office in this building made reference to the fact that collective agreements were to be drawn, which could be modified by agreement or otherwise. These facts came out during the lengthy debate last year. The interesting thing is that while objections were raised when this matter came before parliament in July of last year, and reference was made to this by the hon. member for Ontario and others this morning, the representatives of the unions concerned made it clear that they had not asked for what in effect would be compulsory arbitration. They had assured me and my colleagues in no uncertain terms, however, that being good citizens they would obey the law if such a law was passed.

Mr. Starr: They always say that.

Mr. Nicholson: It should be borne in mind that these interim agreements were drawn up in June of last year and that just a few months ago, after the Picard commission had been working for the better part of a year, the minutes of the settlements were reduced to formal documents and signed by both parties. There is a whole series of collective agreements signed by the unions as well as by the shipping federation. They were signed with the knowledge that the Picard report would be handed down, we hoped soon. They must have realized at that time that under the law passed by this parliament each of those agreements would be automatically and immediately modified to the extent of the conclusions in the Picard report.

The Picard report became available at the end of October. It was necessary to have copies of it prepared in English and in French because of the large number of people directly concerned and because I felt, as minister, that parliament having passed the legislation members should have copies of the report as soon as it became public.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. When the Minister of Labour claims that parliament passed the bill he should make it absolutely clear that it was the government members who in their majority approved the bill and the opposition voted against it.

Mr. Nicholson: We certainly do not deny that.

Mr. Starr: He is giving the wrong impression to the country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Ontario knows there is no question of privilege here. He is making a speech.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has had his opportunity to speak on this motion and he made it perfectly clear this morning what he did at the time, as did the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). I think it is to the government's credit that they introduced the legislation and it went through; otherwise the disastrous situation that had been going on for six or seven weeks might have continued for an indefinite period. But the significant thing, the important thing, is that parliament did pass that legislation, and when the agreements were solemnly signed earlier this year both sides knew that these findings would automatically be part of the collective agreements that had been signed earlier in the year.

When copies of the report became available they were forwarded to both sides on the evening of October 31. The next day, at the opening of this house, copies in English and in French were filed in the house. That was November 1. It was not a case, as was suggested by the hon. member for Ontario this morning, where the Minister of Labour arbitrarily imposed any report on the parties. The parliament of Canada made it clear in July of last year that the findings of this commission would be part of the agreements—

Mr. Starr: No, the Liberal party did.

Mr. Nicholson: —which these people had signed some months after the legislation was passed. Rather than arbitrarily imposing this report on the parties, the minister did what the statute directed him to do and forthwith sent it to both parties. From November 1 to November 5 there were several meetings between spokesmen for the unions concerned, the shipping federation and their agents, the longshoring companies.

On Monday, November 6, following extended discussions the unions notified my representative in Montreal and made it public that they were accepting the findings of the Picard commission. At the same time the executive vice president of the shipping federation made a similar statement, which was later confirmed by the president. That was November 6. Both sides having accepted the findings, I think I had a right to assume that they meant what they said. But what happened?

In respect of the Picard report, as minister I do not want to be too complimentary but I must say that I have read the report and reread parts of it several times and I think the commissioner has done an outstanding job. I believe, as was said by one of the hon. members for Halifax earlier today, his findings are sound and constructive. He proposes a formula that should work well in Canadian ports in general, not just in the ports of Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec. But instead of this report being implemented—and I think its language is reasonably clear—a slowdown began.

It should be pointed out for the benefit of those hon. members who have not read the report that in dealing with job security the commissioner said that those people who had worked from a certain date and had established certain rights of seniority were entitled to job security, but they were entitled to job security only in return for improved productivity. There are in the report some productivity charts which show a falling off in productivity notwithstanding technological change and new developments. The commissioner said he would therefore pick a date and would relate his recommendation to productivity in the year 1964, without even taking advantage of the technological changes that had been introduced in the succeeding two and a half years.

The commission said that all workmen, who had reached that level of productivity and were affected by the report, would receive job security but on the other hand they had to do certain things. He said they had to rid themselves of certain objectionable practices, with which he dealt. He went on to outline what they should do. He said the employers must set up a job security fund, as has been done on the west coast where it has worked successfully for years.

Longshore gangs on the west coast, I might interject, have, I understand, been reduced to 12. Before the report was handed down Montreal longshore gangs consisted of 18 men plus a foreman, certain winchmen and others, totalling around 20 or 21 in a gang. As a result of the report: these gangs are to be reduced to 16 men plus a foreman. They have been 16 men plus a foreman in Saint John and Halifax for some years, I believe. They have been 14 and 15 in Hamilton and Toronto for some years and, as I say, there have been about 12 to a gang on the west coast for some years.

The commissioner made his recommendations. He also dealt with the effects of modernization and technological change. He dealt with the size of a sling and sling loads. He said that in future, in view of the changes that had taken place, these men would be able to work under existing conditions as long as proper safety precautions were taken and they acted reasonably. He told them they could put in whatever load was considered reasonable having regard to the particular kind of equipment being used.

A slowdown, not a strike, not a complete stoppage, developed within a few days. I had my officials in Montreal meet with both sides to see whether they could correct this situation. It was on the seventh day of the slowdown that I sent the telegram which I read earlier. Here I pause to refer to an editorial in a newspaper about which I generally say nice things because I have usually been favourably impressed by it. I refer to the Montreal Gazette. But there are times when they do get off on tangents, and certainly they did not carry out any research in this matter because the headline says "You Can't Arbitrate Arbitration."

Nothing is more absurb than that editorial, because what was said in the legislation was that the conclusions of the Picard report would become part of the collective agreements. Those collective agreements provide in no uncertain terms that if a dispute arises as to the application of the terms of the agreements, there may be arbitration proceedings. If a workman feels himself aggrieved because he considers the safety precautions are inadequate, he has the right to grieve and the right to arbitration. If he feels that other changes should be made, having regard to the combination of circumstances that exists, he has the right to grieve. But the significant fact is that work continues while this grievance is being arbitrated.

I am not stating an opinion on whether the unions are right or wrong. They said they did not object to the Picard report and said they are prepared to implement it, although they do not interpret it in the same way as the shipping federation does. I can assure the house, and I am sure the hon. member for Ontario will agree based on his experience, that in a great many cases matters in collective agreements which are binding on both sides need clarification. It might be argued that instead of using the general language, such as "consistent with safety and reasonableness", the commissioner might have gone further.

Another argument might also be put forward with regard to the availability of longshoremen. In his report commissioner Picard said that longshore gangs will be made up of 16 men plus a foreman but that if in any combination of circumstances management feel, in the interests of safety or otherwise, that the longshore gangs should be increased in size they shall be increased and an extra two or three men should be called up. In several instances more men were called up than the required 16 plus a foreman. In the opinion of the shipping federation or of the stevedoring companies there was a need for additional men. However, sometimes only 17 men showed up instead of 17 plus the additional men who were asked for, and when they were asked why they did not get the extra two or three men they said, "They are at home in bed; go and telephone them". That may or may not be contrary to the letter of the Picard report. I have my own opinion on that but I do not feel justified in stating it.

There might be a need for some clarification on one or both of these points. If the spirit of the report were complied with, one would think that at least during the initial period—and the agreement only has a few weeks to run—the extra men who were asked for might be supplied. They might have had a reason for doing what they did because in most of these disputes there is something to be said for both sides. But in this particular case the employers contend that the language of the report is clear and that they want these men to be made available on the docks as the Picard report indicates should be the case, and if there is any gripe or grievance then reference should be made to the provisions of the agreement.

In reply to the question put to me by the hon. member for Ontario I should say that I received a long wire from the shipping federation within 18 or 20 hours following my wire, in which they said that they could not agree to arbitration because this is only another delaying tactic on the part of the longshoremen. I am not saying that there were delaying tactics on the part of the longshoremen, but it was the view of the shipping federation that to appoint an arbitrator at that time or even now would entail a series of lengthy hearings which might extend until long after freeze-up and no benefits whatever would be derived from the Picard report although the added wages that were agreed upon in June of 1966 are being paid.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister—

Mr. Nicholson: Will the hon. member please resume his seat and wait to ask his questions until I finish my remarks.

Mr. Starr: No wonder the minister cannot settle arguments.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, may I say with deference that I was very patient with the hon. member. This is the third time he has risen to interrupt. I have attempted to answer his questions and when I am giving him the answers he should not interrupt me.

Mr. Starr: We will not ask any more questions. Let the minister carry on.

Mr. Nicholson: Rightly or wrongly the shipping federation said to me that it had been made clear to them that although the longshoremen had indicated they were accepting the Picard report they never intended to do so. This is what they said in their wire as justification for their action in not agreeing to arbitration, which they say would delay matters for weeks. I will read from it:

It is crystal clear from Mr. Gleason's testimony—

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Earlier they identified Mr. Gleason as the president of the International Longshoremen's Association with headquarters in Brooklyn, I believe.

—that his union never had the slightest intention of respecting the binding conclusions of the Picard report. The charges and complaints emanating from the I.L.A. in recent days are merely a smokescreen to divert attention from this vital fact. In the light of the following—

Then they quote certain testimony which was given by Mr. Gleason before the Picard commission in June of last year. They go on to say:

On June 1, 1967 Mr. Thomas Gleason of New York, international president of the I.L.A., appeared before the commission. Pages 90 to 93 of the transcript of his evidence that day are particularly revealing. Under examination by his own counsel—

By the counsel for the longshoremen's union.

—Phil Cutler, the following exchanges took place:

Q. You have told us you have participated in the collective bargaining relationships in the St. Lawrence river ports. You have been in here at various times. Would you tell the commission whether you feel you know your men, your membership of the St. Lawrence river ports?

A. Well I think I really do. I have come up here on three or four occasions when it was really rough even before I became the international president. I think this is one of the most militant groups that we have.

This was their own international president speaking.

They are not any more militant than we have in any other areas but in Canada they are a very militant group. I think that anybody who would try to force a decision on them once again would have trouble. I think they could not make them heed it. I am positively sure nobody would be able to control men if this kind of action would happen.

Q. What kind of action?

A. Well an arbitrary decision would be handed down and automatically say "from now on your gangs are 16 men" or "your gangs are 19 men" or whatever changes you would make. I believe you have a contract which is in effect here now until December 31, 1967, the end of this year. I don't think anybody could make this kind of a change during the life of this agreement without having a complete rebellion on their hands as far as the rank and file.

Q. This is your belief?

A. This is my belief.

Q. This is your belief as an individual and as president of the I.L.A.? Now I ask this of you Mr. Gleason. You have spoken of the steps that you had to undertake in the New York port area to have the men understand and accept this. You have said that without that it could not be undertaken in Montreal.

My question to you is this: as president of the International Longshoremen's Association are you prepared to undertake if necessary the same efforts here in Montreal to have the men accept a cut in the gang?

A. I would say no, I think that it would be foolish. Like I said, I think there is a contract in effect until December 31, 1967 and I would support the rank and file and the local unions in Canada, as the international president, to maintain those conditions and maintain that contract until its expiration.

Rightly or wrongly, the shipping federation say they are convinced that arbitration will do what Mr. Gleason predicted was going to happen, that is, it will protract the whole business until December 31.

In discussions with the shipping companies, I drew attention to the fact that the shipping season was nearly over and there was going to be a new agreement. I said, "Now, be realistic". They said, "Well, we had a shutdown in Montreal in the spring of 1966 which lasted seven weeks and if we go along with this situation during arbitration until the end of this particular shipping season in 1967 we are only going to be faced with a six or seven weeks slowdown or perhaps longer in Montreal next spring. We would rather have a showdown now when there are only two or three weeks to go". It is as simple as that. I still feel it would have been much better if an arbitrator had been appointed at that time, and I suggested it. I believe the language of the report is clear. However, neither side would agree to an arbitrator, although I learned this morning that the longshoremen have intimated they might now consider arbitration.

Another suggestion that I put forward was that, since there were only two or three points that may need clarification, rather than appoint an arbitrator perhaps Dr. Picard should be invited to come back and answer questions to clear up these points. As I said earlier, collective agreements often need clarification. Yesterday, in answer to a question, I indicated that the employers had said they would accept that proposal and would be guided by whatever Dr. Picard said. However, the longshoremen, in no uncertain terms, have said they will not have Dr. Picard. They said he was through and they would not take his clarification or interpretation.

A suggestion was made that we might appoint an administrator to run the hiring hall set-up in Montreal. I ask in all seriousness, what good would it do to appoint an administrator or a port controller if there are still three or four points on which, rightly or wrongly, each side takes such a determined stand, and particularly when the shipping federation says, why should we waste further time on this thing when we know it is going to be abortive? It is all very well to say that the Minister of Labour or his department should move in. I have not hesitated to move in where there is a prospect of some results, and I will be dealing with the remarks of the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) in a few minutes.

I did not hesitate to move into this situation last year in May and again in June. I had no hesitation in moving in on the serious situation which was developing in connection with the operation of our railways last summer. I had no hesitation in moving in on the Vancouver situation when I brought about a settlement acting as mediator. This was one of the most difficult disputes that we have ever had in Canada. Fortunately I had good, sound advice and support in the course of those negotiations. This morning the hon. member for Lapointe said that the minister had accused him of being irresponsible. I repeat that he was irresponsible when he refused to allow an emergency debate to clear up a situation that had existed for several weeks in Vancouver when millions of dollars worth of oranges and perishable goods were being destroyed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a question of privilege. I suggest to hon. members that we are abusing the rules when we seek, on the basis of a question of privilege, to correct what we consider to be a misstatement by another hon. member who has the floor. This has never been and cannot be a question of privilege. Having said that, I will hear what the hon. member for Lapointe has to say.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, this is truly a question of privilege because it is based on the fact that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) has ascribed to me intentions I did not have and statements I did not make.

Mr. Speaker, the minister says that I raised objections and delayed consideration of the longshoremen's strike in British Columbia, last year, but that is not at all what I did. I simply asked that we consider at the same time the opening of the ports on the St. Lawrence—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Grégoire: It most certainly is a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Nicholson: I did not interrupt the hon. member when he spoke this morning. He was referring to irresponsibility. I repeat that he was irresponsible on that occasion. Millions of dollars worth of perishable goods were being lost and he refused unanimous consent to enable the introduction of legislation which would have put an end to that situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise again on a question of privilege. I have just told the minister that I never did that. Yet, he still imputes to me motives I never had or ascribes to me statements I never made, and I think that justifies me in raising the question of privilege. I told him that I did not delay that debate, that I simply asked that we consider at the same time the opening of the ports on the St. Lawrence. That is not the same thing.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of Labour.

Mr. McIntosh: May I ask the minister a question before he leaves this matter of perishable goods? As I mentioned before, I know very little about the dispute between management and labour. The minister just finished saying he never hesitated—

Mr. Byrne: Would you know a rotten apple when you saw it?

Mr. McIntosh: The minister has just said he never hesitated to move in when an innocent party was affected. I fail to see the difference between this dispute and the earlier dispute. Millions of dollars worth of perishable goods are being affected by this dispute, as the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) pointed out.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are not in committee and the minister has the floor.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Mr. McIntosh: Perhaps he would explain that point.

Mr. Nicholson: I would be glad to deal with it. I said I had no hesitation in moving in, and I did move in here. I have requested the persons involved in this dispute to give priority to perishable goods and commodities of value. I have been assured that priority has been given to the shipment of fruit and other perishable products. My colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) will be dealing with that phase of the subject later today. On one occasion I made a special trip to Montreal to plead with them for action on perishable and special goods.

Mr. McIntosh: What about wheat?

Mr. Nicholson: I do not believe we face the same problem in connection with wheat because wheat is handled in bulk quantities and not by longshoremen to any great extent.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to bring to the attention of the house the fact that the minister's time has expired, unless he is given unanimous consent to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nicholson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the members of the house. The Minister of Agriculture will deal with the wheat aspect in greater detail. However, I do appreciate the hon. member having raised the question. The Minister of Agriculture will deal also with the comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North and the hon. member for Kamloops.

A suggestion was made that the Picard report is not acceptable to either side. This statement was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. I can only repeat that, according to public statements made by both sides, the Picard report is acceptable to them. It is a question of the interpretation of parts of the report and not the report itself. I am not saying that perhaps some of the actions of the companies have not been hasty because when tensions are high people do things for which they are sorry later. I am not holding a particular brief for one side or the other, but I am putting forward the reasons, in response to a question asked by the hon. member for Ontario why the shipping federation and the stevedoring companies would not agree to arbitration. I have had no direct answer to that, although the unions did say they would not agree to have Dr. Picard come forward and interpret the report. Far from saying that the minister or the government are adverse to interfering, I say I am still prepared to appoint an arbitrator if both sides will agree.

If there were no collective agreement in force and they were still in the course of negotiating, then I could act under the statute. I could move in arbitrarily without permission. I could appoint a conciliator. In this case I might even send in a mediator, but in view of the lines that have been drawn and the points that need clarification, unless he had some authority to make binding arbitrary decisions—and I did only suggest that his authority extend to December 31 of this year—there would be very little hope of finding a solution to the problem. The only other course I can think of would be to ask parliament to deal with the matter by legislation and then appoint an administrator to run the docks at Montreal in the same way as the former government appointed an administrator to run the ferry boats on the west coast six or seven years ago.

They are the courses that are open, Mr. Speaker. However, as I said yesterday, there are today in effect binding agreements between both parties. Both parties have not only provided remedies for grievances, settling them by arbitration according to the agreements, but they also have the right to resort to the courts. The employers have said—and again I am not saying whether they are right or wrong—that they are only getting 50 per cent productivity, that they want a dollar's worth of work for a dollar's pay, not 50 cents worth of work. They have also said that if they do not get the right type of personnel they will not accept them. After all, as they point out, they are management and have responsibilities as such.

If this is wrong, Mr. Speaker, then resort could have been had to the courts two weeks ago. But no resort to the courts was had until I made the statement yesterday that these people must learn to do something for themselves instead of asking parliament to intervene every time a situation of this kind develops. It is about time people realized this. We do have a responsibility as a government, yes. Members of parliament also have a responsibility. Knowing what this stoppage is doing to the future livelihood of these people and the reputation of the port of Montreal, and despite the imposition of surcharges to take care of added costs, no resort was had to the courts until after my statement yesterday that they should rely on what they agreed upon themselves in solemn contract a few months ago.

Some questions were asked by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand). He said that an interpretation of the Picard report was needed, but I think I have dealt with that as fully as I need.

There may be some points which require clarification. In my opinion the best way to deal with these questions, if the parties do not want to take the time involved in going to the courts and embarking upon expensive litigation, is to accept my offer to appoint an arbitrator. I therefore repeat that offer now. I will appoint either a port controller or an arbitrator if the parties give him some tools to work with and not tie his hands before he commences.

The hon. member for Kamloops suggested that the government or the Minister of Labour—one or the other—has a particular responsibility to see that the conclusions reached by the Picard report are carried out. I agree that perhaps we have a greater responsibility here. But again I go back to what I said in my opening remarks namely, that the parties entered into these agreements and signed them only a few months ago some time after Professor Picard went to work. They therefore knew he would be submitting a report and they would be bound by it.

Why should not the parties be encouraged to use the remedies provided in the agreements they signed and go to the courts or proceed to arbitration? I will do everything I can to help them, but I do not think they should ask me to get down on my knees any more than I have already. I feel that I have gone about as far as I can. I have pleaded with them. Some reason must be shown, and I think the pressure should come from the people whose shipments are involved, such as the exporters, or the longshoremen and the shipping companies. Let the parties use some common sense. If they wish I will very gladly move in and do what I can but they must co-operate.

There is one point that I do not think should go unanswered. The hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois) said there were no members on the government side from Montreal present during this debate. I should like to point out that throughout the whole debate my colleague the Minister of Industry (Mr.

Drury) was here, and he represents a Montreal riding. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) was also here as well as my parliamentary secretary who is from Verdun, the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel), the hon. member for Nôtre-Dame-de-Grâce, and the Registrar General (Mr. Turner). Also my colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) was here. I have named about eight or nine members from Montreal who have been showing great interest in this debate, so I would suggest that instead of making careless statements of this kind some hon. members should be a little more reasonable and restrained in what they have to say about fellow members of the house.

I did indicate that after I had attempted to make it clear—whether or not I have succeeded remains to be seen—that the minister was not indifferent to the situation but on the contrary had been actively engaged in trying to find a solution in a reasonable and orderly way, not in a way which would encourage people to run to parliament every time they have a work stoppage, I would attempt to answer any questions hon. members wish to put, and I shall now be glad to do so.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not think any member could deny the seriousness of the problem that is involved here. Certainly the problem is serious from the point of view of the primary producers of the country, and this has already been pointed out.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that many members have spoken to me privately about the problem faced by the farmers in the country as a result of the tie-up at Montreal. The hon. members for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford), Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne), Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman), Coast-Capilano (Mr. Davis) and Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Groos) have been bringing this very serious problem to the attention not only of myself but the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing). I can assure them the matter has had our immediate attention, and today's debate has served to emphasize the importance and gravity of the situation to our primary producers.

I am sure all members are anxious to assess the situation and that no one seeks to use this very grievous state of affairs for political advantage. I am sure we are all anxious to get at the facts of the matter and not engage in exaggeration or in putting the problem in a context that is not in accordance with the facts.

From the tenor of the debate in the house and from the representations I have received, there appear to be two areas in which the problem has serious consequences for the primary producers. I note that hon. members opposite feel that more should or could have been done by the Minister of Labour, but I think his presentation to the house this afternoon has clearly indicated he has done everything that is reasonably practicable or which in any way could be effective in this situation.

I was somewhat taken by the words of the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam) who indicated that if the methods of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) when he was minister of labour were adopted, we would have a panacea that would bring a solution to all our problems. Of course, such advice ought to be considered but we must also remember that labour problems of any kind, particularly critical labour problems similar to the one we are discussing, are much easier to solve when there are long lines of unemployed and there is much unemployment. Then there is not that critical sense of urgency in labour problems that we now see in this country. Labour problems such as the one here are problems of a hot economy and of full employment.

Mr. Ricard: Not in Montreal, by any means.

Mr. Greene: I am sure that in the days when the hon. member for Ontario was the minister labour problems were much easier to solve by reason of the vast number of unemployed who were available to ease the pressure of labour problems.

I wish to touch on two areas of concern. First, I wish to deal with the question of wheat, which was drawn to my attention previously by the Minister of Veterans Affairs and by some speakers today. The situation with regard to wheat is as follows. The hon. member for Moose Mountain said that wheat sales this year were not as great as they had been up to this time last year.

An hon. Member: Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. Greene: I beg your pardon. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre said that sales this year were not as great as up to this time last year, which undoubtedly has somewhat alleviated the critical nature of the situation with respect to wheat. I was somewhat disturbed because he apparently felt that insufficient measures with respect to wheat sales were being taken.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Greene: From my limited experience in this field, and I know my hon. friend has had more experience in this field than I have, the wheat board is an extremely efficient organization which is composed of dedicated and able men. They are doing an excellent job in selling wheat. I think that anyone who tries to kid the western farmer or anybody else that wheat can be sold merely by snapping your fingers, that wheat can be sold irrespective of price or production in other countries, will not get far. I do not think you can fool the farmer in the west or anywhere else with that nonsense.

Mr. Pascoe: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Greene: After I have finished, Mr. Speaker. I think the wheat board is doing everything possible that can reasonably be done to sell wheat. In my view, certainly, all the wheat it has been possible to move has been moved and moved effectively.

With regard to the problem in Montreal harbour and wheat sales which have been affected, certainly we should not minimize this situation. Where wheat cannot be moved for some period of time a difficult situation could arise. At the present time the elevators are almost full with adequate supplies of export wheat and domestic feed grains. There are 18.6 million bushels in store at the present time and this is about all that the elevators can take. So from the standpoint of bringing in wheat and of unloading in the port of Montreal, no situation of difficulty at the present time exists in respect of wheat. Of this wheat to which I have referred, about 11 million bushels are export grain, about 6 million bushels are for domestic feed and the rest is United States grain in transit.

An hon. Member: What about production?

Mr. Greene: One lake vessel is unloading grain this afternoon and six are waiting to be unloaded. Of these, one is at berth and the other five are at anchorage. Three ocean vessels are waiting to load grain which is for export. The situation now is that virtually no more grain can be unloaded until space is made available when ocean vessels begin loading.

The Canadian Livestock Feed Board advises that its estimate of winter requirements for feed grain in Montreal at the close of navigation would be from 10.5 to 11 million bushels. They anticipate that about 7 million bushels of this amount would be in elevators and about 3 to 4 million bushels on board winter storage vessels.

It is understood that the railways are continuing to offer agreed charges to feed merchants in Quebec for movement between Fort William and Quebec destinations. In many locations such rates are competitive with transportation by water and rail, particularly in the case of oats and barley. Should there be difficulty in getting sufficient supplies through the harbours board elevators it is very likely that more agreements will be made with the railways for these agreed charges. Certainly this would provide a way to protect the feed supply situation should it be impossible to provide sufficient grain in Montreal for the winter feeding season.

The worst feature in a situation like this is the harm that is done to the Canadian Wheat Board when overseas customers lose confidence in the board's ability to deliver. I think hon. members on the opposition side are well aware of how successful we have been with our sales of Canadian wheat. I concur wholeheartedly in the remarks that export sales of wheat have made a great contribution to the Canadian economy. Western farmers have made a great contribution to the economy of this country by their productivity.

Certainly the effectiveness of our wheat sales is in direct proportion to the quality of our wheat, which is unsurpassed, and to the reliability of wheat deliveries. With respect to reliability we have a proud record of performance in the past. I do not deny that there may be a great problem with regard to wheat though up to the present time the situation has been under control. No grievous harm has been done with respect to wheat or grain at the present time. As I indicated, the elevators are now full. Nevertheless we should not minimize the situation. If the strike should continue for such a time that the reliability of our deliveries pursuant to our commitments is in any way impaired, we would suffer grievous harm with respect to our international repute for dependability of delivery.

Labour Dispute at Montreal

With regard to the other major item which was referred to by members from British Columbia on both sides of the house and by hon. members from Quebec, the one area of concern is apples. The area generally, is that of fruit, though apples form the major area of the problem. I agree with the words of hon. members in respect of the great achievements of the fruit producing industry in British Columbia. Those in that industry have created a viable and efficient industry which, from the standpoint of production, marketing, sales techniques and knowledge, is without peer. That industry makes a great contribution to the Canadian economy.

Mr. Herridge: Hear, hear.

Mr. Greene: It behooves all members of the house, including the government, to make certain that the profitability and effectiveness of that industry are not impaired by external factors which would interfere with its efficient operation.

• (3:40 p.m.)

At the same time, the Quebec apple producers have a close concern with this area and it might be worthwhile to get the facts straight on the situation. I was very worried. I do not believe there is any advantage in overstating the position or stating it in a partisan sense. I believe all hon. members are seriously concerned about the gravity of this problem and its effects upon not only the primary producers and the parties directly concerned but on the Canadian economy generally. They would like to be told the facts in order that their judgment might be based on actual facts rather than on some impression which is not in accord with the facts.

In this connection the hon. member for Ontario spoke—and I was careful to note his exact words—of fruit and vegetables being allowed to rot. He spoke of hundreds of millions of dollars of spoilage. I believe those were the exact words he used. I wrote them down at the time.

Let us consider the situation with respect to apples. At this time last year some 125,000 bushels of apples had gone to the United Kingdom market. The total sales to the United Kingdom market are now some 6,000 bushels less than this—about 119,000 bushels. But in the province of Quebec, where apple production this year has been nearly double what it was last year, exports to the United Kingdom market at this time last year amounted to 38,000 bushels while at this time they amount to some 46,000 bushels. So already there has been a larger exportation from Quebec than had taken place by this time last year.

The hon. member for Kamloops made some constructive and valuable suggestions and I can assure him these have already been followed. Action has already been taken with respect to his suggestion that the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and myself should work together on this problem in the interests of all concerned. But I believe the hon. member was under the impression that the majority of sales on the apple market take place prior to Christmas. According to the instructions I have, this is not the case. The majority of sales to the United Kingdom market take place after Christmas. Therefore in considering this question we should ask ourselves what are the probabilities with regard to future sales in this area.

I have cited these statistics with regard to sales. As to the question of availability and surplus at the present time and the statement that fruit and vegetables are being allowed to rot with hundreds of millions of dollars in spoilage, in the words used by the hon. member for Ontario, the situation is that total storage of apples in Canada has increased by only 3 per cent over last year. This, to my mind, does not suggest that hundreds of millions of dollars have been wasted because of spoilage.

What are the prospects for sales? First, the quantity available for export in the United States, which last year amounted to some 54 million bushels, is at the present time only 48.6 million bushels. So competition from the United States for the United Kingdom market will be that much less. By the same token this government, through the good offices of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and some humble help on my part through meetings with the minister of agriculture of Great Britain, was able this year to increase the quotas substantially with respect to apple sales to the United Kingdom. These two factors taken together portend well for likely sales of apples in the United Kingdom market during the current year.

Granted, none of us is clairvoyant enough to discern at the present time what effect devaluation will have. We are hopeful from the information we have that this year it will not impair our apple sales to the United Kingdom. Despite the difficult situation which now prevails I believe we can be reasonably sanguine about the prospects for our primary producers in connection with sales of apples to the U.K. in the current year.

Again, because I am sure that this debate will be much more useful to all hon. members if it is based on facts rather than on wild and extravagant hyperbole, I believe we should consider the words of the hon. member for Ontario when he told us that fruits and vegetables were being allowed to rot with hundreds of millions of dollars in spoilage. Naturally we on this side are much concerned about this problem and have been, as the Minister of Labour indicated, all along. He has unquestionably worked night and day in a valiant attempt to do everything possible to alleviate the situation.

At the same time, in the interests of the primary producers of this country, it was my responsibility to keep abreast of the situation and do what I could to alleviate any economic ill effect upon our farmers. The hon. member for Ontario is, I am sure, concerned about the facts. He has a great respect for this house and at no time would he attempt, I know, to mislead hon. members for the purpose of partisan advantage. I was concerned, therefore, when he said that fruit and vegetables have been allowed to rot and spoke of "hundreds of millions of dollars spoilage".

I had a check made this morning to find out whether in fact there was any spoilage or whether anything was rotting on the docks in Montreal. I checked again at noon to make sure of my facts so that in assessing the gravity of the situation hon. members could base their conclusions upon them in determining what ought to be done to solve this problem. As I say, I checked again at noon to find out about these hundreds of millions of dollars lost in spoilage of these fruits and vegetables which were being allowed to rot. I took down the exact words contained in the report of my inspectors in Montreal who have been on this job from the beginning. Their report was that on the docks in Montreal at noon today there were 900 bags of onions and these were the only items that could spoil which were on the docks. These bags were frost-damaged last week prior to the start of the current difficulty and have been left on the docks because of that damage.

This is the actual situation in connection with "fruit and vegetables being allowed to rot" resulting in "hundreds of millions of dollars spoilage", in the words of the hon. member for Ontario, and on the basis of this information he wished this house to reach sober conclusions on the serious problem which besets primary producers, the parties concerned and the nation as a whole. I hope these few remarks as to the actual nature of the situation will be of some help to the house in reaching a conclusion with regard to this very serious problem.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour a question? Before he sat down he said he would entertain a few questions. I remained in my seat, in view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture was about to speak, thinking that possibly he would answer some of our questions and it would not be necessary for me to ask them now. I do not mind telling the Minister of Labour that I listened with a very sympathetic ear to the problems that he has encountered in regard to this situation. However, I would suggest that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has already taken part in this debate. He can speak only once. He can ask a question if the minister will entertain one.

Mr. Nicholson: I said, Mr. Speaker, that I would gladly entertain any questions if by so doing I could throw any new light on the subject.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I had hoped that the minister would have spent less time on the hyperhole of the hon. member for Ontario and a little more time dealing with the problem in competitive markets caused by the surcharge. Will he join his efforts with those of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) to negotiate the removal of that surcharge as soon as possible, pending the settlement of the dispute?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, it is in the area of private enterprise in which the surcharge falls. I understand it is a charge imposed on shippers by virtue of the increased costs of transportation incurred as a result of this situation. I quite agree with the representation made earlier by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke to the effect that it is inequitable that so often third parties, who have contributed in no way to the strike or slowdown, have to bear the brunt of the cost of the situation that is created. In that repect

I agree with him most wholeheartedly that everything possible should be done to have this surcharge removed as soon as possible, and the hon. member can rest assured that in any negotiations on the matter we will do everything we can to make possible the removal of the surcharge as soon as possible.

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested by various hon. members that the members from the Montreal area have been somewhat silent in this debate, but the minister has pointed out that there are 10 or 12 members from the Montreal area who have been following the debate with a great deal of attention. Of course, in view of the fact that this debate was granted at the request of the opposition it was only normal and natural that we should have permitted members of the opposition to use up as much time as they required, but frankly I am rather surprised that there has not been full participation on the part of members who have pointed out the tremendous urgency of the situation that exists at the moment.

The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), the former minister of labour, who is not in his seat at the moment, emphasized the fact that his party voted against Bill C-215 which was introduced and passed by the house a year or two ago. I think that is a rather sad commentary on the the former minister of labour because if ever there was a good piece of labour legislation introduced in the House of Commons it was Bill C-215. I do not want to spend too much time bringing back to memory the situation at that time, but hon. members will recall that the ports of Montreal, Three Rivers and Quebec had been tied up by a devastating strike which threatened not only Expo and its starting date but also the very economic life of the nation.

Respecting, as this party has always done, the rights of labour in labour disputes and realizing that the public usually conceives at first that labour is to blame, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) bent over backwards to do nothing that could be interpreted by labour or by management as an infringement on their rights under the free collective bargaining process. But when it became apparent that a state of emergency did exist and that the economic life of the country was being affected, then and only then did the minister exert the type of pressure which under normal circumstances he would be reluctant to exert. This resulted in Bill C-215 which was passed by the house on division.

The only suggestion the former minister of labour had to offer was one which he makes on many occasions such as this, namely, bring all the parties together in Ottawa. I have heard this suggestion from the hon. member every time there has been labour dispute. However, I have looked at his record as minister of labour, and I may say it was an excellent one, and I found no hesitation on his part during the British Columbia ferry dispute to introduce legislation to bring that embarrassing strike to an end.

Nor did I find any reluctance on the part of the N.D.P. to bring the longshoremen's strike in Montreal to an end. As was pointed out by one of the members of the Conservative party today, a bill was introduced by the leader of the N.D.P., drafted by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), which, if it had been adopted, would have removed from labour their democratic privilege to strike. Regardless of what followed the longshoremen would have been forced back to work. But, as has been pointed out, the N.D.P. had second thoughts about the bill and withdrew it. Since there were no concrete and valid suggestions offered by the opposition, Bill C-215 came into existence and was discussed quite adequately in the house. It was the first breakthrough in the history of Canadian labour that faced up to the fact that the future of labour and management is bound up in a common cause, particularly in light of the fact that we are an exporting nation.

Strikes are rapidly becoming obsolete as a bargaining weapon. If labour is to share in the fruits of the wealth of this nation it must understand that wage increases and productivity go hand in hand. We can no longer afford the luxury of rising costs and lower productivity. This feeling is growing among responsible labour people. They know there is a direct relationship between productivity and labour, and the Picard report attempts to deal with this subject matter.

Without going into all the technicalities of the clauses, Bill C-215 was a piece of legislation which impressed on the ship owners, the shipping federation, that the men in the port of Montreal were entitled to an increase in pay, and impressed on the labour union that if the ship owners were to be able to afford increased wages, and at the same time Montreal was to remain competitive with other ports in North America, then the port of Montreal would have to produce more. There would have to be increased productivity and labour would have to cease fighting modern technological methods. This was basically the problem at that time.

In order to establish properly what was the real cause of friction on the waterfront and what could be done to bring about increased productivity, under the authority of Bill C-215 the Minister of Labour established what is now known as the Picard commission or, more formally, the inquiry commission on the St. Lawrence ports. I think its report is a very significant document and I have read it not once but several times, as I hope most hon. members have.

I agree with labour that there are ambiguous sections in the report, and if they are ambiguous to labour I presume they must be ambiguous to management as well. If they are ambiguous to both sides in the dispute, then I think we have a moral duty to clarify the ambiguity. Therefore there should be no reluctance on the part of the minister or the government to make sure that Mr. Picard comes back and clarifies these ambiguous sections of his report. I think that by so doing he will in no way be infringing upon the collective agreement that is in existence between labour and management. If Mr. Picard clarifies what he meant in this report, then it would be up to labour and management to take advantage of the processes within the labour laws and the agreements should they not agree with his interpretation of the problems and the solutions.

I am speaking more as a Montrealer than as an assistant to the Minister of Labour. Unless labour and management in that port face up to realities the port of Montreal will dwindle into a second class port. There are too many alternate methods of shipping today for a port such as Montreal to be in a constant state of turmoil. In a country such as Canada which depends on export markets we cannot afford the luxury of management and labour wrangling every few months about wage agreements and working conditions.

By the same token it is unfair of anyone to presume that the source of friction is entirely on the labour side. Those who have read the Picard report and are familiar with longshoring, or those who know anything about port facilities, will realize that the basic and essential problem that causes friction in the port of Montreal is job security. Job insecurity in the Montreal port is a greater threat to labour and management relations than it is in Vancouver because of climatic conditions.

Longshoremen might be considered as unskilled labour, and the men are drawn from the labouring or working class whose educational levels are perhaps quite low. With the realization that the port of Montreal is only open seven or eight months a year these people engaged in longshoring must face the fact that there is little or no employment for them in the winter months. Professor Picard recognized this fact, and one of the basic principles of his report relates to job security and minimum income spread over 52 weeks. This is a major breakthrough which was never touched upon by the opposition in the actions it took in respect of this problem in the port of Montreal.

Governments have for too long been satisfied simply to get the parties together on some form of wage agreement that would keep them together and create a little peace for the greater part of the two year period between collective agreements. They have never before got at the root or source of the problem. The Picard report does, and if there are areas of ambiguity they should be clarified. I think there is a moral obligation on Mr. Picard to come back from his holiday and clarify these ambiguities. That is my opinion, and it is not expressed by me as one on the side of labour any more than I am on the side of management. We cannot afford the luxury of keeping the port of Montreal closed when any day now the river will begin to freeze, with an ensuing economic impact on fruit growers, exporters and importers in this nation. This is a luxury we can no longer afford.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Does the hon. member not realize that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) would not admit that a few minutes ago?

Mr. Mackasey: The Minister of Agriculture simply clarified a point, the point being that there are not tons of apples lying rotting on the wharves in the port of Montreal. This is the type of innuendo and false impression that unfortunately creeps into every debate involving labour. It is unfair to labour and in this case it is simply not true, as pointed out by the statistics presented by the Minister of Agriculture. I happen to think that if there is only one case of apples rotting in the port of Montreal that is one case too many.

The point I am trying to get at as a Montrealer is that the economy of the region, the province and the nation is such that we cannot afford the luxury of a work shutdown in the ports of Montreal, Vancouver, Three Rivers, Quebec or anywhere else in Canada. We must find ways and means to stabilize and continue peaceful negotiations between management and labour. The first practical, tangible and progressive step toward the eventual day when strikes will be obsolete and accepted as obsolete by both sides at the bargaining table is the Picard report, particularly when accepted by labour and management.

Labour must realize that Bill C-215 granted very substantial increases in wages. We have been criticized from all parts of the house and by private enterprise about the generosity of that settlement which has been erroneously interpreted as a forced settlement by the Prime Minister. That is not the case. An increase in the wages of employees on the waterfront of 35 per cent or 40 per cent would be insignificant to the ship owners provided the workers in turn would increase productivity in the port of Montreal, which is now far less than the productivity of other ports in Canada.

Labour must face up to these indisputable facts. If labour refuses to go along with the spirit of the Picard report because of a genuine misunderstanding of certain clauses, I suggest it would be better for them to carry on during the few remaining weeks until the port closes, under protest if necessary. Surely labour has a moral obligation to the port and the people using it who are not directly involved as management or labour in this dispute.

At the risk of being discourteous, Mr. Minister, I suggest that you should contact Mr. Picard and get him to cut his holiday short, come back and give us the benefit of his advice. That is my first suggestion.

Mr. Nicholson: The unions have said they will not agree to that course.

Mr. Mackasey: I do not care whether the unions accept it. Mr. Picard should make his report so clear that whether or not the unions accept it there would be no difference in the opinion of the parties as to what the report is all about. If the unions did not accept it then they would be failing the spirit of Bill C-215 and accepting a pay increase under false pretenses.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

There is ambiguity in the report. Let me point to the one portion regarding slings and the size of slings. Mr. Picard uses the word "reasonable". What is reasonable to the unions might be one thing but yet another to management. Management may feel that "reasonable" means all the weight that the slings and cranes can carry, but labour may suggest that this would reach the point where the operation is no longer safe or the point at which management was asking labour to triple productivity rather than double it. In any event I think Professor Picard has an obligation to come back and clarify these points. Once these points are clarified I think labour and management have an obligation to sit down together and thrash out their differences under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. Nicholson: Unfortunately they do not look at it that way or agree—

Mr. Mackasey: I do not intend to become involved in a dispute with my minister, and that is why I said I was speaking as a member from the Montreal area who believes we cannot afford the luxury of shutting down the port of Montreal. That is my first point. The second point is that if the shutdown is the result of a genuine misunderstanding of certain parts of the Picard report, then Mr. Picard should clarify its contents and make very clear to labour and management precisely what he meant by words such as "reasonable". After that is done management and labour should show good faith and, under the provisions of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code and the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, should appeal to the minister's department for assistance in bringing their dispute to an end. If they do not they will wake up one day to the fact that the port of Montreal has become obsolete. Ship owners will find they have to go elsewhere to find facilities similar to those in Montreal, which I think are unmatched anywhere in the world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Mr. Ricard, seconded by Mr. Starr, moves that the house do now adjourn. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion negatived.

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL INTERVENTION IN DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Labour.

In view of the discussion which has just ended and also in view of the situation which prevails in Montreal harbour, would the minister indicate to us what his policy will be and what measures he intends to take in order to correct that situation which is so harmful to the Canadian economy?

[English]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, one of the parties having taken steps that I intimated nearly two weeks ago they might have taken, and that matter being now before the courts, it is now partly sub judice. That is one difficulty. But I wouldl repeat what I said earlier today. I have indicated a willingness to appoint an arbitrator whom I am convinced could settle fairly quickly the points in dispute on an interim basis. I can appoint an arbitrator, however, only if the parties agree, because the collective agreements are now in effect. If they do not agree, my hands are tied. I certainly have been disposed, as I indicated on the 13th, to appoint an arbitrator—you might call him a port controller; I do not know what magic name you might give him—if the parties would only agree to such action on my part.

Mr. Ricard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister not consider that the suggestion made by his parliamentary secretary is one that merits very careful consideration, and will he not accept the suggestion of his parliamentary secretary and call back Mr. Picard so we may hope something will be done along that line?

Mr. Nicholson: I always give very careful consideration to suggestions which come from my parliamentary secretary. I have a very high opinion of him. But I would point out to hon. members—and those who have knowledge of the law will appreciate the significance of this—that once a judge has handed down his judgment and the judgment has been entered, the judge is what we refer to as functus officio. In this case Commissioner Picard is through, he is functus officio. I have been, and still am, perfectly willing to ask Professor Picard to do this, and would have been in touch with him before this if the parties had indicated a willingness or a desire to have him clarify the situation; but the unions have made it perfectly clear that they do not want Professor Picard to clarify the report. They have said so. They have said he is through. It puts the minister in a rather difficult position when, in law, he is through and one side has pointed out that he has no status at this time and they don't want further action by him.

Mr. Ricard: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Do we now have to take for granted that there is nothing the minister can do, and the dispute has to settle itself?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister that the hon. member is now asking an argumentative question which is a repitition of the debate we have had since eleven o'clock this morning.

[Later:]

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Labour. Are the unions involved Canadian unions, or are they affiliates of American unions?

Mr. Nicholson: They are, of course, Canadian locals—there are some eight of them involved—but they are affiliates of a larger union, the International Longshoremen's Association.

Mr. McCutcheon: That being the case, is there any evidence of action here that might eventually direct the movement of exports to, say, certain American ports where the same union would be handling the products?

Mr. Nicholson: I do not profess to be an expert on transportation, Mr. Speaker, but if they do not go from the ports of Montreal,

Trois-Rivières and Quebec they would have to go from other ports. I would hope that some of the goods might go from Halifax or Saint John. But undoubtedly some exports that would normally go from Montreal over the next three or four weeks might go from American ports.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know the adjournment debate ended awfully quickly, but I wonder whether anyone on the government side could tell us if the Acting Prime Minister will be in the house to answer questions, or will another minister be designated to answer questions on behalf of the Prime Minister?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister has unfortunately been called away and will not be here for the next couple of hours.

INDUSTRY

COPPER—PRICE INCREASE BY NORANDA COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I am in a bit of a quandary, too, Mr. Speaker. I have a question for the Registrar General. I will ask it, anyway, because one of the other ministers may be able to answer it, and if not it will appear in Hansard. In view of the increase in the price of copper announced by Noranda and now followed by the Hudson's Bay Mining Company, will the minister take action to reconvene immediately the committee on consumer prices so that the effect of these price increases on the general level of prices throughout the economy may be investigated?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): I will take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

HOUSING

MONTREAL—HELP FOR FAMILIES LACKING ACCOMMODATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if he has been approached in any way by the authorities of the city of Montreal for some assistance by the C.M.H.C. in order to assist 150 families to be evicted by the Montreal Catholic School Board?

[English]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): I will have to take that queston as notice, Mr. Speaker. I have no knowledge of any such request, but will be glad to look into it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—ACCEPTANCE OF DR. MANLIO BROSIO AS MEDIATOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, whom I presume is the minister directly across from me. It is in reference to the very welcome news of the acceptance of Dr. Manlio Brosio as mediator in Cyprus. Does Dr. Brosio take on this important assignment as long range mediator to settle, hopefully, the dispute? Second, is he also working under the aegis and the good will of the Secretary General of the United Nations?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the terms of reference of Dr. Brosio and therefore cannot answer the first part of the question. I do know he will be working in close co-operation with the Secretary General.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—DUNCAN DAM—PAYMENTS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the deputy acting prime minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herride: —or the appropriate minister. Has the deputy acting prime minister or the appropriate minister anything to inform the house about the $12 million owed to the government of British Columbia with respect to the Duncan dam, and the interest related thereto?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, payment of this sum of money was made a day or two ago. Arrangements are now being made for this money to be transferred to the government of British Columbia. Negotiations are still going on with respect to the interest on that money.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Can the minister inform the house of the date on which that sum of money was paid, and what was the rate of exchange?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that his question is not in order.

AGRICULTURE

MILK—ALLEGED HARDSHIP THROUGH MINIMUM QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister received representations from milk producers pointing out the fact that the government's dairy policy with regard to minimum quotas in creating grave economic hardship, especially among the smaller producers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is not sufficient to ask whether certain representations have been received by the minister, to make the question urgent.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, I wish to discuss this matter at the next ten o'clock adjournment.

SHIPPING

MONTREAL—LOSSES TO AGRICULTURE FROM LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture and ask him whether he could give the house any information with regard to the cost to agriculture generally, of the delay in shipments as a result of the labour problem in Montreal, either the direct costs such as surcharges for prolonged refrigeration of perishable goods or costs in terms of lost contracts.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): To the best of my knowledge, there is no loss by reason of lost contracts as yet although, as I indicated earlier, if the strike continues for any length of time this would be a very grave danger and one which could do long term injury to the primary producers of this country. With regard to direct costs, such as added storage charges and additional transportation costs, etc., I do not have this information at present and I think it would be pretty hard to calculate the costs until the termination of the dispute.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister make some effort to at least get an estimate of the amount of perishable goods that are now in transit, and the delivery of which is being delayed on account of the strike?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that this question was considered by the minister earlier today.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a very important and urgent question which I had intended to put to the Acting Prime Minister, but perhaps the Minister of Industry and Defence Production might answer it. It relates to the status of the Canadian forces in Cyprus. Is it the view of the government that this force can be required to withdraw on the request of either Turkey or Greece?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any specific provision for the withdrawal of the force on the request of either country. The hon. member will recall that this Canadian contingent forms part of the UN forces, and therefore withdrawal will be conditional on arrangements between Turkey, Greece and the United Nations.

Mr. Aiken: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is our force in Cyprus in the same or in a different position from that of our force in the Middle East, which was recently asked by Egypt to withdraw?

Mr. Drury: I think the conditions are somewhat different.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO INVITATIONS AND AGENDA FOR CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): My question is directed to the Minister of Labour, who is in charge of housing. Has the government finalized the agenda of the forthcoming federal-provincial housing conference, and if so, would the minister make it public?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I hope that at the conclusion of orders of the day we will revert to motions. If so I will then table the proposed agenda as well as the background working papers of the conference.

Mr. Gilbert: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the government to permit members of the House of Commons to attend the conference either as observers or as delegates?

Mr. Nicholson: I can only repeat the words of the Prime Minister the other day, when he said that this is a federal-provincial conference and the attendance of members of parliament or others as observers would depend upon the joint wishes of both levels of government. In the letter that is being written today by the Acting Prime Minister to the provincial premiers the suggestion is being made that at least the opening sessions of the conference, and perhaps some other meetings, might be open to members of this house.

AGRICULTURE

EFFECT OF CURRENCY DEVALUATION ON EXPORTS TO U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, if I may I should like to pose a question to the Minister of Agriculture. It is based on an undertaking made by the Prime Minister yesterday to assess and report to the house on the effect of the devaluation of the pound on imports to the United Kingdom of Canadian agricultural products. Will the minister endeavour to canvass the opinion of the British purchasers, especially those of tobacco, cheese and apples, as well as obtain the evaluation of our own Department of Agriculture?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): As I indicated yesterday to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), my department is taking every possible step to garner all the information available at both ends with respect to the likely effect of the devaluation of the pound, but this is a very dynamic situation. What will happen to the value of the pound in the United Kingdom is certainly not clear at the present time, and therefore all we can do is to try to keep the situation in hand, to collect all the necessary information available and to pass it on to producers, processors and exporters, and this we intend to do.

Mr. Danforth: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether it is his intention also to make a statement on motions dealing in some detail with the estimated effect on the shipment to the British market of such important commodities as I have outlined.

Mr. Greene: I had not intended to do so because I do not know of what benefit it would be, as I am sure everyone concerned in the industry is watching the situation. I do not think any advice from me would necessarily be more effective than that which the exporters themselves would have. But I will be glad to consider the suggestion of the hon. member, and if sufficient information which might not be readily available to the public is made available to me, so that a statement from me might be of use to producers, processors or exporters, then I will certainly consider making such a statement.

WOMEN

INQUIRY CONCERNING APPOINTMENT OF REPLACEMENT TO ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that one of the members of the royal commission on the status of women has tendered his resignation, is it the intention of the government to appoint a member to replace him?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, this particular question is still under consideration.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. When will he be in a position to make an announcement with regard to a subsidy on the 1966 crop of sugarbeets?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): I do not want to be too positive on this matter because these things sometimes have a way of getting side-tracked, but I hope to be able to make a statement next week.

[Translation]

FINANCE

POSSIBLE APPLICATION OF CEILINGS ON PRICES AND SALARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the hon. Member of the Administration?

In view of the fact that, to ensure the success of his campaign for restrictions, the Minister of Finance intends to consult a group of experts, can the minister tell us whether, as a result of their recommendations, a ceiling will be put on prices or salaries?

Mr. Speaker: I believe the question is much too general in nature to be put at this time.

[English]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

MANDARIN ORANGES—POSSIBLE APPEAL OF JUDGMENT IN PROSECUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Registrar General in his capacity as minister in charge of consumer affairs. Is it the intention of his department to appeal the judgment imposing fines on the ten companies in British Columbia convicted of conspiring to unduly lessen competition in the orange trade?

Hon. John N. Turner (Registrar General): Mr. Speaker, I take it the hon. member is referring to the mandarin orange case. If so, we are awaiting advice from counsel, but it would be my feeling that the amount of the fines might be appealed.

AGRICULTURE

TURKEYS—RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): I should like to direct another question to the Minister of Agriculture. It is based upon representations I am receiving with regard to the turkey industry. I know the government is quite aware of the problem with which turkey producers has been faced recently. I wonder if it has made a final decision about the effect of the tariff imposed on turkeys from the United States or whether the government will implement a quota system as well?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the value for duty provision implemented in order to protect the Canadian turkey industry against unfair competition from United States turkeys being delivered in Canada at less than their cost of production has not been in effect long enough to assess whether or not it is effective, and whether it will make the game fair and equitable. If this measure is not sufficient, in giving protection to the Canadian producer, to make the game equitable, then we will consider further action. At the moment, we do not have enough information to make such a decision.

FINANCE

ALLEGED OVERCHARGING BY BANKS ON EXCHANGE OF UNITED STATES CURRENCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Finance. Is it the intention of the Minister of Finance to report to the house the results of his investigation with regard to the banks that overcharged on exchange between Canada and the United States, and who thereby violated the international monetary fund agreement?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Member of the Administration): Mr. Speaker, I will bring the question to the attention of the Minister of Finance and if he deems it necessary, I am sure he will report to the house.

[English]

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PAROLE—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Solicitor General. Did I understand him correctly last night that legislation to amend the Parole Act will be placed before parliament at this session? If so, will this be done at an early date?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, certain proposed amendments to the Parole Act are included in the omnibus Criminal Code amending bill which I hope will be on the order paper very shortly.

FINANCE

ALLEGED ACTIONS OF FRANCE IN GOLD MARKET—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In the light of the attempt by the government of France to attack the United States dollar and indirectly the Canadian dollar on the gold market, with a view to forcing devaluation of these currencies, would the Canadian government consider any retaliatory moves, including sequestration of any natural resources owned by the French government or controlled by a French company in Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): It is well known that I only administer the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. The hon. member's question relates to monetary policy. I will gladly bring it to the attention of the Minister of Finance.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Member of the Administration who is, I think, the assistant to the Minister of Finance.

Is there really evidence that this run on gold is caused by the actions of France and that France seeks to reduce the price of gold? Could the minister tell us whether there is evidence that France has done this?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is an argument. I do not think the question is in order.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. It is not only an argument—

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It might be easier to accept the question. Is there a minister willing to answer the question of the hon. member for Lapointe?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Member of the Administration): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is the situation. Of course, the international monetary question is very complex and often the value of gold may vary according to the demand on the market but, in my opinion, it would not be because of pressures by any country.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

LAY-OFF OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I want to take advantage of the question period to put a question to the Minister of Labour.

Could he tell us whether his department is taking remedial action with regard to the increasing layoffs by the C.N.R., and also whether it is true that this crown corporation is considering the layoff of 3,000 workers before next January 1?

[English]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this is a question which, I believe, should have been directed to either the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I shall be glad to pass it along.

HOUSING

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS RELATED TO FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): I know you have called orders of the day, Mr. Speaker, but I am wondering if the house would give unanimous consent to allow me to return to motions so I can table the documents that I mentioned earlier?

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that we revert to motions to allow the Minister of Labour to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for agreeing to revert to motions so as to permit me to do this. I now wish to table two copies in English and two copies in French of the suggested or proposed agenda for the federal-provincial conference on housing and related urban problems, as well as rural problems I might say, to be held on December 11 and also the background papers that were sent out today to the premiers of the ten provinces.

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): May I ask the minister if these background papers will be made available to members of the house?

Mr. Nicholson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, on Monday I hope.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK

AMENDMENTS INCREASING CAPITAL AND BORROWING AUTHORITY, ETC.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (for the Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-164, to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a very few words on the third reading of this bill. During the debate on second reading on November 13, there was a full and comprehensive discussion. At that time there was a censensus that the procedures of the Industrial Development Bank in processing loan applications were agonizing, slow, frustrating, security conscious and bureaucratic. The debate that took place was quoted in the press in most centres, mostly in the business sections of the newspapers. Following this, I received a number of communications from people because my name had been mentioned.

In view of the fact there has been an interval of a couple of weeks, I point out that the communications that were received were in support of what was said by most members during the second reading debate. One letter I received was from a professional engineer. It reads in part:

> Having dealt with them on several occasions, I try as much as possible to steer people clear of their bureaucratic, laissez faire attitudes and their lack of recognition of the sense of urgency that would cause people to contact them in the first place. One negotiation in which I was involved lasted over a year.
> Surely they are intended to provide a better service and were not proposed as a money making organization to start with.

Now, I should think I received half a dozen letters of this type from all across Canada; one from British Columbia, one from the east and two or three from Ontario and Quebec. These letters were concerned with, first, the requirement to submit new applications during the course of negotiation of a loan; excessive requirements for security and collateral; long delays during legal investigations following tentative approval, and the fact the Industrial Development Bank seemed to be more concerned with paper work than with the viability of the enterprise. Most of these applications come from persons who urgently require assistance. A delay of six months or more results in some industries foundering before they are even granted the loan.

I rose, Mr. Speaker, merely to urge the minister to ask the Industrial Development Bank officials to look into this procedure and to see what can be done to improve it and prevent delay. The general operations are not criticized so much as the procedures that are involved.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, September 26, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-151, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system for a period from the 1st day of January, 1967 to the 30th day of June, 1968 and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company—Mr. Chrétien (for the Minister of Finance)—Mr. Richard in the chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): When the committee rose on Tuesday, September 26, clause 3 of the bill was under consideration.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, there is a pretty good mood in the house, but I should like to ask someone why we deviated from the order of business that was suggested last night. We are not prepared to pass the C.N.R. bill, I might say, before five o'clock. I understood the Post Office Act was next.

Mr. Chrétien: We changed the order at the request of the house leader of the opposition party. First of all we were going to discuss the post office matter, but at the request, I believe, of the hon. member for Ontario we changed the order. That is why we are now dealing with this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I was not at all aware that the order of the business of the house had been changed for today. You will recall that the last time we considered this bill concerning capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways, I had made objections on clause 3, and I was ready to present a motion.

Now I am taken completely unawares; I did not know that we would be considering this bill today. All my documents on that matter are in my office and if I leave the house to get them and all clauses are agreed to rapidly, I will have no other opportunity to discuss this.

That is why I would ask the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Chrétien) to realize the situation in which I now find myself here, without notes of any kind, without the figures I had taken. Moreover, the last time we debated section 3, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) had the floor. I wonder whether the Minister without Portfolio was here at that time.

So I must admit that I am utterly taken by surprise on account of this change. Had I been given only five or ten minutes to go and get my notes, I would have accepted, but I was not given any notice at all.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) that he is being unfair because yesterday, before the adjournment motion, the government house leader announced the business of the house and the opposition asked that this bill be given priority for a reason unknown to us. All that is reported in Hansard, and if the hon. member for Lapointe is not aware of it, it is because he does not follow the debates of the house.

As far as the other remark is concerned, it is true that the bill was introduced last September by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson). I was to sponsor it myself, but at that time I was attending the conference of the International Monetary Fund in Rio and that is why the Minister of National Revenue acted in my stead.

Mr. Grégoire: The hon. minister cannot say that I am not keeping myself well informed. I had here the list that had been given yesterday and, naturally, when I noticed that the business was adjourned to allow for the discussion of our problems and that there still was the bill on the Post Office Act, I could not know that legislation concerning the Canadian National Railways would be presented today.

I would ask the Minister without Portfolio —oh, I know now, it is written here, if the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté) is kind enough to show me where it is—it is the second item: expenses of the C.N.R.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I suggest to the hon. member for Lapointe and to the hon. member for Saint John-Albert that they read Hansard a little further. After the house leader had suggested, as reported at the bottom of page 4644 of Hansard for last night, that the order would be the Post Office Act, then the Industrial Development Bank and then the C.N.R. bill plus some other matters, the hon. member for Ontario said this:

> —may I suggest to the government house leader that instead of taking the first item that he listed, having to do with the post office, it would be more expeditious to consider the second and third items first, and then move into the post office resolution?

To which the government house leader replied:

> Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is agreeable to us. I gather that hon. members feel they can deal with these items relatively quickly. We will agree to that, and will then continue with the post office resolution.

So, Mr. Chairman, it seems quite clear that the arrangement last night was that we take the Industrial Development Bank bill, then the C.N.R. bill, and then the Post Office Act. If the hon. member for Lapointe needs to go to his office to get his file, some of us can keep talking on the point of order until he gets back.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has stated the situation correctly. However, if it would help the house the government is prepared to go to the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, if hon. members would give unanimous consent.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I apologize for the mistake I made and which has been pointed out. Although there are not too many members of my party present I think there would be agreement to go ahead with the suggestion made by the Solicitor General. Probably we could make very good progress with that item.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, in view of the rather peculiar circumstances, I think the house will be a little lost as to the consideration of any bill that might be introduced today. In view of the late hour, I wonder if we could not call it five o'clock, proceed to the consideration of the private members business and then adjourn at 5.50.

Mr. Grégoire: Agreed.

[English]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Is the committee agreeable to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Chapleau?

Mr. Pennell: Let me try the post office resolution, Mr. Chairman. Is the committee prepared to accept this?

Mr. Knowles: No, we do not like that one.

[Translation]

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, may I make an intervention in favour of my bill?

Mr. Chairman, I think we are all ready to pass this bill which is intended to extend the assistance to gold mines for a certain period of time. Indeed, I believe that the members in all sections of the house are ready to pass this bill. Therefore, I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to put the question to the house.

[English]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

PROVISION OF EXTENSION OF APPLICATION

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-155, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister not making a statement?

Mr. Barnett: Should not the minister tell us why he thinks we should all be in favour of this bill?

• (4:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report that all hon. members have voted in favour of the renewal of subsidies to gold mining at the resolution stage. Some made at the time comments which were sometimes constructive and sometimes not quite right, but I think all felt the urgent need of extending the application of this act as soon as possible, since it was due to expire at the end of December.

[English]

So, with the agreement of the house, I shall confine my remarks to a summary of the reasons for seeking the authority of parliament to extend the application of the act.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has seven minutes.

Mr. Pepin: I wish to emphasize, again, that the mining of gold continues to be an important element in the mining industry of Canada. It is still fifth on our list with respect to revenue. It is true that its size and importance are declinning, because of circumstances beyond its control, and a change in these circumstances, such as an increase in the price of gold or a decrease in costs, does not appear eminent. I know that there has been discussion on that subject. One thing is sure; it is beyond the capacity of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to influence the price of gold at this time. As far as I can see, the operation of most of our gold mines in contingent on a continuation of the assistance which is provided under the act. Of course, if prices should change, that situation will affect the implementation of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

May I repeat that our concern, at this time, lies with the communities that are dependent on gold mining, and with the economic and social dislocation which would occur in them if most of the gold mines were forced to close through a withdrawal of assistance. It is evident that most members share the minister's concern and I suggest, therefore, that it may be possible to obtain agreement to pass Bill C-155 through the remaining stages at this sitting, and thus ensure continued support of the gold mining communities by gold mining operations.

Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): May I ask a question? As I listened to the minister it appeared to me that his notes had been made before recent developments had come about. He is trying to suggest that there is another area of government responsibility. I wonder if he could tell the house something about the actual operation of the act in relation to what appears to be an entirely new and different market situation in the world's gold markets. Can he say under what circumstances the condition of the world gold markets may alter the operation of the act, which is facetiously called the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I must advise the hon. member that his type of question ought to be reserved for the committee of the whole.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I wish to make a few remarks on this bill, Mr. Speaker, in the hope that we can pass it. The matter was extensively debated at the resolution stage and I do not intend to repeat what was said then. The official opposition does not oppose extending the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act for another three years. We regret, however, that the government has not devised a more fundamental plan to deal with the difficult state of affairs in gold mining communities, which arises because so many producing mines have been closed down.

Having expressed that regret, having previously put forward a number of suggestions and having heard other hon. members making suggestions to the minister which, as he said, had been considered and rejected, it seems apparent that at this time we cannot go further. We want passage of this bill, which extends the time for assistance, but we hope that the government will not feel it has nothing more to do in this area for another three years. They have assumed responsibility for the life of these gold mining communities, and we hope that they will do more in the next three years than merely consider renewing again the emergency legislation.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I did not participate in the debate on the resolution stage of this bill, though in years past when the matter has been before the house I have talked on it. I agree with the remarks which have been made; the title of this act long ago ought to have been changed to the gold mining assistance act, and the word "emergency" ought to have been dropped. If necessary, some sort of renewal clause could have been included.

We all agree that the gold mining industry of the country faces an emergency. Originally, as I understand, the legislation was enacted to stave off the disaster which threatened to engulf the industry after the second world war. At that time the gold mines were not able to operate and make a profit, with gold being sold at $35 an ounce. The Canadian government sold gold to the United States under a complicated formula, and emergency gold mining legislation was applied to keep the mines operating. The government, I think, has a responsibility to pay money under this legislation and to look at the world situation generally.

The conference in Rio de Janeiro shows us that changes in the International Monetary Fund are taking place. Really, the United States is behind the fund. Its existence is owing to the willingness of the United States government to do a favour to gold producers of the world. Because the government of the United States was willing to support the price of gold at $35 an ounce it was possible for the International Monetary Fund to use gold as an international currency. Gold has served its purpose. Recent events shows that this is so. France, because of a senile, tired old man who dislikes Anglo-Saxons in general and President Johnson in particular, decided to try to make the International Monetary Fund go broke. It was evident that the International Monetary Fund, which operated solely on the basis of gold backing, could not meet the threat. Much money had to be pumped into the fund to prevent the total depletion of its gold reserve.

Some at the conference in Rio de Janeiro tried, because of pressure from the United States, to have the United States dollar substituted for gold as the unit of international currency. I do not think that the world is prepared to accept the United States dollar as the unit of international currency. The conference decided that gold still has a role to play—a role which does not seem to be well understood by anyone, let alone by those who are buying gold at a panic rate in the United States. Since gold is being traded at the rate of 80 tons a day and since it is being bought by United States citizens and stashed away in Swiss banks, we may take it that the United States public regards gold as the stable medium of international currency, as opposed to the United States dollar.

Devaluation in Britain has highlighted the change in the thinking of many financiers in terms of gold. Canada is a country which exercises a great deal of influence throughout the world currency market and it seems to me that as a major gold producer we should consider playing a far more active role in this field.

• (5:00 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper.

Mr. Pepin: Perhaps we could continue this debate if there were a chance of concluding it within the next few minutes.

Mr. Peters: I do not have very much more to say.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It is past five o'clock, and unless we have unanimous consent to do otherwise we must proceed to private members business. Since there is no unanimous consent the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on the order paper, namely public bills.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pennell: I am not in a position to give members business, I might perhaps be permitted to announce the business for Monday. It is proposed to call item 32, house in committee of the whole on Bill C-161, an act to establish a Department of Corporate and Consumer Affairs. Then we would take item 33, the post office resolution, followed by item 34, consideration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will that be the order of business to be followed for Tuesday and later?

Mr. Pennell: I am not in a position to give that assurance. It is quite possible we shall return to the capital punishment bill—the amendments to the Criminal Code—on Tuesday.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the minister able to say definitely whether or not we shall return to that bill on Tuesday? I think it would be to the convenience of the house if he could say definitely one way or the other.

Mr. Pennell: I can go this far, that I think the chances are very strong that we shall be doing so. That is as far as I can go at the moment, in the absence of further consultation with the leader of the house.

Mr. McNulty: May we stand public bills 1 to 3 inclusive and take up bill No. 4?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Bills Nos. 1 to 3 stand at the request of the government.

INQUIRIES ACT AMENDMENT

APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES TO SERVE AS COMMISSIONERS

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-15, to amend the Inquiries Act.

He said: This bill, No. C-15, which would amend the Inquiries Act so as to restrict judges from acting as royal commissioners has two companion bills on the order paper, also introduced by me—C-16 to amend the Judges Act and C-89 to amend the Supreme Court Act. The three bills have a common purpose and in order to develop my argument it will be necessary to ask Your Honour's indulgence and that of the house to make brief reference to the other bills.

The basic purpose of the three bills is to uphold and strengthen the independence and impartiality of the judiciary. I believe Canada is uniquely fortunate in the calibre and integrity of those dedicated men, and regrettably too few women, who serve on the bench at all levels. Indeed, I assert with confidence that the quality of the Canadian judiciary is not surpassed by the judiciary of any other nation. None the less I believe and submit firmly to the house that the practice of appointing judges as royal commissioners, arbitrators, conciliators, referees, or to other such extra-judicial duties is detrimental to the best traditions of the bench, endangers the independence and impartiality of the judiciary and should now be stopped once and for all.

Companion Bill C-89 was drafted to achieve two purposes, first as an absolute prohibition against a justice of the Supreme Court of Canada serving as a commissioner under the Inquiries Act and, second, to prevent any such justice from undertaking any service of any nature—and I emphasize, any service of any nature—unrelated to his judicial duties, as a result of which he might become involved in political controversy.

Companion Bill C-16 to amend the Judges Act would prevent judges from accepting any extra-judicial duties except when expressly authorized to do so by resolution of this house, or by resolution of a provincial legislature.

This Bill C-15 is designed to prevent a judge from being appointed a commissioner under the Inquiries Act without the express authority of a resolution of the House of Commons. Hon. members may wonder at this qualification. Provision for appointment of a judge as a commissioner with the express authority of a resolution of the House of Commons would enable the use of a judge in a very exceptional—and I repeat, very exceptional—case, where the Minister of Justice could satisfy the house that no damage to the judiciary could result.

Frankly, I would hope that this provision would seldom—perhaps never—be used, but I have inserted it as a precaution in case there might arise some emergency, or some other situation, where the duties of the proposed commissioner would be essentially judicial in character. I might use as illustrations, the Royal Commission on the Law of Insanity as a Defence in Criminal Cases, or the Royal Commission on Criminal Sexual Psychopaths.

The issue is not a new one. It has been debated many times in this chamber and I think it is only fair to say that hon. members, when they sit on this side of the house, seem to take a more jaundiced view of the practice than when they assume administrative responsibilities on the other side of the house. That distinguished and amiable scholar, Professor John C. Courtney, in a well documented article entitled "Judges as Royal Commissioners" in the winter issue, 1964-65, of the Dalhousie Review, pointed out that as early as 1872 a resolution was introduced into this house to the effect that payments received by judges for extra-judicial work "are calculated to impair the independence of the judiciary and are in contravention of the spirit of our laws designed to secure the independence of the judges". Ninety-five years later, I subscribe fully to those words.

A number of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada have in the past become embroiled in political controversy as a result of serving as royal commissioners. The greatest Canadian jurist of all time, Sir Lyman P. Duff, twice became the centre of partisan controversy as a result of his services, first as royal commissioner on transportation and second as royal commissioner on the Hong Kong expedition. The violent attacks upon him were not, I submit, good for our highest court or for the status and prestige of our highest judicial office.

Similarly Mr. Justice Davis in the Bren gun affair, Mr. Justice Taschereau as he then was, and Mr. Justice Kellock in the soviet espionage affair, normally known as the Gouzenko affair, and more recently Mr. Justice Spence in the Munsinger affair, drew upon themselves and their high office bitter public controversy with, as well, I submit, detriment to the highest court in the land. I might express this perhaps more vigorously, except that I want to bury past follies.

The best statement of this problem may be found at page 445 of Norman Ward's edition of Dawson's "The Government of Canada", from which I would quote:

> There would seem to be little purpose in taking elaborate care to separate the judge from politics and to render him quite independent of the executive, and then placing him in a position as a royal commissioner where his impartiality may be attacked and his findings—no matter how correct and judicial they may be—are liable to be interpreted as favouring one political party at the expense of the other. For many of the inquiries or boards place the judge in a position where he cannot escape controversy: he may be making decisions which at least touch on policy; he may be considering, or conciliating, or deciding disputes on labour questions; he may be investigating and interrogating by very questionable procedures persons suspected of treasonable activities; he may be conducting inquiries on definitely political matters such as the Hong Kong or Bren gun charges.
> It has been proved time and again that in many of these cases the judge loses in dignity and in reputation, and his future usefulness is appreciably lessened thereby. Moreover, if the judge remains away from his regular duties for long periods, he is apt to lose his sense of balance and detachment; and he finds that the task of getting back to normal and of adjusting his outlook and habits of mind to purely judicial work is by no means easy.

Basically, sir, the objections as they are stated there to extra-judicial duties are threefold; first the possibility, and in many cases the probability of a judge becoming involved in public and oft-times partisan controversy; second, that judicial work suffers—no one can moonlight without affecting his regular work, and it is a truism that justice delayed is justice denied—and third, the receipt of extra pay for judicial moonlighting is an infringement upon the independence of the bench. I am not by any means certain that the legislation passed at the last session of this parliament has solved that latter problem.

All these facts were clearly pointed out by the Chief Justice of Quebec, Hon. Lucien Tremblay, in a vigorous speech to the Conference of United States Chief Justices, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of August 5, 1966, from which I quote:

Quebec's Chief Justice, Lucien Tremblay, yesterday vigourously assailed government practice of appointing judges to commissions of inquiry and labour relations boards.

Chief Justice Tremblay charged that the practice—which he termed "bad as a general rule"—delayed the course of justice, resulted in violations of the law and often misled the public.

Then later on:

"The function of a judge is to hear cases and render judgment, but when a judge gives his opinion on any other than a legal question, his opinion is not worth more than that of any other citizen of equal standing", he said.

I think perhaps I should point out to the house that the former minister of justice, Hon. Lucien Cardin, wrote to all the chief justices across Canada in July, 1966, drawing attention to sections 37 and 38 of the Judges Act, and he added:

I should appreciate it if you would draw these provisions to the attention of the judges of your court, and point out that in all cases where they propose to undertake extra-judicial duties in labour matters for private persons the consent of the governor in council must be obtained. You might also indicate that I would not be prepared to recommend to the governor in council that such consent be granted unless I am assured by you that the duties can be undertaken without interfering with the administration of justice.

Now, sir, enforcement of the requirement that a judge must have the consent of his chief justice as well as the approval of the governor in council presumably will safeguard against court proceedings suffering due to judicial absenteeism, but it does not meet the problem of public controversy or infringement of the independence of the judiciary. I have very grave doubts whether the procedures outlined by the former minister of justice are in fact being adopted and enforced, and particularly at the county and district court level. I doubt if all the Ontario county judges who have engaged in labour relations work since July, 1966, have had the approval of the governor in council.

Moonlighting by judges in the field of industrial relations has been a very genuine problem in the province of Ontario. Until the legislation of a year ago there were a few county judges in Ontario to whom the regular judicial emoluments were mere bread and butter, whereas they earned their honey and jam by supplementing their judicial earnings two or three times over through fees charged in industrial relations conciliation and arbitration work. Has this been solved completely by the new legislation? I am not by any means sure. In fact I believe it has not.

Are these outside earnings a threat to judicial independence? Personally I am satisfied that they have that potential. Judges are only human; their lofty positions do not insulate them from the frailties and temptations which beset lesser mortals. I adopt the words of a very great Canadian, a man who was an outstanding parliamentarian, a great barrister and former President of the Canadian Bar Association, John T. Hackett, later Senator Hackett, spoken in this house on June 21, 1946, as reported in Hansard at page 2709 for that date:

To the extent that these tasks are paid for, they are subversive of the principle of independence which is the bedrock of our whole judicial system. If a judge is to receive remuneration in excess of his statutory compensation, which has been horribly inadequate for generations, he is beholden to the party paying him, be it the political party in power or be it a labour union or employer who commands his services. But if the practice in the form to which I have just alluded is reprehensible, it becomes more objectionable when judges undertake tasks highly pigmented by politics.

It is impolitic for a practising barrister to say anything which might be construed as criticism of the bench. It is most unfortunate that stern necessity imposes on me the duty of pointing out the dangers to the greatest of our institutions inherent in this practice. I do not accuse the government in power of being the sole offender, but circumstances have made it the most frequent and the most recent offender—

I say with sorrow that the reputation for impartiality, dignity and honour enjoyed by the bench has been exposed to criticism by this practice. All who believe in the law, who depend upon its fearless administration, and admit that the people at large must have complete faith in the integrity of the judiciary, must oppose the continuance of this practice.

Then Mr. Hackett, after referring to labour disputes, went on:

At the present time, in the clubs, in the marketplace, wherever men meet and discuss, one hears a judge classified as "favourable to labour," another as "favourable to the interests," another as "weak and not knowing exactly which side he is on".

Those words are as wise and as true today as they were 21 years ago when they were first uttered. Equally wise and pertinent quotations could be found in numerous speeches on this subject made by the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), particularly when he was the hon. gentleman from Lake Centre.

There is a further aspect, namely the assumption by judges of administrative duties. In this I am thinking particularly of judges serving on police commissions. The constitution of police commissions is a matter for the provinces, but the duties of judges, I submit, are within the jurisdiction of this parliament, and I believe parliament should prohibit judges from undertaking police commission duty. To adopt the words of Chief Justice Tremblay, "The function of a judge is to hear cases and render judgment." He should not be closer to the police than to the criminal. He should be insulated equally from both. Personally I do not believe that any judge actually achieves any bias by reason of serving on a police commission, but I do know that members of the public suspect such bias. This is an instance, surely, where the old rule applies: that justice must not only be done, it must appear to be done.

I do not suggest for a moment that the need for the types of skills which judges are alleged to possess can be left in a vacuum. From time to time royal commissions are needed, though I confess to believing that the less often the better. Certainly adjudicators, arbitrators, conciliators and referees are an essential part of modern life, and not merely in the field of industrial relations. From what segment of the population may such persons be drawn if not from the judiciary? Personally I believe they must be drawn from the academic and the practising profession. I go further and suggest that a new and trained profession in this field is now a necessity. Perhaps we could learn from France.

A former attorney general of Ontario, A. Kelso Roberts, sought to meet this problem by legislation to establish a new group of scholarly people to be known as "approved impartial referees and arbitrators". Apart from the tongue-twisting name, the idea was a good one—the establishment of a panel of qualified, yet non-judicial, referees, arbitrators, conciliators and adjudicators. The panel would achieve their status through licensing by a board of supervisors and would be available for such duties as are now performed in this field by judges. The legislation, which is chapter 5 of the statutes of Ontario of 1962, received royal assent on April 18 of that year, but regrettably has never been proclaimed. What might have been a valuable experiment has never been tried. For myself, I accept the general principles of this Ontario legislation. A system of qualifying a new group of conciliators, arbitrators and other such persons as an alternative to bringing judges down off their benches must in my view be worked out.

What I would ask the house to do now is to send the judges back to the high and lofty status to which they were summoned; to prevent them from becoming involved in political controversy; to stop some of them from competing with one another in a money grubbing operation to see who can land the most labour relations work, and to free them from administration and give them time and opportunity for scholarship and judicial meditation. In short, let judges be judges.

In my enthusiasm for reform I may perhaps have seemed to reflect upon our bench in Canada. My dear old friend, the late John T. Hackett, said as I quoted earlier that "it is impolitic for a practising barrister to say anything which might be construed as criticism of the bench". I think it is even more impolitic for one, who has been forced by parliamentary circumstances—to his great regret—to become a non-practising barrister to appear to so criticize. For that reason I close on the note upon which I began. My admiration for the scholarship, the integrity and the independence of our Canadian judiciary is genuine and sincere. I want them to be judges in the great traditions, both of the civil and common law, and to cease being as they now are, jacks-of-all trades.

Mr. H. E. Stafford (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I always marvel at the fluent and able way the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) introduces either a private members bill or anything else in this house. I agree with many of the allegations the hon. member has made, especially in respect of the quality of the Canadian judiciary. I know of no country anywhere in the world where the judiciary is held in higher esteem. Unlike my hon. friend, it is my feeling that inquiries under the Inquiries Act are as important as any case, and sometimes they involve matters of such serious public concern the decision of a judge is more readily accepted than a decision by anyone else, because of the independence and unbiased quality our judges possess.

The hon. member for Carleton made many objections and I do not intend now to cover them entirely. He referred to the possibility of a judge becoming involved in public controversy. I suppose a judge could always become involved in public controversy but, as I will suggest in a very few minutes, there are other amendments which I feel are much more important to keep judges away from such controversy.

The hon. member also mentioned that justice is sometimes delayed. It is my submission that an inquiry can be just as important as any other case, and sometimes much more important. I do not intend to deal specifically with the hon. member's third objection, but I will refer to it indirectly in a few minutes. The hon. member suggested that when a judge gives his opinion in respect of any case, other than a legal case, his opinion is worth no more than that of anyone else. Let me refer him to his opening words which can be used to refute that statement, because it is the reputation for independence and impartiality that judges possess which makes their opinion much better in a particular field than that of an ordinary person.

The hon. member referred to moonlighting in respect of industrial relations. Certainly in labour arbitration I believe that the opinions of judges are usually accepted more readily by the parties involved than by any other group of people. The hon. member suggested the reputation of impartiality may be damaged because of added remuneration. I think that equally wise quotations could be obtained regarding the value of obtaining the services of an unbiased, impartial judge.

My hon. friend mentioned that justice must not only be done, but that it must manifestly appear to be done. I am in total agreement with that statement. This is a quotation that has long been used in reference to our system of British justice. The member speaks of a new and trained profession that is needed, namely the establishment of a panel of qualified arbitrators. I would be in complete agreement if that new profession were already established, but to date that is not the case. I can only ask the hon. member whether it might be better to pass legislation setting up such an alternative before leaving us in a vacuum by preventing judges from performing this very important task.

I support the hon. member in respect of two things, and I commend him for bringing this important matter to the attention of the house. This is something which has been discussed for some time by the members of the profession which the hon. member and I share outside this house. I share his feeling that the law should be amended, but the areas of amendment in my opinion are different.

Let me make two points in this regard. Under the Inquiries Act the terms of reference for the commissioners should be submitted to this house. It is very important that the terms of reference be fair. In my short time in the house I have heard discussions on at least one, if not two occasions, about terms of reference, so far as certain members of this house were concerned, not being exactly fair. They should be fair and perhaps one way of making sure they are fair would be by submitting them to this house for approval.

My second point is that the commissioner should be restricted to findings of fact, and should not pass judgment on those facts. That responsibility should be left to the house. In other words, the facts found by the commissioner should be presented to the house, where any judgment on the basis of those facts should be made. I do not intend to deal with any of the commissions of late but would just give this example. Let us suppose it is alleged that a minister did not use good judgment in entering into a contract. Pursuant to the provisions of an order in council, a judge is appointed a commissioner under part I of the Inquiries Act to inquire into whether the minister used good judgment in entering into the contract. The commissioner should inquire into the facts, as for example whether other tenders were called and the circumstances surrounding the contract.

When the judge, acting as a commissioner, makes a finding of fact, parliament should then make the judgment on those facts. In other words, it is for parliament to decide on the facts whether the conduct of the minister was open to censure. The judge should be relieved of passing judgment on a minister or member of parliament on any matter relating to the responsibilities of a member of this house. If a commissioner decides only on the facts, I submit he will not be exposed in the way in which the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) has very carefully pointed out on so many occasions.

I should like to discuss for a moment only one of the examples put forward so ably by the hon. member for Carleton. I refer to the commission that was set up to report on the Hong Kong expedition. As the hon. member for Carleton said, Chief Justice Lyman Duff was appointed the royal commissioner in that case to inquire into the organization, authorization and despatch of the Canadian expeditionary force to Hong Kong in October, 1941.

I quote from the report by the royal commissioner:

> The order in council states that the purpose of the investigation is to determine whether there occurred any dereliction of duty or error in judgment by those whose duty it was to arrange for the authorization, organization and despatch of the force that resulted in detriment or injury to the expedition or its members.

I am not reading this out just for the sake of reading it. I would like to cite this case to the hon. member for Carleton as an example of how we can take the law as it exists today and use it by submitting only facts to the commissioner involved. In making a finding of fact the commissioner could not possibly, in my respectful submission, be exposed in the way put forward by the hon. member for Carleton. Later in his report the commissioner said:

> My duty is to determine whether there occurred any dereliction of duty or error in judgment "on the part of any of the personnel or of any of the departments of the government whose duty it was to arrange for the authorization, organization and despatch of the expeditionary force"—

If a finger can be raised against the commissioner in this particular case, it is the terms of reference that are responsible and not the commissioner himself. The commissioner went on to say in the report:

> —and whether, if such dereliction or error occurred, there resulted detriment or injury to the expedition or the troops comprising it.

Five points are set out by the commissioner in his report but I will summarize those which can be taken as factual matters. First, who authorized the expedition? That is fine as far as it goes. This refers to the expedition that left Canada on October 27, 1941.

On page 4 of the report the commissioner pointed out one thing that I should like to bring to the attention of the house. As far as I can see, this is the only time in the report when he expressed an opinion, but in my respectful submission this opinion was expressed because of the terms of reference themselves. He said:

> It would perhaps be a possible view that the propriety of this decision by the government is exclusively a matter for consideration and discussion by parliament.

In expressing that view it would seem the commissioner felt he was making a finding of fact and it would be up to parliament to decide, on the facts, whether there had occurred any dereliction of duty, rather than it being left to the commissioner to himself find that dereliction.

In this connection I should like to stress to the hon. member for Carleton that if the commissioner had to make up his mind only on matters of fact, all the objections upon which he based his bill and which he mentioned in his speech today would be completely superfluous. The commissioner went on to say:

> Since, however, I am required to pass upon the question, it is my duty to say that I have no doubt the course taken by the government was the only course open to them in the circumstances.

Of course, there is one advantage in having it done that particular way. As I mentioned, there were certain secret documents and telegrams here that probably would not have been exposed to this house. Second, the commissioner had to deal with the question of the selection of the units for the expeditionary force. That was a factual matter. In that case the minister could easily have found on that point of fact without any criticism from anyone. Third, he had to consider the steps taken to bring the units up to strength, including first reinforcements; fourth, the general organization and despatch of the force, apart from the subject of mechanical transport; and fifth, mechanical transport—that is, the number of vehicles, and so on. If all those five matters were decided by the commissioner, I would say to the hon. member for Carleton that no criticism could be placed on him. Of course, I agree with the commissioner's findings in that case; but if the facts alone had been left to the commissioner, and those facts brought back to this house for judgment, it would have left the commissioner in a much better position.

It is often mentioned in the house that parliament is too busy to deal with matters of this kind. At no time has this been quite as obvious as it was in the last few days. I am not going to give all the examples that I could, but in the debate on capital punishment the other day the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) said, as reported in Hansard at page 4261:

> There are also many very urgent matters which the house should be considering.

The hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Alkenbrack) said on the same day, as reported at page 4281 of Hansard:

> —despite the serious economic ills which now beset our country and the need for useful and beneficial legislation concerning economic matters, the government now wastes the time of parliament by sponsoring this bill dealing with the Criminal Code, which will be productive of nothing of benefit to Canada.

The next day the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) spoke of impending legislation and said there were other ways in which this house could be more gainfully and more usefully employed, and that it was no time to debate a bill that would bring about changes to the Criminal Code. It has been said on many occasions that parliament is so busy. I would ask the hon. member for Carleton whether parliament is not too busy to discuss and take up the time necessary in dealing with his bill.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is he advocating the abandonment of private members hour?

Mr. Stafford: No, Mr. Speaker, I am merely pointing out what would happen if this amendment became law. Unless the governor in council were expressly authorized in a particular case to appoint a commissioner by resolution of the House of Commons, it would mean that every time a commissioner was appointed by resolution of the house the matter would have to be discussed.

I listened to a debate in this house not too long ago about terms of reference, and I hate to think of 265 members expressing their views about a particular judge or judges named in a resolution to do a job required by the government. I submit it would be a very lengthy discussion.

It is obvious that if the names of judges are bandied about and if an extended discussion concerning judges is carried on in the house, this would not add to the dignity, unbiased nature and reputation which judges and courts possess in Canada at this time.

I should like to say a few words about judges. They have a great security of tenure in Canada. Their appointments last until they reach the age of 75 years. It is an established practice in Canada not to lower the salaries of judges; so their future is assured. The executive cannot say to a judge "If you do not do "a certain thing", your salary will be cut down to $1 a year", which, all in all, makes them very independent. Over the years they have built up a tradition of impartiality and objectivity. People in Canada respect their independence. What my hon. friend said to sum up the reputation of judges in this country cannot be expressed in a better way. The reputation enjoyed by the judges also applies to the courts.

I have already covered one difficulty of appointing judges by a resolution, namely that it would take much time of parliament to discuss and criticize the personalities of the judges. The airing of this subject would destroy the respect which the public has for judges today. If that were to happen, we would also lose respect for the law. The judges themselves would be the subject of an inquiry before the inquiry ever took place, and after such a public inquiry in the house the public would not be prepared to accept the finding of the commissioner. In my respectful submission it would be a retrograde step which would undermine one of our most viable institutions, namely our judges and our courts.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in my view the bill which the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) has introduced, with his usual eloquence, undoubtedly points to a problem which exists and which is real. I am not at all certain, however, that the bill offers a solution, and perhaps that is the consideration which should be uppermost in our minds when we assess a proposal of this kind. If I heard the hon. member correctly, he was quoting another opinion when he argued that court proceedings were suffering from judicial absenteeism, and he spent some time discussing what he referred to as judicial moonlighting. For a while I hesitated in deciding whether or not I should inject myself into this discussion, because I do not have knowledge in the operation of the courts which is possessed by someone in the profession of the hon. member for Carleton. But on second thought I decided that I would take part in the discussion because perhaps the hon. member's search for a solution may be restricted and limited by the special knowledge he has in this field, and which I lack.

Both he and the hon. member who followed him expressed some concern that the integrity and the honour in which courts in this land are held should not in any way be impaired. The hon. member for Carleton argued that as a result of some of the activities in which members of the judiciary are called upon to engage there is a lowering of their reputation in the minds of the people of this country. In my view these activities, which tend to lower our faith in the integrity of the judiciary, which faith we all consider to be desirable, have not been activities under the Inquiries Act but have rather resulted from certain defects in the laws. I might as well say at once that I am referring to certain applications for injunctions which are becoming increasingly frequent in our society.

I think that probably most members of the house would agree that the fact that judges are being called upon to perform functions which are outside their traditional duties indicates that there is a need in our society for people to perform these tasks with the integrity and detachment which we traditionally associate with the judiciary. Therefore I suggest for the consideration of the house that instead of the proposal made by the hon. member for Carleton, which would in effect prohibit the use of judges under the Inquiries Act, except in some rare instances, and because of the very reasons that were advanced by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Stafford) that no government will wish to have frequent debates in the house regarding the appointment of judges under the Inquiries Act, we should consider expanding our traditional view of the courts. It seems to me from a layman's point of view, that our judicial system and the decision as to the number of judges which we appoint, was established in the context of a much simpler society which, by and large, was rural. At that time the only need for people in such a detached position was in cases involving civil or criminal actions; whereas in our present society there is an increasing need for judges presiding over inquiries going far beyond the scope of the traditional courts. Perhaps we should therefore think of an expansion of the whole concept of what is involved in being a judge.

The hon. member for Carleton suggested that we should think of employing in this capacity academics and other professionals. I suggest to him that academics have knowledge in a special field, whereas there is a need for someone who is beyond and above any particular specialty and who is in a position to assess and to judge certain cases. In many instances the matters that are being dealt with are of such broad public interest that the persons appointed to deal with them must enjoy the prestige and impartiality normally required in carrying out the functions of a court.

[Mr. Barnett.]

There have been of course many suggestions for the setting up of panels of arbitrators or referees. I have been wondering whether or not any action we might take in this parliament would be likely to attract or develop a group in our society which would have anything like the prestige traditionally associated in the minds of citizens with judges. I have been wondering whether or not we should take a different approach to certain appointments in order to provide panels of people on the bench from whom we could draw for this very important social purpose, rather than have these judges haggling over some civil action.

I am not suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that I have the answer to this problem. However, I believe some such approach as I have suggested might be sounder than the bill proposed by the hon. member for Carleton which, in a sense, is going to restrict the availability of competent people, with the prestige that is required to do very necessary jobs in our society, without putting anyone else in their place. I suggest to the hon. member for Carleton that he put his fertile imagination to work on a proposal which might appeal to more of us, and bring about a desirable solution to the important problem we have in which our judges admittedly have been caught up in a rather unfortunate way.

Mr. Ron Basford (Vancouver-Burrard): We have had very learned addresses on this private bill from the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) and from the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Stafford). I think the hon. member for Elgin has successfully demolished the argument of the sponsor of the bill. There is one aspect of this subject that has not been dealt with, Mr. Speaker, and that is that if we are going effectively to limit judges from serving as royal commissioners, then we must of course ask where we can find others to do this work. The purpose of a royal commission is to get a number of different views. By appointing three, five or seven persons to a royal commission you would get these different views and then, by a process of distillation of opinion, the royal commissioners reach a consensus on some important social or economic problem which they have been asked to examine.

We must ask ourselves, who would replace the judges? The first group of people that come to mind would be the economists. It is said of economists that if you put three in a room you get four opinions. If we made up a royal commission of economists, the taxpayers would get one opinion for nothing, so I think that would be a desirable saving to the taxpayers.

After giving the matter more thought, it seemed to me that if we were not going to allow judges to sit on royal commissions we should perhaps have royal commissions made up of newspaper publishers and editors. It seems to me there are a number of important benefits from this proposal. Of course if a royal commission were made up of newspaper publishers, we would be assured from the beginning that the royal commission would have the benefit of a wide range of views on any given subject into which the commission inquired. If one picks ten editorials on any given subject, he usually finds there are three editors in favour, three opposed, two editors usually have not decided on their position, and by the end of the editorial two more have managed not to declare themselves either for or against. Therefore, we have the advantage of being automatically guaranteed a wide range of opinion.

It seems to me therefore it would be very good for newspaper publishers and editors to be appointed royal commissioners. They would have to grapple with the problems of the nation, rather than sit in their offices and write editorials. This would be a good training for them. A more important benefit is that we would be automatically guaranteed editorial support for whatever recommendations the royal commission might make. As it is now, we have recommendations coming from royal commissions which cost us a great deal of money, and then the newspaper publishers across the country set about shooting down those recommendations in flames. If the recommendations were made by the publishers, then automatically when the royal commission report was made public it would receive the overwhelming support of the Canadian editorial writers. The recommendations would then be easily implemented by the government. I think we could solve the major issues of the nation in this way.

I suggest, for example, a royal commission on foreign ownership might be composed of the publishers of the Toronto Star, the Winnipeg Free Press and the Vancouver Sun. Perhaps the Edmonton Journal could be included. They would sit down and analyse this question, then come out with a royal commission report on foreign ownership which I am sure would solve the problem once and for all. Perhaps we could have a royal commission on French-English relations composed of the publisher of the Orillia Packet, the Vancouver Province and Le Devoir. I am sure they would solve this problem once and for all. When these commissioners made their recommendations they would have unanimous editorial support across the country, and we could implement their recommendations without further controversy. Then we could get on with the other problems of the nation.

We could have, for example, a royal commission on economic prospects and policy, composed of the publishers of the Halifax Chronicle, the Toronto Telegram and the Winnipeg Tribune. In this way, we could have a consensus on what we should be doing about inflation. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) could implement the report of the royal commission and receive newspaper support right across the country.

Mr. Knowles: Whom would you put on the status of women commission?

Mr. Basford: I suppose the publishers of the Ladies Home Journal and Chatelaine. Since we are not going to be allowed to have judges as the members of royal commissions if this bill passes, I think we must turn to other groups. I can think of no finer group than the newspaper publishers and editors in Canada. As I have pointed out, I believe there are definite benefits to limiting the appointment of royal commissioners to that group of people. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say again that I believe the hon. member for Elgin properly and effectively demolished the reasoning behind this bill, and clearly indicated why we should not proceed with it.

May I call it six o'clock.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): There are two other bills standing in my name, Bill No. C-16, to amend the Judges Act and Bill No. C-89, to amend the Supreme Court Act, and I think it would be best if they took the same status on the order paper as this bill. I ask unanimous consent that they take the same status.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Does the house give the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Inquiries Act Amendment

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): The suggestion is that order No. 5, second reading of Bill No. C-16, an act to amend the Judges Act, and order No. 78, second reading of Bill No. C-89, an act to amend the Supreme Court Act, both in the name of the hon. member for Carleton, be dropped to the bottom of the list of public bills; is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): The hour for the consideration of private members business has now expired.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MARRIAGE OF CANADIANS BY CONSULAR AGENTS ABROAD

Question No. 286—Mr. Caouette:

1. Are Canadian diplomatic or consular agents empowered to marry Canadian citizens abroad?

2. Can Canadian citizens be married abroad by diplomatic or consular agents of the United Kingdom and, if so, under what statutory provision or agreement can this occur?

3. Since the Statute of Westminster of 1931, has the government of Canada requested the government of the United Kingdom to continue to allow its agents to marry Canadian citizens outside Canada?

4. Does the government of Canada intend to allow this practice to continue?

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The Canadian diplomatic or consular agents do not have the power to solemnize abroad the marriage of Canadian citizens.

2. Canadian citizens are able to marry abroad in accordance with the provisions of local law. As an additional facility, by virtue of the United Kingdom Foreign Marriage Act of 1892-1947 and the Foreign Marriages Order 1964, which empowered certain official British representatives abroad to perform marriages abroad, Canadian citizens can, if they wish it and provided they meet the requirements involved, be married abroad by such officials.

3. Canada has not made such request to the Government of the United Kingdom.

4. The British legislation in this field has been useful to those Canadians desiring to take advantage of it. The question as to whether this procedure should be maintained is, however, under study.

Legislative authority in relation to marriage is divided between the provinces and parliament. The provinces have jurisdiction in relation to "solemnization of marriage in the province" and parliament has jurisdiction in relation to "marriage and divorce". As a consequence, while parliament could authorize Canadian consuls abroad to perform marriages, it would be necessary for the provinces also to pass legislation validating such marriages.

Federal legislation would be required since such marriages would not relate to a solemnization of marriages in the provinces and therefore would not be within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. Jurisdiction on this question would be vested in the parliament of Canada. However, provincial legislation would also be required so as to ensure that marriages solemnized outside the provinces would be valid within the provinces. Only the legislature of the province could enact a law declaring that a marriage solemnized outside the province is a valid marriage within the province. It will be realized that the concurrence of the province would therefore be required in order to change the actual practice. The question is presently under study.

MAILING OF SAVINGS BOND INCOME TAX FORM

Question No. 637—Mr. Harkness:

1. When Canada savings bonds interest payments were sent out on November 1, why was a notice included stating that the T5 form would be mailed not later than February 28, 1968, rather than including this form with the interest payment as has been done previously?

2. What is the estimated cost of making this second mailing to all registered bond holders?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1. Because holders of fully registered Canada savings bonds who redeem their bonds up to August 31 in each year receive accrued interest to date of redemption from the bank branch which redeems them, the records at Ottawa must be adjusted to allow for these transactions before any cheques can be prepared. By the time all such bonds reach Ottawa from bank branches coast to coast and have been processed, the time remaining for cheque preparation is limited. The number of holders of fully registered Canada savings bonds is now so great that if the cheques and forms T5 were both to be prepared in time for all of them to reach bond holders by November 1st, expensive additional equipment, which would only be used for a short time each year, and more staff would have been required. Of total production time, about two thirds is needed on forms T5 and one third on cheques, whether they are produced in one operation or two.

2. By delaying production of forms T5 until after the cheques are prepared additional costs have been avoided which would be much larger than the stationery mailing and other costs involved in the present separate despatch of T5 forms.

CANADIAN FOREIGN ASSETS NATIONALIZED

Question No. 698—Mr. Caouette:

1. Has the government any record showing the number of claims Canadians have made in connection with their assets in other countries which have been nationalized without compensation and, if so, what are such claims and in what countries?

[Mr. Béchard.]

2. Is the government of Canada negotiating with those countries so that the Canadians concerned will receive fair compensation?

3. Has the Cuban government nationalization program affected Canadian industries or capital and, if so, has the government of Canada taken any steps to protect Canadian interests?

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Yes. Pursuant to understandings reached with the Governments of Bulgaria, Hungary, Poland, Romania and Czechoslovakia, the Department of External Affairs has requested and received from Canadian citizens details concerning property in these countries which has been nationalized, expropriated or otherwise taken without compensation. In addition, the Department has on record a number of nationalization claims which have arisen in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Cuba, the United Arab Republic and Communist China, as well as in the Eastern zone of Germany. These claims have resulted, generally speaking, from the nationalization or other taking of urban real property, residential property, farm land, industries, bank accounts and other debts, bonds, mortgages, etc. However, pursuant to a well-established principle of international law, the Canadian Government can advance only those claims which belonged to the Canadian citizens at the time of loss and continuously thereafter until the presentation of the claims to the foreign governments.

2. A settlement of Canadian claims against Bulgaria in respect of nationalized property was reached on June 30, 1966. Under an Anglo-Yugoslav agreement signed on December 23, 1948, a former owner of expropriated property in Yugoslavia, who had Canadian citizenship or other British subject status at the time and who gave due notice of claim, could have obtained limited compensation. Canadian officials have held to date three rounds of negotiations with Hungarian authorities in an attempt to reach a lump-sum settlement of Canadian claims against Hungary. A fourth round will begin on November 27. Negotiations toward a lump-sum settlement of claims against Poland are expected to begin early next year and it is hoped that it will be possible to start negotiations next year as well with Romania and Czechoslovakia. Consideration is being given to raising with certain other governments the claims of Canadian citizens in respect of property which has been nationalized or otherwise taken.

3. Yes. The Canadian Government has succeeded in obtaining payment of certain commercial debts owing to Canadian companies. Other such commercial debts are currently under discussion with the Cuban authorities, as is the question of nationalizations.

I.D.B. ASSISTANCE IN PORTNEUF AND CHAMPLAIN CONSTITUENCIES

Question No. 706—Mr. Godin:

1. How many businesses in the constituencies of Portneuf and Champlain have received financial assistance from the Industrial Development Bank?

2. What are the industries that have received assistance?

3. What sums have they received?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1, 2 and 3: The annual report of the Industrial Development Bank for the year ended September 30, 1966 contains information regarding the number and amount of loans by size, by province and by type of business. A further breakdown of the information is not a matter of public record.

SALES TAX ON FENCE TRANSFORMERS

Question No. 707—Mr. Godin:

Does the government intend to remove the 11 per cent sales tax on regulating devices (transformers) for electrical fences used by farmers?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): This question concerns budget policy. If the government proposes any additional exemptions from sales tax it will be announced at the appropriate time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CLAIMS BY YUKON RESIDENTS

Question No. 722—Mr. Nielsen:

How many Yukon residents claimed unemployment insurance benefits for each of the months October, November and December in 1966 and for each of the months of January to October inclusive in 1967 through the office of the unemployment insurance commission in Prince George, British Columbia?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): I am informed by the Unemployment Insurance Commission that no statistics are available with respect to the number of Yukon residents who claim unemployment insurance benefits through the commission's office at Prince George, British Columbia.

OLD AGE SECURITY PAYMENTS

Question No. 736—Mr. Davis:

In respect of old age security (a) how much was paid out to individual Canadians in 1966 (b) what is the estimated amount that would have been paid out had old age security been available at age 65 (c) what amounts were collected in 1966 from (i) 3 per cent tax on corporate incomes (ii) 3 per cent tax on sales (iii) 4 per cent tax on individual incomes?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): (a) $1,006,329,265; (b) $1,385,593,200; (c)(i) $152,800,000; (ii) $547,500,000; (iii) $539,000,000.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to bring to the attention of the Acting Prime Minister that 181 questions are listed on the order paper of which 29 were answered today, leaving a total of 152. I raised this matter previously and asked the ministers to try to answer these questions as promptly as possible. However, no attention has been paid to my request, as is evidenced by the growing number of questions on the order paper. The last time I believe there were 135 questions; now there are 152. We are continuously being asked to put questions on the order paper. We do so in the hope we may get answers within a reasonable time. Therefore I ask the Acting Prime Minister if he would try to get some co-operation from the ministers in answering these questions.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): As my hon. friend has remarked, he has raised this question before. He will recall that in reply the Prime Minister pointed out that we were most anxious to co-operate and see that questions were answered as quickly as possible. When the Prime Minister made this reply he also observed that an analysis revealed the record of responses by this government to questions is very good.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): I should like to protest very strongly the fact that question No. 426 standing in my name has been on the order paper for some two months. It is a straightforward question, and I can think of no reason why the government has not answered it long ago.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO EXCHANGE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT DE GAULLE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister about the public exchange of criticism between the Prime Minister of Canada and the president of France which took place earlier today. I think I may be permitted to say, quite apart from the merits or demerits of what was said on either side, that this is an extraordinary way to carry on international relations.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should ask his question.

Mr. Fulton: My question is, could the Acting Prime Minister give the house any helpful information on the background and circumstances of this exchange, and in particular could he tell us whether the remarks of the Prime Minister preceded those of General de Gaulle, were contemporaneous, or were made subsequently, and was this exchange entirely accidental or was it in any way planned?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my belief is that the speech made by the Prime Minister this morning in London when he received the freedom of the city was completely unrelated to the remarks made by the president during the course of a press conference. As a matter of fact I have been advised that when the Prime Minister was about to take his plane he was advised that observations had been made by the president of the French Republic. The Prime Minister's reply was that he would not make any comment until he had seen the text. My own examination of the Prime Minister's speech bears out the view that the two statements were completely unrelated.

While I am on my feet, I should like to answer another part of the question and this I shall do in French.

We have just received the first reports of the press conference given by the president of France. However, there seems to be certain doubts about his exact statement about Quebec.

Of course, before deciding, the government will have to consider carefully the statement of the president of the French Republic. But I can add even now that the government, in considering these texts, will keep in mind two main considerations: On the one hand, our traditional and steadfast friendship for France and, on the other hand, our obligation, as a government representing the whole country on the international level, to exercise our rights and to allow no interference in our domestic affairs.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: May I ask a supplementary question. Could the Acting Prime Minister obtain for the house an official text of the remarks made by our Prime Minister in London at the Mansion House luncheon, and could the Acting Prime Minister use the offices of the Department of External Affairs to obtain an official transcript from France of what the president of France said there so the two texts could then be made available to the house?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would be glad to do so.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN PROPOSED PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in view of the many significant discussions regarding the future of Canadian confederation which have taken place this past week end I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government would be prepared to change its attitude, even at this late date, toward the Confederation of Tomorrow conference and send members of the cabinet to that conference, even if only as observers.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows there are four observers at the conference. The matter referred to in my hon. friend's question has already been anticipated in an earlier reply of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement in the letter of the premier of Alberta, tabled a few days ago, rejecting the idea of a constitutional guarantee of the equality of language rights wherever practicable in Canada, would the Acting Prime Minister assure the house that the federal government will remain firm on this point at the projected federal-provincial conference?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, federal-provincial conferences are not formally constituted bodies. Those who participate do not vote, and there is no right of veto. We do propose, of course, to discuss basic issues and basic rights. Premier Manning's preliminary position represents his own point of view, but it seems to me it must be borne in mind that such views as he entertains may not be typical of those of the majority of English speaking Canadians, who I believe are prepared to take a more flexible attitude in order to promote the unity of Canada.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, could the Acting Prime Minister tell us when the report of the Laurendeau-Dunton commission on bilingualism will be tabled and put at the disposal of hon. members?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a definite answer, but the Prime Minister is expected back tonight. According to something I received last week, I am under the impression that it is quite likely that the commission will submit its report to the Prime Minister towards the end of this week perhaps, but I am not sure.

MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can he report any progress toward a settlement of the port of Montreal dispute?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I cannot report any real progress. As I intimated in my remarks on Friday last, there is a serious question before the courts, in proceedings, which I had hoped might have been instituted some two weeks ago. The parties are now involved in litigation seeking an interpretation as to their rights. The judge who heard the application said he would deal with the matter with dispatch. When the judgment is known—today, tomorrow or whenever it is—the government will be watching the situation carefully, and we will be guided to some extent by the decision in that case.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. Is the government contemplating any direct action or initiative to bring these parties together and reach some understanding on their disagreement?

Mr. Nicholson: My department is constantly in touch with both sides and the situation is being followed closely. Should the situation warrant further direct action by me or by the government, it will be taken. We are certainly not contemplating any further action unless there is undue delay in the decision in the case that is now pending in the courts.

Mr. Starr: A further supplementary question, and I direct it to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour. Since the minister is reluctant to take action, and since I am aware of the keener appreciation of the parliamentary secretary of what is involved in this dispute—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows he cannot ask a question in this way. I suggest that he is reviving the emergency debate which went on for many hours on Friday.

Mr. Starr: I am asking the parliamentary secretary to take all steps possible to bring the parties together.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Turner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, when the minister is in the house a question having to do with the administration of his department quite properly ought to be directed to him.

Mr. Speaker: There is no question about this; I was merely waiting for the hon. member to complete asking his question. He knows that is so.

Mr. Starr: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Am I to understand that the rules say no member may ask a parliamentary secretary a question if his minister is in the house? Is that correct?

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. Since Friday last has one of the parties in the dispute asked for the minister to intervene personally?

Mr. Nicholson: No, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AGRICULTURE

FOOT AND MOUTH DISEASE—ASSISTANCE TO U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North): My question is for the Minister of Agriculture but in his absence may I direct it to the acting minister. Has the federal government any specific plans to assist the United Kingdom government in their efforts to clear up foot and mouth disease in that country? Clearing up the disease over there would help prevent the spread of that disease to Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My recollection is that this question was asked last week.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF PROPOSED REDUCTIONS IN ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): My question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the statement by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics over the week end that during the first seven months of the year federal government expenditures increased by 15 per cent over the same period last year, does the minister intend to announce to the house this week the reductions he intends to bring about in the estimates for 1967-68?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall be dealing with this year's expenditures as well as next year's in my statement on Thursday.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister in a position to assure the house that no supplementary estimates will be brought down this year save in respect of emergencies and errors, to which this government is susceptible? If he cannot give that assurance, can he advise us what will be the total amount of any estimates it is proposed to bring in by way of supplementary estimates for this year?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the further supplementary estimates will be brought down in due course. I can assure the house that the statement I made about our budgetary limitations this year will be observed, and that any supplementaries have already been taken into account in our estimates of expenditures.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Greece as yet begun to reduce its armed forces in Cyprus? If so, by how much? At the same time may I ask whether Turkey has commenced to reduce its armed forces in the ports adjacent to Cyprus?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question of reduction of forces and withdrawal of forces is the issue that is now being discussed, and until agreement is reached I cannot answer the question. My hon. friend will remember that on Friday last the security council reached a consensus that called on the parties to refrain from any action. Mr. Vance, the emissary of the president of the United States and Mr. Rolz-Bennet, the representative of the Secretary General, are now in the Mediterranean area discussing, in the capitals of Turkey and Greece, the matter involved in my hon. friend's question together with other questions which could bring about a settlement.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since I gather from the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that no reduction of armed forces has yet taken place, may I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. Has a decision as yet been reached about whether Canada will increase her armed forces under United Nations command in Cyprus?

Hon. Leo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): We have had no request to do so, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is part of the normal rotation of the Canadian troops in Cyprus, which I believe should take place in December, being proceeded with, or in view of the situation on that island at the present time is this rotation being delayed?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): This rotation took place six weeks ago, Mr. Speaker.

INCOME TAX

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING DISABILITY PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address what might be considered a more or less philosophical question to the Minister of Finance. Urgency is attached to it, inasmuch as more than 172,000 war veterans disability pensioners are now on tenterhooks, and this information is now required in connection with several forthcoming national conventions.

Has the minister or members of the government received representations from the Royal Canadian Legion or other veterans organizations which outline their views with respect to the principles of income taxation as related to disability pensions and allowances? If so, what was the government's response to these representations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): We have received representations such as the hon. gentleman has referred to, and I can assure him that these representations will certainly be given the most sympathetic consideration.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FERRY SERVICE, SAINT JOHN, N.B.-DIGBY, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I have a question for the Minister of Transport, whom I should like to welcome back on his safe return from his trip to the maritimes over the week end. I should like to ask the minister where we stand now on this question of the Digby-Saint John ferry. Are we to take it, from his very disappointing statement, that this is now to be left to the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): We are two days closer to a solution than we were on Saturday, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Can the minister indicate a time limit, bearing in mind that his predecessor gave many time limits, all of which were passed by?

Mr. Hellyer: I will say this; from conversations in Saint John I understand that this was also true of previous governments. As an experienced politician I am sure the hon. member will agree with me when I say it is better to pursue a matter diligently than to set a date which we might not be able to meet by a few days.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF REPORT ON ATLANTIC PROBLEMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): My question too is addressed to the Minister of Transport. Is it the intention of the minister to refer the special study on transportation in the Atlantic provinces to the committee on transportation and have that committee hold public hearings in the Atlantic provinces, so that all problems related to transportation might be considered on site as was done by the committee in western Canada recently?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): This is a comprehensive policy question and I will take it under advisement.

[Later:]

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I have a further question for the Minister of Transport. Did the minister have an opportunity to meet with the Atlantic premiers in Toronto over the week end to discuss transportation problems? If not, when does the minister intend to meet with the premiers, as was promised by Premier Robichaud at a meeting which I attended recently in Halifax?

Mr. Hellyer: I was not able during the week end to meet with them, but I shall be glad to do so at their convenience. I think we can work out a mutually agreeable arrangement.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, this question arises from the answer given by the Minister of Transport. When the minister was asked whether the transportation committee would conduct meetings in the maritimes his reply was that this was a very comprehensive question. What is the difference between the transportation committee conducting meetings on the east coast or the west coast?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will recognize himself that the question is argumentative.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Would the minister check the remarks made by the former minister of transport during the debate in the house, when he promised members from the Atlantic provinces—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASES IN PENSIONS AND DISABILITY ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have a question to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Bearing in mind the approach of the Christmas season, can the minister now say when we may expect legislation to increase veterans allowances and disability pensions?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I am not at present in a position to answer that question directly.

SAGUENAY RIVIER—INQUIRY AS TO WINTER NAVIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alcide Simard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, on November 17 last I put a question to the Minister of Transport which could be summarized as follows: Can the minister confirm whether there will be winter navigation on the Saguenay river? If so, will his department provide icebreaker service to keep the channel open on the river this winter?

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): What we did last year, as I understand it, was to make some probes into the river to determine the feasibility of maintaining navigation. The proposal is to repeat the process this year in order to gain additional information. It would be the intention of the department to attempt these probes at a time when the operation might be most beneficial to the ships which would like to use these waters during the winter months. There seems to be insufficient traffic at the moment to require that continuous icebreaking facilities be made available. However, we shall certainly pursue the investigations which were begun last year, and try to do so in a manner which would be of the greatest assistance to any shippers who would like to use the river ports.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): As a supplementary question arising out of the minister's answer, Mr. Speaker, does he or the government think if this waterway were kept open throughout the winter there would be a gradual pickup in new traffic using it?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is argumentative.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Could the Minister of Transport tell the house whether his department has determined the costs involved to keep Montreal harbour open and permit navigation on the St. Lawrence throughout the year?

[English]

Mr. Hellyer: I could not say, Mr. Speaker, but as my hon. friend knows additional icebreaking facilities are being built to prevent flooding on the St. Lawrence river. This also will tend to keep the channel more open than previously for shippers who desire to use those facilities during the winter months.

Mr. Valade: As a further supplementary question, would the minister consider informing the house that such a study would be to the advantage of the people in general, to see what is the difference between the cost for icebreaking—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's supplementary question is argumentative.

EFFECT OF CURRENCY DEVALUATION ON EXPORTS TO U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister what action the government is taking to safeguard Canada's competitive position in the British market in light of the fact that a number of our competitors, especially those supplying agricultural products, have improved their competitive position relative to Canada's by devaluing their currencies.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend with his great experience would agree that this is a question of which I should take notice.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LA SALLE, QUE.—LAY-OFFS AT NAVAL DEPOT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Rock (Jacques-Cartier-Lasalle): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the Department of National Defence laying off employees at the naval depot situated in the city of La Salle, giving only two day's notice to its employees'. If so, is this the department's normal procedure with respect to such notice?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has made a representation to the government which I am sure has been noted.

[Later:]

Mr. Rock: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Since the railway employees receive two weeks notice before lay-offs, does he not feel that defence employees should receive equal treatment?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that the question is argumentative.

OLD AGE SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING SUPPLEMENTAL PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and ask him whether the government is contemplating introducing amendments during the current session of parliament to correct the injustice which occurs through old age pensioners' supplementary payments, in respect of changes in their income status during the current year.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we have under consideration within the department certain changes that might be made to improve the administration of the guaranteed income supplement. I cannot say with certainty when it will be possible to bring in these amendments, but I doubt very much whether it will be possible this session.

Mr. Starr: As a supplementary question, in planning these amendments is the minister contemplating making their effect retroactive in order to correct the situation?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, all aspects of the matter will be given consideration, including retroactivity.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REQUEST THAT DECEMBER CHEQUES BE ISSUED BEFORE CHRISTMAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I put this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare while there is yet time for him to do something about the matter. Would it be possible for the December old age security pension cheques to be sent out to our old age pensioners so they might receive them a few days before Christmas rather than a few days afterward?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this question comes up almost every year. It has been the policy of the department not to make any change in the date for sending out these cheques for the reason that if the cheques were sent out before Christmas, as many of us would like, there would be a considerably longer gap between those cheques and the following ones, and most pensioners are accustomed to budget on a particular time schedule. This particular gesture, I think, might be more harmful than helpful.

Mr. Knowles: As a supplementary question, how did the minister make out when he spoke to the Minister of Finance about the possibility of a Christmas bonus?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has he consulted with the Minister of Finance with regard to a centennial bonus of $100 for each of our senior citizens?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think the question is very urgent. In any event it was asked previously by the hon. member.

Mr. Knowles: But it wasn't answered.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I point out that when I originally asked this question the minister said he would consult with the Minister of Finance. I would now like to know whether he has consulted with the Minister of Finance, and what is the result?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member thinks there is urgency to the matter he might give notice that the question be debated at the time of adjournment.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

WHEAT—REPORTED REDUCTION IN EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but since he is not in the house I shall direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. It has to do with a very serious problem, namely the export of wheat. During the first two months of the last crop year there were 116 million bushels of wheat exported. This year only 52 million bushels have been exported. Would the minister look into this serious problem and see to it that the farmers are able to export more wheat in order to pay their expenses?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is some time since my hon. friend and I were jointly associated in the active pursuit of the welfare of the agricultural community. The question my hon. friend asks gives me an opportunity to say that perhaps no administration has been more active in this regard than the present one.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATION OF FREEDMAN REPORT RECOMMENDATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the rapid reduction of skilled staff on the railways, such as telegraphers, and the hardships being created by lay-offs as the result of automation and technological change, will the government in the near future be bringing forward legislation to implement the recommendations of the Freedman commission?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, no legislation is contemplated for introduction at this session to implement any such recommendations.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—POSSIBLE POSTPONEMENT OF INTRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Due to the fact that there is some apprehension in the country over the imminent increase in taxes, can the minister tell the house whether medicare will be delayed beyond the date set for it to become operable?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid this question was asked many times last week.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): It has never been answered.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN POSITION AS TO ADMISSION OF RED CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I want to address to the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs, or maybe I should address it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister. Having in mind the move which I understand has been made by France at the United Nations, calling for the United Nations to oust nationalist China and seat the People's Republic of China, what is Canada's position on this issue?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada's position is that we believe mainland China should be seated in the United Nations. We also believe that Formosa should continue to be a member of that organization, and for that reason we will abstain on a resolution that seeks both to seat mainland China and to expel Formosa. The only way which we can give legitimate expression to our one China-one Formosa policy is in the manner we followed last year.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): As a supplementary question, in view of the remarks made from time to time by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in supporting this one China-one Formosa policy as expressed a moment ago, will the Canadian delegation be presenting its own resolution to the United Nations this fall?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have stated what our position is and what procedure we intend to follow.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): As a further supplementary question, is it the intention of Canada to support this year's Albanian resolution at the United Nations?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Speaker, I said we would abstain.

MANPOWER

REPORTED BREAKDOWN IN RETRAINING PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, but in his absence I should like to direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the serious breakdown in the government's manpower retraining program as reported in today's Globe and Mail, what steps does the government intend to take to rectify this situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that his question is much too wide and should not be asked in this form at this time.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF P.F.R.A. AND ARDA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his capacity as house leader. A few days ago I asked him whether he would consult with the other members of the government and bring forward to the agriculture committee the recent report of the Economic Council of Canada on the economic impact of ARDA, P.F.R.A. and M.M.R.A. Is the minister now in a position to report to the house in respect of what action has been taken?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the matter of a reference to the committee is one for the respective ministers, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, in consultation with the chairman of the committee. I have begun this process of consultation to determine whether there is any desirability of making a reference to the standing committee on agriculture, forestry and rural development. If so I would be quite happy to do my part.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the Economic Council of Canada reports to the Minister of Finance, and in view of the fact that he has now received a copy of this report, will the minister table this report in the house in order to facilitate its reference to the appropriate committee?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the question of the hon. gentleman is based on a false assumption. The Economic Council of Canada does not report to me.

[Later:]

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the Minister of Finance was good enough to remind me it is the Minister of National Revenue who is responsible for the Economic Council of Canada. Since I believe he is waiting to answer my question as to whether he will table this report in the house in order to facilitate its reference to the appropriate committee, perhaps he might be given an opportunity to do so at this time.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): It is a wrong guess again. The Economic Council of Canada reports to the Prime Minister.

HARBOURS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—DEVELOPMENT OF PORT AT ROBERTS BANK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. It is based on a news report which appeared in a west coast paper recently. I should like to ask the minister whether any negotiations are being carried on between the federal government and the province of British Columbia regarding the development of a super port at Roberts bank on the west coast.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question should be placed on the order paper.

FREIGHT RATES

CREAM—INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION OF NEW RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Earlier the minister indicated that there is a postponement until December 5 of the new rates applicable to the shipment of cream by rail. Will the railways now be permitted to implement these new rates on December 5, or are there further developments in the matter?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): There has been a further postponement, Mr. Speaker, in order to give interested parties an opportunity to get together to discuss the situation further.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Could the minister indicate for how long the further postponement is?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am informed it is for 60 days from December 5.

POLLUTION

INQUIRY AS TO PREPARATION OF NATIONAL ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I should like to ask the minister whether we are any closer to having a national clean air act for Canada than we were when we discussed this matter in the house a month ago.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Recently the whole question of pollution was dealt with at a meeting of the dominion council of health, which is composed of representatives of all the provinces. At this meeting considerable progress was made in outlining what could be an appropriate federal role in this whole field. This role is very close to the point of view I had expressed in the house. This has been very helpful, and at the present time we are preparing further material in the department for consideration by the government.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he would refer this matter to the appropriate committee of the House of Commons, as well as Bill No. C-25, an act to control air pollution, standing in my name.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the relevant standing committee is the standing committee on health and welfare. At present this committee is fully occupied with consideration of another important subject matter. Following that we are considering having the matter of cigarette advertising sent to that committee. In view of these circumstances it might not be helpful at this time to send the subject matter of pollution to this committee, but I assure my hon. friend that action is being taken and consideration is being given along the lines of my answer.

NATIONAL PARKS

REQUEST FOR LEGAL DECISION RESPECTING LEASEHOLD QUESTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the chairman of the committee on northern affairs and national resources. Would the chairman convene the committee to consider the entirely reasonable request from the western parks to have the leasehold question referred by the government to the courts for adjudication?

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very pleased to call a meeting of the committee, but we must have the authority of the house first. No business has been referred to the committee as yet.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR JOINT MEETING OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND DEFENCE COMMITTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the statement last week by the minister that he had discussed with the Secretary of State for External Affairs the advisability of holding a joint meeting of the two House of Commons committees, the committee on national defence and the committee on external affairs, may I ask whether there is now any possibility that this joint meeting will be held before the Christmas recess in order to discuss NATO and NORAD problems.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I understand that this matter is now being taken up by the chairmen of the committees.

TRADE

TOBACCO—POSSIBLE INCREASED IMPORTS FROM SOUTH AFRICA AND RHODESIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will the devaluation of the British pound accelerate the recent sharp increase in the importation of flue cured tobacco from South Africa and Rhodesia?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that this is the type of information which should be given to the house at the time of motions by way of a general statement.

HOUSING

MONTREAL—AVAILABILITY OF HABITAT '67 AT EXPO SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Since there is a certain shortage of housing in Montreal, and since Habitat '67 is almost completely vacant, will the minister state whether C.M.H.C. intend to take over Habitat '67 or whether they would consider making it available to low and middle income families at least on a part time basis?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): I would have to take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct this question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister now in a position to say whether legislation will be presented at this session to provide for raising the ceiling and increasing the benefit rates under the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have said several times that it has been my hope that such legislation would be introduced this year. In view of the progress we have made with the legislative timetable it looks extremely doubtful that we will be able to deal with it before Christmas.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the legislation not be put on the order paper, even if it cannot be reached in the house?

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

OTTAWA—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION TENDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Desmond Code (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport and ask whether Canadian National Railways have entered into the construction business; and are they given special consideration when they tender on certain jobs here in the city of Ottawa?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This somewhat mysterious question might be placed on the order paper.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice, or in their absence anybody in the cabinet who can might answer it. Since Reginald John Colpitts, who killed a penitentiary guard in Dorchester, New Brunswick, has hanged himself in the British Columbia penitentiary, I would like to ask this question. Had he completed his rehabilitation course, or had he just heard the murderers of prison guards might be hanged in the future?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and ask whether he would confer with his counterpart in France, and request that the president of France be committed to an institution before he further damages international relations.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's comments are unparliamentary. If the hon. member will consult our precedents and rules he will know that it is not in order to comment upon or refer to the head of a friendly state in that type of language.

INDUSTRY

COPPER—PRICE INCREASE BY NORANDA COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Registrar General. I should like to ask whether he had referred to him the question I asked last Friday; and if so, is the minister prepared to answer it now?

Hon. John N. Turner (Registrar General): Mr. Speaker, in view of the position already taken by the Minister of Finance I think the question should properly be directed to him.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. On Friday last I asked whether the minister would consider recalling the committee on consumer prices in order that the effect on the whole economy of these increases in the price of copper could be investigated by that committee. My question did not refer merely to the price of copper. Is the minister in a position to do that now?

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, I am on record as being in favour of having that committee reconvened. With regard to the terms of reference, I am currently discussing them with the two co-chairmen and the Prime Minister.

CORPORATE AND CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT, APPOINTMENT OF PERSONNEL, ETC.

The house resumed, from Friday, November 17, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-161, to establish a department of corporate and consumer affairs—Mr. Turner—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of the whole on Bill No. C-161, to establish a department of corporate and consumer affairs. When the committee rose on Friday, November 17, clause 6 of the bill was under consideration. On that day the Chair was given notice of four amendments to clause 6 of the bill. The first amendment was by the hon. member for Yukon.

On clause 6—Duties re consumer affairs.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I have reread what happened on Friday, November 17—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt on a point of order just to have a matter made clear. When these various amendments were suggested a week ago Friday, I raised the question whether it would be possible for us to make amendments to subclause 1 after subclause 2 had been dealt with. We are quite prepared for subclause 2 to be dealt with first provided our rights are protected. Is that the understanding of the Chair?

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, our standing orders provide that there shall be clause by clause consideration of a bill in committee of the whole. We are now engaged in discussing and dealing with clause 6 of the bill. I assume, therefore, we can deal with any part of clause 6 and amend any part of it.

The amendment put forward by the hon. member for Yukon, which I propose to move now if it is necessary to move it formally, is one that to some extent deals with matters raised in amendments put forward by other hon. members. I suggest that we deal with them all at the same time. I suggest that we deal with clause 6, subclauses 1 and 2, and when the Chair comes to put the amendments I assume those to subclause 1 will be put first followed by the amendment to subclause 2. I assume there will be no objection to this course being followed if the Chair feels so disposed.

The Chairman: Order. I think it is the usual practice to consider the clause before the committee as one question. At the moment there is just one question before the committee, which is clause 6 of the bill. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Yukon was in respect of subclause 2 of clause 6. There would be no objection by the Chair to having that amendment considered. On the other hand, if it is the wish of the committee to proceed subclause by subclause, that is a matter for the committee to decide. However, I should point out that if the amendment which is to be proposed by the hon. member for Peace River were carried it might necessitate a redrafting of the amendments proposed by other hon. members.

Mr. Knowles: That is quite satisfactory, Mr. Chairman. We are not asking to deal with subclause 1 before we deal with subclause 2. We just want to make sure that we still have the right to deal with subclause 1 provided the situation is not altered by the adoption of the proposed amendment to subclause 2.

Mr. Turner: On the same point of order, Mr. Chairman, we intend to argue the admissibility of two of the four amendments. Those two amendments relate to subclause 1. I refer to the one having to do with a prices review board and the other having to do with a corporation empowered to deal with drugs. I leave it to the discretion of the Chair, but I want to reserve my right to argue the admissibility of those amendments when they are put before us.

Mr. Knowles: That is par for the course.

The Chairman: Order. I would suggest to the committee that we deal with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Peace River. If hon. members wish to make a contribution regarding the validity of these amendments, perhaps we should have those contributions in the order in which the amendments are placed before the committee.

Mr. Baldwin: In that event, Mr. Chairman, I shall restrict my remarks to the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Yukon which I assume I must now formally move. I would call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the amendment was not actually put. Is it the view of the Chair that this should be done now or should I wait until the conclusion of my remarks? I want to make sure that the amendment is in fact put. This comment was made by the Chairman with regard to the matter, as recorded on page 4428 of Hansard:

Perhaps I should point out to the committee that the suggested amendment by the hon. member for Yukon has been read but has not been officially put by the Chair.

I move this particular amendment now.

The Chairman: Order, please. The amendment as moved by the hon. member for Yukon was read by the Chair. If the hon. member wishes me to put it formally now, I shall do so. It was moved by the hon. member for Yukon:

That subclause (2) of clause 6 of Bill C-161 be amended by deleting the said clause and substituting in its place the following:

Shall I dispense?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, the agreement which we have made will make it simpler for me to deal with this matter now. I do not intend to address any of my remarks to the amendments moved by members of the New Democratic party. I will wait until they are dealt with by the Registrar General. With respect to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Yukon, I think the arguments in its favour have been well put. I will simply summarize them and leave the matter there in view of the length of time which has already been taken in dealing with this measure.

It is the view of this party that this bill is innocuous, that there is no need for it to be brought forward, that all the powers which are purported to be given to the minister and the government are contained in other legislative proposals, that it is merely window-dressing and that it will simply serve as a peg upon which will be hung excessive expenditures. But in order to try to make something out of the bill, an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Yukon. It provides that the minister will have the right not only to engage in research but also in investigation.

Particular reference is made to price increases. It is our view that the primary interest of the consumers lies in the increases in prices which have taken place all across the country. We doubt very much that the federal government has sufficient authority in this regard, and we have made this plain during the course of speeches we have already made. It is our view that the government laboured mightily to produce a misshapen, distorted and twisted mouse with its head where the tail should be and its tail where the head should be. The hon. member for Essex West attempted to reform that distortion by an amendment which put consumer affairs at the head and corporate affairs at the tail. However, this did not have more appeal to us so far as the bill is concerned. We are simply asking that the minister pursue the right of investigation in order to try to determine to what extent the federal government may be able to help the sorely pressed consumer at the present time.

We have made particular reference to price increases in our amendment and in the concluding part have suggested that the minister should report to parliament with his recommendations with regard to this matter. We feel that the government is insinuating through this measure that it may be able to work its way into fields in which it has no jurisdiction.

The problem of fraud has been mentioned. Every sale of an article is a question of civil rights. Every province has legislation dealing with the sale of goods and every province has statutes dealing with fraud. Unless these frauds amount to criminal acts they lie exclusively in the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. Restrictive trade practices lie exclusively within the jurisdiction of the federal government. Consumer credit is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments and advertising, unless it is of a misleading nature, can be the subject of criminal proceedings. Unless the government is prepared to declare that certain acts are criminal in their nature and will provide penalties for them, it has no jurisdiction in that field.

Under this amendment we propose that the government examine this issue to see to what extent it can, within the framework of the legislation and of clause 6 of the bill, discover whether there is any possibility in conjunction with the provinces of dealing with the very serious problem of price increases. We recognize that the problem of price increases lies within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance and not within that of the Registrar General. As a result of a motion made not so long ago by the Leader of the Opposition we are forbidden to comment on the bad management of the government which has brought about price increases. It was obvious by the vote which was taken at the time that the majority of the supporters of the government, including the Registrar General, accept the fact that the government has managed the finances of this country in a most efficient, economic and careful way and that if price increases have taken place it is someone else's fault and not that of the government.

This being the case, I cannot touch on that matter, but I can say that with the spiral of inflationary price increases which is going on, both because of the government's actions as well as in spite of them, people may take advantage of the situation to establish wage and price increases which are not consistent with the requirements of the time. This may be an area where the government, after suitable investigation in the closest co-operation with the provincial governments, might delegate to some board sufficient responsibility to deal with this issue in cases where there have been glaring and flagrant abuses leading to an inflationary spiral of costs of goods, services and wages.

We move this amendment with that in mind. If the government really intends to do something, then I suggest that the minister can well lend his support to the amendment, and I ask members of the committee to support it.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, we have looked at this amendment with the care which its author indicated it deserves. I want to say at the outset that we reject completely the initial remarks of the hon. member for Peace River which were of course merely an echo of those made by his colleague, the hon. member for Yukon, when he presented the case of the official opposition at the second reading stage, namely, that the department will have no teeth.

I said in closing the debate on second reading—and with your consent, sir, I think I should answer the argument advanced again today—that this bill does not set forth the entire consumer program of the government. It does not elaborate or describe the powers which will be made available to the department to enforce a consumer program. It empowers the minister and the department to protect consumer interests. It empowers the minister and the department to initiate new measures having to do with consumer interests. The teeth are already in legislation on the statute books of Canada, and this legislation spans the authority of several government departments. The purpose of this bill is to co-ordinate government policy which affects the consumer, to render this legislation more enforceable, to ensure that enforcement is applied on a more uniform basis and to ensure that the legislation is observed and enforced from the point of view of the consumer.

There is a good deal of legislation already on the books, Mr. Chairman. I mention section 306 of the Criminal Code relating to misleading advertising, section 33 (c) of the Combines Investigation Act involving the same subject, and the food and drug regulations. There are the series of measures relating to the misleading description of agricultural and fisheries products and legislation under the Canada Corporations Act relating to the disclosure to the public of information in the hands of financial institutions. This and other legislation which we would propose as the department assumes its authority will constitute the teeth in favour of the consumer in so far as this bill is concerned.

This bill gives the department the muscle to exercise and to clamp down with those teeth. So any argument suggesting that the bill does not contain teeth flows from a misreading of the nature of the bill and what it is attempting to do, namely, to co-ordinate and enforce on a uniform basis the existing legislation on the books and give it a perspective, an orientation which is, primarily, the protection of the Canadian consumer.

Turning to the wording of the amendment itself, I may say that what the amendment purports to do is add the power of investigation to clause 6, subclause (2) concerning the power of research. I suggest that what the amendment purports to do, if accepted by this committee, is completely illusory. The minister already has the power of investigation under the provisions of clause 5 of the bill relating to combines and bankruptcy. These powers of investigation are found within the Bankruptcy Act and the Combines Investigation Act. The difficulty here is that this clause would attempt to add new powers of investigation without in any way indicating how these powers would be co-ordinated with the powers that already exist.

I want to say as well that the great difficulty with this amendment is that it purports to give the power of investigation without in reality conferring any power to investigate because any power to investigate should provide the terms of reference and the consequences of such an investigation. Where is the power to compel witnesses? Where is the power to limit the nature and extent of the investigation or inquiry? Where are the limits placed upon the invasion of private rights? In every statute setting forth specific powers of investigation, the limits of the investigation are carefully set forth. Thus, in section 3(a) of the Bankruptcy Act the powers are indicated in clear terms relating to the conduct, dealings and transactions of the bankrupt concerned, the causes of the bankruptcy and the disposition of the property. The powers of inquiry are specifically set forth in that section. There are no powers contemplated in this amendment to implement the investigation.

In the Combines Investigation Act section 8 gives the director of research and investigation power of inquiry but the limits of that inquiry are carefully set forth in part V of that statute as the subject matter of the investigation—offences in relation to trade, conspiracy, mergers and monopolies, price fixing, resale price maintenance, refusal to sell or supply goods. In other words, the terms of reference protect the subject from undue encroachment by anyone launching an inquiry. I want to suggest to the committee in the strongest terms that this amendment is toothless because while it sets forth an assumed power of investigation, in fact it confers no power upon the minister at all, no power to compel witnesses, no power to compel attendance, no power to compel the production of documents. On the other side, and even more important, it does not set limits on the terms of reference which would protect the individual from undue encroachment by an inquiry.

I want to say that when we were discussing this bill amongst ourselves we discussed whether or not it should have a power of inquiry. One of the difficult aspects was how to limit that power of inquiry in strict terms of reference, how to define the subject matter over which the inquiry would be conducted without invading severely the rights of people and institutions to resist an inquiry that might be an unwarranted encroachment upon those rights by one minister granted this power within a statute. I want to say that the power of inquiry already exists in the government under the Inquiries Act, and should matters arise of sufficient importance in the opinion of the government to cause such an inquiry to be launched, then the government would do that. However, one must be very careful, I submit to the committee, how one confers the power of inquiry upon a single minister, and it should be done only under a provision which carefully restricts and defines the terms of reference.

Another point of disturbance was the constitutional limitation of such an inquiry power. The hon. member for Peace River quite properly outlined to the committee some areas that lie within provincial jurisdiction and some areas that are shared between the federal and provincial authorities. The consumer interest is shared by both federal and provincial authorities. The purpose of this bill is to confer upon one minister the authority to co-ordinate federal policy relating to consumer interests with those authorities having the same jurisdiction within provincial governments. I want to say that an unlimited power of investigation might well provoke constitutional problems. If a minister were unilaterally to embark upon an inquiry which transgressed upon the constitutional field of the provinces, and this amendment makes no reference to limiting the scope of an inquiry, this might well involve challenges in the courts.

In rejecting this amendment, therefore, I want to say that we have not yet fully explored the scope of the existing legislation or its administration and if it should happen, after we become more aware of the responsibilities conferred upon this department, that a specific inquiry power should be lodged in one minister, at that time we would come back to parliament to ask for it. However, we would ask for it in terms that would give the minister power to investigate, power to compel attendance, power to produce documents, power to swear witnesses, and even more important from a civil rights point of view, with definite limits to the scope of the power of inquiry.

Our primary objection, then, to this amendment is that it tends to give the department or the minister the illusion of having an investigatory power, because it uses the word "investigation", without the authority to implement that power. If "investigation" is to have the same meaning as "research", then the addition of the word is unnecessary. But if the word "investigation" is to have the meaning of the word "inquiry", then it is insufficiently defined either in terms of supplementing that power with statutory authority or, more importantly, from the point of view of limiting that power as it relates to the civil rights of citizens. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we would have to reject the amendment.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I have just one comment to make. The minister has referred to illusions. I do not think one more illusion would hurt the bill because it is full of illusions. I would point out that the wording of the amendment is:

> For the purpose of carrying out his duties and functions under this act, the minister may undertake research and investigation into matters to which the powers, duties and functions of the minister extend—

The wording of the amendment follows the same wording the minister has in the bill. Clause 5 says:

> The duties, powers and functions of the minister extend to and include all matters over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, not by law assigned to any other department, branch or agency—

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the wording of the amendment follows that of the bill. We contend that the power the minister has, which is limited to the matters that are his by jurisdiction and by law and are within the limits of the parliament of Canada, shall simply include the power of investigation.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I can see there is a half-hearted response on the part of my hon. friend from Peace River, but the basis of our objection is that this would constitute misrepresentation to the consumer. If "investigation" were equivalent to "research", then its inclusion would add nothing. "Investigation" might give the people of Canada the idea that the minister had the power of inquiry, and there is no such power in the bill or the amendment.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I am rather disappointed at the minister's reply and his comments on the amendment. I appreciate the difficulty he raises regarding powers that are not spelled out. I had hoped that in the spirit of trying to get all-party agreement on a department of consumer affairs he would have made some effort to acknowledge that this is a good principle, that it is advisable to adopt it, and that he would consider the amendment if the powers were more specifically spelled out. But simply to say that the amendment confers no powers though the idea has some merit is not a suitable answer.

The minister's interest and concern in the field of advertising are well known and we have been watching to see what the minister's attitude would be as hon. members introduced these amendments attempting to put more teeth into the legislation. We have been waiting to see whether he would accept them in order to implement the purpose he has expressed in some of his speeches.

I should like to thank the minister for sending me a copy of his speech at the annual general meeting of the Institute of Canadian Advertising on September 22 last and I should like to read an excerpt. The minister had this to say:

> We intend to analyse the advertising process and its effect upon the economy and consumer. We intend to pursue the question of the role of advertising in Canada. What I say today are some tentative and preliminary ideas—

That is fine, Mr. Chairman; the minister has not committed himself too far. But what I want to know is, does he intend to do anything about these ideas? The minister goes on to say:

> The power of advertising is undisputed. But power must be balanced by responsibility.

How does the minister intend to effect this responsibility? How does he intend to ensure that advertising will be responsible when he is not willing to put powers of that type into this legislation? I would have expected that he would be the first to insist that the legislation have as many powers as possible so as to assist him in the work he has indicated he wants to do.

There is a disappointment with this legislation, Mr. Chairman, but not for the reason given by the minister. In effect, what the amendment moved by the hon. member for Yukon tries to do is to set up what is essentially a prices review board but in an emasculated form. I hope that when our amendment to establish a prices review board is brought forward the government will have the courage to go all the way and set up a board which will offer reasonable prospects of accomplishing some of the objectives that are listed in this amendment.

We intend to support the principle of a prices review board as it relates to research and investigation at every available opportunity during the course of this debate and for that reason, Mr. Chairman, we will support the amendment.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I want to comment briefly on the statement of the minister with reference to the amendment that is before the committee. I have not taken part in the discussion up to the present time but I agree heartily with the spokesmen of this party who in their various statements have suggested that the legislation we are considering at the moment is what one might call a snare and a delusion. It presents a proposition to the house, and through the house to the people of Canada, that something effective is going to be done in the interest of consumer affairs. Yet, Mr. Chairman, as we examine the legislation we discover it does not include any powers that make it possible to deal effectively with the consumers' problems that have become increasingly obvious across the nation, particularly since the housewives of Canada began protesting so vociferously.

The minister in his remarks this afternoon has confirmed the viewpoint that clause 6 is merely enabling. As the minister himself says, its function is to co-ordinate. If this is true, it seems to me that he would welcome any amendments that would make it possible to overcome this obvious deficiency in the legislation and assist in putting some teeth into the bill. The minister has indicated that it lacks teeth, that it really has no powers to deal with the problems confronting consumers at the moment. As I look through clause 6 that is certainly the impression I get.

Mr. Turner: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I did not say that the bill lacked teeth. I said the purpose of the bill was to put all the teeth in one mouth.

Mr. Dinsdale: I listened very carefully to the minister's comments, Mr. Chairman. He said he was going to put all his eggs in one basket or, if I might change the expression, that he is going to put all the teeth into one mouth. At the same time he talked out of the other side of the mouth and criticized the amendment, which was put forward with the sole purpose of providing something other than a study group approach to the problem. Looking at clause 6 (1) one sees that it has four paragraphs which piously express the hope that the minister will:

• (4:00 p.m.)

(a) initiate, recommend or undertake programs designed to promote the interests of the Canadian consumer;

That is extremely vague language:

(b) co-ordinate programs ... designed to promote the interests of the Canadian consumer;

(c) promote and encourage the institution of practices or conduct tending to the better protection of the Canadian consumer—

By enacting paragraph (c) the government obviously hopes to improve the ethics of business in this nation. That is the interpretation I place on the wording. Paragraph (d) reads:

(d) undertake, recommend or assist in programs to assist the Canadian consumer to be more fully informed about goods and services offered—

And so on. These are all pious platitudes and do nothing in a legislative form to resolve the problem that the minister professes the legislation is put forward to deal with. It seems to me that the new department of consumer and corporate affairs is to be a study group much along the lines of the Economic Council of Canada. That body studies the basic economic questions and makes recommendations to parliament and to the government in the form of an annual report. The government, as regularly as the reports are made, does not accept the recommendations of those reports.

Though the minister has committed himself and has said that he rejects the amendment of the official opposition, I hope that he will change his mind and at least permit a gesture toward putting some teeth into the legislation. Co-operation and study are not good enough; those activities do not deal with the real problems. When the minister referred to having all the teeth in one mouth no doubt he was referring to the existing legislation which deals with combines, mergers, monopolies and restraint of trade. Presumably the minister thinks that the existing legislation which deals with these problems of consumer affairs is adequate.

Speaking from my experience in this house over the past 16 years, it seems to me that one of the great difficulties in protecting the consumer arises because the legislation designed to deal with combines, mergers, monopolies and restraint of trade, lacks teeth. I remember that one of the first debates in which I participated in this house had to do with the abolition of resale price maintenance. That was in the fall of 1951. The measure was put forward by the Liberal government of the day. It was thought that the measure would resolve all consumer problems with respect to constantly rising prices. Actually the legislation has been instrumental in eliminating more and more smaller merchants and wholesalers in the field, leaving the larger operators to range freely in this important area of the business community. Prices, instead of coming down, have constantly soared upward and onward. Anyone who has taken the trouble to read the various reports on the extensive investigations into purported monopolies, combines and restraint of trade activities in Canada is forced to conclude that these investigations also amount to little more than studies in depth. Existing legislation has no teeth.

If this legislation establishing a new department is to be more than a snare and delusion it must have teeth. There are no teeth in the existing legislation which is designed to deal with monopolies, mergers, combines and so on. Admittedly, the amendment before the house will not solve all problems. It is, however, an attempt to make clause 6 more effective.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Would the hon. member permit a question? Under the present Combines Investigation Act the financial penalties are unlimited in amount. Injunctions may be obtained to prevent further breaches. What additional teeth would the hon. member propose?

An hon. Member: Well done.

Mr. Dinsdale: I will not debate the Combines Investigation Act at the moment. I merely indicate that during all the years I have been in this house that act has not been effective. Though the hon. member has been here but a short time, he must be fully aware of its ineffectiveness. If the government is purporting to put teeth into the legislation it is bringing forward which, it is hoped, will rectify the obvious ineffectiveness of existing legislation, I think the government ought to write the appropriate wording into the bill. It should not be satisfied merely with the pious platitutes I have referred to already.

Mr. Nesbitt: Otherwise they are false teeth.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): What penalty can be higher than an unlimited penalty? What additional sanctions would he propose?

Mr. Nesbitt: False teeth.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, though the amendment of the official opposition is weak I rise to support it. The minister, by rejecting this amendment and by refusing to say—and so far he has refused to say—what specific steps the government is prepared to take when this department is established, has confirmed something that we have been claiming which has been borne out by recent events. This department is nothing but a promotional gimmick and is as false as most of the advertising gimmicks that are used to sell soap. The only real purpose of establishing this department is to give the minister, as I have said before, a forum in which he may promote his candidacy for the leadership of the Liberal party.

During the last week we have seen what has been going on in this country. Noranda Mines increased its copper prices. We have been lectured by ministers of the crown such as the Minister of Finance, by editorial writers of large newspapers, by financial analysts in our daily newspapers and by others about the danger of inflation and about the danger of pricing ourselves out of the world market. We have been told to use restraint. I am disturbed that most of these lectures seem to be directed at one group in our country, the ordinary citizens, the ordinary workers. Essentially, the workers are being told: For goodness sake, make sure that your union does not demand too much because the economy cannot afford it. Such exhortations would have a good deal more force if those making them would say something when business increases its prices and profits, particularly when there is no justification for price increases.

On November 21, six days ago, the Toronto Globe and Mail reported that Noranda Mines proposed to increase the price of copper from 47 cents to 51 cents a pound. From that day to this, questions have been asked in this house almost daily in an attempt to find out what the government proposes to do. We received the ingenuous answer a few days ago that Noranda was being very generous in raising its price by only 10 per cent and not to 60 cents a pound. I suppose we could say "Thank God for small mercies".

Why has this increase been decided upon? There is a simple answer. There is at the present time, and there has been for some five months, a strike directly affecting all the copper mines in the United States, and as a result of the tremendous demand for copper brought about by prosperity in the United States and the war in Viet Nam there is an acute shortage of that metal. There is a demand for copper almost regardless of price. So Noranda and other producers such as Hudson Bay Mining and International Nickel can charge any price they wish.

What are the effects of this increase likely to be? In the issue of the Globe and Mail to which I have already referred, that of November 21, the reactions of some of the users of copper are reported. We find Mr. James Thomas, vice president of Phillips Cables of Brockville, saying that the increase is "definitely inflationary." He is reported as commenting:

> The increase and subsequent additions will mean a 20 to 30 per cent increase in the cost of wire and cable.

He went on to say that an addition in the cost of primary metals would obviously be felt in the prices of finished goods. Mr. E. W. Darby, secretary of Pioneer Electric which manufactures transformers and switchgear apparatus, said he was shocked by the news. The increase would force the company into an increasing use of aluminum.

Copper is used in almost every manufacturing and industrial process in this country. One thinks immediately of power generators and the lines which carry power, of refrigerators and other appliances. It is hard to mention an item in which copper is not used. One might think that this price increase was forced upon the company, and upon others which will undoubtedly follow suit, by falling profits or higher costs. But the figures which appear in the Financial Post surveys do not indicate this to be the case. We find that Noranda Mines made a profit of around $31 million in 1964. In 1965 it had risen to $36 million and in 1966 to $43 million, an increase of almost 50 per cent in three years.

Here are similar figures with respect to the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company. In 1963 net profits amounted to $11 million. In 1964 the profit amounted to $13 million and in 1965 to just under $16 million. Take Sherritt Gordon which has a mine at Lynn Lake in my own province. In 1963 profits amounted to $2,710,000, in 1964 to $5 million and in 1965 to $5,400,000. Again, this represents an increase of just over 50 per cent in three years. Increases in prices imposed by these companies and similar increases on the part of every other copper company in Canada are bound to have an effect on the cost of living about which every minister has been talking. If the hon. gentleman and the new department cannot do something about this situation either through direct legal means or through his powers of persuasion, if he cannot somehow induce these companies to stop robbing the public, he might as well forget all the pious speeches made by the Minister of Finance and others about restraint for the sake of holding down the cost of living, because if the working people of this country are faced by price increases such as those which will be brought about by this increase in the price of copper they will demand increases in wages to offset the increases in prices and the increases in the profits of these large companies.

It is not enough for the minister to reject the amendment moved by the hon. member for Yukon. I think he should tell us what he proposes to do about the highway robbery which is being perpetrated by the copper companies of this country.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I want to say a few words in connection with the amendment proposed by the official opposition. We in this corner were very disappointed to hear it so quickly rejected by the minister. The amendment makes only a mild proposal. The minister has indicated all along that he is not yet thoroughly muscled, that the law needs teeth, that he will come out as the champion of the consumer as much as he is able. Yet even when an amendment with rather weak teeth is presented to him today we find that far from being glad to have it he rapidly backs away from it. He does not want these teeth and he has made it abundantly clear that when it is our turn in this corner to try to put genuine teeth in this legislation he will reject our proposals as well. If the minister is backing away from any kind of teeth in the legislation, it is a very peculiar thing.

Why is he backing away from amendments of this type? The amendment proposed by the official opposition is, after all, not mandatory. It is permissive. If the minister backs away from an amendment which merely suggests that he may have certain powers, there is something very wrong about this situation. We suspect that the minister wishes every vestige of doubt removed with regard to whether he even has teeth in the legislation. In these circumstances I, along with all the consumers of this country, am led to believe that the minister really does not want teeth in the law that he can use. The minister does not want the legislation to have teeth in it. Why not? Some hint may be found in a statement which appeared in the press last spring when this department was first mooted, to the effect that the minister was very anxious not to frighten business. I do not think that business is that tender and shrinking a violet. If the minister is going to champion the consumers he should realize that he needs some kind of armament, some teeth, if there is to be any control exercised over the cost of living.

If the minister is going to back away from this mild amendment moved by the official opposition he will simply be saying to the consumers, "Sure, I want to be called minister of corporate and consumer—I beg your pardon—consumer and corporate affairs, but for goodness sake don't give me any power. I would be embarrassed because I don't intend to use that power." The minister cannot have it both ways. If he is going to champion the consumers the legislation must have the necessary teeth. If he refuses to accept those teeth then he is backing away before the fight starts. There is no alternative.

This is a very mild amendment from the official opposition. As a matter of fact the hon. member for Brandon-Souris referred to it as merely a gesture. I agree that it does not contain anything more than the beginning of teeth, but we are going to support it because any teeth are better than none.

The minister has indicated that under the rules he will contest the validity of the amendment which we will be moving, but I suggest to him that either on the present amendment or later on our amendment he should indicate what kind of teeth he will accept. If he rejects this amendment and later argues against the admissibility of ours, without indicating what he himself will do to put teeth into what somebody has called this namby-pamby collection of pious platitudes, then the warning signals will be up for the consumers throughout this country. I earnestly urge him not to reject our amendment which we believe will infinitely strengthen the armament at his disposal.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a specific question in connection with the matter which I raised earlier. Is it his intention to meet with the officials of Noranda Mines to discuss with them last week's announced four cents per pound increase in the price of copper? If not, has he other plans to deal with this announced increase?

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance has already indicated that he has been making inquiries into this price increase. Since it relates to the general economic policy of the government the matter is properly in his hands. Of course I am very concerned about the subject matter raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, but in this particular instance the government is being represented by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Orlikow: Is the minister aware of when the Minister of Finance intends to meet with the officials of this company, in the same manner as President Johnson and the late President Kennedy in similar situations urged, indeed demanded that such price increases be restrained? Is this going to be the kind of inquiry we heard about in the past, more particularly with respect to the recent steel price increase, an inquiry which goes on for months and months and with respect to which we do not get an answer until the next price increase is announced?

Mr. Turner: I am sure that since the Minister of Finance took the house into his confidence he will report in due course on what action he was able to take.

Mr. Saltsman: Will the minister use his influence to see that the consumer prices committee is immediately reconvened so that it can call witnesses and look into the copper price situation? Since the minister seems determined not to accept any teeth in this legislation that he could use, I would point out that that committee would have the power to call witnesses and hear argument with respect to the copper price increase. I ask him to consider my suggestion seriously and give a favourable reply so that the committee on consumer prices can get to work immediately.

Mr. Turner: I have already said in an answer on orders of the day that we are working out terms of reference for a committee on consumer affairs. I want to add that the reason this amendment is being rejected is because it would add no teeth at all. It mentions a power of investigation but really it does not accord any real power and does not put any constitutional limits on the power mentioned in it. The amendment has no teeth.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In that case is it the minister's intention to introduce an amendment which has teeth in it before this bill goes through committee? If this is his sole reason for rejecting this amendment and if the implication is that he wants something with teeth in it, then we hope he will introduce such an amendment.

Mr. Turner: The hon. member was not here when I replied initially to the hon. member for Peace River that our concept of the bill was that it does not set out the entire consumer program or entire legislative enforcement of that program. It is a bill whereby the policy and the program of the government can be administered by one department and one minister. The teeth are there. The bill itself does not contain the complete range of teeth. I repeat that the teeth are there, and it is a question of co-ordinating and administering the law in a uniform fashion.

Mr. Saltsman: While the establishment of a committee on consumer affairs might be very desirable, it is quite evident from what the minister has said that this will take some time. The copper situation is an immediate problem. It can have serious effects in an inflationary situation. If the minister could get the consumer prices committee established immediately it could look into the matter. Why does he not consider this an appropriate action to take at this time?

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Nielsen) negatived: Yeas, 33; nays, 41.

• (4:30 p.m.)

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, we are now about to attempt again to provide teeth for a very reluctant St. Lawrence-St. George as he goes out to battle for the consumers. He says that the teeth are there, but it is a little like the story of the Emperor's Clothes. The emperor and his whole entourage know that the clothes are on them, but to the people on the street they look naked at the present time. We do not know that the teeth are there or that the minister is prepared to have real teeth given to him. The minister recently painted another of his very glowing portraits of poverty when speaking to the Ottawa-Carleton Liberal Association. He made exactly the kind of speech most of us would like very much to make.

The Chairman: Order. The Registrar General on a point of order.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member would indicate to which amendment she is speaking.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): It has to do with the prices review board, the one with teeth.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has not moved an amendment yet. She is speaking to clause 6 of the bill.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I said that it is the one with teeth. I hope I do not have to explain that. As I said, the minister made the kind of speech the other evening which many of us would very much like to make if we had the same number of information diggers and ghost writers at our command, because he gave a very effective summary of the poverty in this country and the terrible deprivation it works upon the low income people. He quoted the following from an article by Alan Philip which appeared in Maclean's magazine:

> If a family cannot afford the kind of housing, clothing, food, medical care and pleasure that the rest of us take for granted, then by our Canadian standards that family is poor.

Then he went on to say:

> Poverty in this country is curable. There is a remedy. I don't say this merely as an act of faith but as a clear prescription for action. The task of our new century is to learn how to solve difficult problems and to put our best efforts in service of building a decent, open society.
> An attack on poverty is the only choice an affluent society has if it is to honour at all the basic ethic of social responsibility and humanism that is part of our western tradition.

We can very well endorse those sentiments, Mr. Chairman. These are the sort of things to which all of us give adherence. I should like to suggest, however, that if the minister thinks he is going to get away in his present job with this sort of tea and sympathy, he is not. What the people in this country want is protection against profiteering. Unless the minister is prepared to accept the power, the teeth and the muscle necessary to give him a chance to bring about these things, he is not getting down to business and is deceiving the people of this country if he tells them he is getting down to business. He is not going to get down to business unless he has the armament necessary to do so.

The minister said that poverty is curable. We want to get down to the business of driving the dragon of poverty out of this country. The amendment I am about to propose is designed to put the sort of teeth in this legislation that it requires. We do not say that it will be all that is required; it is only a start. I do not need to labour this point, but we are saying that we must start by giving publicity to the unconscionable price rises in respect of basic commodities in this country. We must build a climate of public opinion which will make it possible later to bring in legislation against such unconscionable profiteering. Instead of saying that this sort of thing is not possible under the existing powers, I think the minister should be bending every effort to take advantage of what would be possible and to see exactly how far he can go. I do not believe he should hide behind a constitutional excuse. I believe he should come up with a reasonable program. If he did so I do not believe there would be a provincial premier—not excepting mine in British Columbia—who would dare to stand in his way in protecting the public against profiteering in prices.

Consequently, Mr. Chairman, I wish to move the following amendment on behalf of this party:

That subclause (1) of clause 6 of Bill C-161 be amended by adding thereto the following new paragraph:

(e) establish a prices review board with authority to inquire into complaints of price increases in essential commodities, to make its findings public and to take joint action with any of the provinces to deal with price increases that cannot be justified.

I may say that we have already distributed copies in both English and French.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak briefly to this amendment, first in respect to its substance and, second, on the ground of admissibility. On second reading we engaged in a debate involving a prices review board. I outlined to the house then, and would ask the indulgence of the committee to underline now, the fact that the movement of prices is due to many complex factors, many of which are beyond the control of the federal government and many of which are beyond the jurisdiction of any of the governments of Canada. A good many of them, of course, are related to international economic factors, particularly in our vulnerable economy which depends, as it does, on foreign trade for one-quarter of every dollar earned. The movement of prices depends, within the private sector, on wage settlements, on rising costs in other areas and on the production process. In so far as it relates to government spending it depends in large measure not only on spending at the federal level but also on spending at the provincial and municipal levels.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

In 1966, for instance, the federal government spent $6.7 billion on goods and services and at the same time the provincial and municipal governments spent $12.6 billion. Two thirds of every tax dollar spent by governments in Canada on goods and services was spent at the provincial and municipal levels. Despite the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway as to the constitutional limitations upon our ability to control prices, those limitations do exist. In times other than those of emergency or of war the responsibility for the control of prices and wages rests with provincial authority. As I said before, at the federal level we can influence prices in the sense of ensuring that competitive forces are at play. The department has the responsibility for the administration of the Combines Investigation Act, the Patent Act, the Trade Marks Act and other legislation which can inject competition, particularly at the manufacturers' level.

If the purpose of the prices review board is to control prices, which is often indicated by members of the New Democratic party at the hustings level although they would have us believe in the house that its purpose is only to review prices, it would be constitutionally invalid. Such a prices review board would be toothless. As drafted the amendment purports to require the minister to set up a board with the authority to inquire. But the minister cannot give any board real powers of investigation because those powers would have to be spelled out in the Act. But there are no powers in the amendment to compel the attendance of witnesses, to compel the production of documents, to compel testimony to be given. So here again, as I said with respect to the amendment presented by the hon. member for Yukon, the amendment is illusory in this respect.

The proposed amendment envisages board authority to make inquiries but it sets no limits on such inquiries; in other words, it does not set out within its terms what the limits are upon the infringement of civil rights by any such board. It does not set out the limits of any inquiry. It does not tell us just what protection would be given to the average citizen in this country with respect to the powers of inquiry or the invasion of civil rights contemplated here.

The amendment speaks of joint action with the provinces, but joint action of an undetermined kind. What kind of joint action is envisaged? What is meant by the words

"deal with price increases"? Are the provinces to be asked to pass complementary legislation? I remember that when dealing with this matter on second reading the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, the leader of his party, suggested that a prices review board would have to be supplemented by complementary, simultaneous legislation passed by all the provincial governments.

The hon. member thereby admitted that there was a constitutional limitation upon this type of board and that the authority over price control lay with the provinces. Would such a prices review board have a role to play with respect to the major determinants of prices, namely, wages and other incomes? If not, these inquiries would be meaningless. Unless the proposed board is to be purely advisory, it is doubtful that parliament is competent to legislate in this field, and if it is purely advisory the amendment is unnecessary because clause 7 of the bill provides authority to establish advisory boards.

I am not yet convinced that a prices review board would be a practical measure. Do the advantages of such a board outweigh the costs, both monetary and social? Do the actual money costs of setting up such a board, together with the social costs of the delay and the red tape, really justify it?

I wonder whether hon. members of the New Democratic party have thoroughly thought out some of the consequences that might flow from the establishment of such a board. It might cause the setting of artificial prices based on a substantial rise in cost. It might allow any manufacturer to justify a price increase if he could substantiate an increase in cost, without having at the same time to show that he had done everything possible to improve his product, to improve the distribution process, to improve unit productivity, research, and so on.

Since an increase in cost will be primarily, I suppose, a result of an increase in the cost of labour, it might be that a union, knowing a wage increase would justify a price increase before such a prices review board and knowing that this increase in cost would be passed on to the consumer whether or not it was justified by productivity, would be tempted to press for that wage increase. As Professor Beach of McGill University said in a recent speech in Montreal to the Consumer Association of Quebec, there is in a prices review board "a strong built-in tendency to inflation." I want to quote some of his words:

> It may come as a shock to some here when I say that a cost increase is not an adequate justification for a price increase. If costs increase and squeeze profits the industrialist should attempt to improve his product or his process, and only as a last resort will prices be raised—the last resort which may well imply losses and bankruptcy for some.
> The inability to pass on cost increases is a great social control—even uncertainties about the abilities to pass on such costs is important. Thus I am not in favour of a price review board. It has more dangers than promises of success.

It is the opinion of Professor Beach that it has inherent in it as many dangers as it has promises for success. I have grave doubts as to the admissibility of this amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. The minister has discussed at some length the merits of the amendment. I suggest to him that before he opens a procedural argument as to its admissibility he should in courtesy—and I know him to be courteous—give other members an opportunity to discuss the merits of the amendment, particularly those of us who support it. He ought to give us the opportunity to reply to the circuitous argument which he has presented. I suggest that this should take priority over the procedural discussion which the minister is about to introduce. I would like the floor, Mr. Chairman, assuming someone else does not have it, to deal with the merits of the amendment.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I dealt with the merits at some short length in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

Mr. Knowles: At some length.

Mr. Turner: I intended, of course, at the outset to object to the admissibility of the amendment.

Mr. Barnett: But you got carried away by your own eloquence.

Mr. Turner: I got carried away, perhaps, in replying to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I should like to present my argument on the admissibility of the amendment, if that is the wish of the Chair, but I do not wish to limit the discussion.

Mr. Lewis: Why cannot we have a discussion on the merits? Some of us will not be any longer than the minister was. If he wants to attack the admissibility of the amendment, he can do it then.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, if a point of order is being raised surely it must be disposed of before we can go on with any further discussion.

Mr. Turner: I should like to attack the admissibility of this amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Lewis: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that is precisely the point that made me rise. I put it to the minister and other members: Is it fair that the minister should make a speech attacking the amendment and making what in my view were entirely wild, irrelevant and indefensible statements about it, including quoting the remarks of Professor Beach, and then enter into a procedural argument? Should the Chair hold with the minister that the amendment is not in order, the opportunity to reply to him on the amendment itself goes by the board.

I appreciate that one might drag in the argument with relation to the amendment on some other clause, but that is not a good way to deal with it. I know I cannot do anything to stop the minister and I cannot ask you, Mr. Chairman, to stop him; but I am saying to him that if he really wants to be fair to the consumer and to the subject matter before this committee, he ought not to take advantage of his position as minister, make the kind of speech he did and having made it then say, "Really, all of this is out of order because the amendment is out of order."

Mr. Turner: I make it quite clear, Mr. Chairman, that I was going to attack the admissibility of this amendment.

Mr. Lewis: You wanted it to be on record.

Mr. Turner: Had I been called to order I would, of course, have abided by the ruling of the Chair. I made it quite clear at the outset of my remarks that I intended to attack the admissibility of this amendment and I would like your permission to do so, Mr. Chairman.

• (4:50 p.m.)

The first ground is that the amendment is moved to a money bill, which has been preceded by a resolution necessary for the introduction of a money bill, and that the amendment would tend to add to the expenditure of money within the precedents recognized by the house. I refer Your Honour first of all to citation 246, paragraph 3, page 207 of Beauchesne, fourth edition, which reads as follows:

> The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the Crown is that the communication, to which the royal demand of recommendation is attached, must be treated as laying down once for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of a charge, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications. In relation to the standard thereby fixed, an amendment infringes the financial initiative of the Crown, not only if it increases the amount, but also if it extends the objects and purposes, or relaxes the conditions and qualifications expressed in the communication by which the Crown has demanded or recommended a charge. And this standard is binding not only on private members but also on ministers whose only advantage is that, as advisors of the Crown, they can present new or supplementary estimates or secure the royal recommendation to new or supplementary resolutions.

I submit to you, sir, as chairman of the committee that in attempting to add a subclause establishing a prices review board the amendment goes not only beyond the scope of the resolution which preceded the introduction of the bill but also extends the scope, object and purposes of the bill by adding the creation of a new board.

I want to refer Your Honour also to citation 249 (1) found on page 214 of Beauchesne, fourth edition, which reads as follows:

> No cases can be found of any private member in the Canadian Commons receiving the authority of the Crown, through a minister, to propose a motion involving the expenditure of public money. No principle is better understood than the constitutional obligation that rests upon the executive government, of alone initiating measures imposing charges upon the public exchequer. On one occasion, in the English Commons, the consent of the Crown was given to certain formal resolutions proposed by a private member with reference to charges in courts of law to be defrayed out of the consolidated fund. It was thought, however, that any resolution placing a charge on the consolidated fund should be moved by a minister of the Crown, and the more regular procedure was thereupon carried out. It was distinctly affirmed, however, that the member who proposed the motion involving the charge was within his right when he had the sanction of the Crown, but it was generally admitted at the same time that it was better, as a matter of policy, that the proposition should emanate from a responsible adviser of the sovereign.
> The responsibility of recommending applications for pecuniary redress or relief to the consideration of parliament should rest solely upon the executive government, who are strictly accountable for every item of public expenditure, whose especial duty it is, in the interest of the taxpayers, to oppose all unnecessary outlay, and who possess peculiar facilities for investigating into the merits of all pecuniary claims.

The seventeenth edition of May's Parliamentary Practice, dealing with the rules and practices of the British House of Commons, contains citations to the same effect. At page 803 the following sentence is to be found under the heading "Amendments in Committee (or on Report)":

It is, however, necessary to consider the additional restriction resulting from the relation between a bill and its financial resolution, the effect of which is, as stated above, that no amendment may be moved in committee on a bill which would increase the charge beyond the limits authorized by the relevant money resolution, as recommended by the Crown and agreed to in committee and on report.

And at page 805 May states the following:

As explained above (p. 781), it is unnecessary to set out the various ways in which amendments may impose fresh charges. The different kinds of expenditure which are regarded as charges have been tabulated in pp. 781-9. The rules there stated are generally the same for amendments as they are for bills, with the substitution of the relevant money resolution for the existing law as the standard in relation to which the increase of a charge is ascertained. Reference should accordingly be made to the classification of charges contained in pp. 781-9.

Example No. 8 given by May refers to an increase of charge by extension of the purposes of the bill and it reads as follows:

When a bill contains provisions extending the purposes of expenditure already authorized by statute, such provisions may require the Queen's recommendation. The following examples may be given:

The examples are bills in which amendments were attempted extending the scope and object of the bill.

May I say as guidance to Your Honour that a ruling was made by Mr. Speaker as late as November 30, 1966, and is to be found at page 1080 of Votes and Proceedings for November 30, 1966. An amendment in committee was proposed to the medicare bill which, attempted to extend the definition of "medical practitioner". The Chair referred to citation 246 of Beauchesne, fourth edition, and to paragraph 13 of May, seventeenth edition. He ruled the proposed amendment out of order on two grounds, mainly that it extended the purpose and objective of the resolution adopted by the house on July 12. In other words, the ruling was to the effect that the amendment was out of order in that in a bill effecting charges upon the Crown it extended the scope, object, purposes, conditions and qualifications, because the resolution and the bill must be considered as having set once and for all those objectives, conditions, qualifications and principles of the bill.

I should like to refer to one further citation which is to be found in the Journals of the house for November 29, 1949 at page 306. At that time Bill No. 194, an act to encourage and to assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway, was being considered in committee of the whole. Objection was taken in committee to the decision of the Chairman on a point of order and an appeal was made to the whole house. The Speaker resumed the chair and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

When Bill No. 194 was under consideration in committee of the whole, Mr. Argue moved that clause 4, subclause 2, be amended by deleting therefrom the words "fifty per centum" and by substituting therefor the words "seventy-five per centum".

The chairman ruled the amendment out of order on the ground that it increased the financial responsibility of the government. Whereupon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre appealed the ruling of the chairman, and the question being put by Mr. Speaker, "shall the ruling of the Chairman be confirmed", it was decided in the affirmative.

Therefore I wish to submit to Your Honour that the amendment is out of order on the ground that it increases the scope, objects and purposes of a financial bill which was preceded by a resolution. In accordance with the customs of the house, and since the amendment involves an expenditure of money and is beyond the scope of the resolution or of the bill, it is therefore inadmissible.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, before saying a word on the procedural point which the minister has raised I should like your indulgence to deal with some of the remarks he made with regard to the amendment now before the committee, and in doing so I hope to lay a foundation for my suggestion to you on the very simple basis that the minister's lengthy procedural argument should not be accepted in view of some simple words in the resolution to which I shall refer later.

Let me say first, Mr. Chairman, that the minister's extremely circuitous, almost incomprehensible argument, against the amendment now before the committee ignored completely what my colleagues have suggested on a number of occasions is the purpose of our urgent suggestion for the establishment of a prices review board. I say to him that if we were not aware of the fact that the power to control prices is, under our present division of powers in Canada, under provincial jurisdiction, then our amendment would have been of a different type. Then I, for one, would have supported a provision in this legislation that would give some body the power to have selective price control. It is precisely because we know it is not within the jurisdiction of this parliament to impose price controls, in a period such as the present in Canada when we are not at war or in a particualr emergency, that we urge upon the committee and upon the minister, as we have done for some months, the establishment of a prices review board.

Surely it is not very difficult to see the value of such a board, even though it would not have the power to decree that a certain price be lowered or changed. I cannot imagine the minister does not realize the tremendous advantage it would be to the people of Canada if such a board had the authority to make an inquiry in response to complaints against price increases and to publish the evidence it received as well as the results of the inquiry along with some declaration whether or not the price increases were, in all the circumstances, justified. This course would bring public opinion to bear on the vendor, the employer or manufacturer or whoever it may be to lower the price below the unconscionable level which the prices review board might have found the price increases to reach. Surely there is nothing mysterious about this. Why is the minister running away from it? What possible harm could there be in that?

In order to justify his obvious refusal to do anything constructive for the consumers of Canada, in order to justify his obvious determination to clothe himself in raiment which glistens but has no value, he goes into all sorts of irrelevant avenues and talks about all sorts of things that have no relevance to the amendment before us. This is basically a very simple proposition, that this parliament ought to give the government and the minister authority to have some body to look into complaints about price increases, get all the evidence available, look at all the facts available and pronounce whether or not such price increases were justified. This would bring public opinion to bear on unjustified price increases.

The second reason we have urged for many months the suggestion contained in this amendment is precisely our realization that constitutionally this parliament cannot control prices, and our realization also that the federal government has a duty to give some leadership in this field as in any other field. If the government accepted the proposal to set up a prices review board, not to do the kind of nonsensical thing the minister talked about but to be in consultation with the relevant provincial authorities, then the leadership given by the setting up of this board would, in our view, lead to action by the provinces across the country so that you would eventually have a network of laws that would really protect the consumer of Canada.

What is wrong with that? In what way does this suggestion violate logic, the constitution or anything else? In what other way can this parliament give any leadership to end the unjustified price increases than by the establishment of the kind of body which it constitutionally has the authority to establish? The minister talked about there being no limits upon the incursion into the civil rights of a person. This is the second or third time I have heard him cry the common cry about this. Who is going to interfere with civil rights? Do not the people of Canada, does not this parliament, have the right to say to someone who sets out to gouge the consumer in Canada that the reason for his action ought to be made public? He is interfering not only with the civil rights but with the very livelihood of every person living in Canada. Is that not of importance? Does the minister always have to defend the right of corporations to refuse to make public the reasons for their actions when those actions are against the interests of the ordinary person in Canada? What lachrymose arguments; Mr. Chairman. What relevance has civil rights in defending the proposition that is now before the committee and to which the minister addressed himself?

Then the minister quoted as an authority Professor Beach, for whom I have great regard not only because he has the prefix "Professor" before his name but because I have had the privilege of knowing him. A good many people for whom I have the greatest respect, including the minister and Professor Beach, can be in error. The minister and Professor Beach are right if they assume you get a prices review board which is dumb, blind and deaf and does not understand what is happening to the economy of Canada or has not the courage to get advice from experts in the country or anything else that would make a prices review board work.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, this is one of the difficulties in making these suggestions to the government because the way this government chooses, the likelihood is that if the minister accepted the value of such a board we would have the same kind of board as we have had in the Board of Broadcast Governors and similar boards in that it would be composed of defeated Liberal candidates and do precisely what Professor Beach fears.

However, if such a board consisted of men and women of intelligence and understanding of the Canadian economy, they would of course look into the productivity and efficiency factor, the particular situation as well as some figures on cost. What kind of nonsense is it to say that because this board would exist, corporations could give the usual figures on costs and justify what otherwise would be an unjustifiable increase in price? I assume that the board would consist of men and women who would know what causes some of these things. I would assume the board would be composed of people who had at least sufficient elementary economic training or economic experience to know that every time—as a matter of fact this is the history of economic development—there has been a wage increase, almost every time there has been pressure on the economy, the answer has been to have greater and greater technological development resulting in greater and greater productivity resulting in smaller and smaller costs per unit of production. This may well happen even in cases where the prices go up.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, I have been away the last little while as an observer at the United Nations and I was not here when this discussion took place. However, I can think of several occasions when the government's attention has been drawn to what appeared to be totally unjustified increases in the price of copper. These increases were not justified by any considerations whatever in Canada but were imposed by the copper producing companies which took advantage of the pressures on the market resulting mainly from events in the United States, namely, a five or six months old strike in the copper producing industry in that country coupled with the war in Viet Nam. Corporations in Canada have taken advantage of the situation. And not only in Canada, Mr. Chairman, but elsewhere as well. As a matter of fact, the price of copper on the international copper market has increased for no other reason than that the demand is greater than the supply at the moment and it is thus possible to squeeze more profits.

This is the kind of situation that a prices review board would examine. It would clearly show that it was a question of nothing but sheer, gross greed by the corporations involved whose profits are already large enough and have been for some time.

There is nothing in this amendment to suggest that the prices review board inquiry is to be limited to cost. It is to make an inquiry into price increases and would be justified in extending that inquiry and asking questions about efficiency and productivity as well as other factors involved.

At no point, Mr. Chairman, will such a board be meaningless. This body is not advisory in the sense of the advisory council referred to in clause 7 of the bill. Perhaps the closest analogy is that it is intended to be a public body of the same kind as a conciliation board in labour disputes, such as was provided for many decades ago. Everybody knew when it was set up that it could not impose any decision it made or conclusion it reached upon the parties to a dispute. However, it was always believed—and this has proven to be true—that in most cases the recommendation of a conciliation board in a labour-management dispute would carry tremendous weight with the parties, and that the party that ignored the recommendation would be in danger of creating pretty bad public relations with the people of Canada.

With some leadership of the kind I have mentioned, Mr. Chairman, this is the sort of thing that a prices review board would accomplish. Everybody who has studied the developing economy in Canada knows perfectly well that the days of pure competition are gone. So-called free enterprise has been dead for nigh on two or three decades, and the market today is controlled. In this regard I do not rely on my own statements but would draw to the attention of the minister Professor Galbraith's recent book "The New Industrial State". He merely collects together a great deal of information about our developing economy which some of us have read and presented for many years.

When you are dealing, Mr. Chairman, with a market where competition is no longer free, where demands and prices are to large measure controlled, where prices are administered rather than the ideal market prices of the kind envisaged by Smith and Marshall, then only parliaments and governments can do something to make sure that people are not fleeced by high prices, that prices are not increased without justification or reason. Therefore I say that our proposal is within the constitutional competence of parliament and that it can and would do a tremendous amount of good.

With regard to the procedural matter, Mr. Chairman, I will leave it to my hon. friend and colleague from Winnipeg North Centre to deal with the citations. As a practising lawyer between my political excursions inside and outside parliament I have always taken the position that every time there is simple language in a contract or in a statute which is clear and distinct the lawyer who wants to challenge the wording has to do the kind of meandering that the minister did in this case.

Having read the resolution which preceded the bill I should like to make this very simple argument—simple yet to my simple mind conclusive argument. I am not going to refer to any precedents because it seems to me that plain, simple common sense has always been the best legal argument in judicial decisions and should be the best argument in parliamentary decisions as well. The wording of the resolution, which is to be found on page 3067 of Hansard, commences in this way:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a department of corporate and consumer affairs; to provide for the appointment of a minister and a deputy minister and for their duties and powers; to provide that the governor in council may establish a consumer advisory council and other bodies to assist the minister—

I know what the minister's answer is going to be because I am going to give it in a moment. It is true that the resolution refers to other bodies to be established by the governor in council. I realize the minister is going to say that this particular power referred to in the resolution is embodied in clause 7 of the bill. But there is no language that qualifies "other bodies". My simple legal mind tells me that the resolution does contemplate other bodies. A prices review board is another body. I do not have to go into all sorts of circular arguments because the words are there.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the suggestion of establishing another body, which is what a prices review board is, falls directly within the language of the resolution, and it seems to me that citations and references which seek to stretch the meaning of words are unnecessary. The words of the resolution are clear and they mean that this bill may provide for the establishment of an advisory council as well as other bodies. The simple English words indicate to me that a prices review board is another body. Therefore it comes within the resolution.

Mr. Turner: Would the hon. member permit a question at this stage?

Mr. Lewis: Certainly.

Mr. Turner: Would the hon. member not admit what I think he has already admitted, that the words he read in the resolution are reflected in clause 7, and that the power to appoint advisory bodies is given to the governor in council? To attempt to set them up by statute in clause 6 would be going beyond the scope of the resolution.

Mr. Lewis: As I said a minute ago, Mr. Chairman, I thought that was going to be the answer of the minister. However, with great respect, I do not see why logically it is necessary to say that the "other bodies" referred to in the resolution mean only the other bodies referred to in clause 7. Why cannot a prices review board, which is another body, be established in this legislation instead of established by the governor in council under clause 7?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I got the message when my legal friend was speaking that it is not necessary to go to great lengths in quoting precedents, standing orders, and so on, in connection with the point of order. Even before I got that message it was my intention to make only a brief contribution at this point.

The Registrar General has based his case against the admissibility of this amendment mainly on two grounds: first, that in his view it goes beyond the terms of the resolution preceding the bill; second, that it involves an expenditure, and that this is something that cannot be proposed on the motion of a private member. With respect to his first point, the contention that the measure goes beyond the provisions of the resolution that preceded the bill, I wish to go further than my hon. friend from York South and point out that the resoltuion in clear wording forecasts a bill which will provide for a minister and deputy minister, and their duties and powers. In clause 6, I suggest, we are dealing with the duties and powers of the minister and we have the right to move an amendment with respect to what those duties and powers shall be.

I also wish to draw to your attention the last words of the resolution. Perhaps these words are always included in such resolutions for protective reasons; nevertheless they are there and they are as follows:

—and to provide for certain other matters related or incidental thereto.

We suggest that a prices review board is related or incidental to the operation of the bill. I therefore contend that the request for a prices review board is within the general terms of the resolution which was introduced by the minister.

The minister's second point is one that in this parliament is 100 years old. He argued that private members cannot move anything which would involve the expenditure of money. May I remind Your Honour of Mr. Speaker's interesting ruling on Monday, November 13, with respect to a private member's bill which the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier-Lasalle sought to introduce. His bill had to do with printing statutes and other parliamentary documents in both languages. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre questioned the validity of the bill on the ground that it would cost money. Mr. Speaker took the matter under advisement and ruled on Monday, November 13 that, provided the charge involved was not a direct one, and provided it was a charge which was covered under—

Mr. Turner: Would the hon. member please refer to the page number ?

Mr. Knowles: Yes. Page 4165 of Hansard for Monday, November 13, 1967. Perhaps I might read a few of the interesting words of Mr. Speaker. He said:

My conclusion is that the present bill does not fall within that definition. May states that a charge must be new and distinct and that it must be effectively imposed. He adds: "These tests have the effect of excluding from the category of charges a considerable number of matters which prima facie involve expenditure."

In the same vein, Mr. Chairman, I remind you that there are a number of citations in Beauchesne's fourth edition on the point. Your Honour is familiar with them because you have quoted them to us. They can be found in the index to Beauchesne under "Money resolutions, subsidiary charges." Examples are citations 251 and 277 and others. Many citations suggest that where something that a private member is asking for may necessitiate a vote of parliament, or where what is being asked for is not a direct charge, then that matter falls within the category of the sort of thing which Mr. Speaker talked of on Monday, November 13. The reliance which the Registrar General placed on citation 246(3) is partly faulty. He read that citation to us as though it stood by itself. He read the words, "The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the Crown", and so on.

Subparagraph 3 must be read in conjunction with subparagraph 2, which makes clear that the amendment of a resolution is being discussed. We are not now amending a resolution. We understand the restrictions with respect to resolutions that precede bills. The point has now been reached where a money resolution that precedes a bill cannot be amended. I am prepared to accept that. But the Registrar General read this citation and left the impression that it applied to amendments, with respect to a bill. This is not so, for as Your Honour knows, citation 251(1) of Beauchesne's fourth edition says:

It may happen that the resolution sanctions some expenditure without fixing the maximum amount to be spent.

Your Honour is familiar with this citation. It goes on to point out that, if the situation envisioned in the first two lines of that citation exist, the committee on the bill may move amendments that may indirectly seem to involve the expenditure of money, but as they are covered in the general terms of the resolution they are not out of order so far as a private member is concerned. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there is a case against the Registrar General's argument with respect to both points he has raised.

Mr. Turner: With respect to the recent judgment of Mr. Speaker on November 13 it is relevant to consider it at this time. He said in part:

If any expenditure is required following the adoption of this bill, it is already covered by section 16 of the Publication of Statutes Act—

And he added:

—the publication of the statutes, was introduced in the house on March 31, 1925, with the same wording as that contained in section 16 and without a resolution. In other words, if there is any expenditure in the bill proposed by the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier-Lasalle it is already covered by existing statutory authority.

In other words, Mr. Speaker's decision was that there was already statutory authority for any money which might be expended under the bill introduced by the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier-Lasalle.

Mr. Knowles: By the same token, the minister's bill provides the statutory authority for any money which is to be spent under it, provided that the requests for expenditure come within the terms of the resolution, as I believe this one does.

The Chairman: Order, please. I thank hon. members for their contribution on whether this amendment is valid. The Chair, of course, was interested in the constitutional argument but that is not a matter which the Chair must decide. The Chair must decide whether the amendment is procedurally acceptable and not whether it is constitutionally correct.

I refer hon. members to citation 71(5), to be found on page 61 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which states:

> The Speaker will not give a decision upon a constitutional question nor decide a question of law, though the same may be raised on a point of order or privilege.

Next, the Chair must decide whether setting up a prices review board is outside the terms of the resolution. The resolution reads as follows:

> —to provide for the appointment of a minister and a deputy minister and for their duties and powers; to provide that the governor in council may establish a consumer advisory council and other bodies to assist the minister and for the remuneration and expenses of the members thereof;

The Chair takes the view that a prices review board could well be included in the phrase "and other bodies".

With regard to that question I wish to refer hon. members of the committee to citation 251(1) of Beauchesne's fourth edition which has already been quoted and which states as follows:

> It may happen that the resolution sanctions some expenditure without fixing the maximum amount to be spent. If, for instance, the resolution recommends that adequate salaries be paid a newly constituted body and the amounts of the salaries are fixed in the bill based on that resolution, the Committee on the bill has the right to increase those amounts, because, in doing so, it does not go beyond the scope of the royal recommendation.

Further, in paragraph 2 of citation 251 we read:

> A motion that certain commissioners should be appointed to examine the feasibility of some public improvements and report the results of their investigations to the House is in order, as it is an abstract proposition that does not necessarily bind the House in any way.

May I refer members also to citation 278, paragraph 4, which is to be found on page 227 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. It reads as follows:

> The committee is not bound by the terms of the provisions which the ministers have inserted in the bill; and, when no amount has been mentioned in the resolution, any member may propose to increase the grants specified in the bill or to extend the application of the provisions of the bill, whatever may be the cost resulting therefrom, so long as the power conferred by the royal recommendation is not exceeded.

It is the opinion of the Chair that the present amendment does not go beyond the royal recommendation, that it is within the scope of the resolution as passed by the committee on October 13, and the Chair therefore accepts the amendment.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): May I ask the minister a question? Would he like this amendment any better and would he accept it if instead of the word "take" in the third last line we were to put the word "advise"?

Mr. Turner: In our view, and I say this with the greatest of respect, I do not think the amendment could be cured by such a change.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I was just trying to prevent the teeth from showing a little farther above the gum than the minister might like.

Mr. Saltsman: The minister indicated that he did not believe a prices review board would be of any great assistance in controlling the level of prices. Am I correct in this interpretation?

Mr. Turner: I suggested to the members of the N.D.P. that they ought to look at both sides of the question. What disturbs me about this amendment is that it purports to set up a prices review board which, even in its own terms, does not possess adequate powers. Only a skeleton is left. If a prices review board were to be set up it should in my view be set up by a separate statute giving it real power. This amendment gives the public the idea that a prices review board is to be constituted without setting out the powers necessary for the enforcement of the board's decisions.

Mr. Saltsman: I would be interested to hear the minister's position with regard to the establishment of a prices review board and to hear him tell us what kind of powers he has in mind. If he is thinking in terms of a prices review board which could help the consumer, he might find us most co-operative in assisting him. Perhaps the minister could outline his thinking on this subject.

Mr. Turner: Not on this occasion. However, if a prices review board were to be established by parliament I think the appropriate motion should be introduced by the Minister of Finance who has direct responsibility for the general financial and economic policy of the government. The board would be set up with appropriate terms of reference and given such authority as would enable it to do the things the hon. member has been talking about.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver - Kingsway): Would the minister be prepared to recommend to his colleagues the establishment of a workable prices review board?

Mr. Turner: My mind is not closed on any subject.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): That is not an answer. Would the minister put on paper the terms of a workable proposal for the setting up of a prices review board?

Mr. Germa: Listening to the minister's almost hysterical rejection of the proposal to set up a prices review board I felt it was indicative of the attitude he really takes toward controlling consumer prices. The hon. gentleman has already indicated he has no intention of controlling prices. So the bill as it stands is just another shade of pale so far as the consumers are concerned.

The minister has in the course of the past few years built up a picture of himself as an affable, nice fellow, a friend of everyone including the corporations. If he is to discharge his present job effectively as minister of corporate and consumer affairs I do not think it is possible for him to maintain this image in the community, especially among the crème de la crème of the corporate elite. He needs to buy himself a barbed wire overcoat and thump these people around a little. If he is not willing to do this, the bill becomes just one more piece of window dressing such as have been perpetrated on our people for the last 100 years.

Every time the question of prices comes up someone blames increases in wages right away. No one asks why it is that wages have increased. Look at the levels of corporation profits. It is these profits and their effect upon prices which have caused labour to rectify the situation by bringing back some of this money into their own pockets. What the minister seems to have envisaged in connection with this bill is the appointment of a little debating society, a couple of ladies discussing the price of shoelaces while doing their knitting. We want something different. We want somebody with power to tell Noranda Copper to prove its case for raising prices, to justify its demand for higher profits.

What is going on in this country is not even unbridled free enterprise because, as my hon. friend from York South has told us, we are really living today under a system of monopoly. There was no reason for the recent increase in steel prices with extra profits for the steel companies. Yet no justification was ever offered in defence of that action.

Almost every phase of this nation's industrial activities is controlled by two or three large corporations, mostly foreign owned, which do not care two hoots about the Canadian consumer and are entirely unconcerned about his welfare. Does anybody believe that General Motors could not run Ford and Chrysler off the market any time they saw fit? The only reason Ford and Chrysler are allowed in Canada is to maintain this patchwork system of so-called free enterprise. General Motors know that if they run Chrysler and Ford off the market the United States government would intervene. This is why they continue this pretence of competition which is not competition at all.

We have to get control of the marketplace, Mr. Chairman, because the free enterprise system has been described as a rat race without control, and the rats are winning. These are the people over whom we have to get control. We have to get those rats by the tail and swing them around our heads a little bit.

If the minister does not know where to get a barbed wire overcoat I can tell him that I have a spare one. I will lend it to him and he can use it to go to Noranda Copper and deal with these people. There is no use hiding behind the constitutional issue and saying: We cannot do this and we cannot do that; we cannot control these people because of the constitution. The greatest force in this country is public opinion. That is where the minister will find the power.

A prices review board will expose to the Canadian people what has been going on. Once you tell the people the truth they will give you the backing you need and you will have more power than anybody else in the community. The minister's attitude will have to change. He will have to get that silver spoon out of his mouth and get the show rolling. We are trying to give him the power. We are asking him to take the power and go ahead and do the job.

I ask the minister to quit this namby-pamby-ing and saying he cannot interfere with civil rights. That is all baloney. Let him interfere on behalf of my rights and the rights of the rest of the people who are consumers. The minister has to interfere on their behalf and not on behalf of the corporations. They have the strength to look after themselves. I wish the minister would not take this hysterical attitude. I wish he would accept this amendment because without it this whole Bill C-161 might as well go by the boards as absolutely useless.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Allmand: Maybe I will not be so brief now. I feel there were a few points brought up by members of the N.D.P. that have to be met. I know that the minister has dealt with these things very well, but I wish to point out that the N.D.P. is a party which pretends it is against window dressing, that it is against sham, and that it likes things which are well thought out. But here we have an amendment that is nothing but window dressing, nothing but sham, and is not well thought out.

What does the N.D.P. amendment say? It calls for the establishment of a "prices review board with authority to inquire into complaints of price increases in essential commodities." It sets out no structure for such a board. It does not say how complaints are to be brought before the board or by whom, and it does not say what are the essential commodities. It calls for the board "to make its findings public and to take joint action." What kind of joint action? Is it action to control prices, to roll back prices or to set prices as was done by the wartime prices and trade board? It does not say. No, Mr. Chairman, this is sham, political window dressing, and it is poorly thought out.

I think the minister was quite correct in saying that even if we were to accept the principle of a prices review board, provision for it should be brought forward in a separate piece of legislation. If we are going to change the marketplace in a radical way and do something new, we have a duty to set forth such a proposal in a well thought-out manner detailing the method of procedure, particularly since it would be related to income policies and prices policies in general.

I suggest to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, who is so fond of talking about window dressing, that before she introduces any more amendments she should think them out better and think more of their effect on the legislation rather than of political gain. I think the only honest member in that party is the hon. member for Waterloo South. When he spoke during the debate on this legislation on November 17 he dealt with a prices review board, and in answer to several questions which I put to him he said that in his opinion a prices review board should not have the power to fix prices or roll back prices but should merely investigate and make recommendations to the government.

This is typical of the N.D.P. members. If you talked to ten of them about a prices review board they would have ten different definitions of it. Last year when the consumer prices committee was investigating prices I remember attending one particular meeting. I was with a member from the N.D.P. party and he told the people at the meeting that night that the N.D.P. wanted a prices review board that would fix prices. That is exactly what the people at the meeting wanted to hear and they thought he was a great fellow. But, as I say, we have an honest member like the hon. member for Waterloo South who takes another approach. Then we have the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway who takes a different approach, and several other members of that party take other approaches to the problem. I say that we must object to this amendment because it is poorly thought out and is merely political window dressing.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I believe it is absolutely unnecessary to introduce this amendment. All it would do is build up a greater bureaucracy than we have now. Everything this amendment seeks to do can now be done by the Department of Trade and Commerce through the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. If its reports are co-ordinated the public can be kept informed of what is taking place with regard to price increases. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics issues reports from time to time on the cost of living and on many other sectors of the economy. To establish a prices review board, with the additional employees that this would entail, would add a cost to government that is unjustified at this time. Therefore I intend to vote against the amendment.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in some remarks the minister made in reference to the amendment. He suggested it set out only the skeleton of a prices review board, but comparing the amendment with the terms of the bill before us I would like to ask the minister just how much more than a skeleton does the bill give him? I had a vision of the minister as a skeleton painted in luminous paint when he was suggesting that our amendment had no more to it than that.

The hon. member for York South and others have made it clear that this amendment in just a few words sets forth something which could be given a very substantial body if the will were there to put it into effect as intended by its mover. Therefore I suggest to the minister that he take another look at his own bill when he starts talking about words being only skeletons.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, since the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has called my character into question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Allmand: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I said that the hon. member for Waterloo South was the only honest member in that party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Saltsman: Now that the rowdyism has settled down I think it is time to become serious. I might point out to the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce that I have a very high opinion of him. He did an excellent job on the prices committee, as I pointed out on a previous occasion. I am somewhat surprised at his vehemence now when he rises and takes exception to the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I thought he would have risen to support it.

The hon. member talks about inconsistencies. I point out to him that the mover of this amendment is prepared to make a change in it which I am certain would satisfy him. We do not pretend that the amendment we have introduced is perfect in every detail. It is essentially an amendment of principle, a very important principle as we have tried to demonstrate. We are quite prepared to listen to any suggestion from the government side of the house.

During the course of the debate we have asked the minister whether he would be prepared to bring in an amendment to establish a prices review board and have stated that we would support a prices review board of his suggestion if we felt that it met some of the qualifications for the protection of consumers. I do not believe there is any reason to be critical of a group which acts in this way when we have pointed out our willingness to be as co-operative as possible with the government provided the government has a position to place before the house. In the absence of the government having a position, we have introduced this amendment.

I should like to recall to the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce the proceedings of the committee. He was a member of the committee and he will remember that during the time it was in session it in fact acted very much like a prices review board; it acted very much along the lines suggested by this amendment. During the course of those sittings it became quite obvious that prices were restrained. A number of statements were made by officials of some of the very large companies in this country to the effect that they had to restrain their prices during the time the committee was sitting because it would have been injudicious not to do so. We think the committee had a salutary effect at that time. We think that something of a more permanent nature than the committee should be established on behalf of the consumers of this country.

I do not really know what the objections are to this suggestion. After having listened to the polemics and the beating of the breasts on the other side of the house I really do not know what their objections are to a prices review board. We have indicated that the amendment does not raise any constitutional problem. We have also indicated that it would go a long way toward giving the consumers the kind of protection and civil liberties they really need. The consumers would know what was going on. Surely the consumers have a right to this knowledge. Again, before the taking of the vote we would ask those members who sincerely believe that the protection of the consumer in this country is important to ensure that this bill has incorporated within it a measure that will provide a positive opportunity for the protection of the consumer.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mrs. MacInnis, Vancouver-Kingsway) negatived: Yeas 11; nays 49.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, this is experimental legislation. I, for one, regret that the minister did not accept the amendment. As the result of experience I believe a formula could be worked out whereby the Canadian people could be informed, wherever necessary, concerning the prices they pay. However, I must say that I have every respect for the minister and I am quite sure he would not deliberately deceive the consumers of Canada.

I must take exception to the remarks made by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce when he said there is only one honest man in this party.

An hon. Member: Two.

Mr. Herridge: I think it would be quite fair to say that we are all honest men even though hon. members think we are misguided on occasion.

I should like to make a few remarks on clause 6 which deals with a problem of growing interest in Canada. I have knowledge of this as the result of correspondence I have had from people who are supporters of all parties in this house. They are very concerned about the increase in the cost of living over the past year or so. The debates in this house on this question and on other matters which affect consumers have even affected the government of British Columbia. That government has responded by establishing a new law for the protection of consumers which goes into effect on January 1, 1968. I should like to remind the house that in the first instance there was great reluctance on the part of the government of British Columbia to introduce this type of legislation. However, the particular attention which the matter has received to date has caused the provincial government to recognize public opinion in this regard at least to the extent of passing a bill which is largely related to the protection of the consumer who is seeking credit. Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

The Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock and in order that the house may proceed to private members' business, I do now leave the chair.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather), Consumer affairs—consideration of motion for inquiry into car insurance; the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Laprise), Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—petition concerning a program shown on CKRN-TV; the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette), Assistance for Lepers—Africa.

It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions.

Mr. McNulty: Mr. Speaker, may we by unanimous consent stand notices of motions Nos. 15 and 16? The members sponsoring these motions should be back in the house this week. May we take notice of motion No. 19 in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre?

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think there is already some understanding that items 15 and 16 will stand and retain their positions on the order paper. Shall we therefore proceed with item No. 19?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

OLD AGE SECURITY

PROPOSED INCORPORATION OF SUPPLEMENT INTO BASIC PENSION—PAYMENT AS OF RIGHT AT AGE 65

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to amending the Old Age Security Act to provide for the full amount of the income supplement provided thereunder to be incorporated into the basic pension, and for the eligible age to be lowered immediately to 65, so that all persons in Canada 65 years of age or over who meet the residence requirements will receive the full pension of $105 per month without any income test, the full amount of the old age security pension thus being recognized as a matter of right.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the terms of the resolution which Your Honour has just read from the chair are quite clear. It is our view that the full amount of the old age security pension, which is $105 a month at the present time, should be paid to all our old age security pensioners without any income or means test on any portion of it. It is also our view that the provision for the old age security pension to be payable at age 65 should come into effect immediately, rather than on a year to year basis as is the case at the present time.

Obviously, the presenting of this resolution is an expression of opposition to the idea of an income or means test on any portion of the old age pension. In case anyone has forgotten it—and I find that hard to believe—we in this party took a very strong stand against the so-called income test which was put on the extra $30 that was added to the old age security pension by legislation enacted in 1966. We felt then that it was wrong in principle to take this retrograde step. We still feel it is wrong in principle and that parliament should call upon the government to take action to correct the mistake that was made in 1966.

When I think of the debates we had on this matter last year, I am aware of the fact that arguments were put forward both ways. I am also aware of the fact that it was felt in some quarters that we should try this method for a while to see how it would work out. But I suggest that the experience of our people has already demonstrated it was a retrograde step that the government asked parliament to take.

I have been actively interested in old age pensioners and old age pension legislation long enough now to have seen three phases of it so far as our people are concerned. I saw for a good many years the effects of the original old age pension act, with its means test, on our older people. I am talking about the pension that was initially $20 a month, which rose by stages to $40 a month, was payable only at age 70 and had a means test on it. I remember very well how in those days the people who drew that pension felt the stigma that went with it. They were not happy to say they were on the old age pension because it meant they had submitted to a means test and were in dire circumstances.

Then I lived through the period, as most of us in this house have, when we had an old age security pension the full amount of which was free of a means test of any kind. That was true from January, 1952, until the end of 1966. During that time it became a matter of pride for older people to be able to say they were on the old age pension. In the earlier years of that 14-year period the amount was a little more valuable to people than has been the case more recently, but even apart from the amount there was a definite change in the attitude of people toward the old age pension, both those who received it and those who did not, because it was completely a matter of right.

Now we are in a third period, the period of a means or income test on a portion of the pension. It has been in effect for only ten or 11 months and yet already my mail and my contacts tell of hundreds of people who are feeling the indignity of the income test to which they have to submit. I regret as strongly as I can the fact that parliament took this retrograde step. I also regret the fact that there seems to be a tendency to say in this place: Oh, we have dealt with the old age pension question. Why don't you leave it alone for a while?

To support the statement I have just made that there are people who are unhappy about the way in which the income or means test is affecting them, may I cite one particular kind of grievance to which, as a matter of fact, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) alluded in a question he put to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) on the orders of the day this afternoon. I remind you, sir, that when we were debating the so-called guaranteed income supplement the theme, the insistence of the minister was that under this legislation people would be brought up to a minimum figure; no old age pensioner would have any less than a total of $105 a month. One of the guarantees the minister gave when we were debating this legislation was that if a person's income changed during the course of a year from what he had estimated it would now be, an adjustment could be made. This is not true for all our pensioners.

I have cases—and I have spoken to the hon. member for Ontario since he asked his question today and find he has precisely the same kind of cases in his experience—where this principle that the minister guaranteed is not being carried out. Let me boil it down to one instance. I will call this woman Mrs. M., because her story has been written up by a columnist in the Winnipeg Tribune. Mrs. M. is a woman who at the time her husband died in 1962 was awarded, by the company for which he had worked, a five-year pension. I am not commenting on the fairness or rightness of such a pension, but it is a fact that she was awarded a five-year pension which ran from the spring of 1962 until the spring of 1967. Accordingly, in the year 1966 she drew the full amount of that pension from the company for which her husband had worked. When she applied for the guaranteed income supplement for 1967 she of course had to report the total income she received in 1966, and it included this pension, so-called, for 12 months. The result was that her guaranteed income supplement for 1967 was reduced accordingly and she received about $3 a month.

Then 1967 comes along. Mrs. M. draws this so-called pension for only three months, January, February and March, and then it is discontinued. She was under the impression that the guaranteed income supplement was designed to guarantee that every old age pensioner would have not less than $105 a month, so she applied for a readjustment of the amount of her pension. She went to the appropriate officials and to various people, and friends of hers have written to me giving me the full particulars.

I am raising this matter here although I have tried to do something about it in other areas. I have been in touch with the appropriate officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare and I have received letters from them in which the act has been cited to me. I was told by these officials that there are only two cases in which a person can have his income supplement readjusted during the course of the current year. One is if his income is reduced because he stops work in that year and retires, and the other is when there is a change in his marital situation. In any other instance a person whose income is cut down during the course of the year cannot get any adjustment in that calendar year. This is the situation despite the minister's assurance last year that although people would apply for the supplement on the basis of their income in the previous year, in some cases they would be able to give an estimated income for the coming year or to get an adjustment during the course of the year.

But now, as if it were not bad enough for Mrs. M. to have to continue with $3 a month for the balance of the year instead of receiving the full $30 to bring her up to $105, let us consider her situation in 1968. When it comes to applying for the guaranteed income supplement for 1968, she will have to report her income in 1967 which included three months of this so-called pension. She will not get one cent of it in 1968, and yet her 1968 income supplement will be based on the income she had in 1967 because she will not fit into the category of those whose incomes are reduced because of retirement or a change in marital situation.

I earnestly hope that this is one of the bugs which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) said this afternoon the government would like to iron out. But I suggest that even after such a bug has been ironed out the act will still not be good enough. I point out that one of the things about which people are very upset, people who are on the guaranteed income supplement, is that they have to apply again to get it in 1968. We in this parliament who argued, debated and fought over this measure know this is the case, but every day I receive letters from people who are horrified at this. They thought that at last when they received this supplement it would increase their pension and they would continue to get it, but lo and behold they have to apply for it each and every year and again submit themselves to a so-called income test which to them is a means test.

It is also a fact that because of the changes which take place in the incomes of people, there must be scores, perhaps thousands, whose cheques have to be changed by the people who send them out on behalf of the federal government. I suggest that an expense is developing in that connection which is certainly not worth the indignity which these people must suffer. So it seems to me that the arguments we put forward in 1966 have been borne out. We have taken a retrograde step and we have taken the heart out of many of our old age people, and this is the very opposite of what we were doing when we gave them a pension which was completely free of a means test. It is still my view that despite all the highfalutin' philosophical arguments that have been put forward about social security measures and so on, one of the best pieces of legislation we ever passed in the parliament of Canada was the old age security pension which became effective in 1952 and which was completely free of a means or an income test of any kind. It is my view that we should get back to that just as soon as we can.

I point out that still another problem is hitting us in this field and it will hit us even harder as time goes on. I am referring to the way in which the cost of living and the standard of living escalate after a person goes on pension. Just recently I have been dealing with a friend who is around 60 years of age and who may be able to retire by accepting a slightly smaller pension than he could get if he continued to work until the age of 65. He has asked for my advice and I told him that amongst other things he should consider the future of our economy. I asked him whether he thought he could get by for the rest of his life on the pension which he will receive now at the age of 60. I said to him, "Look, my friend, you are in good health and you are only 60 years old. You have a good chance to live to the year 2000. Do you think that the pension you are now able to draw will be good enough for the conditions of life in the year 2000?" The answer is, no; some arrangement must be made for pensions to escalate.

I produce this argument with regard to retired civil servants at least once a week, but I think this will have to be done for all our people, and it is logical and sensible to accept the proposition that the over-all old age security pension without a means test must go up progressively as the years go by. It is not sufficient to grant a supplement on the basis of a means test. Ever since I put this resolution on the order paper on May 9 asking that the full pension of $105 a month be paid to everyone without a means or income test of any kind, conditions have changed to such an extent that now I would have to amend the figure of $105 a month to $125 a month because of the way in which costs have gone up since then and the way in which the living standard has gone up. I say to hon. members that there is no point in being shocked at the idea of this further increase. The standard of living of other people is going up. We think that people who retire, whether it is at the age of 60 or at the age of 65, should not be asked to live for the rest of their days on the same amount of money and thereby have to take a gradual decline in their actual as well as their relative standard of living.

Therefore, as I said, if I were proposing this resolution today I would go a step further and say that the old age security pension should be $125 a month rather than $105. But one cannot change the resolution at this point, and I would emphasize my contention that the most important part of this motion is not the amount of money that is mentioned in it but rather the principle of universality. Let me repeat again—and I know I have said it in the house hundreds of times—that one of the finest things we ever did was back in the early 1950's when we adopted a universal old age pension. All our people received it as a matter of right. Parliament took a retrograde step when we put part of it on an income test, and I hope we will soon get back to the progressive position we took in the early 1950's and pay the full old age security pension to all as a matter of right.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, in rising to deal with the motion put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I should like to place on record the position of our party regarding the period which has just elapsed. We believe that the means test incorporated in the legislation put forward by the government some months ago was the meanest test of all, particularly when inflation and high costs are a part of the everyday life of our communities and particularly in view of the fact that this measure affects those people who have contributed so much in the past to the productive capacity of our nation today. I agree with the hon. member who has just resumed his seat that assistance should be made available to our senior citizens at the age of 65 without the escalating feature which was incorporated into the legislation brought forward by the government some time ago.

I know there are those who will say that the government cannot find the money to provide this assistance. If that argument is valid, then it is valid when applied to other expenditures the government has been making. We should compare them on a priority basis to ascertain whether or not this argument holds water. I think of the expenditures being made on behalf of the C.B.C. amounting to $140 million and perhaps next year $180 million. I think of the plight of the senior citizens of our country and I cannot help but feel that part of the money expended on the C.B.C. probably could have gone to help these people had proper priorities been established by this parliament and by the government. I think of the expenditures that were made by Canada in order to have Expo. I am one of those who believe that the expenditures made for Expo were well spent. Here again, however, we find that a tremendous amount of money has been spent in order that we might celebrate the centennial of our confederation.

When we have asked questions of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) with regard to the possibility of a centennial bonus of $100 for our senior citizens, we have been met by silence. I say to you, sir, that this ill becomes a government that is trying to celebrate the centennial of our confederation.

In talking about our senior citizens at this time I want to add one additional argument to indicate what could have been done. I remind you, sir, and members of the house that since this government came into office some four years ago more than 10,000 civil servants have been added to the payroll. This represents 300 members of the civil service for each member of the government elected in 1963. In other words, the cost that Canadians have had to bear in order to have a Liberal government during the past four years has been an additional 300 civil servants for each member of the House of Commons elected by the Liberals in 1963. If we say that these civil servants are on a modest salary of something like $5,000 or $6,000 each and each has a secretary being paid about $4,000 with office equipment at $1,000 or $2,000 each, we have an expenditure per civil servant of $10,000. If the true figure were known, it would probably be twice that. The minimum cost, therefore, of these civil servants would have been about $3 million. This cost is being borne entirely by the people of Canada in order to sustain this government in office, and yet the government says it cannot grant the senior citizens of this country the things that are set out in the resolution we have before us.

When we have asked for a centennial bonus for the senior citizens of this country, government ministers have been silent. When a resolution like this is before the house we find the Minister of National Health and Welfare absent, not caring enough to be here to listen to the debate and let us know why the government has not seen fit to make this provision.

I say to you, sir, that had the government wished to take care of the senior citizens of this country, had they established proper priorities, we could have provided this assistance without in any way endangering the orderly development of our nation. After all, when we look at the swollen civil service we have today, when we realize some of the waste that is taking place in departments that have been built up in the way the Department of Industry has been, then I cannot help but ask those on the government benches to give a little more consideration in working out priorities and try to do something to meet the challenge embodied in this motion.

[Mr. Nasserden.]

Mr. L.-P. Neveu (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to speak tonight on this most important motion.

I have often listened most attentively and respectfully to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He is an experienced parliamentarian who never misses an opportunity to make a valuable contribution to the debate in this house.

Nevertheless, when I heard him speak on social security, more particularly on the old age pensioners and guaranteed income supplement to the aged starting at 65 years of age, I realized how much easier it is to sit on the opposition benches than on the government side.

I am, however, most happy to rise in this debate, because I am a member of the party that fathered almost all, if not all, the social security measures benefiting Canadians today from ocean to ocean.

Mr. Speaker, in spite of these objective remarks, I must say that I share the feelings of the mover of this motion to the effect that we should aim more and more at a wider distribution of social security, thus giving greater justice to all but, obviously, when a question of social justice is involved, social equality must be more particularly mentioned, not social inequality.

If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, in order to make my meaning clearer, I shall review certain facts and quote statistics which will enable us to better grasp the situation.

As a matter of fact, the Canadian parliament has already recognized the need to maintain incomes by passing, in 1966, an act on the guaranteed income supplement. The purpose of that plan is to ensure old age security pensioners a monthly minimum income of $105, during 1967, by adding a supplement of up to $30 a month to the pension of those who have no other source of income. The plan also provides, for 1968 and subsequent years, the possibility of increasing the guaranteed minimum income, according to the increase in the cost of living.

Indeed, those increases have been announced and they will become effective in 1968, for both the old age security pension and the guaranteed income supplement.

At the most, those increases will boost the payments to $107.10 per month. I am convinced that the income supplement plan now in force gives our old people an income more efficiently and at a lower cost than would be the case under a formula such as the one proposed by my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

In fact, we do not need that formula, because the income supplement plan meets the needs of the present situation better.

One of the great advantages of the guaranteed income supplement is that it allows for calculating the payments granted in terms of an estimated income.

The motion of the hon. member would make this supplement universal and would provide an additional income to many people who do not need it.

In September 1967, a total of 1,244,085 senior citizens were covered by the Old Age Security plan; of this number, 717,845 pensioners, or 57.7 per cent, received partial or full payment of the guaranteed income supplement. These figures mean that, in 1967, there were 526,960 pensioners, or 42.3 per cent, eligible to Old Age Security allowances, whose income exceeded the permissible limit for payment of a guaranteed income supplement, namely, $1,620.

Of those who received guaranteed income supplement allowances, 436,011 pensioners, or 60.7 per cent, were entitled to full payment, while 281,834 others, or 39.3 per cent, were entitled to partial payment.

The motion introduced by my hon. friend would increase these payments for all pensioners. This would not only increase expenditures, but it would also be unfair toward pensioners with moderate or relatively high incomes.

The proposal of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would result in a considerable increase of costs. The expenditures thus added to relate the total amount of the supplement to all pensioners receiving old age security payments in 1968-69 would reach about $300 million. Additional expenses caused by the decision to extend these payments to all those between 65 and 66 years of age in 1968-69 would be about $200 million; accordingly, the amount of new expenditures for 1968-69 caused by this proposal would run to about $500 million. This would bring about an increase in expenditures for 1968-69 totalling about $2 billion.

Of course, when considering these things —objectives are always praiseworthy—we must understand that, as administrators, we are delegated to attend to proper management of the country's business and to pass adequate legislation.

I often hear members on the other side of the house, and especially from the hon. member's party, saying that the government does not do enough. If we were to carry into effect all measures and good suggestions submitted to us, we would fall into such excesses that the government would be the first to show the way to inflation by increasing its public expenditures.

However, every time mention is made of increasing taxes or imposing new measures requiring the co-operation of all citizens, then the government is accused of taking dollars from the taxpayer's pockets. Such a situation is normal. The hon. member who has been here for a long time has certainly made his mark, since he has always kept the confidence of his constituents, but we must say that, at the present time, in 1967, we distribute, we administer the funds committed to us, but we cannot work miracles. That does not exist in the public service.

We must administer without a deficit and in a climate of social justice. We must not throw off balance the small wage-earners, those who want to benefit from that social equality, for instance.

The problems of the old, which I feel very deeply, must be considered quite objectively but they must be solved with equality in mind.

For instance, I know very well that if I were 65, today or tomorrow, and arrived in my constituency, I would not need a guaranteed income supplement, but I would be happy if the majority of my constituents, who are not as well off, who worked hard for their children, who did not spare their health or their time, and who contributed also to the old age security fund as citizens, received a supplement. All that would help promote social justice and the welfare of the population.

The additional amounts suggested in that motion would in most cases go to people who tend to be great consumers, and that would increase the demand for consumer goods and services. As a result, other increases would have inflationary effects on prices and costs. The additional expenses should be supported out of the old age security fund. On the other hand, various taxes would have to be increased: personal income tax, corporation—

Mr. Nasserden: Would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. Is the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden) asking whether the hon. member for Shefford would allow him to ask a question?

Mr. Neveu: After my speech, with pleasure, Mr. Speaker.

—personal income tax, corporation income tax and sales tax. At the present time, this would have some undesirable economic consequences.

New expenditures must be studied in the context of the other priorities to be respected. One of those, especially for the old people in Canada, is the setting up of an adequate medicare plan. Older people usually need more medical attention than the others. That is what is important.

The hon. member knows very well that when he meets his electors over the week end, most of them are often older persons who receive pensions, but who have bills to pay for medical supplies, or medical services, often reaching $30, $40 and $50 a month. Social justice surely demands that we consider the mass and those excellent suggestions in the future. But let us use them today to eliminate the present situation and to give us a truly complete social mechanism.

I feel that, at the present time, it is urgent that Canadians should be given a decent health insurance program. I am pleased that the present minister is dynamic, extremely perspicacious, and that he has the social security of all Canadians at heart, just like his predecessors in the past.

The newspaper La Patrie of Montreal published an eloquent article on poverty on June 4, 1967. It is often said that the poor and the old are ill more often, that they need medical assistance oftener. I think that with the savings of the wise administration we now have, we will be able to give Canada and the Canadians a health insurance that will give greater social equality and allow, once again, the central government to assert itself and say to the provinces: We have something to present, we have something to give you; you are free to refuse it or to accept it, but the government of Canada wishes to bring, from sea to sea, social justice to all Canadians, English-speaking, French-speaking, or whatever the language they may speak.

I think that when we relieve someone of hardship, hunger, when we create social equality, when we pass legislation as did this government, when we pass a bill which is complete, that is unpartitioned, but which takes into account social facts, then we are doing something for Canada, we are doing something for its people, because when one is happy, when one has a homeland, one of course has something to live for, to hope for, a striking example to pass on to future generations. In fact, I think that the most striking example is to be able to say that, in this house, we have contributed to the improvement of social security, we have contributed to establishing not perfection of course—since perfection is unknown in this world and no one is naturally perfect—but something concrete. In my opinion, we have all the qualities, the sense of liberalism required to see things as they must be seen, all across Canada, and with a very broad outlook.

We must be proud enough to tell those people: We would like everybody to get $105 per month at 65 or even at 60 years of age, but the economic situation does not allow for such a provision.

I know some 50 or 55 year old unemployed who come to my office. They are pitiful. I would like to help them. I think that these citizens, who are understanding people, will realize that this is for the future good of the whole people; they can be proud to be Canadians, because not only their fellow-Canadians, their parents and their friends, but above all their children, will be able to take part in progress and in a better Canadianism. I am convinced that it is good administration on the part of the government which allows us to reach that goal.

This is my first term in this house, and I fully appreciate the extraordinary work done by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), the members of the cabinet, the ministerial team and the right-thinking people in this house. I am proud, at this time in our history, to belong to a government which stands up, assumes its responsibilities and protects, with much concern for equality—because equality is always relative—the true democratic rights of all the citizens of all nationalities.

[English]

Mr. Nasserden: May I ask the hon. member a question? Did I understand him correctly to say that adopting a full pension for senior citizens would cause inflation? Surely he was not serious in that suggestion?

An hon. Member: That is a serious question.

Mr. Knowles: That is what he said.

Mr. Choquette: The question is out of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Neveu: My hon. friend will forgive me for replying in my mother tongue, for it makes me feel more at ease. In any case, he will understand what I say, through our interpreters. We are working quite amicably in close co-operation.

My hon. friend will recognize, as I do, that during inflationary periods, there is an imbalance in currency volume, due basically to three factors: prices, products and wages. It behooves the government to set an example for other agencies in order to stabilize the economy and prevent inflation.

Being aware, indeed, of the knowledge and experience of my hon. friend, I should think he will greatly appreciate my remarks.

[English]

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it will be hard to follow the previous act—

Mr. Knowles: En français; en français.

Mr. Deachman: If my hon. friends do not mind, I shall leave French this afternoon to others who are more fluent and impassioned in that language.

This afternoon's debate is interesting because it recalls to mind the debate in this chamber when the guaranteed income supplement, which provides for a minimum income for senior citizens of $105 a month, was brought down. That debate divided itself on party lines. The parties of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) were prepared to increase the old age pension to $100 a month. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) argued that we must do something more basic than merely increasing the pension to $100 a month; we ought to introduce a guaranteed income supplement. After that, the guaranteed income supplement was brought down.

The supplement enabled the government to guarantee $105 a month to those who have no income, instead of the $100 a month which would have been paid to them had the party of the hon. member for Rosthern or that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre been in power. The government went beyond that and for the first time tied the pension supplement and the pension to a pension index. As a result, we see the pension rising to meet the rising cost of goods and services which our old people must obtain.

Mr. Knowles: By how much?

Mr. Deachman: I will give my hon. friend the figures; I have them here. The increase which has been announced, and which will come into effect in 1968 will bring the guaranteed income supplement up to a minimum of $107.10 a month. I am as willing as anyone to say that inflation at the moment is rising more quickly than the pension index is rising. I also point out that by not adopting arguments to make the old age pension a flat $100 a month, our old age pensioners who receive the supplement will be $7.10 a month better off. They will be $7.10 better off than if the party of the hon. member for Rosthern or that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had formed the government.

In September, 1967, information available shows that 1.25 million old age pensioners lived in this country. Working out the difference in payments, one may calculate that $7.5 million a month extra is paid to our pensioners. That extra payment would not have been made had a government of either of the gentlemen I mentioned been in office. The total extra payment is about $90 million a year.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North talks about the indignity, as he calls it, of our old people having to submit to a test. They must file an income tax statement. That test every working man in Canada understands. I suggest that it is not so bad when, in common with everybody else in the country, one has to file an income tax statement. It is not so bad when, after filing that statement, one receives—and I am speaking collectively—$90 million a year. Without the indignity of that test, to use my hon. friend's expression again, would that $90 million a year be paid out if—

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a question? That additional $90 million is not coming from the government, surely. The government calculates what income our old people have, and those calculations are taken into account in this so called guaranteed income situation.

Mr. Deachman: No. This additional $90 million comes from the government. I am talking about the difference between having the pension at $100 a month, and increasing the monthly payments by the amount paid under the guaranteed income supplement.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit another question? I am not trying to argue, I merely want to get this clear. When the hon. member talks about $90 million, he talks about an extra $90 million that our old people will be paid?

Mr. Deachman: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Actually we accepted the $105 figure; but I am not arguing that. This $90 million does not all come from the federal government. Many of our old age pensioners have their own money. Under the government scheme many are getting only $75 a month from the federal government, and not any more.

Mr. Deachman: That is all they are entitled to if their total earnings are of the order of $105 a month or more. The government adopted the figure of $105 a month because it wanted to guarantee a floor, under the earnings of pensioners, at $105 a month. If a floor is put under them, then of course we must have the right to examine their incomes. The customary way of declaring income in this country is by filing an income tax form. I suggest there is no indignity attached to that procedure.

• (6:50 p.m.)

Mr. Barnett: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deachman: I have some figures I wish to put on record. I will try to find time for the hon. member's question later.

One of the prime advantages of the supplement is that it distributes payment on the basis of earnings or incomes. The proposal suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would make the supplement universal and thus provide increases for many who are not now in need.

Mr. Knowles: How many?

Mr. Deachman: I will give the figures. In September, 1967, there were about 1,250,000 old age security pensioners of whom 718,000 or approximately 58 per cent were receiving full or partial income supplement payments. This means there were 527,000 old age security pensioners in Canada, or 42 per cent, who were receiving incomes in excess of $1,620, which is the qualifying level for a guaranteed supplement.

Of the total number receiving the income supplement, 436,000 or 60 per cent were receiving the full amount and 282,000 were receiving partial payments. The hon. member's proposal would increase benefits to all pensioners. Not only would this add to the cost but it would create an inequitable situation as between pensioners on low incomes and those on relatively high incomes.

The argument I wish to make this afternoon is that it is beyond our financial limits, I believe, to continue to raise the pensions of all old age pensioners, and raise it to a level at which people are enjoying proper retirement. This government has taken two major steps toward enabling Canadians to retire in dignity. One of these is the implementation of the guaranteed income supplement, which provides for a good deal better rate than could have been paid under the plan which hon. members opposite proposed. The other was the introduction of the Canada Pension Plan which confers benefits by way of transferability and other advantages which hitherto have not been available to most Canadians. These two pieces of legislation together have gone further than any other government measures we know toward underpinning the retired Canadian; we have had nothing like this in Canadian history before.

Members of the N.D.P. and members of the official opposition know that when we began to discuss this legislation in the house, all they were asking for was a simple $100 a month to the pensioner. We would in no way be underpinning Canadian pensioners on retirement, or offering them substantial real benefits, as we have done under the supplementary plan and under the pensions plan, if we had been content with this proposal. These were great steps forward in social legislation. And it was Liberal legislation. It was not N.D.P. legislation; they rejected those ideas. It was not Conservative legislation; they rejected those ideas. They were Liberal schemes, and it is to the credit of the Liberal party that they are on the statute books.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. gentleman like to make it clear that while it is true we rejected the income test attached to the income supplement we did not oppose the Canada Pension Plan? We fought harder for the government to bring it in than did government supporters themselves.

Mr. Deachman: Since its inception the N.D.P. has taken credit for fighting harder for things this government has done than has the government itself.

Mr. Knowles: Isn't it true?

Mr. Deachman: I don't know. It is a good arrangement, and if that is the way hon. members opposite want it, I suppose it is a suitable way to do things. We shall implement the legislation, and they can grunt hard for it as we do so.

Mr. Knowles: You have to get your ideas from somewhere.

Mr. Deachman: I want to make another point before I sit down. The hon. member's proposal would lead to a considerable increase in existing costs. The cost of extending the full supplement to old age pensioners in '68 and '69, as he would do, would be approximately $300 million. The additional cost of making these payments to those aged 65 and 66 would be a further $200 million. Thus the total additional cost would be roughly $500 million. Is that what the hon. member is suggesting this afternoon?

In two or three days it will be budget day, when we shall be called upon to face problems brought about in part by the expansion of social measures. We shall be called upon to face the fact that our productivity is not growing as it should. Does the hon. member wish to burden us at this time with a scheme which would mean $500 million additional expenditure? This thinking is of course what brought Great Britain down, under the government of a party which is very similar to that to which hon. members in that corner of the house belong.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour for the consideration of private members business has expired.

Does the house agree to resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CORPORATE AND CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT, APPOINTMENT OF PERSONNEL, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-161, to establish a department of corporate and consumer affairs—Mr. Turner—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. As it is now seven o'clock, I do leave the chair.

At seven o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: House again in committee of the whole on Bill No. C-161, an act to establish a department of corporate and consumer affairs. When the committee rose, it was considering clause 6 of the bill.

On clause 6—Duties re consumer affairs.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with my brief remarks I cannot resist mentioning the fact that you cut a most impressive figure in your traditional robes.

Before six o'clock I had dealt briefly with the fact that I was rather disappointed that the minister was not willing to accept our amendment to what most of us realize is an experimental form of legislation. I dealt with the general and continuing interest in the problem of the cost of living, and I mentioned the legislation that had been passed in British Columbia as the result of a response to public opinion.

On second reading of this bill I dealt primarily with that portion of it which provides for information and education, and the next day I was very pleased to receive some very complimentary comments from members of trade unions who thought I had dealt with a very necessary aspect of the bill. I must say that I am very interested in clause 6(1)(d) and all the matters which come under it. I must also say I am interested to note that there are trade unions which take an interest in wider matters than wages and working conditions, and which are willing to participate with any level of government to make legislation work that is intended to be in the general interest.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Shall we discuss the issue and come to the point?

Mr. Herridge: I have just arrived at the point, and I am rather surprised at that remark from the hon. member for Carleton, who sometimes wanders far afield himself. In this connection I wish to quote from Canadian Transport of November 15, 1967—and this is directly related to clause 6(1)(d):

> All Canadian workers have it within their own power to give themselves the equivalent of a 12 per cent wage increase. They can do it simply by learning how to spend their present income less wastefully.

That is true in some cases.

> That's the message of Transport's consumer affairs expert, Sydney Margolius, in his latest book, "The Innocent Consumer vs. The Exploiters."

Margolius estimates that the average family wastes about one dollar out of every eight spent. For a family with an annual income of $6,000, this means $720 down the drain. Over a 20-year period, that amount, if saved, would pay all university expenses for two children.

Why do people habitually spend more than they have to for food, medicines, home furnishings, clothing, insurance, and other goods and services? Mainly because they are fooled by deceptive advertising and shady sales gimmicks.

I might say that this is a quotation from an article "Minority Report", written by Ed Finn, an editorial writer for Canadian Transport.

"Consumer exploitation," says Margolius, "has replaced labour exploitation as the real problem of our times. We would not permit the things to be done to people as workers that we allow to be done to them as consumers."

The shocking examples of consumer exploitation he documents in his book dramatize once again the failure of most labour unions to extend the protection of their members beyond the narrow confines of offices and plants.

That is a complaint I have often brought to the attention of trade union members whom I have the honour to represent, although fortunately the trade union members I represent have taken a wide interest in such issues as the conservation of natural resources and the development of water resources. To continue with the quotation:

Some unions, of course, do provide some consumer services to their members, in the form of health clinics, consumer advice classes, and credit unions. One union even supplies free legal aid to members in financial trouble. But the vast majority of unions continue to limit their services to the work-place, leaving the members to fend for themselves in the modern marketing jungle.

This is an article of some length, but strangely enough it deals with some of the questions that I raised during second reading of this bill. It goes on to say:

One of the biggest frauds is the modern "balloon" bread. This is a one-pound loaf baked in a 1½ pound pan so that it expands to a larger volume. The added volume, of course, is nothing but air. Unfortunately, most housewives accept the larger loaf at face value, and pay more for a product that provides up to one-third less nutrition.

Another exorbitantly priced product is the dry breakfast cereal, especially the sugar coated kind, for which the consumer pays $1.07 a pound for the sugar alone. That's a steep price to pay for the convenience of not having to sprinkle on the sugar by hand. By serving the kids cooked porridge, you not only gain financially but nutritionally as well.

I certainly agree with this unionist attitude toward the question. The article goes on in this way to deal with another matter which I mentioned at that time:

Buying on credit is another costly trap for consumers. The average family spends $250 a year on credit fees alone, because they use charge accounts or borrow from finance companies. If they joined a credit union instead, and used its services, they could cut their annual credit fees to $75.

Most families also pay unnecessarily high prices for drugs. Take aspirin, for example. It can be purchased, under its generic name, for one-fifth of the cost of Bayer aspirin, or Anacin, or any of the other heavily-advertised headache tablets; and it is just as effective. Still, most people stubbornly continue to buy advertised brands.

Even prescription drugs, under their generic names, can be bought for a fraction of their brand name counterparts. The trick is to insist that your doctor make out his prescription for the generic drug.

I think this is a very useful article, in this edition of Canadian Transport.

Mr. Roxburgh: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question. He has pointed out some very important facts. I should like to ask him whether in his opinion the consumers themselves—not wholly but partly—are responsible for these high costs about which the housewife is talking.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, in some instances the consumer suffers by his own ignorance, also because of the lack of information on this subject through government sources in the past, and because of the lack of education. This is the reason I was very interested in the speech made by the minister from which I quoted in my few remarks on second reading. I was very pleased to be complimented by the trade unionists for having dealt with this aspect of the question, which in my opinion is very important indeed.

I believe that under this bill there will be an opportunity to provide this information which is required if the organizations are willing to participate and provide information through the advisory council, so that the consumers will know the real nutritional and other values of the goods they intend to purchase. This is the reason I am particularly interested in clause 6. Subclause (1)(d) provides that the minister shall undertake, recommend or assist in programs to assist the Canadian consumer to be more fully informed about goods and services offered to the consumer. Then, the second part of this clause reads as follows:

For the purpose of carrying out his duties and functions under this act, the minister may undertake research into matters to which the powers, duties and functions of the minister extend, co-operate with any or all provinces or with any department or agency of the government of Canada or any organization or person undertaking such research and publish or cause to be published, or assist in the publication of, so much of the results of any such research as the minister deems appropriate and in the public interest.

I believe this clause provides an opportunity for a minister who is alert to the situation. If the full intent of this clause is implemented by the minister, then the consumer cannot help but reap some benefit from the application of this measure. I have always been a bit of an optimist, you know. I have not had an easy time in life, on occasions I have had to struggle for my living. However, I have always taken the attitude that when things look dark it is better to light a candle than to curse the darkness. It is on that basis that I support this bill, and particularly this clause of the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Simard: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make my contribution to the debate on the bill under consideration.

One would have to have one's tongue cut off, or still be completely voiceless to refrain from taking part in the debate on this same bill which seems to me to be vitiated by deficiencies and defects detrimental to the Canadian people, who have a right to expect greater objectivity and protection on the part of present legislators.

Numerous amendments submitted to our approval are not, or will not be, likely to solve the problem which now faces the Canadian consumer. I am thinking especially of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Saltsman) which suggests that the fate of consumers, worried and squeezed by the excessive and frightening increase in the prices of essential consumer goods, be entrusted to another crown corporation. This amendment which is quite subtle, I agree, cleverly sanctions control of socialism diametrically opposed to private enterprise—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I wish to remind the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean that an amendment has not yet been put before the committee by the hon. member for Waterloo South; the hon. member gave notice to the committee that an amendment would be moved, but no amendment has yet been submitted by the hon. member for Waterloo South.

Mr. Simard: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for clarifying the matter.

As a solution and cure to the excessive cost of consumer products, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) that:

That subclause (1) of clause 6 be amended by adding thereto, immediately after paragraph (d) thereof, the following new paragraph (e):

to establish a national credit commission which would be authorized by the Bank of Canada to reassess and adjust consumer prices and compensate any differences by a two-price policy.

Mr. Chairman, any monetary or financial system that does not take into account the question of prices is bound to fail. Sooner or later, it must face the phenomena of inflation and deflation. What use then the monetary units we have in our pockets if the prices of products offered to consumers increase in the same proportion?

Now, in what way does the Social Credit technique for price adjustment limit the freedom of producers and distributors in setting their own sale price? Does the government bureaucrats know the cost price of goods offered for sale better than the producer?

The producer alone must set the conditions which he feels are most appropriate to the production process to meet the needs of the Canadian consumers, but it is not for him to set or determine the conditions under which the consumers will get his products; that is to say, the producer cannot be denied his right to get paid in full according to his sale price, but it does not matter to him if the money he receives comes in full from the consumer or if part of that money has been issued by a credit organization whose creation we recommend.

Such price adjustment could also be made at set periods, every six months or once a year. It can be called a general discount applied to all retail products. That discount could be repaid to the retailer through the issuance of credit.

This bookkeeping operation would enable buyers to pay only a set fraction of the price of the item wanted and the merchant would be compensated for the difference through a credit opened by the authorized office.

This principle of the social responsibility of the state in matters of distribution is quite in accordance with this sentence from the encyclical "Quadragesimo anno", and I quote:

For then only will the economic and social organism be soundly established and attain its end, when it secures for all and each those goods which the wealth and resources of nature, technical achievement, and the social organization of economic affairs can give.

Mr. Turner: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Concerning the admissibility of this amendment, I should like to know whether the hon. member has moved his amendment?

The Deputy Chairman: No amendment has been submitted.

Mr. Simard: Mr. Chairman, I shall read that amendment again. I moved, supported by the hon. member for Portneuf, that in clause 6, immediately after subclause (d), another subclause (e) be added as follows:

To establish a national credit commission which would be authorized by the Bank of Canada to reassess and adjust consumer prices and compensate any differences by a two-price policy.

The Deputy Chairman: Would the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Simard) send me the complete text of the amendment?

• (8:20 p.m.)

[English]

There is an amendment submitted by the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, to add to clause 6 a paragraph (e), to read as follows:

(e) to establish a national credit commission which would be authorized by the Bank of Canada to reassess and adjust consumer prices and compensate any differences by a two-price policy.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) has heard, no doubt, the amendment moved in French by the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean. The Chair entertains some doubts with regard to the admissibility of the amendment and it would appreciate the enlightened and knowledgeable assistance of the hon. member in the ruling it has to make.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I was about to suggest that the question be put to a vote, but since you insist to get some elucidation as to the admissibility of the amendment, I respectfully submit that the amendment is out of order, and for three reasons.

First, it involves the expenditures of public funds, a power which is reserved to the executive. Secondly, the resolution which preceded the bill does not provide for the creation of such board, and if we consider rather carefully that resolution, we shall find that it contained no provision concerning the creation of such a board, even on a temporary basis. Thirdly, the amendment is not relevant to the bill.

I am prepared to quote Beauchesne's parliamentary rules but among the arguments which I have put forward with regard to the creation of a prices review board I quoted some precedents with regard to the expenditures of the crown and the purposes of the resolution. However, in order to support my argument to the effect that the amendment is not relevant, I shall quote Beauchesne's citation 203, fourth edition, which reads as follows:

[English]

It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed. Every amendment proposed to be made either to a question or to a proposed amendment should be so framed that if agreed to by the house the question or amendment as amended would be intelligible and consistent with itself.

I think that the remainder of the quotation is self-explanatory. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I submit that this amendment is out of order.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, the attitude of the minister, who is piloting this bill, does not surprise us in the least, because it seldom occurs that a minister does not defend the way his bill is drafted. As a matter of fact, in the mind of the minister introducing it, the bill is perfect and cannot possibly be amended. That is why he defends so vigorously the clauses in his bill.

The first objection raised by the minister as to the validity of this amendment, is that it will involve an expenditure of money.

Mr. Chairman, it may be seen that clause 6, subsection (1) paragraphs (a) and (b) read as follows:

(1) In exercising his powers and carrying out his duties and functions in relation to consumers' affairs under this Act, the Minister shall

(a) initiate, recommend or undertake programs designed to promote the interests of the Canadian consumer;

But the minister does not tell us how he will go about it. He will set up or prepare programs, but he does not say what programs he has in mind nor the way in which he will apply them.

Clause 6(b) provides:

—co-ordinate programs of the government of Canada that are designed to promote the interests of the Canadian consumer;

But how will he promote the interests of the Canadian consumers? Will he suggest, as we hear too often, new taxes? This would not promote the interests of the Canadian consumers, and the amendment is intended precisely to provide in the bill a means of safeguarding and promoting the interests of the Canadian consumers, by a two-price policy, which would reduce prices without increasing the cost. Since this two-price policy would be provided by the funds of the Bank of Canada, it would not be reflected in the production costs, so that the cost of living would actually decrease, which would be in the real interest of the Canadian consumers.

As for the second objection, the hon. minister tells us that the resolution does not provide for such a board. Of course, if the resolution introduced by the hon. minister had provided for such a board, there would have been no need for an amendment, that is clear.

Third, he claims that this is not relevant to the bill. Mr. Chairman, the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Simard) is precisely intended to improve clause 6 of the bill, to make it more efficient by providing for a two-price policy to help the consumer and, at the same time, allow the government to fight efficiently against inflation and the rising cost of living.

Therefore, in my opinion, the amendment is acceptable.

• (8:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: I have a very brief comment, Mr. Chairman. Having lived in Alberta, I recognize this amendment as a refinement of the A plus B theorem which Major Douglas put forward in his book on social credit. I cannot accept it and I agree with the minister that it is out of order. However, I am shocked and surprised at the minister, who should recall a famous incident of several years ago when members of the present government sat in opposition on this side. At that time, an amendment having been moved by the Social Credit party, the then official opposition endorsed the famous Martin doctrine that anything goes as long as the government is beaten. Later the President of the Privy Council, with his party tenderly embraced this doctrine, and voted for the amendment. I am shocked at the members of the government who have now turned their backs on the doctrine.

An hon. Member: Those were the days of funny money.

Mr. McCleave: The members of the government have no conscience.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I thank the hon. members for their many explanations. By addressing submissions to the Chair, hon. members enable it to consult books to which reference must be made rather often.

Here, I must, for the guidance of hon. members, quote citation 203 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms:

> It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed. Every amendment proposed to be made either to a question or to a proposed amendment should be so framed that if it is agreed to by the house the question or amendment as amended would be intelligible and consistent with itself.
> The law on relevancy of amendments is that if they are on the same subject matter with the original motion they are admissible but not when foreign thereto.

I venture to draw the attention of hon. members of this committee to paragraph 3 of the citation 246 by the same author which reads as follows:

> The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment from the financial initiative of the crown is that the communication, to which the royal demand of recommendation is attached must be treated as laying down once for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of a charge, but also of its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications.

Lastly, I should like to draw the attention of the hon. members to citation 406 appearing on page 285 and I quote:

> Amendments are out of order if they are > a. irrelevant to the bill or beyond its scope, governed by or dependent upon amendments already negatived;
> b. inconsistent with or contradictory to the bill as agreed to by the committee.

For all those reasons, I declare that the amendment is out of order.

[English]

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, until the present time the house has been very unsuccessful in trying to induce the minister to insert some teeth into this legislation. He has two strikes against him, but the third time will really be out for him. The final proof of whether or not the legislation is worth while or whether it will help the consumer rests on the measures contained in it for that purpose. All we have now are some generalities, some words regarding good intentions, and a hopeful outlook for the consumer; but there is nothing positive which will demonstrate that the minister using these powers can act effectively on behalf of the consumers.

Earlier today the minister was given an opportunity to take some action with regard to copper prices. He has turned it down. I would now like to suggest to the minister a specific area of difficulty in this country and a situation which calls out for correction, namely the high price of drugs. I suggest to him that he should examine this legislation to see what could be done to bring down the price of drugs.

In some of his previous statements the minister has indicated he intends to take some action in this regard. So far we have seen nothing of a concrete nature to help the consumer in reducing the cost of drugs. The government has thrown out a bonus; it has given away tax money for this purpose. So far we cannot see that this reduction of taxes has significantly affected the situation. There is no need to document extensively what is going on in the field of drug prices in Canada. This has been done very effectively by a committee set up for the purpose. But I would like to draw the minister's attention to a few statements to indicate the serious nature of this problem. I refer him to a statement made on February 14 and reported in the issue of the Toronto Star of that date. The heading reads "Alberta Study hits out at Drug Firms", and the text reads as follows:

A U.S. economist says his study of the Canadian drug industry shows that lack of price competition among druggists "is a major factor in the high cost of drugs."

Farther on Professor Steele went on to say:

Excessive sales promotion budgets of the big manufacturers create a major barrier to entry into the industry by small firms who could provide effective price competition.

Another report in the Toronto Telegram of February 14 stated that the Alberta government called for sweeping changes in patent, tariff, trade mark and tax laws which were proposed to the House of Commons drug prices inquiry by a United States economist, commissioned by Alberta. The article reads in part as follows:

His study said the industry here now is almost 90 per cent foreign-controlled and well able to lower the barriers that squeeze out smaller competitors.

Prices could be cut by half with annual savings to consumers of $100 million.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

We are speaking about a vast sum of money which, in many cases, is being paid by those least able to afford it. If we consider a smaller estimate such as the one put forward by the druggists, we find that it is their belief that $50 million could be cut from the customer prices. I should like to quote the following statement from the Kitchener-Waterloo Record of August 18:

If two resolutions passed by the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association Thursday were put into effect, Canadians could save as much as $50 million a year says association president Philip W. Goldman.

Whichever estimate the minister wishes to accept, either the $100 million or the $50 million, it is certainly an indication of the amount of charging that is taking place, due either to profiteering or to the inefficency of the drug industry in this country.

The editorial of the Toronto Star of April 4 was entitled "They soak the sick: Ottawa should get though on drug firms", and is as follows:

• (8:40 p.m.)

Profiteering and wasteful expensive promotion make Canadian drug prices among the highest in the world.

Then, in an editorial in the Globe and Mail, I read this:

The House of Commons committee on drugs seemed to doubt that it was. In its April report it suggested that the drug industry was more interested in its pockets than in sick people (except as a source of revenue.) The committee found that Canadian drug prices were among the highest in the world, up 140 per cent in the past 16 years compared with 40.8 per cent for general consumer goods, and returning profits double that enjoyed by other manufacturing industries.

As an indication of what is happening to the consumer, I should like to quote from the minutes of the special committee on drug costs and prices for Thursday, December 1, at page 1512. The hon. member for Winnipeg North is questioning the witness about government policy on buying drugs and the prices paid by the government as compared with prices paid by consumers. The record reads:

Mr. Chairman, just for the record, I would like to point out that the department was able to purchase at the price of $3.25 per one hundred, and that Parke Davis, which is the big manufacturer or distributor in Canada, offered them to the department for $6.39 per one hundred.

I made a phone call after we got this table. The list price which Parke Davis offers to retail druggists in Canada is $39.40 a hundred; the discount which the druggist gets is 40 per cent. The retail druggist therefore pays $23.64 for one hundred of these capsules which Parke Davis offered to the department for $6.39 a hundred. I think it is an interesting comparison.

—on Librium, I notice that here again prices were asked for 10 milligram tablets in bottle sizes of 100 tablets. I notice that Hoffmann-La Roche, which tendered the lowest price offered them to the department for $2.60 a hundred in bottles of 100 tablets. The price to retail drugstores by Hoffmann-La Roche is $12 a hundred, list price.

There are many examples of this type that could be placed on the record. It is generally acknowledged by those who have looked into the situation that the drug industry is in deplorable shape and needs some corrective action. If this department of consumer affairs is to serve a really useful purpose, then it must take action to bring down the prices of drugs. We do not believe that the bill, as it is now constituted, possesses the power to use effectively all the instruments that the minister might be able to use on behalf of the consumer. The willingness of the government to consider our proposal will be an indication of how serious it is in tackling this problem.

I should like to read into the record an article written by Mr. D. H. Fullerton which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen for November 25. The writer raises these very interesting questions:

Action to bring down Canadian drug prices continues to move at a snail's pace.

In June the sales tax on drugs was removed, although most observers felt that this step should have awaited measures to bring greater price competition into the business.

Current proposals being considered by the government involve compulsory import licences and changes in the Trade Marks Act, which would increase the effectiveness of import competition.

Unfortunately, even if these proposals become law there is some doubt whether the impact on drug prices will be more than marginal.

In a society where the high cost of drugs is borne by those least able to afford it—the old, the sick and the poor—one may be pardoned for asking why action on drugs has not had a higher priority.

One answer is being observed in Ottawa today where the well-heeled, monopolistic, and internationally powerful drug industry has been recently mounting the most intensive lobby ever seen in the capital.

A senator with impeccable political connections is acting as contact man for the industry. Ministers, senior officials—in fact anyone who is likely to have any possible role in drug policy—are being wined and dined and courted by the manufacturers.

Several new plants are being promised for certain key constituencies—as if new jobs for a few hundred workers would counterbalance the $200 million or more the country is paying annually in excessive prices for drugs!

The effectiveness of the drug lobby was plainly demonstrated at hearings of the commons committee on drug costs and prices. One M.P. was openly being fed information and questions by representatives of the companies and of their organization, the P.M.A.C., in order that he could better interrogate witnesses hostile to the drug manufacturers.

The minister has an opportunity tonight to indicate that some of these charges are not true. He can take positive action to curtail the influence and power of the drug companies in Canada. I suggest that influence and power is being used against the consumer.

As an indication of the kind of reprehensible approach the drug companies take, I have a letter sent to me by a doctor who resented the infantile approach of these drug companies to the members of his profession. The letter has at the top a picture of two little capsules. I will not read it into the record because it is too lengthy. However, the letter, in child-like terms, goes on gently to lead the doctor to consider that these two capsules might not be alike, but it does not give him any adequate reason for saying so.

This letter is from Bristol Laboratories of Canada Limited, and is put out by a firm that at the moment is under investigation in the United States for price fixing. I should like to quote from an article in the Globe and Mail of October 24, 1967 which reads:

After six years of delay, the drug industry's battle of the century has begun in Federal District Court here.

The adversaries are the justice department and three of the nation's largest drug manufacturers—Chas. Pfizer and Co. Inc., American Cyanamid Co. and Bristol-Myers Co. These are charged in a three count indictment with fixing artificially high prices and monopolizing the manufacture, distribution and sale of the "wonder" antibiotic drugs that millions of Americans use.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out to the minister that even tariff removal on drugs, or complete free trade between Canada and the United States would not be effective in solving the problem of consumers in Canada of procuring drugs at the prices they should be paying. The same companies that are operating in the United States are operating in this country, and if they are fixing prices, arranging prices or whatever they may be doing in the United States, I think it is reasonably certain the same thing will be happening in this country. All that the removal of the tariff will accomplish will be to allow the companies to rationalize a little better than they have in the past.

The impact on drug users would be minimal. Far more than that has to be done in order to bring this industry to heel. We believe that a provision should be included in this bill to permit the government to establish a crown corporation which could manufacture drugs, or could buy them from Canadian companies and put the government brand on them. These drugs could then be distributed directly to druggists. The crown company could operate with a minimum of advertising and could generally serve to rationalize the industry on behalf of the consumer.

What we are suggesting is not original. The government does this now on behalf of many of its own agencies. If I may, I should like to quote again from the minutes for December 1 of the special committee on drug costs and prices for December 1, page 1500. Mr. I. C. Ellis, pharmacist for the Department of National Health and Welfare is being questioned about suppliers, and he said:

> —the Department of National Health and Welfare does have a variety of programs. We all seem to go along in different directions in the procurement of drugs. The medical services branch, which covers the activities of the Indian health services and northern health services, sick mariners services and civil service health, requires pharmaceuticals and continuing supplies in varying amounts.
> The Emergency Health Services Division of the Health Services Branch require large annual purchases of drugs and pharmaceuticals for additions to, and resupply of, the national stockpile.

There is also a general purchasing branch in the Department of Defence Production charged with the responsibility of procuring a very wide range of commodities, and among these commodities are drugs.

The amounts are not insignificant. As reported at page 1526 of the same report, in reply to a question about the amounts, Mr. Erskine stated:

> Mr. Chairman, in total dollar value I could not tell you. Certainly it is a very small percentage of individual types of drugs; but we have not yet any statistics for the two departments that are fairly new customers of ours. We have some estimates of their total requirements in a year. I think around 3½ million is what we expect. The Department of National Defence would run anywhere from $750,000 to $1 million, and National Health and Welfare would be relatively small, perhaps $100,000.

So you can see, Mr. Chairman, about $5 million worth of purchases are accounted for by Mr. Erskine. What we are suggesting is that this program, which is now operated in a somewhat divided way, be grouped together and then extended so that purchases in bulk be made not only on behalf of government departments but also on behalf of the consumers of this country. I do not anticipate that this corporation would take a very large proportion of the business in drugs in this country; but if the government were to move into this field and indicate that it intended to take action to bring down the price of drugs by this method, then the industry would soon straighten itself out very quickly. If they did not do so, the government would take over some of their business.

There has been experience of this situation in other countries. For example, in Sweden the co-ops undertook the job. They effectively reduced prices in many areas, just by moving into the market and taking a small portion of business in the market. The other companies in the field got the message very quickly and reduced their prices to a more reasonable level.

The minister has previously pointed out in argument the difficulty of establishing what is a fair price, or how one arrives at a price. I would suggest that one of the ways to establish this is in a competitive market. However in order to be sure that the price is as competitive or as low as it could possibly be under the circumstances, there must be real competition. This we have not had in the drug industry in this country. Therefore I suggest that the minister has an obligation on behalf of Canadian consumers to see that such competition and alternate supply exists for the consumers, and is obligated to seek powers in the bill that enable him to do so.

Hospitals all across Canada are now doing exactly what I am suggesting the minister should do. They are buying drugs on behalf of the consumers, who ultimately pay the hospital bills. I would therefore suggest that the minister give very careful consideration to this proposal and indicate his willingness and concern to take real action on behalf of the consumers by accepting the amendment I should like to move at this time. My amendment is as follows:

> That sub-clause (1) of clause 6 be amended by adding thereto, immediately after paragraph (d) thereof, the following new paragraph:
> "(e) establish a corporation on behalf of Her Majesty which shall be empowered to: manufacture, sell, distribute, and promote drugs offered for sale in Canada;
> supervise all advertising and promotion activities related to drugs including the distribution of samples and the content of advertising literature."

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I will be brief. I am not going to get into a general debate on the price of drugs but I am going to question the admissibility of this amendment and object to it as being irrelevant to the bill as it stands. I am not in any way questioning the seriousness of the problem, and I am not joining issue with the hon. member for Waterloo South on the merits of his case. However, I think the opportunity will present itself to the hon. member when we debate the legislation to amend the Patent Act and Trade Marks Act which was foreseen in the throne speech, having to do with measures to be taken by the government in relation to the price of drugs. Therefore, while I am in no way minimizing the problem he has presented and am not joining issue with him, I would submit, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member's amendment, which seeks to establish a corporation to manufacture, sell, distribute and promote drugs offered for sale in Canada, is irrelevant to the context of this bill.

We have gone through some of the arguments before, but I would object to the admissibility of this amendment on three specific grounds. First of all, Mr. Chairman, I want to repeat the argument I have already put to Your Honour respecting the prices review board, which at that time you found unacceptable. If this amendment were carried the establishment of a crown corporation would add to the expenditure of money that is chargeable to the Canadian taxpayer, and it is not within the power of a private member, according to the precedents established in this house, to present such amendment.

In this regard I refer Your Honour once more to the citations in Beauchesne, citation 246 (3) and citation 249 (1). I would also refer Your Honour to the same citations to which I earlier alluded in May's Parliamentary Procedure. The two rulings of earlier Speakers would be just as relevant, I submit, to this argument as they were when we were discussing the creation of a prices review board.

Second, Mr. Chairman, I submit the amendment is beyond the scope of the resolution which introduced this money bill. The resolution provides that the governor in council may establish a consumer advisory council and other bodies to assist the minister. While I accept your decision, Mr. Chairman, that a prices review board might be fitted within the four corners of the resolution, surely the creation of an independent crown corporation, an independent operating body having the authority and power to manufacture, sell, distribute and promote the sale of drugs, is well beyond the scope of the resolution and cannot be entertained by the committee.

My third ground, Mr. Chairman, is that the amendment is irrelevant to the purposes of this bill. This is a general enabling bill empowering the department and the minister to co-ordinate, initiate and promote the general interest of the consumer. The general interest of the consumer in Canada embraces a number of specific subjects. If this amendment were to be accepted, surely amendments relating specifically to weights and measures, packaging and labelling, advertising and all the other particular aspects of the consumer's interest would be just as acceptable.

I submit to Your Honour that a specific reference to drugs as one aspect only of the general policy of the government does not relate to the enabling power in the bill itself. In this connection I draw Your Honour's attention to citation 203 (1) of Beauchesne, which in the fourth edition is to be found at page 171:

> It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed—
> The law on the relevancy of amendments is that if they are on the same subject-matter with the original motion, they are admissible, but not when foreign thereto.

• (9:00 p.m.)

I also direct Your Honour's attention to page 549 of May's Parliamentary Practice, seventeenth edition, where the question of admissibility of amendments is dealt with. Under the heading, "inadmissible amendments", in paragraph (1) are found the following words:

> An amendment is out of order if it is irrelevant to the subject matter ... or beyond the scope of the bill ... or if it is irrelevant to the subject matter ... or beyond the scope of the clause under consideration ... Amendments which are irrelevant to the clause under consideration should, as a general rule, if they are within the scope of the bill be moved as new clauses.

On page 551, paragraph 13, are found the following words:

> Amendments or new clauses creating public charges cannot be proposed, if no money resolution or ways and means resolution has been passed, or if the amendment or clause is not covered by the terms of the resolution.

That refers back to the second ground of my objection.

In summary I submit that, serious though the problem raised by the hon. member might be, and anxious as I am to join issue on the merits of his argument while making no comment on the substance of what he said this evening, I ought to point out that he will have another opportunity during the session to present his argument, when a matter that is more relevant to his argument is being considered.

Mr. Orlikow: I was interested in the minister's comments. At one point he told us that the purpose—

The Chairman: Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member for Winnipeg North is about to assist the Chair to arrive at a decision as to whether this amendment is acceptable.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to make a few comments on points the minister raised. Though we have heard arguments in this house on questions of irrelevancy of amendments, nothing it seems to me is more relevant than the $200 million the consumers of Canada are forced to overpay with respect to drug prescriptions in one year.

That is an important amount of money and we ought to address ourselves to consideration of how it is spent. The minister suggested that the amendment is out of order since the purpose of the bill is to permit the minister to appoint advisory committees to help him. I was under the impression that the bill was being enacted to help our consumers. I can think of nothing which would help our consumers more directly than allowing them to buy prescription drugs at a fair price.

The Chairman: Order, please. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North is discussing the amendment. The Chair wishes to hear arguments for and against the admissibility of the amendment before a ruling is made.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, my point might be made more clearly if I were to recite to Your Honour the provisions of clause 6(1)(a) which reads as follows:

(1) In exercising his powers and carrying out his duties and functions in relation to consumers' affairs under this Act, the minister shall

(a) initiate, recommend or undertake programs designed to promote the interests of the Canadian consumer;

It is obvious from this, that any measure which enables the Canadian consumer to save money is admissible. The amendment of the hon. member for Waterloo South would materially help our consumers to save money and would contribute to their welfare. The words I have read give the minister power to do precisely what our amendment proposes. We can demonstrate beyond a shadow of doubt that our amendment is truly worth while, and I think Your Honour ought to rule that the amendment is admissible.

I wish to raise another point. Throughout this debate the minister has said, "I will not argue about what you are proposing, but this is the wrong time"—or the wrong place, or the wrong bill—"and you should not make your proposition now." The minister suggested that some of our suggestions might be put forward appropriately on the trade marks and patents legislation. I tell him that I have grave doubts about whether we shall ever reach that legislation, at the rate at which we are moving. Even so, I submit that our proposal to establish a crown corporation to manufacture and distribute prescription drugs, which is the substance of the amendment, will have as little to do with the patent and trade marks legislation, when that is brought down, as the minister's arguments have to do with this amendment at this time. I suggest that our amendment is proper and that the committee ought to support it.

Mr. Saltsman: I wish to deal with some of the points raised by the minister with respect to the admissibility of the amendment and, particularly, I wish to deal with the question of relevancy. The amendment is of the highest relevancy, since no other measure that I am aware of would as effectively help the drug consumers of the country as would our amendment, if it were adopted in the legislation.

The minister also raised the question that our amendment involved expenditure of money. We are not talking about any additional expenditure of money. We presume that the crown corporation referred to in the amendment would be self supporting; it would not be bonused, if I may use that term. It could carry itself and compete effectively against the drug companies, as well as bring some return on its investment.

Our proposal is eminently practical since the drug industry of this country needs effective competition. Only the government, with its resources, can create a crown corporation which would not involve the expenditure of extra money and which would provide the drug companies of this country with effective competition.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Waterloo South is debating the amendment. The Chair wishes the committee to present arguments on whether the amendment is admissible. Debating the amendment itself is quite another matter.

Mr. Saltsman: Respectfully, Mr. Chairman, in dealing with the admissibility of the amendment I was trying to answer the point the minister raised. He said that accepting the amendment would entail the expenditure of money and we say that this amendment, if it were accepted, would not involve the government in additional expenditures, within the normal meaning of that term.

The minister also said that the amendment went beyond the scope of the resolution. He said that the resolution provided for bodies to assist the minister. Nothing else would assist the minister more in carrying out his duties than establishing a crown corporation like the one proposed in the amendment. That is completely within the terms of reference of the resolution.

Answering the minister's third point, that anything enacted under this legislation must be shown to be of interest to consumers, I say again, as I said when answering the second point, that the amendment would be of enormous interest to consumers and to those in Canada who suffer because of the distorted price structure which the drug industry of this country has created with respect to drugs. I submit that nothing could interest consumers more than the amendment we are seeking to move tonight.

Mr. Nasserden: The hon. member who has just resumed his seat referred to the creation of yet another crown corporation and the results which might flow from it. It would be irrelevant to go into that issue as the present time. But the whole tenor of this bill has been to provide a policing structure and an information bureau—indeed, I referred to it earlier in the debate as being a glorified information bureau to provide consumers with information about products they might be using. I do not think it is within the purview of this bill to set up a crown corporation.

Consider the experience in Saskatchewan over a period of 20 years, during which crown corporations were set up by the C.C.F. government under the leadership of the present leader of the New Democratic party. The developments which took place in that province were far from happy.

The Chairman: The Chair is interested in hearing arguments for or against the admissibility of the amendment, not for or against the amendment itself.

Mr. Nasserden: I was about to indicate that the creation of a crown corporation, as this amendment suggests, would divert all the attention of the minister and his department away from the task parliament is seeking to give them. For this reason alone I believe the amendment is completely irrelevant. Indeed it amounts to deliberate obstruction on the part of members of the N.D.P. when they introduce amendments of this type to a bill of the kind now before us, knowing full well that they are irrelevant.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I am assuming that the argument the minister made with regard to relevance has fallen on deaf ears, because it is one which cannot be supported by logic or common sense. Nothing could be more relevant to a department of consumer affairs than the protection of a particularly badly exploited section of consumers by a particularly rapacious segment of industry. I will spend no more time on this question of relevance.

The other point the minister raised was that it went beyond the power of a private member to introduce such an amendment because it entailed government expenditures. I would draw the minister's attention to clause 6 (a) where it is stated that the minister shall—he has no option about this—initiate and recommend or undertake programs designed to promote the interests of the Canadian consumer.

The amendment produced by my hon. friend from Waterloo South specified one such program which the minister should undertake in carrying out the terms of this legislation. Surely the legislation allows the development of precisely such a corporation. After all, we have not as yet been presented with an estimate of the cost of setting up this new department. We have not been told that certain limits of expenditure have been placed upon the minister in the performance on his duties. Paragraph (a) clearly indicates that the minister has very wide authority to undertake any kind of program, whether it be the establishment of crown corporations or any other action, if he believes he is acting in the interests of the Canadian consumer. The bill itself sets out the minister's duties and, as I say, one of these is to establish programs in the interests of the consumer. Our amendment specifies the sort of program he should be considering.

The Chairman: If members have no further comment on the admissibility of the amendment, the Chair could possibly proceed. May I first of all point out that under the terms of the resolution the governor in council may establish a consumer advisory council "and other bodies to assist the minister". The interpretation which the Chair would place on those words would be "bodies coming within the purview or within the control of the department." The setting up of an independent body such as a crown corporation would I believe, not come within the meaning of "a body to assist the minister" as referred to in the resolution.

Second, it is the opinion of the Chair that setting up a crown corporation would be a matter for major parliamentary decision and something which would be more properly done by a substantive motion rather than by an amendment to a clause of a bill.

Again, the setting up of such a corporation would be well outside the scope of the resolution. May I read to the committee part of citation 246 (3) beginning at the sixth line?

> In relation to the standard thereby fixed, an amendment infringes the financial initiative of the crown, not only if it increases the amount, but also if it extends the objects and purposes, or relaxes the conditions and qualifications expressed in the communication by which the crown has demanded or recommended a charge.

In the resolution which was agreed to on October 13 there was surely no authority given to this department to manufacture, sell or distribute drugs. This, in the opinion of the Chair, is well outside the confines of the resolution.

For these reasons, therefore, I declare the amendment out of order.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have another amendment to put forward. I will first of all explain the reasons for moving it.

Mr. Mackasey: Why don't you people form a government some time and bring in your own proposals?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Some hon. members over there are in a terrific hurry to pass this bill. I can tell them that for a great many people in this country this is one of the most important measures to come before the present parliament. We intend to draw attention to proposals which could make it a far better piece of legislation if they were adopted. If they are not adopted we shall point out that the public is not being granted the protection to which it is entitled. The bill in its present form is deceiving the people of this country, and unless it is improved we shall be the first to point out its shortcomings.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

In its interim report on consumer affairs, the economic council in July, 1967, reported upon the responsibilities of the Registrar General and recommended the establishment of an interdepartmental committee on consumer affairs under the chairmanship of the deputy registrar general. It stated that this committee should include the deputy ministers of trade and commerce, national health and welfare, industry, agriculture, fisheries, insurance, finance and justice and of such other departments as have a continuing interest in consumer affairs. It stated that in such matters as food, pesticides, consumer credit, consumer goods standards and trade practices, where responsibilities are widely distributed, such co-ordination was imperative for efficient administration.

We would be the last to decry the idea of close co-ordination, but again I would point out that in this respect there is a great lack in the bill. I have been approached by a good many people, members of the Consumers Association of Canada, members of the price protesters association, and by people inside government departments who have told me of the difficulties that exist in regard to this legislation. They have told me that there is a need for it to be amended to make sure that such co-ordination will be possible.

The quickest way in which I can illustrate the need for an amendment such as I am going to move is by quoting from a brief submitted by the Consumers Association of Canada to the Economic Council of Canada in July last. In the appendix to the brief there is a good illustration of the problems arising out of divided jurisdiction in the federal government in matters affecting consumer interests. At the present time there are several departments concerned with consumer interests; thus an amendment such as I am about to propose is necessary. I quote from the appendix to the brief as follows:

> In late 1963 and early 1964, C.A.C. received complaints from a number of consumers across the country that milk and fruit juices sold in wax cartons in retail stores did not contain the amount of liquid contents stated on the carton. Before acting on these complaints, C.A.C. undertook a pilot-measuring project in Toronto. Two samples of 21 brands of various kinds of milk and fruit juices in wax cartons were purchased at random across the city. Using standard measures from the Department of Trade and Commerce, and watched by an official of the Weights and Measures division of that department, C.A.C. members measured the contents of these cartons. Thirteen of the 21 brands contained less than the amount of contents stated on the package, several brands being four fluid ounces short. Two weeks later the operation was repeated and the same results secured.

Inspection of these cartons was the responsibility of both the Food and Drug Directorate, the Department of Trade and Commerce, and in the case of fluid milk, the provincial department of agriculture. As a result of dual and triple control and lack of co-ordination, inspection failed to give consumers the protection they should have been receiving to ensure full value for their dollars.

After checking a complaint that cans of tomato juice labelled 20 fluid ounces did not contain that amount, C.A.C. decided that this matter needed a more thorough investigation. In 1964, some 237 cans of juices in seven different sizes, but chiefly in the most popular size, 20 fluid ounces, were purchased across Canada and shipped to a qualified testing laboratory for careful measurement of the contents.

I quote this to show that the Consumers Association of Canada has been doing very careful work on behalf of consumers in checking complaints and trying to have them remedied under existing legislation, and I believe the members of the association have every right to demand through some of us here that we make this legislation foolproof.

The laboratory reported that none of the cans labelled 105 fluid ounces contained 105 fluid ounces: only one in nine of those labelled 20 fluid ounces contained 20 fluid ounces. Only in the sizes labelled 48 fluid ounces and 10 fluid ounces did all samples contain the amount stated on the label. It was obvious that in most sizes it was very difficult and in some sizes impossible for processors to fill the cans with the amount stated on the label. These cans are of international standard sizes and the amount stated on the label is regulated under the Canada Agricultural Products Standard Act.

On the basis of the test, C.A.C. requested the Department of Agriculture to review its labelling requirements under this act to ensure that the labels of canned juices correctly state the amount of the contents of the can. The results of the test and this request were reported in the press.

Now I come to the moral of the story.

The matter was also referred to the food and drug directorate, which has the responsibility under the Food and Drugs Act that food shall not be labelled or sold in a manner which is false or misleading. The director immediately informed C.A.C. that the directorate was fully aware of the incorrect labelling and for ten years had been trying to get the Department of Agriculture to amend its regulations to require accurate labelling not only of canned juices but of canned juices, fruits and vegetables.

For ten years the food and drug directorate had been trying to get co-operation from the Department of Agriculture, and unless something is done to make this procedure more effective than has been the case in the past, Canadian consumers will be left very much under-protected. I continue with the quotation:

The Department of Agriculture has since taken action. Amended regulations of this department became fully effective on January 1st, 1966. Until C.A.C. discovered this deception and pressed for rectification of the labelling, the food and drug directorate was unable, on account of the inactivity of the Department of Agriculture, to carry out its responsibilities under the Food and Drugs Act.

I know that this bill provides for co-ordination of these different activities under the minister, but I maintain there is still something important lacking, and that is why I move:

That subclause (1) of clause 6 of Bill C-161 be amended by adding thereto the following new paragraph:

"(e) be empowered to secure information from any other department of the government to assist in the investigation of consumer complaints."

In other words, Mr. Chairman, we want to give the minister power to go into the Department of Agriculture, the food and drug directorate or whatever other department may be involved, to get information directly related to consumer complaints. If the bill remains in its present form there is nothing to prevent a situation happening again such as I outlined a few moments ago, where a consumer complaint was left unsolved for ten years while one department waited for another department to act.

This amendment does not propose the spending of public money. It does not interfere with provincial jurisdiction. It does not get the minister in wrong with industry. I really hope he approves of it. I may say that this is not my own idea. It comes from members of the Consumers Association of Canada, who are to be found all across the country. I feel this amendment would strengthen this clause in the bill.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Amendment (Mrs. MacInnis—Vancouver-Kingsway) negatived: Yeas 24; nays, 43.

Mr. Fawcett: Mr. Chairman, during all this debate I have not taken any of the time of the house. However, I do not feel I should let this clause pass without making a few remarks. As my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway pointed out, this, at least to the general public, is one of the most important pieces of legislation that has been brought before this house in a long time. When I look at clause 6 I cannot help feeling that it deals in very vague generalities. I should like to quote subclause (1)(a):

> initiate, recommend or undertake programs designed to promote the interests of the Canadian consumer;

What type of programs are to be undertaken? Will they be educational programs or programs designed to enlighten the general public with regard to the quality of goods? I notice that further down in clause 6 it states that the minister does have the authority to undertake research and publish or cause to be published anything in connection with what this research divulges. However, there does not seem to be anything very specific here. This is my complaint in respect of the whole bill, although necessarily I must deal with clause 6. I should like to be a little parochial and ask whether under the authority of this clause someone will look into the situation in northern Ontario to determine why we pay seven cents more for a gallon of gasoline than is paid 100 miles to the south, when the cost of transportation on gasoline is approximately a quarter of a cent a gallon? Is this one of the things on which the minister is going to have some research done? Will these paragraphs be used to expose the methods used in high pressure advertising?

We know, in respect of the various brands of soaps, that if the sale of a particular brand would seem to be falling off the company comes up with another brand which has a special additive. Neither you, Mr. Chairman, nor I nor the people across the country know what this additive is. We do not know whether it contributes anything to the product. This is another place where I believe there should be a good deal of research in order to determine whether these additives contribute anything to the product, or whether they are just another method of "hard sell". Will the ingredients contained in various products be analysed so that a comparison may be made between the quality of the highly advertised products which sell in the stores primarily under a brand name, plus of course the "hard sell" advertising, and the quality of the lesser advertised products? Here as an example I might use a product which is packaged for the various chain stores, and which sells under a name used by the chain store, although this product in many cases is manufactured by the same company which manufactures the products which are sold under brand names. These brand name products in many cases sell for considerably more than the product which is sold under the chain store's brand name.

In this connection I should like to mention something which came to my attention a number of years ago. It do not know whether or not this particular consumers research bureau is still in existence, but at one time in the United States various labour organizations participated in providing the funds for a consumers research bureau. It did very extensive work. The ingredients which went into various products were analysed. Tests were made to find out whether one product was actually better than another. I recall very vividly some comments made in respect of some research carried out on soap, as an example. One particular type of soap that was not advertised on the market at all was packaged in a plain brown paper bag, and sold over the counters not only in chain stores but in the small retail stores. When the ingredients of that product were analysed it was found that it contained practically the same ingredients as the highly advertised brands. In addition it was found that there were other substances in this particular brand of soap which made it a better product than the highly advertised product.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I wonder whether the arguments being put forward by the hon. member about soap are relevant to clause 6.

Mr. Fawcett: With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, I am merely pointing out that this clause deals in generalities and does not specifically point out what kind of research programs will be carried out, how the people will be educated, and so on. Perhaps I might read the second part of this clause:

> For the purpose of carrying out his duties and functions under this act, the minister may undertake research into matters to which the powers, duties and functions of the minister extend, cooperate with any or all provinces or with any department or agency of the government of Canada or any organization or person undertaking such research and publish or cause to be published, or assist in the publication of, so much of the results of any such research as the minister deems appropriate and in the public interest.

Here, so far as my argument is concerned, is one of the most important parts of clause 6, because if we are to have something which is merely a brief article appearing in a newspaper, or a leaflet which is sent to a householder in the mail, I do not think very much will be accomplished. I suggest to the minister that when he comes up with the result of the research into some of the various commodities, the information should be advertised across the country on a popular public affairs program, which the people watch, so that they can be made very much aware of what has been developed by the research carried on by this consumer affairs branch.

As I said, I shall be very brief. I do not intend to say very much more. This clause in particular deals in generalities rather than in specifics. In all probability the minister and his officials when drafting the bill had certain specific things in mind. I only wish that he had been more specific in outlining just what types of research will be carried out and how he hopes to inform the public of the results of the research which is carried out.

• (9:40 p.m.)

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Mr. Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): Mr. Chairman, I have something to say on clause 6. I should like to put on the record some suggestions which I think should be made in relation to clause 6 (c) of this bill. Under clause 6 (c) the minister will be given the power to promote and encourage the institution of practices or conduct tending to the better protection of the Canadian consumer, and so on. He will be able to co-operate with provincial governments or agencies as well as, I presume, various federal agencies. In this respect I believe some specific suggestions should be made. I suggest that the new ministry, in full co-operation with C.M.H.C., take immediate steps to assure greater consumer protection in the field of housing.

I hope the new ministry, acting in its capacity as watchdog over the interests of the consumer will, either by direct pressure on C.M.H.C. or by recourse to the publicity and information supplying resources which will undoubtedly be at its disposal under clause 6(1) (c) and (d) of the new bill, be able to persuade the public, and through the public C.M.H.C.—if this is necessary—that new measures and conditions must become an integral part of future housing developments if the house buying consumer is to have full value for his investment dollar and adequate long term protection for his investment.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has not over the years taken enough social initiative. It has fulfilled its legal responsibilities but has not gone out of its way to impose upon the communities benefiting from its lending funds the aesthetic standards which we should regard as minimal in any housing development. It would be a simple matter for C.M.H.C. to insist that it would not allow its funds to be lent to any development unless provision was made for putting all telephone and electricity lines underground.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation should also insist that adequate recreational facilities, more especially parkland and playground areas, be included in any development receiving its funds. If C.M.H.C. does not soon include these requirements as a condition for extension of its loans, I suggest to the new ministry that it should intervene on behalf of our home buying public.

I should like to add that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is remiss in its duty of lending money to municipalities to install sewage treatment systems and water purification plants without giving them, at the same time, advice on the most efficient and less costly methods. In my constituency, the town of Sainte-Philomène received a loan from the corporation of over $500,000, 25 per cent of which represented a federal government subsidy. Unfortunately for this town, the system installed on the recommendation of private engineers whose fees were a percentage of the total cost of the project, was needlessly complicated. In using the "open pit" method, the municipal authorities of Sainte-Philomène could have achieved the same results at half the cost.

The corporation is mistaken if they consider that their responsibilities end when funds are loaned. It is an inexcusable waste of public moneys to lend funds to install a system twice as expensive as others just as efficient and with a lower cost of operation. When the municipal authorities of a town or a city try to borrow money to install a sewage treatment system or a purification plant, the corporation should provide advice and the services of their own experts.

[English]

I wish to make one further suggestion to C.M.H.C. which I trust the new ministry will keep in mind. For far too long the Canadian house buyer, although protected from structural and basic construction defects by C.M.H.C. standards and provincial laws, has not been adequately protected against finishing defects. Only a minority of house builders are guilty of producing poorly finished houses, but the unfortunate house buyer who discovers that he has acquired a shoddily finished house must engage expensive legal services, if he is to be able to force the builder to fulfil his contractual responsibilities.

In most cases the buyer is too far in debt, because of buying and furnishing his new home, to afford legal services. The builders know this and take advantage of the buyer's position. The builders who get away with deficient finishing are usually the same ones who have purchasers sign purchase offers which are phrased in a way which result in a buyer signing up for more than he bargained for.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation may have fulfilled its legal obligations under the National Housing Act, limiting its responsibility to maintaining basic construction standards; but it has, I submit, a much broader social responsiblity for consumer protection which it has not fulfilled, but could quite easily be put into effect. I would request that the minister of consumer affairs ask C.H.M.C., if this body does not act on its own, to consider without delay the following proposals: That a blacklist be established of all builders who have been the subject of verified, legitimate and well-founded complaints by home buyers to C.M.H.C.; the establishment of a blacklist of delinquent home builders or, alternatively, the creation of a register of the names of those home construction companies who have a complaint free record. This would have an immediate and highly beneficial effect on the house finishing practices of delinquent house building companies. Also an appeal procedure could easily be established which would satisfy the responsible house builders. If hon. members will bear with me, I suggest that the blacklist of complaint free builders be distributed to the public by C.M.H.C. or through the department of consumer affairs. It could be distributed by public libraries, consumer groups and a broad selection of associations and public bodies.

[Mr. Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie).]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): I suggest that such a house buyer protection policy would produce immediate and dramatic improvements for average Canadian house purchasers, and I would urge the minister and C.M.H.C. to give these suggestions their immediate consideration.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: While the hon. member did have the last word, may I tell him that I was at a loss to relate the remarks he was making to the clause under study.

Clause 6 agreed to

On clause 7—Advisory and other bodies.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, this clause reads as follows:

> The governor in council may establish a consumer advisory council and other bodies to advise or assist the minister or to perform such duties and functions as the governor in council may specify—

And so on. Originally I had intended to move a amendment to this clause. However the minister has been obdurate and inflexible and his juggernauts, the backbenchers on the government side, have spoken in opposition to amendments coming from this side of the house. I would urge the minister, Mr. Chairman, to accept the removal of the words "and other bodies" from this clause.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, while the minister is thinking about that, may I support the suggestion which has been made. Clause 7 is almost a blank cheque to the minister because in it he does not set out the function of advisory boards, as was done so carefully in part II of the bill with regard to the manpower and immigration council, which was earlier before the house. He has simply written in what amounts to a wide open paragraph giving him complete power to set up an advisory council and other bodies. He does not specify how often they will be called together nor what will be their composition. This clause will give the minister too much authority, and now that he has had time to think over the suggestion made by the hon. member for Peace River perhaps he will modify it by striking out "and other bodies", or else explain to us what he intends to do under this clause.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I accept that deletion.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I move that the words "and other bodies" be deleted.

Amendment (Mr. Baldwin) agreed to.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be of interest to the committee, because it is of interest to me, if the minister would tell us how many members there will be on the consumer advisory council.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, instead of making the remarks that I wanted to make I will make a fair exchange with the minister. Will he rise for a few moments and tell us about the advisory council, how many people he proposes to put on it, what its representation will be, where the members will be from, geographically, and who will nominate them. I would be more than satisfied if he would give us this information.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway would review my speech on second reading, she would find the answer to her question. Let me say briefly that we contemplate the appointment of about 15 members chosen for their personal qualities and representing the various economic interests of the country, that is the consumers, the retailers, the manufacturers, the advertising industry, labour, universities and so on. Of course the geographic and the other balanced interests of the country will be represented on the council. However, may I say to the hon. member that I dealt with that matter on second reading.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should like to ask the minister a question. If this is to be an advisory council on consumer affairs, how will the minister make sure that the consumers will be represented, as opposed to the manufacturers and other such groups, because I would draw to his attention that the economic council, which reports to him, has only one representative of the consumers. How will the minister avoid this situation with regard to the consumer advisory council?

Mr. Turner: I think that the consumer interests will be adequately represented by the consumer associations, the labour unions and the universities.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—CONSIDERATION OF MOTION FOR INQUIRY INTO CAR INSURANCE

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, it may seem at first, that my few remarks at this time are a continuation of the representations which we have been trying to make earlier this evening with regard to consumer affairs. However, this is not the case. Some days ago on orders of the day I asked a question relative to car insurance and to the need, in my opinion, for an investigation of that industry at the federal level. My question was not answered at that time, so I hope this evening I will be allowed a few minutes to underline what seems to me to be an important question, and try to get an answer to it.

We know, Mr. Speaker, that car insurance is mainly the responsibility of provincial administrations. However, in recent times the federal government or various departments of it have concerned themselves with traffic safety, and in my view car insurance forms a very important part of that subject. In so far as traffic safety is concerned it is known that a number of private members, including myself, had proposals on the order paper in the form of bills or resolutions dealing with various aspects of motor vehicle standards and car safety, which is basically another sphere of provincial interest. We were successful in having all these bills and resolutions referred to the committee on justice and legal affairs. This committee concerned itself with traffic safety, our bills and resolutions, and brought in a report which in large measure was subsequently adopted by the government. The Department of Transport is now implementing some of the recommendations in that report.

It is my opinion that car insurance is an integral part of the over-all national or federal picture with regard to traffic safety. I say that because we have 150,000 traffic casualties a year, including 5,000 fatalities, which amounts to 100 per week. We spend approximately $1 billion a year, or at least that is the economic toll of highway traffic injuries. Of this $1 billion, car insurance represents something like $600 million. This is the amount which Canadians spend trying to defend themselves against the casualties of the road. In my view, Mr. Speaker, anything that affects so many Canadians, whether motorists or pedestrians, in every area of Canada is a matter which could well merit investigation. This is particularly true when we consider that of the approximately $600 million a year that Canadians spend on car insurance by way of premiums, according the latest figures I have they recover only about 67 cents on the dollar.

I think one of the very first matters which the newly created department of consumer and corporate affairs should take up is service to Canadian motorists in the car insurance field. A national publication, the Toronto Star Weekly, earlier this month ran a feature article on car insurance in Canada, and it introduced the subject by saying that everybody who owns or drives a car knows something of the statistical witchhunts, dubious moralizing, high handedness and general hugger-mugger that affect what he pays to insure himself.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, this is a subject that commends itself for attention at the federal level, just as much as those other aspects of travel safety the federal government has already entered into. I appreciate having these few moments to bring the matter up again tonight and I ask the question once more: Would the newly formed department of consumer and corporate affairs undertake to consider giving further attention to this problem?

Hon. John N. Turner (Registrar General): Mr. Speaker, it pleases me a good deal that the hon. member for New Westminster has put the first question to me about consumer affairs, the house having just accorded third reading to the bill to set up this department.

The combines branch has looked into the matter of automobile insurance under the terms of a general inquiry under section 42 of the Combines Investigation Act, on which the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission reported as long ago as May 16, 1960.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, the commission expressed the opinion that some of the rules, methods and activities of the board's organizations—that is to say, the Canadian Underwriters Association and some of its affiliated territorial associations across the country—and insurance companies, had features which in some circumstances might bring them within the kind of actions, defined by the act, and there was a possibility that they might be held to infringe upon the law.

It was suggested to the C.U.A. at the time, and to other associations, that they should review the situation particularly with regard to the character of premium and commission rates. After a reasonable time had elapsed, in which the C.U.A. and its member associations examined the report of the commission, the Director of Investigation and Research made extensive preliminary inquiries to determine whether the situation warranted formal inquiry under section 8 of the Combines Investigation Act.

In his annual report for the year ending March 31, 1963 the director stated that after assessing all relevant facts he did not consider that the existing agreements among members of the C.U.A. with respect to premium rates would at that time be likely to have the effect of preventing or lessening competition unduly, contrary to section 32 (1) of the act, and therefore that formal inquiry was not warranted. The director has continued since that time to keep informed on the operations of the industry as they pertain to automobile insurance. The director's inquiry pertaining to automobile insurance is referred to in the annual report of the Director of Investigation and Research, under the Combines Investigation Act, for the year ended March 31, 1967, pages 19 and 20.

I realize that the question of the hon. member for New Westminster relates to a wider term of reference than that pursued by the Director of Investigation, and Research, and in view of the program we propose for the newly constituted department of consumer and corporate affairs, I assure him I will give his suggestion consideration as the new department's program develops. It might well be a proper term of reference for the committee of the House of Commons on consumer affairs.

TELEVISION—QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO PROTESTS RESPECTING PROGRAM

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, on November 9 last, I asked the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) to tell the house whether she had been informed of a petition protesting against a TV program shown on station CKRN-TV of Rouyn on October 30 last, and qualified as a torrent of filth by many and, if so, whether she could assure us that the matter would be taken into serious consideration.

Following that program, there was a general protest by all televiewers served by Radio-Nord against that program in which the main characters, who claimed to be journalists, used coarse language concerning a certain public figure. That program was badly received by the entire population.

So, Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask whether the Secretary of State had heard any comments about this program and whether protests had been made by residents of north-western Quebec. Here I would like, to support my remarks, to quote fron an editorial which appeared in the November 1 issue of L'Echo, and which was reprinted in the November 8 issue of La Frontière. I shall read the first part of this article, which is self-explanatory:

The air in our households was polluted by a program originating from Radio-Nord; the term "polluted" is none too strong to express our resentment, our disappointment and our bitterness at viewing the program "Blanc sur Noir", which had been extenisvely publicized for weeks.

Mr. Antonio Flamand, whether one agrees or disagrees with the policies of the member for Rouyn-Noranda, whether one approves or disapproves his conduct as a public official, one is not entitled to be examining magistrate, public prosecutor and judge at the same time, and especially to hurl insults in the face of a man and a population by trying to pass for a journalist.

Last week, we deplored the removal of the program "Le sel de la semaine", due to several complaints, in favour of a local program; no doubt it was intended to punish us for a long time by showing of a spectacle that does not even belong in vaudeville, the main attraction being sub judice, which means in journalistic terms and for everybody else too, that we are not allowed to discuss it.

Here, I would like to say that following this editorial, the director or president of Radio-Nord made a correction, saying that this program "Blanc sur Noir" was not replacing "Le sel de la semaine" but rather another program from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation entitled "Dossiers."

Then, after all that, came an avalanche of protests. The last and most important protest—the Secretary of State or at least the B.B.G. probably heard of it—came from the city of Amos and was set forth in a resolution passed at one of the recent meetings of the council of this town. I quote the whereases of this resolution to put them on the official record and to bring them to the attention of the minister's secretary:

"Whereas Radio-Nord Inc. has, on October 30, 1967, at 10 o'clock p.m., despite many protests from the public, replaced the excellent porgram "Le Sel de la Semaine" originating from the C.B.C. with its program "Blanc sur Noir" deceiving once again the people served by Radio-Nord Inc.;

"Whereas "Blanc sur Noir", on October 30 last, was purely and simply an insult to the population, in view of the behaviour of two so-called journalists, Dexter and Bouchard, who, during the whole program, used every effort and in the most vulgar way to tarnish the reputation of their guest, the member for Rouyn-Noranda, Mr. Antonio Flamand;

[Mr. Laprise.]

"Whereas the management of Radio-Nord Inc. could have cancelled that program, which was taped;

"Whereas, by this shocking and offensive program, Radio-Nord Inc. showed once again that it cannot serve efficiently the people of the Quebec northwestern area who, paying taxes to the federal government, are, as much as others, entitled to a complete broadcasting service by the C.B.C.;

"Whereas the city of Amos wishes to join with the cities of Chibougamau, Chapais and Matagami to ask also for full radio and television coverage by the C.B.C.;

Wherefore, it is moved by alderman Jean-Hughes Boutin, seconded by alderman Jacques Bourgeois and resolved unanimously that the Board of Broadcast Governors be requested to investigate the actions of Radio-Nord Inc. with regard to the program "Blanc sur Noir" of October 20, 1967, and that the board of governors be also requested to see to it that full radio and television coverage is given by the C.B.C. to all the people of northwestern Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the Secretary of State will study that resolution and follow it up.

I should like to add that for a number of years, particularly on the week-end, we have been pestered with stupid gogo programs which only interest children; in fact, not all children listen to these programs, which are intended for them.

Therefore, in my opinion, the C.B.C. should service that area, at least for the time being, with FM radio programs, which would not irritate the people with abstract music, but help them to acquire greater culture by giving them worthwhile programs of truly great and beautiful music.

I support wholeheartedly the request of the authorities of the town of Amos that the C.B.C. service the region of Amos as it does other regions throughout Canada, since we pay taxes just as they so.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, after having read in the newspapers of north-western Québec L'Écho and La Frontière what has been written on that famous program of October 30 called "Blanc sur Noir" on the CKRN-TV station, after having heard several comments and especially the statement of the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Laprise) I understand quite well his indignation and that of most people of northwestern Quebec as a result of that televised program.

However, I must say to the hon. member for Chapleau that the Secretary of State has in no way been asked either by a request or by a resolution emanating from any public organization to intervene in that particular case.

All I can tell the hon. member—and he is well aware of it—is that the Secretary of State is not responsible for the programming neither of the private radio and television stations nor of the C.B.C. I can, however, give the assurance that the minister will call the attention of the Board of Broadcast Governors to any request of this kind that might be made in the future.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL—CARDINAL LEGER—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO LEPERS IN AFRICA

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, when his Eminence Paul Emile Cardinal Léger recently made known his decision to leave the direction of the archdiocese of Montreal, it was such a momentous announcement that a deep impression of a great tragedy was created.

The unexpected departure of the distinguished prelate spread sorrow among all those who followed the rich tapestry of his good works and the magnificence of his sublime apostolate. Cardinal Léger, in giving up his present function, chooses a path which surely will lead him to a more fertile and lofty action on the moral plane.

However, a chasm is opened by the depth of such a loss.

The new horizons towards which the cardinal is headed show that he is prompted by a spirituality unattainable by ordinary people. However, his departure deprives both French and English Canada of an irreplaceable support.

The deep wisdom of that prominent churchman, the powerful example of his personality and his life are a source of inspiration that will not be easily replaced.

Our country is going through difficult times, Mr. Speaker. One only has to watch closely the events taking place here and there, the developments occurring every day to realize that the present situation in Canada is extremely serious, perhaps dangerous—one cannot say—but without being a prophet of doom, it can easily be foreseen. Who knows what leading part Cardinal Léger might have played, through his mere presence in this country, his sense of moderation, his objectivity, his deep influence in various quarters in this looming crisis which, one could say without being unduly pessimistic, could shake the very structures of Canada, to which we are still greatly attached.

The Cardinal will henceforth devote himself to a praise worthy work, and no one should complain; on the contrary, with spontaneity, with admiration, everyone expresses his joy and voices his encouragement in the new task the Cardinal is setting out to accomplish.

Still, I should not like to see his departure pass unnoticed by the Canadian government. Moreover, I feel that a man who has served his country so well, on both the spiritual and temporal planes certainly deserves from his country an outstanding token of gratitude.

I would suggest that before he leaves, he receive from the authorities of his country, the highest available decoration because he richly deserves it.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that it might offend the humility of a man who tries precisely to shield himself from all those sumptuous things, but I believe that we cannot remain indifferent to such a departure, that we cannot remain inattentive, as Canadians, to the tremendous task carried out by the Cardinal, and our country, his mother country, must honour him in an appropriate fashion. Therefore, I believe that the best way to honour him, the best decoration we can offer him, would be to establish a fund which could assist him in the task he wants to perform with the underprivileged and afflicted people.

In my opinion, no action or gesture would be more appropriate than that of a government willing to subsidize, directly or indirectly, the task which Cardinal Léger wants to undertake.

I shall conclude my remarks by saying that in the past, Mr. Speaker, our external aid has been considerable. We have particularly helped the Commonwealth countries at a time when the British Commonwealth needed it. Only this year will the French-speaking countries begin to receive substantial assistance from the Canadian government, $12 million as compared to the $14 million which will be given to the Commonwealth countries.

I think that if we want to help both French-speaking countries and at the same time the task undertaken by Cardinal Léger, we should give important financial assistance to the Cardinal.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have been requested by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), in the absence of his parliamentary secretary, to answer the question put by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette).

I should like here, Mr. Speaker, to stress the nobleness of the decision taken by His Eminence Cardinal Paul-Émile Léger. Needless to recall his apostolic zeal and ardour. Nevertheless, I should like to express the admiration which his dedication to the lepers rouses in our hearts of hearts. Such a worthy, noble and freely taken decision is a fitting ciimax to his unlimited devotion to the service of the faith.

With regard to the possibility of the government helping him in that project, I must tell the hon. member for Lotbinière and the house that this matter comes under the External Aid Office of the Department of External Affairs which examines any request for help in detail and according to the circumstances.

If His Eminence Cardinal Paul-Émile Léger ever asks for our co-operation after stating the exact nature of his needs, our External Aid Office will be very happy to give his proposals the greatest consideration.

Mr. Speaker, before resuming my seat, I should like to underline and applaud the action of the hon. member for Lotbinière; it is so characteristic of his awareness of what goes on and of his great Christian charity.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LANGLOIS—REMARKS IN DEBATE ON NOVEMBER 24

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to make a correction in Hansard for Friday, November 24, at which time I took part in the debate on the situation in Montreal harbour, which matter was put before the house by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) under standing order 26.

I was interrupted in my speech by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) who pointed out to me at that time that there were only three members from the island of Montreal present in the house. You will note, Mr. Speaker, that I did not mention those figures and that it was the hon. member for Lapointe who did so. I did not mention any figures at the time, Mr. Speaker, and I continued as you will find on page 4662 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I had indeed noticed it. I am not as blind as some hon. members opposite who do not see the importance of that problem, etc.—

Thereafter, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson), as recorded on pages 4673 and 4674 of Hansard, that is 14 pages further on following the dinner recess, said this about me:

> There is one point that I do not think should go unanswered. The hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois) said there were no members on the government side from Montreal present during the debate.

I never said such a thing.

> I should like to point out that throughout the whole debate my colleague the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) was here—

I admit that I also saw him.

> The Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) was also here as well as my parliamentary secretary (Mr. Mackasey) who is from Verdun—

I referred to him during my comments and I agree that he was here.

> The hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel).

He is not from the island of Montreal but from the outskirts of Montreal.

An hon. Member: He was here.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Yes, he was here. And the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) who is from Quebec, was even mentioned.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member indicate the nature of his question of privilege and tell the Chair whether it will be followed by a motion?

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, here is the nature of my question of privilege.

According to the statement or the conclusions of the minister, nine or ten members from Montreal have taken a keen interest in the debate. It seems to me, that instead of speaking through their hats, some members should be a little more reasonable and moderate in their statements about their colleagues in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, I am not making preposterous and untimely statements. When the Minister of Labour credits me with having said those words, he is acting irresponsibly, and that is unthinkable on the part of a minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt very much that the hon. member can claim that there are actual grounds for a question of privilege. If there really was such a question of privilege it should be followed by a motion, but the hon. member did not move any.

It is in order to point out also that a question of privilege must be raised at the first opportunity. That does not mean at the first opportunity which suits the hon. member but rather as soon as the breach of privilege takes place. The incident now in question dates back to last Friday. Therefore, it seems to me that the question was not raised at the first possible opportunity.

Indeed, even if the hon. member had raised his grievance at that time, I should hav emade the same ruling.

An hon. member claims there were a certain number of members in the house at a given time; the minister claims that there were more. According to the standing orders, both statements must be accepted even if they are conflicting. However, the member for Mégantic cannot be allowed to pursue the matter by way of a question of privilege.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and I will consider that as a correction to the official report.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMMENT ON STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT DE GAULLE

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short statement commenting on one made yesterday in Paris by General de Gaulle, a statement made as I was leaving London to return to Canada and which I did not see until I arrived back in Canada. Perhaps it is just as well that I did not have the opportunity of reading it before I spoke in London yesterday.

Before I make that statement, Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will permit me as Prime Minister to express my appreciation for the kindness I received from the British government during our visit to London last week and for the privilege, during a very difficult time for that government, of discussing with them some matters of commonwealth and international concern. We discussed in particular the situation in Cyprus, which has remained so dangerously explosive during recent days and which, if it were permitted to explode into armed conflict between two members of NATO and on the territory of a member of the commonwealth, could have an almost fatal effect on the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

I said in my statement of July 25, 1967, Mr. Speaker, commenting on some earlier remarks of the president of the French republic, that Canada has always had a special relationship with France, which is the motherland of so many of her citizens. I said we attached the greatest importance to our friendship with the French people; that it had been and remained the strong purpose of the government of Canada to foster that friendship. I should like to confirm those words today, Mr. Speaker.

I do not propose to deal in any detail with General de Gaulle's statement of yesterday, a statement very carefully prepared and made to the press. General de Gaulle's statement will obviously arouse discord in Canada. I am sure the people of this country will be restrained in their response to it, as I am in mine today, so as not to serve the purposes of those who would disunite and divide our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I believe the statement distorted some Canadian history, misrepresented certain contemporary developments and wrongly predicted the future. This statement was not merely a commentary on Canadian domestic or foreign policies, which could have been ignored; it was an intervention in those policies by the head of a foreign state. As such it remains unacceptable. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, in this case it is intolerable that a head of a foreign state or government should recommend a course of political or constitutional action which would destroy Canadian confederation and the unity of the Canadian state.

The future of Canada, Mr. Speaker, will be decided in Canada, by Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I have confidence, and I know all members of this house have confidence, in the ability and good sense of all Canadians, French speaking or English speaking, to make the right decision. They will do it in their own way and through their own democratic process. I believe this decision will require further constitutional changes to bring our federalism up to date and to ensure, among other things, that French speaking Canadians who form one of our two founding cultural and linguistic groups, or societies if you like, will have their rights accepted and respected in Canada.

I agree also that the federal government, any federal government, should encourage and promote special and close cultural relations between French speaking Canadians and France and other French speaking countries. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we are doing that. There should be no argument on this score except with those who wish to use these relations to destroy the federal government's responsibility for foreign affairs, and that we do not accept.

Canada is a free country and its people govern themselves. Canadians in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada have the right to exercise fully their political rights in federal and provincial elections. Self determination is no new discovery for us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: We do not need to have it offered to us. To assert the contrary is an insult to those who discharge their democratic privileges as Canadian voters and to those who serve their country in this house or in provincial legislatures.

• (2:50 p.m.)

To those who would set us free, we answer "We are free". To those who would disunite us, we answer "We remain united, in a federal system which is being brought into line with the requirements of our time and of our origins and history". On April 19, 1960, the gallant and illustrious head of another state, speaking in Ottawa, had this to say; I quote from his speech:

> And now, how do you Canadians appear to us? Materially, a new country, of vast size, mighty resources, inhabited by a hard-working and enterprising people. Politically, a state which has found the means to unite two societies, very different in origin, language and religion; which exercises independence under the British crown and forms part of the commonwealth: which is forging a national character even though spread out over three thousand miles alongside a very powerful federation; a solid and stable state.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with those words of General de Gaulle in 1960. I disagree with his words in November 1967.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): First of all, Mr. Speaker, may I welcome the Prime Minister back to the house and back to Canada, and congratulate him upon the honour bestowed upon him by the city of London in extending to him the freedom of that city. May I also assure him that in welcoming him back in this manner I do not wish to be understood as casting any reflection upon the manner in which the Acting Prime Minister presided over the house in his absence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanfield: Canadians will certainly resent the statement made by President de Gaulle and regard it as an intrusion into our domestic affairs. We in Canada, a free democratic country, are quite capable of running our own affairs, so we must certainly object to the statement, just as the Prime Minister has objected to it.

It may be there is no practical way of stopping this kind of interference. This is the second time it has occurred, and it may occur again. I say that while we must object to this kind of interference, our maturity as Canadians requires something further of us. While objecting to this unfortunate attempt at interference we are, I hope, mature enough not to allow such an attempt by somebody outside of Canada to affect the relationship among Canadians inside Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: It seems to me we would do ourselves a disservice if we allowed this incident to provoke us to any word or deed which could poison the climate in our own country or make it more difficult to arrange our own affairs satisfactorily. It would in effect make this attempt at interference effective if this statement by General de Gaulle were to give rise to immoderate exchanges within our own borders which could undermine the earnest efforts of Canadians themselves to work out their own arrangements to strengthen confederation.

At the present time in Toronto a constructive conference is being held at which provincial representatives and others are examining the problems within our own country. There are, of course, other constructive efforts going forward in our country. Mr. Speaker, I suggest in all earnestness that we should not allow this attempted outside interference to distract us in any way from our own purpose, which is to build a stronger Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to associate myself with the words of the Leader of the Opposition in welcoming back the right hon. Prime Minister, and to say we are glad to see him in such good form upon his return to the House of Commons.

I am very glad the Prime Minister has made a statement with reference to the pronouncements by President de Gaulle. I think our response to those pronouncements ought to be restrained. I feel much the same about President de Gaulle's statements at this time as I felt about his famous "Vive le Québec libre" last fall; that is, that we ought not to allow this to provoke us into hysterical and provocative replies. We ought to make it perfectly clear to President de Gaulle, or to the head of state of any other country in the world, that we Canadians are quite capable of resolving our own problems without unsought or uncalled for advice from any quarter whatsoever.

Comment on Statement by General de Gaulle

I am sure that French speaking Canadians throughout Canada will resent the fact that the head of state in another country should seek to advise them as to what course they should take in advancing their best interests. As one who was born in the United Kingdom I know I would deeply resent any suggestion by the government of Great Britain as to how we Canadians ought to conduct our affairs in this country—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: —and I think French speaking Canadians will have a similar feeling of resentment. I think they will also resent the reference to them as abandoned children; abandoned, yes; but children, no. After two centuries of abandonment they are a mature people working with their fellow Canadians to resolve whatever differences of opinion we may have, and seeking to work out a great destiny for Canada, to do this by ourselves, knowing we can do it without any intrusion by anyone else.

I think French speaking Canadians will not be enticed by any nostalgic appeal for a new form of imperialism. In Canada this year we are celebrating our one hundredth anniversary, and our pride in that anniversary is in the fact that we have shed all forms of imperialism and are now a sovereign nation. I do not think French speaking Canadians, any more than any other Canadians, want to shed one form of imperialism only to assume the shackles of some other form of imperialism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is a time for members in all parties to make two things perfectly clear. The first is that we believe in a strong, united and viable Canada; that we want people of all races and tongues to work together to make this a great sovereign power in which we can provide a good life for our own people, and through which we can play an increasingly important role in the community of nations.

I think the second thing we want to make clear is that we recognize that in Canada there are two linguistic and cultural communities, and that those of us who belong to the English speaking part of Canada are desirous of seeing the legitimate aspirations of the French speaking community fully realized.

To that end we have problems we must resolve; but we will resolve them in our own way and by our own methods.

I hope that we will try very quickly to resolve these problems. The longer we delay, the greater opportunity we provide for others to fish in troubled waters. This is the reason we in this party have been pressing for the setting up of a parliamentary committee to discuss the constitution. We are convinced there is a greater consensus among the members of this house than might at first appear to be the case. We believe that the quicker we grapple with this problem the sooner it will be resolved, and the sooner it is resolved the greater will be the opportunity to build a strong and united Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Ralliement Créditiste and my colleagues, I am happy to endorse the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), and I am doing so as a French Canadian from the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: When the Prime Minister says: "Canadian policy will be determined by Canadians" and "French-speaking Canadians have the ability to find their own place in confederation without stepping on others", that is true, and will become even more so since the French fact is being recognized throughout Canada as never before in the past.

Everyone admits that we have lived through squabbles since 1867. But, Mr. Speaker, under the British North America Act, one thing has nevertheless been granted to all Canadian provinces and, particularly, to the province of Quebec, and I am referring, for instance, to rights in matters of education, where the federal government has never intruded and where the provincial government had all the necessary powers in matters of highways, health, agriculture and natural resources development. In fact, if the province of Quebec decided to develop one source of wealth rather than another, neither Alberta, Ontario nor British Columbia would be entitled to intrude in the problems of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, when General de Gaulle states that Quebec will obtain its sovereignty, I say that the province of Quebec has had more sovereignty within the Canadian confederation than any country connected with France has ever obtained since France exists.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: To look at history, Mr. Speaker, some time ago, I was speaking on television in my area of northwestern Quebec. At that time, I was giving the history of the second world war when General de Gaulle had to leave his country and go into exile for some time in Great Britain, when Marshal Pétain had to take over and move the seat of the French government from Paris to Vichy. At that time, Mr. Speaker, I was a young man of the province of Quebec, a member of the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste and all French-Canadian associations in Quebec. At that time, the intellectuals who met in Montreal these last three days were defending Marshal Pétain just as we were. We were then blaming the actions of General de Gaulle, because we felt that Pétain, standing up to the invader in his own country at a time when France was unprepared to face a world war, had no other alternative to what he did. At that time, we were supporting Pétain and condemning de Gaulle, and some people of the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste, gathered in Montreal two days ago, were of that opinion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: It was said Pétain has been charged with collaboration. But I have an explanation. When an armed bandit breaks into a home, waving his gun, Mr. Speaker, many people are forced to do his bidding, because they are driven to the wall, and this is what happened to Marshal Pétain. Nevertheless, Pétain was sentenced to death; his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment and after having been dishonourably discharged by General de Gaulle's followers, died stripped of his rank and of all the glorious titles he had won during the first world war.

Mr. Speaker, General de Gaulle may try today to tell Quebec: Liberate yourselves, liberate yourselves, but it was not so long ago that Algeria, under the French régime, and the Algerian people fought an internecine war for 7½ years to obtain their independence, which led them where? Where they are now, with a standard of living decidedly lower than the one they formerly enjoyed, and surely that is the example General de Gaulle has in mind at this time.

Mr. Speaker, all this means that we can get along without the advice or intervention of General de Gaulle or any other head of state, whether from Great Britain or any other country in the world. Our people, whether they speak English, French, Ukrainian, Polish or Italian, in brief, all Canadians, are able to develop policies that are respectful of each and every one of their countrymen. The aspirations of the French-speaking Canadians are the same as those of the English-speaking Canadians. By showing mutual respect, we will set an example to the world with regard to political freedom and economic security.

Mr. Speaker, reference was made earlier to this conference of all the Canadian provinces which is now taking place in Toronto and where changes to be made in the constitution are being discussed. Everyone agrees that certain changes should be made in our constitution, but the provinces are not meeting simply to discuss the problem of language, French or English. It is a question of life or death for each of the provinces, for each one of them is faced with great economic and financial difficulties which prevents it from developing according to its own aspirations and possibilities.

And here, I appeal to the Prime Minister. The central government can help all the provinces, it can co-operate to maintain the unity so greatly desired by enabling each province, from an economic point of view, to make the most of its possibilities, its intellectual resources, its potential. Then, it will no longer fear the intervention of foreign leaders, of foreign countries in the administration of our national affairs.

Canadian affairs are our concern. We do not interfere in the affairs of France, England or any other country. Let us continue in that direction and through mutual respect by all, we shall build a greater Canada, a more prosperous Canada, which doubtless will set, from every point of view, an example for the whole world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, we in the Social Credit party join with the others in this house in deploring this further intervention by General de Gaulle in the affairs of this country.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Availing himself of the opportunity presented at the time of Expo, General de Gaulle chose to make his first unwarranted intervention into our national affairs. This most recent intervention is completely unwarranted, uncalled for, distasteful and unacceptable to Canadians everywhere.

Inquiries of the Ministry

In his address this afternoon the Prime Minister urged restraint in response to this latest statement, but I must say that a great many Canadians are becoming increasingly impatient over such statements. They require the Prime Minister to make his protests on behalf of this country both very loud and very clear. General de Gaulle's statement must be rejected firmly and without apology, so it is made abundantly clear that we in Canada are determined to govern ourselves in accordance with our own decisions and in harmony with our national aspirations.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (for Mr. Macaluso) moved that the sixth report of the standing committee on transport and communications, presented to the house on Friday, November 24, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of our great concern about what is going on in Cyprus, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs give the house any further information as to how matters now stand and what action the government of Canada may be taking in this regard?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the situation in Cyprus continues to be tense. There is really no change in the situation since I reported to the house yesterday. The special representative of the government of the United States has been engaged within the last few hours in trying to compose further differences between the two Mediterranean countries, Turkey and Greece. He has succeeded, I believe, in narrowing the differences.

Having regard to the suggestions made to the parties by the Secretary General of the United Nations I would hope that before the day is out we might see some more definitive statement from the United States emissary as well as from Mr. Rolz-Bennet, the representative of the Secretary General. At this moment I cannot report a final decision.

[Mr. Patterson.]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the mandate under which the peace keeping forces are operating in Cyprus requires authority from the security council before they may be withdrawn. Will the minister take the necessary steps to obtain that prior authority from the security council so that if war breaks out the Canadian troops can be withdrawn without delay?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of National Defence would confirm that there is every confidence in the effectiveness of the plans of the United Nations itself and of the components of the force should they be required.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, it is unusual for me to ask for clarification from this minister, but will he obtain prior authority from the security council so the peace keeping force may take action in withdrawing if that becomes necessary?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, there is of course a difference between the evacuation and the withdrawal of a force. When the withdrawal of the United Nations force in the Middle East took place we took up with the Secretary General what position would be taken with regard to the withdrawal of the force in Cyprus. The Secretary General said that before that force would be withdrawn or disbanded he would refer the matter to the security council.

Having regard to the evacuation or withdrawal of the force for security purposes, that is a matter which in accordance with the plans already made, rests with the commander of the United Nations force.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. Is he in a position to report to the house in respect of dissatisfaction among the ranks of Canadian troops under UN command in Cyprus? I ask this question as the result of a Canadian Broadcasting Corporation interview with non-commissioned officers in the force.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I believe the question of the hon. member is much too general. What he is apparently referring to is a purported declaration by a sergeant that he did not know whether to stand or run. My suggestion to this sergeant would be that he ask his commanding officer, who knows what to do.

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of the fact that this situation was brought to our attention by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, an emanation of this parliament, I am wondering whether the minister will investigate the matter and report to the house in a day or two.

[Later:]

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I should like to address a further supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. During discussions of this matter will the minister propose to the security council that additional powers and personnel, if necessary, be given to the UN force in Cyprus so as to prevent any future build up of forces and war materials which might result in an outbreak which would be in contradiction of the Zurich agreement?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that has been borne in mind in recent discussions. My hon. friend will recall that the Prime Minister made some reference to this in London the day before yesterday.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. I am sure members of the house and the country generally would be grateful for any report the Prime Minister could give about his discussions with the British government in respect of the problem in Cyprus, particularly as to whether any concrete steps were discussed or projected during his conferences.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I discussed with them the proposals that had been made and the discussions which had taken place among the governments of the United States, Britain and Canada. The results of these discussions have been made known in this house by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Certain proposals were put forward which have been used as the basis for subsequent negotiations by the representative of the President of the United States. He is making an effort to get an agreement on these proposals, with the modifications which may be required. Those are the steps being taken now which we hope will result in the solution of this crisis.

FINANCE

GOLD—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General.

Inquiries of the Ministry

In view of the fact that gold is being sold very readily on the world's market at the present time, can the minister indicate whether a possible increase in the price of this very precious metal is considered?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

SHIPPING

MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. I believe the injunction to which the minister referred yesterday in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Fraser Valley has been granted. Can he report today on the effect that it has had on the St. Lawrence dock situation?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the longshoremen gangs were called up for one o'clock today. I am hoping for a report at any moment on the number of gangs that have shown up. I do welcome this question, however, because it affords me an opportunity to say that I think that the action taken by one of the parties to the dispute, which resulted in the interim judgment yesterday and the outome, fully vindicate the stand taken by the government throughout the last few weeks.

TRADE

PROTECTION AGAINST IMPORTS OF SUBSIDIZED FOODS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack A. Irvine (London): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister received a brief from the Canadian Food Processors Association and the horticultural council asking for assistance to protect our Canadian food processors and producers against unfair subsidized competition from abroad?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member would have a supplementary question. It is not acceptable simply to ask whether a brief has been received by the minister. That does not constitute an urgent matter.

Mr. Irvine: Mr. Speaker, this is a very urgent item, and I will rephrase my question. In view of the subsidy that is now being paid by Italy on processed food entering Canada, is the government contemplating any immediate action to protect Canadian food processors and producers against this type of unfair, subsidized competition?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have had meetings with the organizations in various processing areas. Certainly the government has under advisement the problems with respect to imports into Canada of processed foods which are in fact subsidized by the countries from which they emanate. We will certainly consider very seriously appropriate action to protect our processors and primary producers from any unfair competition in this regard, and any such action will of course be announced in the proper manner.

[Later:]

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture arising out of a question put to the minister today regarding the importation of subsidized processed fruits and vegetables. Have any conferences or consultations been arranged with the governments concerned with a view to establishing voluntary quotas or the reassessment of previous trade agreements?

Mr. Greene: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Agriculture. Can he inform the house whether his department is giving consideration to the setting up of a central marketing board for all agricultural products?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This also is a very general question which should not be asked at this time.

INDUSTRY

COPPER—PRICE INCREASE BY NORANDA COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in connection with his promise a week ago that an investigation would be made into the action of the Noranda mining company in raising the price of copper. In view of the fact that since that time they have changed the formula but the price is still fixed at 51 cents and in view of the fact that the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company has now instituted a similar action, may I ask the minister two questions; first, is the investigation continuing in spite of this change of formula, and second, will it include as well the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows the Noranda company changed the formula under which they were going to price copper. They were going to relate the price of copper to the price in the United States. I felt that this was hardly consistent with the statement they made that they had increased prices in Canada because of internal inflationary conditions here.

We are continuing to make inquiries about the basis for the increase in price to 51 cents, the price at which it is now fixed, and the actions of other companies.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the Minister of Finance when he thinks such an investigation will be completed?

Mr. Sharp: I cannot answer this question, Mr. Speaker, because this is a matter which I should also like to discuss with my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is directly concerned.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

REPORTED PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH BILINGUAL FEDERAL DISTRICT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to propose next January the establishment of Ottawa as a bilingual federal district, as announced by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in Hamilton last Friday?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the question is not urgent and could be placed on the order paper.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

MEETING OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE IN OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The advisory committee on the Canada Pension Plan will hold its first meeting in Ottawa on December 4 and 5. Would the minister inform us whether this meeting will be open to the public, to enable the committee to hear the views of individuals and briefs from groups?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

RHODESIA—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING SANCTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of Canada's determination, as expressed here today, to resist any interference in our internal affairs, will the government now cease its attempt to overthrow the government of Rhodesia by the imposition of sanctions?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend should know that the two situations are not comparable.

NOVA SCOTIA

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING STEEL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I realize he is a very busy man and his shoulders are heavily burdened, but could he possibly advise the house of the day when he may meet the premier of Nova Scotia with regard to possible financial assistance from the federal government in dealing with the steel crisis? May I also express the hope he will deal with that matter as commendably as he has dealt with the ravings of General Charles de Gaulle.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope to meet the premier with the least possible delay. A communication from him was forwarded to me in London, and I hope to discuss it with him and with some of my colleagues with, as I said, the least possible delay.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BURMA—REPORTED DETENTION OF CANADIANS IN JAIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Has the minister any progress to report concerning the two young Canadians who are detained at the present time by the Burma authorities in Rangoon?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, our ambassador who is accredited to Burma is there at this time and I am expecting his report. The day before yesterday, we received the visit of the parents of one of the young men.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question.

Did the minister send a note of protest to the authorities in Burma concerning the way these young prisoners were held incommunicado for five months and were denied the right to legal counsel? Does the government intend to protest against such action in order to protect Canadians in foreign countries?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That also will depend on the reports received from our ambassador and that of the United Kingdom.

YEMEN—INQUIRY AS TO RECOGNITION OF REPUBLIC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is Canada considering recognition of the southern Yemen people's republic, Aden and the federated states?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must admit that I cannot tell whether this is a very urgent matter. However, I suspect it might not be.

DIVORCE

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. A little more than a week ago the Minister of Justice told the house, I think in answer to a question from the hon. member for Peace River, that a bill with regard to changes in the divorce law of Canada had been printed. May I ask when the bill will be given first reading and whether, in view of the great and natural public interest in this matter, there is any chance it will be given second reading before the end of the year.

[Translation]

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there is surely a possibility that the bill will get second reading before the end of the year; I expect that the resolution to introduce this bill will be moved any day now.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING CIGARETTE ADVERTISING AND SMOKING EDUCATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the increased knowledge available and increased interest in the subject of cigarette smoking, when will this matter be referred to the health and welfare committee as promised some time ago?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out yesterday the health and welfare committee is presently considering a very important matter assigned to it by the house. As soon as there is some indication that this consideration will be completed, we will consider the reference to that committee of the subject matter mentioned by the hon. member.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF REGULATIONS RESPECTING VITAMIN SUPPLEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government house leader. Will the hon. gentleman consider referring the matter of the directions from the food and drug directorate regarding vitamin supplements to the committee on health and welfare?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will consider it, but I think I have prejudged the matter.

[Mr. Brewin.]

POLLUTION

TAX INCENTIVES TO PLANTS INSTALLING CORRECTIVE DEVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and ask him whether in view of the serious, continuing problem of water pollution he can assure the house that the agreements with industry will be continued after the new year.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we are presently inquiring into that matter.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the incentives to industry in regard to water pollution be put on a permanent basis rather than the ad hoc basis on which they are now?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I feel that the question is much too general to be asked at this time.

[Later:]

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the incentives to industry in regard to water pollution be put on a permanent basis?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether this is not the same question the hon. member asked previously.

Mr. Starr: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I ask for your guidance as to how I can evoke an answer within the rules, because of the importance of this situation.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I may not have been very clear when I answered a previous question on this subject. What I meant to say was that I am working on it now. The idea just mentioned is one aspect we are studying.

FINANCE

LOANS BY BANKS UNDER FARM IMPROVEMENT ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that farm improvement loans are no longer attractive to the banks because of the interest rate, and farmers therefore find it difficult to obtain financial assistance under the farm improvement loan plan; and in view of the severe cost-price squeeze prevailing in the agricultural industry, will the minister institute a search for ways and means to encourage the banks to continue to provide assistance to farmers under the farm improvement loans legislation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making very general representations and submissions to the minister. I do not think this question could be considered acceptable at this time.

ATLANTIC AREA—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION IN BUDGETARY PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the recent statements and representations by the four Atlantic area premiers, will the Minister of Finance assure them and this house that his budget proposals on Thursday night and proposed expenditure cuts will be sufficiently flexible that they will not adversely affect the economy of the Atlantic region?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a speech, not a question.

MANPOWER

REPORTED DECREASE IN RETRAINING PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of manpower. In view of the fact that recent amendments to the vocational and technical retraining program have resulted in a drastic decrease in enrolment, notwithstanding the worsening unemployment situation, would the minister take immediate steps to restore the effectiveness of this program?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think I have already explained in this house the reason for the decrease in the number of persons assigned to retraining. The situation is correcting itself and I think that, in a few weeks, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) will not have any questions to ask on this matter.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Inasmuch as the Indian citizens are most seriously affected by this problem, will the minister give special consideration to their situation?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: I have already stated, Mr. Speaker, that Indians and Eskimos were treated exactly like all other Canadians.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CALGARY—LAY-OFFS RESULTING FROM CONSTRUCTION DECLINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of manpower. In view of the fact that Atco Industries in Calgary laid off 200 men last week as the result of a decline in the construction industry, has the minister been able to find any alternative employment for these men?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I did not hear the name of the company.

Mr. Harkness: The Atco Company, the Alberta Trailer Company of Calgary, which I believe, is the foremost producer of trailers and mobile homes in Canada.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I will inquire about the work done by the manpower officers and report on this matter soon.

TRADE

CHEESE—REQUEST FOR EXPORT ASSISTANCE FOLLOWING CURRENCY DEVALUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lee Grills (Hastings South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. As a result of the deleterious effect on Canadian exports of cheese of the devaluation of the English pound, has the minister or his department given any consideration to correcting this situation and giving some encouragement to the cheese industry? I may say there was no cheese sold through the local cheese board last week.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe the hon. member will recall a similar question was asked just two or three days ago.

Post Office Act

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. First will you permit me a word of explanation, since the Secretary of State for External Affairs does not understand the significance of my modest boutonniere. The name of the game is rugby. We from the west are proud of the achievements of the Saskatchewan Roughriders. I want to ask the Prime Minister if he will take the house into his confidence and let us know whether he has again made a wager against the Saskatchewan Roughriders with the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, I have, Mr. Speaker, and my hon. friend will be feeling yellow and black next Monday.

Mr. More: A supplementary. Would he welcome wagers from other western members?

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR INCREASES IN POSTAL RATES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Friday, September 29, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Côté (Longueuil)—Mr. Batten in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Post Office Act to increase by one cent the postage rates for letters posted in Canada for delivery in Canada; to provide an amended rate structure for newspapers and periodicals; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act, more especially in relation to tenders and contracts.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Chairman, this will probably rate as one of the longest speeches ever made in this house. It was commenced on September 29 and if we had resumed consideration of this measure tomorrow it would have taken two full months. We are being asked to approve an increase in postal rates which will result in an increase in the cost of living for every Canadian and in the cost of doing business. The burden will fall chiefly on ordinary citizens because businesses will pass on the increase to the consumer while at the same time charging up additional expenses when computing their income taxes. Therefore in the case of business firms the increased rates will in reality only net the government a fraction of the amount they hope to raise. It follows then that the main burden of these increased rates will fall on the ordinary citizens of the country. Further, I suggest that these increases should only be considered as a last resort after all other avenues have been explored.

[Mr. Speaker.]

With this in view, Mr. Chairman, I have a few questions I should like to pose to the Postmaster General. The post office has 44,244 employees at the present time, or rather did have two months ago when my figures were prepared. In 1963 the total number of employees was 26,520. The question bothering Canadians is: Why was there a personnel increase of 69 per cent during this period while the volume of mail reportedly rose only 9 per cent? During this period the number of post offices has decreased from 11,336 to 11,172, a drop of 164.

If I may refer again to personnel, Mr. Chairman, in 1954-55 the post office operated quite efficiently with four or five so-called branches. Between then and 1959 the number of branches was increased to six with the appropriate number of directors. During this period the maximum growth of our cities took place. This was the period when the poor postman frequently found new subdivisions seemingly appearing overnight in what had previously been a cow pasture.

If ever a department did a job well, Mr. Chairman, it was in this period of maximum growth in our developing urban areas. All of this was accomplished with six branches. Now, in 1967, the post office has 13 or 14 directors, three assistant deputy ministers and five directors of personnel. I would suggest there are quite a few chiefs and that the increase in the number of these high priced individuals is taking place at an alarming rate.

This is just one of the mysteries of this department, Mr. Chairman. The fact that such a gigantic increase in personnel was not accompanied by a similar increase (a) in efficiency and (b) in volume of mail handled seems to indicate that the department probably needs considerable overhaul.

The committee has had the benefit of the minister's statement in regard to income and expenses, but I can find no accounting sheet or annual report that allows me to find out—indeed, I suggest it is impossible to find out—how much was spent on and how much was received from each kind of mail. Surely these figures exist somewhere.

In May, 1966 the minister said that he agreed with his predecessor that certain efforts should be made to follow up some of the recommendations made by the Glassco royal commission. I have no way of knowing whether any of the recommendations in the Glassco commission report have actually been implemented, but I should like to refer to them for a moment. The commission made some specific recommendations, which are contained in the report on government organization volume 3, pages 350 to 351. Extensive changes were suggested in the operational scheme, the financial methods and in almost all aspects of the post office's work. The commission foresaw an annual saving of at least many millions of dollars if its recommendations were heeded.

The following, Mr. Chairman, is a summary of some of their money-saving recommendations: a time study approach in all offices, with a potential saving of $7½ million; reduction of wicket staff, with a potential saving of $2.8 million; an analysis of sortation methods, with a possible saving of $4.8 million; and a thorough analysis of highway transportation, with a projected saving of $1.2 million. These in total would provide a saving of $16.3 million. Therefore my second question to the minister is: Have any of these recommendations been followed? What action has been taken toward the implementation of cost-saving programs? Has there been any real effort toward economy? All indications are that there has not been any real effort in this direction.

Having this in mind, Mr. Chairman, I think that we should delay implementation of this legislation until the minister can come before the house and say: We have saved X dollars by reducing inefficiency; we can save X dollars by making certain changes in operation and sortation. In other words, when the minister is able to say that he has actually tried to cut costs and to maintain service, only then should we support the government on this new bill.

Whether or not the post office has instituted these recommended changes we do not know. However, before the post office raises its rates to the Canadian public we should be assured that every opportunity has been taken to reduce costs. Not only is there a lack of information available but there is a stupendous amount of misleading information, and it is my guess that greatly increased efficiency should be possible.

I suggest, sir, that this bill be delayed for say six months so as to give the Postmaster General the opportunity to initiate some innovations and to streamline procedures, but particularly to curtail expenditure. Perhaps if he really goes at the task properly he can lead the way in demonstrating to his colleague the Minister of Finance how a sincere effort coupled with action might obviate the easy way out of simply raising rates.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Chairman, there are a couple of reasons I have some particular pleasure in rising to take part in the discussion of the postal service and its rates. One of the reasons is that I am one of those who believe in the merits of public enterprise as well as private enterprise. I think the postal service of Canada, broadly speaking, is one of the best services of its kind in the world. It is probably the federal function that gives most satisfaction to most Canadians. I think the service is really wonderful when we consider the vastness of our country and the immense volume of mail which is handled every year which amounts, according to the figures I have, to approximately four and three quarter billion pieces of mail each 12 months, the vast bulk of which is picked up and delivered without error within 24 hours.

I think the degree of efficiency and lack of error in the postal service are quite well indicated by the fact that by the end of 1965, the last year for which I have an available figure, the number of inquiries—and an inquiry does not necessarily mean a complaint to the postal service—had dropped to 68 for every one billion pieces of mail carried. I doubt very much that any private enterprise can match the efficiency of the Canadian postal service. It is a very big service with approximately 44,000 employees and it does a business which amounts to $300 million a year.

I said there were two reasons I had some particular pleasure in saying something on this subject, Mr. Chairman, and my second reason is a personal one. At one time I was a letter carrier and was part of the postal service. I therefore know a little more about it than I might otherwise have known. You might say that I learned the post office business by mail.

At any rate, Mr. Chairman, the Postmaster General is asking parliament to increase postal rates in the case of letters being delivered in the postal area in which they were posted from 4 to 5 cents, an increase of 25 per cent, and in the case of letters which are posted in one district and are to be delivered in another from 5 to 6 cents, an increase of 20 per cent. These increases, if allowed, would be on first class mail, on letters written and received by the people generally. In the case of second class or business mail, which covers magazines, newspapers and periodicals, the increase is not spelled out. It seems to be less than what has been proposed for ordinary, first class mail.

We object to three things, Mr. Chairman. The increase in mail rates generally comes at a strange time, considering that the government itself is urging everyone not to increase costs. If the deficit which the government aims to meet by increasing mail rates is $30 million, as reported, then the increase will be to cover that amount and will be paid directly by the general public through increased postage rates; or by commercial establishments such as telephone and hydro companies whose bills make up a great deal of the first class mail. Can anyone imagine that business will absorb the extra $20 million, say, that it must lay out in meeting increased postal costs? I submit that as usual businesses will pass on their extra costs to the consumers, the ordinary letter writers of this country. We submit that the government's proposal to increase postage rates will increase living costs for many people. They in turn will seek to offset their increased expenses by trying to obtain a higher return in earnings.

We also object on this ground, Mr. Chairman. Though for many years first class mail, the mail of the ordinary citizen, has been paying its way and making a profit in some years, and though over the same period second and third class mail, that mail which is distributed to make a profit for someone, has been carried, at a deficit and to that extent has been subsidized by the ordinary consumer who uses first class mail, suddenly the government says. Let us wipe out the postal deficit on commercial mail largely by imposing increases on the consumers' first class mail. If postal rates are to be increased at all, surely they ought to be increased in those areas where over the years they have been proven to be too low to meet costs. I am preferring to second and third class mail.

It is said, Mr. Chairman, that first class mail is beginning to show a deficit and that it may lose money. I suggest that we should wait and see. Before increasing postage rates for consumers, why does the government not find out exactly where the deficits occur? It is too early to say exactly which way the trend is going with regard to deficits on first class mail. It is not too early to say what has been happening to second or third class mail, that mail which has to do with commercial, private profit-making business.

The public accounts committee of the House of Commons this year made a report which contained this unanimous recommendation:

> The committee first drew the matter to the attention of the house in its 1958 report—

That is almost ten years ago:

> —and while minor changes have been made the annual loss has continued to increase and the committee is of the opinion that sufficient consideration has not been given to the solution of this problem. It considers it essential that the Post Office Department or parliament immediately find ways and means of covering the loss of the Post Office Department in handling second class mail . . . without this being done at the expense of other classes of mail, keeping in mind, however, the need of assistance to small independently owned newspapers circulated in rural areas.

Similar recommendations have been made by similar committees during the past six years. I make a similar recommendation today. The recommendations of the House of Commons committee, and I urge the government to heed them, have repeatedly been drawn to the attention of Postmasters General over many years. Possibly some post office difficulties have arisen owing to the high rate of turnover of Postmasters General. We have had no less than seven in the past six years.

Returning to my argument, I ask why should the Post Office Department face a deficit when ordinary first class mail has made a profit and mail having to do with private business has been carried at a loss which must be paid for by the taxpayer? I wish to quote from another source. The royal commission on publications in 1961 made this statement:

> Periodicals do not carry the full cost because it is believed to be in the national interest that there be the widest distribution of periodicals and newspapers—

According to the commission, much of this deficit, which increased from $20 million in 1960 to $30 million in 1966, can be attributed to periodicals which are mailed abroad and delivered in Canada. The Canadian post office derives no revenue from the delivery of foreign second class mail. Under the terms of the universal postal convention, all governments are required to handle free of charge whatever is passed to them by foreign post offices. This arrangement is reciprocal and, in theory, equitable.

Between Canada and the United States that theory fails completely. Canadians receive far more second class mail from abroad, largely from the United States, than they send abroad. We believe that the agreement which has brought about this situation should be renegotiated. It is not enough to say that boosting ordinary letter rates will take care of everything. We do not want to protect this situation any longer and we will not support any move that will add to the cost of living of the ordinary consumer of this country.

We ought to concern ourselves with other aspects of the post office. On the one hand the Post Office Department receives subsidies and benefits of approximately $25 million a year. These include provision for accommodation, buildings, and so on. On the other hand, the post office performs various services free of charge. Because of the free service it provides to members of the public and to members of parliament with respect to parliamentary correspondence, the post office is loaded with extra costs which according to the 1965 figures amount to approximately $4.5 million. It is not enough for us to tinker with post office rates at the retail level. In fairness we cannot increase or decrease those rates until we have a clear picture of the factors which interfere with the ability of the service to break even.

We regard the post office service as a basic service which the Canadian public has organized and which it uses and pays for. The service is a natural, public monopoly and we want it to pay its way, but that is all. We want no one class of the community to pay more or to pay less than in equity it ought to pay.

I should like the government to answer some questions so as to provide us with a clearer picture and better perspective of the dimensions of the post office service and what it costs to maintain that service.

For instance, what was the approximate value of subsidies to the post office, including accommodation, for the year 1966? What was the approximate value of the franking service and other services that were performed free of charge by the post office in 1966? What was the loss in 1966 incurred by the post office in the carrying of newspapers and magazines? What was the loss to the post office in 1966 in connection with second class mail posted in the United States for delivery in Canada? What has been the loss to the post office in the last ten years as a result of carrying Time and Reader's Digest? What was the value of printed matter imported into Canada in the last ten years and carried by our post office without remuneration under the terms of the universal post office convention?

In conclusion I summarize the position of my party with regard to the proposals to increase postal rates. We propose to let the first class mail rate alone. It is said that the rate may be resulting in a deficit. Let us study this for at least a year so as to be sure of what is happening, just as we are sure that the second class rate is incurring a loss.

In the second place we propose that the deficit which has all along been caused by subsidizing private business mailings be eliminated by increasing the rate in the area where it is low enough to cause a deficit, that is, in the second and third class rates.

Third, we ask that the government renegotiate the international treaty which has involved us in losses and bring about parity with the United States postal service in order that our consumers and publishers may not be subsidizing non-Canadian competitors.

Fourth, we want an examination—it might be through a committee or a commission or a special inquiry within the post office itself —of the various subsidies and charges borne by the postal service in order to bring out the facts and provide a clear picture showing who pays for what.

Fifth, we would like a study to be made in depth of the reported advantages of turning the post office into a public corporation, that is, a crown company operated quite separately from itinerant postmasters general.

Finally, what we in this party would like to see is a further advance in the modernization which has already taken place within the postal service. We should like its procedures and techniques brought increasingly in line with the era of technological production and distribution in which we are living. Today the post office faces a situation similar to that which the telephone companies faced a few years ago before they made their operations as automatic as possible.

We in this party aim to do what we can to bring about the most efficient service possible, the best service to the most people in the shortest time, and it is not in line with that philosophy for us to support the proposed increase in the first class mail rate.

Post Office Act

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Chairman, I shall take this opportunity to extend my sympathy to the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté), sponsor of this resolution. It is unfortunate to note that after less than two years, he has been forced to come begging to us again.

I remember that 21 months ago, the minister had accepted his appointment with the best intentions in the world and at the time, he had made his plans known to the whole country at a press conference. It is realized today that the minister is faced with the increased cost of living.

He has to administer a department which employs a great number of workers scattered throughout the country. Those workers must pay taxes like any other, in order to meet the requirements of financiers who are asking for a larger share year after year. Taxes and charges must be raised. Our businessmen, our industrialists, through force of circumstances, have become tax collectors have to hire additional personnel and this increases costs and requires an increase in the price of their products. The present minister faces all these increases: Increases in the cost of services, rents, wages, and so on.

In view of the problems brought about by the increase in the cost of living, the Minister of Finance last spring brought down a deficit budget. Nevertheless, the Postmaster General being an intelligent man, wants to run his department on a business basis. To meet the increases in rentals of departmental premises throughout the country, to meet the demands of contractors who supply the trucks, to meet the costs of transportation either by railroad or by air, it is obviously necessary to resort to a new increase in rates. I am not opposed to this plan, because I think that it is the department where the employees work the hardest. It is also a department which generally gives excellent service.

Personally, I had the opportunity to go to Vancouver last winter and I noted that a letter mailed on Monday afternoon had been delivered in Quebec Tuesday afternoon, 24 hours later. It is also known that from Ottawa to Quebec is a twelve-hour service.

I take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. minister who uses modern means in modern times. We know that trains or trucks are still more advantageous for short distances, and that planes are better for long distances.

There still are some rural areas which are served according to old methods because certain rules apply which date back to the days of wax candles when much of the transport was handled by ox-carts. Unfortunately, a few parishes in the riding of Portneuf, which I have the honour of representing, were served that way. Their service must be improved. Some time ago, I pointed out the situation to the hon. minister and I know he will do everything in his power to give satisfaction to the people concerned.

I take this opportunity to thank him for his co-operation. I wish also to tell the minister that the part of the resolution in which I am most interested is the last paragraph, and I quote:

> —to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the Act, more especially in relation to tenders and contracts.

It is interesting to note that the minister is looking for reform because the old system was really obsolete, and I could quote many examples to this effect. I have here the list of all the contractors of my region, and it is deceiving to note the numerous price differences between the various parishes for contracts providing for the same mileage and about the same number of subscribers.

This situation is caused by civil servants who work for the party. I have noticed in the past two years—I imagine that things were the same before I came here—that when the time comes to renew a contract awarded to a member of the party, the government never calls for tenders. When citizens who do not belong to a specific political party are involved, however, tenders are called. That is when people try to cut each other's throat, when unemployed persons, faced with the problems of survival and an insecure future, make unreasonably low bids and are unable to discharge adequately the responsibilities involved in the circumstances, I cannot but welcome the projects of the minister for improving those methods.

I should like to ask the minister to make a limited personal investigation in another area, more particularly in respect to closing times of rooms where post office boxes are located. In three post offices located within a few miles of one another, hours during which access may be had to post office boxes differ. In one post office, access to the boxes is prohibited after 6:30 p.m., since the facilities are locked. Ten miles farther, in another post office, the public has access to the boxes till 7:30 p.m. Then, another 10 miles farther, the post office boxes are open till 9:30 p.m.

I made a telephone call again this morning; I was somewhat concerned because of the irregularity of the situation. In the light of these facts, Mr. Chairman, I come to the conclusion that the closing hours are related to the wishes or whims of certain employees.

In some post offices, the postmaster is responsible, but in others, we must get in touch with the Department of Public Works because the time during which we can have access to these boxes is decided by this department's officials. No matter who is in charge, standards should be established for such cases.

Moreover, as the rates for a letter or a parcel post are about the same, I imagine that for towns and villages of the same size, services should be comparable.

I hope that the minister will take into consideration the remarks of all hon. members. As far as the improvement of the few defective areas are concerned, I hope also that the minister will get in touch with the postmasters concerned because most of those employees work conscientiously. They work in the field and, in my opinion, they are really neglected. As a matter of fact, I am under the impression that they very seldom get a chance to speak. I suggest to the minister to consult those employees who would like nothing better than to put their intelligence at the service of the department by making suggestions that will benefit the Canadian postal service as a whole.

• (4:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, in taking this opportunity to comment on the resolution with regard to the proposed postal bill I wish to emphasize as vividly as I can that any remarks I make with regard to the post office are in no wise intended to reflect on the Postmaster General, whom I consider possibly the most conscientious member of the cabinet in the administration of his department. My reflections with regard to the resolution and the bill which will follow are directed primarily to the method by which legislation is placed before parliament, and I wish to comment on the manner in which so-called representative government never gives an opportunity to the people's representatives to do any governing.

When the broadcasting bill was introduced in the house I spoke at length on the manner in which it was brought in, pointing out that members of parliament other than members of the cabinet were in no wise considered with regard to the bill or its contents, that neither the caucus, nor the party in power, nor individual members of parliament outside of the cabinet were asked anything about the proposed legislation, and pointed out that pieces of proposed legislation are never shown to them. I said at that time that when the post office bill or resolution was brought forward I intended to make the same comments, and I do so again, if possible with a little more vehemence. If the members of the House of Commons wish to consider me conceited, that is their privilege. It is a free country. But I still stand here, as I have said on more than one occasion when the post office estimates were up for consideration or a post office bill was being discussed, and say that I believe I know more about the Post Office Department than any other member of the house.

I had 25 years close association with the post office in a business way for 24 hours a day, seven days a week. I am not exaggerating, because in the publication of newspapers with a circulation of one million a week, or 400,000 a day, you are in continuous contact with the Post Office Department. Yet as a private member of parliament, elected to this house from the riding of York-Humber, and as one who is conceited enough to say he does know something about the post office, I have never been asked a single, solitary question about it by any member of the cabinet, by anybody connected with the cabinet side of the so-called parliamentary system of government. But being on the right of Mr. Speaker I am immediately supposed to vote for anything which emanates from the cabinet mind because it is bound to be wholly right, wholly true, wholly correct.

I am not one who subscribes to the belief that the hand-picked members of the cabinet are right in every decision they make. How can you believe that every decision the cabinet makes in secret is right? When a general election comes around and a cabinet is unhorsed then you are supposed to criticize members of the former cabinet for what they thought were wholly right decisions when in office. I do not believe that any man is ever wholly right or wholly wrong, but I do believe that the representatives of the people should be given an opportunity to represent the people who elected them and present their views on the matters of the day that may be brought before the house.

I came into this chamber just now, after having been over to the committee reporting services branch checking on the reporting of some committees, when the hon. member for New Westminster was speaking. As a member of the Liberal party sitting to the right of Mr. Speaker I wish to say I personally endorse everything the hon. member for New Westminster had to say in commenting on this resolution. I do not believe for one moment that first class postage rates should be raised without the house having been advised what are the details of the losses on other classes of mail, second class, third class and parcel post, if there are losses. It is not satisfactory to this country to have members of the cabinet stand up and say, "There is a deficit in the post office operation. Therefore we are going to raise first class postage rates." First class postage rates affect everybody in the entire country, and why should all the taxpayers of this country be asked to carry the load for the business firms that are being subsidized by too low rates on the classification of mail in which they are primarily interested?

When the broadcasting bill was introduced I commented on the number of times that the minister introducing it, the Secretary of State, stated: Under this bill we will be doing this and we will be doing that and we will be doing the other thing. Never once did she say that the cabinet was asking parliament to approve their suggestion that such and such be adopted as the policy of the parliament of Canada. We were simply told straight from the shoulder what parliament was going to do with regard to broadcasting, because didn't she have a broadcasting bill to lay before the house? Now here we are again with another representative of the cabinet introducing other legislation.

I have before me Hansard for September 29, 1967, and as recorded on page 2685 the Postmaster General, a friend of mine, moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Post Office Act—

Et cetera. As recorded on page 2686, during his speech he said:

> The new rate on a letter for delivery within the postal area in which it is posted will be five cents—

There was no suggestion there that members of the cabinet were in fact asking parliament to approve a rate of five cents for the first ounce or fraction of an ounce. Then he continued:

> The rate on a letter posted within one postal area for delivery in another postal area will be six cents for the first ounce—

What are we meeting for? Why do they not just put it into effect? They are telling us what they are going to do. Why waste our time discussing the matter if that is what the rates are going to be? But I agree with the hon. member for New Westminster that we want a lot more facts before parliament should be asked to approve an increase in the first class mail rate, which affects all the people of Canada and, without doubt, will be a subsidy to business firms using other sections of the postal service.

I was here when the minister made his remarks on September 29 and it was interesting to me to hear him say—I suppose the facts are given to him by officials of the department—as recorded on page 2689 of Hansard:

> The hon. member who has just made his speech—

That, by the way, was the hon. member for New Westminster.

> —suggested that the ordinary citizen would have to pay the bulk of the revenue to be provided by this increase.

• (4:20 p.m.)

> Let me tell him that the average citizen spends on the services of the post office $1.89 a year; the increase will bring this up to $2.12, so the ordinary citizen will be paying 30 cents a year more.

Then listen to this big business cabinet:

> But consider the position of the Bell Telephone Company, for example, which has telephones in every home and sends a bill to every house once a month. What about companies and corporations of this kind? It is they who will really be carrying the burden.

Well, I do not shed any tears over organizations the size of the Bell Telephone Company, but I like to ask the members of the cabinet where they think the Bell Telephone Company will get the money to pay the increased postage rates. If you increase the postage rates of the Bell Telephone Company they will increase their rates to their subscribers. I know of no reason why we should force the domestic taxpayer, the home owner, to pay more for first class mail service on the ground that outfits the size of the Bell Telephone Company will share the increase in the rate too, because any increase in the postage rate they pay they will get from the consuming public, and then suggest that there should be no objections and no argument about an increase in first class rates.

Since I am referring to what the Postmaster General said on September 29 regarding the Bell Telephone Company, I might ask him a question which I brought to the attention of the house a year or two ago. I asked whether the Bell Telephone Company had a special mailing rate for sending out its monthly invoices. Has that special rate been wiped out now?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): On your recommendation.

Mr. Cowan: I am very glad to know that one slight change was made on my recommendation. I can hardly believe that that amount of attention was ever paid to a private member of parliament. I do not think, however, that this is great enough that we should throw our hats in the air in glee. The Bell Telephone Company for years had a special rate. When this was brought to the attention of this very able Postmaster General, action was taken so that they would be forced to pay the same rate as every other business firm in Canada when sending out invoices.

The question of the revenue from second class and third class mail and from parcel post has been gone into many, many times. The hon. member for New Westminster in the course of his remarks asked what loss we sustain by delivering throughout Canada second class mail originating in the United States from which the Canadian Post Office Department does not secure any revenue. When the hon. member for New Westminster asked about the United States he might have been even broader in his question and have asked about all the other countries in the world. A tremendous bulk of mail is pouring into this country from other nations of the world which comes in as second class mail and is delivered throughout the whole country, and the Canadian Post Office Department does not secure a cent of revenue from it. When the hon. member for New Westminster mentioned the United States no doubt he realized that the great volume of second class mail which comes from outside Canada comes from the United States, but there is a heavy mass of second class mail from other countries such as Great Britain and France, to name two more other than the United States.

In discussing this question of the loss on second class mail I should like to point out something which I have pointed out several times before. It is said that constant dripping wears away the hardest stone. I hope that with constant repetition we may get some action.

I do not know how many members of this house are aware of the fact that second class mail which crosses international boundary lines pays its postal revenue to the country in which it is mailed but that that revenue is not shared with any other country through which that mail may progress. To refer again to the hon. member for New Westminster, I may say that if mail is placed in a mail box in Chicago, Illinois and addressed to Vancouver or New Westminster, British Columbia, or St. John's, Newfoundland, the mail going east may come into Canada at Windsor, Ontario, and the mail going west may cross into Canada at Emerson, Manitoba. The Canadian government carries that second class mail from Emerson right through to New Westminster without a cent of compensation, and if it is going to St. John's, Newfoundland, it is transported from Windsor without a cent of compensation. The United States post office department retains the full revenue for moving that mail from Chicago to Emerson, Manitoba, or from Chicago to Sarnia. I do not see how any man can believe that this is a fair and proper division of the revenue from second class mail mailed outside of the country.

As I have said before and repeat now, for over 30 years definite requests have been made to the government of the day—this involves the Bennett government, the King government, the St. Laurent government, the Diefenbaker government and even the present government—for a proper adjustment of the revenue on international second class mail. We have the example of parcel post coming from the United States into Canada and parcel post going from Canada into the United States. On two days in the year all the parcels are hauled to the border and the post office departments of Canada and the United States very quickly analyse and calculate the weight moving on these two days, check how far the parcels are going in either country and, using these two days as the best example, they multiply by the number of days in the year and come up with the weight of the parcel post movement from Canada to the United States and from the United States to Canada, and the distances travelled in both countries. The revenue then is divided equally according to the ton miles carried.

Since this has been done on parcel post for years, why can it not be done on second class mail? We are given the answer that we are bound by the international agreement of the postal union which union meets every five years. We have the example of Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, a very able and determined prime minister of this country who, when his government decided to put a tax on foreign publications coming into Canada, put the tax on the foreign publications coming into Canada even though hon. Mr. St. Laurent knew that this offended some agreement with regard to tariffs involving the U.S.A. When the U.S.A. protested about the unilateral action of the Canadian government under Mr. St. Laurent's able direction, he simply told the United States that we needed the revenue. Well, if hon. Mr. St. Laurent had enough backbone to tell the United States that this country of 20 million people alongside a country of 200 million people needed the revenue and therefore he proposed to put the tax on foreign publications, why cannot we in 1967 tell these foreign countries such as Denmark which hauls foreign mail the whole width of Denmark—40 miles in some places—that we do not believe Canada should have to carry their mail across Canada from Halifax to Victoria because the Danish government has carried our mail from one side of their small peninsula to the other?

There should be some reason and common sense shown. It is ridiculous that we move these tons and tons of mail through the Canadian postal service and do not receive a single solitary cent.

I knew that this resolution was coming up and I went to see Mr. Douglas Fisher, the former N.D.P. member of parliament for Port Arthur, and an able member he was. I was elected to the House of Commons in 1962 and Mr. Fisher was a member from 1957. I used to have numerous consultations with that indefatigable worker, which he was and is. I knew his views with regard to the Canadian postal service. I will give you a rough outline of the situation. The Diefenbaker government was in power. The postmaster general was Hon. William Hamilton, a man experienced in the advertising world. Mr. Fisher, the hon. member for Port Arthur, had been pressing Mr. Hamilton in respect of how much of a loss was involved in the handling of this foreign second class mail. Mr. Hamilton was interested in that problem and I am sure still is interested in it. He said that a very confidential study was being prepared in the Post Office Department and that he would release it to Mr. Fisher when it was ready.

Some weeks later Mr. Hamilton sent Mr. Fisher a typewritten statement which I have read about three times. Mr. Fisher pointed out to me that this was a confidential government document from a member of the cabinet sent to him as a member of the opposition and that he had been asked to keep it confidential and not to publicize the situation. This statement is really something to look at. The figures are unbelievable. Millions of pieces of mail are being handled by the Canadian Post Office Department without any revenue whatsoever accumulating to the Canadian postal services. This is a confidential statement. Surely it is in the files of the Post Office Department. If the minister wants to know where to find it let me tell him it is from Hon. William Hamilton who was then the minister in charge of postal services, and it was prepared at his request. I should like to see this statement brought up to date and presented to the house before we are asked to raise first class postal rates on letters being mailed throughout the country by the average taxpayer and home owner. I do not believe that first class mail users should be asked to subsidize second class mail originating outside this country, even though we are given the happy privilege of dragging it right across the nation at our expense.

Some comment was made on September 29 regarding the tremendous service the Canadian postal service is giving first class mail. Let me make a comparison with the United States. If you are air mailing first class letters in the United States you pay a special rate for that service. If you do not pay that special rate you get surface service at the rate that has been established for years in the United States. We are told that there is a deficit arising in the handling of Canada's first class mail. We are asked to believe, and I am sure it is correct, that the speed at which mail is carried within Canada is an example to every postal administration in the world. There is no mention made about the cost; we are just told that the speed at which the mail is carried in Canada is an example to every other postal administration in the world.

We are also told that domestic mail prepaid at first class postal rates, regardless of weight, will be given air mail service if this measure goes through the way it is proposed. Why should all first class mail be moved by air? Not all first class mail has to be received the day after it is mailed. If people want that kind of service they should pay for it as they do in the United States. If surface mail is satisfactory across the country for much of the mail, why should the government worry about giving all-up mail service for all first class mail?

I have mentioned in the house before and I repeat that it was possibly 30 years ago when I heard the president of Trans-Canada Air Lines—before my confreres from Quebec jump to the rescue of Air Canada let me state that I am talking about 1937 when it was Trans-Canada Air Lines—make a statement in the Langevin block that he was not going to see T.C.A. operate at a loss and he would bill the Post Office Department with any deficit he thought he had, so he could show a block figure in the T.C.A. annual statement. I suggest to you that that is one way to run a postal service but it is not one of which I approve.

Why can we not have an analysis to find out what it costs to send mail by air services on a basis of weight and distance travelled compared with the cost of surface mail? There is no reason that we should use the most expensive method of transportation for first class mail, even if we do want to brag about the speed with which mail is carried in Canada, which we are told is an example to every postal administration in the world. If this is such an example to every postal administration in the world I should like to ask how many other postal administrations are following our example of using the most costly service possible for all first class mail even if not demanded.

The Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I presume you need agreement.

The Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent in order that the hon. member may continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cowan: I thank you, Mr. Chairman, and through you I thank the members of the committee for their kindness. I should like to make some further remarks on the matter of postal rates.

We were told in an explanation given on September 29 that there will be some substantial changes in second class mail. Why have not members of the house been informed since September 29 what those changes are to be? Why do members of parliament who represent 265 constituencies have to sit here in the dark waiting for the cabinet to release the details of the substantial changes in second class mail at some time at their pleasure? I believe we should be allowed to discuss these matters fully and frankly and then adopt legislation according to the representations made by the elected representatives of the people. But oh, no. That is not the way of government today.

As found on page 2689 of Hansard for September 29 the Postmaster General had this to say:

> Some of the magazines or newspapers now enjoying second class statutory rates will cease to have the benefit of these rates because we are working out a new definition of a Canadian newspaper or a Canadian periodical.

Note the words "we are working out". Are the members of parliament not allowed to work out a new definition of a Canadian newspaper, or do we have to rely on officials to work out that definition? Perhaps it is the cabinet which works out the definition. What are we sent down here for, just to act as rubber stamps on a piece of legislation once it has been worked out by someone, because we are not told who "we" is? I brought this to the attention of the house when the broadcasting bill was brought down.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): It is the members of parliament.

Mr. Cowan: I should like to think the Postmaster General meant members of parliament. I should state that I believe the Postmaster General is one member of the cabinet who would like members of parliament to work out this legislation before it is brought down, and I say that with 100 per cent sincerity.

On September 29 the Postmaster General also stated that there will be free zones for weeklies. This is a contentious matter; yet here we have the cabinet telling us through the Postmaster General that there are going to be free zones for weeklies. How do you reduce the deficit in respect of second class mail by continuing free mail services for anybody?

After I spoke during a debate in this house about free postal services being available to publications with under 10,000 circulation within a 40 mile radius of the office of publication you should have seen the editorials which appeared in those publications which enjoy this subsidy from the Canadian government. One could talk about the old adage, it all depends whose ox is gored; some of those editorials were absolutely childish. They suggested I was an ass, ridiculous, puerile, infantile and did not know what I was talking about. If you want to get the straight truth ask the publisher of a weekly who is getting free postal service from the Canadian government. I am sure he will tell you what the straight truth is. Don't ask a man who has 40 years experience and who knows the postal rates for those publications such as the ones with which I was employed, compared with free service. Ask the publisher of a weekly newspaper who is enjoying this free service and I am sure he will tell you the truth about rates. Anybody who does know will tell you that the value of this free postage service in one year amounts to hundreds of thousands of dollars for weekly newspaper publishers.

Let me ask the Postmaster General if we are going to have zone postal rates on second class mail. Why should Canada haul second class publications mailed in Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg or Vancouver right across the country on a general rate? The government demands extra money through T.C.A. depending on the mileage travelled. It is a crown corporation.

The government demands extra money from the passenger depending on the number of miles he travels on the C.N.R., a crown corporation. It demands extra payment for freight hauled on the C.N.R. according to the mileage it traverses. It demands payment according to the mileage serviced for telegrams sent by the C.N.R., a government agency. Why does this not apply to the postal service? I can see no reason for asking a man who flies from Toronto to Vancouver to pay more on Air Canada than does a man who flies from Toronto to Port Arthur, when one considers that a paper mailed in Toronto is carried to Vancouver for the same rate as to Port Arthur. The airplane and postal rates cannot both be right. Let us have a little consistency in the government's administration of public funds.

I have made these comments, Mr. Chairman, and I mean every word that I said. There are other comments I could make but I do not wish to prolong the discussion as I am sure there are other members who have something to say on this resolution. However, I want to make it perfectly plain that I support 100 per cent the words of the hon. member for New Westminster in connection with this resolution.

[Mr. Cowan.]

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, it is always a distinction to follow the hon. member for York-Humber. I am sure it is a great relief to the members of the government when an opposition member rises and brings the house back to a relatively non-partisan atmosphere.

First of all I should like to say that I hope the Postmaster General and the government, if this bill is passed, will not introduce the new rates until after the Christmas season is over. I hope the Postmaster General, when he takes part in the debate later before the resolution stage is completed, will give us this assurance because during the Christmas season mail is dealt with in bulk quantities. Following the advice and request of the post office, people put stamps on their Christmas card envelopes, gather them together in bundles secured by rubber bands and mail their cards and letters by a certain date. Since some of these cards and letters will undoubtedly require a higher postage rate if this measure is passed, I hope it will be put into effect at a time of the year when it will not throw thousands of households into a great deal of confusion and require the extra licking of one cent stamps.

Second, and this is not a criticism directed solely to the hon. gentleman, we are disappointed that we have been told very little about this legislation at the resolution stage. The resolution stage was originally developed to enable a minister to assess the financial situation which the resolution and bill are to overcome. If this had been carried out we would have had figures from the Postmaster General with regard to the problems encountered by first class and second class mail and the other problems which he seeks to solve by the legislation, but he has not given this information either to the hon. member for York-Humber or to other hon. members. Instead, in his speech on September 29 the hon. gentleman referred to the four points which are to be considered in the bill.

On looking at some of the figures which have been supplied to me by researchers I am not certain whether a case for an increase in first class mail rates has been made. The Postmaster General stated that first class mail pays its way but later he corrected himself and stated the opposite, that it costs about one cent more than is actually covered by the postage. This conclusion has been arrived at by arbitrary action by the Post Office Department in imposing on the first class mail structure 15 per cent or so of the costs not directly related to mail service such as the cost of operating the department. Neither I nor any other hon. member can say whether or not the case for an increase in the first class mail rate has been made out properly by the minister at the resolution stage of the bill. I think this is a defect in the proceedings.

Perhaps an alternative way of proceeding would be to establish a committee outside the house to which the government could say: Look, we have to do something about the deficit of $30 million in the Post Office Department. The committee would hear them out after which they would present some kind of measure to the house. In this way all members would become acquainted with the problem and would have the opportunity to present their own suggestions because, let us face it, once the resolution stage is over the legislation is not changed or is changed very little when it is introduced. Although what I wish to suggest is not possible in this case, I hope that at some time a committee will be established outside the house to deal with this matter, thus enabling us to discuss it with the officials of the department and to satisfy ourselves with regard to some rather perplexing figures.

For example, at present the Post Office Department has over 44,000 employees. In 1963 it had about 26,500. The increase is approximately 69 per cent. What has been the increase in the amount of mail handled in the intervening period of four years? In 1963 the amount of mail handled was 4.2 billion pieces, at an average cost of 6.02 cents. Last year the 4.2 billion pieces of mail had risen to 4.6 billion pieces, carried at a cost of 6.05 cents. In the interim there seems to have been a tug of war between increasing efficiency and an increasing cost factor which did not make it possible for the cost of handling mail to drop. Perhaps this was due to the increase in employees. It is quite obvious that at one stage of the game postmen were carrying too much mail, or it may be that now they carry too little. I just do not know what weight factors are imposed on the postal employees of this country.

On examining the operations of the department I notice that the distribution of post offices across Canada seems to be on a "roll out the barrel" basis. For example, Newfoundland has more post offices than New Brunswick although the former has a smaller population than the latter. Saskatchewan has 50 per cent more post offices than Manitoba, their populations being about the same. Saskatchewan has 33 per cent more post offices than British Columbia although a 20 per cent larger population.

Then we find that part of the smaller post office program—this is particularly true in my constituency—has been swept away and yet in other parts of Canada new small post offices are being built. I will not even try to infer sinister motives but the reason may be the serious cut-backs and slashings which are going on in government departments today to the point of affecting even that very vital source of employment for Canadians in the wintertime, namely, the winter works program.

I have pointed out some of the figures which have raised questions in my mind concerning the necessity for these increases. If these increases are necessary, where should the burden lie? Should there be a flat increase on first class mail or should it be imposed on second class mail? What about the documents which are being dropped from door to door, such as direct mail advertising? Should more be charged on such mail?

Personally, I believe that the Canadian people would be more satisfied if the present 5 cent rate for first class mail were maintained. If somebody wants to pester us with all sorts of grandiose advertisements for furniture or magazines, that type of mail should bear an extra share. First class letters, unless they are from the bank, are received with a certain amount of pleasure. The remainder of our mail is something to help start a fire in the fireplace.

The other point I wish to mention deals with the remarks of the hon. member who preceded me. On June 2, the hon. member for York-Humber was very critical of second class mailing privileges enjoyed by some of the weekly newspapers. I believe that an editorial which appeared in the Canadian Weekly Publisher for July, 1967 should be read into the record in defence of these newspapers. This magazine is the official publication of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association. Before I read this editorial I should like to ask the Postmaster General another question. If he does take part again in the debate on the resolution stage, perhaps he would amplify his remarks about support from the postal rate for these little publications. These remarks are to be found on page 2685 of Hansard. If the Postmaster General means that the former support is to be continued, then I think these newspapers would be satisfied on this point, and I would be also. However, if he means some additional charge is going to be imposed upon them, perhaps not the full charge, then I would not be satisfied. I hope, therefore, he will make that point clear.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Will the hon. member tell me what he means by "small publications"? Does he mean the weeklies?

Mr. McCleave: I refer to the very small weekly newspapers. I am glad the minister did not give me an answer at this moment because this affords me an opportunity to put on the record some comments made in an editorial entitled, "M.P.—Irresponsible Talk". After making several comments on the remarks made by the hon. member for York-Humber, the editorial reads as follows:

> Thus we generously estimate (the exact figures have been supplied to the postal authorities by the C.W.N.A. Postal Committee) that the Post Office Department handles, free of cost, at the most some 500,000 copies a week.
> During the publishing year, with most newspapers closing one week for a plant holiday, this number amounts to 25,500,000 copies. At the usual mailing rate—3 cents for the first two ounces—the annual lost revenue to the Post Office Department is $765,000 at most.
> This isn't 4 per cent of that far more worrisome $30 million.

Then the magazine, in language which should appeal to the hon. member for York-Humber because it is as rough and ready as his own remarks, takes him to task for some of his statements. I do not intend to read that part into the record. What I do want to read is this:

> Mr. Cowan would like to know what other reasons there are to provide free mailing privileges to the smaller weekly newspapers.
> This may come as a surprise to the self-professed expert on publishing business, but Mr. Cowan should be aware that a small community newspaper is no money-maker to many a publisher. This service to the public is, if the publisher is fortunate, made possible by the job shop and stationery store run in conjunction with the newspaper.
> The publisher keeps putting out his newspaper also because it is the only means that provides a voice to the grass roots community and lends it some identity. Quite often the small newspaper is the only voice through which the government by publicity releases or advertisements—

[Mr. McCleave.]

This should appeal to the hon. member.

> —can reach the isolated or furthest corners of this country. Thus the newspapers not only provide service to their readers but help the government to communicate with its citizens.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, the Postmaster General realizes the point I am trying to make. We must not look at this matter of postal rates as a simple matter of business efficiency and the recovering of costs according to the particular items to be mailed. We have to have some regard in this country for a policy which will enable the small weekly newspapers to survive. I hope the Postmaster General will clear up my questions on that score later in the debate.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I want to rise in connection with some comments made by the hon. member for Halifax.

The Chairman: I am sure the hon. member will recall the conditions under which the committee is debating this resolution. Standing order 61A provides the hon. member with 20 minutes during this debate and he has already exceeded that limit.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I suppose it is just a coincidence that you have reminded us of the 20 minute limit just when I am rising to make my contribution. My first task, of course, is to congratulate the Postmaster General who has responsibility for the problems connected with the post office. Since I am a Montrealer I am very much aware and appreciative of the courage and initiative the Postmaster General has shown in connection with some of the internal labour problems of the post office and the forthright and direct manner in which he has intervened to the benefit of everyone concerned. I feel this is a tribute to the Postmaster General who has taken his role very seriously.

I do not share in the general criticism of the ambiguity of the resolution, at least in comparison with other resolutions with which we have been faced. However, I believe the hon. member for York-Humber has a legitimate grievance to some extent at least. The resolution does outline four general areas in which the Postmaster General intends to introduce legislation. We are given at least some idea of what he has in mind.

In reviewing the speech made by the minister I was impressed by the fact that 70 per cent or more of the first class mail in this country originates not from private citizens but from businesses. The bulk of any increase in the cost of first class mail, therefore, will fall mainly on the shoulders of business. My observations at this moment are made from a rather intimate knowledge of the graphic arts industry. Prior to five years ago, when I first came to the House of Commons, I earned my living as the president of a graphic arts firm. I severed my connection with that firm very reluctantly when I realized I could not be a publisher and a member of parliament and do justice to the business of which I was head. However, I have retained my interest in that particular field of endeavour.

I am participating in this debate because of the effect, directly and indirectly, that the postal service and postal rates have on the graphic arts industry. I think there is no member in the House of Commons who is not aware that in his own community or his own constituency there are several one-man shops, some two-man shops and perhaps some rather sophisticated and efficient printing plants. In fact, Mr. Chairman, as of 1965 there were over 78,000 people engaged directly in the graphic arts industry in Canada. I know of no other industry in which 78,000 people are so widely distributed from one end of this country to the other. It is only natural that the graphic arts industry should view with apprehension any changes contemplated in our mailing services.

The hon. member for York-Humber made an excellent point when he said that owing to the population of Canada and the size of the nation we are by international agreement expected to absorb more than our share of providing mailing facilities for other signatories to the agreement. I think that at the next conference, which will be taking place in a few years, Canada should advance the proposal that the fund be pooled. As the situation is at the moment the fund is weighted very heavily on the side of the United States of America, with its vast population, and other countries with large populations and therefore with large mail flow.

One of the greatest inequalities suffered by the Canadian graphic arts industry in recent years results from the fact that so much direct mail coming into Canada originates in the United States. Years ago when I was associated with a printing firm I remember that nothing upset me more than to receive mail soliciting my business and asking me to purchase another piece of equipment or a new type of ink or a new can of solution, something I needed for the day to day operation of the business, which originated from the United States. I thought it was an insult to our graphic arts industry, which is so dependent on business from Canadian corporations, to openly approach me for business by mail which originated in the United States.

If you go into a supermarket today, Mr. Chairman, you will find that many of the labels on cans of food originate in the United States of America. The country of origin must be indicated by law. It gripes me, realizing the contribution the graphic arts industry makes to every little community, that when I buy a can of pears or peaches the label on the can bears the rather unobstrusively printed words, "Printed in the United States of America".

A question of cold economics, of course, is involved here. In the United States there is the advantage of the over-run. More and more Canadian firms have been trying to offset the competitive advantage of the United States which merely has to run its presses a few hours longer to print labels for Canada. Canadian firms have met this competition not only by being efficient but by being on the Canadian scene. However, I am a little apprehensive, as I mentioned to the Postmaster General if the mailing rates in Canada are increased in respect of third class mail. This class of mail includes the bulk of direct mail, and any increase in rates will mean increasing the competitive advantage of direct mail originating from the United States. Many subsidiaries of international firms will once again find it expedient to send direct mail from the United States, taking advantage of United States postal rates to solicit business across Canada in competition with local representatives of the graphic arts industry.

People ask me why the government should subsidize the graphic arts industry. Why should the government subsidize small printing firms in communities across the country by carrying their mail at a low rate? It would be equally logical for the representatives of the graphic arts industry to ask why the government should subsidize those who advertise not by direct mail but on the C.B.C. This form of advertising is subsidized through the amount of money the Canadian taxpayer puts at the disposal of the C.B.C. When a program on the C.B.C. is sponsored jointly by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Ford Motor Company, or whoever it is, we all know this is a form of subsidy to a specific type of advertising. If it is not correct to do it in one case then it is not correct to do it in another.

I therefore would not view with any tremendous degree of alarm the fact that the post office may subsidize directly or indirectly, certain segments of the graphic arts industry. Sponsors who advertise on television and on the radio are equally subsidized. In fact, the story of Canada is one of subsidy, whether it relates to farming areas, the cities, the advertising industry, the graphic arts industry, radio or television. I am sure hon. members are all familiar with the amount of subsidization that exists in this country.

I am very resentful when speakers refer, as sometimes happens, to all direct mail as being junk mail. I think this is unfair. Whether we like it or not, the amount of direct mail is increasing. Whether we like it or not, at the present moment the pulp and paper industry is badly depressed in Canada. Because of overproduction and increased competition in foreign markets, one of the godsends to firms like the E. B. Eddy Company, Abitibi and others in Canada is the amount of fine paper that is used by the graphic arts industry in the production of direct mail. We may find ourselves in the ridiculous position of trying to increase the income of the Post Office Department by increasing rates on third class mail which could result in a decrease in revenue from the 12 per cent tax that is applied to all pieces of direct mail produced in this country.

I do not pretend that every piece of direct mail produced in Canada is tasteful any more than every advertisement seen on television is tasteful. In this regard I think particularly of advertisements for the drug or pharmaceutical industry depicting men with hammers banging on their heads or their stomachs, and other similar exaggerated advertisements. They are no more tasteful than some of the direct mail which is sent out every day of the week in Canada. However, by and large the direct mail distributed in Canada is tasteful and attractive. If it is not it does not capture the imagination of the people, and if it does not do that people stop using direct mail and turn to other media of communication such as television, radio and the daily newspapers. Before hon. members condemn direct mail per se I would ask them to reflect a little and to realize the good effect that direct mail does have on the graphic arts industry, with the resultant good effect upon their communities as well as mine.

It is for this reason that I am not concerned about the fact that direct mail may or may not be handled at a loss to the Canadian taxpayer, any more than I am concerned about the fact that advertising on radio and television is subsidized from the huge grants we give the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. But I am concerned about any increased charge to the graphic arts industry in the form of a further increase in third class mailing rates. I say further increase because there was a substantial increase on October 1, 1967 which had to be absorbed by the graphic arts industry. This added burden, which may or may not be imposed by the Postmaster General—the resolution is not too clear about this—could very well mean the difference between further expansion in Canada of the graphic arts industry or a return to the old practice of mailing direct from the United States. This practice is to the complete and total disadvantage of the 78,000 people employed in the printing industry in Canada, as well as the fine paper merchants and others who benefit from direct mail.

I could go on, Mr. Chairman, during the short time at my disposal to point out that there is more to printing than somebody merely running a printing press. The graphic arts industry of Canada gives work to artists, to creative people, printers, translators, copywriters, proof readers, and all those other trades so familiar to the hon. member for York-Humber and other members who have been more directly associated with newspaper work.

As I mentioned, the resolution lacks information. As found at the bottom of page 2685 and the top of page 2686 of Hansard the minister said that he intends to define clearly those publications that will be carried as second class mail and those publications, weekly or otherwise, which will be relegated to third class status.

I am concerned about the following remark to be found on page 2686 of Hansard where the minister is reported to have said:

> Publications which do not qualify as Canadian will come out of the second class statutory rates category.

I hold no brief for magazines which do not qualify as Canadian magazines. Hon. members who were here in 1963 may recall that as the member for Verdun I rose in the house and suggested that Reader's Digest and Time Magazine ought to be run out of the country. I spoke for half an hour and gave my reasons. I said that since many employees of the firms that publish these magazines reside in my riding it was high time to stop procrastinating with respect to the O'Leary report, as it was known, and that we ought to decide whether these magazines were Canadian. A long debate followed and from it emerged comprehensive legislation which, among other things, prevented a further decline of Canadian magazines, reduced the possibility of United States publications competing unfairly with domestic publications and prevented Canadian newspapers from ever becoming foreign owned or dominated.

From my understanding of the law, and I expect that the minister will make a statement on second reading, first class mail rates are statutory and third and fourth class mail rates are non-statutory. I believe that everybody understands what that means. For instance, on October 1 the minister in his wisdom—and I say this objectively—decreed that matter which is classified to be carried as third and fourth class matter would be subject to an increase in postal rates from that date. It was not necessary for the minister to come before the house because any action he took was authorized under existing legislation. I expect the minister's reasons for his action were that he felt that the burden of cost of third class mail was such that these categories should pay higher postal rates. I do not object to that.

Nevertheless, I am concerned about magazines and newspapers being placed in the non-statutory category, and for this reason. They will find themselves in the onerous position of being subject to increased rates by regulations which may be applied, and these new rates imposed by regulation need not be scrutinized by the House of Commons. To make my point clear, let me say this. A government—any government—in one year, two years, five years or ten years, which may be upset by the editorial comment of a magazine or newspaper falling in the third class rate category, may resort to using the psychological weapon that it has in its hands. At the top of page 2686 of Hansard the minister said that publications which do not qualify as Canadian publications will be removed from the statutory rate category. The minister did not say whether such publications are to be included in the third or fourth class categories. Conceivably, a new category could be created for such publications. My point is that I do not think it advisable to remove any publication, Canadian or non-Canadian, from the statutory rate category and place it in the non-statutory rate category. I have given my reasons for saying that.

Once a publication is placed in a non-statutory category the government of the day—and this includes my government—has in its hands a weapon that may be unfairly used. Should the government not be pleased with the editorial comment of a magazine it may use the weapon it has in its hand and threaten that magazine—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Chairman, most of my remarks will take the form of questions directed to the minister, but first I wish to thank the minister and his department for the co-operation I have received in the past.

I am concerned about the thousands of small post offices which are being closed. I realize that the department thinks that closing these post offices will result in economies. I remind the minister that many small post offices, most, in fact, are run by merchants who operate small stores. The post office brings in extra revenue which helps to defray general store expenses. The post office also attracts customers to the store who buy goods. By closing post offices the department will inevitably put many hundreds of small businessmen out of business, and these businessmen are all taxpayers. The country as a whole will not benefit from these economies and the department ought to strike a balance between the benefits that may accrue to the country from the economies of closing small post offices and the benefits that will accrue to the country from allowing taxpayers such as small businessmen to continue paying taxes. It is convenient to have a post office in a small store. Those who visit the post office get their mail, buy stamps, money orders and what have you, and buy goods from the merchant.

I wish to bring to the minister's attention that in the previous fiscal year—I am not referring to this year—171 new revenue post offices were built, 139 of them in four provinces. It is nice to have a new post office; every small town would like to get one. But when 139 out of 171 post offices are built in four provinces and the country has ten provinces and two territories it becomes evident that there ought to be a better distribution of post office buildings. Newfoundland has more post offices per capita than any province of Canada. No doubt the minister is aware that Newfoundland post offices are all monuments to John Whitney Pickersgill.

Mr. Webb: I should also like to ask the minister whether he would not consider setting a rate for rural and urban mail carriers so as to eliminate the cutthroat practices which go on today. As things are, tenders are called and one person can take a contract away from another by bidding say $10 less, though possibly his equipment is dilapidated and the service provided will not be as good. I believe this situation should be looked into. A few years ago I was talking to an official of the department and he told me he had tried to promote such a course as I have suggested but had not got very far. If the department would set a rate of 20 cents a mile for urban deliveries and 25 cents a mile for rural deliveries I believe we would get better service. Today many carriers are operating at a loss. They bid a little less than the other fellow and are awarded the contract but get little benefit from it. As to cost, I am sure that when the department calculates at the end of the year how much is needed to keep a postmaster and caretaker in all these new post offices it will be found to exceed the cost of the local deliveries which are being made now.

I should also like to ask the minister whether it is true that today there are some janitors who are receiving larger salaries than the postmasters.

On the subject of newspaper rates may I say I am very sympathetic toward those who publish and read weekly newspapers. Many of these papers are ceasing to be published; those who put them out are finding it increasingly difficult to get along. I can appreciate the government's objective in trying to reduce the deficit which the department is incurring. At the same time I believe we should take a look at what is happening in some of the other departments of a government.

I am thinking particularly of the C.B.C. which is subsidized to the tune of many millions of dollars a year. I am sure many hon. members will agree that many C.B.C. programs are scandalous and shameful. Only a few weeks ago my attention was drawn through letters and personal representations to a program on abortion. People were ashamed to sit with their families and watch it. Many of the corporation's programs are in this category. I contend that if we subsidize the C.B.C. to the extent of millions of dollars we can subsidize the little weekly newspapers which bring personal and local news to the people of the area. These papers have to depend on very limited advertising and, as I say, they are finding it difficult to get along. As to the program I have mentioned, I certainly agree with what was said by the minister in charge of the C.B.C. and I am sure the majority of the Canadian people do also.

Finally, can the minister tell us how much revenue this additional one cent in postage will bring to the government?

Mr. Grills: Mr. Chairman, may I say a brief word on this resolution. I agree with what has been said by my hon. friend and others in connection with the closing of many small post offices. I learned from the minister himself that it was the intention of the department to close some 700 or them across Canada. Would the hon. gentleman not give some consideration to factors other than revenue which are involved when some of these small post offices are closed? Would he not consider the services rendered and what a post office means to our small communities? Closing the post office is equivalent to destroying the identity of some of these small communities.

As hon. members can appreciate, there are common bonds which unite these communities—the church, the school, the local store and the post office. Often the local store includes the post office, and the post office has a value which cannot be measured in dollars and cents alone.

I know that several of these small post offices in my own county are to be closed. The people who use them are unhappy about the way in which the department has gone about this. There has been no opportunity for protest, just an announcement that the office will be closed. I hope the minister will not be too hasty about proceeding in this direction and that he will consider the feelings of the people who use these services. I agree we are facing economic problems but the social benefit which arises from the presence of these post offices is surely something which must be balanced against purely economic considerations. It should be remembered also that it will be necessary to pay someone to deliver the mail. In any case, the loss of post offices will affect our communities adversely to a large extent.

Turning now to another matter, when I first came to this house complaints arising from post office service could be directed to a district supervisor who lived somewhere in the area concerned. This officer would investigate individual cases and if he found evidence of fault on the part of the post office the situation would be corrected. This system worked very satisfactorily.

I do not know when the change occurred, and I am not blaming the minister for it, but I now find that the administration has been centralized and that complaints must be made to Ottawa. The service of investigation is slower, and it seems to me that the extra mileage cost must be considerable. As to the over-all service, I have received more complaints in the last 12 months than I ever received previously. Various factors may have contributed to this situation. Whether it is the attitude of the postal workers or not, I am not prepared to say. But I do believe that the removal of the district supervisors, as we knew them, has been detrimental to the service as a whole.

I hope the minister will give careful consideration to the points I have raised, particularly with respect to my plea concerning the small post offices. Some of them, I know, could be closed without any complaints arising; the people would accept the decision. But in other cases they will accept it only with the greatest unwillingness after closure has been forced upon them.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Chairman, I intend to support this resolution. Indeed, I would have been pleased had the minister gone further than his proposal to raise postage rates by one cent and give effect to some amendments to the rate structure in connection with newspapers and periodicals.

From time to time I have heard the minister make remarks to the effect that it is about time we put the post office on a businesslike basis. This prospect, of course, shocks the daylight out of a great number of people who regard the post office as an institution which is independent of normal accounting. Any change intended to make it a businesslike organization fills them with consternation.

When we are talking about the post office organization as part of a government department we must remember there was a time when the delivery of mail was very difficult and costly. That was during the days of the steamships, the pony express, and so on. Today we have so many other methods of communication that I am sure all of us must wonder whether the business of carrying messages and information is so essential that it cannot be self-sustaining like any other business, and whether it must continue to receive a government subsidy.

Let us get down to basics. In part we are talking about pesonal letters, and objection has been raised to a one cent increase in the postage rate on them. Today, with Canadians being the greatest users of telephones in the world, I doubt that any citizen sends more than one personal letter a week. In that case the increase in the rate would mean approximately 50 cents a year. If a person sends two personal letters a week the increase would be approximately $1 per year. Of course there is the Christmas card business, and I am at a loss to know whether the great increase in mail around Christmas time is so essential to our way of life. I am sure that individuals would have no objection to paying a proper proportionate increase on their personal correspondence if the Post Office Department were organized as a crown corporation and were self-sustaining. But then we must consider business firms which might say: Well, this would be very costly to us.

Some time ago I calculated the cost of sending a letter in an ordinary law office, and I am sure the same cost would apply in most other business offices. The total cost was $2.22 taking into account the typewriter, dictating time and staff wages. That cost has now risen to $2.76 per letter. I am of the opinion that business would be much improved if it cut out about 75 per cent of its correspondence by mail and conducted its business in a more efficient manner. American corporations have gained a lot of ground in office management, and in most offices in the United States letter writing and memo writing are frowned upon. There are other methods of conducting business apart from the sending of letters.

Turning now to the question of direct mailing I point out that when it was introduced it was a good system of promotional selling, but that was 30 years ago. It was cheap and one did not expect more than a 2 per cent or 3 per cent return. In effect the government subsidizes such advertising through its postal rates. But if we are concerned about production, as I am sure the Minister of Finance will remind us on Thursday night that we should be, then business should adopt the most efficient and forward-looking methods of selling.

I am not too concerned about direct mail advertising. Some of the people engaged in that industry will be concerned, but their talents can be used in other directions. Time and time again it has been proven that direct mail is not the best way to sell, but as long as it continues to be the cheapest way it will be used.

I would disagree with the minister a little on the question of periodicals and newspapers. If we are to sustain and promote Canadian magazines and periodicals it will be a difficult task considering the large area of Canada which our magazines have to cover and our relatively small population compared with that of the United States. I think the low postal rates for newspapers and magazines should be considered as a worth-while contribution to the promotion of Canadian magazines, but I would stress not of all magazines. We must have competition. Magazines are not good merely because they are Canadian. They must be good magazines in themselves, competitive with American magazines. When they are, then they should be supported. A magazine published in the city of New York can have a very profitable circulation in the state of New York, even in the city of New York alone. By contrast Canadian magazines have to be sent all across Canada, and therefore I favour consideration being given to our magazines and periodicals.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I seriously think it is about time we got down to putting the post office on a business basis, and not necessarily by arbitrarily setting postage rates. I support the minister in his thinking that it should be a crown corporation properly run in a businesslike way. There is a relative, comparative cost for all articles which are mailed, whether they be magazines, newspapers, personal letters or business letters. This cost can be measured accurately. One can calculate the weight of magazines, how many of them can be delivered compared with letters, and having arrived at the total I believe these articles should be charged accordingly. The same applies to direct mail and to business correspondence. If businessmen want mail delivered six times a day, six days of the week, there is no reason why they should not pay for that privilege.

It is about time that the House of Commons considered transforming the letter organization of the Post Office Department into a self-sustaining, efficiently run business organization. Not for one moment do I imagine that this can be done overnight, and I do not think it should be done overnight. However, improvements should be made and thought should be directed toward establishing an efficient crown corporation that will have complete charge of all post office matters.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest that the government seems to be following rather strange methods to signal the approach of Christmas. We have had an announcement that on Thursday night the Minister of Finance is going to introduce another budget to impose increases in taxes. This does not seem to be a very nice Christmas present. Now we have the Postmaster General introducing legislation which calls for an increase in postal rates. I hope we do not get any more such Christmas presents at least for some time.

I should like to refer to the minister's statement on June 2, 1967 as recorded on page 1083 of Hansard. He said:

> The Canadian post office is something more than a mere processing plant. It is not only a matter of receipts and expenditures. It also concerns the people. It is a matter of buildings and working conditions. It is also a matter of a service rendered to the entire population and to the country.

On the basis of that statement I should like to raise a question concerning the advisability of the suggestion just made by the hon. member who preceded me in this discussion. We ask whether it is absolutely necessary that a service such as this be self-sustaining in every respect. Reference has been made today to the subsidizing of other media of communication. If we are to subsidize from the federal treasury such institutions as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and others which carry on an advertising operation, then perhaps there is some justification for continuing some kind of subsidy in the Post Office Department, at least with reference to some of its operations.

The resolution before us deals particularly with an increase in the rate on first class mail. I think one member raised the question today whether or not it is absolutely necessary to raise the rate on first class mail in order to make this phase of the operations of the Post Office Department self-sustaining. I do not believe the minister has given any proof that this operation is going to be in a deficit position. Possibly, therefore, we should have a clarification on this matter first of all.

I suggest that a further increase in postal rates will, of course, contribute once again to the increase in the cost of living. We should look at it from that point of view. We are endeavouring to find every possible means by which to hold the line and possibly lower the cost of living. But here we have one more indication that there will be an increase because we all know that any increase in this respect will be passed on to the people involved.

The hon. member for Verdun in speaking this afternoon referred to the fact that the bulk of the burden of this increase will fall on the business community. I think he indicated that about 70 per cent or 75 per cent of the first class mail is from business enterprises. I suggest that this group is in a much better position to absorb the increase than are those who fall within the other 25 per cent.

In discussing this matter with a friend today he indicated to me that involved in it are the old age pensioners and those on other types of pensions and that many of these people employ their time in writing letters. As members of parliament we realize that they sometimes are not aware that they can send mail to us without any postage. Many of these old age pensioners carry on a fairly voluminous correspondence. If these people in this category employ the postal department as a means of transmitting their messages, then this increase will place a considerable burden on them in view of their very limited income. Therefore I believe we should consider whether it is absolutely necessary for the Post Office Department, at least in some of these areas, to be self-sustaining.

There are one or two other matters to which I should like to refer briefly this afternoon. I understand there are certain communities in Canada which are required to pay additional transportation costs in order to obtain their mail. The mail is sent to a certain community and delivered to the closest post office. Then it is up to the residents of the community involved to pay the additional transportation cost in order to get the mail from that post office to their community. Would it not be possible and desirable to have all transportation of mail handled under a contract and not handled in some cases at the expense of the small communities which may be concerned?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question? When he refers to mail going to small communities, is he referring to communities which do not have post offices?

Mr. Patterson: Apparently this is the case. The department is not prepared to establish post offices in these communities and does not make any provision at all for the transportation of mail. It would only seem proper, if there are communities where a post office is not located, that there should be a contract whereby the mail is delivered to that community.

The other matter to which I should like to refer is the department's program of closing so many of the small community post offices. I support the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac in this connection. Even though the government or the department may say this is an economy measure and that they are trying to cut down expenses, there is the question of how much this will reduce expenditures. In addition, there is also the other matter of convenience and the fact that over quite a number of years these post offices have rendered a service to their communities. Real hardship is incurred when an announcement is made, many times without any notice whatsoever, that as of a certain date a particular post office will be closed and the people concerned will receive their mail from a post office a considerable distance away. Even though in some cases provision is made for rural delivery, I think we must consider the other services rendered by the post office in the community which will be taken away from the people in the area. I suggest, therefore, that the minister should reconsider this policy as it applies to many of these communities. I think he should recognize that these post offices have rendered, continue to render and would render in the future a service which is very acceptable and beneficial to small communities across the country.

Mr. Roxburgh: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this matter. First of all I should like to assure the Postmaster General that I certainly support his resolution and would like to see the post office put on a paying basis under a crown corporation. However, I wish to support the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac and the hon. member for Hastings South in regard to small post offices located in grocery stores or elsewhere which give so much service to the people in the community. I certainly feel that the minister should not proceed too fast in this regard. I believe that they should be phased out slowly and that provision should be made so that the people in these small communities will still receive the service that is so necessary to them.

Another matter is the job of the mail carriers. As the minister knows, I have spoken to him personally on this and therefore I know his thoughts on the matter. I feel it is going to be handled properly. However, we must remember when talking about royal mail in Canada that one letter going astray can be just as important to an individual living in a rural section as it can be to the man who runs a large business in the city of Montreal or Toronto. I know of a case of one letter going astray which cost the future livelihood of a widow. I should like the minister to consider seriously this aspect of the situation.

Like all members who represent rural communities I should like the minister to give a great deal of consideration to rates in respect of weekly newspapers before making any change. I hope he does not move too fast in this direction.

Lastly, but very far from being least, the world ice hockey championship games are to be played for the first time in our history in Canada in 1970. Let me say to some of my friends, especially those in the N.D.P., that no matter what anyone says the people of this country now claim hockey to be their national game.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member—

Mr. Roxburgh: I will not have any interruptions from the hon. member for York-Humber.

Mr. Cowan: I just wanted to—

Mr. Roxburgh: No, no, absolutely no. I should like to see the Postmaster General sponsor the issue of a new stamp to commemorate this event in Canada. I hope my friend at the other end will keep quiet so the Postmaster General will listen to me rather than to him, because this is a matter which should be given serious consideration. Hon. members may smile at the suggestion of issuing stamps to honour athletic events, but many great countries in Asia and Europe have issued series of athletic stamps commemorating events and athletes. Athletic endeavours are valuable not only for the preparation of our young people in the event of war but generally to keep the population in good physical shape, and athletic endeavours should be recognized. This is one opportunity the minister has in this regard.

[Mr. Roxburgh.]

Mr. More: In speaking at this time, Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to hold up the resolution or repeat anything that has already been said or the representations made to the minister. I should like to refer to one aspect of postal rates in order that the minister will be prepared to deal with the situation and provide an explanation when we consider the bill itself. I refer to the postage rates voluntary associations must bear during fund raising campaigns.

I am sure the minister has received representations from some of the voluntary fund-raising organizations in Canada, particularly those involved in health fields, regarding the increasing cost of postage. These people are contributing to the country through their services. Over the years they have been successful in their efforts to raise the funds required to provide these services at a saving to the government of both trouble and cost. As a result of the efforts of these organizations the government's contributions in many of these fields have been negative or nil.

During recent years the increase in the amount obtained through these campaigns has not kept pace with the increased cost of providing these services. The increase in cost in recent years has been substantial, particularly in respect of postage rates. Instead of letters and receipts being sent out at a two cent rate or at the bulk rate they now have to go out at the four cent rate. This has added greatly to the overhead of these organizations. One organization with which I am familiar has found that its postal costs have increased by more than 35 per cent.

It is my belief that the Post Office Department should be run efficiently but I argue with some of those who say it must be run on a business basis in order to show a profit. The hon. member for Verdun has suggested that postal services are indispensable to the unifying of this country and keeping it together. Perhaps the subsidy required today in respect of postal services is not as great because of the improved communications available, and the use of postal services may be less in the case of some than in earlier years when it was the only means of carrying on business. In any event there are some elements of this service which must be considered seriously, particularly in respect of certain areas where rates should be maintained.

We have heard a great deal about postal rates for mail that comes in from that great country to the south. I am sure that country has had the same problem the minister is now facing in respect of increasing costs. That country still maintains a quarter cent rate in respect of the mail campaigns of voluntary organizations. When we consider the bill itself I hope the minister will be in a position to indicate the position of the Post Office Department in this regard. If he has any doubt about the type of organizations to which I am referring let me refer to the Canadian tuberculosis association and its associates, the Easter seal organization and the council for crippled children.

The stock answer given by the department to representations made by these organizations is that it is difficult to determine which of these organizations warrants this consideration. Let me remind the minister that the regulations of the Income Tax Act require registration of these associations. Surely that eliminates any difficulty. I hope the minister will give us some explanation as to the position of the department in this regard.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

COMMERCIAL SOLIDS PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house in commitee on Bill No. C-113, to incorporate Commercial Solids Pipe Line Company—Mr. Basford—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I thought for a moment that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard would tell the committee of the change which was made to the bill in the standing committee on transport and communications. That is why I hesitated in rising. Although it is a small change in terms of the number of words involved, it is a rather important one so far as the impact of the change upon the authority being sought by the company is concerned. In view of the fact that this change will not be considered by us until or unless we reach clause 6 of the bill, perhaps I should mention in passing that it relates to a restriction of the authority of the company with regard to the operation of aircraft, aerodromes, radios, communication systems, and the like. The company, therefore, does not seek a general licence to operate but rather authority to do so for the purpose of a particular undertaking. Thus we are not in the process of incorporating another nation-wide television or radio system by the change that has been made to the bill.

Yesterday during private members' hour the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra talked out a very reasonable resolution relating to old age pensions. In view of the fact that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra also moved the second reading of the bill now before us and gave us an outline of it, perhaps we will fall into the habit which he established yesterday in dealing with items which come before us in private members' hour. It seems to me that if there is anything of value with which the house should concern itself it should have been the proposal relating to old age pensions moved yesterday by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

The bill before us contains two important factors. One is the authority of the company for its project and plan to establish a pipe line through which it could move solid materials, and the other is the overriding factor of Canadian ownership and involvement in this and similar companies. This subject has interested parliament for some time. To underline our interest I think it is necessary to re-emphasize the declarations made by the Prime Minister regarding his desire to see a larger degree of Canadian ownership in the exploitation of our natural resources and in the industry which transforms these natural resources into usable and consumable commodities.

It is well known that the President of the Privy Council, along with many other members of the cabinet, holds this view. It is regrettable that the whole cabinet has not come to a decision on this matter because it puts us in a rather odd position in that on the one hand the first minister of the Crown has enunciated what we took to be government policy on Canadian ownership and on the other hand there is a persistent flood of bills before the house whose sponsors have ignored the declared policy of the Prime Minister, who naturally speaks for the government.

We recall the time that the Prime Minister was asked whether he spoke for the government on particular matters or whether someone else did. The Prime Minister then made it quite clear in the house that he and only he, makes announcements on behalf of the government of Caanda. As my friend the hon. member for Mégantic said, these policy declarations are not always sound. I think we could spend a fair amount of time in the house speaking about the damaging features of some of the policy decisions made by the government. However, I do not wish to dwell on this matter but simply to emphasize that the Prime Minister himself declared that it is he who announces government policies and no one else.

One of the policies which he announced on a nation-wide television broadcast related to Canadian ownership. He said he was in favour of it and he hoped it would be possible to have a larger degree of Canadian ownership than exists at the present time. I do not think we can have a smaller degree of Canadian ownership in the oil industry than exists at present because I understand that the whole oil industry is foreign owned by people who have no direct political or emotional responsibility to Canada.

In the bill before us we are dealing with the oil industry, and in particular Shell Canada Limited. Some interesting aspects of the bill were placed on the record at an earlier stage of the proceedings when mention was made of the degree to which this company is the sponsor of the bill and the major shareholder in the company which the bill seeks to incorporate. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra in moving second reading of the bill in the early part of June this year placed this information on the record. He pointed out that Shell Canada Limited. will be the principal shareholder of Commercial Solids Pipe Line Company. The public holds 17.5 per cent of the voting power in Shell. Its shares are traded on the stock exchanges of Canada. The remaining 82.5 per cent is held by another Canadian company called Shell Investments Limited whose head office is also located in Toronto.

In looking at this situation casually we might assume that this is a Canadian owned company because it is called Shell Investments Limited, its office is located in a major Canadian city, and 17.5 per cent of its stock is traded on the market. The fact of the matter is that Shell Investments Limited is a wholly owned subsidiary of a Netherlands company located in The Hague. The ownership of the company is divided, 60 per cent in the hands of Royal Dutch Petroleum and 40 per cent in the hands of Shell Transport and Trading Company in London, England. We often find involved foreign ownership when one company is owned by another which in turn will be owned by a foreign company or a couple of other companies. The final, effective ownership of any particular company, in my opinion, must always be traced back to the company which in fact controls and operates that particular company.

In this instance we find that Commercial Solids Pipe Line Company is in fact, in the final analysis, going to be controlled by a couple of companies, one in The Hague and the other in London, England. So far as I have been able to ascertain, there has been no indication of a desire to divest the foreign ownership structure of this enterprise.

Mr. Basford: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Howard: Gladly.

Mr. Basford: I am not sure whether the hon. member has had an opportunity to read the transcript of the proceedings of the committee on transport and communications for Thursday, November 23. This is quite understandable because it only became available this morning. When the bill was before that committee, it was made very clear that it was the intention of the company to make shares in the pipe line company available to other producers in southern Alberta and to members of the public. This intention was documented before the standing committee on transport and communications.

Mr. Howard: As the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said, I did not have a chance to read the minutes of the proceedings before the committee. My colleagues, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Timiskaming, are deeply involved in that project at the moment and undoubtedly will have an opportunity to deal with the proposition put forward in the question by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. If the hon. member is saying that this will be a Canadian owned company, then that puts an entirely different light on the situation. In that event perhaps I should curtail my remarks at this juncture. However, I rather suspect, not having heard anything to the contrary, that even though there may be an offer of shares to other producers in Alberta or to the general public, the ownership of the company will still rest in the hands of Royal Dutch and the company in England, Shell Transport and Trading Company. If I am incorrect in that assumption, perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard could, by way of another question, correct my impression. Then I could leave the matter there. Not having heard anything to the contrary I must proceed on the assumption that even though shares may be held by Canadians, effective control will still rest in the hands of someone else because, as we all know, in any corporate structure the important fact is not that you own a share or two but how many shares you hold.

I have had an opportunity of reading the first page or two of the minutes of proceedings of the committee, but I did not have an opportunity of gaining the information that was given to the committee and put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. However, some interesting information was provided by a Mr. Ritchie, who is vice president of the transport end of Shell Canada. I take it this is the same Robert Pierce Ritchie mentioned in clause 1 of the bill as one of the shareholders and promoters of this company. He pointed out that this was an important new venture in the field of transportation by pipe line. At the outset of his remarks he said, as reported on page 287 of the committee evidence:

> The pipelining of solids is not a new concept. During the last 50 years short pipe lines have successfully been put into operation in England and the United States for the carriage of coal and salt. More recently there have been built a 72-mile gilsonite in the United States and a 50-mile iron ore line in Tasmania. The application for the bill before you, however, represents a major advance in that the applicants contemplate construction in Canada of pipe lines many hundreds of miles in length transporting solids that have never before been moved by pipe line.

Apart from the fact that we may be embarking upon a new form of transportation which in total length surpasses what has been developed in other countries, the fact is that if the pipe line is to transport solids that have never before been moved by pipe line the assumption must be that the solids they contemplate moving have up until this time been moved by some other form of transportation. This brings us to the nub of the question of transportation policy. We know that when the massive omnibus transport bill went through parliament a while ago it was supposed to reflect a very deliberate, conscious, thought-out policy on transport following upon the heels of royal commission and interdepartmental studies of modes of transport.

I do not hold any particular brief for the maintenance of our railways but they have provided a tremendous service to some areas of the nation and have contributed tremendously to the tying together of different parts of Canada. It would seem to me that the other form of transportation which has been used to transport the solids they contemplate moving by this pipe line probably is the railways since railways can carry items in bulk quantities. It may be that truck transport or airlift from Calgary to Vancouver or some other form of transport is used. I do not believe that in this context this is really putting another form of transport into the picture in addition to those we already have. It may be that the development of the concept of moving bulk materials by pipe line which are now being moved by other forms of transport is on the increase. If so, it will undoubtedly detract from the possibility of these commodities being shipped by railway or by some other form of transport.

My concern is about the total contribution that this may make to the well-being of the people of Canada. We all know that the Minister of Finance is supposed to have been working very hard on this during the last little while and that the greater the injection of money into certain areas of the country the greater the contribution to inflation and, if there is a duplication of services in this case, to a potentially uneconomic situation in one or other of the forms of transport. I reiterate that I hold no particular brief for the railroads as the only means to transport commodities, but the railways may find they will have to alter their concept of transportation in order to meet this new venture which undoubtedly will confront them, whether or not this bill passes at this time.

This brings me to another extremely important aspect—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret I must interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted for his speech has expired.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, by some coincidence, just at the point where the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard asked a question of the hon. member for Skeena—I might digress to point out that at one point in the history of our province the area which now comprises the constituency of Skeena was within the area now represented by the city of Vancouver, though that was a long time ago—I was reviewing the proceedings before the committee on transport and communications where the very point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was dealt with.

I might say that as far as I can ascertain there is nothing in the evidence before the committee to indicate that there was anything in any way incorrect in the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena who was dealing, as I understood it, with the question of the basic ownership of the Shell oil interests in Canada and indicating that the control of those interests lies beyond the boundaries of Canada. He was not directly raising the question of the share ownership of this company except to the extent that he was indicating that this company was being sponsored by and presumably would be controlled by the Shell oil interests in this country, and therefore indirectly controlled by interests outside this country.

I have been giving serious attention to the evidence of Mr. Ritchie before the committee. He acted as their chief spokesman and is vice president, transportation, of Shell Canada Limited. As far as I am concerned the statement of Mr. Ritchie and his replies to various questions merely confirm for me the situation which someone suggested was probably the case when we dealt with the bill at the second reading stage. In the first instance, if we were to pass the bill we would be creating a company basically foreign owned and controlled and, second, we would be perpetuating a situation which has existed in the past in the case of many oil and gas pipe line companies incorporated by acts of this parliament whereby large foreign interests maintain effective control. So far as share ownership in Canada is concerned, this would simply be a matter of throwing out a few crumbs so that a few Canadians might feel they had an interest by virtue of holding a scattered and small percentage of the share capital of these companies.

As reported on page 289 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence for Thursday, November 23 last, Mr. Ritchie said:

> Prior to construction of the pipeline facilities ownership shares will be offered to other sulphur producers in Alberta as well as the public. Following start-up and proven success, a further public offering of shares to Canadians will be made by the owner-producers.

Prior to making those remarks Mr. Ritchie had pointed out that the estimated cost of the line is $60 million. He stated that while research is under way the Shell oil company is bearing the full financial burden of this phase. So I think it is very evident that the situation as outlined by the hon. member for Skeena is a correct analysis.

As reported on page 292 of the evidence, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce Mr. Ritchie said:

> As we envisage Commercial Solids Pipe Line Company, it would be owned by a number of shareholders, including the public. However the producers would all want a share interest in it, and once they had that, I would think they would continue to support it.

This question relates generally to a pipe line operating as a transport concern which is affected by potential competition by the railways.

As reported on page 295 of the committee's proceedings, the hon. member for Kindersley asked this question:

> I am interested too in what you said about the shares being offered to the public. Would you care to give us an opinion as to how soon, if you get the pipe line into operation, these shares would be offered, and perhaps what percentage of capitalization might then be offered to the public?

Mr. Ritchie replied:

> You are asking two questions. Relating to the first one, we would envisage that there would be some shares offered to the public at the inception. We try to spell this out in that very short statement. This is a new project. We feel that it would not necessarily be in the public interest to have a large share in the hands of the public at the inception. As soon as the project is operating and there is no question as to its success and the statement is made, we would have an offering and expect that there would be additional shares offered to the public.

Once you have the public in a facility, even though it is a very small percentage of the public, you have to operate the facility in the public interest and not in the interest of the producers. So really the total number of shareholders I do not think really makes that much difference in the way the facility would be operated.

That leads us back to a point which was raised previously in this house on a number of occasions with respect to the operation of pipe line companies. In sponsoring this pipe line company, Shell wishes to perpetuate a situation that has existed in Canada with respect to the transmission by pipe line of gas and oil. It boils down to this: The major producers such as Shell, Imperial or B.A. maintain effective control and management of pipe line companies and retain the bulk of the shares. While a small percentage of shares is made available to the Canadian public, allegations that pipe lines, such as the one proposed in this bill, operate in the public interest are highly debatable, to say the least.

Mr. Ritchie's statement did nothing to allay my fears. Rather, it confirmed my suspicion that the proposition which was being put before us would perpetuate the intolerable situation in the pipe line transportation field. Some may argue that we have gone too far with respect to transmission by pipe line to turn back now, but I am not prepared to admit that that is so. In other words, I think we are now entering a new phase of transportation by pipe line. This is an opportune time for parliament to examine again the entire question of pipe line transportation. In this field we need not perpetuate the mistakes we have made in the past. I refer particularly to those mistakes we have made since the end of world war II and to the manner in which we allowed pipe line transmission systems for gas and oil to develop.

The hon. member for Jacques-Cartier-Lasalle, who was one of the committee members, asked Mr. Ritchie about Shell's interest, generally, in pipe lines. The answer confirms what I have said. Shell seeks to perpetuate a situation that exists with respect to the transmission of oil and gas by pipe line.

On page 303 of the committee proceedings the following is found:

Mr. Rock: ... how many pipe line companies is Shell, directly or indirectly, financially involved in at present?

Mr. Ritchie: I am not sure that I can tell you.

The Chairman: Mr. Rock, are you thinking of oil pipe lines or ...

Mr. Rock: Mr. Chairman, I am leading to something that is very important.

The Chairman: I am asking: is it oil pipe lines or commodity pipe lines?

Mr. Rock: All kinds of pipe lines.

Mr. Ritchie: Well, there are no commodity pipe lines in Canada.

The Chairman: No, it is oil.

Mr. Ritchie: As far as oil pipe lines are concerned, let me see; ...

He is trying to recall, obviously. Apparently there are so many. He says:

...I cannot name them all, sir. But there are Trans Mountain, Inter-Provincial, Portland Montreal, Trans Northern, Sun Canadian, Peace River, Westpur Producers ...

Mr. Rock: So there are quite a few of them, then. This is what I want to know. How many of these run to the west coast at the moment?

The hon. member discovers that Trans Mountain pipe lines only run to the west coast and could transport sulphur, the commodity which is of immediate concern to Shell. Mr. Ritchie says that Trans Mountain pipe lines will require some modification, and he does not think they would be as economical as a separate system.

Clearly, the applicants before the house have detailed a situation which is designed to perpetuate something that has become intolerable in the field of transportation of oil and gas by pipe line in this country. I am prepared to argue that the kind of development being sought here has not been and will not be in the interest of Canada; it will not enable Canadians to enjoy fully the benefits of the natural wealth which is being drawn from the soil of their country, that country of which we like to call ourselves citizens.

Having said that, I wish to emphasize that I do not underestimate the importance of the proposal to move solids through a pipe line. Though I have no detailed knowledge of the matter, from my limited reading I have become convinced that there is an enormous potential for such a development. As we move into the field of transporting solids by pipe line, I want this country to start off on the right foot with respect to the development of new techniques.

Mr. Ritchie said to the committee that the Shell Company of Canada had been engaged in research with respect to the techniques of transportation of sulphur in slurry form. He referred to work that was done by the Alberta Research Council with respect to techniques of transporting solids in capsule form through pipe lines. As reported on page 280, Mr. Ritchie says:

> We are convinced that slurry and capsule pipelining will each take its appropriate place in this country's future transportation system. The distinct difference between the two concepts will undoubtedly dictate the circumstances in which each may be appropriately employed.

• (6:40 p.m.)

This statement confirms what one has read elsewhere about the breakthrough which may come about in this field of transportation.

I was interested to note that the usual points were made in letters from the Minister of Transport and from the parliamentary agent about the jurisdiction of the National Transportation Commission and the National Energy Board. We are told that what we are considering now is nothing more than an application to parliament to incorporate a company; the bill does not confer upon the company any right to construct a pipe line. This has been advanced in the past as being good and sufficient reason for passing the bill and incorporating the company, leaving the transportation commission and the energy board to deal with the details. It is pointed out to us at some length that the energy board must give consideration to a number of factors when deciding whether or not—

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to his speech has expired.

Mr. Peters: This is a bill in which I have had a great interest for some time. I would have thought the government itself would have paid some attention to it. Indeed, I was surprised to learn, when I received the report, that none of the government departments which would normally be concerned with the subject of this measure was represented before the committee. I was surprised that the Department of Transport did not suggest that the Canadian National Railways should intervene in this application. I would have thought that several other government agencies would have been interested in attending, not necessarily to oppose the bill but to bring out the relationship which this company could have with other agencies in the transportation field.

I was interested in the way in which the chairman introduced the statement of the Minister of Transport. Rather than ask that the minister be present, he read a letter from the minister. I was surprised at the statement made by the minister to the effect that while this proposed pipe line would come under the new transportation legislation, part II of that legislation had not yet been proclaimed. And he gave no indication of when part II relating to pipe lines would be put into effect.

I had been of the opinion that the whole of the legislation would have been proclaimed by the governor in council at the same time. I understand now that it is likely that this matter will be dealt with within a few months. In the meantime I presume the present application is having some effect on the date of proclamation. The operation referred to in the bill before us should, I believe, be classed as a commodity pipe line, thereby bringing it into the transportation field.

I noticed on reading the annual report of the National Energy Board that it is very pleased with the growth of Canadian oil production. Since the late 'fifties the production level has about doubled. The statement goes on to say that Canada's petroleum resources have been extended even more rapidly, a development which poses an urgent need for further expansion of markets for Canadian oil. As we are well aware, Shell Oil is interested in this type of pipe line operation because of the problem created by the large residue of sulphur left after oil refining. Sulphur is a commodity which is rather difficult to transport. As the committee report indicates, the transportation cost to the railway is $10 plus an additional $2 in handling charges. The company is of the opinion that transporting the sulphur by means of a slurry operation in an oil carrier would reduce the cost of transportation considerably below that level.

There is an indication that 5,000 cars of sulphur need to be transported. Since I am not in a position to know the total transportation costs involved, I am not able to determine whether or not they constitute an important factor in the operation of the railway as far as revenue is concerned. But in establishing the transportation commission the government obviously took the view that all the transportation facilities in Canada should be united under the control of one commissioner, so as to improve transportation for the Canadian people and reduce costs to producers and consumers.

The bill before us might have been modified in a number of instances. I should not comment unfairly on some of the remarks which were made in the committee, though I think the chairman did a very good job of running interference against some of his colleagues who were concerned about this matter, as well as about some other questions which were in my mind when this bill first came before parliament. I do not blame the Shell Oil Company or Mr. Ritchie or the other lawyers who were involved, because the bill was written before the transportation legislation setting up the transportation commission was put into force. But I believe everyone will agree that since the operations envisaged here do not come under the National Energy Board there are clauses which require modification. Clause 6 is very like so many other clauses which are written into bills by lawyers who take the view that it is worth including another hundred words, just in case a certain situation, unlikely as it might be, should somehow arise. The explanations given by Mr. Ritchie, on the other hand, indicate that the proposition the company has in mind is an extremely straightforward one mainly concerned with the transmission of sulphur in a carrier.

Mr. Ritchie also said that there would be difficulties in adding the sulphur in large enough quantities to be carried by oil, and that there would be difficulties in providing refinery facilities to remove from the oil slurry the full amount of sulphur that had been placed in it. However, these are not insurmountable difficulties. Varying from well to well there are degrees of concentration of sulphur, but certainly the degree of sulphur in the slurry carried by this pipe line will be quite large.

He also indicated that the company was not interested in establishing telephone lines, television facilities or in having a communications system. They were not interested in applying to the Board of Broadcast Governors for maintenance of their communication facility because they did not intend to go beyond the provisions of the Radio Act to cover their communications system.

Under clause 6 the company asks for the right to construct, purchase, lease or otherwise acquire, hold, develop, operate, maintain, control, lease, mortgage, hypothecate, create liens or other security, sell, convey, and dispose of pipe lines. But then it goes on to refer to the gathering, processing, refining, treating, transmitting, transporting, storing and delivering of solids, liquids and gases. I think the sponsor of the bill would agree that, in a number of bills preceding this one such a clause has got out of hand. In previous bills the requests of companies were fairly straightforward and simple, but now lawyers are presenting this type of model legislation to their clients, and I believe its provisions should be reduced to the actual requirements needed.

It seems to me that companies which are applying under the National Energy Board will have totally different requirements because of their need to explore, to build new communities, to go into certain areas to prospect and search for gas, oil, and other minerals, and these requirements are certainly not necessary under the Transport Act as it applies to a commodity pipe line.

This commodity pipe line will be a transportation facility. The commodities transported may be in a solid form in capsules, or they may be in a slurry form. Either way, it is transportation from one point to another, and as developments take place there may be drop-off points along the way. If we, as members of parliament, are to be asked to endorse this type of clause, detailing all these powers which are not needed, it would be wise to hold this bill up until the company has the opportunity to take the bill out of the pipe line part of our legislation and put it into the transportation section, as covered by part II of the Transport Act.

Several members of the committee asked questions about this matter. Mr. Ritchie's replies were fair and clear. He said they were not asking for this type of clause, and were simply making a straightforward proposition. A question which arises in my mind, and which I am sure arose in the minds of some of the committee members, concerns the reason behind the proclamation of that part of the Transport Act which applies to commodity transportation by pipe lines. It has not yet been proclaimed.

Had he been present at the committee meeting I am sure the Minister of Transport would have been asked the reason. He escaped having to give an answer by pleading that he had an important cabinet meeting to attend. I am sure all cabinet meetings are important these days, and if I were in charge I would have cabinet meetings every day because of the present pace of developments. If the minister's excuse was true, and I do not argue that it was not, then he should have sent his deputy minister, who is probably more familiar with the department than he himself, to attend the committee meeting. Certainly the deputy minister of that department is a very capable person well versed in all its operations, and he probably would have been able to say why that section of that act was not proclaimed.

My interest in this bill was met to some extent by the passing of the Transport Act, under which commodity pipe lines are considered to be a means of transportation to be regulated by an agency other than the National Energy Board. But the fact that that part of the act has not been proclaimed makes me wonder whether the government is playing namby-pamby with this company, or is playing around with members of parliament.

Mr. Basford: If I may reply to the hon. member about the proclamation of part II of the act, I wish to point out that in a letter to the committee the minister made it clear that it would be proclaimed soon. I have since discussed this with the minister, and I am authorized to say that part II will be proclaimed as soon as there is a need for it, as soon as someone starts arrangements to build a pipe line, in order to make sure that the pipe line is regulated by part II.

Mr. Peters: I am quite pleased to know that this is the case, but I still do not know why it was not proclaimed along with the rest of the act. This bill has been on the order paper for two years, and it is the reason that that section was written into the Transport Act. This was the first time anybody thought of building a commodity pipe line in Canada, and so there was need for legislation to cover it. Obviously the reason for that part being placed in the Transport Act was the application made by Shell for this pipe line. The point I am trying to make is that this application was made under the old legislation, and we do not want this type of window dressing in the new bills which will follow the Transport Act.

I am quite prepared to say that the transportation bills passed in years gone by cover everything that is in this bill. I am sure the railways have the right to do everything that is suggested here, but I think many hon. members agree that a lot of this should be cleaned up. We are interested in eliminating window dressing. Companies themselves do not want it, but it seems lawyers insist on putting this in bills.

I am pleased that Shell has been interested in this application. I know that success in the moving of sulphur is going to mean success in the moving of iron, and possibly of wheat and a number of other commodities.

Mr. Knowles: You mean when we defeat the government we get him?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member will have to be satisfied with what he gets.

Mr. Starr: Don't take up too much time; we want to get some business done.

Mr. Byrne: The bill is self-explanatory, and if hon. members are prepared to leave it at that, we would be glad to do so.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES COMPENSATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING EXTENSION OF COVERAGE

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act to provide coverage under the act to employees and prospective employees on training courses and to extend the coverage provided under the act to certain employees located outside Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Mr. Starr: Carried.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Starr: By golly, we can't carry anything.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I think most hon. members know the purpose of this measure. Its purpose is to make sure that federal government employees in all parts of Canada and elsewhere are covered by this legislation, the Government Employees Compensation Act.

This act really is the counterpart of the workmen's compensation acts of the different provinces. In the Northwest Territories and the Yukon government employees are covered by arrangements with the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia under their workmen's compensation acts. Certain situations have arisen as a result of comprehensive new programs introduced by the present government. Among others I might mention retraining programs under way in technical schools.

The purpose of this bill is to extend coverage so as to cover not only federal employees, but federal employees who cease work to take training or retraining courses. The second part of the bill relates to employees in our foreign services, employees of the Department of External Affairs, of the Department of Trade and Commerce and latterly the Department of Labour. The Department of Labour now has a number of employees posted to several key places outside Canada.

It should be pointed out that when these federal government employees go to countries in Asia and Africa they are subject to certain tropical diseases, unless they have built up an immunity. I can speak from experience, having incurred an occupational hazard during the first year that I lived in Brazil. I will not say that this has had a serious effect on security for the foreign service but it has had some effect, and it is also unfair that our civil servants who happen to be serving in the areas I have mentioned, particularly in some of the developing nations in Africa and Asia, should not be covered by the Government Employees Compensation Act.

These are the two objectives of the bill, and that is all I have to say at the resolution stage.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I certainly agree with the principle of this measure, which extends the coverage to the persons suggested in the resolution; but I have one question to ask of the minister. Is it the intention of the government to charge income tax to those who receive compensation in the public service of Canada?

Mr. Nicholson: I am sorry that the Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board is not here. I cannot answer the hon. member's question. I can deal with what we do in the field of compensation, but I will not attempt to answer that particular question. I shall refer it to the President of the Treasury Board.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Nicholson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-184, to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time? At the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, earlier today I spoke to the government house leader and asked him whether item No. 29 on the order paper regarding the C.N.R. financing bill could be held over for a short time. He agreed with me. I would ask then that in lieu of that item we deal with item No. 39, the Judges Act.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to call item No. 29. The Minister of Finance will be coming to the house shortly. There has been an unexpectedly speedy passage of the previous items, but he is now coming from his office.

Mr. Starr: I asked the government house leader whether item No. 29 could be held over, and that we go on to item No. 39 instead. I spoke to him about this earlier today and he said he would hold it over.

Mr. MacEachen: I suggest we call item No. 40, and come back to the other items if it is passed speedily.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is it agreed that item No. 40 be called?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCE

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF REGULATIONS RESPECTING INTEREST DISCLOSURE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) moved:

That the regulations made pursuant to section 92 of the Bank Act and section 80 of the Quebec Savings Bank Act, tabled on October 12th, 1967, be referred to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

Mr. Herbert E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Starr: This is a filibuster. We are agreed to pass the resolution.

Mr. Gray: —the house might be interested in having a word of explanation on the resolution.

Mr. Starr: We will get it in committee. This is an obstruction.

Mr. Gray: It may be recalled that at the request of various members of the house, in particular the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), the Minister of Finance undertook to introduce a motion which would permit reference to the finance committee of the house of the regulations made pursuant to the new Bank Act, setting forth the method by which the required banks have to disclose the rates of interest on various forms of loans. This was requested by various members of the house including, as I said, the hon. member for Edmonton West and other members from various parties including members on this side. I believe it was felt desirable that those who were concerned with these regulations should be able to express views on the way they were operating, whether they were carrying out the intent of parliament as reflected in the clause under which they were issued, whether changes should be made, and whether it would be advisable to make modifications in them of one sort or another.

It is for this reason the request was made that the Minister of Finance permit these regulations to be referred to the finance committee. This is the purpose of the resolution and I hope it will meet the support of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, can we now proceed to item No. 39, in view of the fact that the Minister of Justice has arrived?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I hope we will pass it quickly and thus be able to deal with the C.N.R. financing bill this evening, and also perhaps the bill on capital punishment, now that members of the opposition are in the right mood.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the house now proceed to item No. 39?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (8:30 p.m.)

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENTS INCREASING NUMBERS OF SUPREME AND COUNTY COURT JUDGES

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Judges Act to provide salaries for two additional judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario; one additional judge of the Superior Court of Quebec; two additional judges of the Supreme Court of British Columbia; one additional judge of the Supreme Court of Alberta, and three additional judges of the county and district courts of Ontario.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Asselin (Richmond-Wolfe) in the chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Asselin, Richmond-Wolfe): Shall I report the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

27053—304

Judges Act

Mr. Trudeau thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-185, to amend the Judges Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Are copies of the bill available?

Mr. Starr: Are there sufficient copies of the bill available to distribute to members?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes.

Mr. Starr: Will they be distributed first before we discuss the bill?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am advised by the table that copies of the bill are available from the law branch. It will take a few minutes before they are ready. Perhaps the house will wait patiently.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Perhaps in these few minutes we could proceed with other business and pass the bill later when we have had a chance to see it.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time? Later this day or at the next sitting of the house as the case may be?

Some hon. Membrs: Now, now.

An hon. Member: First let us have the bill.

Mr. Starr: No, I think we should see the bill before we pass it.

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, while the bill is being brought down I could make a brief explanation. This is the type of bill with which hon. members are familiar, since many such bills have been passed over the years.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister is assuming we are now on second reading. However, I gather the opposition would like an opportunity to look at the bill to ascertain whether or not they will agree to have second reading at this time. May I suggest to hon. members that it might be better to go on to the next item, and when the bill is here, then we could proceed with second reading. I think this would be more orderly procedure. When shall the bill be read a second time; later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Will someone on behalf of the government indicate what the next order of business will be?

Mr. Pennell: Item 29.

C.N.R. Financing and Guarantee Bill

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

The house resumed from Friday, November 24, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-151, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system for a period from the 1st day of January, 1967 to the 30th day of June, 1968 and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company—Mr. Chrétien (for the Minister of Finance)—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose on Friday, November 24, clause 3 of the bill was under consideration.

On clause 3—Capital expenditures authorized for 1967.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I would have liked to make some remarks and put a few questions to the minister about clause 3 of Bill No. C-151.

In the absence of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer)—I do not see him in his seat at present—I think it would be appropriate, especially after what happened in early November, to ask ourselves a few questions about the future of the C.N.R. It will be recalled that on November 1, practically without warning, the C.N.R. decided to lay off a great number of employees, most of whom were taken completely unawares. The reason given then was that those lay-ofls were mainly due to a decrease in railway traffic.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know exactly what the situation is in other areas of the country, but so far as northwestern Quebec is concerned, when 127 section-men are laid off in a rather small area compared to the full railway network we tend to wonder what the C.N.R. is up to; we also wonder if this crown corporation did not give this reason to lay off its employees simply to get around a clause in the contract negotiated with the union representing the section-men.

So, Mr. Chairman, when we realize what is happening—and I am speaking mostly of northwestern Quebec—it does not seem that railroad traffic is falling off when new industries are being set up.

Recently, a paper and pulp mill started operations. I am sure that when a mill such as this one, which represents outlays of over $75 million, starts producing and shipping products there is an increase in shipments by rail, and not a decrease. In the mining industry for instance, shipments between various points are as high now as they were last summer or last year.

Consequently, Mr. Chairman, people wonder. I have here letters from presidents of railroad unions, from railroaders, who are alarmed, and rightly so, at this massive lay-off which has spread confusion and chaos amongst the employees. I feel that the Canadian National should at least have notified its employees a few weeks ahead of time; it might have spared them considerable losses in time and money.

I should like at this stage to put on the official record the following letter, which I received from president of local 399 of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, Mr. Leonard Gilbert; I quote:

> Dear sir:
> Following our interview in your La Sarre office, I would ask you to find out whether the C.N.R. lay-offs which took place on November 1, on only 3 or 4 days' notice, were intended to annoy the employees, or whether, after calculating approximately the loss in time involved, the C.N.R. decided that it would save the same amount of money by not paying the salaries of the workers.
> If we had only had 2 weeks' notice, the loss in time could have been reduced to a maximum of 1 or 2 days. Had Quebec been chosen as the centre for these operations, everyone would have known where to go according to seniority, before the date scheduled for these lay-offs, whereas, since no notice was given, some workers were moved two or three times, and time was lost between each move.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the problem raised by such a lay-off without notice. As these employees are entitled to seniority, vacancies in the maintenance sections of the track were filled by other employees, while the employees laid off, not knowing exactly where to go, had to move two or three times, and had to suffer loss of time and money each time. However the Canadian National may have succeeded in saving a few dollars.

Because of that situation, I think that the president of local 399 is justified in complaining and in insisting that, in the future, if a lay-off is necessary, notice should be given long enough in advance so that the employees transfer centre has enough time to inform those who have to change job, so that they can do so without losing too much time.

I also have a letter from Mr. Louis Boudreau, president of local 328 in Senneterre, which is just as hard on the C.N.R. I will quote part of that letter, which is self-explanatory.

Mr. Minister:

This is to protest vigorously against the lay-offs which took place on November 1 on the C.N.R. line, particularly in our province and in our region.

Those lay-offs go against the election promises and the alleged government policy to create new jobs.

Not to mince words another axe will fall shortly, possibly on January 1, 1968, according to information given to our union representatives in Ottawa.

Is it a gift from Expo? Here in Senneterre, the yard has just been extended at a cost of $750,000, but we have received the following letter announcing the abolition of 127 section-men's positions: "We regret to advise you that as a result of a general decline of traffic, the following positions will be abolished as of November 1, 1967, circular, file No. 4405 G-3.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, an amount of at least $750,000 has just been invested in the extension of the yard of Senneterre, in order to meet the increased traffic in that area. Therefore, I wonder why 127 employees are summarily dismissed in that district alone.

And when you travel from Montreal or Quebec to Cochrane, especially in winter you can barely stay on your seat or remain in one place. Well if the maintenance crews are removed, how are the trains going to operate next winter and thereafter?

Moreover, I think that as far as the Canadian National is concerned, positions should be revised and it should be clearly stated where traffic has decreased. Also, to be safety-conscious, we should keep enough manpower to maintain the tracks and avoid any danger of trains going off the tracks, especially passenger trains.

Mr. Chairman, under section 3, we are asked to authorize the following:

(1) The National System is authorized,

(a) to make capital expenditures not exceeding in the aggregate $264,800,000 in the calendar year 1967...

But here is what we see in the estimated requirements:

Estimated requirements in the calendar year 1967:

Road property...

Mr. Chairman, I should like somebody to explain to us what this item means. Road property for an amount of $79,701,000.

I should like also to be told—tonight if possible—to what purpose the item "Equipment, $85,304,000", which we are asked to vote, will be used.

For example, I am thinking of the new train soon to be put into service called the Turbo train, which will soon run between Montreal and Toronto. I should like to know how much this train cost and whether it was also necessary to improve the track on which it will run between Montreal and Toronto. How much did these improvements cost?

We are told that this is a wonderful train which will run at speeds never yet attained, but it seems to me that if it is to run at over 100 miles an hour, we will need a better track than that which exists in some areas.

Well, I hope these questions will be answered tonight, that the scope of clause 3 of Bill No. C-151 will be made clear, and if the C.N.R. intends, for some reason, to lay off more people, they will at least be decent enough to let their employees know ahead of time, so that they may be prepared accordingly.

Recently, in Rouyn, I attended a meeting of the United Steelworkers Union who are interested in the future of miners working on the refining and the extraction of metals from the mines. The officials of that union are organizing a mining fund in order to prevent the closing down of some mines.

Now, because mining companies are required to advise their employees, even years ahead of time, of the closing down of a mine, I feel that in the field of transport, the Crown corporation, that is the Canadian National, should also notify its employees ahead of time of any lay-offs to enable them to find work elsewhere. And so, if they have to move, they will not be forced to do so two, three or four times, at a considerable loss of time and money. These are drawbacks which, to my mind, should be avoided.

• (8:50 p.m.)

[English]

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Issue of Securities.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, I have some comments to make on clause 3. An item appears on page 2 of the bill in the amount of—

The Chairman: Order, please. I must advise the hon. member that the committee is considering clause 4, clause 3 having been carried.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Saint John-Albert on previous occasions raised one or two matters with respect to this bill that demand some explanation on the part of the government. Those matters have to do with the desire of the opposition to separate the accounting procedures with respect to Air Canada from those with respect to the Canadian National. Failure to separate accounting procedures lies at the root of many problems that we are experiencing from year to year. As the amount of money that is involved in funding with respect to Air Canada and the C.N.R. grows, so grows the responsibility of the government for greater and more detailed disclosure of accounting procedures. I say that, because the Canadian people ought to have some idea of what is happening to their money.

I wish it to be understood that until the matter I have raised is rectified, members of parliament who represent constituencies in the Atlantic provinces will not be satisfied that all is well with the accounting procedures of the C.N.R. I say this because of the serious situation that has recently arisen in Atlantic Canada. Matters dealing with accounting procedures which have come before the house on numerous occasions have not received adequate consideration in the house. I am talking about disclosure of revenues, costs, financing and so on with respect to the C.N.R.

Private carriers are competing with the Canadian National Railways and with Air Canada. There is a great need, therefore, for the government to make full disclosure of financing methods with respect to those two entities. The government must fulfil its responsibilities. Manufacturers of secondary commodities in the maritimes are greatly concerned about proposed changes in freight rate structures, which may impair their economic well-being. They feel that the new structures are being imposed and that the accounting system under which the C.N.R. operates is not being disclosed for public scrutiny.

Air Canada, too, must disclose its financing methods. That body is in direct competition with other private carriers. It can take the voluntary step of disclosing the information I think it ought to disclose, or steps may be taken in this house to force that disclosure. The railways, also, might volunteer to disclose the information that I think it is incumbent upon them to disclose.

The necessity for such disclosure arises, I submit, because of the serious consequences that face secondary and primary producers in the Atlantic provinces. Our manufacturers are at a disadvantage in competing with other manufacturers, unless they know the accounting methods of the C.N.R. Another argument for disclosure is that the Canadian public has no concept of where its money is going; and it ought to know. The public does not know whether current Air Canada and C.N.R. financing methods are in line with practices that are accepted by government and industry.

It is wrong in principle for the C.N.R. and Air Canada to refuse to disclose their accounting procedures. Already we have seen the consequences of certain hidden procedures which the C.N.R. and other government agencies adopted. Those consequences became apparent when we discussed the Canadian Transport Commission, and the operations of the railways in central and western Canada. The Crowsnest pass agreement is an outstanding example of what I have in mind. The failure to disclose has equally serious consequences for eastern Canada, and particularly the maritime provinces. Our primary and secondary producers must know how they stand with the mammoth crown agency known as the C.N.R.

To emphasize my point that it is wrong in principle not to disclose Air Canada accounting methods, it must be remembered that Air Canada now spends about a quarter of a billion dollars in its annual operations. Most of that money is spent for capital purposes, operating expenditures and so on. I submit that members of the House of Commons and the people of Canada have the right to know how that tremendous amount of money is spent, and what accounting procedures are adopted with respect to it. I do not suggest that there is anything wrong with the expenditures or that there is anything misleading in the way they have been presented to us. Nevertheless, it is wrong not to disclose accounting methods.

Though it may be difficult to bring before the house, estimates with respect to the two entities of which I have spoken, I think the government has an obligation to show how the money is spent and to which part of each operation varying amounts of money are allocated. For example, how much money does the Canadian National, in co-operation with the Canadian Pacific, spend in the telecommunications set-up? How much public money competes with money from the private sector in the operation of that set-up?

Parliament can exercise control over its expenditure only on the basis of disclosure.

This disclosure has not been made. Speaking in a very partisan sense, and I make no apology for doing so—I have some responsibility toward those who are trying to earn their living in Atlantic Canada—I say that until such time as there is disclosure, and a degree of frankness which has so far not been evident, the passage of this bill or any other dealing with Canadian National Railways is going to be a little difficult. Unless there is full disclosure, the people of Atlantic Canada are entitled to question these matters, they are entitled to be suspicious. As one member from Atlantic Canada I am fed up to the eye teeth, thoroughly disgusted and infuriated that—

An hon. Member: Resign.

Mr. Forrestall: I have no intention of resigning. Until this matter has been corrected, we cannot know what is going on within the C.N.R. and we cannot realistically criticize them. We were given no basis for the compensatory principle adopted in the legislation which was passed last fall, other than the superficial statement that it was desirable and necessary.

The livelihood of Atlantic Canada depends upon an adequate rail service, priced not beyond the means of primary and secondary industry to pay, both in connection with the transport of goods within the maritimes, and outside the maritimes and return. If you will pardon me, Mr. Chairman, I use the terms "maritimes" and "Atlantic Canada" synonymously. Part of the difficulty has been caused by the inability of parliament to drag out of the C.N.R. disclosure of its accounting principles. This cannot continue unless parliament and Canada are prepared to write off the four Atlantic provinces.

It amazes me that hon. members from Atlantic Canada on the government side have remained so silent on this critical question during the last few years, and certainly during the last 24 or 30 months. I cannot see any of them on the other side of the house, oh yes, I see one, but I shall not name him for fear of embarrassing his colleagues. This is a crucial time in Atlantic Canada. It is crucial in terms of what the railways propose. If the government expects the producers in the maritimes, those who are the basis of our economy, to accept any motion at all in parliament in connection with the C.N.R., the railway itself will have to accept its responsibility to tell the people what is going on—to tell them why it is thought necessary to do such things as abandon class and commodity rates.

They have to explain in terms of their accounting, in terms of dollars and cents, the reasons for the decisive step they have taken in the face of all the promises made by the former minister of transport that nothing detrimental would happen. They have to explain these things, and the best way in which to do so is through full disclosure of their accounting principles. What great secrets does the C.N.R. have to hide? Or is it that they do not understand their own accounting procedures? Perhaps someone says: We need X dollars; we anticipate moving Y tons of freight; divide X by Y and you get a freight rate. The public is confused, and I say a full disclosure must be made.

It has been indicated to us that disclosure will be forthcoming in the case of Air Canada. It has not been done to date; there has been no separation of the two organizations. There has been a clear indication from the C.N.R. that the company is not willing to make the kind of disclosure which is required, so that producers and manufacturers in Atlantic Canada can determine the basis upon which those responsible for rail transportation arrive at their freight rates or their transportation costs and expenditures.

In conclusion I will repeat the second point I made. I deplore the expenditure of government funds in the absence of a full understanding on the part of parliament of the need for this money to be spent, especially when it is being spent in direct opposition to private industry. To the best of my knowledge the government has yet to do anything as efficiently as private industry. I am not suggesting that the C.N.R. is unnecessary or that we do not require it. This applies to Air Canada as well. But this "holier than thou" attitude adopted by the C.N.R. has to come to an end. As one member from Atlantic Canada I shall not permit this bill to go through until we have been given some explanation of what is going on in that region.

Mr. Deachman: I am in sympathy with the remarks just made by the hon. member for Halifax. As a member of the committee on transportation I cannot think of anything more discouraging than the business of examining the C.N.R., or indeed a number of other powerful crown corporations. The problem raised by the hon. member for Halifax is not one that we should lay entirely at the door of the C.N.R. It is one which we in parliament could solve to some extent ourselves. It is the problem of acquiring in the committee structure of parliament a little more expertise in our capability to examine crown corporations such as the C.N.R., Air Canada and others.

I recall the days when Donald Gordon used to appear before the transport committee. He would appear before that committee surrounded by a coterie of experts, each carrying a black bag filled with a profusion of statistics to prove any particular case he wanted to make. All the expertise was on the side of Donald Gordon. There was no expertise whatsoever on the side of the committee members. Planked down in front of us, he could parade an endless array of statistics that we could not understand, and so he was able to make a brilliant appearance before that committee year after year. We knew nothing of what went on within the confines of the C.N.R.—only what Mr. Gordon slipped out to us from behind the pullman curtain while the body of the C.N.R. remained concealed behind that curtain.

I suggest we could overcome this problem by employing some expertise within the committee structure, and building up some expertise on our part to confront the crown corporations, and indeed the ministers who come before committees with expert witnesses and with vast volumes of information and statistics. Within the committee structure we have the responsibility to oversee what the government is doing, and although the hon. member for Halifax and I sit on different sides of this house, we share that responsibility. Neither one of us is a member of the government. Each of us has the responsibiltiy of explaining to his constituents what the government is doing, and we have the responsibility of intelligently overseeing what the government is doing.

Can the hon. member and I oversee what the government does if in the committee system we do not have some expertise on our side, so that we can make deeper inquiry into what the government is doing? Under the present committees structure we simply serve on committees. We call ministers and heads of crown corporations before us, ask them questions without real preparation, get answers which are backed by their experts, and then retire puzzled, but not really informed, and not really any wiser.

I think I speak for members on all sides of the house when I say that I do not think we can continue as intelligent members on the back benches and perform a duty useful to our constituents unless we develop within the committees system an expertise that is capable of confronting the ministry in an efficient manner. So I make this appeal to the hon. member for Halifax tonight, as I have often made it in private conversation with individual committee members, that in the evolution of the committees system we must begin to develop to a status of something more than a mere clerk who sits there and takes the minutes of a committee. On our part we must have some form of examination which goes deeper into the work of government and the work of crown corporations than we are able to go under our present system. There is an inability on the part of the ordinary backbencher to come face to face in an expert fashion with a proliferating number of crown corporations and vast public enterprises, which we are quite incapable of examining at present.

Mr. Forrestall: I wish to ask the hon. member one question. Would he mind removing himself from the chamber, call the Minister of Transport and find out why he is not here right now? I agree that the hon. member is absolutely right in his conclusions.

Mr. Sharp: Just to keep the record straight, Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for the financing of the C.N.R. and I think it is not really appropriate that questions relating to transportation policy should be raised at this time. I have no objection to listening to them, and I must say that some of the points made by hon. members on both sides about the difficulty of obtaining the information they need may have some justification; but I think it would really be stretching the meaning of the words in this bill to expect that questions of the kind raised should be answered at this time.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I shall have some remarks about C.N.R. financing later this evening, but just on the point brought up by the minister I would like to say that when everything is going all right with the railways, what he says may have some validity. We usually give routine passage to the financial bill, after having examined the company's budget in committee; but the present situation is different. The Minister of Finance is connected with the problem because across this country, particularly in the eastern and western areas, freight rate increases are causing much concern. Therefore I suggest that what has been brought forward by the two previous speakers is very important. I do not know whether it is worth while trying to get the Minister of Transport and the officials of the company here tonight, but I do say we have to look at this matter in an entirely different manner in view of the abdication by the government of the transportation field.

Mr. Fane: Mr. Chairman, I think the Minister of Finance was a little out of order when he suggested that we should talk only about financing. Clauses 3 and 4 of this bill deal with the operating of railway lines and the building of branch lines. They provide money for road property, branch lines, telecommunications, hotels and investment in affiliated companies such as Air Canada to a total of $264,800,000. Therefore I cannot see any reason why we should not discuss all these things, and it is my hope that I may be allowed to do so.

The first thing I wish to mention briefly is the subsidy of $67 million to be given to Air Canada. I know this will provide extra aircraft and other facilities, and I wish to point out that in this day and age there should be a much better air service into Alberta's capital city of Edmonton. The present situation there is simply appalling. One can hardly get a flight to it, and once one gets there it is difficult to get a convenient flight out of it. Also the capital city of Canada is very badly served with flights to other parts of Canada. If any place should have an adequate air service, it is our capital city of Ottawa.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: Hear, hear.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Vegreville, but I am endeavouring to determine whether he is on sound ground or a little up in the air in speaking about Air Canada. Perhaps he would be more on the right track if he were to speak about the expenditures of the Canadian National Railways or about what assistance the federal government should give them.

Mr. Fane: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will agree with you about that, provided Air Canada is entirely divorced from the business of the Canadian National Railways. I think the management of the Canadian National Railways has made such an appalling mess of administration that it would be a crime to have Air Canada subjected to that type of management.

Mr. Cowan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. With regard to the remarks of the hon. member, may I point out to him that I intend to speak on Air Canada under clause 10. He will find that clause 10 has to do with Air Canada.

Mr. Fane: Both clauses 3 and 4 also refer to Air Canada. In any event, I have made my few remarks about Air Canada. I should like to say, however, that the service provided is very wonderful, but the trouble arises in trying to get it.

Mr. Walker: It is nice when you can get it.

Mr. Fane: It is wonderful, but not when you cannot get a flight from Ottawa to Edmonton.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think perhaps the hon. member for Vegreville should go along with the suggestion of the hon. member for York-Humber and go up in the air on clause 10.

Mr. Fane: Very good, Mr. Chairman; you will hear it all over again on clause 10.

This amount of $264,800,000 in respect of the Canadian National Railways angers me so much that I would be inclined to cut that figure down to $1, until they learn how to treat the people of Canada properly and until they provide the services they are supposed to provide, and for which they have been kept in business so long at such a great expense to the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. Woolliams: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fane: The Canadian National Railways has restricted its services. It is not necessary for me to tell anyone here how they have restricted services. They have closed stations and have provided freight services, carload lots, less than carload lots, express services and telecommunications by remote control. This might enable them to operate with a great deal less staff, but it certainly does not provide for efficiency and convenience for the people.

Let us not forget that it is only a few weeks since the railways brought into being a plan whereby they wished to charge $6.75 for sending a can of cream to the city and return. I realize, as was stated by the minister the other day on the late show, that that now has been delayed for, I believe, 90 days.

The less than carload lot facilities for freight are positively appalling in most cases. There is reference in the bill to branch lines and road property. I would like to use as an example the Canadian National spur line from Fort Saskatchewan to the subsidized Imperial Oil fertilizer plant at Redwater. The officials of the C.N.R. have advised us that they are building this 12½ miles of spur line through some of the finest farmland in Canada, and through farms which have been established for a longer period than any others in Alberta, in order to save expense. The railways have a line within six miles of that plant. Why could they not build that spur line over the shortest route to connect with the main line?

They talked about rolling up one part about 20 miles in length in order to save money. That is absurd. They did not need to build this line at such a cost. God only knows how much it will cost to provide this spur line. I am darned sure that if I had anything to do with it the whole amount of $264,800,000 would probably go toward paying for the damage they have done in the area. They also advised me that they were saving money in building this line, because they had to do a little fixing up of the existing lines that are there. How silly can they get. If they just built four or five miles of line up to the town of Redwater where the railway already is, they would not need to buy any land. They could go along right beside the road allowance into Redwater. In this way only a matter of perhaps six miles at the most would be involved.

They told me they were saving money by building this spur line. Well, if they can save money by building a line like that, why can they not save a little more money by building the railway line from Heinsburg in Alberta to Frenchman Butte in Saskatchewan. This railway ends in a dead end at Heinsburg, Alberta, near the salt plant there. They have to bring all their production from that area back to Edmonton on the railway, a matter of perhaps 140 miles back, while all they would have to do is complete 39.1 miles in order to finish that line to Frenchman Butte in Saskatchewan. Part of the road bed was built 35 years ago.

I cannot understand this kind of poor management. I remember one occasion when five of us went to Montreal to see the then president of the Canadian National Railways. When we presented this proposition to him he said, "What do you fellows think you are doing; are you going to tell me how to run my railway?" One of our members just about jumped across the president's long, wonderful, beautiful mahogany desk and yanked him over to our side to beat him up. He would have been able to do it too, even though the then president was a pretty big man physically.

Why is the Canadian National Railways not able to come up with some realistic program of management? I do not wish to go into too much more detail. I have already spoken about the spur line from Fort Saskatchewan to the Redwater plant. Why in the name of heaven could they not have surveyed a more suitable line, and done so by some other means than the use of an aerial photograph of the area? I cannot understand why the land could not have been surveyed properly and located along a route to avoid the destruction of so much good land. It appears to me and to the 23 farmers whose land was confiscated—perhaps expropriated is the polite word—that whoever laid out the line and approved of it crowded the idiot fringe pretty darned close.

The C.N.R. is also abandoning lines in the west without any apparent rhyme or reason. They suggest the lines are not paying. It is understandable why they are not paying if they provide no facilities. The railway certainly cannot expect this to be a paying proposition when they cut off passenger traffic.

Before you call me to order again, Mr. Chairman, I shall defer the remainder of my remarks until we reach consideration of clause 10. At that time I probably will tell the committee again about a matter in respect of Air Canada.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a point or two on clause 4, which I understand deals with the capital financing of the Canadian National Railways system. Before doing so let me say it is regrettable that the Minister of Transport is not in the house, because I think some pretty relevant questions could be asked as to the breakdown—

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Let me direct hon. members attention to the fact that the bill now before the committee comes within the purview of the Minister of Finance. When the Minister of Transport left the house this afternoon he delegated me to look after certain legislation which, I am thankful to say, has been dealt with by the house. The minister also asked, during a communication with me since, that I take into account all matters brought to the attention of the committee in respect of the Canadian National Railways. He indicated that he would be happy to discuss them at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Sharp: On the same point of order, Mr. Chairman, my attention has been drawn to a remark made by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert as reported at page 2527 of Hansard for September 26. He said:

> In the effort to be helpful we have checked over here and we find there is some agreement—

I hope that agreement continues. He then said:

> —I am certainly not speaking for everybody—that this is a routine measure and that there is little change, if any, from what has been done in other years. It has been customary to allow second reading without extended debate.

He seemed to be speaking for someone. He then said:

> I wish to say quickly, though, that there are some on this side who are experiencing problems which they might have raised on this occasion, but they are willing to wait for the debate on the budget or some other occasion before doing so.

I am wondering whether there has been a change of mind.

Mr. MacEwan: You changed our mind.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I should like to reply. I think my remarks of a moment ago covered this. At the time referred to by the minister I said that this was a routine bill. I still admit this; but since September 26 the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Finance started to fool around with rates in the transportation field. I give notice to the minister, in case he did not understand me last Tuesday—and he is certainly aware of the situation in the maritimes and out west—that we no longer consider this to be the normal bill. Any previous statements made have been forgotten, and we plan to bring out in the open the full story about the abdication of this government in so far as the transportation field is concerned. I say this with all sincerity: The record of this government is horrible in the field of transportation. If we have to follow this procedure, all I can say is that we do so according to parliamentary processes. This will be done this way as far as I am concerned. That is my answer to the minister.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, let me say that I was not objecting, but merely trying to draw attention to the statement made previously by the hon. member.

An hon. Member: And you got your answer.

Mr. McCleave: I hate to interrupt these points of order, Mr. Chairman, but perhaps I could continue to make the few points I have in mind. I was not aware that the parliamentary secretary had been given the task of representing the Minister of Transport here tonight. I have sat patiently through three points of order, but if the hon. gentleman would like to reply to those points already made by those who have taken part in the debate before I make other specific points, I will defer to him.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, I think I made quite clear what I meant, and if the hon. member was not listening that is surely no fault of mine. The minister is engaged elsewhere in very important consultations. He did not anticipate that this bill would be considered this evening but he did ask me to note carefully all matters being discussed and indicated that he would be pleased to deal with them when an opportunity presented itself.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I thought the parliamentary secretary had offered to act as spokesman in the house for the minister. He is now telling us that he is merely an errand boy for the minister.

Mr. Byrne: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Starr: There is no point of order.

Mr. Byrne: I had the privilege of sitting on the opposite side when the hon. member was on this side performing substantially the same duties.

Mr. McCleave: I recognize the fact that at one time I was a parliamentary secretary, Mr. Chairman, but I had a different concept of my duties than perhaps the hon. member has. Perhaps he can indicate whether he has been provided by his grateful minister with a list of the projects for which capital is sought under clause 3 of this bill. Is that sort of information to be made available to us tonight?

Mr. Byrne: I think it is quite obvious, since this bill is in the name of the Minister of Finance, that he will have all the relevant information.

Mr. McCleave: This is like playing ball, and I am now in the big leagues. Let me ask the Minister of Finance whether he has the information for us this evening as to the capital projects covered by the borrowing transaction set forth in this measure.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, some time this spring the operating and capital budgets of the C.N.R. for 1967 were tabled in the House of Commons. These are a matter of record in the house.

Mr. McCleave: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps now I can get around to the question I wanted to put. It is simply this: How much consultation is there between the Department of Transport and the Canadian National Railways with regard to capital projects? I make this point because I think the C.N.R. could be misled into making substantial outlays for capital projects if it did not have the ear of the Minister of Transport and if it were not privy to the thinking of that hon. gentleman. The specific case in point involves a massive investment of the C.N.R., and therefore of the public of Canada, in the ocean terminals in Halifax, terminals which, as we know, are being used less over the years because of the drop in winter traffic.

This was my reason for being interested in the planned capital improvements—which nobody seems to know about here, although they are apparently contained in some document—and this was why I put the question to the parliamentary secretary and later to the Minister of Finance. It seems to me that the C.N.R. might be misled by the policy of the Department of Transport as announced by the minister, under which operations in the gulf of St. Lawrence and in the St. Lawrence river are carried out solely for the purpose of flood control. We in Halifax know differently. We know that the operations there are cutting seriously into the winter business in the ports of Halifax and Saint John. Therefore I think I raised a legitimate question on whether the capital expenditures being permitted by the government will be realised in the use of these facilities, or whether they will be allowed to gather rust. The ice breaking operations in the St. Lawrence gulf have increased substantially from 1962 until the present time. I wish to give some figures briefly because I do not want to belabour that point, except as it relates to the C.N.R. spending.

Some $3.5 million was spent in 1962 of which $1.9 million was spent on ice breaking operations in the St. Lawrence river and the gulf of St. Lawrence. By 1966, of a total budget of $4.3 million for all of Canada, $2.83 million went into the operation in the St. Lawrence river and the St. Lawrence gulf, which is a rise from 54 per cent to 66⅔ per cent in the total budget for ice breaking.

Mr. Starr: May I beg the indulgence of the hon. member for Halifax and interrupt him to bring to the attention of the government the fact that it appears we will not be able to complete consideration of this bill tonight. However, for the sake of expediting the business of the house, I suggest that we terminate the debate on this bill, and proceed to items No. 39 and 43 which we are prepared to pass before ten o'clock. We are now on second reading of item No. 39 and we are prepared to pass this item as well as item No. 43, the second reading of Bill S-18.

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Chairman, before the house leader gets any wrong ideas about what can be accomplished, I should like to say that we are not agreeable to passing item No. 39, although we might agree to the passage of item No. 43.

Mr. Starr: In that case may I suggest that we consider item No. 43 first, and then go on to item No. 39?

Mr. Nicholson: I wonder whether the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond realizes the seriousness of the situation and the need for additional judges in the Supreme Court of British Columbia. It is impossible to have cases heard in that province today with less than a year's delay, because of the shortage of judges. Now we have an opportunity to correct that situation.

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Chairman, I realize the seriousness of the situation, but I do not think one day will make any difference. We could have dealt with the matter in September and October, if it were that urgent.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

PUBLICATION OF STATUTES ACT

AUTHORIZATION TO PRESCRIBE FORM AND MANNER OF PRINTING

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-18, to amend the Publication of Statutes Act.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, with regard to this particular matter I think we should have a brief explanation of what is involved in the bill. I notice that certain clauses are very ambiguous, and the regulations seem to be quite broad. Would the minister explain to us what is actually involved in this bill?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this bill intends to give to the governor in council authority to publish the statutes in a certain form. Under the present Publication of Statutes Act, statutes have to be published in separate volumes in French and in English. The intention of this bill is to allow the government to provide that the statutes be printed in some other form. The bill is introduced now because the Revised Statutes of Canada, which are to be published some time in the coming year, will be printed in the form recommended by the commission for the revision of statutes. The recommendation of that commission, which I believe will be accepted by the government, is to publish the statutes in French and in English in the same volume, the intention being to have on the same page a column in French and a column in English. In view of the fact that this will be done with regard to the revised statutes, the government feels it would be desirable to publish the annual statutes in the same form.

I may be out of order, Mr. Speaker, by going further than that, but if the house allows me I could say a few words in anticipation of the report of the revised statutes commission. The intention of publishing the two texts in the same volume, as I indicated, is in order to ensure that the laws of Canada are published in their entirety within the same set. As hon. members know, the British North America Act has stated that the laws of Canada shall be published in both languages. It has been the interpretation of the courts that both languages have equal authority, and that in the case of some doubt arising in the interpretation of a statute, the language will prevail which appears to the court to be closest to the intention of parliament. This being the case, for strictly legal and constitutional reasons alone, to say nothing of the political and symbolic reasons, with which I could gladly deal, it has been decided by the government that it would be prudent to make sure every edition of the statutes is printed in both languages in such a way that any lawyer, judge or person who uses the statutes would have at his hand the complete statutes, and not half of them in one language or in the other.

In that very real sense, Mr. Speaker, a lawyer pleading before any court of Canada, upon the statutes of Canada, is entitled to use both languages. I am not saying any court in any province allows pleadings in both languages because the constitution does not say that. The constitution does say, and the courts have so interpreted, that any lawyer in any province can use a statute in whichever language appears right to him. The court will use whatever language appears to correspond most closely to the will of parliament. This is the main reason the government intends to publish the statutes in this form.

There are of course other reasons, less legal, which have to do with the special intent of this government to ensure that the French language is given equality in the laws, in the sense the constitution decides it shall be given equality. Once again, Mr. Speaker, mainly speaking, this is for the publication of the revised statutes and is not an act for the publication in any special form. It gives the government the latitude, if it so desires, to pass orders in council or regulations which will permit the statutes to be published in this form if the government so desires. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that is a succinct explanation of the purpose of this bill.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, most of what the minister has said is irrelevant to the subject matter here. No one is questioning the status of the two languages. The minister has, with a great wealth of words, tried to conceal exactly what is intended here. What is intended, as I understand it, is to put in one volume both the French and English versions of the statutes. I do not know why the minister did not say that, and leave it at that. I ask the minister, then, what real purpose is served by so doing, other than enlarging the volumes?

Publication of Statutes Act

Every court, every person in Canada, can have access to the statutes in either English or in French. Many people keep both versions; but one does not have to have them on adjoining pages. In any case, the languages do not correspond exactly line for line when translated. You will have to run over the page for the translation from one language to the other. All that it is desired to do is to put in one volume both versions of the statutes. I do not believe this is necessary at all.

What size of book are we going to have? Right now, the revised statutes average about 1,000 pages per volume. Are they to be enlarged to 2,000 pages or will we have a much longer reach of volumes? The same can be said of the annual statutes. The statutes for 1966-67 are contained in a very large volume. I believe 85 bills were passed in that long session, which ran for a year and a half because of the bad management of the government. If that volume were printed in both languages, would it be contained in two volumes, three or four? What will be accomplished here will be just the inconveniencing of people who have to make use of the statutes. I make a great deal of use of them during the course of a session. There is not a year goes by but that I do not look through the statutes for some purpose or other with regard to bills coming before us. It is inconvenient enough now to search through the revised statutes, plus the amendments, when the volumes are of a fair size. I do not see why I should be saddled with double sized volumes in the future.

I am surprised that the minister did not really deal with the issue. It has nothing to do with whether or not the languages are recognized in this country. It is simply a dodge to put both languages in one volume, and there is no other purpose served by this measure.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister how many copies of the Statutes of Canada are now printed in English and how many copies are printed in French? With these figures we could calculate what the extra expense is going to be in printing this number of copies in both French and English. As the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) has said, an increased amount of space will be required to file these books in libraries, judges' offices and lawyers' offices.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Trudeau: I rise to a point of order, in order to answer the hon. member. I have the floor, so I intend to answer him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): The minister understands that he will close the debate if he speaks now.

An hon. Member: Order; ten o'clock.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock has been called.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): It is ten o'clock.

Mr. Trudeau: I want to make it clear that I have the floor.

An hon. Member: Oh, no you don't.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: I wonder if I could ask the government house leader what the house will be engaged in tomorrow and Thursday, and whether he can tell us at what time the Minister of Finance will make his budget speech on Thursday, as well as what we might be doing on Friday?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we will begin tomorrow with the committee of the whole stage of Bill No. C-168, an act to amend the Criminal Code. We will take second reading of the Judges Act; second reading of the Government Employees Compensation Act; and second reading of an act to establish a corporation for the administration of national museums for Canada. It is intended, Mr. Speaker, that on Thursday the Minister of Finance will give his message at eight o'clock.

Mr. Starr: What about Friday?

Mr. MacEachen: I am not in a position to advise my hon. friend about the business for Friday. Depending on the progress we make tomorrow, I hope to be able to give it then. If my hon. friends make such rapid progress in the next day or so they might look forward to an early Christmas adjournment.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

AIRPORTS—MONTREAL—USE OF FRENCH IN DUTY FREE SHOP

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to elaborate tonight on the question I put to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) on October 12, 1967, as follows:

> Has the minister been advised that, at the Dorval airport, some concessionaires, such as the duty free shop, prevent and discourage the use of the French language by the customers who shop there. Will he take immediate steps to ensure that no discrimination is exercised with regard to the two official languages of Canada?

I want to protest strongly against the refusal to speak French on the part of certain persons and concessionaires at the Dorval federal airport.

Our days of humiliation are over. The time of persecution and discrimination is past.

We, French Canadians, have had enough of being insulted by representatives or concessionaires of the Ottawa government or crown corporations. And when, in addition, these insults take place on Quebec territory, our exasperation knows no bounds.

Often in this house or elsewhere, the question is asked as to what Quebec and French Canada want or complain about. Here is another example among thousands to illustrate our frustrations and our determination to demand substantial reforms.

I have already had the opportunity in this house to denounce such iniquities by certain employees of the Canadian Pacific in Montreal suburbs and by certain officers of the R.C.M.P. here in Ottawa.

If the two official languages of Canada are to be developed and given equal treatment, if national understanding is to grow and flourish the Ottawa government must first set an example, adopt legislation and make rules to prevent such discrimination and to promote the harmonious respect of the two cultures.

The federal government should advise all its employees and those of crown corporations or agencies within its immediate or indirect jurisdiction, that it intends to lay off or withdraw every privilege from Canadians who are so narrow minded as to behave like the individuals from the above-mentioned concerns.

Ottawa should also officially protest, after inquiries have been made, in respect to any instance that is brought to its knowledge where its recommendations in this area have not been needed.

Finally, any contract or lease entered into by Ottawa or any of its corporations or agencies should provide for the respect of both official languages in advertising and as working languages.

I hope the hon. minister will take these suggestions in serious consideration and that he will protest vigorously in the case which I have just brought to his attention.

Talking about bilingualism, I should also like to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) to the unacceptable fact that the new manpower centre at Sherbrooke has employment application forms in English only, when 85 per cent of the people of my riding are French speaking. Therefore, I ask that measures be taken immediately to provide employment application forms in the two official languages.

[English]

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think all members of the house are in sympathy with the objectives of the hon. member as I understood them through the translation system. However, I want to assure him that this particular matter has been brought to the attention of the concessionaire. At the moment there are no regulations that permit the government to insist that a particular language be used. The minister is completely sympathetic, and if the hon. member deems it necessary will again bring the matter to the attention of those who are responsible.

Speaking personally, may I relate something that happened to me quite recently. I sent a message to the cafeteria, and in that message I ordered a toasted lettuce and tomato sandwich. I received a cooked meat or a smoked meat sandwich. When the messenger returned I was told that no one in the cafeteria could read what I had written. That, I presumed, was because my writing was not legible.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—
POSSIBLE PURCHASE OF U.S. WEAPONS FOR RIOT CONTROL

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): The matter which causes my intervention in the late show is two programs on the production entitled "The Public Eye", each of which was carried by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and each of which was hosted by Warner Troyer. The programs were shown last week and the week before and dealt with special devices—vehicles, chemicals and machines—which are used in riot control and which, in my question to the Solicitor General, I described as satanic. The matter was of sufficient interest that I felt I ought to rise in the house and speak about it.

Among the vehicles which are being developed in the United States for riot control are special armoured cars, small but high powered pistols, gas which leaves one helpless for 15 minutes, and a chemical which, when sprayed on one, leaves him completely helpless. He cannot walk or roll away, or do anything. I suppose that eventually the chemical wears off. Also shown on the program were methods of handling tear gas, and finally—and I must be careful with my language here—noise producing machines which cause those near to them to lose complete control of their lower intestines. I suppose this machine is not used often because it affects its operator as much as others who get in the path of its unusual sonic boom. All these devices were shown on the television program.

Also shown was a mounted police sergeant who had attended a school in order to learn riot control techniques. The sergeant was asked if Canada was interested in acquiring the devices which I have mentioned; to the best of my recollection he said, "no"' Earlier in the program a United States businessman from one of the companies which manufactures these infernal mechanisms said that some of these things I have detailed have been bought for Canada. To be fair, he tried to be close mouthed and left the question up in the air.

The Solicitor General has been good enough to attend in the house. I wish to ask him whether the R.C.M.P. are to acquire any of the various things I have mentioned during my brief intervention.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the hon. member that, apart from a few cans of a new spray type gas which were purchased for experimental purposes only, and which were found unsatisfactory, the R.C.M.P has not purchased any of the new weapons, chemicals or vehicles which apparently are being developed in the United States for crowd and riot control. The R.C.M.P. has no plans to purchase any of these devices in the forseeable future.

[Mr. Byrne.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE—LASALLE, QUE.—
LAY-OFFS AT NAVAL DEPOT

Mr. Raymond Rock (Jacques-Cartier-Lasalle): Mr. Speaker, yesterday morning I put the following question to the Minister of National Defence.

Is the Department of National Defence laying off employees at the naval depot situated in the city of Lasalle, giving only two days notice to its employees? If so, is this the department's normal procedure with respect to such notice?

Later I addressed the following question to the Minister of Labour:

Since railway employees receive two weeks notice before lay-offs, does he not feel that defence employees should receive equal treatment?

Mr. Speaker, it has been brought to the attention of the house recently that the railways have realized the immorality of laying off employees without sufficient notice. This was the result of questions asked in this house and promises made by the Minister of Transport to draw to the attention of the railways that they had a moral obligation to their employees to give them as much notice as possible in the event of lay-offs.

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I was disappointed and surprised that the Minister of National Defence should have permitted layoffs at the Lasalle naval depot with less than 48 hours notice. Mr. Justice Freedman in an historical document emphasized the need for more co-operation in matters of this type. It is little wonder that employee-employer relations are at times very difficult. The morale of the people of my riding who work at this naval depot is low because of continued and persistent rumours of the closing of this depot and its transfer to Longue-Pointe.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): As my hon. friend is aware, the Department of National Defence hires casual labourers for certain projects for which funds have been allocated. These men are not permanent employees, but it has been the departmental practice to give those concerned as much advance warning as possible about lay-offs.

There are cases, however, when these projects are completed ahead of schedule, or when the funds allotted to the project have been exhausted in advance of the estimated time of completion. In these instances, we cannot give much advance warning because we make every effort to employ the casual labourers for as long as the money is available for these projects. For example, we may employ a painter as a casual labourer on one project and, when that project is completed, re-employ him on another where his services are required.

I must also point out to my hon. friend that it is the policy of the department to release first the last man employed, to protect the seniority of the others. I regret very much that those casual labourers employed in Ville Lasalle were laid off on such short notice but I am told we have made every effort to keep them employed for as long as was possible. I must point out, Mr. Speaker, that although we have no legal obligation to give casual labourers any advance notice of impending lay-offs, we have a moral responsibility to give these men as much notice as possible. In the case at Ville Lasalle we gave them as much as we could, although it was not as much as we would have liked.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ACTIVITIES OF PRIME MINISTER—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of standing order 26, and seconded by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), I beg leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a matter of definite and urgent public importance, namely the unacceptable interference of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in the domestic politics of two countries, France and England, with regard to the common market.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Question No. 634—Mr. Coates:

1. What was the initial cost to the government of Canada in the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and what proportion of the over-all cost does this represent?

Questions

2. On what basis was this capital cost amortized, at what interest rate, over how many years, what is the annual amount required to retire the capital cost, and what portion of this amount represents interest?

3. Have the annual payments been made?

4. What is the total amount of capital expenditures made on the St. Lawrence seaway since its initial construction and what portion of this amount has been the responsibility of the government of Canada?

5. What is the estimated cost of twinning the Welland canal and when will this project be completed?

6. What were the annual receipts from tolls received by the St. Lawrence seaway authority for the year 1966?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:

1. Initial Capital Cost

	CANADA
	Montreal-Lake Ontario section	Welland canal	Total Canada	U.S.A.	Grand total
			(000's $)
Cost at 31st December 1959	$284,971	$ 25,720	$310,691	$123,317	$434,008
Value of assets entrusted to SLSA by order in council P.C. 1959-204	—	130,676	130,676	—	130,676
	284,971	156,396	441,367	123,317	564,684
	—	—	(78.2%)	(21.8%)	(100.0%)

2. (a) Montreal-Lake Ontario section—The repayment conditions under which loans were effected from the government of Canada provided that loans should be amortized with interest over the 50 year period 1960-2009. Moneys have been borrowed at varying rates, the average rate at December 31, 1966, being 4.4 per cent. As of December 31, 1966, the annual amount required to repay the debt, together with interest, during the years 1967-2009 is $19.3 million dollars. If the 1967 payment was made the amount of interest included would be $16.3 million but this would decline each year thereafter and the amount of payment on account of principal would increase.

(b) Welland canal—There is no provision for the amortization of or interest on the amount of $130.7 million representing the value of entrusted assets.

Amortization and interest provisions with respect to the initial capital cost were similar to those for the Montreal-Lake Ontario section. Some time after Welland Canal tolls were suspended in 1962, however, moneys borrowed in respect of the Welland canal were made interest free and the establishment of repayment terms was deferred until construction should be completed. Subsequently borrowings made after September 22, 1966, which amount to $9,727,000 at December 31, 1966, were made subject to deferred interest the payment of which, together with loan principal, is to commence after completion of construction on terms then to be decided.

3. Payments have been made only to the extent of a portion of the interest accruing which is therefore in arrears.

	Montreal-Lake Ontario section	Welland canal	Total Canada	U.S.A.	Grand total
			(000's $)
Additions January 1, 1960-December 31, 1966	$ 44,066	$ 56,507	$100,573	$ 7,737	$108,310
	—	—	(92.9%)	(7.1%)	(100.0%)
Grand total—December 31, 1966	$329,037	$212,903	$541,940	$131,054	$672,994
	—	—	(80.5%)	(19.5%)	(100.0%)

5. The estimated cost of twinning the Welland canal, and its estimated completion date, are presently unknown as this entire scheme, or possible alternatives, are presently under review by the government and no decision has as yet been taken.

6. Montreal-Lake Ontario section, $17,281,-526; Welland canal, nil.

1. Are there any government of Canada wharves or docks to which public access is restricted by any legal order?

2. If so, what is the location of such wharves or docks and by what level of government was the restriction enacted?

Return tabled.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ACTIVITIES OF PRIME MINISTER—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, after having proposed my motion, I wonder now whether you will allow me to put forward my arguments as to the urgency of this debate.

First of all, as required under paragraph (3) of standing order 26, I should like to hand over to you a statement of the matter I propose to discuss. Here it is, Mr. Speaker.

Monday morning, in London, as he was going to be awarded the freedom of the city, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) saw fit to depart from every Canadian custom by meddling in an inadmissible manner with internal political matters involving England and France, and by seeking to dictate to France a political line of action.

I should like also, Mr. Speaker so as to support my argument and show the urgency of this debate, to repeat the sentence which the Prime Minister used yesterday in this house when he said:

> Indeed, Mr. Speaker, in this case it is intolerable that a head of a foreign state or government should recommend a course of political or constitutional action—

And I could add: which would undermine the common market. The hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) used the same sentence.

Mr. Speaker, to continue the statement of facts—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must state the facts which speak in favour of an immediate debate. He cannot state the facts as he would do if a debate had been allowed.

What matters, at this time, is to determine whether there is an urgency of debate, that is, if the debate suggested by the hon. member should take place today rather than tomorrow or another day.

Mr. Grégoire: Very well, Mr. Speaker. I maintain that the debate is urgent and should be held today because there is in Canada, at the present time, a growing aversion for the interference of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Pearson) in the affairs of another country.

To wit, the editorial in this morning's Le Devoir and the editorial in today's La Presse in which the Prime Minister is clearly and categorically blamed for having interfered inadmissibly—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I feel the hon. member is not dealing at all with the matter of the urgency of debate but that he is giving instead, the speech he would give to the house if the motion were accepted. I suggest to him that he should not continue along those lines.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I suggest we have a debate immediately before the escalation of the expected quarrel between our two motherlands, France and England, which will have been willed by the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have listened with the utmost patience and goodwill to the remarks of the hon. member and I cannot truly believe that the point he raises justifies the adjournment of the business of the house to discuss his grievance. There will be other opportunities in the next few days. It is expected that discussions of a general nature will probably arise before next weekend and the hon. member will then have the opportunity to speak of the grievance he has just raised.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, may I now, in one simple sentence, put forward my key argument on the urgency of debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member seems to have given all the key arguments but he has failed to open the door to the debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grégoire: There is one left.

Motion for Papers

MOTION FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, would Your Honour be kind enough to call motion No. 33?

I ask that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

REPORTS ON HARP PROJECT

Motion No. 33—Mr. Harkness:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of reports which have been made to the government on the HARP project, and in particular those made by Dean Ruptash of Carleton University and by Mr. Brightwell of the defence research board.

He said: I had a brief discussion with the minister in connection with this motion and I ask that it stand until that discussion has been completed.

Motion stands.

POLLUTION

SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO DOMINION COUNCIL OF HEALTH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the danger of air pollution and the urgent need of action to deal with it, would the minister consider referring this whole subject to the Dominion Council of Health for study and a report, with recommendations, to the federal government?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As I indicated yesterday, this whole question was considered at the recent conference of the Dominion Council of Health. A number of recommendations were developed at that meeting, and these were communicated to me recently.

Mr. Starr: A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In the light of those recommendations would the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues consider taking some immediate action?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The minister will be bringing them before his colleagues without delay.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION BY PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the discussions which are taking place at the Confederation of Tomorrow conference, and since the federal government itself is convening a conference to be held early in the new year, will the Prime Minister now consider the suggestion we have been making for some time that a special all-party committee be set up to look into this situation and endeavour to reach a consensus as to what constitution might best serve the needs of our time?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I have already stated my opinion that at an appropriate time a committee of this house should be looking into this matter. I am not sure whether it would be advisable for this to be done before or after the proposed meeting, but I would be glad to look into that.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact that positions are hardening in various parts of the country does not the Prime Minister think it would be advisable for parliament itself to give some leadership to these public discussions?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's supplementary question is argumentative.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPLICATION TO STAFF OF BILINGUAL BONUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Since this government or parliament has approved a bonus of 7 per cent for bilingual civil servants and many civil servants have complained to me that they have not received this 7 per cent bonus, is the Prime Minister in a position to tell us when the bilingual employees of the federal parliament will receive this 7 per cent bonus?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be glad to look into this matter and discuss it with the President of Treasury Board. I believe, though, this is rather a matter within the jurisdiction of the Speaker. I shall be glad to talk with Your Honour about it also.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question.

Normally, does this legislation cover parliament employees?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the question is in order.

SHIPPING

SURCHARGE ON FREIGHT RATES THROUGH ST. LAWRENCE PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): My question is addressed to the Minister of Labour. While expressing pleasure at the improved situation in the St. Lawrence ports, I would ask the minister whether, with this improvement, he can report on the possibility of a rapid removal of the 25 per cent surcharge on freight rates through those ports.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry I cannot give an encouraging reply to the hon. member. I am happy to inform the house, however, at least those members who do not know it, that productivity on the Montreal docks yesterday afternoon reached the level which obtained before the Picard report was made. However, there are proceedings pending in the courts. An appeal has been taken against the interim injunction issued on Monday, and until the litigation is over it would be impossible to take any effective action, much as I might like to, along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke.

NATIONAL REVENUE

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF BOARD OF REVENUE COMMISSIONERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Was the Minister of National Revenue expressing the view of the government when he said in Montreal last night that he favoured the establishment of a board of revenue commissioners to administer all federal taxes? If so, when does the government expect to establish such a board?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister himself will be glad to reply to this question.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Benson: —I was simply expressing my own opinion.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if it is in order for the minister to reply. The hon. member asked the question correctly. He can only refer to speeches made by ministers outside the house to ask if they represent government policy.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I believe I have the right to ask the Prime Minister if the minister was expressing the view of the government. I have asked that, and I would appreciate an expression by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Pearson: I would be very glad to look into the matter, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF REPORT ON ATLANTIC PROBLEMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister indicate whether he is now in a position to inform the house of his decision on referring the special study on transportation in the Atlantic provinces to the committee on transportation and communications? If not, can he say when we might expect a decision in this regard?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Not today, Mr. Speaker, but the matter has been under very active consideration since my hon. friend raised the question and followed it up later with a letter to me.

AIR TRANSPORT

TORONTO—REFUSAL OF LANDING RIGHTS TO ROYAL DUTCH AIRLINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of the current dispute over the bilateral air agreement between The Netherlands and Canada. If the Department of Transport is reluctant to open up the Toronto market to K.L.M., the national Dutch air line, would the minister consider recommending that landing rights be made available to K.L.M. at Winnipeg and other regional airports in Canada?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a policy question sufficiently important and complex that it would not be appropriate to discuss it during the question period.

Mr. Sherman: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, could the minister assure the house that the question I have asked, and the ramifications of such a question, are under consideration by his department?

Mr. Hellyer: Well, Mr. Speaker, I did not want to offend my hon. friend in any way, nor my good friends in Winnipeg, but I have no information from the Dutch government that they would consider Winnipeg as an alternative to Toronto. I will be glad to pose this question to them, but with deference to that city I think it is the great queen city of Ontario, which I have the honour to represent in this house, where they are most interested in obtaining landing rights at the present time.

FREIGHT RATES

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION ON LIVESTOCK SHIPPED TO EASTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he or the Minister of Agriculture done anything to assist in bringing together the railroads and the men who ship livestock to eastern Canada, in order to bring about a more realistic freight rate than the one which prevailed last summer and fall?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): If the answer is yes, could the minister inform the house what action is being taken and when we can expect a reduced rate?

Mr. Hellyer: I would be glad to refer that question to the railroads, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

VANCOUVER—EMPLOYMENT OF ONLY RIGHT HANDED TEMPORARY HELP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a most urgent question of the Postmaster General, but in view of the fact that apparently he has not recovered from last night may I direct my urgent question to whoever is the acting postmaster general. Can the house have an explanation as to why, on the call for temporary help with the Christmas post office expanded business in Vancouver, only right handed persons need apply as sorters? Have left handed people no rights in this country?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am, as I am sure every member of this house is, absolutely shocked at this kind of discrimination against those of the left. I will be happy to take it up with my hon. friend the Postmaster General.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, could I direct this question to the Registrar General because of his interest in the proposed department of corporate and consumer affairs. I should like to ask him whether it is his intention to review the proposed increase in dentists' fees and make an appropriate report to the house about it, after determining whether there has been a concomitant increase in productivity as well.

PARLIAMENT HILL

INQUIRY AS TO MAINTENANCE OF CENTENNIAL FLAME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I should like to ask him whether the government will keep the centennial flame on parliament hill burning after the end of the year as a symbol of Canadian unity.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This does not appear to me to be an extremely urgent matter.

Mr. Gray: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON MONTREAL MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Prime Minister?

After the recent session of the Estates General of Quebec and French Canada, can the Prime Minister tell the house whether the observers sent by his party have reported to him about the resolutions agreed to?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that the question is acceptable.

Mr. Allard: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Why is such an important question not acceptable?

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Precedents in this house have always shown, on many occasions over the last several years, that it is permissible to ask the Prime Minister if he has received a report. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) did not go any further. He only asked if the observers had submitted a report.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The report requested must be related to a subject coming under the administrative responsibility of the government.

I do not think that the Quebec Estates General come under the administrative responsibility of the Prime Minister.

[Later:]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Postmaster General?

I know that the Postmaster General attended as an observer the sittings of the Estates General over the week-end and did so magnificently. He even acted as a referee in a clash between—

Mr. Speaker: Could the hon. member put his question?

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I said that he had been a good observer and I should like to know from the minister if the conclusions of this meeting will lead him to recommend to the cabinet the creation at the earliest possible time of a parliamentary committee for the purpose of considering all the problems of French Canadians in Quebec and outside?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is aware that be can question a minister only as concerns his administrative responsibilities.

FINANCE

TAX INCENTIVES TO ENCOURAGE GREATER PRODUCTIVITY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister advise the house when he expects to make the long promised and long awaited statement in respect of what the government plans to do by way of measures to induce greater productivity in this country?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have made many speeches on this subject and have made many statements in the house. I shall be very glad to get together a collection of them to give my hon. friend so he can entertain himself.

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest with respect that what the hon. member is asking now is for a very general statement, which should normally be made by the minister on motions.

Mr. Hees: Then, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he will take the first opportunity on motions. I have read every speech he has made—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hees: —and he has yet to make any suggestion about—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

ELECTION EXPENSES—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the time which consideration of such legislation is bound to take, will the Prime Minister inform the house whether legislation regarding election expenses flowing from the committee report on this subject is being or has been prepared, and when the house may expect such a bill to be introduced?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know how important this bill will be and I wish it could be introduced this session. However, I think it will have to be introduced next session, at which time I hope it will get through without undue delay, giving us lots of time to have it in effect before the next election.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the answer he has just given means that the report of the committee on election expenses is not going to be referred to the house committee during this session, as was promised in the speech from the throne?

Mr. Pearson: That is a different question, and I hope that can be done. My hon. friend asked me a question about a bill based on the report.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR ORGANIZATION OF HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his capacity as house leader. Will the minister arrange to have some matter referred to the committee on defence so it can be organized? I ask this in view of the answers to questions by the minister to the effect that a joint meeting of the committees on national defence and external affairs may be undertaken.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to discuss this suggestion with the Minister of National Defence.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CALGARY—LAYOFFS RESULTING FROM CONSTRUCTION DECLINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) asked if we could find some employment for the persons laid off by the Alberta Trailer Company, of Calgary.

This company, Mr. Speaker, which usually employs 800 persons has laid off 175. We were in a position to find some employment for them in Fort McLeod, in Claresholm and also in Wetaskiwin.

Unfortunately, I do not have any specific figures at the present time, but as soon as I receive a complete report, I will advise the hon. member.

OIL

REPORTED APPROVAL OF PIPE LINE INTO CHICAGO AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and it is obviously important. In light of the imminent announcement by the United States federal power commission approving the interprovincial pipe line into the Chicago area, can the minister indicate the volume of oil expected to be dropped off in that area?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In view of the fact that the hon. member is asking for technical or statistical information I would not think this is the type of question which can be asked now.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCE ON LAW OF THE SEA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he received from the Soviet union or any other country a request for another international conference on the law of the sea, in order to reach agreement on territorial seas and fishing limits?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions with particular countries about a conference on matters relating to the law of the sea including conservation of fishery resources. I cannot say we have as yet received a request along the lines my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. Crouse: In view of that answer, is the minister in a position to inform the house whether Canada would agree to such a request, and will pursue the idea of holding such a conference?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the question is hypothetical.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question arises from the fact that some straight base lines have been proclaimed on the Atlantic coast. I should like to ask the minister whether, in the interests of promoting national unity, this will be extended to the Pacific coast soon, shortly or in due course?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will give careful consideration to that thoughtful question.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROVISION OF EMPLOYMENT FOR HERRING FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question related to the question just asked, which I should like to direct to the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Have representations been received from fishermen on the Pacific coast urging the government to do what it can to find new employment for the herring fishermen who have been displaced by the curtailment of their operation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. While I realize that this may be an urgent matter, the hon. member may not ask only whether a communication has been received.

Mr. Mather: Let me rephrase my question. What action is the government taking to meet the serious unemployment situation facing herring fishermen in British Columbia?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, during a recent visit to the west coast I met the vice president and other members of the executive of the fishermens' union concerned with this matter. They made representations, several of which seemed to have some merit, to the effect that at least some of the herring fishermen might be engaged in fishery research work on the west coast. Pursuant to the assurance I gave them at the time, I have discussed this with my colleague the Minister of Fisheries. In turn this has been taken up with his deputy minister, who has had broad research experience in this field on the west coast. I am awaiting with interest further word from them.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT OF REFUNDABLE CORPORATION TAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Ballard (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance in connection with the fund accumulated by the government from refundable corporation taxes. Have any refunds been made in this regard, and does the minister intend to make refunds this year to the extent promised in the June budget speech?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think that question should be placed on the order paper.

LOANS BY BANKS UNDER FARM IMPROVEMENT ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Finance. Is he contemplating special action to get the Farm Improvement Loans Act operating effectively?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the Farm Improvement Loans Act is operating quite effectively, although I have no doubt I will in due course be saying something about necessary revisions to the act in order to bring it more into line with present conditions.

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's answer I would ask him if he is aware of the situation with regard to farm improvement bank loans; and has he tried to obtain such a loan?

MANPOWER

TORONTO—REPORTED DECREASE IN RETRAINING PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the statement by the chairman of the board of education in Toronto during the weekend that the number of trainees in Toronto has dropped from 11,800 to 3,800, and the minister's undertaking that the program is only temporary, is the minister in a position to revise this program so the citizens of the city of Toronto may get a better deal in respect of retraining?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me this question was asked previously, I think yesterday particularly.

INDUSTRY

COPPER—PRICE INCREASE BY INTERNATIONAL NICKEL COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bud Germa (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. In view of his recent announcement of an investigation into the increase in the price of copper by Noranda and Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting, will he also consider putting the International Nickel Company in the same category, as it has also announced an increase?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member is now making an observation.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that there are now very few government items on the order paper, after the good progress we made last night, will the minister revise his answer of two days ago about unemployment insurance and bring that legislation before the house in this session?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): I am afraid not, Mr. Speaker, because I am confident that the list of priority items will be refreshed and extended considerably tonight.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF REPORTED RESIGNATION OF U.S. SECRETARY OF DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct what I think is a very important question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the close relationship between the governments of Canada and the United States as regards NATO and NORAD, can the minister give the house any information in his possession as to possible policy changes in view of the reported resignation of the secretary of defence of the United States?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

ASSISTANCE TO INDUSTRIES AFFECTED BY GENEVA AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. When does the minister expect to be in a position to make the statement which he first promised me on September 27, and on several occasions since, regarding what the government plans to do to ease the impact on producers who are adversely affected by the Kennedy round tariff reductions?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): My answer is the same as last time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: Could I ask the minister a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does this mean that he will continue to say "soon", "soon", "soon" every two or three weeks, as the other members of the government so often do?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: This is the old arrogance.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

INQUIRY AS TO TENDERS FOR DESTROYER ESCORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry. I ask, what is the present status of tenders for the new destroyer escorts? We were promised them this fall, and we are now getting dangerously close to Christmas.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I did not quite hear the question.

Mr. Forrestall: No wonder; you weren't listening. That is your fault.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Forrestall: I stood here and waited for the minister's attention, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Forrestall: When are we going to get our boats?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEATH SENTENCE AND LIFE IMPRISONMENT

The house resumed, from Thursday, November 23, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-168, to amend the Criminal Code —Mr. Pennell—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House again in committee of the whole on Bill No. C-168, to amend the Criminal Code. When the house rose on Thursday, November 23, clause 2 of the bill was under consideration. Shall clause 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

On clause 2—Approval by governor in council of release after commutation of sentence.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I was asking some questions of the Solicitor General on November 23 when ten o'clock arrived and we were discussing clause 2 of this bill. I stated, as hon. members will find in Hansard, that I still had some questions I wished to ask on clause 2. Clause 2 reads as follows:

> Subsection (3) of section 656 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
> "(3) Notwithstanding any other law or authority, a person in respect of whom a sentence of death has been commuted to imprisonment for life or a term of imprisonment or a person upon whom a sentence of imprisonment for life has been imposed as a minimum punishment, shall not be released during his life or such term, as the case may be, without the prior approval of the governor in council."

My first question to the Solicitor General is this. The clause reads, "a person in respect of whom a sentence of death has been commuted to . . . a term of imprisonment," and so on, evidently meaning less than life imprisonment. How many commutations have there been to less than life imprisonment in the case of convicted murderers sentenced to be hanged?

Mr. Pennell: To the best of my knowledge, Mr. Chairman, there have been no cases in which the person convicted of murder has had his sentence commuted to less than life imprisonment. However, my officials will be with me in a few moments and I hope then to be in a position to confirm this answer.

Mr. Cowan: I am interested in this question for the simple reason that when the Queen commuted the execution order against Lepine in Manitoba in the 1870's it was commuted to a term of two years plus the loss of civil rights. Inasmuch as we have been advised that the cabinet itself pass on all paroles for people who have had their sentences commuted to life imprisonment after ten years in prison, I was wondering whether there were any convicted murderers who had been given commuted sentences of less than ten years. The problem then arises, when would they be referred to the cabinet for decision on whether parole should be granted. We have the Lepine case as a precedent. I ask that question in all sincerity.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I am advised by the officials that within the memory of persons working in the department now there has never been a case where a sentence of death has been commuted to less than life imprisonment.

Mr. Cowan: I am quite interested in this question, in view of the fact that the cabinet has been paroling convicted murderers after they have served a life sentence of eight years, ten months and one day, based on the figures produced in the House of Commons by the Solicitor General himself. Why do they have these words in the proposed bill, "or a term of imprisonment," not specifically life imprisonment? Are they now going to impose terms of imprisonment of less than ten years which would equal the eight years, ten months and one day of life sentences in the past 13 cases? Why is that phrase "or a term of imprisonment" put in this bill if there is no recollection of a convicted murderer having had his sentence commuted to less than a term of life imprisonment?

Mr. Pennell: The proposed clause 2 is drafted to meet the conditions set out in section 656 of the Criminal Code wherein it states:

> The governor in council may commute a sentence of death to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life, or for any term of years not less than two years, or to imprisonment in a prison other than a penitentiary for a period of less than two years.

I also wish to make it clear that I am not disputing the hon. member's statement that there have been cases where by commutation the sentence has been reduced to less than life. All I am saying is that my officials are not aware of any such case since they have been serving with the government.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I am indebted to the Solicitor General for having read the section of the law. It points out that the governor in council may commute a sentence to a period of not less than two years in penitentiary, which includes anything from a little more than two years upwards to ten years. The other day the Solicitor General advised us that an order in council had been passed to the effect that the cabinet could not consider paroling a convicted man under sentence of life imprisonment until he had served at least ten years of his life sentence. If a man sentenced to life imprisonment must serve ten years of his life sentence, is there no possibility of parole before the expiration of his term for the man who has been committed to a term of not less than two years nor more than ten, which is much less than life imprisonment? When does the cabinet consider the question of parole for him? If his commuted sentence is say eight years, does he serve the full eight years because the cabinet, we are told, is not to consider this matter until he has served ten years?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I would think it would be highly unlikely that the governor in council, having passed an order in council setting a minimum of ten years as the period to be served before a person becomes eligible for parole after receiving a capital sentence, would commute to less than ten years. It is not likely they would go contrary to the order in council passed in 1964.

Mr. Cowan: I may say I have seen the cabinet reverse itself in this very house in less than four hours. My only reply to the Solicitor General's statement is that it confirms his statement that this is a poorly drawn bill.

I should like to ask another question in connection with clause 2. We are told he shall not be released during his life or such term, as the case may be, without the prior approval of the governor in council. In answer to a question the other day the Solicitor General said such a case could not be referred to the governor in council until the ten years had been served. We who live in the province of Ontario and have children are very well aware of the fact a driver's licence can be issued to a young person at the age of 16. However, we have a regulation in the province of Ontario to the effect that when a child turns 15 years and 6 months he may be given a learner's permit. The idea is that during the six months between 15 years and 6 months and 16 years of age the child will be able to learn to drive a car on the public highways so that when he turns 16 years of age he will be able to get a driver's licence. Everyone knows what a world that opens up to the young.

I should like to ask the Solicitor General this question. In view of the fact that anyone who is serving life imprisonment for murder may not be paroled until he has served ten years, will the cabinet demand that he serve ten years in full before the parole board considers hope of parole and then refer the matter to the cabinet for final decision or will the parole board be given instructions that after eight years, ten months and one day they had better start considering parole for this man who has been sentenced to life imprisonment? If they decide that he should be given parole, can he be sprung by the cabinet at the end of the tenth year of his sentence, rather than have the poor fellow languish in jail after having completed ten years and then have the parole board consider the matter and then refer it to the cabinet? Under circumstances such as those, the poor devil might be in prison as long as 12 years because it may take the parole board and the cabinet two years to come to a decision to spring him. Will there be a provision such as exists in Ontario for young drivers which will enable the matter to be settled before the ten years are up so that the man can be sprung by the cabinet at the end of the tenth year or will he have to serve his full ten years before the matter of parole can be considered?

The other day I mentioned to the minister of immigration that we have a highly moral society. We keep European thieves out of this country so they will not be a blemish on our moral picture, but we parole convicted Canadian murderers amongst the people so that we can not only rehabilitate them but perhaps they will rehabilitate us. The question is, when will the parole board start considering the question of parole for this man, before the ten years are up so he will not have to serve one extra day beyond ten years, or will the board start considering the matter at the end of ten years imprisonment?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, the National Parole Board is an autonomous body. This government, and I am satisfied all other governments, have scrupulously respected the integrity of the board. No matter of parole is brought to the attention of the governor in council until the parole board takes the initiative. If the parole board reaches the conclusion that the case is not one for parole, the governor in council hears nothing of it. If they feel favourably inclined toward the case, then it is forwarded to the office of the Solictior General who in turn brings it before his colleagues in cabinet.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I have just one more question on clause 2. We are told this person shall not be released during his life or such term, as the case may be, without the prior approval of the governor in council. Is this a threat or a promise? Is it a promise that he will be sprung at the end of ten years or is it a threat that the cabinet, in all seriousness, in the certain way in which they consider every problem of the day, will dwell on the problem of parole for months and months so that he will have to fear inactivity on the part of the cabinet in connection with something which he hopes from this cabinet which has let people out after eight years, ten months and one day? Again I ask, does that phrase, "without prior approval of the governor in council", hold out a hope, a promise or a threat for the prisoner?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, perhaps it would be helpful if I pointed out that in non-capital cases the question of parole is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the National Parole Board and does not come to the governor in council. It is only in capital cases where the sentence has been commuted that the matter is referred to the cabinet. This new clause will make it necessary for all cases, both capital and non-capital, to be referred, and parole shall not be granted unless there is approval by the governor in council in addition to the approval of the National Parole Board.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I just want to express a thought or two about the intention of the clause before us. I say at once that I do not know what the percentage figure is in connection with rehabilitation. In other words, I cannot say how many individuals who, having been convicted of a crime and sentenced, have successfully undergone rehabilitation. We talk in terms of 70 per cent or 80 per cent being recidivists, so presumably 20 per cent or 30 per cent represents the degree of success. These figures include criminals generally and not particularly those people who may have committed capital or non-capital murder.

I am quite sure that if during the time our penal system has been in existence we had followed the philosophy advocated by the hon. member for York-Humber we would undoubtedly be in a deficit position with respect to rehabilitation. I do not care to comment any further on the hon. member's remarks or upon his antediluvian concept except to say that we should be appreciative of the fact he is here and is not working as a guard or a warden in a penitentiary because the situation would then be disastrous.

I am not supporting the clause that is before us at the moment. Neither am I partial to the existing situation. As I understand it, when the governor in council makes a commutation the individual in question cannot be paroled without prior approval of the governor in council. The provision before us at the moment is mandatory. There is no necessity for including such a provision in the terms of commutation because it is clear that the governor in council must approve in each instance the parole of a prisoner who has had his sentence of death commuted either to life imprisonment or to some other term.

As I understand what the Solicitor General said a moment ago in reply to a question put to him about the integrity of the parole board members, the parole board does all of the case work in any event, which I think is as it should be. The parole board was established to deal specifically with the circumstances surrounding individuals, to investigate the manner in which individuals conduct themselves while in prison, situations with which they may be confronted while on parole, areas to which they may go, conditions at home, and all the other sociological factors which may have some impact on these individuals in cases of parole.

The parole board carries out the same function in regard to people who have been convicted of capital or non-capital murder and sentenced to life imprisonment. Therefore it would seem to me that it would impose an additional burden on the cabinet if they were called upon to deal with each individual case. I would think the cabinet would have neither the time nor the concern to do so. The Solicitor General may indeed have concern as an individual member of the cabinet, first because of his interest and second because as minister he is charged with the responsibility of overseeing the activities of the penitentiaries service and the parole board. However, by and large I would say that the cabinet members in total would not have the degree of interest and concern necessary to give a fair and judicious opinion in a particular case presented to them by the Solicitor General.

I suggest that all that would happen in fact would be that the parole board would examine the case and make a recommendation and then the recommendation would come to the cabinet. The cabinet would not be concerned enough to bother making an extensive inquiry whether or not the parole board's recommendation was correct. The parole board would not be represented at cabinet meetings and subjected to questioning on each individual case, and in any event I do not think they should be required to be present. Therefore we are perhaps imposing a burden upon the cabinet that it is ill-equipped to carry out. It would be unwise, in my opinion, to make a political body responsible for such decisions. This is the function we generally give to the parole board. I do not think that the cabinet should be made responsible for making parole decisions with regard to a particular group of people who commit a particular type of crime.

In my opinion the cabinet should endorse the recommendation of the parole board. The cabinet has faith in the integrity of the parole board and in accepting the board's recommendation the cabinet does not become involved in the matter. This will mean that the cabinet is not involved in hue and cry if the parole board has made a decision which perhaps was not what was hoped for.

I do not think the parole board should be composed of politicians, first because of the fact that they are politicians and, second, because they do not have the time or the individual interest, I am sure, to go in detail into each situation. The matter should be in the hands and under the jurisdiction of the parole board. The board was set up with certain guide lines, mechanisms and procedures for granting parole and I submit that the board should be allowed to follow that machinery in cases of capital and non-capital murder as it does in cases involving other crimes.

I do not intend to vote against the clause before the committee, Mr. Chairman, because this would be an indication that I was on the other side and was in favour of the provision already in the legislation. In other words, I favour neither provision, so I would just as soon refrain from voting on this clause and express my disagreement with it orally.

However, if the matter is to be put to a vote I submit that the law as it now stands is a little better than the provision before us. The present law is at least permissive. It permits the governor in council to make a direction in cases of commutation, and I think it is preferable that the governor in council and the cabinet have this leeway so that they can, if they wish, make no direction. The clause before us is not discretionary; such a course of action is automatic and applies not only to cases where the sentence of death has been commuted to life imprisonment but also to sentences of life imprisonment.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Transitional.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like the Solicitor General to tell the committee why paragraph (a) of clause 3, subclause 1, was included in the bill. If I understand paragraph (a) correctly, it seems that cases of alleged murder already before the courts or cases in which proceedings have been commenced before, this act comes into force are to be proceeded with as if the law is that which existed before this bill passed. This would mean that if in cases already commenced but which will not actually come to trial for a few months the accused is found guilty of capital murder, the judge is called upon to sentence the accused to death.

• (3:40 p.m.)

It strikes me as rather strange that we would call upon our courts to pass such sentences, parliament having made the decision that it does not favour the application of capital punishment except in two restricted cases. I find it hard to believe that the cabinet would countenance a death sentence when parliament has decided against capital punishment. Where a death sentence has been passed I should think that commutation would be almost automatic. It it not a farce, then, to ask judges, juries and courts to handle capital cases in the next few months as though the law had not been changed? Since parliament has made its decision about capital punishment and since in all likelihood the cabinet will commute any death sentence, will it not be a bit of a farce for a judge to put on his black gloves and so on and sentence a man to death at any time during the next two or three months?

I think that the Solicitor General and I are on the same wavelength about what ought to be done. I want to know why this provision is to continue in force. It seems to me that clause 3(3)(a) ought to be eliminated and clause 3 ought to be redrafted. I am not proposing an amendment. I am merely saying that this provision ought not to be in this bill.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, while the Solicitor General is thinking of the answer to my hon. friend's question it might be appropriate for me to add a word to what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said. It seems to me, in the situation he has drawn to our attention, that our judges, juries and courts will be placed in a false position so far as the law is concerned. The hon. member for Bow River in general terms, when speaking on an earlier amendment, spoke about the mockery of the administration of justice. Parliament has changed the law. For parliament, through the provisions of clause 3(1)(a), to call on a judge to pronounce a solemn sentence of death, in the light of the change in the law, is to make a mockery of the administration of justice and to bring it into disrepute. The death penalty is not the appropriate penalty in such circumstances.

With the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I urge the Solicitor General to reconsider this matter. What is the administrative difficulty of making the new law applicable at a certain date? The new legislation ought to apply to all capital murder trials that take place after that date. We ought not to tolerate the present situation where charges may have been laid and where the accused may be tried with the old law still being applicable.

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Chairman, I would also like to say a few words about subclause (3). I should appreciate it if the minister would indicate to the house and to all Canadians the meaning of commutation of the death penalty.

The legislation provides in general that, in the case of an individual sentenced to life imprisonment, the governor in council may reduce the term of imprisonment, further to a report to this effect from the National Parole Board.

The public—as I came to realize during the week-ends I spent in my riding—was asking this very question. They wanted to know, in the case of an individual sentenced to life imprisonment, what standards and criteria the minister will use to commute his sentence.

Will the minister have to rely solely on the reports of the parole board or will he try to set up another organization which would review the recommendations submitted by the board to the cabinet?

I know that the parole board performs a tremendous task. Its members are only human and make mistakes sometimes, but I feel, when the life sentence of a dangerous criminal is to be reduced by ten or fifteen years, that the minister should take every precaution to ensure that its decision is not detrimental to society in general.

I should like to know whether the minister will maintain the National Parole Board as it now stands and whether he will accept the recommendations of the board on the commutation of the sentence of someone who is sentenced to life imprisonment.

I should also like to know whether the minister intends to alter the organization of the National Parole Board or if he will set up another body to reassure the public that the recommendations of the board have been seriously considered in depth, because I know the minister cannot go into all the details when he is asked for parole. He must rely on the parole board and it is impossible, even inhuman, to ask the minister to consider all the details in order to make an objective recommendation to the cabinet.

I should also like to know whether the minister intends to check in detail and in depth the recommendations of the National parole board and what criteria he will use as a basis for his recommendations to the cabinet for a commutation of sentence for someone sentenced to life imprisonment.

[English]

Mr. Pennell: May I deal first with the question raised by the hon. member for Charlevoix. I had some difficulty in following his remarks through the translation system, but the matter of commutation falls exclusively within the jurisdiction of the governor in council and does not fall within the powers of the National Parole Board. These powers will remain unchanged so far as commutation is concerned. I shall propose some changes to the Parole Act in the omnibus amendments to the Criminal Code when that bill is presented. That, I hope, will be some time during this session. I am not at liberty to go into details with respect to the proposed amendments. Basically the powers of the National Parole Board remain unchanged notwithstanding the proposed amendments.

Coming now to the question raised by the hon. members for Greenwood and Winnipeg North Centre, I must compliment them for seizing quickly on an apparent inconsistency in the bill. When I saw that clause in print for the first time I thought it would entail problems. Clause 5 and clause 3 are complementary. We hope that by taking action under clause 5 when this bill becomes law it will not be necessary to take action under clause 3. Before the bill is proclaimed we hope to notify all appropriate authorities across the country so that they do not commence trials until the legislation has been brought into force. Should it be that a trial is under way, it is possible that the trial could be pending when we proclaim the legislation. In that case it is proposed that the trial continue as if this legislation had not come into force. The rules of evidence and the conduct of the trial are not changed by the proposals in this bill. Only the sentence is affected, and in the event of the death sentence being passed it would be necessary for the governor in council to commute it. We feel this is not likely to occur, but the possibility does exist.

Mr. Brewin: May I ask the Solicitor General what interpretation he places on the word "proceedings"? From the way he spoke it sounded as though he thought "proceedings" was the same as "trial". I had thought that proceedings might be initiated by the laying of an information or by indictment at some time well ante-dating the trial and that the effect of subclause 3 would be that if proceedings were initiated today, for example, by the laying of a charge or the preferring of an indictment, then the old law would apply to the trial even though the trial might not take place until two or three months hence. This is the problem we foresee. Perhaps it could be dealt with by changing the word "proceedings" to "trial".

Mr. Churchill: I wonder whether the minister will give some thought to this suggestion. I am speaking now of clause 3 (1) and I suggest we strike out everything after the word "Act" in line 5 down to line 21, put the word "and" in place of the word "where" and leave the rest of it in. We would then be left with what I think the minister would like to see. He wants to deal with proceedings which have begun prior to the coming into force of this legislation and then with proceedings which commence after the coming into force of this measure. If my suggestion is adopted the operative lines would be from line 22 to line 30 and the punishment would then be in accordance with this bill.

You deal with proceedings started in advance of this bill, proceedings started after the legislation has come into force, and then you determine what punishment shall be imposed as though the crime had been committed after the coming into force of the act.

You get away from all this uncertainty. If there is some delay in getting this measure through the house or through the other place you may run into difficulties. But could the bill not be clarified by striking out the lines to which I have referred?

Mr. Nugent: I am not sure I followed my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Churchill: I was very clear. My hon. friend should pay more attention.

Mr. Nugent: I hope my hon. friend will put forward an amendment for our consideration. As I see it, this is the difficulty in which we find ourselves as a result of the present wording of the bill. Suppose a man was accused of murder last April and the process of his trial is subject to a great many delays. His case would be subject to the provisions of the new act. On the other hand, a man accused of an offence on the same date whose trial had been expedited would be dealt with under the old law. I find it hard to persuade myself that punishment should depend upon the degree of expedition with which the courts have acted. Some murder trials are completed within a year. Others drag on for three or four years after the date upon which proceedings were first begun. Perhaps the criterion should be the date upon which the crime was committed. I cannot agree that the provisions of clause 5 make it practicable for the crown to cure this trouble arising from delayed proceedings. I think it will be almost impossible for the courts to examine past proceedings and make sure there is an equitable rule maintained in the interest of those who are now being tried.

Mr. Pennell: On the point raised by the hon. member for Greenwood and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I should like to point out that subclause 3 of clause 3 refers to proceedings commenced upon the preferment of an indictment pursuant to part XVII of the Criminal Code. I am advised that in this circumstance the preliminary hearing would have ben concluded and that the present bill would not affect the preliminary hearing proceedings.

Mr. Knowles: Before the Solicitor General goes on to another point may I put a direct question to him? Are there any cases now at the stage where clause 3(1)(a) would apply, were the trial would have to be carried on under the old law and where the judge would pronounce sentence of death upon the prisoner, if found guilty, only to have that sentence automatically commuted?

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Pennell: Unfortunately I am unable to give a satisfactory answer to that question. I do not know how many trials are under way at the present moment. But I can assure this chamber that should the bill carry and be sent to the other place we shall be watching proceedings very closely and alerting provincial attorneys general so as to avoid a situation where this act would be proclaimed in the middle of trial proceedings.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the clear intention of the Solicitor General, namely, that the attorneys general are to be advised, why should we not take care of this in the law? Why have a law which says something different from the clear intention of the government? As I read it the law is so worded as to say that it is possible for judges to pronounce sentence of death on people convicted of a crime for which parliament is now saying the sentence should be life imprisonment.

One other question. Is there any intention of making the date upon which the act comes into force retroactive? Does it have to be a date later than the date upon which the bill is passed?

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Pennell: I am sure the house gave this particular point grave consideration, but notwithstanding all the precautions we take we cannot forecast the speed with which legislation moves through this chamber and through the other chamber. It is possible that if a trial were under way the responsible authorities might not wish to delay it. A trial may have reached its last moments. The jury might be out over midnight, and if the bill were proclaimed to come into effect on a certain day we might get into the situation that by the time the jury had returned its verdict the act would have come into effect. It is suggested that it is not advisable to change the ground rules of a trial once it is under way. It is for that reason that we propose coupling clause 3 with clause 5, hoping that this will avoid such an unusual situation.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister go at least as far as to say that it is the intention that as from now on no trial will start on the basis of the old law?

Mr. Pennell: Our hope is that no trial will be commenced at a time when we expect the new act, if passed, to be proclaimed as being in force. I cannot engage in forecasting the political fortunes of this bill in another chamber, but of course I am very hopeful. I cannot say to the various attorneys general: You should not embark on trials. The best I can do is to keep them advised of the progress of this bill so that they may take responsible action with regard to the holding of trials of this nature.

Mr. Nugent: I am still a little puzzled why the crown wants to complicate unduly the method by which the new rule will be brought into force. I can see that there will be lots of consultation with the various attorneys general throughout the country, and knowing how long some trials can be delayed I am satisfied in my own mind that a satisfactory method can be worked out by them. Would the Solicitor General tell us what is wrong with fixing an arbitrary date, based on the day that the bill comes into effect, rather than going through a cumbersome system that could be unworkable and at the very least difficult to manage? The crown can arbitrarily fix a date such as the date the house gave approval to the principle of the bill, and proceedings after that can then take their normal course, no matter how long. Would the Solicitor General be kind enough to deal with that problem?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I feel I ought to deal with the point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. If I followed the hon. member correctly—if I did not, it was my fault because I was trying to speak with my officials—his suggestion was that we should conduct a trial according to the law in force at the time an offence was committed, and it seems to me that by doing so we would be coming to the same proposition as now proposed under clause 3. It would mean that if a capital offence were committed today and the person were convicted he would be sentenced to death. This is the same result as we would be reaching under clause 3.

Mr. Nugent: I did not say on a date fixed by proclamation. If the date were set as November 1 then the punishment for the offence of capital murder after that date, no matter when the trial may be held, would be life imprisonment, but this bill would have no effect on any offence committed before that date, no matter when the trial may be held.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I want to try once more to make my point to the Solicitor General. I do not think that what he said meets it. As I see it, the problem is not so much the case where a trial has actually commenced. I can understand that if the bill were likely to come into force it might well be possible to arrange to have a trial postponed until it actually does come into force, but I still ask the Solicitor General to consider the case where proceedings have commenced already by the preferring of an indictment.

The Solicitor General will be more familiar with these matters than I am. I understand it is possible to prefer an indictment after a preliminary inquiry and then have the trial postponed for one reason or another for a matter of months, certainly for a matter of weeks. If this legislation remains as it is now drafted, then although the act may be proclaimed the trial must take place, as I understand it, under the old dispensation. I suggest that instead of saying, "where proceedings in respect of an offence" the clause should state, "Where a trial in respect of an offence was commenced". A comparable amendment would then have to be made in subclause 2, and possibly subclause 3 would have to be struck out.

This would make it clear that once the act came into effect any case would have to be tried under the new dispensation, the new definition of capital punishment, and perhaps a new indictment would have to be prepared. However, that would not tax the abilities of our crown attorneys unduly and it would remove the anomaly of which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has spoken. I suggest it would be derogatory to the administration of justice to ask a jury, after this bill has come into effect, to proceed in accordance with a law that is no longer in effect and have the sentence of death imposed with all the macabre details that go with it, knowing full well that that is not the law of Canada as determined by parliament.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I was remaining in my seat feeling that possibly the Solicitor General was going to make some comments in answer to the hon. member for Greenwood, but as he has not risen I would like to speak on clause 3 of the bill and to refer to the points raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Greenwood.

I ask hon. members not to overlook the fact that this bill was introduced into the house on October 19, 1967, when it was given first reading, and that it was given second reading on November 9. As I explained on second reading of the bill, many of us were amazed at the action of the cabinet in bringing it forward since this parliament of Canada in April, 1966, had declared in unmistakable terms that it wished capital punishment retained in this country. We are relying on the word of the Prime Minister of Canada that this parliament would be asked to declare itself once and for all on this question. This parliament declared itself once and for all on the question and stated that capital punishment should be retained. This was done in April, 1966. What happened? The cabinet had no intention of carrying out the will of parliament. It goes on commuting death sentences to life imprisonment and starts to parole persons with commuted sentences after eight years, ten months and one day.

There is no doubt that the cabinet enjoyed their position on the throne of mercy when they were commuting every death sentence imposed since they came to office in April, 1963. True enough, Shakespeare wrote that mercy "becomes the throned monarch better than his crown", that "it is an attribute to God himself; and earthly power doth then show likest God's when mercy seasons justice."

There can be no member of the cabinet but what must have enjoyed the sensation of having an attribute to God himself when he was extending mercy over and above the law of the land which had been endorsed by a free vote—and I said free vote—of the parliament of Canada in April, 1966. But it does seem to me that members of the cabinet must have been reading more of Shakespeare than "The Merchant of Venice" during the four and a half years they have been in office.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I do not think he should be making observations in general terms about the subject of the bill. He should be confining his remarks to the transitional aspects of this bill.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that if you and the other members of the house will pay attention to my remarks you will find that I am referring to clause 3 of the bill, because I intend to get down to clause 3 (1) (b) which reads, "Where a new trial of a person for the offence has been ordered". The new trial to which I will refer and up to which I am leading is the new trial ordered for Messrs. Schirm and Guenette, separatists in the province of Quebec. I happen to be leading up to that point and I will be commenting in a moment or two on the situation where a new trial of a person for an offence has been ordered as referred to in clause 3(1) (b).

The cabinet must have been finding that the attribute to God was embarrassing to them when they were extending mercy to the murderers of prison guards, the murderers of policemen, the murderers of children and the murderers of women, because Shakespeare wrote eloquently in "Timon of Athens", "It is necessary that he should die; nothing emboldens sin so much as mercy". I do wish that when people are talking about mercy being an attribute to God himself they would also bear in mind that Shakespeare wrote that nothing emboldens sin so much as mercy.

Mr. Chairman and members of the House of Commons, I do not like this bill. I have not hesitated to express my dislike. But I must say in no uncertain terms that I consider clause 3 (1) (b) to be the most nefarious part of the entire bill. Far be it from me to make any charges; I am not a lawyer. But I do not mind borrowing nice easy-sounding phrases when I find lawyers using them. I wish to borrow a phrase from the Solicitor General when he was speaking on second reading of this bill. I should like to submit that the burden of proof is on the shoulders of the members of the cabinet in the matters which I intend to draw to the attention of the committee.

Clause 3(1)(b)—and I am confining myself to this clause—refers to where a new trial has been ordered. Let me say that in the case of Schirm and Guenette a new trial was ordered on October 24, 1967. I intend to refer to this in some detail.

In speaking on this bill in the past—and I do not hesitate to refer to it a second time—I made much of the celebrated case of Lepine during the Red River occurrences in 1870. I made the statement at that time that the most despicable chapter in the history of the Mackenzie government, the Liberal government of this country from 1873 to 1878, was that relating to the case of Lepine whose sentence of death was commuted by Queen Victoria. I said it was—and it is—a despicable chapter not only in the history of the Mackenzie administration but also in the administration of law in Canada. I stated that the Dufferin-Carnarvon correspondence of 1874 to 1878 shows conclusively the lack of backbone in the Mackenzie cabinet, a craven cabinet if ever there was one, which refused to allow the law to be carried out.

A jury consisting of English speaking Canadians, French speaking Canadians, half-breeds and Métis had found Lepine guilty of the murder of Scott. These papers tell an unfortunate story, I can assure you; I have made reference to it before. The Governor General, Lord Dufferin, advised the officials in England, particularly the secretary of the colonial office to whom he was responsible, that the cabinet in Canada was in a very embarrassing and vexed position. The cabinet of Mackenzie was sustained in the House of Commons of Canada by a heavy vote from Quebec and a heavy vote from Ontario. Lepine had been found guilty of the murder of Thomas Scott who came from Ontario and he was sentenced to death. If Mackenzie allowed the sentence of death to be carried out it was his impression and that of the hon. Edward Blake that Quebec would turn against the Mackenzie administration and that if the sentence was commuted by Mackenzie Ontario would turn against the Mackenzie-Blake administration.

"How to get off the hook" was the expression I used the other day. I repeat it today. It was decided in informal conversations with the Governor General to persuade the Queen to commute the death sentence just as though Ottawa knew nothing about it. To carry on the sham, when the word came through that the sentence of death on Lepine had been commuted to two years' imprisonment plus the loss of his civil rights, the Mackenzie cabinet was overjoyed because they passed the word around—it is in the books here—that Ontario accepted the clemency of the Queen without question because of the high regard in which the Queen was held. It was pointed out that if the Mackenzie cabinet had commuted the sentence there would have been anger from one end of Ontario to the other.

May I refer to Hon. Edward Blake. In this correspondence it is pointed out that Blake protested loud and long in Canada, particularly through a paper which he owned, about the interference of the colonial office in the affairs of Canada. Mackenzie, in order to show the people of Canada that the Mackenzie administration did not want the Queen interfering in our affairs, decided to send Blake to Great Britain to protest her interference in an affair which she had been asked to interfere in by informal conversations with Governor General Dufferin. They then sent Blake over to England and he is supposed to have protested, although there is no record of it. Later on Blake, who had been prime minister of Ontario at one time and later minister of justice in the House of Commons of Canada, went to Great Britain and was elected to the house there. He fell flat on his face, to use a common term, so far as British politics are concerned. I do not have the slightest doubt that he did. The politicians and statesmen in Britain knew that he was the man who had requested that the Queen commute the sentence of Lepine and then had gone to England to protest the commutation. I do not have any doubt that Blake fell flat on his face in Britain because of the prior knowledge in Britain of his actions as a politician in Canada.

I come now to the case of Schirm and Guenette, these convicted separatists in the province of Quebec. I would like to think that some members might keep track of the dates I mention as I proceed. It was on August 29, 1964 that a man was killed in a gunshop in Montreal as he came up from the basement. Not only was this man shot and killed in his own gunshop but another man in the area was killed accidentally by a police bullet because of the exchange of rifle fire between the raiders and the gunshop employees and police.

Schirm and Guenette were convicted on May 21, 1965, although the robbery and murders took place on Saturday, August 29, 1964. I wish to read some of the history of the Schirm and Guenette case. Following their conviction the case was automatically appealed to the Supreme Court of Quebec on August 24, 1967 and a new trial was ordered. I trust that you will keep track of the dates I mention because I submit that the burden of proof is on the shoulders of the cabinet to disprove that they are not placing on parliament as a whole the responsibility for commuting the sentences of Schirm and Guenette.

The cabinet has always thought it in order to commute the sentences of other murderers but here we have men who, during the course of their trial, claimed they had committed a political offence and should therefore be tried in other than a criminal court of Canada. They even mentioned that they should be tried in an international court because they claimed their offence was a political one and Canada does not have a political court such as they have in countries like Holland, Belgium and France. Of course, the Canadian law enforcement officers would not listen to such an argument and they were tried in a criminal court for the murder of the vice president of the gunshop.

Let me read to you from the Toronto Star of August 31, 1964 which carried a United Press International and Canadian Press dispatch from Montreal regarding this case. It states:

> Anti-terrorist squads of three police forces joined today in a 4,000 man hunt for the missing member of a five-man separatist group after two men were shot dead during an abortive raid Saturday on a firearms store.
> Inspector Roland Perran of the Montreal police force said the five raiders had "revolutionary tendencies" but that four persons captured near the site will not be identified until a coroner's inquest is held.
> Detectives said they have positive proof the raid was attempted by men with "revolutionary tendencies" but would not pin down with what separatist organization the men were connected.
> Some reports said they were members of the A.L.Q. (Armée Libération Québecoise) the group which took over the F.L.Q. (Front Libération de Québec) smashed after a wave of bombings last summer.
> Saturday's deaths bring to three the killings resulting from separatist violence.
> A store employee said a bandit pointed the gun at the clerk and announced in French: "We don't want any money—just rifles and ammunition".

We read in the Ottawa Journal of September 4, 1964, about the "revolutionaries". The article from Montreal states in part:

> Five lean, shabbily dressed men, described by police as "revolutionaries"—

Then we find a reference to François Schirm, 32, a Hungarian born French army paratrooper. Later the article states:

> Following their capture, police described the five as "revolutionaries", but said there was no proof they belonged to known separatist groups.
> At a press conference Thursday, Pierre Bourgault, president of Le Rassemblement pour l'Indépendance Nationale, a separatist party, said only Schirm was an R.I.N. member and that the party could—

Mr. Lewis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I cannot say that I have heard every word the hon. gentleman has spoken because I have been in and out, but it appears to me that the hon. member for York-Humber is discussing a case in respect of which a new trial has been granted and which is now before the courts. The hon. member is making highly prejudicial statements in respect of this case. This matter is now sub judice and ought not to be discussed on the floor of this house at all, certainly not in the terms in which the hon. member is discussing it. I respectfully suggest to Your Honour that you stop him from carrying on with this bloodthirsty subject.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I have been listening to the remarks of the hon. member for York-Humber and I must admit I have been a little bit puzzled by his observations about an individual case. Hon. members should confine their remarks to the transitional aspects of clause 3 of this bill rather than speak in general terms or about individual cases.

Mr. Lewis: With respect, Mr. Chairman, I urge you to rule whether or not the hon. member should deal with any matter of this kind. The matter is in your hands, but I ask you to rule that he cannot discuss this case in respect of which the accused have been granted a new trial, at least certainly not in the terms in which he has been discussing it.

Mr. Cowan: My references have been taken from the transcripts of evidence in the cases in question. I should like to draw attention to a statement made by the hon. member for Three Rivers who spoke in this house on November 23. This is to be found in Hansard on page 4643. No ruling was made at that time with regard to that member's statement. He said:

> I also see cases which might constitute what is generally called political crimes when governments might be concerned over electoral consequences, over the penalties they might mete out to those responsible for political crimes. There might be some even now and the rumour is rampant. Mr. Chairman, I am not inventing anything. It is currently being reputed at least in my province—I do not know whether it is being said in the rest of the country—that if the government is so insistent in having this bill carried, it is because they do not dare allow the death sentences against the two separatists who have been guilty of murder, lest a scandal result along the lines of the (Lepine) affair in the political history of the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member may refer to a previous debate, but a point of order has been raised by the hon. member for York South. He has pointed out that this case is now before the courts. The hon. member should confine his remarks to clause 3 of this bill rather than to individual cases.

Mr. Cowan: Let me point out that the reference I read is from this very debate, and no one objected to the hon. member for Three Rivers as he continued to point out that—

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member should return to clause 3. The point of order of the hon. member for York South is well taken.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, in respect of clause 3 of the bill, which I had under consideration during my earlier remarks, some comment was made by two members of the house regarding clause 3 (1)(a). The question was asked why this clause should be included. In my opinion the burden of proof rests on the cabinet to show that this clause was not put in to make it appear as though the penalty would be executed. The burden of proof is on the cabinet to show that it was not their desire that this bill should be passed before the execution date of November 3, 1967 had occurred. If the bill had been proclaimed before November 3 the executions would have been automatically set aside.

It appears that I should not be specific, but the bill states that when a new trial of a person for the offence is ordered and the new trial is commenced after the coming into force of this act, the new trial shall be commenced by the preferring of a new indictment before the court before which the accused is to be tried, and thereafter the offence shall be dealt with, inquired into, tried and determined, and any punishment in respect of the offence shall be imposed as if it had been committed before the coming into force of this act.

I am talking about a case or cases that occurred in May of 1964, and I am not mentioning names. Why is there this distinction between trials that might begin at one time and a new trial, particularly when you consider that the murders were committed as far back as 1964? I think this is a very interesting coincidence. The burden of proof is on the cabinet to prove that it is only a coincidence that these charges were being tried and appealed and that seven execution dates were set with six postponements and that the first capital punishment debate was started on March 23, 1966.

I submit that the burden of proof is on the shoulders of the cabinet to prove that they were not endeavouring to have capital punishment removed before the executions could be carried out. Parliament declared itself in no uncertain terms on the matter, and as you know, Mr. Chairman, the cabinet kept on commuting death sentences and it looked as though they would have to commute the death sentences in this case, which might be a little touchy and a little risky. Lo and behold, the two trials to which I am referring but about which I cannot be specific, have slowly dragged along in the courts.

On October 19 first reading was given to this bill. As regards the appeal court, the fate of the people who were already under sentence of death is not yet known. If this bill introduced on October 19, should become law, capital punishment would be eliminated and these separatists would be incarcerated in prison for eight years, ten months and one day instead of having the death sentence exacted upon them.

I point out that the penalty for treason in this country still stands at death. I do not know why, if a man shoots the Queen, he should be sentenced to death for treason, because in this country you may be able to shoot the Governor General and get only life imprisonment, but if you shoot policemen and prison guards you may be executed. However, if you shoot the Queen they can get you under another section, namely, treason.

I submit that the burden of proof is upon the cabinet to prove that they were not rushing this bill through a second time by introducing it on October 19, 1967, when it received first reading, with second reading being given on November 9, in order to avoid imposing the death penalty on people who on October 19 were under sentence of death. I regret very much indeed that parliament is being placed in the position of being asked to pass Bill No. 168 so that a term of life imprisonment will be the most serious punishment that can be meted out to armed separatists who under oath, when giving evidence on their own behalf, stated that they were separatists.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the cabinet is evading responsibility for commuting to life imprisonment death sentences imposed prior to Otober 19, 1967, by asking parliament as a whole to pass Bill No. 168. The burden of proof is on their shoulders to show that they are not rushing this bill through to relieve themselves of the necessity—that is what they would consider it to be—of commuting the death sentence on these two men who are avowed separatists. I do not like the bill and I do not like the way it has been introduced.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I know the Solicitor General has been considering amendments to the bill. I have an amendment that I hope will simplify and clarify matters if the crown sees fit to accept it. It would save all the difficulties I have mentioned in trying to determine when the crown should bring the bill into force.

I believe it is the intention of the crown that this amendment to the act should take effect immediately in respect of all those now undergoing trial and those whose trials are about to commence. If I am right in this supposition, the amendment is fairly simple. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Charlevoix:

That clause 3 be amended by adding after the word "before" in line 4 of subclause 1, the words "or after", by deleting all the words after the word "act" in line 5 of subclause 1 down to the end of the words "this act" in line 25 of subclause 2, and deleting all of subclause 3.

The clause as amended would then read:

3. (1) Where proceedings in respect of an offence that, under the provisions of the Criminal Code existing immediately prior to the coming into force of this act, was punishable by death were commenced before or after the coming into force of this act, the offence shall be dealt with, inquired into, tried and determined, and any punishment in respect of the offence shall be imposed, as if it had been committed after the coming into force of this act irrespective of when it was actually committed.

I submit that this covers the whole situation. If there is any doubt in anyone's mind with respect to trials which may now be in the process, we could add these words: "and irrespective of the state of any trial in process at the time of the coming into force of this act." In my view this would not be necessary. I think this amendment is in line with the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. I had not quite understood what he meant, but surely this is a less cumbersome procedure. It simply says that the provisions of this clause shall apply to all, no matter what is the stage of the proceedings or when they started. Once the act comes into force it applies to every matter that is before the courts and that is to come before the courts. I hope the Solicitor General and his officials will give some consideration to this very uncomplicated method of dealing with the clause.

The Deputy Chairman: For the information of the committee I might read the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

Mr. Pennell: Before you read the amendment, Mr. Chairman, I must say that the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona and the hon. member for Greenwood are attractive. Both hon. members, I am sure, will agree with me, however, that we can never foresee the skill of counsel, and looking forward I would say it is a rather difficult section to draft.

Mr. Knowles: The minister knows whereof he speaks.

Mr. Pennell: I was wondering, therefore, whether the committee would wish to continue with clause 4 and then deal with the remaining clause. If the committee rises at five o'clock I could take these amendments under advisement and if the matter is called tomorrow I will then be in a position to give my views on the proposed amendments.

Mr. Cowan: May I ask a question with regard to clause 3? Can the Solicitor General tell us what other new trials have been ordered, besides Schirm and Guenette, in the whole of Canada at this time?

Mr. Pennell: I am not aware of any other convictions that have been set aside and new trials ordered. I was tempted to say there is the case of one Booth where a new trial was granted. He was convicted again in the lower court and that matter is now under appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. I am not aware of any other case.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, since I am not allowed to mention names of particular cases, might I be allowed to say that I submit the burden of proof is on the cabinet to show that clause 3 (1) (b) was not inserted for the specific benefit of the only new trial so far ordered in all of Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed by the members of the committee that the proposed amendment be stood and also that clause 3 be stood?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

• (4:40 p.m.)

On clause 4—Duration and Expiration of act.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, the Solicitor General will not be surprised if I say we are not exactly happy with clause 4. I realize, and I say this quite openly, that what the Solicitor General has brought before parliament is a compromise bill. He has done so in the belief that such a compromise would command the support of the majority of the members of this house. We have already debated, and I will not reopen, our unhappiness with the other compromise, namely, the retention of capital punishment for those found guilty of certain crimes. But we are unhappy also about the way in which the provision for this trial period is drafted in clause 4. I do not want to lay down, in any hard and fast way, that we will not agree to a trial period rather than making the new law permanent. But I say to the committee that even if one accepts the idea of a trial period, I think we have a right to look at the wording that provides for that trial.

As I read the wording of clause 4, it seems to me that we are leaving the country in this position. If five years from now there sits here a parliament that does nothing about this issue,—my colleague from York South says perhaps by inadvertence—then this new act will expire and we will be back with the law on capital punishment which parliament, by a majority, has decided it does not approve. I point out even further that the way this provision is worded, even if five years from now a resolution to extend the provisions of this act were before parliament and the debate on it were stalled, then with the arrival of the day five years from the date this act is proclaimed we are back to the old law. I say to the Solicitor General that I will not ask him to go back on his undertaking that this will be for a trial period. However, I do think that what happens at the end of the trial period should be put in a different way.

One way to have it would be that the law continues unless there is a resolution asking for it to be discontinued. Another way to have it would be that if a motion is made to continue the law and that motion has not yet been resolved, the present act would continue until a decision had been made. Another possibility, of course, would be that a provision might be written into the act giving any ten members the right to put down a motion and require that it be debated. As I say, I should like the Solicitor General to look at this provision rather carefully. I know he has lived with this legislation for a long time, but it seems to me that it is loaded on the side of the old law, on the side of capital punishment coming back. The minister may say to me that the provision should make for equality as between our views and the views of those who disagree with us. But this is not equal. This is loaded, as I say, in favour of those who would like to see the old law come back. All that has to happen is that good men do nothing in 1972 or that the efforts of the so-called good men be frustrated by those who would prevent such a resolution from coming to a vote.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, this matter could be resolved by not having clause 4 in there at all, by allowing the bill to come into effect as though the measure were to be permanent. In that event parliament would still have the right five years from now to amend it by wiping it out. I feel the better way would be to provide that the measure continue in effect until parliament has actually taken a decision one way or the other. In fact, I press that consideration the strongest because it seems to me it is the way that is fair to both sides, to those who want the law changed and to those who do not want the law changed. I suggest that perhaps some words along this line might be added: provided, however, that if parliament has not dealt with any such resolution this act shall continue in force beyond that five year period until parliament has made a decision. I should like the Solicitor General to give his comments on this point.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Gladly.

Mr. Churchill: The suggested change, "unless parliament has dealt with it", means that a resolution would have to be brought forward by the government. You might have a government in 1972 as inactive as this government and the resolution might not even be called. It might appear on the order paper but it might not come up for consideration.

Mr. Knowles: These are points that we have to take into consideration. We have to have what the chairman ascribed to a Conservative member the other day, namely, clairvoyance. My colleague is pointing out to me that one answer might be that if parliament does not act at all it would be because no one wanted it.

Mr. Churchill: On the contrary, you can ask this government on many occasions to bring something forward but you get only promises, not action.

Mr. Knowles: This is the reason for one of the suggestions I had in mind. I found in the Bill of Rights the wording I have in my hand, and such a clause might be inserted in this bill. It could read something like this, and the language is taken from the Bill of Rights: A notice of motion in either house signed by ten members thereof made at any time after four years and six months from the date fixed for proclamation, pursuant to section 5, shall be debated in that house at the first opportunity within ten days after the motion is made. This is one way of making sure that if it comes before parliament, provided there were ten people who wanted it brought before parliament, it would be debated. Then I believe the other provision would have to be there as well, that in that event the expiry of this act five years from now would not take place until parliament had made a decision, either on the motion of the ten private members or on the government's motion.

Frankly, one of the reasons I am not offering any formal amendment is that I think this is the kind of thing that needs to be thought about by the minister, and about which there could be some consultation. It does seem to me we should protect ourselves against a do-nothing situation in 1972, particularly when that do-nothing situation could result in the positive act of reverting to full-scale capital punishment.

Mr. Pennell: I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that the drafting of the section as it now stands was deliberate. I looked at the British precedent and the Lord Chancellor proposed an amendment in terms not dissimilar from the one put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am sure he knows I have never concealed my views on the subject of capital punishment. It became very clear from the remarks of some hon. members who supported the bill on second reading that they only supported the bill because of the way in which this particular clause had been drafted. I am satisfied in my own mind that a similar reaction would take place if we followed the proposal of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. All I can say is that I believe the clause as drafted represents the greatest common denominator of views acceptable to the house at this time. As I say, the hon. member knows clearly what my views are on the subject of capital punishment.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, not only do I know the minister's views but he knows mine, and we think alike on this issue. However, I would ask him whether it is not a fact that the clause as now worded is unfair to the position taken by those of us who would like to see abolition continued. Is it not also a fact that if the wording I suggested were adopted it would not be unfair to the other side? If we provide that a decision has to be taken in 1972—and by that I mean a formal decision, not decision by default—then we are leaving it open to parliament in that year to make the decision. Under the present wording, in the event of there being a do-nothing situation we are making the decision one way now rather than letting it be made then.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say something about one of the suggestions offered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, namely, that a few words be added to make it clear that the provision contained in this bill will remain in effect until a decision is reached by the house on a resolution. Apart from any other consideration, it appeals to me that this would cover the event that parliament might be dissolved and not in existence five years from the date of proclamation. If this happened to be the case I think the minister would agree that the law as now drafted would lapse by default because there would be no mechanism for parliament or anybody else to take action on whether there should be any continuance of the law.

It strikes me that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would not concern the hon. members to whom the Solicitor General just referred, those who had made their position on second reading conditional upon there being a trial period. The amendment would simply mean that the law could not lapse by default. I think this is a point that should be considered in relation to the present wording of this clause.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, as one who has spoken as an abolitionist and would not be prepared to accept the bill if the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre were carried, I would have to argue that the amendment is out of order. Having listened to the debate and knowing the feelings of hon. members and why some of them changed their vote, I can only conclude that the decision to abolish capital punishment was based on there being a trial period which would automatically end after five years.

Any amendment which would in any way allow the trial period to continue by default or would allow the issue to be decided by others would be changing the sum and substance of the principle which we managed to get the majority of the house to support. Personally I would delete the clause, but I feel the minister is not in a position to do this. The amendment about which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is talking is unfair to those who voted to abolish capital punishment for a trial period of five years.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I say to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona that he does not need to raise a point of order because I have not moved the amendment or, indeed, any of my amendments. I have suggested wording that I hope the Solicitor General will consider. May I also say to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona that I agree with him that one of the reasons that this legislation is getting through parliament, as we hope it will, is that it is based on a five year trial period. I am not quarrelling with this.

My view of the matter is that if we cannot change the wording I may feel it necessary to vote against clause 4. However, I still feel there is a case to be made for wording the clause so that it would establish a trial basis in a way that is fair to both sides at the end of the five year trial period.

Since the Solicitor General has already agreed to take a look, whether or not he actually comes up with anything, at the suggestions that were made in connection with clause 3, perhaps he would be willing also to take a look overnight at clause 4. He does not need to accept my wording. Having listened to the arguments advanced and having considered the proposition he might come back with a suggestion tomorrow. I am not going to make life uncomfortable for him on this tomorrow, and I do not think I have done this in any case.

Since there are about 30 seconds before five o'clock and we will be going into private members' hour shortly, I wonder whether the Solicitor General would be willing to take clause 4 under review overnight in the same way that he is going to review clause 3.

Mr. Pennell: I am prepared to do this, Mr. Chairman, but I openly confess that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona has put the case for me. However, I will accede to the suggestion of the hon. member since we have now reached five o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mackasey: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, which clock are you looking at? There seems to be quite a difference between the two.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is an understanding that the first two private members' motions on the order paper today should stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that notice of motion No. 15 standing in the name of the hon. member for Springfield and motion No. 16 standing in the name of the hon. member for Spadina stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX

PROPOSED DEDUCTION OF RESIDENTIAL TAXES

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale) moved:

That in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate consideration to the feasibility of allowing residential taxes to be deductible from federal personal income tax.

• (5:00 p.m.)

He said: Mr. Speaker, at this time when Canadians are involved in a national debate on tax reform and the recommendations of the royal commission on taxation, at a time when the housing shortage and increasing taxes are reaching disturbing levels, I welcome this opportunity, on the eve of the special federal-provincial conference on housing and urban development, to debate my motion which has been on the order paper since May 9. My motion states:

That . . . the government should give immediate consideration to the feasibility of allowing residential taxes to be deductible from federal personal income tax.

The purpose of my motion is to bring once again to the attention of the government and especially to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) the great burden of the Canadian taxpayer, who is not only overtaxed, but in some cases doubly taxed.

Mr. McCleave: Hear, hear.

Mr. Haidasz: It is my opinion, and that opinion is shared by many citizens, that home owners and tenants in rooming houses and apartments deserve fairer consideration by the Minister of Finance in regard to municipal taxes. For these citizens the present taxation system involves a flagrant case of double taxation in that the federal personal income tax is a tax on municipal taxes as well as on income. The United States recognizes the inequity of this practice. Home owners in the United States are now permitted to deduct their municipal taxes from income for federal tax purposes. I also want the Minister of Finance to consider what is being done in the United States and the United Kingdom, whose mortgage interest on owner occupied homes is deductible with respect to personal income tax that is paid to the federal government.

During the past few years many representations have been made to the federal government and the royal commission on taxation, urging the government to adopt the tax practices of the United States and the United Kingdom. Repeatedly over the years the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, in its submissions to the government of Canada and to provincial governments, has recommended the deduction of municipal taxes from personal income tax in computing personal income, the deduction of home mortgage interest from personal income in computing taxable income, and the payment by all federal crown corporations of grants equivalent to property taxes that would otherwise be payable if the assessable properties of such crown corporations were owned privately.

In the present manoeuvring to give Canadians a new tax system it is obvious that there is growing concern that the problem of municipal taxes is not being given the attention it properly requires and deserves by federal and provincial ministers of finance. I believe it is imperative for the federal Minister of Finance, with his provincial counterparts, to study this serious matter more deeply and to give it more favourable consideration.

House and home stand at the centre of people's lives. Proper shelter means security. It also means independence and privacy. A decent home is also a good place for parents to bring up a family in a favourable environment. I believe that it is high time to insist that the social aspect of housing be among the determinants of economic policy instead of its unfortunate victim. In Canada the private, family home is essential to our traditional way of life. Private home ownership is considered an undeniable natural right. But in the present condition of our economy, ownership of a private home imposes a heavy financial burden on the ordinary Canadian citizen. After paying an average of $26,000 for a home plus mortgage payments in a city like Toronto and after paying all kinds of provincial and federal taxes, the citizen is additionally burdened with steadily increasing municipal taxes.

On reading a brief from the Toronto Real Estate Board dated February, 1967, which was sent to various levels of government, I learned that Canada's housing stock is now composed of 5,505,000 dwelling units, of which 3,495,000 or 64 per cent are owner occupied and 2,010,000 are rented. In metropolitan Toronto, where I represent the constituency of Parkdale, there are 555,000 dwelling units, of which 320,000 are owner occupied and 2,010,000 are rented. In metunits. On page 9 of this brief I also read that, in the opinion of the board, to encourage home improvements, the federal government should allow municipal tax payments and interest payments on home improvement loans in urban renewal areas and neighbourhood conservation areas to be deductible items in the calculation of personal income tax. To prevent home owners who improve their properties from being penalized, municipal governments should guarantee that assessments on rehabilitated dwellings will not increase for at least five years.

The Toronto Real Estate Board also revealed in the brief that the Ontario government "home ownership made easy plan", which is to assist many families to buy homes, will require an annual public subsidy of approximately $300 a year per unit. Also, there is no guarantee that the most deserving or needy families will be helped. Moreover, municipal governments have not been receiving the assistance they require from provincial governments to provide essential services to their residents. This complaint is directed mostly with respect to the requirements of education.

Canadian municipal governments find themselves forced to continually expand their public utility activities. Expenditures on education, transportation, health services, social welfare and police protection have increased steadily. Heavy municipal government expenditures in these areas are a great burden on property owners and apartment dwellers. Many Canadians are asking themselves, to what extent should they, through municipal taxation, continue to finance education and health and welfare services? The benefits of such municipal services are felt not only province-wide but throughout the nation. It is quite appropriate, therefore, for these expenditures to be financed by federal and provincial governments.

I think that provincial governments could save much money by cutting out unnecessary projects and the savings would help greatly to cover education costs. It will take wise management and courageous leadership on the part of governments to devise fiscal measures to rearrange tax responsibilities. That will involve continuous co-operation and consultation with all levels of government. Provincial governments must realize that our federation is co-operative. It is to be hoped that enough responsible people at all levels of government will get together often enough to bring about suitable fiscal adjustments. The revision of responsibilities in this area is an essential need in our country.

Experts tell us there are mainly five factors which are responsible for the housing shortage in Canada, namely, unstable mortgage financing conditions, insufficient serviced land, restrictive construction bylaws and conflicting building codes, and an inequitable tax base. It is the inequitable tax base that has forced municipal authorities to raise taxation and levy rates as a direct result of the burdens of financing education and other essential services.

I realize that in an effort to halt rising municipal taxes the soundness of our dollar and its protection from further inflation are important requirements. Inflation has eroded the security of many of our people who depend upon a fixed income. The heavy load placed upon most property taxpayers produces unhappy results. Old people with limited retirement incomes and small pensions are especially hurt. They denied themselves many things in earlier years in order to pay off mortgaged homes only to find themselves faced now with rising municipal taxes.

We have been told that older people would be better off in apartments, but they have no choice. They have to stay in their own homes. They also have to cope with problems of maintenance and they regularly face a rise in municipal taxes. When they try to make some improvements they are taxed again. Tenants in apartment houses face an increase in rent whenever municipal taxes rise. Also, as costs of maintenance soar tenants in apartment houses are forced to pay higher rents.

It is necessary to work out techniques that will give municipalities more revenues without steadily raising taxes on family dwellings. This is an objective which demands an all-out effort on the part of responsible ministers of the government. I realize that taxation should be on an equitable basis. I also understand the concern of the Royal Commission on Taxation when it states that it is difficult to devise a system of credits for property taxes against personal income tax liabilities which would be equitable as between those who own their homes and those who rent from others. However, despite the difficulties which present themselves, a serious effort should be made to find out what portion of municipal taxes and rent payments can be considered for relief from federal personal income tax. The federal government has been able to give numerous tax credits to businessmen, industry and corporations, and also hands out various kinds of subsidies. I now ask for fair tax treatment for the unfortunate Canadian workers and heads of families.

As I have stated previously, the present system appears to be a flagrant case of double taxation in that the federal personal income tax is a tax on municipal taxes as well as on income. Furthermore, it was possible for the governments of the United States and the United Kingdom to recognize the inequity of this type of taxation. That is why home owners in the United States are permitted to deduct municipal taxes from income for federal taxation purposes.

I strongly urge the Minister of Finance and his advisors to give favourable attention to these views and facts and come to the aid of the overburdened taxpayers in owner-occupied homes, boarding houses and apartments who are adversely affected by rising municipal taxes. I also appeal to all hon. members to support this motion.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the remarks I wish to make on the motion before us will be brief. I think the motion is in one sense too narrow to be supported. In another sense it is too vague and too discriminatory to be supported.

It is narrow because it extends an opportunity for relief from the full weight of personal income tax only to one group of people in our society. As hon. members know, there are others in our society who are denied the opportunity to make deductions when computing their personal income tax in respect of expenditures which they are bound to make in order to earn a living. If the motion had been broad enough in its terms to include, for example, the opportunity for a working man or woman to deduct the cost incurred in buying special protective clothing, articles which are often required by provincial law to be worn for safety purposes, it might be more acceptable. Workmen's compensation board regulations, certainly in British Columbia and no doubt in other provinces, require that individual workers in certain occupations must wear hard hats.

We think such expenses as these should be covered by the hon. member's motion since the workers concerned are now required by law to purchase a particular item before they can go about the business of earning a living. I have used hard hats as one example but one could extend the list almost indefinitely. Loggers, construction workers and others are obliged to wear special types of clothing. I wish to include in this list also those workmen who have to buy tools, equipment and so on which are necessary to them in the earning of their livelihood. Had the motion made provision for these things it might have been more acceptable.

I turn now to the discriminatory feature of this motion. What is the position of two groups in particular, tenants who rent living premises in the urban areas and those who pay board and lodging, including employees working for mining and logging companies in cases where it is necessary for them to go out of town to work? In neither of these instances does the motion as I read it recognize that endorsement of what is proposed by the hon. member for Parkdale would amount to discrimination, that it would be unfair to the man who has to earn a living in a construction camp or a logging camp.

Mr. Haidasz: I did mention in my speech that apartment dwellers and dwellers in boarding houses should also be allowed to deduct that part of the rent which represents the payment of municipal taxes.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I did not take my seat because I did not want you to be put in the awkward position of having recognized two members at once. I did not think the hon. member was rising to ask a question. What the hon. member said in his speech and what is contained in the motion are two entirely different things. If the hon. member had this sort of conception he should have put it in the motion. The motion has been on the order paper since May 9, 1967, and it reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the feasibility of allowing residential taxes to be deductible from federal personal income tax.

If the thought was in the mind of the hon. member that tenants should be able to deduct that portion of the rent they pay which would reflect their proportionate share of the residential taxes, the motion should have said so. What I am saying is that the motion is too narrow in that sense, and all that the hon. member did in his introductory remarks was to add something to his own motion that is not contained in it.

I also said that something else should have been contained in the motion. The hon. member and I are on the same ground. Neither of us agrees with the motion that he has put forward and which he himself has found deficient. If he did not find it deficient, why did he make all these additions and speak on something that was not included in the motion?

I submit that the hon. gentleman either drafted his motion poorly and made it too narrow or, once having drafted it and got it on the order paper, realized it was too narrow and thought he had better enlarge on it in his introductory remarks. I would gladly, if the hon. member desired, try to help him out of his difficulty by drafting an appropriate amendment to the motion, but I do not think we have time now for that. It is not my function to assist him in making his motion more acceptable. I think he is going to be stuck with the motion he introduced and which he now realizes is one he should not have introduced or that he should have drafted it in a different way.

The hon. gentleman has substantiated my view that the motion is too narrow and discriminatory because it does not fully take into account the position of others in our society. Therefore the motion should not be accepted by the house, and when it comes to voting on it I hope the mover and I will be voting the same way. I shall be voting against it.

Mr. Haidasz: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say that in the words "residential taxes" I imply taxes paid by all residents, including the residents of private homes, rooming houses and apartment houses, as I stated in my speech.

Mr. Howard: On another question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. gentlemen is a parliamentary secretary and I wish to say his ability at draftsmanship will not get him into the cabinet if this is an example of it.

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what was said by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) who spoke before me, I am pleased to support the objective of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz).

The purpose of this notice of motion is to help not only the people who wish to own a house but also those who have already made the necessary sacrifices and personal efforts in order to buy or build a house.

This resolution involves a change in the Income Tax Act. I think this motion will give satisfaction to those who are endeavouring to improve the present system, because if we analyse the situation somewhat, we find that the present taxation system, as pointed out by the hon. member, has greatly contributed to the increased cost of living.

That increase in the cost of living has created real problems for our school and municipal organizations, because all the services we receive from those intermediate bodies become increasingly expensive. This unexpected increase in essential services is reflected at the present time in the sale of many private properties.

When the government established taxation at the source, it was felt that, as a basic deduction, the amount of one thousand dollars represented the basic necessities, and although, that exemption is completely inadequate today, the government keeps it in force. Although the cost of living has doubled, the labourers, the Canadian workers are still required to pay according to schedules established about 20 years ago.

Therefore, in my opinion, it would be very appropriate to amend the Income Tax Act so that home owners might deduct from their taxable income any amount paid as property, municipal and school taxes for the houses in which they live. In so doing, the government could counter the slackening in the building industry at the present time by encouraging the Canadian people to invest their money in the purchase of a home, because the present situation has brought about a decrease of about 30 per cent in housing starts, for the whole country, as compared to 166,000 starts in 1965. Indeed, statistics show that Quebec experienced a decline of 11 per cent in 1967, compared with 1966.

Nevertheless, a sustained publicity drive has led Canadians to believe that present-day administrators are concerned with their fate. However, Mr. Speaker, we still remember that a $500 bonus used to be granted to those who had their homes built during the winter season.

That bonus has now been withdrawn while the money from the 11 per cent tax on building materials is still coming into the government's coffers.

This same government decided recently to grant an additional amount to reduce as much as possible the cost of rents in modest districts of Montreal. This is a most human decision which deserves commendation but we have poor districts in a rich country such as ours because our social legislation is not satisfactory.

I am in favour of assisting the poor, but I am even more in favour of a measure like the one introduced by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) and I am in favour of an amendment to enable private owners to live normally in decent districts.

Every human being dreams of home ownership and all men dream of becoming one day the owner of a home for their wife and children. In Canada, private ownership is closely related to the family and it is a natural right that all hon. members in this house are no doubt anxious to protect.

Inasmuch as the object of that motion is to lighten the financial burden carried by the Canadian citizen and to encourage him to become a home owner, a step that will not place on him an unbearable burden but will enable him to fulfill his aspirations, I hope the government will give it all possible consideration.

[English]

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on the motion now before the house which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the feasibility of allowing residential taxes to be deductible from federal personal income tax.

It is refreshing to listen to a supporter of the government urging members of all parties to support a motion calling for tax reductions. This is more encouraging than the statement forecast that we will no doubt listen to tomorrow night. I would much rather see action taken in the direction indicated by this resolution than in the direction we anticipate that the government will be moving tomorrow night. The fact that the resolution is not broad enough to lighten the burden of other categories should not discourage us from supporting it.

As I listened to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) it seemed to me that he referred to at least one or two proposals which have been discussed and supported on other occasions in the house by a great many members. Therefore, as I say, I do not think the fact that other categories are not included in the terms of this resolution should discourage us from supporting it.

We give our complete support to this motion because the proposal has been a plank in the platform of the Social Credit party for a long time. We have never retreated from this position. I hear someone saying "shame", indicating that we have retreated from support of this principle. I do not feel that way about it. I am very happy to associate myself with this measure at this time. I am sure all hon. members have paid lip service to the principle that home ownership is desirable and that everything possible should be done so that every Canadian citizen who desires to own and live in his own home may have the opportunity to do so. I say "lip service", Mr. Speaker, because the record of the government in this field is far from commendable in this regard.

We remember that after a great deal of talk about the desirability of home ownership a winter bonus plan was implemented whereby those who built homes in the winter season would receive a bonus. We were informed that the purpose was to take up the slack in unemployment but that it was not necessarily designed to assist in the home building and home ownership program. Nevertheless it was appreciated and I believe it did assist some people in proceeding with building plans and in owning their own homes. But then we found that the exemption from the 11 per cent sales tax was withdrawn. This more than offset any benefit that accrued from the other plan.

In recent times the government has announced increases in the mortgage rates under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. All these things have caused us to wonder whether the members of the government are really sincere in their statements that they want to encourage home ownership. As the situation now stands, those in the low income brackets, or even in the medium income brackets, find it almost impossible to proceed with their building plans and to build their own homes. I do not believe we are giving them very much encouragement because it seems that every measure introduced and every announcement made in this regard make it more difficult for them to proceed with such plans.

As I have said, we support the proposal that the government should give immediate consideration to the feasibility of allowing residential taxes to be deductible from federal personal income tax. We also support the idea that mortgage interest should also be included as an exemption. Under our present system a person pays in capital and interest an amount double the initial cost. Therefore, in considering this entire program and the desirability of home ownership, because of its social as well as its economic ramifications, I believe mortgage interest should be included as well even though the hon. member did not see fit to include it in his motion.

I should like to join with the hon. member for Parkdale in his impassioned plea that members of all parties support this resolution. I know he is sincere in presenting it and in making this plea to hon. members. I trust that no member on the government side will stand up and talk out the motion. I hope it will be permitted to come to a vote. Last night a measure was defeated which would have added to the burden of the taxpayers by increasing postage rates. This motion, if adopted, will help to decrease that burden. I hope that in this instance the member on the government side who has introduced this motion will have the support of the house and that it will be passed before six o'clock.

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I think all members of the house should commend the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) for giving us an opportunity to discuss the very important point covered by his motion. I believe it was rather unfair of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) to criticize the hon. member for Parkdale for the manner in which he has drafted his motion. I think a fair interpretation of the words in his motion could well lead one to the conclusion that it covers measures to assist people who rent residences, people who live in apartments, people who have to live in bunkhouses and so on and have to pay some form of rent for this accommodation. After all, the resolution says:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the feasibility of allowing residential taxes to be deductible from federal personal income tax.

Personally I feel, and I believe others will agree with me, that the phrase "residential taxes" can be very broadly interpreted. I for one certainly do not agree with the hon. member for Skeena when he attempts to suggest that the hon. member for Parkdale introduced in his speech a point which he did not include in the resolution in that he suggested that a form of deduction of property tax be made available to those who rent apartments. I feel that this interpretation could very fairly and easily be placed on the broad wording of the resolution.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member for Parkdale should be commended for giving the house an opportunity to discuss this very important concept. I think it is well known that the rules of the house permit private members to discuss proposals involving the tax law which would change the balance of ways and means only through the form of discussion of private members' resolutions. This may or may not be the best way to permit private members on their own accord to take part in discussions of this sort, but the fact of the matter is that the rules of the house at the present time limit us to the discussion of resolutions which, if they should carry, will have no direct effect in changing the income tax law.

Rather than suggesting the possibility of government members or members of any party allegedly talking out a measure of this sort, I think we should look upon the opportunity we have to discuss a resolution of the type presented to us by the hon. member for Parkdale as a valuable opportunity to place our views on the record of the House of Commons and therefore before the country on matters involving the raising and spending of tax moneys such as contained in the resolution before us today. This resolution reflects the very constructive attitude of the hon. member for Parkdale, an attitude which in turn reflects his own deep concern for the problems of people living in urban areas on limited incomes, and some of these people are in his own riding. Let me say a word at this time to indicate that I feel the hon. member for Parkdale, by his efforts as represented by this resolution and as parliamentary secretary, is carrying out a very constructive task as a member of parliament for his constituents and for the country. I commend him for these efforts.

In discussing this resolution there may be those who will try to bring our attention at this time or at a later date to the arguments against what I consider to be a very constructive proposal. We should recognize these arguments, which I personally do not accept, and analyse them to determine their weakness and to provide answers.

One such argument is contained in the report of the royal commission on taxation—the Carter commission. It in fact recommended against this type of tax change. If I may attempt to summarize the point of view put forward by that commission it might be expressed in these words, which are not mine in the sense of being my own argument. Persons who invest in homes enjoy a tax advantage over those who choose to put their savings into other forms of investments in that income derived in the form of interest or dividends is subject to income tax but the imputed rental value which accrues to the home owner does not need to be taken into income for tax purposes. Therefore the argument could continue that if the home owner were to vacate his house and rent it, the rental income which he would receive would be subject to tax. I am not using the exact words of the Carter commission report, but I think this reflects the argument it put forward.

This type of argument helps convince members of the house and the public generally that, with all due respect to the distinguished gentlemen who are appointed to royal commissions and do a lot of work and present reports, the reports should not be taken as tablets of stone handed down from on high, of such a nature that the House of Commons should simply rubberstamp them. We should instead look at them very carefully in an attempt to take from them what is best and, exercising our responsibility as elected representatives of the people, not accept those recommendations which do not seem to be completely sensible or in the best interests of the population of Canada.

Certainly no person with ordinary common sense would agree with the contention of the Carter commission that an individual could in any real sense get any benefit from income he does not receive. The Carter commission defines imputed income as being the benefit which accrues to an individual through his own use or consumption of an income generating asset. As I said, no matter how interesting such a concept might be in a theoretical sense, certainly if you are not getting income which you can spend or use to improve your living standard you are not getting any benefit from it. The Carter commission will have to go a long way to persuade most of the reasonable people in this country that they are getting a benefit from some type of imputed income in respect of which they are spared the opportunity of paying income tax, particularly having regard to a home which they own themselves and in which they live.

The Carter commission overlooked the basic point that the great majority of home owners do not purchase their homes for investment purposes but for the purpose of shelter. If a home or dwelling were purchased as an investment then one could possibly see its argument, but the fact of the matter is that obviously the overwhelming majority of people who own their own homes bought them to provide themselves with shelter. Their aim was to get an adequate roof over their heads. I do not think it is sensible at all to treat a home owned and occupied by an individual as a form of investment.

Another argument is made, and again I am not stating it as my argument, that if a person vacated his house he could rent it and get income from it on which he would have to pay taxes. Of course, if a person vacated his house he would have to go out and rent or buy another one and he would have to get the money to pay the rent or to purchase another house. In any event, as a practical matter a person occupying his own home would in very few cases have the means to permit him to go out and rent another home or buy another home while putting his original dwelling up for rent or sale as a commercial matter. This is simply not a realistic possibility at all.

As the hon. member for Parkdale put it so well, and other members also, I think home ownership is something that should be encouraged. A person who owns his own home obviously has an interest in and a concern for it which does not exist in the same way on the part of an individual renting an apartment or a dwelling of another sort. The decision to rent or buy is a personal and optional one, and it therefore cannot be said that people who decide to rent, having made a personal decision after taking into consideration the possibility that if the law is changed they cannot deduct their property taxes, are being treated in an unfair way or would be treated in an unfair way if they were not able to make a similar type of deduction. But in any event the hon. member for Parkdale has pointed out that his resolution implies the working out of a scheme that would afford similar benefits to someone renting an apartment or a house. Of course, we should remember that many people who own their own homes are people with limited incomes—people on fixed incomes and people who are retired. For these people the burden of residential taxes is very real. It falls on them much more heavily proportionately than on people who have other income besides their pensions and whose income may not change for years at a time. This certainly should be kept in mind.

So the argument of the Carter commission that the person who owns and occupies his own dwelling is getting some benefit because he does not have to pay income tax on an imputed income is one which the majority of the people of this country will find very hard to accept. Most people will take the common sense view that if they are not getting the income and are not deliberately forgoing it, it is certainly not a benefit. The fact that they are not being asked to pay income tax on income they do not get is nothing for which the royal commission or the government can take credit. This is an interesting argument in the form of a sort of verbal sleight of hand but, as I said, it is one which I think the population of this country will find very hard to accept.

Another argument that may very well be raised against the proposal of the hon. member for Parkdale is that those people who are more affluent and have larger incomes and larger homes will get a greater benefit because if a person has a larger home, one with 20 rooms or more, he will pay larger property taxes and thus get a greater benefit than someone who has a more modest cottage elsewhere. In my opinion there is a very simple answer to this argument, namely, to place a maximum on the amount of property tax that can be deducted for income tax purposes.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Winch: That is not in the resolution.

Mr. Gray: It may not be in the resolution but the resolution is before us for the purpose of discussion in order to help clarify what should be added to it and developed from it. This is the very reason we have this House of Commons, to exchange views of this sort. I do not criticize the hon. member of the New Democratic party who made that interjection. It will go on the record.

Mr. Winch: I am in favour of what you suggest.

Mr. Gray: Thank you. This proves my point, Mr. Speaker, that this type of discussion here is very constructive and will put suggestions before those charged with the responsibility of formulating tax policy in a way that otherwise could not be done. We already have something like this in our income tax law. If I am not mistaken there is an upper limit on the amount that can be deducted with respect to donations for charitable purposes. I think there is also an upper limit on the amount that can be deducted with respect to money paid out for medical expenses. Actually it is a percentage. But the point I am trying to make is that this principle exists already in our income tax law.

When we proceed to consider changes of the type contemplated by the hon. member for Parkdale the argument that will be raised against them by some—and it is not one being made by me—is that the more affluent and wealthy people will receive a proportionately greater benefit. This argument can be dealt with by placing a ceiling or upper limit on the amount of property tax that would be subject to deduction.

There is one argument that may be raised which may be somewhat more difficult to answer. There are those who may come forward and say that by accepting the suggestion of the hon. member for Parkdale a certain amount of tax revenue which we now receive will be lost. Of course, to carry out the programs of the government which the public desire, tax revenue is necessary. I think the answer to that argument is to review our tax system to see whether there are areas which are not bearing their fair share of taxes, and try to make up the difference from these sources. Obviously it would not be sufficient merely to bring in the change proposed by the hon. member for Parkdale. At the same time we do this we would have to take a look at our tax system generally and make sure that the revenue which would not be obtained as a result of the change which I think the hon. member is constructively proposing would be made up through some other source.

I think this is why the approach of the government in planning to present to us a white paper setting forth its views on the proposals of the Carter commission is very constructive. Rather than dealing with these things in a piecemeal manner—I make this comment not in a critical fashion at all with respect to the constructive suggestion of the hon. member for Parkdale—we will have a package brought before us and will be able to see the effect of any change on other areas of our tax policy.

I believe this is a very good way to go about it, especially since it is my understanding that the government's white paper will be referred to a committee of this house for study. In the course of that study we will hold public hearings and be able to hear not only from members of this house but also from people from the general public sector. Speaking personally, I hope this may be a precedent for an evolution in tax policy.

The United States goes about making budgets in a much more open fashion than we do. I am not saying I am completely familiar with their method. However, I think they bring down a budget document, or rather the president presents a budget message to congress and congress holds a lengthy series of public hearings. There is quite a public discussion before the laws are passed, and often many amendments are made. I do not think this method shakes to its roots the financial structure of that country.

It is my feeling, now that I have been here for several years, that whatever may be said for our present system of budget-making there is a lot to be said for moving forward and having a more open system than we have at the present time when making and changing tax laws. I hope the remarks already made in the house by the Minister of Finance with regard to handling the recommendations of the Carter commission may be an omen of further development in our parliamentary system with respect to budget-making.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I again want to commend the hon. member for Parkdale for his very constructive proposal. I think a proposal of this type would do a lot to remove the burden which I believe already falls too heavily on people who occupy their own homes, many of whom are on very limited incomes. Certainly there are needs for education, the building of roads and social welfare at the municipal level. These matters are very important. But I think the time has come to spread the method of payment of those needs over a much wider base than the municipal property tax. I therefore commend the hon. member for Parkdale once again for this most constructive proposal.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. J. G. Lind (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on the motion of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz). It reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the feasibility of allowing residential taxes to be deductible from federal personal income tax.

I would like to point out that the record of this government was very good last year. According to Southam Building Guide's indicator of future construction activity, housing contracts moved substantially upward from June to July.

Miss LaMarsh: Six o'clock.

Mr. Lind: Starts in July numbered 6,326, 27.6 per cent higher than 12 months ago. The statistics of the past few months, considerably higher than those of the corresponding months of 1966—

Miss LaMarsh: Six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Lind: Is it six o'clock?

Miss LaMarsh: It is by one clock.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, what is this? A Liberal caucus?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): The hon. member for Middlesex East has the floor.

Miss LaMarsh: It is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): The hon. member for Middlesex East has the floor.

Mr. Lind: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, the statistics of the past few months, which are considerably higher than those of the corresponding months of 1966, have brought the year-over-year cumulative gain for the first seven months to 25.8 per cent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the house leader? What will be the business tomorrow before we proceed with the message of the Minister of Finance in his budget?

Mr. MacEachen: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we will take the committee stage of Bill No. C-168, second reading of the Judges Act, second reading of the Government Employees Compensation Act, second reading of an act to establish a corporation for the administration of the national museums of Canada, committee stage of Bill No. C-151 with respect to C.N.R. financing, second reading of Bill No. S-19, an act respecting the boundary between the province of British Columbia and the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, and second reading of Bill No. S-18, an act to amend the Publication of Statutes Act.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell us now what the program will be on Friday?

Mr. MacEachen: If this program is completed tomorrow we will have a new menu for Friday, but if it is not completed I will invite hon. members to the same table.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister inform the house when he will table the report of the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism and will he be making a statement at that time?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I received the report from the commissioners yesterday. I announced this to the cabinet this morning and arranged for copies of the report to be circulated to the ministers, so we could have a look at it and exchange views on it at the beginning of the week. I hope to table the report next Tuesday and at that time to make a short statement.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN ABSTENTION IN VOTE ON ADMISSION OF CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs with reference to the vote in the United Nations last week. Why did the Canadian representatives abstain from voting on the motion to seat the Peoples' Republic of China instead of supporting that motion, as did the representatives of Great Britain and the Scandinavian countries?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My hon. friend has obviously been reading the Globe and Mail this morning in which the same point is made with the same lucidity and precision of my hon. friend's question.

The reason for the abstention was that in adopting the procedure followed last year, this seemed to us the wisest course to pursue in view of our policy, which is that mainland China should be admitted to the United Nations but that Formosa should not be expelled. A resolution was put forward by a number of countries calling for the seating of mainland China and the expulsion of Formosa. We could not agree to the expulsion of Formosa, but this resolution did meet part of our policy, namely that mainland China should be admitted. Because the resolution met part of our policy we therefore abstained. For this reason, and because it rejected another part of our policy, we ourselves did not put forward a resolution; because after canvassing the matter it was clear that a resolution in our terms would not gather much support.

So for the reasons I gave last year and which I reiterated in this house only last week, we followed the course pursued last year. It must be clear that we took the position that mainland China should be admitted to the United Nations.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the government of Canada professes to be in favour of seating mainland China and retaining the seat of Taiwan in the assembly, may I ask why the Canadian representatives did not move this proposition as an amendment to the motion?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have just explained that after canvassing the situation we were convinced that to move such a resolution in the form of an amendment would not gather any support. That, as my hon. friend knows from his experience at the United Nations, is not a wise course to follow.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): In the light of the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs today, as well as those made on many previous occasions, when may we expect the Canadian government to give diplomatic recognition to the government of communist China?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As the Prime Minister explained some months ago, this is a matter involving an appreciation by Canada of the situation in China, among other circumstances. The hon. member will appreciate that events in mainland China during the last year do not fully meet the criteria of recognition by one régime of another. As to the future, that will depend, among other circumstances, on events.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): In the light of the other circumstances described by the minister does he not think diplomatic recognition might bring some stability to the government of mainland China?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is an argumentative question.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

INQUIRY AS TO SAFETY STANDARDS RESPECTING TIRES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alcide Simard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the hon. Minister of Industry?

Does the government intend to announce the enforcement of security standards in order to protect tires against blow-outs at high speeds?

Mr. Speaker: I would suggest to the hon. member that this question does not seem to be so very urgent and that it could easily be put on the order paper.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): In view of recent reports, could the Secretary of State for External Affairs advise the house whether a Greek-Turkish accord has been reached on the Cyprus issue, or whether satisfactory progress is being made toward that objective?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): There has been a definite improvement in the Cyprus situation. I think I can say the parties are approaching agreement in principle on the contentious and immediate issues. However, there are some details to be worked out. The representative of the United States has had several long discussions with the head of the government of Cyprus. There are further consultations under way. I hope that before too many hours will have expired we may receive further definite indication of progress toward a settlement in this matter.

EFFECT OF REPORTED RESIGNATION OF U.S. SECRETARY OF DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the resignation of Mr. McNamara as secretary of defence in the United States, and in view of the widespread concern as to the effect of this on the war in Viet Nam, could the minister inform the house whether the government has made even more urgent representations to Washington that this should not mean an escalation of the war in Viet Nam?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FAILURE TO OBSERVE SAINT ANDREW'S DAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): On behalf of the many members of this house of Scottish extraction and therefore, momentarily, a self appointed spokesman for one of the two great founding races of this country—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): —I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is his intention this session to introduce legislation which would eliminate the odious anomaly whereby the house sits on the feast day of the patron saint of one of these two great races, while on the festive day of the other we adjourn.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): We on this side of the house are paying a very special tribute to the patron saint of Scotland, Saint Andrew, by bringing down a budget today.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he is bringing down a supplementary budget on St. Andrew's day in the hope that some of the Scottish thrift and capability in financial affairs will brush off on the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as a fellow Scot I want to say it will give me great delight this evening to be able to display those virtues of thrift, of caution and of prudence that are so characteristic of people of my race.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO INCREASE INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTIVITY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Industry. In view of the figures made available by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics showing that there has been no increase whatever in industrial productivity in Canada during the past 12 months, would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to indicate to the house and the country what he and his department intend to do to overcome this serious situation?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated to the hon. member on a number of previous occasions, there are a great many programs of the Department of Industry, as well as of other departments, having as their principal objective the increase in productivity of the Canadian industrial machine. I think it would take much longer to elaborate all of them, involving a general review of government programs, than a statement on motions would permit.

Mr. Hees: As a supplementary question, would the minister take an appropriate opportunity in the near future to make information on these programs available—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hees: —because obviously they are not having the desired effect at the present time; and does he not think the time has arrived—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hees: —for him and his department, which costs $150 million to operate, to do something constructive?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF FEDERAL DISTRICT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Last night on the English network of the C.B.C., while he was being interviewed—and I congratulate him on his answers to the questions, since he spoke as a true Canadian—the Prime Minister said he favoured the creation of a federal district. Is the government now taking measures to meet the authorities concerned so as to implement this project of a federal district?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are discussing the matter with the two provinces that would be concerned, and we would also have to discuss it with the municipalities that would be involved.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, will this matter be referred in any way for discussion by a committee of the house?

Mr. Pearson: I would think that would be appropriate at the right time, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that a part of Hull will be included in this federal district, does the Prime Minister intend to consult the provincial authorities on the establishment of this national capital district?

[English]

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I have just said that, Mr. Speaker. That would be essential.

EMERGENCY MEASURES ORGANIZATION

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE ABOLITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry. Would he kindly advise the house whether consideration has been given, or is being given at the present time, to the complete abolition of the emergency measures organization, and any financial assistance to the provinces involved in this type of program?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the position and functions of the emergency measures organization are currently under review. I think it would be wrong, certainly at this juncture, to contemplate the complete abolition of those functions. I think we will always have to carry on with contingency planning against emergencies.

Mr. Lambert: As a supplementary question, would the minister advise whether any reduction contemplated in this organization and its programs is for budgetary reasons?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, if there is to be any reduction in the functions of this organization it will be because they have a lower priority than some other rather more urgent projects.

CONSIDERATION OF RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT MONTREAL MEETING

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

VANCOUVER—EMPLOYMENT OF POSTAL TRUCK DRIVERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Has the minister received urgent representations from postal truck drivers in Vancouver who have been denied employment because they do not live in the Vancouver postal area, even though they have been discharging these duties for years? If so, what steps are being taken to correct this injustice?

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest to the hon. member that the urgency of the matter is not readily apparent.

Mr. Deachman: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Lambert.]

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

FURTHER LEGAL OPINIONS AS TO OFF-SHORE MINERAL RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put this question to the Prime Minister. On November 8, with reference to the Supreme Court of Canada decision on off-shore rights, I asked the Prime Minister if he would advise the house whether it is the intention of the government to seek further opinions from the court with reference to off-shore rights as they affect other provinces. The Prime Minister said the matter was under study and that he would be reporting to the house in due course. Is he ready now to make this report?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Not at the moment, Mr. Speaker, but I hope to do so early next week.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF RESOLUTIONS OF OUTLOOK CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address this question to the Minister of Agriculture. I apologize for not giving him written notice, but I did communicate orally with his parliamentary secretary. In view of the interest on the part of all parties in this house in the problems of the farmers and rural dwellers, would the minister consider referring the subjects discussed at the annual federal-provincial outlook conference to the standing committee on agriculture, forestry and rural development.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the outlook conference in its make-up is a dominion-provincial conference. I do not know whether it would be appropriate for me to submit their findings under this format to the committee. Their report, however, is a public document and, since it is a public document, I feel very certain the committee would have every freedom to study its content if it so wished.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question relates to the question the minister was asked with regard to the agriculture committee. A few days ago I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether we could have referred to the committee the report of the Economic Council of Canada on ARDA, P.F.R.A. and M.M.R.A. and their effectiveness. Can the minister now report to the house whether he will have that report referred to the committee?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I am not certain whether the agriculture committee would be the proper forum to which the report of these good ladies should be referred, but certainly I shall be glad to take it up with the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development and give the hon. gentleman's suggestion every consideration.

SUGAR BEETS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUPPORT PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) inquired about the subsidy to be paid to Canadian producers of sugar-beets for the 1966 crop.

The Agricultural Stabilization Board has decided to set the total amount to be paid at $4.83 per standard ton, including interim instalments paid the producers at the beginning of the year. Cheques will be mailed to eligible producers as soon as the final data have been received from the processors who have been advised of the amount to be paid. The cheques should be ready for mailing before mid-December, provided the processors do not delay in sending us the necessary information. As announced on April 7, 1966, the support price for the 1966 sugar-beet crop will be $14.35 per standard ton.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO SIGNING OF INTERNATIONAL GRAINS AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. D. McLelland (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to direct this question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but in his absence possibly the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance may have the information. This being November 30, the last day the international grains arrangement will be left open in Washington for the signatures of the various countries mentioned on page 43, article VI of the convention, could the Prime Minister inform the house whether all nations involved have signed the convention and whether it will be accepted to go into effect July 1, 1968.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I shall be glad to check into that and answer the question tomorrow. I understand that my colleague has an answer.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I might answer immediately, Mr. Speaker. All signatories to the Kennedy round agreement on grains have signed both conventions of the international grains arrangement or have indicated their intention to do so before the deadline of November 30.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—FURTHER LAY-OFFS OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of fears of further lay-offs by the railways which have shaken Moncton and the Atlantic provinces, will the Prime Minister see that a top level meeting is convened immediately between the government and the railways to determine where this whole thing stops and starts in so far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned; and will he make a report to parliament in this regard?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to discuss this matter with the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Transport immediately.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

POSSIBLE DISCONTINUANCE OF INTERNATIONAL SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I did not give him notice as this matter came to my attention just a few moments ago, but I believe it falls within his administrative responsibility. Is the government of Canada giving consideration to cutting out the international services of the C.B.C.? If so, in light of the fact that this service constitutes the voice of Canada to the outside world, will the government think again before taking this step?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of this question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Later:]

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the hon. lady on the treasury benches. I wonder whether she could advise the house, or at least allay the fears that have arisen in the last day or two, about a possible cut-back in the C.B.C. international service as a result of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question was asked earlier this afternoon.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): In any event, Mr. Speaker, I think I would obtain a copy of the text of the Prime international service is a matter for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, not my department.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INCLUSION OF HOSPITAL EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring this question to the attention of the Minister of Labour. Can the minister say whether a decision has been made in respect of the recommendations of the Gill committee for the inclusion of hospital employees under unemployment insurance?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to implement any of the recommendations of the Gill committee in order to provide coverage for hospital employees. It is now open to hospitals to apply to the commission for coverage. Employees in several hospitals are covered.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

I understand that the text of the Prime Minister's remarks has been circulated. Is the minister now in a position to make available the transcript of the press conference?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will.

MONTREAL—RECOMMENDATIONS OF PICARD REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour. Could he tell the house whether it is his intention to adhere to the recommendations of arbitrator Picard concerning the port of Montreal?

[English]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): The answer is very simple, Mr. Speaker. Parliament has already accepted the changes proposed in the report.

[Later:]

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday afternoon the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke inquired as to conditions on the docks in Montreal. I was able to give an interim report only at that time. I have since gone into the facts and find that the longshoremen have returned to work. There were some 60 gangs out yesterday, approximately the same number or more than on the day before. Work is progressing at an encouraging level as compared with the work level that existed at the time the Picard report was handed down.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

EXPRESSION OF APPRECIATION OF WORK OF PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the obviously great contribution to the strengthening of confederation made by the confederation of tomorrow conference held in Toronto, would the Prime Minister consider it appropriate to send a telegram of appreciation to the prime minister of Ontario?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already telephoned, at lunchtime, the chairman of the conference to congratulate him on the work of the conference.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister tell us whether he might take a leaf out of the book of the proceedings of the confederation of tomorrow conference and hold the federal-provincial conference on the bill of rights, which

I believe is planned for January, partly in public so the public may get a view of the important issues involved?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, these of course are matters which will be decided by the conference. I appreciate the point made by my hon. friend.

Mr. Brewin: May I ask the Prime Minister also to consider the procedure of the confederation of tomorrow conference whereby members of opposition parties were invited to attend as observers.

Mr. Pearson: They were invited, no doubt, because the conference was held in public.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): When sending his wire of congratulation to Premier Robarts regarding the results of the conference just concluded in Toronto, will the Prime Minister also congratulate him on his great initiative and statesmanship in calling the conference in the first place?

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In discussing the arrangements for this conference with the provincial premiers, would the Prime Minister also take up the possibility of the idea of all members of this house being permitted to attend?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, provided we could get a room large enough.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister?

Since he called up the chairman of the Toronto conference to congratulate him, can he tell us if he got in touch also with the chairman of the Estates General?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASES IN PENSIONS AND DISABILITY ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Has a decision yet been reached on the request for further interim increases in disability pensions and war veterans allowances pending the tabling of the commission and committee reports?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): No decision has yet been reached, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister say whether progress has been made?

Mr. Teillet: I can assure the hon. member that I am making progress.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, because there has been a delay, my question becomes a supplementary question to those put by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge).

As a matter of fact I wanted to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs if he can assure the house that he used fully his power of persuasion so that tonight's budget will include a major increase in the pensions and allowances paid to veterans.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ARREST OF MEMBERS OF CRIME SYNDICATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that members of a criminal syndicate gang have been arrested in Montreal, Calgary and Vancouver, and this appears to be the first breakthrough in combating organized crime in Canada, would the Minister of Justice be prepared to make a statement on this matter? I did not have a chance to give him notice because this matter was brought to my attention when I came into the house. Perhaps the minister would make a statement tomorrow.

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): I am not aware of the facts, Mr. Speaker, and I will look into them before reporting.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister would check at the same time into why the R.C.M.P. will not give any information to the news media with reference to this organized criminal syndicate.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, questions on the R.C.M.P. should be addressed to the Solicitor General.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Woolliams: Then may I put the question to the Solicitor General.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has already put the question.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, but the Minister of Justice referred it to his friend the Solicitor General. I wonder whether the Solicitor General would answer that question.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the hon. member that the R.C.M.P. have been very active in this particular investigation, and if they did not make their activities public, it was in the public interest not to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs whom I would like to assist, as is my custom.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Would he inform the house concerning the world problems that he intended to discuss this morning at the external affairs committee, which had to adjourn because the Liberal members failed to attend?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PUBLIC SERVICE

COMMITTEE REPORT ON PENSIONS OF RETIRED CIVIL SERVANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question either to the Prime Minister or to the President of the Treasury Board. Has the government yet made its decision to increase the pensions of retired civil servants, as recommended by the joint committee on May 8?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Is it not appropriate to get an answer to that question, Mr. Speaker?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The answer is the same as the one given last time; it is under consideration.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

INQUIRY AS TO TENDERS FOR DESTROYER ESCORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the junior member for Halifax asked me about the tenders for the new destroyer escorts. The tenders for these vessels were originally called for September 18, 1967. FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO U.K. SUPPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? Could the minister advise us of the direct or indirect share of Canada in the loans granted to Great Britain lately?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that question was put to me the other day, but I believe it is worth while clarifying the position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: No fresh obligation is laid upon the government of Canada to raise any money either by taxing or by borrowing for the purpose of giving support through the International Monetary Fund or through the Bank of Canada to the pound sterling. Exactly the same sort of transaction took place in 1962 when the International Monetary Fund and central banks around the world came to the support of the Canadian dollar. At that time no resources had to be put out to support the Canadian dollar. I do not expect that any resources of Canada will be needed to support the pound sterling. It has been represented, I believe, that somehow or other in my budget this evening I am going to be raising money for this purpose. I would like to deny that quite categorically.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question?

Could the Minister of Finance tell the house whether the alleged funds which the member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) obtained lately in Europe under false pretences will be taxable after the budget this evening?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question related to the question I have already asked.

Can the Minister of Finance tell us whether Canadian currency will be needed precisely to guarantee, through the International Monetary Fund, the loans granted to England lately?

An hon. Member: They are not loans.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: The transaction is as I explained it, and I hope my hon. friend will understand and spread my explanation throughout the province of Quebec. I would like to add just this, that all the countries of the world who are members of the International Monetary Fund, including France, Germany, the United States and all the rest of the world, are standing behind the pound sterling as a means of promoting the international stability of the monetary system. I believe we should do this too. It will not require us to raise any fresh resources. We shall simply hold our reserves in one place rather than another.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon.—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Since this is a debate, I do not think that the hon. member can—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question to the hon. Minister of Finance.

Since the Minister of Finance and Receiver General denies that Canadian resources are needed for those loans to England, then could he tell us what is Canada's role?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call the hon. member to order. This is a debate, since he is asking a third or fourth supplementary question, and the question is out of order.

Mr. Grégoire: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

RURAL DEVELOPMENT

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO SIGNING OF ARDA AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development. Can the minister advise the house on when he believes it will be possible to sign the agreement under the ARDA program with the province of Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the beginning of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Keays: Would the hon. minister tell the house when he expects to sign the agreement with the province of Quebec under ARDA?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, the agreement between the province of Quebec and the federal government was signed in January or February of 1965. Negotiations between the two governments will soon begin as to an agreement concerning the development of the lower St. Lawrence territory and the Gaspé peninsula.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Could the hon. minister tell the house whether his department as well as that of the province of Quebec have made plans so as to conduct similar studies in other counties or areas of the province of Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a very general question and the hon. member could easily place it on the order paper.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEATH SENTENCE AND LIFE IMPRISONMENT

The house resumed from Wednesday, November 29, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-168, to amend the Criminal Code.—Mr. Pennell—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: When the house rose yesterday, the committee had stood the amendment to clause 3 as indicated in Hansard on page 4858 for Wednesday, November 29, and clause 4 of the bill was under consideration.

Amendment Respecting Death Sentence

[English]

On clause 3—Transitional.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, when the debate on this bill was adjourned at five o'clock yesterday afternoon I advised the house that I would take under consideration certain amendments which had been proposed to clause 3. I wish to advise the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, who proposed an amendment, and also the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre and Greenwood, that I did not lightly dismiss their suggestions. I wish too advise the house that together with my officials and the officials of the Department of Justice I gave lengthy consideration to these amendments. I also discussed with a senior official of the department of the attorney general for the province of Ontario the practical problems raised by the amendments. I understand that the same transitional provisions which are incorporated in clause 3 were used in 1961 when the house faced the same problem.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. May I ask hon. members to refrain from conversations or, if they have to converse, to do so in a lower voice.

Mr. Pennell: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The house faced the same problem at that time as we are facing today, and I wish to say sincerely and respectfully that I propose to follow the precedent set by the hon. member for Kamloops. It is a precedent which has been tried and proven. At the same time I recognize the possibility of some difficulties that were raised by hon. members. However, since I have such an excellent precedent before me I propose to follow it, and I respectfully ask the house to accept the clause as drafted.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be permitted to say that while I appreciate the tribute paid to me by the Solicitor General and through me to the draftsmen of that day, I am quite sure that if the provision should not work this time and if difficulties should arise the minister will accept the fact that it is because of his administration and not because of the drafting.

Mr. Pennell: I accept what the hon. member for Kamloops has stated. If there is any praise to be handed out it should go to the officials, and if there is any blame I will accept it as the responsible minister.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the courtesy of the minister in seeing me earlier about this amendment. I recognize the difficulties which may arise in connection with it, and if the committee will give me permission I should like to state that I have the consent of my colleagues to withdraw the amendment I moved last night.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed by the committee that the amendment be dropped?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the Solicitor General a question arising out of the statement he made a moment ago. Following the adoption of this procedure in 1961 were there any cases where a person's crime was dealt with under the former law to his disadvantage in the light of the improvement made in 1961? I have in mind the fact that at that time murder was divided into capital murder and non-capital murder. Were there any cases where the transitional provisions worked to the detriment of the accused?

Mr. Pennell: I am advised by my officials that they are not aware of any cases where the provisions worked to the detriment of the accused because of the transitional clause in the bill at the time. We propose to adopt the same procedure and to contact the attorneys general in the several provinces so that we can arrive at a date which we hope will avoid the necessity of any action being taken under clause 3(1)(a).

Mr. Knowles: In other words, as the Solicitor General said yesterday, it is his hope that from the day this law is passed its letter and its spirit will be adhered to in all cases now pending.

Mr. Pennell: That is my hope, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the Solicitor General for taking the trouble to look into this matter carefully, and I would like to say that now he has decided to make no change we will not persist in this matter. If trouble arises, as it may well do, let the blame be on his own head for following the precedent set by the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I understand that the amendment previously before the committee has now been withdrawn? If so, I should like to put another amendment before the committee having to do not so much with the working of the clause as it now stands but rather introducing a new provision.

I am quite sure that the amendment I intend to propose will be of interest to the hon. member for York-Humber and also to other members of the committee because it deals with the matter of compensation to innocent victims of a crime, a subject matter which I believe is one of the most urgent ones requiring consideration in connection with amendments to the Criminal Code. I think that this subject and consideration of the law of insanity as a defence to a criminal charge are two matters urgently requiring consideration and amendment.

Members of the committee will of course appreciate that it is not possible to compensate the victim of a murder, the dead man. But I do think that concern should be had for his family and any other persons dependent upon him. I believe it is only just and equitable that when a murderer has assets he should be required to compensate at least in part the family and dependants of his victim.

• (3:20 p.m.)

I have always said I did not believe in citing the deterrent argument in support of my stand for the maintenance of capital punishment. I put it on another base. On the other hand, I do not believe that the deterrent argument has ever been disproved. I just do not think it is capable of proof one way or the other. As far as a case may be made for saying that the penalty formerly provided had a deterrent effect, the penalty has now, of course, disappeared. But I do not put this amendment forward so much on the basis of its possible deterrent effect, I put it forward on the basis of justice and equity, on much the same basis as I rested my position with regard to the retention of capital punishment generally.

The amendment speaks for itself, Mr. Chairman, so accordingly I will read it and then ask you to put it to the committee. I move:

That clause 3 be amended by renumbering the present subsection (3) as subsection (4) and by inserting the following as subclause (3) thereof:

(3) When in any proceedings referred to in subsection (1) or (2) hereof, any person is convicted of the offence with which he is charged, the court shall, in addition to any other sentence imposed, and after first making inquiry as to the existence and material circumstances of any family or other dependants of the individual in respect of whose death such person has been convicted (hereinafter called the victim), and as to the existence and material circumstances of any family or other dependants of such convicted person and as to the material assets, if any, of such convicted person, make such order and award for the maintenance of the family or other dependants of the victim out of the assets of the convicted person as to the court shall seem just and equitable under the circumstances disclosed by such inquiry.

It will be appreciated by the committee, Mr. Chairman, that what I am suggesting in this amendment is this. At the time the court is passing sentence on a criminal convicted of a crime which, but for the passage of this bill, would have subjected him to capital punishment, and which will now subject him to a sentence of life imprisonment, this provision requires the court to make inquiries, first, into the question whether the victim, the murdered person, left any family or other dependants. If so, the court makes inquiry into their circumstances and material assets with a view to establishing whether they are in need of assistance with respect to their proper maintenance.

The second branch of the inquiry would be this: Does the murderer have any family or other dependants and, if so, what are their circumstances? In my view it would not be right or just or equitable to punish the family or dependants of the murderer for an act for which they were not responsible by depriving them of their assets if those assets are limited. The purpose of this branch of the inquiry, therefore, is to find out what are the circumstances and needs of the family of the convicted person.

The third branch of the inquiry is, of course, whether the convicted person has any assets in fact and, if so, what they amount to and whether there is enough over and above the needs of his own family to provide for the needs and maintenance of the family of the victim. Then after making those inquiries the court would be empowered to make such order and award for the maintenance of the family and other dependants of the victim out of the assets of the convicted person as to the court shall seem just and equitable under the circumstances disclosed by that inquiry.

There is room here for the court to exercise proper equity in dividing the assets, if they are sufficient to be capable of division, between the family of the murderer and the family of the victim, or if there are only enough to provide for the family of the murderer and the court does not think it equitable to deprive his children of the means of maintenance, under those circumstances the court will make such order as justice and equity indicate is appropriate.

Amendment Respecting Death Sentence

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the spirit of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kamloops and it is somewhat in keeping with section 628 of the Criminal Code which now makes provision for the making of an application for compensation for loss of or damage to property. However, the amendment as drafted leaves certain questions unanswered, such as how one determines whether or not a person is a dependant. The amendment does not set out whether it is to be a person aged 16 or under, and as presently drafted it would pose considerable administrative problems for a criminal court.

I can assure the committee that the matter is now under active consideration both by my department and the Department of Justice. Hon. members are also aware that several provinces have taken action in this field. I would therefore respectfully suggest that the matter be left for further action pending completion of the study of the officials in the Department of Justice and in my department. As I stated, the amendment would pose certain problems for the court. The court would have to refer to a definition section. We would also wish to consider compensation for victims of crimes other than murder.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, the members of the New Democratic party agree in spirit with the amendment set forth by the hon. member for Kamloops but like the Solicitor General we see many problems which would confront the court. During the emotional impact of a murder trial it would be very difficult to discuss questions of compensation for the victim of the crime. The Solicitor General is quite correct in saying that the provision should also extend to the victims of other criminal offences. The motion put forward last week by the hon. member for York-Humber which was referred to the standing committee on justice and legal affairs should, I suggest, be studied fully, because I think the proper procedure would be to set up a compensation board which would determine the compensation to be paid to the innocent victims of criminal offences.

I think the hon. member for Kamloops would agree that most murderers have a few assets. To determine what compensation is to be paid to victims an inquiry would have to be set up to examine the murderer's assets and decide whether paying compensation to the victim's family would deprive the murderer's family in any way and thereby place them in an awkward financial position. I think the state, rather than the murderer's family, should be responsible for compensation. I do not think the murderer's family ought to be penalized.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Broadview has brought to my attention a matter that the hon. member for York-Humber has before the house. I think it would be useful to the ministry to have the report of the committee on this point.

Mr. Fulton: I only wish to say, in reply to the point that has been raised, that I agree it would be desirable to deal with compensation to victims of crimes other than murder. I agree with that as a general statement. In this bill, nevertheless, we are dealing with murder only and on this clause it might be out of order to deal with compensation to victims of other types of crime. In any event, not having the assistance of the professional draftsmen who are available to the government it is difficult for me to draft such a comprehensive amendment. I do not think I am qualified to draft such an amendment. I think I was able to draft an amendment dealing with compensation to victims of the type of crime which is being dealt with in this bill, so I confined the amendment to compensation of victims of what would otherwise be capital murder.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair is in doubt about the relevancy of the amendment to clause 3. Since no one is willing to bring up a procedural point I think we might take the vote on the amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Chairman, just a word to say that the amendment would not mean much for the family and dependants of the victims of murderers.

I understand the intention of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) very well. He wants the criminal to pay compensation for the damage he has caused out of his own money or his property but, to my mind, if one examine the crimes that are committed and the environment in which the criminals live, I cannot see how a study by a judge at the time of sentencing could possibly enable him to find funds that might really help the survivors of someone killed by a criminal.

So, I support the idea of the member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) and I think that the opinion of the majority of members is that we should ask for special legislation providing compensation for the victims of various crimes and ask the government to be more definite. Now, most cases would be provided for and the result would be more objective.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

[English]

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Fulton) negatived: Yeas, 43; nays, 69.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. Churchill: I did not think we could pair with other members in committee.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, now that we are back on clause 3 of the bill I wish to make some further remarks along the tenor of those that I addressed to the house yesterday afternoon. First, I should like to ask a question of the Solicitor General. He made a statement, when opening discussion on the bill a few moments ago, in which he expressed the indebtedness of the present cabinet to a former minister for certain words that were used in a transitional provision in 1961, I believe. I noticed that when referring to clauses 3(1)(a) and (b) he said that the words are practically the same as those used previously. The Solicitor General should supply the house with an exact copy of the words used in the transitional provision of five of six years ago so that we could compare them with these paragraphs in clause 3 of the present bill. I noticed specifically that he used the words "practically the same". Why did he use the word "practically" if the words are not exactly the same?

I have already said that the burden of proof is on the shoulders of the cabinet to show that clauses 3(1)(a) and (b) were not specifically designed, when the bill was presented on October 19, 1967, to relieve the cabinet from what they might consider their duty in commuting the sentences of two revolutionaries who, when the bill was presented, were under sentence of death. In developing that thought yesterday I quoted extracts from the official reports of the trial in Montreal to show what type of people were under sentence of death at that moment. I cannot believe that the administration prior to this one was faced with any such situation as now exists in the Dominion of Canada when it was preparing its transitional clause five or six years ago.

I understand that if one is a lawyer one is supposed to say: "With all due respect to the Solicitor General". I bow to the usage of these words, but I still would like to see that transitional wording because the burden of proof is on the cabinet to show that these two clauses have not been inserted specifically so as to place on parliament as a whole the responsibility for abolishing the death sentence on two revolutionaries. If the original conviction had not been sustained on appeal and a new trial had been ordered, under clause 3(1)(b) those concerned would not be subject to the death penalty although the crime was committed as long ago as 1964.

I quoted from the official records of the courts with regard to these two men, Schirm and Guenette. Hon. members may recall that during the discussion of this bill yesterday I asked the Solicitor General the following question as reported on page 4858 of Hansard:

> Can the Solicitor General tell us what other new trials have been ordered, besides Schirm and Guenette, in the whole of Canada at this time?

The Solicitor General replied:

> I am not aware of any other convictions that have been set aside and new trials ordered.

The exchange continued:

> Mr. Cowan: Since I am not allowed to mention names of particular cases—

I was not allowed to do so, yesterday.

> —might I be allowed to say that I submit that the burden of proof is on the cabinet to show that clause 3(1)(b) was not inserted for the specific benefit of the only new trial so far ordered in all of Canada.

I showed yesterday that the murders were committed in August, 1964, and I read from a Montreal dispatch in the Toronto Star of August 31, 1964, and a Montreal dispatch in the Ottawa Journal of September 4, 1964, pointing out that these men were described by the police as revolutionaries, as having revolutionary tendencies, as separatists and members of the R.I.N. I should now like to draw the attention of the committee to a report which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of September 30, 1964. When the trial was in progress the Journal carried a report of the evidence given by two crown witnesses who described the activities of the new terrorist group—

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member for York-Humber, but may I refer him to standing order 59 (2) which says that speakers in committee must be strictly relevant to the clause under consideration. I would ask the hon. member's co-operation and invite him to refer strictly to clause 3 which is now before the committee.

Mr. Cowan: I drew the attention of the Chair yesterday to the fact that clause 3 (1) (b) refers directly to circumstances in which a new trial of a person for an offence punishable by death has been ordered. I am referring now to the only case, according to the Solicitor General, in which a new trial has been ordered. No trial is yet in process. I wish to comment on this new trial which the Solicitor General said yesterday is the only one affected by this clause.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I would ask him to comment on the clause and not on a particular trial. I think the hon. member's remarks should be relevant to the clause before us.

Mr. Cowan: I submit that the burden of proof is on the cabinet to prove that this clause was not put into the bill in order to cover specifically the cases of Schirm and Guenette, convicted revolutionaries who were sentenced to death, appealed to the Supreme Court of Quebec and are now waiting for a new trial and a new charge to be laid against them. I can surely refer to the courts of this land when we are discussing capital punishment Bill C-168, particularly when I am referring to the only case which is covered.

In the Ottawa Journal of September 30, 1964 there is a report of the evidence given by one Tardif who turned Queen's evidence and is now serving a life sentence in connection with those charges—

Mr. Brewin: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member appears to be referring to the evidence given in a particular case in which a new trial has been ordered and which is before the courts. I submit it is wrong and improper for him to refer directly or indirectly to this case. It might well be prejudicial to the administration of justice if this committee were to discuss a case pending before the courts.

[Mr. Cowan.]

Mr. Otto: On the point of order, I do not intend to advocate the position adopted by the hon. member for York-Humber. As you know, Mr. Chairman, he and I are on opposite sides of this question. But the point of order which has been raised is an important one. It seems to be covered by citation 149 of Beauchesne which states that an hon. member may not bring up any matter on which a judicial decision is pending. If the Chair were to interpret this rule as meaning that where a trial has been held and a judicial decision is pending no discussion in the house can be permitted, I would have no quarrel with that ruling.

In the particular case referred to by the hon. member for York-Humber, however, I understand that though a new trial has been ordered it has not yet commenced. There may have been an indictment, but that is all. If the ruling of the Chair is that the prohibition in Beauchesne extends to every procedure of litigation or criminal prosecution, we must decide whether it is to be limited to criminal prosecutions or interpreted as covering the whole gamut of civil proceedings as well. If Your Honour rules that it applies to all proceedings, then any subject which is a matter of litigation at any stage, even privately, becomes taboo in this house. If this is the case I cannot understand how this house can function. For example, it is obvious that where it is intended to abandon certain railway lines, any individual can sue the C.N.R.

Mr. Grafftey: The legal mind at its worst.

Mr. Otto: Yet if this rule were strictly applied the house would be prevented from discussing the subject. In his notes I believe Mr. Dawson refers to four examples, two of them in 1897 when, criminal cases being in process, a speaker was denied the right to bring up the subject. The other two cases were in 1927 and 1942. The first had been referred by the government itself to the Supreme Court of Canada. The second one was a judicial inquiry in 1942, also instituted by the government and it was ruled that that subject, in a very limited way, might be discussed.

• (3:50 p.m.)

But, Mr. Chairman, if you rule that any matter under court jurisdiction, or any matter that is under review by the courts resulting from the issuance of a writ, cannot be discussed then I suggest to you that the House of Commons is going to find it very difficult to function. I suggest that if you rule at all you should interpret the provision in a very strict sense, namely, that where a judicial decision is pending, where proceedings have been completed but a decision is pending, then an hon. member should be allowed to speak on the matter.

The Deputy Chairman: I thank the hon. member for York East for the submission he has put before the Chair. I certainly heard it with interest and I will read it with greater interest tomorrow, but I think the fundamental rule which should be applied at this time is the rule of relevancy. This was mentioned to the hon. member for York-Humber yesterday, and I would like him to adhere to the rule of relevancy during consideration of clause 3 now before the committee.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I have always considered the relationship of relevancy and I am considering it now. What is more relevant to clause 3(1)(b) of the present bill than a murder case in the city of Montreal, which the Solicitor General himself has said is the only one he is aware of where a new trial has been ordered? I wish to refer to that one new trial, which is the only one at the present time covered by clause 3(1)(b). That is what I was doing yesterday and that is what I am doing today. I wish to point out some of the legal background concerning that one new trial which the Solicitor General said yesterday was the only one covered by this clause. My argument is that the cabinet should prove to us—the burden of proof is on their shoulders, to use another phrase of the Solicitor General—that this clause was not put in the bill to take the fear of the death penalty away from the minds of these two men.

I have been endeavouring to read an extract from the Ottawa Journal of September 30, 1964, where a report appeared concerning one Tardif who had given evidence. As I said before, he is doing a life sentence now as the result of a conviction in connection with the same case. I read the following:

Tardif said he heard of the A.R.Q.—

The Armée Revolutionnaire du Québec.

—in mid-July. Its goal was to "liberate the country." The group decided to "requisition" arms from armouries or stores.

Tardif said he and Edmond Guenette, 20, and Francois Schirm, 32, met at a camp near St. Boniface 80 miles northeast of Montreal to "discuss what was going on in the province." Schirm was the chief, the rest were "soldiers."

The members of A.R.Q. contributed their own funds. Tardif said he spent $400.

Gilles Brunet, father of six children ... said that obtaining weapons was mentioned at two early A.R.Q. meetings and that Schirm was armed when he visited the remote camp. Brunet identified all the accused as being present at the camp on one of his trips.

Brunet said the camp's aim was to "form character" for persons planning separatist demonstrations in Montreal—

Previous witnesses testified to finding a large quantity of communist and separatist literature near the St. Boniface camp. One edition of Resistance—Independance ou Mort (Resistance—Independence or Death) was sub-titled 1837-196?—

L'Armée de Libération du Québec was smashed last spring following arms raids on armouries in Montreal and Shawinigan, Que.—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I have risen three or four times asking him to co-operate with the Chair and the committee. I ask him to please refer strictly to clause 3 and not refer to one trial in particular. I ask him to be relevant to the clause before the committee.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I submit that the burden of proof is on the cabinet to prove that this clause was not specifically worded to relieve them of their responsibility, as they would call it, of commuting any death sentence on these two men and instead placing the responsibility upon the whole parliament of Canada by bringing in this bill so soon after the definite vote in April, 1966.

As I said before, I place a great deal of importance on the word "practically" that the Solicitor General used a moment or so ago. It is only one word but it can mean a great deal. Yesterday I quoted a speech of the Prime Minister of this country in which he said that this parliament, the parliament now sitting in this chamber, would be given the opportunity of ruling once and for all on the question of the death penalty. In reading Hansard yesterday in the form in which it is before it goes to the printers, I noticed that the Hansard reporter had struck out the word "this". I put the word "this" back in because I had quoted the Prime Minister as saying "this parliament". As I say, one word can mean a great deal.

I have already asked that the Solicitor General show us the transitional provision that was introduced by the hon. member for Kamloops when he was minister of justice so that we can see where it differs from clause 3 in this bill. The Solicitor General says they are practically the same. I would like to see the specific differences. In addition, I submit that the burden of proof is on the cabinet to show that this bill was not rushed into this house in October, 1967, for one specific purpose.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make just two points. The first is that there are now 15 persons before various courts of appeal in Canada and it is possible that one or more of them may be granted a new trial, and of course it follows logically that we have to make provision for this contingency.

So far as clause 3(1)(b) is concerned, may I refer to the act passed in 1961 amending the Criminal Code in respect of capital murder, section 17(1)(c), and I ask the hon. member to look at the bill now before the committee and follow along as I read the transitional provisions in the bill of 1961. Section 17(1)(c) reads:

(c) where a new trial of a person for the offence has been ordered by the court of appeal or the Supreme Court of Canada and the new trial is commenced after the coming into force of this act, the new trial shall be commenced by the preferring of a new indictment before the court before which the accused is to be tried, and thereafter the offence shall be dealt with, inquired into, tried and determined, and any punishment in respect of the offence shall be imposed, as if it had been committed after the coming into force of this act.

I think it follows rather clearly that we have followed the same provisional clause that is in the 1961 act.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Arising out of the minister's remarks I would like to ask him one question. Of the 17 men who at the time of the second reading of this bill were under sentence of death, how many were under that sentence for murdering a policeman or prison guard?

Mr. Pennell: To the best of my knowledge, and this is confirmed by one of the officials beside me, none.

Mr. Cowan: May I ask the Solicitor General to read to us the section in the 1961 act corresponding to clause 3(1)(a). He has read the one referring to clause 3(1)(b). The present cabinet so frequently refer to the fact that they are using the very same words and the very same laws as the previous cabinet used that I often wonder why I was asked to stand for election in order to defeat the previous cabinet. I would like to have the corresponding words for clause 3(1)(a).

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, section 17(1)(a) as set out in the Criminal Code—Capital murder—reads as follows:

(a) subject to paragraph (b), the offence shall be dealt with, inquired into, tried and determined, and any punishment in respect of that offence shall be imposed, as if this act had not come into force;

[Mr. Cowan.]

I suggest that this follows very closely the wording in clause 3(1)(a) of Bill No. C-168.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Duration and expiration of act.

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Chairman, I should like to put a short question to the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell). At the end of clause 4, it is said that this act——shall then expire unless before the end of that period parliament, by joint resolution of both houses, directs that it shall continue in force.

I should like to know what the minister has in mind. Would it be a government resolution or a resolution by a private number or a member of the other place? I think it is rather important to know.

[English]

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I believe the resolution could be proposed by a private member or it could be a resolution introduced by a member of the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Chairman, has the minister anticipated in this case that it should be a bill proposed by the government, since the bill now under consideration is a government order, having been introduced by a government member, because it is customary—but not mandatory—that a bill be repealed by another legislation introduced by the government?

I wonder, therefore, whether the minister, under the provisions of this clause, intended that abolition be provided also in a government bill?

[English]

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, if this bill should pass, I think in the light of experience at the end of the proposed five year trial period the government would take the appropriate action. It could if it wished, I suppose, introduce a bill dealing with capital punishment. I do not see that this particular provision ties the hands of parliament five years hence.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the Solicitor General could give us the benefit of the consideration he gave overnight to suggestions that were made yesterday. I have in mind in particular the suggestion I made that clause 4 might be so worded as to make the situation equal five years from now between the two sides rather than being loaded one way as I think it is.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I hope that my very brief reply does not appear to indicate that I am being discourteous to the hon. member. I went so far as to look at the provision in the Bill of Rights, which contains a clause somewhat similar to the one suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. However, after considerable consideration I felt that perhaps I ought not to make any change or offer any amendment to the bill as it is now drafted. I wish to thank the hon. member. We had a conversation about this point after the house adjourned last night at which time I said I would give the matter further thought, but I am still of the same opinion.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the minister for his courtesy too. As he realizes, some of us are still of the opinion that it would be better to draft clause 4 in such a way as to make it completely equal in 1972 or, failing that, that clause 4 should not be there at all.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Solicitor General this question. Having regard to the indefinite life of this government, can he guarantee that there will be no more ameliorating amendments to the Criminal Code brought forward by this government?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the difficulty of bringing in amendments on this point but may I ask the minister whether he is satisfied that there is no way in which we can prevent in five years another full-scale debate on this subject?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I have always felt that parliament is master of its own procedures and rules. I shall not forecast what parliament may or may not do five years hence.

Clause 4 agreed to on division: Yeas, 58; nays, 16.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the clause carried.

On clause 5—Coming into force.

Mr. Enns: Mr. Chairman, may I ask what I believe is a very obvious question and one which I hope you will permit me to put. Clause 5 states that this act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation. Lest there be any suspicion that there might be any retroactive element in this clause I am sure the minister can state that the date to be fixed will follow the passage of the bill by this house rather than a retroactive date.

Mr. Pennell: I can give that assurance to the hon. member.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, can the minister give the assurance that proclamation will be effected as soon as possible after the bill has been passed?

Mr. Pennell: As I said earlier, we will confer with the attorneys general and it will be brought into effect as soon as it is practicable to do so.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported.

• (4:10 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Pennell moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have now reached the position that Bill C-168 has been given second reading and has been considered by the committee of the whole house, embodying approval in principle of the maintenance of capital punishment for those who deliberately murder policemen or guards. I have not advanced arguments in favour of retaining capital punishment as a deterrent, but as the government feels this feature should be retained in so far as policemen and guards are concerned it is my belief that the house should determine whether the death penalty for the crime of murder should also be exacted in respect of those who deliberately murder children. The instances may not be many but the disaster to a family is appalling. The Lindbergh case will come to mind. We must also consider the deliberate killer who by means of a bomb deliberately destroys an aircraft, some of whose passengers are likely to be children.

It is not my intention to debate this matter at length but I think the house should have the opportunity to express its opinion by a recorded vote. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Bower):

That Bill C-168 be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house with instructions that they have the power to amend section 1, subsection 2 thereof by the addition of a new paragraph with the words "any child under sixteen years of age".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif). All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Call in the members.

[And the members having been called in]

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to hon. members that the vote might be taken as in committee of the whole and that we start with the first row to my left.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the Minister of Fisheries. Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Ballard: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Verdun. If I had voted I would have voted in favour of the amendment.

Mr. Addison: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Speaker, I abstained from voting because I was paired with the hon. member for Northwest Territories.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Speaker, I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Thomas (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I was paired; otherwise, I would have supported the amendment.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move an amendment. My remarks will be brief and if there is no disposition on the part of the house to debate it we can immediately proceed to a vote.

There was discussion in the committee not only of the class of person just considered in the last vote but also of cases where women are murdered or people who go to the assistance of police officers are murdered and whether the murderers in such cases should be required to pay the supreme penalty. While attendance in the committee was large, I recall there was still only about two-thirds of the total membership present, and perhaps it is important that the house make a declaration on this point. I therefore move:

That Bill No. C-168 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house for the purpose of reconsidering the various categories of persons whose murder is considered to be capital murder, as set out in clause 1, subsection 2, of the said bill.

Mr. Speaker: I should bring to the attention of the house that there appears to be serious doubt as to the amendment from a procedural point of view. Perhaps hon. members have arguments for the guidance of the Chair, but I must say that this amendment appears to go beyond the terms of the bill, the principle of which has already been accepted. However, I will entertain arguments if hon. members have views to express on this very point.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the amendment does go beyond the bill. The bill sets out a principle which states that persons who murder certain categories of people shall be subject to the extreme penalty. All the amendment is asking the house to consider, as I understand it, is sending the bill back to the committee for reconsideration of the particular clause. It might well be that the clause would be reduced in scope rather than enlarged. I do not think it follows that the clause would be enlarged.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should bring to the attention of hon. members that throughout this debate both in committee and with the Speaker in the chair we have tried to be as lenient as possible in the consideration of procedural points. Perhaps it would be the disposition of the house, in spite of the reservations I have about the amendment, that the question should be put.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member has not heard me say that I have decided to accept the amendment submitted to the house.

[English]

Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Is there a disposition on the part of hon. members to call the vote now without ringing the bells?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

[Mr. Speaker.]

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, only two words before the vote on third reading, to say that this bill, which will likely be law in a few minutes, does not reflect the will of the Canadian people at all.

In fact, questionnaires have been sent and referendums held, not only in the province of Quebec, but throughout Canada. I even received letters from people in British Columbia and Alberta, who were opposed to abolition of the death penalty.

At Montreal Expo, where the question "Are you for or against the death penalty?" was put to the public—I understand that some people may have voted twice as we can see on election day in the old political parties—five million and a half said they were in favour of the death penalty while 19,000 only were for its abolition.

The other day, while in the hospital in Montreal, I heard on the radio programs on which the listeners were asked the question and invited to phone in their answer and I did not hear a single one call in and say: I am for the abolition of the death penalty. All, without exception, stated that the death penalty should be maintained in Canada and gave their reasons.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, before this vote is taken, I want to state very clearly that I am against the abolition of the death penalty, in order to respect the opinion of the Canadian people.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the main motion. Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house to adopt the said motion?

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house to take the vote without ringing the bells?

Mr. Webb: Mr. Speaker, I point out that in my opinion—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Webb: —those who voted against these amendments today have voted actually—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot reflect on a vote. Unfortunately, the question has already been put.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The question has been put and I suggest to hon. members that it may now be difficult to move points of order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a question or privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I draw to Your Honour's attention that the hon. member who spoke just before me was on his feet before Your Honour put the question.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): He was trying to make himself heard and he could not be heard.

Mr. Speaker: I regret I did not see the hon. member. In any event, I must bring to the attention of the hon. member who spoke previously that his remarks were out of order since he was attempting to reflect on a vote. That is against the rules of the house.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a further question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): —the hon. member could not express his opinion. Retentionists on the back benches claim they saw him trying to catch Your Honour's eye.

Mr. Churchill: Are the bells ringing, sir?

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Bill read the third time and passed.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENTS INCREASING NUMBERS OF SUPREME AND COUNTY COURT JUDGES

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-185, to amend the Judges Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few brief words on this bill. I support the principal purpose of the bill because I have personal knowledge of the need for the appointment of more judges to the bench in the province of British Columbia as the result of the backlog of court cases which has arisen owing to the increase in the population of British Columbia and other developments.

I must say I have had quite a lengthy experience with and personal knowledge of members of the bench in British Columbia in the supreme court, county courts and magistrate's courts. I think I can properly say that their code of conduct has been of a very high order indeed. While in principle I am opposed to the partisan appointment of persons to the bench, I am not quite sure just what is the best way to correct this.

I should like to give an illustration to point out how fair I found a magistrate to be on one occasion. Along with ten other farmers in my riding I was charged with failure to have a dog licence. We appeared in court before the magistrate. We were all fined $2.50 apiece. After the others had left the court room the magistrate, who had asked me to remain behind, said, "Herbie, you are the president of the B.C. Liberal Association and I am a lifelong member. I was appointed by the Liberal government, but regardless of that the law is the law." He could not deviate from the law. I gave him credit for this.

There have been suggestions that appointments to the bench be made by the Canadian Bar Association. I cannot agree with that. Why should the bar association be given the right to choose such persons? Why should it not be the working people? Why should it not be the small business people or those in other occupations? I cannot agree with the principle that one group in our society should have the right to make these appointments. I believe we would then have another form of political or partisan appointments because they would be looked at from one point of view. To have persons occupying prominent positions on the bench through appointment by the bar association, the law society, or whatever it is, would be just like asking the grocers in Canada to appoint the men who inspect weights and measures. I believe there would be just as much reason in that.

I am not certain what can be done about this problem. I have heard persons discuss it. Many people are endeavouring to think of another way by which persons might be appointed to the bench. Perhaps the government might appoint a board representing the major segments of our society including lawyers, farmers, trade unionists and businessmen. In this way the government would not be subject to the accusation that it makes political or partisan appointments. In this regard I am not clear about the best thing to do. Let me hasten to say that to date, on the basis of my experience in British Columbia, with very few exceptions those who have been appointed to the bench have served this country well.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I thought the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) would make a statement when introducing this bill. I doubt that many members are opposed to the appointment of more judges. The increase in population is accompanied by an increase in the number of cases and in many provinces court calendars are far behind schedule. In some I understand it takes one, two or even three years before a case comes to trial. The old adage that justice delayed is justice denied certainly applies. One welcomes the increase in the number of judges in certain provinces.

I thought that the Minister of Justice would make a preliminary statement regarding the method of appointing judges because it is most important. I must congratulate the minister on the appointments he has made since assuming his cabinet position. The old criticism that judges were appointed along party lines as party supporters appears to be diminishing. It is my understanding that in one province particularly the minister has crossed party lines by appointing a judge not because of political affiliation but because of ability, merit and experience. The minister is to be congratulated in this regard and I hope he will continue this procedure.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) is opposed to the bar association appointing members to the bench. The Canadian Bar Association has taken the position that it should never have the prerogative of appointing members to the bench and that it should always remain with the Minister of Justice. What the association has said is that through a committee of the association they should present nominees for judgeships, which would not be binding on the minister, and that the minister should at least consider those names when deciding whom to appoint. This is a good idea because it removes the matter from the realm of political partisanship such as has prevailed in the past. This has made the job of the judge more difficult when he takes his place on the bench.

The minister is very forward-looking and I thought he would make some suggestion regarding the procedures for the removal of judges. A recent case certainly indicates the necessity for amending the procedures in this regard. It is one thing to have security of tenure but it is another thing when, because of difficulties, a judge should be removed from his position. We should update our machinery in this regard.

My final point relates to the training of judges. Under our Canadian system most judges have experience both as barristers and solicitors but in many cases the weight of their experience is on the solicitor side. When they accept an appointment to the bench they have to deal with many branches of the law in which they are not experienced. It is my hope that the Minister of Justice can devise some system whereby an individual appointed as a judge may sit with a senior judge for a period of time in order to acquire experience in the procedures of every branch before presiding over cases.

Again I welcome the appointment of additional judges. I hope the minister will continue to be forward-looking and will bring about other corrections.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a very few remarks to make about the level of pay for judges. Let me point out to those people who point the finger at the level of pay for parliamentary members that the level for judges has been increased twice since the increase in pay for members of parliament some four and a half years ago and exceed it by $9,000 per annum for superior court judges.

Let me raise another point which I have raised previously with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell). I refer to what I believe is a discrimination arising in respect of two superior court judges, one in the Northwest Territories and one in the Yukon. Some considerable time ago they received a northern allowance to compensate them for the very high expenses they incur. This is true not only in the case of their regular duties but also to compensate in respect of their non-appointment, similar to their colleagues, to head up various judicial inquiries and commissions. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) has advanced the proposition that judges should not be used for these purposes. However, judges are being used and I do not understand why these two judges should be doubly penalized. Anyone who suggests that the justices of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon are receiving sufficient remuneration in comparison with their colleagues in the southern part of Canada should live in the north for a while to find out just what I mean.

Mr. Ron Basford (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the provisions of this bill in respect of the appointment of more judges in the province of British Columbia where they are needed because of the great time lapse between a case being set down for trial and actually coming to trial. I feel that I should make one suggestion in this regard. Judges have a responsibility to assure that the matters before them are dealt with as expeditiously as possible. While the administration of our courts is technically a provincial matter, I should like to suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) that in British Columbia, and I assume the same is true of other provinces, the courts take a long two months vacation in the summer, July and August. This is a terribly antiquated and outdated court procedure which should be eliminated as quickly as possible. Except in the case of an emergency, or motions in chambers, the courts do not sit for those two summer months. At that time no case can come to trial. This works a great hardship on the legal profession as well as the litigants involved. It also makes it difficult for judges to schedule their trial work. While the minister has no direct responsibility in this regard, I hope he can encourage the provincial attorneys general to do away with this long vacation. I hope that the judges of British Columbia will also encourage the provincial attorney general to change this procedure of taking long vacations in the summer.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, I noticed that the minister was about to get up to speak but he was buttoning his collar button and being unaccustomed to having his collar buttoned he had difficulty in getting up in time. The minister is very avant-garde in this respect and does pretty well.

Some comment has been made about the appointment of judges and the method by which they should be appointed by the minister. It seems that anyone who has taken an interest in politics is now being condemned and relegated to such a position that he cannot occupy a seat on the bench. I think this is quite wrong. I do not think that just because a man has become involved in politics he should be condemned as a potential judge.

I believe this attitude demonstrates a concern that should be very carefully considered. In my opinion it does not matter what political party a person supports. If he has the necessary qualifications he should be appointed to the bench. To suggest, as did the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), that judges should be appointed after special consideration of a list of names submitted by the bar association or the benchers in Ontario would, I think, be a great mistake.

Throughout history butchers have always wanted to have complete command over the appointment of meat inspectors. Gasoline purveyors have always wanted complete control over the inspection of gasoline stations. This is customary. In most provinces the bar association is really a very tight union for the protection of lawyers, although it is always supposed—and this idea is promoted —that it is really for the protection of the public.

I recall getting into a bit of an argument at one time with the Upper Canada Law Society in connection with searching titles and conveyancing. I was then representing an insurance company which was quite willing to guarantee all the titles in Canada at a very nominal fee. This would have meant that anyone selling or buying a house would not need a lawyer. You would be amazed at the great controversy this brought on because, after all, lawyers charge $250 for their services in the sale or purchase of a house. This is the bread and butter of the profession. But this was not the reason given by the law society; the reason given was that what they did was for the protection of the public.

Pay little heed, Mr. Minister, to the urgings of the law societies. If you want an opinion I suggest that the judges now sitting on the bench can give you a very accurate summary of the nominees you have. After all, they have heard them plead cases and pretty well know what sort of a judge a person will make. A judge must be a person who has a great respect for the law. This is essential. I suggest that the minister would do much better in this field if he took notice of their ideas with respect to nominations.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order. If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on some of the remarks made by hon. members, mainly concerning the appointment of judges. I did not stand up to speak first on second reading, though I was prepared to do so if no one else had risen. When I saw hon. members were rising I preferred to let them speak first. As a matter of fact, I thought they would congratulate me on the way in which I have been appointing judges. In fact, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) did have some very kind words to say. I want to clear up the matter of the appointment of judges because hon. members seem to be unaware of the procedure I have been following. I have publicly stated what this procedure is.

Hon. members know that practically every year since 1952 the question of amending the Judges Act has come before the house. Reading some of the past debates I have seen that generally the minister of justice, at least this was the case last year, has been strongly urged by various hon. members to consult some sort of committee before appointing judges or, rather, recommending that the governor in council appoint them. In fact, at the meeting last September of the Canadian Bar Association I sat in at a press conference given by the president of the judicial nominations committee of the association. At that press conference, which obviously did not receive the attention of the members of this house, it was stated that it has been my practice since becoming minister to consult with the president, and through him with the members of that committee of the Canadian Bar Association, before appointing any judge.

I think I can say that without exception, to my knowledge and memory, I have not appointed a single judge since becoming minister without having at least asked the opinion of this committee. I stated at that time that this was as far as I intended to go then. I wanted to try out this mechanism personally before committing the government to it officially. I was doing it on a trial basis. I must say, incidentally, that as far as I am concerned it has worked very well. The members of this committee have been extremely helpful to me in making sure that any person I have named at least did not have a black mark against him with the bar. Again, to the best of my memory, I have made no appointment of a person which had met with the disapproval of this committee.

That does not mean I am bound to continue in this direction. I think the law on this point is well understood by hon. members. The governor in council has the responsibility for nominating judges. This is the way I think it should remain. The hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) used some very good metaphors indicating why this should be the practice. I think it is quite right that the people responsible to the citizens of this country should in the final analysis make the nominations and bear the blame if their nominations are bad.

I do not agree that a committee should submit a list of names to the Minister of Justice in order that he may choose judges to be appointed. In this regard I do not agree with some of the suggestions, made constructively I am sure, by some of the members of the New Democratic party. My policy is not to choose a judge from a list of names submitted to me. My policy is to go to this particular committee of the Canadian Bar Association and say: I am thinking of appointing so-and-so; I should like to know whether in your opinion he is qualified.

I think this is the only proper procedure under the constitution. I should not be limited in any way as to the names I should consider. Even if I did not agree with the recommendation of the Canadian Bar Association I would feel free to proceed with the nomination anyhow. But in fact I have not made any appointment which did not meet with their approval. As far as I am concerned, this has been a very helpful and constructive procedure. It has permitted me to make sure that I was not choosing people whom the members of the bar association did not feel were qualified.

As to the political character of the appointments, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) mentioned that I had made an appointment in one province at least of a person who is not of our political persuasion. He referred to the fact that in one province I had named a person who, rightly or wrongly, has been associated with the hon. member's political party. I think this might be true of other appointments of judges in other provinces who have been associated with a party other than the Liberal party. However, I am not too concerned about the political past of the appointee. If he is a good person and is qualified for the bench, then these are sufficient qualifications and they are the ones that are uppermost in my mind. It has happened on occasion that I discovered post facto that a certain appointee was of such and such a political persuasion, but this is not the most relevant consideration in my choice.

I am very grateful for the contribution which the Canadian Bar Association has made through this committee which, as might be recognized, must be fairly burdensome to them because it is composed of at least one member from each province and in some cases of more than one. The committee is rather large and the members consult among themselves. I believe they do it with as much secrecy as possible. I am very grateful for their help in that regard.

While I am on my feet I should like to touch on one or two other matters which were raised. First, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) commented on the increase in judges' salaries. I am not quite certain whether I understood him correctly but in case I did I should like to set the facts straight. Under this bill no increase in salaries has been provided.

Mr. Woolliams: He said there had been two increases since members of parliament received their increase.

Mr. Trudeau: If that is what he said, then he may be correct. This bill relates to the appointment of more judges but not to an increase in their salaries.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the minister permit a question at this stage? In increasing the number of judges in the various provinces did he seek advice from the chief justices and did he receive an affirmative answer in that regard? If he did, I think he has performed his duty properly.

Mr. Trudeau: I will gladly answer the question. What happens in fact, as the hon. member well knows, is that this is an area where the jurisdiction is divided. In each of the cases in which I have recommended an increase in the number of judges I have only done so after having received the advice of the attorneys general of the provinces concerned with regard to a new opening. I did not make new appointments until such a request was made.

Each of the provinces seeking the appointment of additional judges has, over the past year, amended its law. These laws bear various names but all of them have to do with the administration of justice, and during the past year they have asked that provision be made in the federal law for the salaries of additional judges. Of course, under our constitution the provinces decide on the number of judges necessary to administer justice, and under section 96 the federal government appoints these judges and provides for their salaries.

This reminds me of a point made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford) who spoke about the long vacations enjoyed by judges. He said quite correctly that this matter was not under my jurisdiction, although under the Judges Act the Minister of Justice must give permission to a judge if he is to be absent for more than 30 days. However, the provision of vacations for the courts in the various provinces is determined by the provincial governments. I will certainly consider the matter raised by the hon. member and although I would not presume to tell the provinces how they should administer justice I will gladly raise this point informally when I have the occasion to meet the provincial attorneys general.

I think that covers the main points Mr. Speaker. I see the clock advancing and I hope the bill will be given second reading now.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

On clause 1—

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say one word with reference to what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard when he spoke about holidays for judges. I can only speak for my own province in that regard but I should like to say that the chief justices in the various courts in my province have been most co-operative and have always arranged for a judge to be on duty during July and August. This is not a holiday for them. During the summer they have an opportunity to write their reserved judgments and to catch up on their work.

I should like to be fair to the courts in that regard and say that so far as Alberta is concerned I have always found, and other lawyers from that province will confirm what I say, that there has always been a judge on duty during the summer vacation. In fact sometimes during July and August justice is administered more expeditiously because at that time it is possible to go directly to the court clerk at a moment's notice. I was glad to hear the Minister of Justice say that he would speak to the attorneys general about this matter. I am well aware of the fact that in this regard provincial legislation comes first and that federal jurisdiction comes next but the federal government pays the bills and therefore we are responsible when legislation is passed.

There is one further point I should like to make. I agree that it is a good idea to receive guidance from the law societies. I have nothing but respect for our law associations but it must be admitted that there are politics in every organization. It may not be of the same variety as the politics exercised here but nevertheless it exists.

I agree with the hon. member who said that the fact that a man has served in public life should not disqualify him for an appointment to the bench. In this connection I should like to refer with some respect to a former member of the house who is now deceased but who was a judge of both the Queen's Bench division and the court of appeal in Saskatchewan. I refer to the late Judge McNiven who was one of the finest judges we have had. Not only was he highly qualified but his experience in public life and in dealing with people added to his humane approach as a judge. So it does not seem to me that the fact that a man has served in a provincial legislature, in the House of Commons, or in public affairs should in any way debar him from appointment to the bench. Such service should be taken into consideration by the Minister of Justice because if a man has received the approval of his peers at home we can be certain that he will make a good judge and will be humane in making decisions and in exercising the responsibility given to him. I agree with the person who said that the most important qualification of a judge is a humane approach, and if he knows a little law he is all the better for it.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): As it is six o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Alkenbrack)—Agriculture—Milk—Alleged hardship through minimum quotas; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand)—Housing—Montreal—availability of Habitat '67 at Expo site.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, I am advised that there has been an agreement to suspend private members' hour and to continue with government business.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, the first private bill on the order paper stands in my name and concerns the Co-operative Trust Company Limited of Saskatoon. I wonder whether it would be the disposition of the house to deal with it first and then to proceed with whatever business the government might like to take up.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, I stand corrected. The whip has just advised me that the understanding was that we would rise at six o'clock and return at eight o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pennell: This seems to meet with enthusiastic approval.

Mr. Nasserden: This is news to me, Mr. Speaker; I heard of it just a moment ago. The bill to which I referred has been considered in committee both in the Senate and in the House of Commons. There is an amendment dealing with the qualifications of directors. I do not think the bill is contentious and I would appreciate it if the house would pass it this afternoon and then adjourn for dinner until the budget is brought down.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support the hon. member's request. I think it a reasonable one. I gave him the right of way on one occasion and I should like to do so again. I do not think it would take very much time.

Mr. Knowles: The understanding is, then, that we take only the time that is necessary to deal with item No. 1 and then rise for a recess.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Does the house order that we suspend the sitting after consideration of Bill No. S-20?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUDGETARY PROPOSALS

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this being St. Andrew's day, and being a Scot, I did not observe one of the customs of the Minister of Finance, who is supposed to buy a new pair of shoes when presenting the budget. Being a Scot, and this being the second budget I have presented this year, I am wearing the same shoes that I wore when I presented the budget on June 1.

Mr. Starr: The minister cannot afford a new pair of shoes.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker. The purpose of this statement is to present to the house the fiscal measures which the government considers necessary at this time to achieve three urgent, and closely related objectives: first, to restrain the inflationary increases in prices, costs and the cost-of-living that are undermining our prosperity; second, to ease the disturbing strains in the capital market that threaten our continued economic growth; and third, to meet in a non-inflationary way the costs of continuing public programs essential to social security and long-run national development.

I might recall that in my speech introducing the budget of June 1st, which is still before the committee of ways and means, I noted that our budget policy was to assist in the transition from the rapid economic expansion of recent years to a steady growth in employment and production at levels near capacity. Our budget was therefore intended to exert a moderate sustaining force upon the economy. It provided for a deficit of about $300 million in terms of our national economic accounts, excluding operations of the Canada Pension Plan. Tax reductions proposed in that budget were designed to contribute to a decrease in certain key prices, particularly those of machinery and equipment in order to improve industrial efficiency, and in those of drugs, to relieve the group of consumers in the country most deserving of such assistance.

The budget involved over-all net cash requirements for the current fiscal year of $1,590 million, to be financed by borrowing and by the reduction of our cash balances. These high financial requirements were due not only to the deficit in our budget accounts, which was forecast at $740 million, but also to a large volume of government loans and investments, particularly for house building. The housing loans were intended to bring and did bring a recovery in house building from the low levels to which it fell last year as a result of the severe competition for funds from other borrowers.

On October 4th I made a second statement in the budget debate. In it I said that the outlook for production and employment this year was much as expected at the beginning of June. There were, however, two major problems. The first was the continued high rates of increase in costs of production and in prices. These increases were much too high. The second problem was the very disturbed state of the capital markets, where high and rising interest rates continued to prevail in Canada, as in other major western countries, despite a substantial rate of expansion in the money supply. I said that the expectation by investors of continued inflation was contributing to this extraordinary condition of the capital markets. We had to find some way of bringing the inflationary movement under control. This would require the exercise of restraint on increases in prices, wages, other money incomes such as rent and dividends, and government expenditures. I noted that the government, in preparing next year's expenditure estimates, was making an early and extraordinary effort to limit the growth in its spending programs and its demands on the capital markets.

On the 10th of this month I announced in the house that our budgetary expenditure programs for next year would be held to $10,300 million. This would be apart from medicare which would be financed by new revenue raised for the purpose, and the writing off of the Expo deficit in our accounts which does not represent any new disbursement. By this action, by the reductions in our lending programs, and by some tax measures, we would hold our overall net cash requirements and our consequent demands on the capital market in the next fiscal year to less than $750 million, apart from unforeseen requirements for our foreign exchange reserves.

I stated then, Mr. Speaker, that these various measures would be a part of an integrated program to check the inflation of prices and costs occurring in Canada and to reduce the excessive pressures upon our capital markets. Tonight it is my duty to carry forward the program by reporting more fully on our situation and on the government's intentions, and to propose those tax measures we consider necessary.

Economic Situation

• (8:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

First, I will note briefly the economic situation and prospects, though these are not substantially different to what they were when I spoke in October.

During 1967 there has been a deceleration in the rapid economic expansion which took place in the last few years. Our gross national product has nevertheless continued to expand, and for this year I expect the increase will turn out to be approximately 7 per cent. In terms of volume, however, the increase will be less than half of this, as prices have continued to increase at excessive rates. The expenditures of consumers, supported as they are by rising wages and salaries, are at a high and increasing level. The expenditures of governments and municipalities on goods and services continue to rise this year although not as rapidly as heretofore. In the first half of 1967, exports reached a record level, although in recent months they have been declining, both in the case of wheat and, to a lesser degree, in the total excluding wheat. This has of course reflected to some extent the slowdown in expansion in the United States and overseas as well as the special circumstances of the wheat market. For the year as a whole, however, exports will reach the target set by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters). Business capital expenditures have also been declining in recent months, both on construction and on machinery and equipment.

The result of these recent changes in the sustaining forces in the economy has been a slowing down in the rate of growth of production, a slight downturn in total employment, and a rise last month in unemployment. The economy has ceased to be under the serious strain it experienced last year, and has developed a small amount of spare capacity.

These developments, however, have not put a check on prices and costs; the excessive rates of increase in wages and in other costs continue unabated. The consumer price index has declined fractionally during the past two months, chiefly because food prices fell as they normally do at this season. Still, the underlying movement remains strongly upward. Excluding food, the consumer price index is up by 4½ per cent over a year ago. Costs have been rising rapidly and profits have been squeezed. Our most comprehensive measure of prices—the price component of the gross national product—showed an increase in the second quarter of this year of 5 per cent over the second quarter of 1966.

Canada is now finding it harder to achieve price stability and full employment at the same time than earlier thinking had led us to suppose. Even with unemployment at levels we do not regard as satisfactory, prices and wages are rising too rapidly. They are rising more rapidly than those in the United States, more rapidly than those in most other western industrialized countries. No group in Canada can afford this erosion of our international competitive position.

Moreover, and even more important, the expectation that prices and costs will continue to rise is creating an inflationary psychology which is having serious effects on both the capital market and the labour market. In the labour market this psychology is leading to continued demands for wage increases that are clearly far in excess of any prospective increase in productivity, and therefore clearly inflationary. Increases in major wage settlements negotiated in Canada over the first nine months of this year are reported by the Department of Labour to have averaged 8.7 per cent a year over the life of the agreements. A roughly comparable average for the United States is 4.4 per cent per year. In the capital market the same psychology is leading to an unwillingness to lend money for long terms on bonds and mortgages except at very high interest rates.

Both the labour and the capital markets must work efficiently if we are to continue to be prosperous and to develop our economy.

In particular we are a nation which must save and invest about one-fifth of our total national output each year, mainly through the medium of the capital market. In addition we expect to obtain a net annual inflow of capital of nearly a billion dollars or more. We run our economy on the basis of such expectations, and this continued flow of savings and investment is essential to the productive employment of our growing labour force. It is vital therefore that our capital market continue to work effectively and in a proper relationship to the central capital market of the world, which is in the United States.

[English]

An hon. Member: And now a little gimmick for St. Andrew's day for the Scots.

Mr. Sharp: I should like to say to the hon. member that this is one of the groups which has made an enormous contribution to this country, even rivalling that made by the two founding races. Indeed, I sometimes wonder whether one of the founding peoples was not the Scots.

An hon. Member: Where are the Scots on the front bench?

Mr. Sharp:

Economic Prospects

Looking ahead, in 1968 a somewhat greater increase in production than this year in real terms and a somewhat smaller increase in prices is indicated. This appraisal anticipates a revival in economic activity in the United States and a continuation of growth in production in Europe and Japan, all important markets for us. Consequently, I expect to see a resumption in the growth of our exports. We can certainly expect a continuing increase in the expenditures of Canadian consumers, probably at a greater rate than this year. Housing expenditures can be expected to rise next year. Mortgage funds should be more readily available as a result of the more flexible interest rates on insured mortgages as well as a reduction in the competition for funds and the entry of the banks into the market this year. Already, as hon. members know, there has been a very substantial increase. On the other hand, it appears to me that capital expenditures by business will not increase next year, bearing in mind the effects of increased costs and some uncertainties regarding market conditions. This is borne out by the preliminary impressions I have heard of the investment intentions of large businesses. As I have previously emphasized, this is an area where expansion rather than restraint is now required.

Taking these various changes together, I would expect total production and incomes to increase moderately next year and employment to increase from the current level about in proportion to the growth of our labour force. We expect to see a better performance in overall productivity, partly as a consequence of better training and deployment of our labour force and partly because there is usually an increase in productivity at this stage of the business cycle. We must recognize, however, that we now have an economy where many businesses and many consumers have large liquid resources at their disposal which they can decide to spend on short notice should there be a change in the prevailing psychology.

• (8:20 p.m.)

The current international situation is one in which there are potential dangers for Canada, in view of our considerable dependence both on world trade and on international capital markets. Never before I believe have the central capital markets of the world been in such a disturbed condition for so long a time. There has been widespread uneasiness about the position of the major international currencies which has now been relieved by the successful revaluation of sterling and by the manifest strength of the United States dollar and other major currencies in the face of speculation during the past ten days. Many countries are experiencing real difficulties in bringing their government finances into line with current necessities and in curbing the inflationary tendencies that exist so widely in the Western world. We cannot isolate ourselves from international price pressures, particularly from the United States, but we must do what we can to contain the inflationary pressures operating in Canada. In the current international circumstances, our policies must reflect the need for strong action to protect our underlying position and for flexibility in adapting to changing circumstances.

Controlling Growth in Government Expenditures

It is against this broad economic background that we must decide upon our programs and measures. First, we must consider our public expenditures. Our program will be before the house in detail in a few months in the form of the main estimates, but in the meantime the government is having to make the basic decisions which will be reflected there, along with those expenditures arising out of statutes. It is essential that the house and the public recognize the nature and severity of the problem that confronts us and the need to cope with it.

Since this government took office it has been putting into place, as it stated it would, the major reforms required to complete Canada's social security system. On our recommendation, parliament has also authorized a substantial increase in the contributions to what is now Canada's first priority, higher education. This was done both in the form of expenditures and in the form of a special fiscal transfer to the provinces for this purpose. We have deliberately transferred to the provincial governments additional resources so that they and their municipalities could provide the rapidly expanding services required of them. We have pressed forward with measures to promote scientific research, industrial development, and the improvement of those areas in the country which have suffered from slower growth and lower incomes than elsewhere.

We made no secret of the fact—and the house was aware—that all these reforms would involve substantial increases in public expenditures. Indeed, we were urged to go even further. I made it quite clear last year and this year that the requirements of a growing and developing Canada in which these economic and social reforms were proceeding would involve increased claims by governments and their agencies on the national output. Even so, I pointed out the growth in the public sector of our economy was not going to be so rapid as to require more than a portion of the growth in the national output as a whole, although it would and did involve higher tax rates.

Let me illustrate. In the last fiscal year our total federal government expenditure on the comprehensive basis used in the national economic accounts amounted to $9,846 million, which was 16.8 per cent of the gross national product. Five years before, in 1961-62, when the party opposite was in office, it was 19.2 per cent of the gross national product, and five years before that again, in 1956-57, the total was $5,126 million, which was 16.4 per cent of the gross national product. Thus it will be seen that although our expenditures over the same decade had increased by 92 per cent, they were about the same share of the gross national product as they were ten years ago, and a smaller share than they were five years ago. Moreover, during this period we reduced our tax rates in favour of the provinces, as I mentioned a moment ago. In addition, parliament has during this period enacted the Canada Pension Plan which is not reflected in these figures. It is a separate, fully contributory, funded plan in which at this early stage the contributions far exceed the payments and produce a large investment fund which is placed at the disposal of the provincial governments to help them meet their capital requirements. Now let me look at the expenditures of provincial governments and municipalities.

The expenditures of provincial governments and municipalities have been rising much more rapidly over this past decade than those of the federal government. Again using the figures as produced for the national economic accounts, provincial and municipal expenditures together show a total in the last fiscal year of $10,942 million, which was 18.6 per cent of the gross national product. Five years before that, in 1961-62, they were 16.3 per cent of the gross national product, and five years before that again, in 1956-57, they were $3,474 million, which was 11.1 per cent of the gross national product. In other words, in contrast with federal government expenditures which have maintained a constant proportion over the last ten years, provincial and municipal expenditures between them have risen from 11.1 per cent to 18.6 per cent of the gross national product. The average annual growth rate over this period of provincial plus municipal expenditures has been 12.1 per cent as compared with the average growth rate in federal expenditures of 6.7 per cent. I should add here that the federal expenditures I have given include contributions to the provinces and municipalities which would have to be eliminated before one added the figures to get a total, since the provincial and municipal figures include expenditures made from monies received from federal sources.

While it will be noted that these rates of increase of provincial and municipal expenditures have been substantially greater than our own, I am not criticizing the provinces in any way for this. It is well known that many of the increasing demands for public facilities and public services arising from the rapid growth of our population, our labour force, and our economy generally, as well as from the shift of population from the rural to the urban areas, fall upon provincial governments and their municipalities. This is a fact of life which must be taken into account in evaluating the rate of increase in government expenditures as a whole.

In appraising the situation this year, and taking into account our various commitments including medicare, the government decided it would have to impose much more severe limits on the growth of expenditure than have applied for many years in the past. This restraint is necessary if we are to check the inflationary influences in the economy, reduce our demands upon the capital market, and minimize the increase in taxes. Consequently we decided, as I stated earlier this month, that we would hold the increase in our budgetary expenditures, apart from medicare and the writing off of the Expo deficit, to some 4½ per cent, a rate of increase much smaller than in the three previous years. Once this has been achieved and medicare has also been put into effect, then I believe the future growth in our public expenditures can be held to a level which can be met from the increasing revenues resulting from a growing economy without inflationary consequences. There will be many important programs to be pressed forward by the federal government, particularly in the fields of manpower training, research and economic development, but I think they will not involve the rapid, massive increase in expenditures that we have seen in this past decade on the health and social security programs.

To make this transition we must this coming year make a downward adjustment in our spending programs—apart from medicare—from the rapid rates of increase that we have had recently to more sustainable rates of growth, just as we have been endeavoring in the past 18 months to adjust our rates of economic expansion. This will not be easy. To some it may appear at first blush that the ceiling on budgetary expenditures next year of $10,300 million—which allows an increase in the neighbourhood of $400 million over the revised forecast of this year's expenditure—is not a difficult one to meet. Indeed, I have seen comments like this in the press, that submit we are not setting ourselves a very difficult target. In fact it means that over large areas of the government's operations we will be wielding the axe.

Let me illustrate. We make a large number of substantial transfer payments to the provinces and municipalities, such as equalization payments, hospital insurance, aid for education and the Canada assistance social welfare plan, most of which increase automatically under statute or agreement with the provinces. We have in addition (apart from old age security which is financed separately) major programs consisting of transfer payments to persons, including family and youth allowances, veterans' pensions, and adult training allowances. All of these are also mainly fixed by population factors and by statute. Finally, there are the public debt charges which will inevitably rise if we assume that interest rates will remain at present levels. Taken together, these expenditures require unavoidable expenditure increases of something over half of the total increase of about $400 million to which we are holding.

When expenditures in these categories are deducted from the total forecast for this year, it leaves about $5,640 million of other expenditures which can increase only 3.3 per cent within the ceiling set for next year—a margin which will largely be required to meet the increased costs of higher pay rates and prices.

In the face of these unavoidable increases in our payments to provinces, in payments to individuals under statutory programs, and in public debt charges, and the increase in pay and prices, it is clear that our other expenditure programs as a whole, under our normal budgetary control, will have to be restrained severely next year. The reductions must be large enough to make way for a number of new things that we will have to undertake, such as the program in Cape Breton. I am thinking about the Cape Breton Development Corporation, the Atlantic Development Board expenditures, and so on. Consequently we are going to have to cut back or cut out a number of things that we have been doing. Some programs that we have been carrying on for years will be dropped, some major construction projects will be postponed, some subsidies will be reduced, some expansion of programs—including some the government has promised—will be held back. In planning our programs we are taking account of the greater unemployment in the Eastern areas of Canada and the fact that expenditures there are less likely to be inflationary than they are in Canada generally.

My colleague the President of the Treasury Board, who is in charge of this expenditure control program, will speak in the budget debate next week and give the house some of the detailed decisions on these cuts. I expect he will deal with the plans for restraining the growth of the public service, about which many people have expressed concern. I would make only one point about that to keep the subject in perspective. It is that the size of the federal Public Service has for the past 15 years—whether there were ceilings on or off—remained very close to one per cent of the population of Canada and for the past half dozen years has been declining as a percentage of the Canadian labour force.

I have seen suggestions, and probably will hear some suggestions that we should be cutting back government expenditures. I am sure I have the support of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in saying that this is unrealistic, because I have here a report of an interview with the Leader of the Opposition which appears in the most recent issue of Executive Magazine, in which he says:

> I think anybody who suggests that you can cut down on government spending or offer a substantial reduction in taxes isn't being very realistic. But any government can control the rate of the increase in expenditure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: That is the point.

Mr. Sharp: The Leader of the Opposition can try to convince us that our rate increase is too high, but all he was able to do was increase the last increase, and his last increase was much greater than ours.

Government Lending Programs

Our problem in regard to the demands we make on the capital market arises, as I have indicated, not only from our spending programs but also to a large extent from our lending programs. In the current fiscal year for example, we are lending from the treasury to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for housing and related purposes a net amount of $608 million, after taking into account repayments we receive. We are lending to the Farm Credit Corporation for farm mortgages a net amount of $167 million. We are advancing to the Veterans Loan Board for housing and farm credit purposes $60 million. The size of these lending programs will have to be restricted. I am confident we can do this without serious economic effects, when account is taken of the better flow of mortgage funds we can now expect the capital market to provide.

Another demand upon our funds is Air Canada. It is having to expand rapidly its fleet of aircraft and its various ground installations in order to meet the growing traffic demands on it. The Minister of Transport and I recognize that it will be necessary to exercise restraint on what the government lends to Air Canada in future years, requiring that company to seek sources of capital funds other than the government. On the other hand, two of our large lending programs will come to an end in 1968, that for Expo and that for the Municipal Development and Loan Board, and we can expect some recoveries in future of what we have lent under both these categories.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, the government is applying rigorous restraints on its spending and lending as part of our program to check the inflation of prices and costs, to reduce excessive pressures in our capital markets, and to minimize increase in taxes.

Budgetary Outlook and Policy

Given the situation I have described, we have come to the conclusion that some increases in taxes are essential in order to meet our growing expenditures even under the restraints we have imposed, and to reduce our over-all cash requirements to what we can reasonably expect to finance in the market. Our large cash balances of last April were down to rock bottom at the beginning of this month. Fortunately the Canada savings bond campaign has succeeded in raising a substantial amount of new cash during November, despite the very adverse circumstances under which it had to be carried on. I wish to take this opportunity to express my admiration and gratitude to those who have organized and carried out this campaign this year. We will need to come frequently to the market in the next sixteen months, both for refunding and for cash. We face an unusually large maturity of savings bonds in 1968, and will consider making an offer to holders of these bonds to convert them into a new issue of savings bonds in advance of their maturity on November 1st. I feel we must ensure that our over-all cash requirements, apart from the effects of unforeseen changes in our exchange reserves, should be kept well within our $750 million limit for 1968-69.

To attain this objective is going to require the virtual elimination of our budgetary deficit next year. This is because, even after the reductions proposed in our lending program, our net non-budgetary requirements next year will be large, including as they should some repayment of the 1966 refundable tax on corporate cash flows. In addition it is important to build up our cash balances from the low levels they are likely to be at in March 1968.

Our budgetary expenditures in the current fiscal year—this year—are now expected to be about $9,900 million. Our revenues, before taking into account tax changes I am proposing tonight, are likely to amount to about $9,070 million. Although these figures are different from my June budget forecast, I intend that our tax and expenditure measures will hold the budgetary deficit as close as possible to what was planned at that time. It now appears that our over-all cash requirements for the year as a whole—apart from the refunding of our debt and on the basis of the current level of our exchange reserves —will be about what I expected in the budget speech of June.

Outlook for 1968-69

The best preliminary forecast I can make of the yield next fiscal year of our revenues under our current tax laws—which of course at this early date is more uncertain than is usual in normal springtime budgets, is about $9,700 million. With our expenditures at the level of $10,300 million where we have decided to hold them, apart from medicare and Expo, our budget deficit would be $600 million. I believe we can and should aim to eliminate most of this deficit.

The fiscal restraints that are essential now may limit somewhat the increase in our production next year but such a limitation now is far better than a serious recession later. If we cannot, as individuals and organizations, exercise the restraint that is now called for in price, cost and wage increases then there is no alternative but a collective fiscal restraint exercised by parliament. This is a case where the proverbial ounce of prevention now is far preferable to a pound of cure later. When the government and parliament have taken the action we should to hold our expenditures in check and to meet our expenditure requirements by tax revenues, then we should, as I said in October, support such action by a determined campaign to achieve by voluntary co-operation a large reduction in the unacceptably high rate at which prices and costs are increasing, including wage settlements.

We must bring to an end the present round of inflationary price and cost increases, and move to a situation in which all Canadians can work and buy and bargain and invest in the expectation that their money over the years will maintain its real value. To the extent that we can mobilize public opinion effectively in support of this objective, and against the actions of those who clearly exploit their market power to obtain inflationary increases, then we can have a higher level of employment, production and incomes along with price stability. This would be, in the words of the Leader of the Opposition, "a more civilized way to control inflation". I think that we can do it. The government is planning to organize a temporary program of this kind—after we have done our part here in parliament to restrain our spending and to impose the taxes necessary to finance, in a non-inflationary way, the expenditures which we in this house have judged to deserve the priority that is implied in our approval of them. When these measures have been approved I would then propose, with several of my colleagues, to initiate discussions with leaders of labour, of management, and other main elements of the economy, as to the manner in which we could most effectively organize this program of restraint.

The Tax Reform Program

Before putting forward my revenue proposals I think it is desirable to say what I can now about our plans in regard to the tax reform program on which we have been working and about the reactions we have received to the report of the Royal Commission on Taxation.

In the first place it must be recognized that our tax reform program must be undertaken under circumstances quite different to those contemplated in the terms of reference of the royal commission and its work. The commission was designing a system to yield a revenue comporable to that of 1964. Clearly we will need a tax system in 1969 and subsequently which will produce more revenues that that of 1964—even after allowing for the growth in our economy since then, and the consequent increase in prices and incomes and in our federal revenues.

Mr. Woolliams: What growth?

Mr. Sharp: Somebody said "What growth". I do not think there has ever been a period in our history when there has ever been such growth. There has never been a greater rise in the real economy, and there has never been a greater rise in employment than during this period.

An hon. Member: There has been a tremendous growth in taxes and unemployment.

Mr. Sharp: On the other hand we can and will take account of the arguments the commission made regarding the relative incidence of the tax on various income and other groups.

In accordance with our invitation to all Canadians to send us their views concerning the commission's report we have received many hundreds of briefs and letters on the subject. Many individuals and groups have talked to me, and to the Minister of National Revenue, and to other ministers and officials about the report and its proposals. I wish to express our appreciation to all the individuals, businesses, trade unions and associations who have given us their views on this difficult and controversial subject.

I have been particularly impressed that four points have played a central role in the public discussion of the report, and in the submissions made to the government. The first is the sweeping extent of the changes recommended by the commission, and the difficulty of predicting the effects that sudden changes of this magnitude would have on the economy and ultimately on the position of various taxpayers. We have encountered this difficulty ourselves. The second point is that the commissioners have suggested for Canada a tax system quite different from that of other countries, and in particular quite different from that of the United States with whom we have an integrated capital market. This could give rise to economic difficulties, as well as to technical problems in drafting an effective law. The third point is somewhat related to the second, although it has connotations in other areas as well. It is that Canada will need to generate and invest a large volume of savings over the next decade in order to carry out the economic growth and development we want, and we shall need to attract substantial amounts of foreign capital to supplement our own savings. Many people feel the commission did not give adequate weight to this consideration in deciding on its recommendations, and I am inclined to agree. The final point is a widespread concern over the regional impact of the commissioners' proposals, particularly those related to the mining and petroleum industries.

Many of the briefs which we have received contain suggestions for modification of the commission's proposals, or alternatives to the commission's proposals. We are now studying these suggestions, in addition to completing our own work on tax reform and the report of the commission.

The government believes that substantial reform is necessary if its revenues are to be raised as fairly as possible and with a minimum of interference with the proper development and functioning of the Canadian economy. I believe that the report of the royal commission will turn out to have been of great value to the government, to parliament and the people of Canada in helping us all to recognize the deficiencies in our present tax system and to devise sensible ways to reform the system.

However, the work we have done within the government, as well as the analyses we have received from others, leads us to the conclusion that while the reforms we will place before parliament and the public in the form of a White Paper and ultimately in draft legislation will undoubtedly be influenced by the monumental report of the royal commission, they will be more in the nature of reforms of the existing tax structure rather than the adoption of a radically different approach. They will not necessarily be limited to items which the commission has recommended.

In the meantime our current tax proposals must of course be made in a form that relates to our present laws.

Personal Income Surtax

I come now to my tax proposals. My first proposal relates to the personal income tax. I am asking the house to approve a special surtax of 5 per cent of the amount of the basic tax assessed on an individual in excess of $100. This surtax will take effect January 1st and would remain I expect until we have completed the transition to a slower rate of growth of expenditures or until economic and financial conditions call for a change in our fiscal policy.

This change will be made in such a manner as not to affect provincial revenues. As was done in 1965, I propose that the maximum change in tax resulting from this amendment be limited to $600. The surtax is so defined that it will not apply to single persons with incomes of less than $2,000 a year nor to a married man with two children having an income of less than $3,600. The increase in tax for a married man with two children and a typical income of, say, $100 a week would be 23 cents a week. I would ask permission at this point to insert in Hansard tables to illustrate the effects of this change upon taxpayers with incomes of various sizes.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the tables referred to by the hon. minister be inserted in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[The tables referred to above are as follows:]

(a) This is the combined federal and provincial income tax, including the old age security tax, in all provinces except Quebec, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. The taxpayer is assumed to take the optional standard deduction of $100 in lieu of deductions for medical expenses and charitable donations.

Mr. Sharp: For the information of hon. members who are listening to me now I might give a typical example, taking a current taxpayer with two family allowance children. The increase in the tax for a man with a $5,000 annual income is $10 per year; with a $7,000 annual income, $29 per year; with a $10,000 annual income, $64 per year, and with a $15,000 annual income, $145 per year. This gives an index of the incidence of this tax.

My officials estimate that this surtax will increase our revenues in the fiscal year 1968-69 by $185 million: the effect on the current year will be to increase our revenues by approximately $25 million.

Liquor and Tobacco

My second proposal is to increase the taxes on liquor and tobacco. The effect of the proposed changes would be generally to raise the weight of the federal tax on spirits, beer, wine, cigarettes, cigars and tobacco by approximately 10 per cent, effective immediately. This would be implemented by a number of measures.

The rate of excise duty on spirits distilled in Canada would be increased by $1.25 per proof gallon. For most spirits this would mean an increase from $13.00 to $14.25. The excise duty on beer would increase from 38 cents per gallon to 42 cents per gallon. It will also be necessary to provide increases of the same amounts in the tariff on imported liquors and beer.

A special excise tax would be applied to wines, both imported and domestic. The rate would be 2½ cents per gallon on wines containing not more than 7 per cent of alcohol, and 5 cents per gallon on wines containing more than 7 per cent of alcohol.

On tobacco and tobacco products we levy both excise duties and excise taxes. We propose to use the excise taxes to obtain the increase necessary. The rate of excise tax on cigarettes would be increased to 3 cents on each five cigarettes from the present 2½ cents, that on manufactured tobacco to 90 cents a pound from 80 cents, and that on cigars to 17½ per cent from 15 per cent.

In all, it is estimated that these changes on liquor and tobacco will increase our revenues in fiscal 1968-69 by approximately $95 million, and in the current year by approximately $20 million.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Corporation Tax

My third proposal concerns the corporation tax. It is designed to give us a substantial increase in our receipts next year, without adding in future to the costs of production or distribution of Canadian business. It will be of substantial help to our cash position at a time when that is necessary, and will constitute a measure of continuing reform designed to produce greater equity as between corporations and other taxpayers.

Corporations presently begin the payment of their tax in the fifth month of the taxation year to which it relates and complete these payments four months after the end of the year. This timetable of payments which was advanced in 1963 and 1964 still contrasts with that of individuals who have income tax deducted from their wages each pay day. We have decided to reduce further the difference between corporations and individuals.

In future, corporations will be required to make their first instalment payment in the third month of their taxation year and complete their payments on account of their estimated tax by the second month following the year.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Lambert: That is all windfall.

Mr. Sharp: Since some companies may have difficulty determining their actual tax liability within two months of the end of the year, they will be permitted to make a final payment adjusting their estimate of tax to their actual liability at the end of the third month following the year. The change will not affect the date for filing corporation tax returns, which will remain six months after the end of the year.

The corporations will make the transition to this payment schedule by increasing their first ten payments for their next taxation year beginning after tonight. Under the present law these payments would each be one-twelfth of the estimated tax for the year; during the year of transition they will each be one-tenth of that amount.

We estimate that this change will increase the cash receipts of the government by approximately $290 million in the fiscal year 1968-69, of which $240 million will be non-recurrent budgetary revenues and $25 million will be old age security revenues.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is just a phony.

Mr. Sharp: The remainder will be credited to the provincial tax collection account from which payments are made to the provinces under our tax collection agreements. There will be an additional $50 million of receipts in fiscal 1969-70.

Special Refundable Tax

Hon. members will recall that in 1966, as a measure to restrain the boom in capital expenditures then in progress, we introduced a refundable tax on cash profits. Under the law, the payments must be refunded with interest not later than 36 months after they were due, or after they were received if they were late. They could be repaid as much as 18 months earlier if the government so decided. Consequently the amount collected—some $230 million in all—must be repaid some time between today and June, 1970. Clearly it would be difficult to make repayment in in the next few months, but I believe we should not put off the repayment entirely until the last possible date for that would add seriously to the burdens to be faced during the 1969-70 fiscal year. I believe the measure I have proposed in regard to corporation taxes will provide us with enough cash receipts to permit us to repay a substantial amount of the refundable tax during 1968-69.

We now propose to begin the refunding process in June of 1968, refunding then the payments received before June 30, 1966. Every second month thereafter we will refund one month's receipts; in August 1968 we will refund payments received in July, 1966; in October, 1968, receipts of August 1966, and so on until February, 1970. The final payments will be made in May of 1970 refunding amounts received in May 1967, as the law requires, and late payments.

In order to reduce administrative costs, we should refund with our first payments in June the total amount received from those corporations whose aggregate refundable tax did not exceed $1,000. We will be asking parliament for authority to do this.

This program would require payments of approximately $105 million, including interest, during fiscal 1968-69. During the following fiscal year it is estimated that the payments will be $139 million—leaving a few million to be paid in May 1970. These payments are not budgetary expenditures, but repayments of debt.

Conclusion

Mr. Speaker, the substantial proposals which I have put forward would increase our revenues in the current fiscal year by some $45 million and, together with the reductions in expenditures to be announced, will hold our budgetary deficit this year close to that forecast in the budget of June 1. It will hold our estimated over-all cash requirements for the current year—apart from any changes in our foreign exchange reserves after today—to about $1,550 million. This will leave us with a substantial amount to borrow from now until the 1st of April, but I regard that as manageable.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What amount?

Mr. Sharp: I shall be glad to answer a question in that context later. I should like to conclude my speech.

For next year the changes proposed will add about $520 million to our budgetary revenues—including the large non-recurrent revenue arising from the change in the timing of payments by corporations. This will bring our estimated revenues for next year up to within about $80 million of the level to which we intend to hold our expenditures, apart from medicare and the Expo write-off. These tax changes will also increase our cash receipts during the fiscal year 1968-69 by approximately $570 million. It should enable us to hold our over-all cash requirements, including the repayment of the refundable tax, well under the ceiling of $750 million I announced on November 10.

Six months ago, in presenting the main budget, I said: "There is no one-shot economic nostrum guaranteed to keep us healthy through the coming year". That budget of June 1 marked a stage in the continuing process of economic adjustment, in the process of managing our prosperity. So do the measures I have placed before you tonight, made necessary by the persistence of inflationary increases in prices and costs, both in Canada and abroad, that threaten to erode the foundations of our prosperity.

The federal government cannot by itself control inflation. What this government can do and is determined to do—with the support of parliament—is to keep its own finances in order, take action to steady the economy and give leadership to the other governments in Canada and to the country at large. This task is difficult and involves some tough decisions. But, as I remarked earlier, an ounce of prevention now is far preferable to a pound of cure later.

Income Tax Act Resolution

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act to provide among other things:

1. That for the 1968 and subsequent taxation years, in addition to the income tax otherwise payable by an individual under the Income Tax Act, a special surtax be payable equal to the lesser of

(a) 5 per cent of the amount of the basic tax as determined under section 33 of that Act in excess of $100, or

2. That for the taxation years commencing after November, 1968, a corporation shall during the 12 months period ending two months after the close of each taxation year, pay to the Receiver General of Canada

(a) on or before the last day of each of the 12 months in that period, an amount equal to one-twelfth of the tax as estimated by it at the rate for the taxation year

(i) on its estimated taxable income for the year, or

(ii) on its taxable income for the immediately preceding year,

(b) on or before the last day of the month ending three months after the close of each taxation year the remainder of the tax payable on its taxable income for the year at the rate for the year and that for the taxation year commencing in the period after November, 1967, and before December, 1968, a corporation shall during the ten months period ending two months after the close of its taxation year pay to the Receiver General of Canada

(c) on or before the last day of each of the ten months in that period, an amount equal to one-tenth of the tax as estimated by it at the rate for the taxation year.

(i) on its estimated taxable income for the year, or

(ii) on its taxable income for the immediately preceding year,

(d) on or before the last day of the month ending three months after the close of its taxation year the remainder of the tax payable for the year at the rate for the year.

Excise Act Resolution

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Act and to provide among other things:

1. That effective December 1, 1967, the duty of excise on spirits distilled in Canada be increased from thirteen dollars to fourteen dollars and twenty-five cents per proof gallon.

2. That effective December 1, 1967, the duty of excise on Canadian brandy be increased from eleven dollars to twelve dollars and twenty-five cents per proof gallon.

3. That effective December 1, 1967, the duty of excise on all beer or malt liquor be increased from thirty-eight cents to forty-two cents per gallon.

Excise Tax Act Resolution

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act to provide among other things:

1. That effective December 1, 1967, the excise tax on each five cigarettes or fraction of five cigarettes contained in any package be increased from two and one-half cents to three cents.

2. That effective December 1, 1967, the excise tax on each pound of manufactured tobacco, including snuff but not including cigars and cigarettes, be increased from eighty cents per pound to ninety cents per pound.

3. That effective December 1, 1967, the excise tax on cigars be increased from fifteen per cent to seventeen and a half per cent.

4. That effective December 1, 1967, an excise tax of

(a) two and one-half cents per gallon on wines of all kinds containing not more than seven per cent of absolute alcohol by volume, and

(b) five cents per gallon on wines of all kinds containing more than seven per cent to absolute alcohol by volume, be imposed in addition to any other excise tax imposed by the said act payable at the time of sale by the Canadian manufacturer and at the time of importation or withdrawal from bonded warehouse by the importer or transferee who takes imported wines out of bond for consumption.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

13. Resolved, that the Customs Tariff be amended by adding thereto a section as follows:

There shall be levied, collected and paid as a Customs duty on all goods hereinafter enumerated in this section when imported into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein, in addition to the duties otherwise established, an amount determined as follows:

(a) in the case of goods enumerated in tariff items 15605-1, 15610-1, 15615-1, 15620-1, 15625-1, 15625-2, 15630-1, 15635-1 and 15640-1, one dollar and twenty-five cents per gallon of the strength of proof; and

(b) in the case of ale, beer, porter and stout enumerated in tariff item 14700-1, four cents per gallon.

14. Resolved, that any enactment founded upon the foregoing resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the 1st day of December, 1967, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the said resolution imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on or after that day and before the 1st day of January, 1968, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before the 1st day of December, 1967.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, may I begin my remarks by saying to the minister on behalf of all Canadians, "A merry and prosperous Christmas to you, too."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Monteith: After tonight's budget it will certainly be less so for most of us, and indeed somewhat more spiritless.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Monteith: I, too, would like to pay my tribute to St. Andrew's day, or St. André's day, as the minister now calls it. I must say that I was very much impressed with that part of his speech which he delivered in Gallic. Having been made aware of the full content of his budget message, taxpayers all across Canada have a very much closer relationship to the "Scots, wha hae wi' Wallace bled". Now it is, "Canadians wha hae for Mitchell bled."

It has become a common thing for the minister to produce these fiscal afterthoughts and having to correct errors in his earlier budget, or to compensate for his failure to predict correctly what was happening in the economy. Last December 19 the minister brought in a so-called mini-budget practically on the eve of Christmas. As we had expected, he increased taxes. Now tonight, roughly a year later, he presents not a mini-budget but a meany-budget. Again, almost on the eve of Christmas, he increases taxes.

Mr. More: And a happy new year to you.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, when is this complete disregard for the plight of the Canadian taxpayer going to stop? The minister has asked us to place our confidence in his judgment. How good has it been in the past? The following is the minister's statement made last December 19, at the time when he presented his mini-budget, as recorded on page 11332 of Hansard:

> My judgment is that the economic expansion now taking place is more in line with the capability of our economy to grow steadily without inflation.

Later on he said:

> —I now believe we can expect some moderation in the trend of wage increases and further restraint in pricing policies.

What has happened actually? Consumer prices have risen 3.6 per cent since then. We have inflation, a sagging economy, higher and higher prices, and extraordinary government expenses, mostly non-productive in nature.

The minister has attempted to lay the blame for the present situation on world wide conditions. He said the whole thing was talked over in Rio last autumn. I will wager he did not tell the other ministers of finance the whole story as regards Canada. Subsequently I intend to review in greater detail just how the government has brought us to this precarious situation.

First let me admit freely that there is turbulence in the financial and economic community at large. Then I must say that Canada's troubles have been accentuated to a very dangerous point by the complete ineptness of the government in its monetary and fiscal approach to our problems. Never have so many financial statements been made by a government; never have so many warnings been issued; and never has there been such contradiction and deterioration.

Last June we were presented with a budget in which the minister gave his usual reassurances that all was well, except for a possible danger of inflation which he was confident he could manage. On October 4 we had substantially the same message, that all was well, that there were some problems but they were being managed under this government's policies. The minister stuck a pin in his own balloon on November 10 when he had to rise in the house and say that he needed more money.

The sole purpose of this budget is to raise money for the government's extravagant expenditures. Again tonight we have had a lengthy statement containing the minister's exhortations on what we must all do, but no indication of an awakening to reality by the government. Where is the restraint in this budget? The London Economist said the only policy left to this government is restraint. It urges restraint on everyone else but does not practise it. We have had message after message, statement after statement, exhortation after exhortation, and yet the situation continues to deteriorate.

All the government has done tonight is to go to the taxpayer once more and to turn the screw a little tighter. The minister has dressed up that simple operation with a mass of verbal gymnastics. All that can be accomplished by these measures is a further damping down of the economy at a time when a number of indicators are beginning to sag. I will not quote many people this evening, but let me quote John Meyer from this morning's issue of the Montreal Gazette. This is what he said:

> It's difficult to imagine the timing for the budget being less fortuitous than it is. The economy has lost way and is wallowing in the cross currents of indecision.
> The public mood is one of weary resentment of government fumbling. The budget itself can offer nothing to inspire. It is, after all, hardly more than the belated correction of a gross miscalculation, or rather a series of gross miscalculations, over the past two years.

The minister has said that next year he will increase his spending by 4.5 per cent, without taking into account medicare, Expo, or old age security. The budget expenditure, he said, will be $10.3 billion. This means we will continue to have inflation and unemployment in a sagging economy.

The government's measures have been unrealistic and haphazard, with the result that we now have uneasiness, lack of confidence and a growing concern about the economy. We in the official opposition, while being as constructive as we possibly can in the face of this government's fiscal inadequacy, are nevertheless conscious of great uneasiness for many reasons, of which I will just mention three or four.

This budgetary statement does nothing to get the economy back on the track of stable growth. It shows no realization of the damaging effects of inflation, and very little intention to discipline and organize government spending. It is obvious that what we have had tonight is simply a device to help finance an unrealistic level of government spending. The minister's inability to curb his colleagues or to persuade the Prime Minister to curb them indicates that the considerations behind the fiscal policy of this government are not economic but political.

It all comes down to one basic fact. The government has grossly overspent. Later I intend to deal in some detail both with the spending record of the government and with its disgraceful record of increasing taxes throughout its term of office. What then do we face because of the government's complete disregard of any sense of thrift or of any trust placed in it by the Canadian people that it will spend their money wisely and carefully? The Liberal government has so overspent that it can no longer use taxation as a measure of fiscal policy. This has put unbelievably severe pressures on any possible monetary control of the economy, and because of loss of confidence it can no longer borrow the required sums without paying exorbitant rates of interest. I refer of course to the sums it requires because of its huge deficit in turn caused by its spendthrift ways.

The government's prime need is cash —cash pure and simple—to pay its bills. We have witnessed a desperate attempt by the minister in the last few months to instil some confidence in investors for Canadian securities. The minister began by saying that in next year's estimates there will be huge savings. How silly can he be, and how naïve does he think Canadians are? How could we know what savings will be made next year? No one outside government circles has ever seen the coming year's original estimates. I would think the original estimates for every year since confederation have been cut and frequently slashed before the final figure was presented by the government. Despite all this fancy footwork by the minister, he said that next years spending will be 4.5 per cent above this year's, a year in which spending has been the highest ever. I ask, why? The press across this country is worried, as we have seen in recent weeks and months, and I would like to read a few words out of an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of November 14, 1967, which read as follows:

> Finance Minister Sharp has been sanctimoniously parading a four-and-one-half per cent increase in government expenditures next year as thrift incorporated.
> By this government's standards, 4½ per cent is peanuts. But this is 4½ per cent on top of 12 per cent last year which in turn was on top of 14 per cent the year before. All Sharp and the government are doing is to slow down the rate of spending which got out of hand years ago.
> If the government had said that it was going to reduce its spending by 4½ per cent or even keep it the same as last year, the protestations of a return to fiscal responsibility could be taken more seriously.

This is an example, Mr. Speaker, of the majority opinion across Canada today that this government has mismanaged fiscal and monetary affairs.

If I may summarize, Mr. Speaker, fiscal policy—that is, the attempt to control the level of economic activity—has been tossed out of the window. These taxes have nothing to do with the over-all requirements of the Canadian economy. Indeed they may well do a lot of harm to economic activity. The government simply needs money—lots of money —to pay for its extravagances. It cannot borrow any more. Despite this, it still intends to spend more. This present attempt to bolster confidence in Canada's financial policy by raising taxes should have been unnecessary. The required confidence would have been there had the government acted prudently on the matter of expenditure over the past few years.

When this debate is resumed, Mr. Speaker, the minister's so-called message will have been given the most careful attention. I do not intend tonight to delve into his tax changes; certainly there will be plenty said about them next week. May I simply conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that here again we have had another Scrooge budget with which to face Christmas. I suggest that the taxpayer's lament at this time might well be: "I'm dreaming of a white Christmas—bled white by this government".

May I adjourn the debate, Mr. Speaker?

On motion of Mr. Monteith the debate was adjourned.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES COMPENSATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING EXTENSION OF COVERAGE

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-184, to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL MUSEUMS

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CORPORATION FOR ADMINISTRATION

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-2, to establish a corporation for the administration of the national museums of Canada.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the minister not going to make a statement? We would like to hear her speak tonight.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I do have a lengthy speech, but since hon. members are in such a good mood I shall not continue at length. I should like to say to hon. gentlemen that this bill has been before the other place and been to a committee in March of this year. It was reported back unamended, and now appears before the house.

This is an interesting bill, dealing with some of our oldest institutions—the National Gallery, which goes back to 1913, and the museums of Canada, which go back to 1842, some four years older than a similar institute, the Smithsonian, in the United States.

The principal purpose of the bill is to bring together under one administration all national museums, including the National Gallery. There is to be set up one board, which is not to be composed of experts but a board of generally cultured people to represent the country. The members of the board may be replaced from time to time, instead of the board being a sort of self-perpetuating organization as is the case with some boards. The legislation also provides for the setting up of advisory councils of experts in various disciplines. These it is expected will be of assistance to the board.

This situation is somewhat similar to that at the Smithsonian, which as some hon. members may know is a loosely knit series of museums. Some of them are run completely by government appointed officials; others by individuals who have privately made very substantial donations, such as the board of the national gallery in the United States, which has been set up almost completely through Mellon money.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, the legislation deals with the National Gallery and the museums. As hon. members know, some new museums have been opened, including one in a temporary home, the Museum for Science, which was opened a week or so ago and is already proving extremely popular. There is also the new aircraft museums. In fact, there are three kinds of museums in existence. All three branches of the museum, together with the gallery will be placed under a single board of trustees and its officers. There will be a senior administrator who will be designated secretary general, and the purpose of designating him is to bring all the administration into one place to relieve people who become directors of the gallery, or of the museums, and who themselves are experts in a great deal of administrative responsibility and routine.

We think this will lead to savings of money and to a more economical and improved administration. It will free the director of the gallery and directors of the museums, and allow them to devote their full time to the professional development of their museums. We hope that this type of administration will improve the interest in and support of all our national galleries. The legislation will set up a board of trustees to run our galleries. It will set up a single administrative body, with the persons composing it reporting to the under secretary of state.

The provisions of this bill deal with moneys that will be voted by parliament for the purposes of the corporation, through normal estimates and appropriation procedures. The cost of the administration and operational programs of the corporation will be financed and controlled in exactly the same way as if the corporation were a department of government. There is a normal provision for a revolving fund to cover the holding of publications and their sale to the public. We also provide in the bill for two special accounts in the consolidated revenue fund, both of which will be interest bearing and non-lapsing. The first is a purchase account for the acquisition of objects for the collections on the advice of, and with suitable delegation of authority to, individual directors. As hon. members may recall, in times past money has lapsed if it has not been used in a fiscal year. As I say, purchases will be made on the advice of directors, who will assist in these purchases.

The second account is a special trust account which will enable the trustees to accept, if they see fit, and to administer, donations and bequests of any kind, in accordance with the conditions which may be attached to those donations. In the past it has not been possible to accept conditional gifts. For instance, in the past if someone wanted to leave something to Canada but wanted what he left to be kept in a certain part of Canada, or if he wanted the gift to be used for a particular purpose it was not possible to accept it. We hope that now a much wider group of Canadians will have the opportunity to benefit from the national collections.

In brief, Mr. Speaker, the provisions of the bill are to ensure that the national treasures of Canada are preserved, added to and made available to Canadians as a whole. This bill, which has already been scrutinized by members in the other place, deserves speedy passage through this house, and I commend that course to hon. members.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Before the hon. lady resumes her seat, would she indicate whether she is prepared, after second reading, to send this bill to one of the standing committees —perhaps to the committee on crown corporations—for study? The hon. lady's answer might enable us to give some indication of what we might do on second reading.

Miss LaMarsh: I refer my hon. friend to the volume of the other place where this matter was debated.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I have read the debate, thoroughly.

Miss LaMarsh: It is obvious that the learned gentlemen of the other place perhaps have more time, and some might say, more proclivity—

[Miss LaMarsh.]

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Perhaps they have not more wisdom.

Miss LaMarsh: I have been taught that my elders necessarily have more wisdom than I have.

Mr. Churchill: Hear, hear.

Miss LaMarsh: That means that my hon. friend is wiser than I am—though only by a month or so. Since this matter has been scrutinized by those in the other chamber, who perhaps have more time than we have for such scrutiny, and since this matter was before a committee, and this bill has been examined for more than six months, perhaps hon. members of this chamber might deal with the bill expeditiously at this time.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit another question before she sits down? Can she tell the house whether this legislation envisages that any of these museums will have branches in various parts of Canada, so that the things we collect for Canada can be seen by more of our people?

Miss LaMarsh: Not specifically. As my hon. friend realizes, a new museum building has long been promised for the capital area. That is becoming necessary.

Mr. Dinsdale: Hear, hear.

Miss LaMarsh: First, we must have a building for display purposes. We now have considerable additional storage area. Of course there is no purpose in having national treasures if they are not out where people can see them. In the past the National Gallery has spent much money and has done laudable work for art shows. It is contemplated that the treasures which are owned by the people of Canada, and are permanent deposits here, will be made available to as many Canadians as possible. I think that all directors of museums and galleries are anxious for our people to see our treasures. A good example of the kind of thing being done can be seen in the centennial train and caravans, which have brought matters of interest to our people in their home environments.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, after the harrowing experience we have gone through tonight, after listening to the Minister of Finance, I am interested to know if the Secretary of State can define "cultivated people"?

Miss LaMarsh: My hon. friend would qualify. It means, people of culture.

Mr. Dinsdale: Could I ask the hon. lady if it is contemplated to reach an understanding with provincial museums whereby the most important art treasures in Ottawa can be made available, on loan, to provincial museums? This would be particularly useful in bringing some artifacts in other parts of Canada to Ottawa. The provincial areas involved would be willing to co-operate if there were some basis that would enable the exchange of art treasures between the provinces and Ottawa.

Miss LaMarsh: Nothing in the bill prevents that. There has been a sort of renaissance in our museums and the gallery; which has been stimulated by centennial year. I thank hon. members for supporting, by their attendance, centennial openings of museums, and for their attendance in the gallery. There seems to be an intensified interest this year in these matters, with greater exchange and co-operation between national and provincial institutions. I am sure, if it is parliament's wish that there be more active programs of exchange, that the directors would be happy to know of this, and happy to know that they have parliament's support.

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): I had hoped that the minister would agree to referring this bill to one of our standing committees, before which we might take evidence. We could try to determine what the future of the national museums, the National Gallery and other organizations that will come under the aegis of this new bill, will be. I confess that I have grave reservations about the proposals made in this bill.

We, as Canadians, have been tremendously neglectful of our history and traditions. We do not seem to understand that we have one of the most romantic histories of any country in the world. We are inclined to play down the history of our nation and to say, "We are dull people; we do not count in the great march of history."

Anyone examining our country, whether that examination is confined to the great march of history, to archaeology, or to the history of the last 300 or 400 years, will find that ours is one of the most exciting and romantic histories. We need to let our young people understand this. If they do understand, I believe we shall have some unity in our nation. It is for that reason that this bill is of greater importance than, perhaps, hon. members realize.

• (9:30 p.m.)

The bill received a very cursory examination in the other place. I hope you will not call me to order, Mr. Speaker, but that is the type of examination which the other place is giving to all legislation, and if the other place does not give better examination to bills than it has been doing in the last two years it will forfeit its right to be considered a second chamber of any distinction whatever.

An hon. Member: It has already done so.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I opened on the basis of our history and how important it is. Now we come to consider the problems faced by the National Museum over the last number of years. It is foolish to say there have not been very grave problems indeed. The minister has experienced them, and so did her predecessor. Before this bill goes to committee I think it is important that we should ask: How will it change or help to solve problems of a personality nature? Such a change will not be brought about simply by appointing a new board of directors.

I have a clipping in front of me with the headline: "Glover's Statement—Museum Bill Cause for Resignation." There have been many resignations from the National Museum over the last three or four years. Why? I think we should be given an explanation. How will this bill improve matters? I see the minister pointing to one of her predecessors in this connection. These problems should be clarified, and that is why I would like the bill to go to the committee.

The major reservation I have in connection with this measure is that it would bring the National Gallery under a board of trustees which would have responsibility for all our museums. I shall need a great deal of convincing that this is the best course to follow. I confess I do not believe that the type of persons who would agree to serve on a board and who would be interested in geology, paleontology, in the National Aviation Museum, in ethnology, archeology or various subjects of that kind would be persons with the judgment and discrimination required to make a first class job of running the National Gallery of Canada.

Perhaps we have not gone as far as we should in building up our National Gallery. I shall have to take my full share of responsibility, as a minister who once reported for the gallery. I think we have been inclined to downgrade its affairs, to say that art is for the arty folk and that not too much attention should be paid to it. The minister shakes her head. I give her full credit for the approach she has taken since she has been responsible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): We must recognize the National Gallery as something that our grandchildren—I hope the great grandchildren of the minister—will regard as one of the great assets of the nation.

Miss LaMarsh: My grandchildren?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No, the minister's great grandchildren.

Miss LaMarsh: I had better get started.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I do not want to give the minister any incentive tonight.

Miss LaMarsh: The hon. member always has.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am getting in deep, I can see.

Mr. Churchill: How about getting back to the bill?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): We should look upon the National Gallery as one of the truly great assets of this nation in the years ahead. My point is this: Can we hope to get a board of directors composed of men and women sufficiently sophisticated and sufficiently knowledgeable in relation to National Gallery matters, whom we should also appoint to the board of the National Museum with its special interests in paleontology, zoology and so on? I will need some convincing.

I am aware that this is the situation in the Smithsonian Institute. I have been there and I recognize it is one of the most magnificent institutes in the world, one of the finest series of buildings I have ever visited. But I wonder whether we could duplicate such a board in Canada. I fear we cannot. I think, therefore, we should retain a board responsible for the National Gallery, and that we should have a separate board responsible for the National Museum. In my opinion the step proposed in this bill is a retrograde one. I think we shall suffer as a result of it, and that the future will show its lack of wisdom.

It is true there has been much pettiness in the National Museum and we want to get rid of it. The suggestion here is that we should wipe the slate clean and have a new board. But I wonder whether the result will be the one it is hoped to achieve. I trust the minister will give serious consideration to these words, which are sincerely spoken and which reflect my concern about whether it is wise to bring the museum and the gallery together. Would it not be far better to keep them separate, and to give distinct responsibilities to those who are prepared to serve the two institutions.

I had not intended to speak on this subject. I would have much prefered to speak tonight on the budget. But I want at least to indicate the most serious reservations with respect to this legislation, to tell the minister why I hope it will go to the committee, and why, if it gets to the committee of the whole, the hon. lady should give us explanations far more complete than those which have yet been presented to us.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): My hon. friends in this party were somewhat surprised when I indicated that I wished to say a few words on this bill. Perhaps, because our policy does not allow me to accept an appointment to the Senate, they were wondering whether I was not asking to join a museum.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: First of all, I want to repeat the compliment which the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) paid the minister. It seems that since the hon. lady became responsible for the museum a great deal of the pettiness and professional jealousy which went on in the past has been dissipated. We support the principle and purpose of the bill. We are not sure what experience will prove with respect to its administration but we do think it is a great improvement over the situation as it has existed in the past.

I have been interested in this subject for a number of years. People in other countries have been interested in it also. I have received dozens of letters from people interested in museums across Canada and the United States expressing concern at the events which have taken place in our National Museum. I should like to quote briefly from one of these letters because it shows that others, outside Canada, are interested in this question.

• (9:40 p.m.)

I have a letter here from Dr. Vernon Leslie, director of the Pennsylvania Institute of Anthropology dated December 26, 1963:

Dear Mr. Herridge:

For some time I have been intending to write to you relative to the situation which has unfortunately been allowed to develop at the Canadian National Museum. Many scholars in the United States have been observing events there for several years—in fact, since the resignation of one of America's most brilliant young archeologists, Mr. Thomas E. Lee.

Since science knows no international boundaries and because of the fact that your name has been mentioned as a champion of the effort to clean up this museum mess once and for all—

I did not know I was a champion of anything really.

—I am taking the liberty of writing to you on the matter. It is the feeling here that every effort should be made to restore the museum to its former status as a research institution.

I judge that is contemplated in the terms of this bill.

Then I have another letter here from the Director of the Instituto Interamericano, of Denton, Texas, dated November 13, 1963:

Dear Mr. Herridge:

We have been interested in the affairs of the National Museum of Canada for some time since our organization is dedicated to the study of man and his activities, past and present, and the dissemination of knowledge thereof. We have kept in touch with the museum's stormy affairs through the Canadian press. I enclose a copy of our current newsletter that you may see how things look to us at the moment. See page 5.

I read the newsletter and it indicated at some length their, shall I say, grief at what was happening in our national museum at that time.

While our area of interest is world wide, we are perhaps best informed on the U.S. and Latin America. For this reason we are curious about certain points and facts which seem uniquely Canadian.

Then he went on to write:

A third point involves the museum staff. It is rather odd that twice within four years there should be wholesale resignations either voluntary or forced. Is this due to internal stresses or is it also a matter of politics as also has been suggested by published articles?

I suppose that all of this is really none of our affair but we are intensely interested and greatly involved in anthropology in the Americas and this museum matter affects Canadian anthropology gravely. Moreover, we have always had a very warm feeling for Canada and her people.

Sincerely yours,

Carl B. Compton,
Director.

Then I had another letter from the director of The Massachusetts Archaeological Society, Inc., who wrote on January 3, 1964:

Dear Sir:

The writer has noted with growing concern the adverse effects of the present controversy in Ottawa with regard to the control of archaeological work in that area. This attempt by certain professional archaeolgists to obtain complete control of the field is by no means confined to Canada.

I think in this letter he was referring to certain United States citizens who could not take the oath of allegiance to Canada and who had a very prominent part in our museum at that time.

Witness the treatment accorded to Dr. Vernon Leslie in this country for publishing an article entitled "Fraud in Ontario Archaeology."

This shows that what happened in our museum aroused the interest of museum directors in many places in the United States as well as in Canada. I have one more short letter here, and I want to quote briefly from it in view of the minister's statement that the purpose of the museum is to preserve things of great value to Canada, artifacts and things of that sort. The letter is from Mrs. Robert L. Needham, who is a bachelor of science and a master of arts, sent from 647 River Road, Corunna, Ontario, on January 30, 1964:

Dear Mr. Herridge:

Would you please send me a copy of Hansard containing your speech re the national museum disgrace?

I am an American with a Canadian husband, living in Canada. Canadians criticize Hoffa. We Americans have no greater national disgrace, at least until Kennedy's assassination, to equal that museum scandal.

Canadian artifacts being given by McNeish to American museums is something Canadians are going to resent in a very big way.

Further on she wrote:

Dr. Rousseau and Mr. Tom Lee could make that museum a place of which Canadians could be proud.... The government has let the Canadian people down most shamefully.

That was the government of the hon. gentleman from Carleton, who was speaking a few minutes ago. Then she added:

—we, my Canadian husband and I, admire you for trying to do something about it.

I just brought to the attention of the house certain facts given to me by the staff of the museum at that time. Then came this paragraph:

Dr. Rousseau and Mr. Tom Lee could make that museum a place of which Canadians could be proud, instead of the pathetic shambles it is, losing its good men to the U.S. because they can't stand the disgrace of it. We've admired Tom Lee's absolute honesty, integrity and courage to fight for Canada while being soundly booted by the country of his loyalty.

I just wish to give one more quotation from the Anthropological Journal of Canada, volume 5, No. 3, 1967, which is the quarterly bulletin of the Anthropological Association of Canada. The editor is Thomas E. Lee who, I understand, is now professor of anthropology at Montreal University. In it he has an article entitled, "Members of Parliament, Lend Me Your Ears." It reads in part:

Readers of this Journal have long been aware of editorial concern over the problem of foreign control of archaeology and the archaeological profession in Canada. In general, references have been oblique, often obscure, out of certain knowledge of human nature that to mention the citizenship of an involved person is to raise the hackles of well-meaning but poorly informed friends, and to be branded as "anti" something or other. The international character of the Anthropological Association of Canada and its published bulletin, of its associates, and of its long record of co-operation, should tell all reasonable persons that, as applied to either the association or myself, the charge would be false. But, as one who was hounded from a civil service position, into long years of unemployment in my own country by the activities of non-Canadians and those who served them well, I feel eminently qualified and informed to speak on that subject. And one might even dare hope that thoughtful Americans would share the concern and resentment of their Canadian counterparts and of the victims themselves—

The peculiar placing of R. S. MacNeish of Brooklyn in the civil service of Canada in 1949—an act with which J. B. Griffin of the University of Michigan proudly told our government years later he had "something to do"—was the beginning of a process that has produced an institution and a profession in Canada that is anything but Canadian, although supported entirely by Canadian taxpayers' dollars. What parliament apparently was unable to determine, then or later, was the extent to which infiltration by non-citizens had occurred in university departments and other institutions across Canada—

Yes, Canadians have been pathetically apathetic—indifferent to what has been going on around them and among them. They might do well to look at page 7, The Interamerican, volume v. 14, No. 4, 1967, Denton, Texas. "By a vote of more than 13-1 the Fellows of the American Anthropological Association have adopted a statement which deplores the employment of anthropological research as a cover for foreign intelligence activity."

I just wonder whether any of these gentlemen were placed in our museum staff, or in other museums in this country, as a cover for foreign intelligence agencies. I have had quite a few discussions with a number of people who have come to my office from Montreal, Toronto, and other places, and this is of serious concern to some of them.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Further on the article reads:

But if anyone raised the matter of citizenship, this is not indicated. And it ought to have been raised. This is no innocent little get-together of a group of professional men co-operating across the border. This "Council For Canadian Archaeology"—composed of persons "concerned with work in Canadian archaeology or working in Canadian institutions" is very heavily loaded with United States citizens—as was the group of 12 meeting in Reno, Nevada, at an earlier date to hatch up the scheme (although the birthing pangs are happily and conveniently attributed to a Canadian-born holder of a Michigan degree).

• (9:50 p.m.)

I have quoted briefly from some of these letters and this article in order to indicate what has happened in the past and what has caused many Canadians a great deal of concern, particularly those who are interested in this subject. This is the reason, when I rose to speak, that I congratulated the minister. The tenor, the tempo and the development since this department has come under her jurisdiction have been greatly improved. I trust that the board of trustees for the administration of this and other museums will clear up the situation once and for all, and that the numerous citizens who are qualified will have the first opportunity to serve the government of Canada, rather than those who are sent in from other places at the direction of anthropological organizations outside of this country.

That is all I have to say at the present time. I may have a few words to say when we deal with the various clauses of the bill.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay the second reading of this bill, nor do I wish to prevent other members who have indicated an interest in this bill from having an opportunity to speak in respect of it. In view of the fact that there are several other members who wish to speak tonight, I think perhaps the suggestion already made by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), to the effect that we might well refer this legislation to a suitable committee following second reading, would be an excellent one. I say this because I did have some responsibility for museum matters for a short period, not during the period referred to by the hon. member who has just spoken, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), but following that period of difficulty, when plans were afoot to put the National Museum of Canada on a basis that would be adequate for the stature of Canada at this particular time.

It had been the hope that by our centennial year we would have a fine new building and a fine new organization, such as is outlined in this legislation, as one of our major centennial projects. If I might be permitted to quote the bard on St. Andrew's night, "The best laid schemes o' mice and men Gang aft a-gley". I might take this measure as a step forward. However, unfortunately I have found myself in precisely the same position as the hon. member for Carleton. I have searched the records of the debates of the other place and I am forced to say that the discussions there were quite superficial. I believe that if we referred this matter to a committee the interest generated there, both on the part of the members and the press would have a beneficial and educational effect in influencing the public of Canada as to the importance of preserving their historic past.

Even though we are dealing with artifacts and the Canadian past, it is almost impossible to find published information on the operations of the Canadian National Museum. I am sure members would be only too happy, in coming to grips with this situation, to take the necessary time to examine the legislation, which on the surface seems to be reasonable enough so far as the personnel organization is concerned. I do not believe that merely to state it is patterned after the Smithsonian Institute is too informative. One thing of course which we will not have is the facilities and buildings which house the Smithsonian Institute. This is an important aspect of any museum project.

At this stage I would support the hon. member for Carleton and hope that the minister would refer this matter to a committee for further examination.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that the committee system is quite valuable in examining pieces of legislation, but I cannot quite share the imaginative enthusiasm of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) in his suggestion that it would excite the imagination of the many members of the press to have this bill referred to a committee. I think we could do just as valuable an assessment of it here as could be done in a committee—and perhaps a more valuable one. As the minister put it, we do not all fall within the class of people who have the detailed interest which one would have to have in a subject such as this.

I am one who on a number of occasions has had cramps in his legs from visiting museums, because I enjoy the materials contained therein. I have a particular interest in them. I should like to mention certain items of artistic and historic value which usually are contained in museums and which emanate from the native Indian people on the west coast. These people developed an artistic form which is equal to perhaps anything in the world. I believe it was the people of the early west coast tribes, with their artistry and imagination, who did the murals and totemic carvings which contributed a tremendous amount to artistic matters and art forms. It has been mentioned by someone far more learned than I that the totemic works of the west coast Indians were the only original North American art forms developed here and that everything else had been developed in another nation. This particular form is extremely original.

A program of totem pole restoration is being undertaken all along the Skeena river. This is a program in which the provincial government assists financially. I do not know whether it is conceivable that the museums might be able to participate in this program, but it would seem to me that this would be a very worthwhile project for the corporation or some of the museums to participate in. In this way they would be able to help preserve some of the value and quality of these totem poles on the sites where they originally stood.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether there is a desire to proceed or to call it ten o'clock. In view of the fact that some other members have indicated a desire to speak, I think I might call it ten o'clock and return to this subject another day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order, please. It is now ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government house leader if he would give us some indication concerning which matters will be discussed tomorrow on government orders, and the order in which they will be taken up.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue with the second reading of the bill to establish a corporation for the administration of the National Museums of Canada. Then we will have the committee stage consideration of Bill No. C-151 with regard to the financing of the Canadian National Railways system. The next order of business will be the second reading of Bill No. S-19, respecting the boundary between the province of British Columbia and the Yukon and Northwest Territories. This will be followed by second reading of Bill S-18, an act to amend the Publication of Statutes Act; second reading of Bill S-3, an act respecting the armed forces of countries visiting Canada; the resolution preparatory to amending the Historic Sites and Monuments Act, and the resolution preparatory to amending the National Parks Act.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Starr: When that is finished what will we do?

Mr. MacEachen: If that is finished at any time tomorrow afternoon I would be glad to move the adjournment of the house.

On Monday I should like to call the resolution now on the order paper preparatory to amending the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and, hopefully, the resolution on divorce, prior to resuming the budget debate.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may we have some indication as to the time when the budget debate will be resumed? Will it be on Tuesday in any case, or is this day like a movable feast day?

Mr. MacEachen: Tonight it is movable, but perhaps by tomorrow evening I will be able to say definitely that we will not call it until Wednesday. I should like to get these two resolutions passed before we begin the budget debate, so that members will have an opportunity to examine the bill on divorce and the bill in respect of the Industrial Disputes and Investigations Act. It may be that if the house takes the full time allotment on each of these resolutions we will not be able to proceed with the budget debate until Wednesday. Perhaps by consultation we may have some indication as to whether we can call the budget debate for Tuesday or Wednesday.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, if I may be so bold as to suggest some change in the order of business which might help expedite the completion of this business, perhaps we could take second reading of the bill in respect of the national museums, and then proceed to number 11 on the order paper followed by number 41, number 43 and number 29.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. Knowles: Apparently there are lots of movable feasts.

Mr. MacEachen: I have no objection to that rearranged order. I agree that we call the items mentioned in the suggested order, and then the C.N.R. bill, followed by the business in the order I suggested.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—MILK—ALLEGED HARDSHIP THROUGH MINIMUM QUOTAS

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening as a result of a question I posed to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) last Friday, asking him whether he had received representations from the milk producers pointing out that the government dairy policy with regard to minimum quotas is creating grave economic hardships, especially among small producers. This question was unanswered at the time and I now appreciate the opportunity of putting it again this evening.

I have received many protests, both verbal and written, from milk producers and milk processors in Prince Edward-Lennox. Indeed, this government is placing the producers, especially the small producers, the processors and the small cheese and butter factories in jeopardy. My question last Friday was urgent.

If the Minister of Agriculture and this government do not change their policies and abolish this discriminatory 50,000 pound minimum quota, the small milk producers of this country will not only be soon forced out of business but, indeed, many of them will inevitably have to ask for other forms of assistance. Let me quote the letter I received on November 15 from the executive of the Elmbrook Cheese and Butter company of Picton, Ontario, in Prince Edward county. It is from Mr. A. Ackerman, the secretary treasurer of the Elmbrook Cheese and Butter company, who says:

Dear Sir:

Enclosed please find a "resolution" that the board of directors of the Elmbrook Cheese and Butter Co. Ltd. made at a meeting recently.

If all our patrons under the 50,000 lb. quota are cut off from subsidy it would sure hurt our factory.

Would you please see what can be done about this?

Thanking you in advance for giving this your attention, we are, yours truly—

Here is the resolution:

Be it resolved that we are not in favour of the 50,000 lbs. milk quota. We have about 68 patrons and of that number one third are under that quota. In order to operate our factory we need the small patrons as well as the big senders.

Mr. Speaker, this letter from the Elmbrook Cheese and Butter Company Limited is proof enough that this government seems determined to drive the small producer and cheese and butter factories from the market and out of business. Such policies cannot be tolerated, for they endanger the very economy of a vast section of rural Canada. The minister may say that a farmer or rural landholder producing less than 50,000 lbs. of milk per year is not running a viable or economically successful business.

The minister may arrive at his conclusions because of some of these modern, yet not necessarily sound economic doctrines which now try to dictate that to be successful one must be big. I refute this dogma, which is an unreliable concept. Several businessmen at home in Napanee and Picton—dealing in the farm trade, the feed dealers, the farm supply dealers and the farm implement dealers, tell me that this concept is not always so. They tell me that for the most part their best accounts and their soundest credit lie with the small farmer and not always with those who, like mushrooms, have suddenly sprung overnight into big business.

Most of these small milk producers are the owners of the smaller farms of 100 acres or less. They are men and women who are too old to attempt to venture into expansion but who are not yet of pensionable age. They are people who keep from six to ten milking cows, and quite often the reason they do not produce more than 50,000 lbs. per year is that they are feeding calves which they rear for market. These may be for either veal or for future milk cows. The calves are either pail-fed or suckling. This type of farmer in his farm practice is producing just as much, and perhaps more, toward the betterment of the country's economy as the man producing 75,000 or 100,000 lbs. of milk.

But no, this government will not give the small producer any subsidy or recognition. This is nothing but discrimination against approximately one third of the farmers of eastern Canada. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Moore) informs me that the same applies to western Canada.

One of my constituents said to me the other day in protest when I met him on the street in Napanee, "My wife and I milk six cows. We have been sending our product to the Forest Mills cheese factory for many years. We use the money from our milk cheques to pay the taxes, insurance and grocery bills at the village store. We have 100 acres of farm and we must use the grassland for some good purpose. Now I understand we will not receive the $1.10 subsidy because we do not produce enough to suit the government. We are not going to part with our cows, and we are going to continue to send milk anyway and get what we can from our small operation, despite the sting of discrimination as practised by this government."

Mr. Speaker, I find that this man is not alone. There are others sending to the same factory who will continue to send milk even though they do not receive the subsidy. What a travesty of trade results from the lack of use of good Canadian common sense on the part of the minister and his department. Now we will have one farmer for example who produces 51,000 lbs. of milk per year receiving all the government largesse in subsidies, but another one producing 49,000 lbs. of milk gets nothing from the government; and if he continues to send milk he takes $1.10 per hundred less for the same product. I say to the minister, stop this discrimination immediately.

I have made other inquiries and am informed that Pet Milk Canada Ltd. in Napanee, a large processor, has about 400 patrons. Of these patrons between 75 and 100 are small producers of less than 50,000 lbs. per year. What about the butter industry and the cream producer? Canadian butter production for 1967 has decreased in comparison with 1966. This is directly attributable to the present dairy policy of the government. I understand the dairy commission announced that the limitation of 50,000 lbs. for a producer to be eligible for subsidy in 1968-69 would not apply to cream shippers, and that there would be consultation with proper organizations as to a minimum quantity of cream to be eligible for subsidy next year.

This is a very indefinite promise which will not give the cream shippers and the smaller creameries much hope. Does the minister not realize that without the $1.10 subsidy the cream shipper only receives $2.20 per hundredweight for standard 3.5 milk? This is a far cry from the promised $4.75 per hundredweight.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, I did not start until six minutes after ten o'clock and it is not yet 10.13.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): The allotted time for hon. members during the adjournment debate is seven minutes.

Mr. Alkenbrack: With due respect, Mr. Speaker, I have not yet spoken for seven minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): I regret to inform the hon. member that he has spoken for seven minutes.

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the implication in the hon. member's question is that small producers are now suffering hardship as a result of the minimum quota policy of the Canadian Dairy Commission for the current year ending next March 31 is of course completely wrong. In fact, quite the reverse is the case. When the commission established the principle of limiting the total amount of subsidies to the requirements of the domestic market, and giving each shipper a subsidy quota for the amount of manufacturing milk or cream which he delivered last year, it made one very significant exception. The exception was that if a shipper delivered less than the equivalent of 50,000 pounds of 3.5 per cent milk last year, he was given a subsidy quota of 50,000 pounds for this year. This meant that if a shipper delivered, say, 10,000 pounds last year, he could get a subsidy on deliveries of up to 50,000 pounds this year. This can hardly be regarded as discriminating against the small shipper.

Presumably what the hon. member had in mind in his question was the statement of the Canadian Dairy Commission on April 14 last that it proposed not to issue quotas in 1968-69 to producers who delivered less than 50,000 pounds of milk in 1967-68.

In answer to his question I can say that representations have been received from farm organizations and from dairy groups with respect to this. I can say also that almost without exception they support the principle that there should be some minimum level of production to qualify for a federal dairy subsidy.

In taking this position they agree with the fundamental point that milk and cream production and subsidies must be related to the needs of the domestic market, and that the available subsidies should be directed to help develop more efficient production units. This of course was the reason why the commission this year gave quotas of 50,000 pounds to those who shipped less than that last year, so that the commission would put no obstacles in their way to reach the minimum volume which it proposed for next year.

There is of course some difference of opinion as to what that minimum quantity should be. The commission itself announced some time ago that the proposed figure of 50,000 pounds of milk would be reviewed with respect to cream shipments. That review is still going on and as soon as possible, after taking into consideration all representations and all the factors involved, a decision will be taken and an announcement made.

HOUSING—MONTREAL—AVAILABILITY OF HABITAT '67 AT EXPO SITE

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, November 27, I asked the Minister of Labour the following question:

> Since there is a certain shortage of housing in Montreal, and since Habitat '67 is almost completely vacant, will the minister state whether C.M.H.C. intend to take over Habitat '67 or whether they would consider making it available to low and middle income families at least on a part time basis?

In reply to this question the Minister of Labour said that he would have to take it as notice. Under ordinary circumstances I would not have pressed the point further, but since I felt action was required immediately I put the question on the agenda for the adjournment debate.

This month there was an article in the Montreal Star written by Charles Lazarus in which he pointed out that out of the 115 completed units at Habitat '67 only 12 to 15 are still rented, and only two of these will be rented for the winter. He also pointed out that while it was originally hoped to rent these apartments after the conclusion of Expo, this proposal was cut back by the government's hope to reduce Expo costs. In his article Mr. Lazarus said:

> The decision announced a few weeks ago by Michael Preston, administrator of Habitat for Expo '67, that the $300 to $715 monthly rent scale would be continued after the exhibition, has been suspended pending further action to place the project under the jurisdiction of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.
> If and when that happens, it is expected that the range of rents will be considerably lower than the $300-$715 scale.

Then Mr. Michael Preston was quoted as saying:

> The problem . . . is that we cannot negotiate leases since we are waiting for some specific decision by the federal government, which is taking over the project.

It is my proposal that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation take over Habitat as quickly as possible and make it available to medium and low income families, especially those families which have been displaced by renewal projects in Little Burgundy, Lower Westmount and elsewhere. Many of these families have been put out of their homes to make way for these projects, and I understand are having difficulty finding new homes at similar rentals. If no one is going to use Habitat, I cannot see why it cannot be made available to some of these people as quickly as possible.

If there is going to be action, Mr. Speaker, I think it should be taken very quickly. Rents could be scaled to incomes and to meet the cost of services and upkeep. Once the urban renewal and public housing projects to which I have referred have been completed, these same families could be moved back into them and Habitat used as originally planned.

Some might say that we cannot use a luxury project like Habitat for this sort of thing, or set the rents as low as I propose, but it seems that it is better to get some rent from this project rather than get none at all. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, we are providing housing for families who are now living in deplorable conditions.

In support of my question the Montreal Star in an editorial dated November 29, 1967 had this to say:

> —what use could better reflect the whole spirit of Expo, which gave birth to the project?

Which, Mr. Speaker, is "Man and His World".

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member who has just spoken for having raised this question. It is timely since I realize full well that people have begun asking questions about the future of Habitat, which played such a useful part during Expo '67.

I am sure the hon. member will be interested to know that negotiations are proceeding now with representatives of the city of Montreal, the province of Quebec and the federal government for the disposition of certain Expo assets, including Habitat. These negotiations should be completed very shortly, and it is quite possible—I will not say probable, but it is certainly possible—that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation may become responsible for the administration of Habitat '67. If this is the case, it would be the intention of the corporation to make Habitat available for rental, but I am afraid, that having regard to the very substantial investment and also to the expenditures involved in winterizing such units as are not now occupied, they are likely to become available at a high quality rent rather than a rent which would fit in with incomes of people in the lower or middle income brackets.

The three levels of government have very substantial investments in Expo '67 and it was the hope that certain of the facilities provided would be disposed of, or put to reasonable economic use. That therefore should be the objective of C.M.H.C. were that body, as may well be the case, to take over this operation.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.22 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF PROPOSED REDUCTIONS IN ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. On November 15, as recorded at page 4305 of Hansard, I asked the following question:

Can the minister advise the house when he expects to announce the reduction in the spending estimates for 1967-68 which he has said he intends to make?

The minister replied as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I will be making a statement both about the spending in this fiscal year and our plans for next year when I make the statement I promised to make in the house when I bring down my supplementary financial measures.

Since the minister did not make such a statement or give this information when he made his financial statement last night, I would ask whether he would make it available to members of parliament before Monday so that when the budget debate begins we can proceed in a useful manner having this very important information before us.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) Mr. Speaker, in my financial statement yesterday I made this statement, as reported at page 4903 of Hansard:

My colleague the President of the Treasury Board, who is in charge of this expenditure control program, will speak in the budget debate next week and give the house some of the detailed decisions on these cuts.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that the budget debate is not particularly useful unless all the information that hon. members require to deal with it in a sensible fashion is available to them, and as the Minister of National Revenue may not speak until well on in the debate, would the minister consider my request to make this vitally important information available before the debate starts on Monday?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this is the responsibility of the President of the Treasury Board, and I think he should make the statement.

RECOMMENDATIONS BY TAXATION COMMISSION RESPECTING DEPLETION ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. On November 23, as recorded at page 4603 of Hansard, I put a question to him as follows:

I have a question for the Minister of Finance. A few days ago the minister indicated that he intended to make an interim statement with reference to the extractive industries, petroleum and mining, in connection with the Carter commission report.

Will he be making that statement now? He said he would be making it on his budget. I listened very attentively last night, like other hon. members, and I ask will he now be making that statement since he failed to make it in his budget report last night.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, all I intend to say at the present time about tax reform I said in my budget message yesterday.

Mr. Woolliams: As a supplementary question, is it the intention of the Minister of Finance to make any statement in the near future in reference to depletion allowances and special concessions under the Income Tax Act in connection with those industries?

Mr. Sharp: Not at the present time, Mr. Speaker. When the government presents its proposals dealing with tax reform our intentions will then be revealed, but I have nothing to add to what I said in my statement last night.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the government house leader. Would he consider adjourning the house this afternoon so we can all attend the funeral of the late Carter report?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall).

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I won't be able to attend.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the situation in Cyprus. I would ask the minister whether he can acquaint the house with the terms and conditions under which a settlement is being sought in that area and what response has been received from the three governments most intimately affected, namely the governments of Greece, Turkey and Cyprus.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated the other day, until final agreement has been reached I do not think it is possible to discuss the terms of the settlement. But it must be evident that these include the position of forces on the island other than the forces supplied by the United Nations. The tension on the island has very considerably decreased. I continue to be hopeful for an early agreement in principle which will solve the immediate issue. This has to do with the withdrawal of forces other than those of the United Nations. However, there are at this moment certain problems which are still to be overcome at the United Nations and elsewhere to which the Secretary General a few moments ago advised me he is addressing himself in consultation with the countries concerned.

Mr. Douglas: As a supplementary question, in view of the fact that some time this month the United Nations will be discussing the renewal of the mandate in Cyprus, is the Canadian government insisting that in such a renewed mandate the commander of the United Nations forces will have sufficient forces to police the situation and prevent the build-up of military forces in contravention of the terms of the Zurich agreement?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This will certainly be an aspect of the approach that we will be taking. I should point out to my hon. friend that the establishment of a United Nations force is something that depends not only on the action taken by the security council but on agreement made pursuant to the decision of the security council with the country on whose territory the force operates. I can assure my hon. friend that this question is very much in our minds.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

POSSIBLE DISCONTINUANCE OF INTERNATIONAL SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is a follow up to questions asked yesterday which the minister said he would take under advisement, concerning the decision of the government to abolish the foreign service of the C.B.C. I sense a real concern on the part of many people who feel the C.B.C. has done a commendable job in this regard, and I wonder whether the minister has a statement he can make to the house today.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I cannot add anything to what I said yesterday, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether in dealing with this matter the government would not consider it appropriate in the interests of economy to prune on top the branches rather than cut down the whole tree?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No one ever disagrees with a generality.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is argumentative.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

FURTHER LAY-OFFS IN INVESTIGATIVE AND SECURITY SECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wanted to direct to the Minister of Transport, but in his absence I shall direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. Can he advise the house of the extent of the further lay-offs during the last day or two in the investigative and security sections of the C.N.R.?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I will be very glad to look into that, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BURMA—DETENTION OF CANADIANS IN JAIL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs if he can inform the house what is the position of the two Canadians, to whom reference has been made previously, who were imprisoned and held incommunicado for some months in Rangoon. I understand they are coming up for sentence today. What is the actual position, and what is the hon. gentleman's department doing to protect their interests?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my information is that they have had their trial and that they were sentenced yesterday. I may be wrong, but I think they were sentenced to something like eight or nine months. I have sent instructions to our ambassador for a full report. He has seen the prisoners and will be reporting to me later today, and if I have the information before the end of the day I will advise my hon. friend. We have already been in touch with the parents.

Mr. Fulton: Will the hon. minister consider using his undoubted good offices with the Secretary General of the United Nations, U Thant, with whom the hon. gentleman is on very good terms, to see whether he can exert some influence in respect of the protection of these Canadians.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure my hon. friend, who has had considerable experience in the administration of justice, will recognize that there is a limitation in respect of the right of a country to interfere in the administration of justice in another country unless there are some special circumstances. We are now examining those special circumstances.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Were the parties in question properly represented by counsel, so their rights were put properly before the court in question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Whether they were properly represented I cannot say, but they were represented by counsel. The Canadian government is interested in this aspect of the case. If my hon. friend had been in Burma I would have utilized his services.

Mr. G. D. Clancy (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether there is not a rule that you do not serve a sentence in a mixed jail.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will have to give that question consideration.

Mr. Clancy: I have a supplementary request, Mr. Speaker. Answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary is argumentative.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the same subject. Where is our Canadian ambassador stationed who has been in touch with the two Canadians who have been imprisoned, and why were we dependent upon the British high commissioner in Malaysia for information with regard to these two gentlemen? Have we not extracted ourselves from our colonial period?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not know of any country that has moved away as quickly and as solidly from colonial status as has Canada. I am surprised that so distinguished a parliamentarian and historian of our affairs would put that kind of a question. Our high commissioner in Malaysia is accredited as ambassador in Burma. He is not normally resident in Burma but, as I said in the house three days ago when my hon. friend was absorbed elsewhere, he went to Burma to deal with this matter.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

PROTEST RESPECTING LAY-OFFS OF SHOP WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Norman Fawcett (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. I regret that I did not have time to give him notice. Has the minister received a protest from approximately 4,400 shop men employed at the Canadian Pacific Railway's Angus, Weston and Ogden shops regarding a notification from the C.P.R. that they will be temporarily laid off for the period December 22 to January 2? If the minister has received such a protest, does he intend to intervene?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this matter has not been drawn to my personal attention. I might say that I have been tied up continuously since early this morning on another matter, but I will inquire.

AIR CANADA

MONTREAL—APPOINTMENT OF INDUSTRIAL INQUIRY COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. I wish to ask him whether he has received a request from the national association of machinists urging that the minister appoint an industrial inquiry commission to investigate the dispute with Air Canada in Montreal. If so, will the minister be appointing such a commission?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, is the hon. gentleman inquiring about an industrial inquiry commission or a conciliation board?

Mr. Orlikow: My question referred to an industrial inquiry commission.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Nicholson: I will have to take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DIVORCE AND ABORTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Justice.

In view of the fact that he has stated several times that he would introduce a comprehensive bill to amend the Criminal Code, particularly as far as divorce and possibly abortion are concerned, could he inform the house whether he intends to introduce separate bills on divorce and on abortion so as to enable each member to express his opinions freely on these important questions.

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the bill on divorce will be a separate bill. In fact, if the member refers to the current orders of the day, he will find that the notice of motion is being published.

As for the other questions concerning the Criminal Code, they will be included in a comprehensive bill, an omnibus bill which I think will be introduced very shortly.

[English]

MR. JUSTICE LANDREVILLE

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION BY CABINET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, while I realize that this period is generally for the opposition, when I asked a question of a member of the cabinet in private he answered by suggesting that I ask it in the House of Commons. I thought you might like to know that. I have a question for the Minister of Justice, who is not the member to whom I referred. I should like to ask him whether the cabinet has taken any action whatsoever with regard to the Leo Landreville matter, which is of some concern to many people in this country.

[Translation]

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the cabinet has not taken action to grant a pension to Judge Landreville.

[English]

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION AND AVAILABLE FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question, particularly this week, to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his capacity as the man in charge of the Atlantic Development Board. In view of meetings of this board held in Ottawa early this week, and the slight degree of optimism on the part of the Minister of Finance in his budget speech last night about future expenditures there, can the minister say whether there will be any new plans or legislation announced in the near future? If so, what will they be?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to announce any new legislation at the present time.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Is the minister hopeful that we can do something to straighten out our problems there?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): May I ask the minister whether the report is correct that there will be no cut-back in the funds available to the Atlantic Development Board?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic Development Board has had considerable resources at its disposal. We expect that in the next year it will have considerable resources to assist the economy of the Atlantic provinces.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO REVIEW OF CANADA-U.S. AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Industry. In view of the fact that the United States-Canada auto agreement must be reviewed by the two governments concerned before the end of this month, has the review begun and, if not, what is the reason for the delay?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the review is to commence very shortly in Washington.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Industry. Do I take it that the United States authorities have now agreed to meet with their Canadian counterparts and conduct this review, and that this is something that had not happened two weeks ago?

Mr. Drury: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It did not happen two weeks ago because I think the difficulty was in arranging a suitable date rather than any other reason.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the minister when it is anticipated that this review will be completed; and will the results of the review be made public?

Mr. Drury: We hope to complete the review some time early in the new year. The results will of course be made public.

COPPER—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PRICE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Last week when Noranda Mines announced an increase of 4 cents a pound in the price of copper the minister answered a question on this matter and promised to look into the increase. The other day International Nickel announced a similar increase. I wonder whether the minister has looked into this matter and has anything to report to the house.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I answered a similar question asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and said the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I were both looking into all these increases.

WINTER WORKS

POSSIBLE SLOWING DOWN OF MUNICIPAL PROJECTS IN COMING YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday when referring to various cut-backs proposed by the government the minister let it be known that the expenditures of municipalities had not slowed down in the past ten years. Is it the intention of the minister to apply this austerity program to the extent of also slowing down winter works projects in the municipalities for the coming year?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, any announcements about the winter works program will be made by the appropriate minister.

SHIPBUILDING

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO BRITISH COLUMBIA SHIPYARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry. In view of the critical situation in our shipyards on the west coast, particularly in the Victoria area where employment has dropped from 2,700 to 700 in the last five years, is the minister considering any measures to assist this industry?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, as I think the hon. gentleman is aware, a scheme of transitional arrangements in respect of the west coast shipyards was agreed upon some two years ago between the federal government and the ship construction industry. This program is continuing.

Mr. Chatterton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister pursuing every angle with regard to the costsharing program with the United States to have some United States ships built in the shipyards of British Columbia?

Mr. Drury: Yes, we are pursuing this actively. I think the hon. gentleman will be aware that there is some reluctance on the part of the government of the United States to have contracts carried out in Canadian shipyards for the construction of ships to be owned by the United States government.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO RESULTS OF RECENT BOND ISSUE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, on November 10, I asked the Minister of Finance whether he could inform the house how successful the Canada savings bond campaign had been in comparison with former years, and particularly how much new money he estimated would come in from this source. He stated he would give that information when he presented his supplementary budget. As he did not do so last night I wonder whether he will do so now.

[Mr. Langlois (Mégantic).]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I overlooked this request when I was preparing my budget statement. A public statement has been made about this, though perhaps it does not answer all the questions asked by my hon. friend. I will look into the matter to see whether I can give him a full statement.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In his search for income I wonder whether he would consider minting next year, for collectors' purposes, a silver dollar?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the question is very urgent. It should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Would he consider striking a wooden nickel to commemorate his centennial budget?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sharp: If it would give us any additional revenue, I think I would.

INQUIRY AS TO IMPOSITION OF TAX ON CAPITAL GAINS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance and ask whether in his search for additional federal revenue serious consideration is being given to the institution of a capital gains tax, as this unearned increment is not yet taxable in Canada.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the capital gains tax, like all other proposed taxes, is under consideration in connection with tax reforms. I should just like to add, because there may be some misunderstanding about it, that even if a capital gains tax were to be introduced it would not produce appreciable revenues for some time to come.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF CONFERENCE WORKING PAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour in charge of housing. In view of the refusal of the government to allow members of parliament to be delegates or observers at the forthcoming federal-provincial conference on housing and urban development, and in view of the tabling of the working papers by the minister last Friday, would the minister consider referring those working papers to the standing committee on housing and urban development for study and report?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I take exception to the statement by the hon. member. There has been no indication by the government that members of parliament would not be permitted to attend this conference as observers. No such decision has yet been made. The Acting Prime Minister has asked the provincial governments whether they would be prepared to open at least part of this conference so that members of parliament could attend as observers and we are awaiting their replies.

With regard to the second part of the question, the answer is that we are not disposed to refer the matter to a committee of the house at least until after the meeting on December 11, which after all is only a little over a week away.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF BILL RESPECTING QUORUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his capacity as government house leader. In view of what happens sometimes when there are not many members in the house, would the minister consider asking the house to refer to the special committee on procedure, perhaps at five o'clock today, the subject matter of my bill calling for a larger quorum?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: Then be it on your own head.

NATIONAL MUSEUMS

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CORPORATION FOR ADMINISTRATION

The house resumed, from Thursday, November 30, consideration of the motion of Miss LaMarsh for the second reading of Bill No. S-2, to establish a corporation for the administration of the national museums of Canada.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, last evening I mentioned there was a totem pole restoration program in existence in British Columbia, and I thought it might be an appropriate opportunity for the federal government, through the corporation or through one of the museums under federal government authority, to participate in that restoration program and in effect establish a sort of museum on site, the site being the location of the original totems of various tribes on the west coast.

The contribution made to art by the west coast tribes has been tremendous and prolific. Unfortunately a great many of the works of art of the people of the west coast have found their way into collections and museums in other parts of the world. In fact I heard that a few years ago the national museum spent some $40,000, though I am not quite certain this is the exact figure, to purchase a collection of masks and other carvings which were the property of Lord Blossom.

This year the Vancouver Art Gallery exhibited a collection of works of art of the west coast tribes as a centennial project. It is as beautiful a collection as I have ever seen assembled in Canada. However, in order to assemble the works for this particular showing it was necessary for those who contributed to it, and particularly for Bill Reid who is an artist of high quality especially in gold and silver carvings, to travel quite extensively to museums in the United States in order to ask permission to get back for the purpose of that particular showing some of the works that these museums had lent. As I said, I think it was one of the finest collections that has ever been seen in Canada.

The works of a very prolific and highly gifted artist of the Haida people, Charles Edenshaw, were also there. They were indescribably beautiful carvings in black and red on silver, bone and wood. I was there the day the late Charles Edenshaw's daughter, Mrs. Emily White—a grand, elderly lady now—came down from Grimshaw to see the works of her father assembled and on display. Everyone who went through the art gallery in Vancouver this year was amazed at the beauty of the totem collection there.

The point I have been trying to make is that on many occasions in the past not too great an interest has been shown in preserving or retaining the works of art of the west coast Indian tribes, and as a consequence they have found their way into other hands and into other collections and museums all over the world. Perhaps there will be no further opportunity to collect the materials and the works of art of the past because most of them have either been placed in museums, have been allowed to rot on the site, or have been lost.

However, in the last couple of years a group of anthropologists and archaeologists working under the national museum have visited certain areas on the west coast together with some officials of the provincial government, to search through and dig amongst the sites of the villages which existed in those areas in the past in an attempt to discover in greater detail some of the history of our native tribes. I think this might be a function of the museums which could be expanded.

There are a few provisions in the bill before us on which I would like some clarification. First of all I should like to know whether it will be permissible under the act for the museums to loan their works of art to local community museums or to provincial museums. I should also like to ask whether provision would be made under the bill for travelling exhibits. Both these measures would meet with approval because, particularly in this centennial year, increased interest has been shown in the establishment of museums as centennial projects.

A number of these have been opened in my area, and a couple of them which were previously in existence have concentrated to a large degree upon the collection and display of native Indian art objects. I think it would be of tremendous value if in addition to any of the collections and exhibits they now have, they could borrow from time to time some particularly fine works of art to display to the people who visit these areas and who may not have an opportunity to visit any of the national museums or see any of the travelling exhibits.

There is a provision in the bill which states that the Surplus Crown Assets Act shall not apply to the corporation. I assume this means it will not be possible for the museums to declare as surplus any of the exhibits they have, and thus they will not be able to dispose of them through the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. If my impression is correct I think this is a commendable feature of the bill.

However, there is a provision in the bill which permits the disposal of objects in collections by sale, exchange or gift. I think the opportunity provided for this body to give away objects that a museum may have in its possession, even though there is a the saving feature that this should only be done when in opinion of the directors of the museum the objects have no further use or value, needs some clarification. Unless there is some balancing provision this might be an awkward feature to include in a bill of this nature, or an awkward authority to give the directors of the museum.

With those remarks, Mr. Speaker, I will close and look forward to the minister dealing with these items in her closing remarks or perhaps at some stage in the committee consideration of the bill.

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): I rise, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words in support of the plea of the hon. member for Carleton that this bill go to committee. I know the minister has already declined this request, but I feel it would have been useful to hear from the directors presently involved in the administration of the several museums this bill seeks to incorporate, and to have their very learned reaction to the principle of the bill. As you know, Mr. Speaker, we are not able to call upon this expertise when we are dealing with a measure in the house. It was the late John F. Kennedy who said that of those to whom much is given, much is required. In our time, not only in our centennial year but within our time in history, a great deal has been given to our people. There has been an accumulation of a great deal of history in the arts and sciences that is well worth preserving.

Though in our centennial year we have not been able to achieve the establishment of a national museum building, which I am sure all members deplore along with the minister, I am confident that in the not too distant future there will be a fine museum which will be a credit to our country. I am worried, however, that when the high court of history sits in judgment on us with regard to the way in which during our brief span of history we have fulfilled our responsibilities to the nation, this measure may not be regarded as fulfilling those responsibilities for building and housing in a museum those things that need to be preserved.

After all, in our short span of existence as a country we have seen the change from the horse and buggy to the automobile, and then to travel in the space age. We have seen the disappearance of steam power, the development of electrical energy and now nuclear energy. We have witnessed wave after wave of immigration which has added to the multicultural basis of our nation about which we like to boast. We have seen the slow flowering of the arts and sciences, and witnessed the halting advance of democracy in social concerns.

Somewhere these developments should be adequately recorded so that future generations may come to see them. I am just wondering whether the manner in which we are dealing with this very important question, namely by incorporating these museums under one crown corporation, will achieve those things we desire to achieve through this bill. My question simply is, would the minister reconsider the request to send this measure to a committee?

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): I have only a few remarks to make at this time. I wish to take advantage of the opportunity to urge the minister and the government to give more assistance to the local museums that we have around the country. I have one or two in mind which I know are doing a very good job, and the assistance they receive from the government of Canada or from provincial governments is very limited. I think, for instance, of what is taking place at Duck Lake and the work that was undertaken by Fred Anderson over a period of years in gathering together many relics from the days of the rebellion in the area around Batoche, Duck Lake, St. Laurent and Fish Creek. The needs of this museum are very limited and lie mainly in the area of cabinets and cases, with a little assistance in the care of the building in which these relics are housed. I know that the mayor of Duck Lake, Charles Boyer, has done everything he can to assist this museum. The interest in it reaches beyond the confines of that immediate area. Relics from the old days have been gathered from people right across the country, and even in the United States.

There is also the matter referred to by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa, the multi-racial culture of our nation. Some of the ethnic groups are trying to establish museums so that people in the future may be able to chart some of the contributions they have made to our nation. It is my belief that in this area as well there is room for a little more assistance than has been available from the federal or provincial governments.

The museum and the gallery in Ottawa are controversial matters. Yesterday I asked the minister what she meant when she referred to cultivated people. I note that in Hansard the reference is to cultured people. When you go through this museum you wonder whether it is really charting the course that Canadians have taken in their history. Perhaps I do not fall into the privileged group referred to by the minister, but I cannot help but feel that the emphasis in this gallery seems to be on the decline of those values held by the pioneers of this nation. I do not pretend to be an art critic, but I know many people in this country simply cannot understand some of the pictures in the gallery. They wonder why they are there and why we spend thousands and thousands of dollars on them.

This is one of the things which those in charge of the gallery should be looking at and assessing. They should be wondering whether they are encouraging the right type of art in this country. Some people think they have to follow along with what is being produced today. I believe the gallery should afford something in the way of leadership to guide people along those paths that will be of benefit to our nation in the years ahead.

I should like to add my words to those of other hon. members who believe this whole matter should go before a committee in order that all of us may learn a little more. Perhaps if we learned more about the operations of these various departments, if one may call them that, we would understand them better. In the meantime I can assure the minister that I find it difficult to understand some of the expenditures that have been made.

• (11:50 a.m.)

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, like the previous speakers I shall try to be brief in my remarks on this bill. I support the plea the hon. member for Carleton made last night. I thought his point was well taken. I support it, not because the other place may not have reviewed this matter in sufficient depth but because there are areas of concern in the broad concept of this bill that ought to be properly aired. We ought to do something to make our great paintings, sculptures and other works of art more readily available to all our people. For that reason I join with the hon. member for Carleton and others who have urged the minister to refer this bill to a committee of this house, or to a joint committee, for further consideration.

Mainly I want to say this. I shall propose an amendment to the bill. Though it is a slight amendment it will, if adopted, enable our youth to benefit more than they now benefit from the art objects we have collected and that we shall collect as the years go by. Our universities at the present time are embarked on the greatest expansion in our country's history. That expansion has not yet ended. Our universities are erecting wonderful, fireproof, air conditioned and sprinkler protected buildings, and perhaps we are missing a good bet by not using these buildings for art shows.

That has been proposed but not spelled out in detail. The clause that gives the corporation authority to sponsor and assist travelling shows is good, but vague. I should like the bill to say specifically that the major universities of our country may be regarded as museums of Canada. Perhaps that provision might be narrowed to refer to the libraries that are being built on our campuses.

Hon. members may have noticed that in the last three or four years wonderful new libraries have been built on our campuses, and these libraries have ample space at their entrances to accommodate art shows. The buildings are fireproof, and almost always security guards are present. If we want our young people to be exposed to art I suggest that by using the libraries on campuses for art shows we could bring about that result.

A major obstacle in the past to such art shows has been cost. Most universities from time to time hold an art show, usually somebody's collection, but most universities have not had the money to keep changing their art shows. As I say, most of them have neither the finances nor an adequate security staff for this. Perhaps if there were precise authority for this in the bill our major universities might have revolving art shows; the shows might be changed every six months, say, or once a year, and our undergraduates passing through university would have an opportunity to be exposed once or twice a year, throughout their university careers, to many art treasures. Throughout a university career an undergraduate might see 200 or 300 art treasures. The universities have the space for these shows, and that space is not being used except occasionally.

Unless our young people go out of their way in places like Ottawa to see art treasures, or unless they see the odd travelling art show, they have little opportunity to be exposed to our culture. They do not see what Canadian talent has produced in the past or what the talented artists of this world have produced over the last 1,000 years. That is wrong. Understandably in the past, because libraries in universities were not fireproof or as well protected as they are today, the authorities in Ottawa felt reluctant about letting art treasures leave the vaults of Ottawa. Now, with more modern buildings on our campuses, buildings that are well protected against fire and other risks, perhaps consideration might be given to releasing art treasures to be shown in them. I commend that course of action to the minister. I should like to see in this country the best art museums in the world. I hope the minister will give consideration to my suggestion and incorporate the appropriate wording in the bill.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the minister last evening, and I agree with many of her remarks. She said we were experiencing a renaissance in the field of museums and art galleries in Canada. I agree with that. I am sure that all across this country federal participation in centennial projects, especially projects under which art galleries and museums have been erected, has been appreciated. That participation has been a factor in the renaissance. I congratulate the national gallery and its director, through the minister, for the two outstanding centennial exhibitions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Johnston: The 300 years of Canadian art exhibition in itself was an education for any Canadians seeing it. Equally good is the present exhibition, which blends Canadian history and artistic development. I commend it to any member who has not been to the gallery to see it.

• (12 noon)

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I cannot quite understand the provision in the bill that places all the museums and the national gallery in the charge of one over-all organization. The minister stated last night that this move would save money. I doubt that very much. If any change is to be made in relation to art or the national gallery or the museum, then saving money should be the last consideration. If we wanted to save money at the expense of a very important area of our national development then we would not have a gallery, and we would likely not have some of the museums either. The gallery will cost money, and I anticipate that if we want to continue our development it will cost us even more money. The problem is really one of education and enthusiastic salesmanship to justify a most important expenditure in the development of the country.

I was wandering whether the minister was not overly impressed by the United States pavilion at Expo, which managed to combine in a very light-hearted fashion the most recent developments in science along with some of the most recent, if startling, developments in art. The problem is that we are moving into an era of austerity, the end of which is not yet in sight. It is an era of austerity of which we were fully reminded last night when we listened to the Minister of Finance presenting his budget to the house.

I suggest that if the visitors from the United States to the U.S. pavilion at Expo had been polled on their view as to which exhibits in time of austerity should be cut out, as between the scientific displays and the displays of modern art, there would be no doubt in anybody's mind what the answer would be and which exhibits in the pavilion would first fall victim to any austerity drive.

The hon. member for Rosthern raised a most important point, but I would not for a moment agree with what he said. I would not accept the hon. member for Rosthern as an art critic for a single minute. However, he did point out that when it comes to art there is a great divergence of opinion. We do accept the possibility of there being bad art. However, we do not accept the possibility of bad science; there is no such thing at the moment. All scientific endeavour as such is sacred and good and we can justify almost any expense if it is based on scientific advance.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when one reads the bill and finds that the credit balances in the national gallery purchase account are going to be moved over to the national museum's purchase account, one wonders how the division is going to be made between the conflicting demands of art through the gallery and those of science through the science museum or the museum of natural history or any of the projected museums of the future. Certainly great expenditure will be required over the next few years to construct several new national museums. However, as I say, how do you arbitrate the conflicting claims of the national gallery and the national museum? It may be that the minister would like the budget of the national gallery to be buried in the budget for science and for museums so the public could no longer distinguish between the funds allocated to one or the other.

I hope this is not going to be the case, Mr. Speaker, and that such a step would be considered a sort of doctrine of despair. Surely we in Canada can develop an appreciation of art and its place in society. I hope the national gallery will be allowed to exist as a separate entity and to have a separate budget. I hope its value will be fully appreciated, and in the long run I feel this would be the better course.

I do not think the minister gave us sufficient explanation last evening of the thinking that prompts the change proposed by this bill. Other hon. members have pointed out the dangers that are there, and I hope that before the bill is passed the minister will give a further explanation, or that the bill will be referred to a committee. In the latter case we could hear from the director of the national gallery and learn whether she is fully satisfied that this measure will not constrict the developement of that most important part of our culture.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I suppose the first thing I should say is that it should be suggested to the hon. member for Rosthern that he grow a beard so he can join that category of art critic just mentioned by the previous speaker.

My purpose in rising is to support the suggestion made by my colleague from Halifax in relation to transporting some of our national treasures to other parts of the country so they can command as wide an audience as possible. We all realize that not everyone has the opportunity to come to Ottawa.

At this point I should like to give the minister full credit for the many activities of our centennial celebrations. I think she truly deserves many times over the applause and thanks of those of us in this house for her efforts. One of the brightest features of our centennial year was the centennial train and the centennial caravans, which attracted audiences of tens of thousands everywhere they went. My colleague suggested making certain exhibits available to the universities of Canada, and this method would be one way of doing this. I think this is a worthwhile idea that should be followed up by the minister and the administrators of the corporation that we are going to establish.

Another possibility that might be considered if funds ever again become available from the government is to use the centennial train and centennial caravan approach so that at selected periods specific segments of artifacts and other exhibits gathered by these museums could be displayed to as many people as possible. If we cannot bring the people to Ottawa to see these treasures, let us take some of them to the people of Canada from time to time.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is the type of bill which I think should not go through the house in just five or ten minutes but on the other hand it should not be very much delayed. The only reason I am speaking on it is a certain experience I had 20 years ago when, as a new and rather brash member of the Manitoba legislature, I drew to the attention of that august assembly the importance of the museum which is situated in the city of Winnipeg. This had satisfactory results. It stirred up interest on the part of the provincial legislators and encouraged those people who were dedicating their efforts to the advancement of the museum.

Similarly now, I do not think it is a bad thing for parliament to indicate that its members have a real interest in the museums of our country and in our national art gallery. We can hastily pass legislation without comment, but if we do that with this legislation those who work in the museums and art gallery cannot be certain whether it is due to a careless indifference on the part of members or whether parliament has an active interest which it has not expressed. By speaking today I would like to display my active interest in our art gallery and museums, as the minister displayed her interest last night. Parliament as a whole, representing the people of this country, will show that interest by our recording in Hansard our appreciation of the work of those who have been operating and maintaining our museums and of those who have supported this effort. Over the last 20 years I have seen a great upsurge of interest in the history and records of this country as portrayed in our museums. This is all to the good. It is one of the means by which we establish our Canadian identity.

I was quite impressed with the minister's remarks last night. Her interest in these fields is intense. I was also impressed with the remarks of my very learned and distinguished colleague from Carleton, who drew attention to the exciting history of Canada, a history which I fully agree is exciting. The more we bring it to the attention of our young people the better it will be for Canada as a whole. This has happened during the last few years, and particularly during centennial year. One of the finest things to emerge from centennial year is the interest across Canada, in small places and in large, in Canada's wonderful history.

I recall my own keen interest as a student and young man in museums. I recall my first visit to the great city of Toronto many years ago. The first place I visited there was the museum. I was more than impressed and my knowledge of the world was enlarged by the exhibitions there. I have always had an interest in these matters and I express that interest today.

With regard to the bill I entertain some doubts that this is the best method of going about the work of the art gallery and the museums. As members have said, there is a sharp difference between an art gallery and a museum. A museum shows things from the past and the record of past events. It displays scientific and archaeological records. An art gallery has a different approach and a different appeal.

I am one of those who can appreciate a painting by Constable, but for the life of me I cannot understand some of the modern art which is placed before my eyes. So I cannot be a judge. I do not feel I am capable of making a judgment with regard to art other than that I like something and dislike something else.

I think that bringing the art gallery and the museums under the terms of one bill may be a mistake. If it is being done just for financial reasons then I think members were justified in asking for the bill to be referred to a committee prior to passage in order to determine whether or not this is wise. However, I understand the minister prefers not to do that. Consequently we will have to get on with the bill and hope for the best in the future. In any event these reservations have now been placed before the house.

I think that the general attention to our art galleries and museums is good. As I say, it is right that parliament should pay some attention to them. It is right that we should vote money for these purposes. All we can hope for is that their administration will be effective so that the people of Canada at large will benefit from these marks of an advanced civilization. It is only the higher civilizations that maintain such records of their histories and traditions. I conclude by saying that I support the bill, with the reservations that have been expressed so clearly by my colleague from Carleton.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few brief words on the bill. First of all, I congratulate the minister for introducing it. I think that over all it is good legislation. However, there are one or two points about it which disturb me to some extent. The first concerns clause 13(b) which calls for the establishment of advisory committees consisting of members of the board or persons other than members or both. If permission is to be granted for the establishing of advisory committees, I would prefer that the appointees be separate from the board. I do not like the idea of mixing the two functions.

I recommend to the minister that the appropriate form should be as enacted in section 14 of the act to provide for the establishment of a Canadian Film Development Corporation, passed by this house in February, 1967. That section reads as follows:

> The minister may, on the recommendation of the corporation, appoint an advisory group broadly representative of the professional associations, exhibitors, distributors and unions in the Canadian film industry and including other qualified persons, to advise the corporation on matters which the minister or the corporation may refer to it.

I would suggest that this is a better example of how to go about forming advisory committees.

The other point I wish to bring to the attention of the house is that this bill was the cause of the resignation of the director of the human history section of the national museum, Dr. Richard Glover. I wish to quote briefly from Dr. Glover's statement, published in the Ottawa Journal of April 24, 1967. This is part of what he said:

> —the act does not give directors complete charge of the professional business of their museums. Instead, it leaves a new and as yet unappointed board of trustees to make by-laws prescribing what each museum director's authority shall be; and the directors will be able to do only those things which the trustees may see fit to assign to them. All business not so assigned is given to a new officer called a secretary-general. Here the act falls sadly short of the government's professed purpose.
> Worse follows. Another clause empowers the board of trustees to appoint consultative committees, which are to be composed "of professional people to advise it," as the Senate was told. I acknowledge that committees may from time to time make useful recommendations on broad general policy; and that directors themselves may sometime welcome the help of advisory committees of their own. But these consultative committees of professional people reporting to the board on professional matters are quite another thing.

• (12:20 p.m.)

> The meaning of this clause, as explained by the government's spokesman in the Senate, is that the trustees may expect professional advice on the museums' programs from two different sources—their consultative committees on the one hand and the museum's own experienced and highly professional staff on the other. But advice from two different sources often differs and the prospects of conflict, friction and unrest which this clause opens up are as obvious as they are deplorable.

When a person of the stature of Dr. Glover resigns on grounds of principle involving what I just read and in addition the fact that the government has cut back on the construction of new museum buildings, I think the matter should be gone into a little more carefully. I do not believe his protestations should be dismissed without some consideration having been given to them. I recognize that there are problems in this regard but I should like to suggest to the minister that this bill be referred to a committee after second reading in order that we may go into some of these aspects.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Does the minister intend to make any comment?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, on second reading some very serious matters were discussed by a number of members of the house. Surely the committee is entitled now to the courtesy of having from the minister some comment on the matters which have been raised.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I would be happy to comment on the various matters when we reach the clauses in question. If the hon. member wishes me to comment on the matter of the bill being referred to a committee, I can only say that I have full faith in the members in this chamber being able to give it full study following the study it was given in the other place. The committee which normally would be asked to study it, if it were referred, would be the committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts. At the moment that committee is dealing with the broadcasting bill which it is hoped will be reported back to the house before the end of the month. It also has to deal with the matter of e.t.v. which has just been referred to it. It certainly appears that that committee will have plenty of work at least until the end of this session. That was one of the considerations in having this bill go before the banking committee in the other place for study in the first instance.

I should like to thank hon. members in a general way for the remarks they have made with regard to the personnel of the museums. I forgot to say that all are now Canadian citizens.

Mr. Herridge: Good.

Miss LaMarsh: All the directors have recently been appointed. Dr. Boggs is the director of the National Gallery. I believe she has brought a really new spirit of excitement to the gallery and to its work. She was appointed within the past two years. Dr. Banfield was appointed in February, 1964. Dr. Taylor was appointed this year and Dr. Baird was appointed in October, 1966. All these people are young, vigorous and interested in their work. They are highly qualified specialists. The interesting thing is that these people are civil servants. They are appointed under that act and are not at the moment in the capacity of some of our appointees as public servants. That has been one of the criticisms often made of the situation in the past. Of course, it leads to a problem when one is looking for the very best persons to appoint to the various directorships.

I believe Canada can rejoice in the fact that, as it so happened, within a year or so before centennial year these exciting and vigorous young personalities were taken on as directors of our national museums. Indeed they are national museums. If hon. members will look at the terms of the bill and think for a moment of museums as they know them, such as the museum of natural history, the museum of natural science and a museum which now is included along with the others, the new air museum, and then look at them from the point of view of what we understand as a classical art gallery, they will find that the words apply in each case and that while many people think of the galleries as being separate they are in fact not. As a matter of fact the association of directors of galleries is known as the association of museum directors. As you know, some of the great museums of the world, including the one in Montreal, are known as museums of art and not galleries of art. This is because they are in fact collections of treasures.

It may cost the better part of $1 million to collect a treasure for the art museum and perhaps only $10,000 to collect an old railway car for the science museum. Yet some of the exhibits in the science museum are unique, irreplaceable and without any limit to their value. I think the concern of people who are particularly interested in one or the other of the museums, including the galleries, is that if you put them all together and have one general account either the science people, the art gallery people or somebody else will get more money. This has been very prominent concern of the directors as well. However, in each case the directors will run their institution and will prepare their budgets every year. These will be put together as a whole budget and the money parliament votes will be distributed in the amounts budgeted for. While this is something which should be watched it has not been contemplated, nor should members be concerned, that the directors will not be very alert to the fact that their portion of the money in the non-lapsing fund is there for their expenditure.

I should like particularly to thank the hon. member for Skeena for telling the chamber about the reconstruction of the west coast Haida totems and for his very interesting suggestion of making an on site museum. I had not appreciated that this was taking place in some parts of British Columbia. Indeed, I had thought that perhaps the only permanent record we would have of totems in their place would be the paintings of Emily Carr. Certainly this is a most interesting thought which I will be happy to pass on to the appropriate officials and even the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which is responsible for historic sites. I had never heard of any other place in North America where there still are totems in their original position which can be restored and viewed. I think that this is a national heritage which we should have for a long time in the future.

I should like also to comment on the "Arts of the Raven" show which was mentioned. My own personal opinion, for what it is worth, is that this is one of the most superb shows I have ever seen. Anyone who missed it in Vancouver this year in its four or five month run really missed a Canadian show which cannot ever be replaced. As hon. members will realize, when we talk about travelling exhibits and sending out national treasures more and more, whether they relate to libraries or new cultural centres, it should be remembered that there is always a toll on the treasures as a result of the travelling. We were told in respect of the "Arts of the Raven" show that this is the last time any of these treasures will ever be lent for exhibition because of the fact that, unavoidably, the treasures become damaged in travelling. I think the national gallery and the museums have long been devotees of travelling exhibits and assistance to other museums. As you will see in the bill, there is provision for that to continue.

The hon. member for Rosthern suggested that there has been a decline in values and that we should only purchase things of value. No one could agree with him more in that regard than I, but that does not mean that we cannot buy contemporary works for both the museum and the gallery. It is all right for me to propose a $6 million purchase of a Leonardo da Vinci. I can propose it even though I do not get the money because obviously such a painting has stood the test of time and nobody could question its value, particularly since someone turned around and paid the same price for it when we would not. Surely we do not have to wait until someone has been dead 300 or 700 years to say that the value of his work is something we should accept. If that were the case we would never be able to purchase anything because we cannot seem to get the initial $6 million purchase under way.

Certainly with the current financial situation there is not going to be as much money as I should like to see added to the cultural field to carry on and expand, but I should like to undertake to the house that there is going to be no greater cut on the cultural side of life than there will be elsewhere. This is not going to be the first place where all the meat is picked from the bones, and I will defend this as a mother cat defends her kittens.

An hon. Member: Did you hear that, Richard?

Miss LaMarsh: The gallery has put on two superb shows this year, and I commend the current one, the pageant of Canada, to hon. members if they have not yet had the opportunity of seeing it. It is a rich reminder of our heritage on both sides of the two founding races. It is a particularly beautiful show. The gallery should also be commended for the fact that it was responsible for the superlative show put together at Expo. I think the world has never seen anything just like that particular collection which, unfortunately, is no longer with us.

Each of the people who are now responsible for our national museums has new ideas. Some of these ideas developed from Expo and the centennial celebrations. Nowadays things are not exhibited in a static way but in such a way that things move, make sounds, breathe, smell and involve in some way the person who comes to watch and listen. If members have not seen the new science exhibits in the new science museum opened for Dr. Baird two or three weeks ago may I commend that to them as well. After tomorrow's festivities visitors may find that they are in need of a more restful place and I suggest to hon. members that they take those visitors and friends to the science museum for an hour or two where they can at least recover from their sentiments regarding the game.

I hope I have answered most of hon. members questions. There was one other as to why the gallery is included. I have tried to explain the situation. The directors will run the gallery. They are the experts and they are there because of their learning and erudition in their particular fields. They are not there because they are good administrators. It is not necessarily true that the best person in a creative field makes the best administrator. We want the best administrator to take all the paper work off their hands, and he will be appointed as the person to do that. The directors will run their own affairs.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River suggested that a director resigned after examining this bill. That may be the case but I do not know. I read the same clippings but I was never asked for an interview by the gentleman in question, and I am not sure I ever met him before he resigned. I was certainly under the impression that his resignation was due to a number of internal matters in the museum and, most importantly, because of his very sharp, and I think warranted, disappointment that it was necessary once again to postpone the construction of a new museum building. We have lots of priorities in the national capital and I agree that there are many which may be higher on the list than a national museum. I think all hon. members will realize the loss of morale and sharp disappointment which occurred as a result of the postponement in replacing the building that once housed this chamber during the emergency created by a fire in the parliament buildings. It is still being used as the museum building, but many of us who walk into it are afraid it may be a firetrap and of danger to the children and people who visit it. Imagine how much worse the disappointment has been for the people who are working in that building and who keep hearing promises of a new building to work in with better working conditions. After all, it is not just for those who work there but for the people of Canada. They are disappointed that once again the construction of a new museum has been postponed.

There is no one more unhappy about the postponement of the construction of a new museum than the museum people themselves, and I should like to pledge to the house and to them that as fast as we can get a new museum we will get one. We will also have display places downtown so people who come to the national capital will have the opportunity to see some of the national treasures there at their convenience.

Mr. Churchill: I am sympathetic to the minister's disappointment in this regard. While the Minister of National Defence is in the house, will the minister indicate the position of priorities in respect of the museum and that great stone monument, the national defence building?

Miss LaMarsh: I do not answer for the Department of National Defence or my colleague. Both of us have to fight our own battles with the Minister of Public Works and so far my colleague has been doing better than I.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): As a matter of record, I should say in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that the monumental project for national defence, as he called it, has also been postponed.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I do not think the Secretary of State has really come to grips with the chief reservation in relation to this bill which some members of the house have. I refer to whether the national gallery ought to be part of this whole corporation or should be separate. The minister so far as I am concerned has been less than her usual persuasive self in dealing with this issue. Virtually all she has said is that repositories of art in every part of the world as well as in Canada are frequently known as museums. Some of the great galleries in the world carry the name "museum", such as the Metropolitan Museum of Art of New York.

The concern here is that the gallery will become subdued and take a secondary position without its own board of directors. I do not believe it will be possible with a board of 12 members to have a genuinely representative group of Canadians who are interested in the field of art. It may be possible to have three directors of the new corporation especially interested in art but I doubt very much that we will get more. I doubt very much that such persons who have made a great contribution to the gallery, like Mrs. H. A. Dyde, Mrs. Hugh Mackay and others, would accept an appointment to directorship of an organization which was going to be dealing with a broad field including the national aviation museum and the national war museum as well as scientific, natural and human history. I doubt also that the present chairman of the national gallery would accept an appointment to such a board, and I doubt that such distinguished Canadians as John MacAulay and Colonel Sidney Oland, both of whom have made a fine contribution and brought representative character to the gallery, would accept such an appointment.

We may lose in this situation, and if we do the gallery will take in the long haul a less significant role in this field and will become subdued in relation to the science and other museums. That is my concern. I have expressed it and the minister appears to be adamant. Time alone will tell whether the minister is right or whether those of us who have reservations are justified in having such reservations.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the kind remarks of the minister in regard to some of the matters I raised. Just so there is no misdirection with respect to the totem pole restoration program to which I referred, I should like to say a word or two on this subject. I understood the minister to say that I referred to Haida poles. This is not so. The totem pole restoration program is in existence now, under the auspices of a committee operating locally and assisted financially by the provincial government, in the upper Skeena river area, which is one of the few remaining areas where there are standing totems on their original site in a fairly well preserved condition.

To my knowledge there is only one totem pole of the Haida people standing on the Queen Charlottes; all the others have either been removed and deposited in the provincial museum in Victoria or at U.B.C., or have decayed almost beyond recognition. Just so the officials to whom the minister refers this matter do not head in the direction of looking for Haida poles and the like, may I say that the area involved is the upper Skeena river.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, last evening on second reading I spoke briefly on this bill, mainly with the purpose in mind of supporting the suggestion that the bill be referred to a committee so we might have an opportunity to explore in some depth the important problem of establishing a national museum that would be worthy of Canada in our centennial year.

The minister has indicated that this is not her intention. Therefore I should like to elaborate the thoughts I had in mind when I spoke briefly last evening. The minister has indicated that she feels the committee of the whole is able to come to grips adequately with the ramifications of this problem. Unfortunately that is not true because we know that the committee of the whole is a rather unwieldy organization and suffers in particular from the handicap of not being able to deal directly with the officials of the department, particularly those concerned with museum problems, in obtaining information and putting forward ideas.

The minister dealt briefly with one subject that concerns me, namely, the fate of the proposed new building. I agree with her completely that the present facilities are entirely inadequate. I refer to the old Victoria building known as the Victoria museum. The building was condemned in 1961. Prior to that the geological survey had vacated the building in 1959, as I recall, and the national gallery followed suit in 1960 and moved into its new headquarters.

While I am mentioning the national gallery I should like to support what my colleague the hon. member for Carleton has said with respect to the inclusion of the gallery under the umbrella of the corporation proposed in this legislation. I know the national gallery breathed a sigh of relief when it was finally able to vacate the old Victoria museum premises in 1960. I do not believe this was entirely due to the fact that it was occupying quite inadequate and cramped quarters. It was also because the gallery felt it had new freedom to expand and do those things that are required of a national gallery which are not necessarily connected with museum programs.

When the old Victoria building was condemned by the Department of Public Works in 1961 it was the intention of the government to have a new building ready for opening in 1967 as a major centennial project. Plans were set in motion immediately to have sufficient Canadiana available so that it would be possible to have a complete display of human history in the new building that would present the onward march of Canada from the early days of settlement and civilization and also, of course, pre-dating the arrival of the white man. Special sums of money were set aside to gather this Canadiana material. Dr. L. S. Russell, who was at that time the director of the museum, was highly enthusiastic and I recall his stating prior to his departure from the museum in late 1963 that they had succeeded in gathering from various parts of Canada representative Canadiana which would make it possible to have a comprehensive display.

The museum as a centennial project was not realized. I should like to know from the minister what are the present plans and proposals and what progress has been made in this respect. We have seen evidence of activity on the site. The old La Touraine restaurant building was torn down and all the facilities that were part of La Touraine. We had great hopes that the program was proceeding on schedule, but all during centennial year that particularly strategic site in the national capital has been a parking lot rather than a national museum. It is passing strange that we should have destroyed good accommodation which was badly needed in centennial year merely to convert it into a parking lot. There must be some plans and proposals afoot because, as the minister herself indicated, the present building is entirely inadequate and has been resolutely condemned by the Department of Public Works. In addition, as the minister hinted there may be some safety factor involved. While we are dealing with this matter in committee of the whole I wonder whether the minister could indicate the possible target date for the erection of a building which would suitably house Canada's national museum.

• (12:50 p.m.)

Miss LaMarsh: There is a classic answer to this question, namely, that it will be done as fast as funds become available. Some people have been studying this matter. Land has become very expensive in downtown Ottawa. We asked this group of people to take an unfettered look at this matter to see whether or not sites might be available outside the immediate downtown area for labs, for research work, for storage space and for some of the display area. As hon. members know, the new museum of science is located outside the heart of the downtown area. At present it is in rented space which, however, gives us much more room than we would have had otherwise. We have also acquired another new building for the extension of the war museum which has been refurbished and reopened within the last months. This building is in the downtown area. I cannot say at this moment whether the Department of Public Works will decide to house the national museum in a number of buildings and whether they will be downtown or on the outskirts of the city. This will depend upon how soon money and land are available. It seems to me that without any question a major display space must be made available in the downtown area for the walking traffic, but it may be that in such a case exhibits, such as the huge locomotives which are in the new science museum or the huge planes in the aviation museum will never be displayed downtown where space is so valuable. I am sorry I cannot give a more specific answer at the moment but the whole matter is now being re-examined because of the delay in implementing the plans which had been made previously.

The hon. member should not forget that the national gallery is also in the plans. The Lorne building in which the gallery is now housed is only temporary accommodation and was originally designed for use as an office building. I hope that one of these days Canada will take sufficient pride in her achievements to build something like the Philadelphia museum which is a magnificent setting for a magnificent collection.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, the minister is correct in that respect. I realize that the present accommodation of the gallery was originally designed to house the old department of citizenship and immigration. It is understood that it is being used temporarily to accommodate the national gallery. Am I to conclude from the hon. lady's remarks that the site which was originally designated for the national museum is no longer available for that purpose and that the plans which were made in that connection have been scrapped entirely? That site was originally chosen because of the possibility which it offered of expanding into the area occupied by the temporary buildings which house the Department of National Defence.

I know that various museums have been located on the outskirts of the city. For instance, the old archives building now houses the war museum. The aviation museum which was established in 1959 as the nucleus of the museum of technology is now located at Rockcliffe Airport, and the rented buildings in the east end of the city now house the museum of science. I conclude that these plans are temporary and that the minister and her department still have their eyes on the valuable site which is now serving as a parking lot.

Miss LaMarsh: It is my recollection that the last time I discussed this matter with the under secretary of state I noticed that on the map this area is still marked "museum", but at the time when I discussed this matter I understood that this space might be confined to a display area and not used to accommodate all the other supplementary exhibits which are such a vital part of the museum but which do not necessarily need to use such expensive space. I have asked my colleague who has seen the map lately and he says the space on the map is still marked "museum".

Mr. Dinsdale: No doubt some of the material which was gathered for display purposes in 1967 was used in the centennial caravans and in the centennial train which travelled across the country, but I presume most of it is still in storage awaiting the day when we will have the display facilities to which the minister has referred.

Miss LaMarsh: Most of the material in the train has been borrowed from one place or another and it has to go back. The promise was made that it would be returned at the end of 1967. It is not owned by Canada or by the national museum. If my hon. friend is referring to some other collection for 1967, I am afraid I do not know to what he refers, unless he means the display of Canadiana in the gallery itself which was opened a month or two ago and which has been collected or borrowed. It will be on display at least until the end of the year.

Mr. Dinsdale: The material I am referring to is that which was gathered during the years 1961, 1962 and 1963, particularly under the direction of Dr. Russell who was with the museum at that time and to whom special funds were made available to gather this material in preparation for the centennial year. Unfortunately we lost Dr. Russell to the Royal Ontario Museum as a result of his disappointment when the government after 1963 decided not to proceed with this centennial project. I presume that this material is owned by the national museum and it is designed to present a complete picture of the development of Canadian social life and Canadiana from the earliest years of settlement.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I will have to look into the matter.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I remember my early days as a boy when the Smithsonian Institute and other United States institutions made studies of the Kootenays and the lakes Indian tribes in the interior of British Columbia. At that time a large number of artifacts were carted off in cases. I understand that not too much was done to organize this sort of undertaking at that time. When the Columbia river treaty was being considered I asked the minister concerned whether our national museum could co-operate with the provincial authorities to preserve those artifacts and other things in connection with the lakes Indian tribes which can be found and which will be destroyed owing to the flooding of the Columbia River. What has our museum done in that respect? The only thing I have heard about is the trip made by Dr. Leishman down the Arrow lakes, who then made a report on the Arrow lakes Indian band, but I have heard nothing more.

Miss LaMarsh: I will have to investigate this matter further. I remember that my hon. friend was particularly interested in the Arrow lakes and he told me there was a rather notable Indian burial ground in that area which was to be flooded. I will see if during the lunch hour I can ascertain that for my hon. friend.

The Chairman: Order, please. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair. The committee will resume at 2.30 p.m.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Establishment of corporation.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): On division. Perhaps I should explain that I say "on division" simply because I disagree with the idea of bringing the National Gallery and the other museums together under one corporation. I earnestly hope the minister is right and I am wrong. Perhaps we will analyse the situation ten years hence.

Clause agreed to on division.

Clause 4 agreed to.

On clause 5—Purposes of the corporation.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, earlier in the discussion I spoke to the minister about provision for close co-ordination and co-operation with the provincial museums which are now operating in almost all of the provinces across the country. Manitoba will have a very fine museum as a part of its major centennial project. Saskatchewan, Ontario and other provinces also have creditable museums. I believe it would help in achieving what obviously this bill is endeavouring to achieve, the establishment of a body of public opinion nationally for the preservation of our history and our culture which has been so sadly neglected until recent years, if we were able to ensure in a formal way continuous consultation and co-ordination between the national museum and the corresponding provincial museums. I agree also with the hon. member for Halifax who emphasized the developments that are taking place in the universities of Canada in making contributions toward the commemoration of our past.

So that this idea may be formalized as part of the legislation before us I move:

That subparagraphs (f) and (g) of clause 5(2) be relettered as (g) and (h) respectively and that a new subparagraph (f) be added as follows:

(f) establish adequate liaison with provincial museums and universities with a view to securing maximum collaboration of all activities in this field, and for such purposes to establish a committee or committees pursuant to section 13.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Surely the minister can accept that amendment without advice from the gallery.

Miss LaMarsh: I should like to see a copy of the amendment in writing first. I am afraid this is a lawyer's vice, but I should like to look at it. I do not see any objection to (f) as it is. I understand that is the only paragraph to be inserted. I believe that perhaps the current (f) takes care of the situation, but if the committee feels they would like to be more specific about it I have no objection to the insertion of such an amendment.

Mr. Howard: I wish the minister would not move with such speed on that item. While it may well be covered by an extremely generous interpretation of some other subclause, we had in mind putting forward the suggestion that an arrangement might be made for the lending of materials and objects by the national museum to other museums in Canada. When I say that I do not mean to include only provincial museums and university museums. There are in existence other museums. I take it the wording of the amendment applies to museums under the aegis of provincial governments as distinct from local or community museums. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris nods his head, so I take it my interpretation is correct. Museums in my area and in the area represented by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni from time to time borrow objects from the national museum on a temporary basis to supplement their own exhibits. That, I think, is a commendable approach.

Since the minister has said that she is willing to accept an amendment, would she be willing to consider broadening the concept proposed by my hon. friend on my right? Instead of including only provincial university museums, could not the amendment encompass all museums of Canada with respect to materials being lent to them on a temporary basis? I know it is difficult to draft an amendment to a bill by standing up and chatting about it, and I am not attempting to move a subamendment to the amendment of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. I am merely putting forward my idea as a talking point. I hope it is possible to incorporate my idea into an amendment that will be drafted to conform to accepted legal and parliamentary practice.

Miss LaMarsh: Perhaps the mover of the amendment, and I am prepared to accept it—might like to say in his amendment "establish adequate liaison with museums and universities". That might secure maximum collaboration with respect to all activities in this field.

An hon. Member: Doing it that way would be very difficult.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

Mr. Howard: That might be acceptable if it were not, for the fact that museums are defined as meaning "a museum described in section 6 or established pursuant to that section". All that that wording would do would be to establish liaison among the museums set forth in clause 6. The words that we had in mind in respect of any such amendment would cover museums in Canada other than those described in section 6.

Miss LaMarsh: Perhaps both hon. members who have spoken might get together behind the curtain for a few minutes, and we can stand the clause until we get an amendment that satisfies them. I shall look at it. That way we shall not take up the time of the committee.

Mr. Howard: Shall we go behind the curtain?

Mr. Dinsdale: Before we disappear behind the curtain I might make a suggestion that might satisfy the minister and the hon. member for Skeena. I have not got a copy of my amendment but the word "provincial"—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Just say "other museums".

Mr. Dinsdale: Wait until I get a copy of my amendment. The wording is, "establish adequate liaison with"—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Other museums.

Mr. Dinsdale: —"provincial museums and universities". I have mentioned provincial museums because they are formal and well established organizations and come under the aegis of provincial governments. Those governments in turn have some responsibility for municipal museums, or whatever one likes to call them. Municipal museums would make their contacts and arrange liaison through the provincial museum organization. I wonder whether that wording would satisfy the hon. member for Skeena. The wording would be "establish adequate liaison with provincial"—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): With other museums.

Mr. Dinsdale: "With other museums and universities with a view to securing maximum collaboration", etc.

Mr. Howard: I hear the hon. member for Carleton giving the hon. member for Brandon-Souris advice. I do not know whether I should accept that wording because of that. I will take the word of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris that that wording will do what we want it to, and as such it is perfectly agreeable to me. Nevertheless, I know that this is a most unwise way to draft legislation. We are constructing an amendment in bits and pieces by chatting back and forth.

Mr. Churchill: It is not unwise when the work has been done by the hon. member for Carleton.

Mr. Howard: I do not know about that. I had some experience with the hon. member for Carleton and yourself, sir, when both hon. gentlemen sat on the government side of the house. I would not place too much reliance on what either of those two hon. members propose.

Miss LaMarsh: This seems such a cozy Friday afternoon and everybody is in such a good mood that we will hope it continues this way. This seems a most effective way to draft an amendment. Could I see the amendment again, please?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The minister had the appropriate nod from the gallery. She might accept the amendment and substitute "other" for "provincial".

Miss LaMarsh: I am not sure I could draft this amendment in French. Perhaps someone here might wish to translate it into French.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member for Kingston is especially skilled in that.

Miss LaMarsh: His specialty is Dutch.

An hon. Member: Double Dutch.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we delete the word "provincial" and replace it with "other"?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Barnett: Before the amendment is put to the committee I wish to say a few words on the idea expressed by the hon. member for Skeena. He and I have discussed it previously. When this amendment is properly drafted he hopes, as I do, that taken with the words in the present paragraph (f), "provide professional and technical services", the implication will be that materials such as those now in the national museum may from time to time be placed in smaller museums across the country.

Some years ago I discussed this matter with a former director of the human history museum. We talked about having some articles in the possession of the national museum relating to our west coast culture placed in appropriate locations in the areas from which the articles came. I believe I am correct in saying that some time after 1958, when I was temporarily absent from the house, something like that was done with respect to a small, local museum in my area. As I recall, the condition was laid down that the museum must have suitable display space and that the articles displayed must be reasonably protected, from damage or fire.

I feel that such activities should be an important part of the work performed by our national museum. While it is all very well to have central buildings housing collections in the capital, I point out that in a country the size of Canada only a small percentage of the population will have the opportunity, even over a period of years, to see the treasures that are displayed here. I hope that if this amendment is carried the corporation and the directors of the various museums will seriously consider the idea of expanding opportunities for Canadians in other parts of the country to view in their own localities some of the works of different kinds now held by the national museum.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Amendment agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on the clause in relation to subclause 2(f) which reads:

> —arrange for or provide professional and technical services to other organizations whose purposes are similar to any of those of the corporation, on such terms and conditions as may be approved by the minister;

And so on. Over the years we have established a large number of local museums and our centennial year has created a demand to establish more of these museums, which we are glad to see.

I wonder whether this clause would make it possible for the national museum to provide advice to smaller museums or even courses for the directors and staff who operate them. Since the great part of the work in such museums is performed on a voluntary basis, if these people were given the opportunity to attend a course in administration of museums, arranging collections and so on it would be of great value to these people who undertake this work across Canada. Could the minister tell the committee whether this clause makes this possible?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I think this would more properly fall under paragraph (e) which deals with undertaking or sponsoring programs for the training of persons in the professions and skills involved in the operation of museums. I am not certain that the draftsman contemplated bringing in part time volunteers, but there is no question that the language is wide enough to do this provided there was a demand and the museums had sufficient funds.

I do know that there are relatively few people who are trained to administer museums and operate them, and certainly any assistance which can be given them would be very much appreciated. I have already had some conversations with officials of the national museum about this. For example, the small centennial museum in the Northwest Territories was able to obtain a number of beautiful furs and pieces of Eskimo clothing, but it had to construct papier-maché figures in order to display the exhibits. We have been searching for some mannequins but these were beyond the financial capability to provide. This would have enabled them properly to display the figures in the small museum that has been built.

As I say, the language is wide enough even though it does not order this necessarily to be done. I think that the officials would want to explore the possibilities of such a program before being committed to it.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for her answer, but to illustrate what I have in mind may I talk for a moment about the museum at Nelson. A lot of voluntary work is done there, but if that museum had the funds to send one or two persons to Ottawa to attend a course in the administration of museums and other related matters, would the minister think this clause would be wide enough, the matter having been considered, to permit this to be done?

Miss LaMarsh: I think the language is even wider, Mr. Chairman, in that if the museum had sufficient funds it could undertake or sponsor programs within a university. This might be done as a summer course or something of that kind and might be a better way to handle these volunteers.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I was very pleased indeed that the minister indicated earlier to the committee that she had personally been able to view the "Arts of the Raven" display in Vancouver during the past year and I join with her in praising it. I was also interested to see that she displayed an interest in the preservation of totem poles, a subject raised earlier by the hon. member for Skeena. In light of the interest she displays in the native culture of that part of British Columbia from which the hon. member for Skeena and I come, I am emboldened to pursue one aspect of the matter a little further.

For purposes of so doing I should like to make particular reference to paragraph (a) of subclause 2 in which power is granted to the corporation to collect, classify, preserve and display objects relevant to its purposes. I want to relate that authority with that which has been exercised under the aegis of the government of Canada and the museum system we have had heretofore, with particular reference to many of the items produced by the native peoples. I have specific reference to the members of the Kwakiutl nation who for the most part, except in the northern portion, live in an area that is now in the constituency of Comox-Alberni. These items were used by them in former times for the purpose of their potlatch celebrations.

The minister is probably aware that at one time the parliament of Canada took action to outlaw these festivals so far as the Indian people on the west coast were concerned. As part of the business of enforcing the law the government of Canada took into its possession a very large number of the beautiful items which had been part of the regalia of the potlatch festivals. I understand that these items are still in the possession of the government of Canada and in the custody of the national museum in particular.

At a considerably later point in time parliament saw fit to remove from the Indian Act that section of the law which forbade potlatching. In other words, it is quite legal now for the Indian peoples on the west coast to hold these festivals should they so desire. I think I should say at once that it is most unlikely they would be revived fully in the manner and to the extent they once existed; nevertheless there is that tradition of festivals.

This is not really what I want to deal with, Mr. Chairman. What I do want to deal with is the fact that while I know it has been said that the Indians received some reimbursement at the time for these articles—I have never been able to find out just how much they did receive but in effect they were purchased—nevertheless for all practical purposes there was a forced seizure from them of some of the most cherished possessions in their tradition.

• (3:00 p.m.)

So far as the Indian people are concerned, the Kwakiutl in particular, and especially since the Indian Act which forbade potlatches was amended they regard this as virtually an illegal seizure of their cherished, traditional articles by the government of Canada. There has been a long-standing grievance in this connection. Now that there is a revival of interest in their own culture these people in my area are becoming more and more desirous that these hereditary articles be returned to them. One may say that possession is nine tenths of the law, but the fact that parliament changed the Indian Act does not change the status of these articles.

If I am correct in my assumption that the articles now in museums will come under the jurisdiction of the proposed new corporation, I urge the minister not to regard passage of this bill as establishing any further barrier to an act of simple justice in recognizing the right, title and interest of these people in these articles. In the minds of many of the people that I represent in the house, the government of Canada is perpetuating a long-standing injustice by continuing to claim it has a right, title and interest in these things.

As a result of the revival of interest in their culture the Kwakiutl now have an awakening realization of the value of these articles and of their intrinsic worth and beauty. They recognize that many changes in their own mode of living have taken place since the potlatches were banned and that these things will probably never be used again in the way they were previously. These people know there was a period when they themselves were willing to let other people take these things away from them for a song. It was during that time that many of the items on exhibit in the "Arts of the Raven" display were allowed to leave Canada and be placed in museums in the United States and Europe. It is possible that they will never be regained. But in conversation with me the leaders of these Indian people tell me they would like to have recognition of their right to the potlatch seizures. They also tell me that if their rights were recognized they would be willing to take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that these items would be taken care of and preserved and in effect see that they are placed in museums so that they could be enjoyed not only by themselves and their grandchildren but by the rest of Canada as well.

I feel it very important that the Secretary of State should understand the importance and significance of the situation. I hope she will do all within her power to rectify what I am convinced was one of the worst things to take place in our past and for which we should have regret. Some of the people from whom these things were taken are probably no longer represented by the families involved, but others are. It is to avoid any sort of conflict among themselves as to which articles belong to whom that they would be prepared to take appropriate steps to ensure that all the articles will be preserved for their own enjoyment and for ours, provided parliament recognizes that in effect an injustice was done to their people.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has raised something which leads me to another matter generally involving the removal of artifacts and artistic objects not only from the people to whom they belong but from the country entirely. I think that the oldest known item of native Indian creativity is in the British museum in London. It is a relatively small mould which I believe has a beaver design carved on it. There may be some argument whether it is in fact the earliest item still preserved, but certain journals have made that claim.

This item is in London. It is not in Canada. The American Museum of National History in New York has a tremendously large collection of items from the west coast, including a Haida war canoe, examples of which are few and far between now. It is displayed so as to make one believe it is still in use, with human figures dressed in Indian regalia. A great many of the items which were displayed in the Vancouver art gallery presentation of the "Arts of the Raven" had to be obtained on loan from other parts of the world—

Miss LaMarsh: But some from the national museum.

Mr. Howard: I said a great many of them had to be obtained from other parts of the world, some from the provincial museum in British Columbia, and some from private collections in that province. I was not trying to say there were no contributions from within Canada or from the national museum. In fact the national museum has a very complete collection of items from the west coast, most of which is stored in an attic some place out of sight of visitors.

Miss LaMarsh: Not now.

Mr. Howard: I have not been there for some time but on one occasion I had an opportunity to go into one of the back rooms on an upper floor through the courtesy of Dr. Barbeau who was in the museum that day.

The fact remains that there are a great many items of highly artistic quality, items which are Canadian, that have been removed from our country in years past and deposited in private and public collections in other parts of the world. It may be too late to do something about them now. Many of these items, certainly those made of wood, decay quickly if exposed and through the passage of time disappear in a natural way.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I understand that some nations in the world prohibit the removal from their countries of archaeological items relating to the history and culture of the area itself and to the people indigenous to the area. To my knowledge nothing of this nature exists in Canada today. There has been a great influx of tourists into the country in the last few years especially since the opening of the Alaska marine highway or ferry system which runs from Prince Rupert to Panhandle, Alaska, and the institution by the province of British Columbia of service by the Queen of the North from Vancouver Island to Prince Rupert. Incidentally, this ship will be out of service until some time next year owing to a decision by the premier of the province—regretfully so, I say—but that is another matter. In any event, this factor plus our promotion of tourism has resulted in an extremely large number of tourists moving through an area where there are still a great number of these items in the possession of individuals and in some of the homes and buildings which no longer are in use or are semi-deserted because people do not live there any longer. There is almost a scouring of the area to find anything that was produced by the native people, especially the older items.

Miss LaMarsh: I have done that myself.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Howard: The minister says that she herself has done this. I hope that whatever she found she did not remove from Canada.

Miss LaMarsh: I could not afford it.

Mr. Howard: Then you were not looking in the right places. I do not like to single out United States tourists in this regard. However, they do come up in very large numbers simply because they have an easy means of access by road and can make use of trailer camps and because the North American continent has interconnecting roads between the two nations. This is easy for the United States tourists to do just as it is easier for us to travel to the United States by road.

Every summer searches are still going on in many areas, particularly in villages which are not too heavily populated in the summer because the people, mainly from the upper river villages, go down to the coast to Prince Rupert to fish and work. Many of the homes are boarded up when the people leave and it is not uncommon to find they have been ransacked or to find totems standing from which pieces have been hacked or pulled off if that was possible. In fact this occurred not too long ago in the village of Skeena Crossing. I notice that the minister expresses some shock. Three people were involved in this incident. It is true they were Canadians, but that does not lessen the crime. They stopped at the Indian community of Gitsegeulla and took one of the figures from the pole.

Miss LaMarsh: You had better spell that name.

Mr. Howard: It is just as hard to spell as it is to pronounce. The woman who was in the house came out and protested but most of the men were away and she could not do very much. Fortunately they were able to contact the R.C.M.P. The R.C.M.P. stopped the car with these three people in it 30 miles up the road. They took the piece of the totem from them but did not lay any charges. The minister expresses shock again. I communicated with the officials about this matter but so far as I know nothing was done. This is the type of activity which goes on.

The point I started to make and which I should like to make is the necessity to retain as much of this material as we possibly can within the country. It is too late to have returned to this nation and to the people many of the beautiful old items which were removed from our country many years ago. However, I do not think it is too late to take similar action to that taken by Mexico and Egypt whereby artifacts or materials representative of the earlier culture of these nations cannot be taken out of the country. By this means we could at least preserve what is left of these older and beautiful objects.

This may not be the bill in which we should incorporate such a prohibition or sanction. It may be that some other piece of legislation is required or it may be a matter which should be dealt with in the Criminal Code. I do not presume to know how the government draftsmen would think this should be done. However, I do think it should be done and I put forward the suggestion to the minister that if it can be incorporated within the bill before us we should consider doing it. If it requires some other type of legislative approach, through another act or another department, then let us consider doing that. I do not think we should continue to allow items which are truly the possessions of the native people of this nation and by adoption are really a part of our cultural inheritance to be removed from the nation. I should like to see a sanction placed against the removal of these items from the country.

Miss LaMarsh: This is a very interesting proposal. It raises a problem which I do not think can be dealt with in this bill. It is a problem which perhaps has been with us for quite a long time. Many countries, particularly those with very ancient civilizations such as China and Greece, for a long time have prohibited the export from their countries of ancient treasures. So far as I am aware the only legislative enactment which exists in Canada is within the jurisdiction of the provinces. It will be appreciated that this matter involves the question of property and civil rights which constitutionally come under the jurisdiction of the provinces. Some of them do have "treasure trove" legislation.

You will recall the case of the gentleman who recently found gold bullion off the coast of Nova Scotia. He had to deal with the government of Nova Scotia. Whether then offshore rights under the water come under federal or provincial jurisdiction, it would seem that property which is found on the shores, until this time at least, has been under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments and they have enacted legislation.

In my constituency about three years ago an Indian burial ground some 400 years old was accidentally found in the backyard of a commercial establishment. It is one of the oldest burial grounds to be found in Ontario. A United States anthropologist came to the rescue. She came from Buffalo and brought with her some of the students from the university who began to dig. It was the municipal authorities who contacted me in this regard. While the national museum paid out a matter of a few hundred dollars in order to forestall the construction of a blacktop surface in this area so that this burial ground could be examined, it was the provincial government which came into the picture. They contributed no money but they were the only ones who had a right to authorize digging to go ahead.

There seems to be a real shortcoming in the co-operative structure across this country when something which could be a national treasure turns up. Unless there is a national emergency the federal government cannot step in. It is only the provincial governments that can do anything in this regard; yet it may be a national treasure, not a provincial one. I see no way in which this can be incorporated in this legislation because of the very great constitutional difficulty. Certainly the time has come, and this must be more in the minds of people now in centennial year, when we should make different arrangements, particularly when you consider that when we want to exhibit Champlain's astrolabe we have to borrow it from the United States. This also was the case in respect of the geographic clock that was used by the first surveyors of Quebec city, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. When we try to purchase articles of this kind we find they are in the United States. It was only as a result of the generosity of American Airlines to the people of Canada that this clock —I have forgotten the exact name—was returned here.

These things are a few hundred years old; yet we have treated them as though there are many more and we need not concern ourselves about them. It seems to me, as mentioned by a number of members, that there is not only new interest in what we have to display but in digging up new things which might be usefully displayed. Incumbent upon this will be a new interest in preserving those things which are already here in this country. I would be very happy to take up the suggestion that we should have a tighter policy in respect of national treasures which may still be within our borders, perhaps under the jurisdiction of provincial authorities, with a view to coming up with better legislation.

Mr. Howard: The sympathy and understanding of the minister in this regard are very good and should be commended. If there is an exclusively constitutional difference involved, perhaps all we can hope for is that someone will be hired who has an equal interest and sympathy, as well as understanding, in these matters. I am afraid that the various provincial governments are not as interested in these things as the minister.

Perhaps I might suggest that the minister look at the constitutional aspect of this matter from a different point of view. Indian lands and reserves fall exclusively within the jurisdiction of the federal government. Perhaps this can be extended to those lands vacated by the Indians, some of whom have left behind historic possessions. One must also consider customs and excise laws, as well as international relationships, all falling within federal jurisdiction. We now have the Export and Imports Permits Act which requires permits to export certain things. Perhaps this could be taken into account in relation to federal authority regarding the removal of these Canadian treasures from Canada. I realize that as long as money is not counterfeit the property rights lie with the individual who possesses it. On the other hand, the amount, color and value fall within the jurisdiction of the federal government. At various times in the past we have prohibited Canadians from taking more than a certain amount out of the country. Perhaps in this regard there is some constitutional framework within which we could prohibit the removal of items of this kind from the country.

These suggestions are only put forward as possible ways of preserving articles of historic value in this country. I do not disagree with the minister but simply suggest that if she is going to look into this matter she might well look into it with these points in mind. They may provide an avenue of approach for action on the part of the federal government to protect and preserve those items to which we have referred.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 6 agreed to.

On clause 7—Museum directors.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister one or two questions in relation to clause 7. I hope she will be able to tell us what happened as a result of Dr. Leishman's tour on the Minto and his report in respect of the history of the Arrow lake Indians. What has been done by the museum in this respect? How many of the directors and the staff of the museum are members of the Anthropological Association of Canada?

I have in my hand a journal published by the Anthropological Association of Canada, of which I happen to be a member. I have recommended the Anthropological Journal of Canada to practically every museum in Canada and more of them are subscribing to it each year. I have been willing to send out hundreds of letters in this regard to the smaller museums across Canada, and I have received a number of letters commending the formation of this organization as well as the articles by the editor and other persons. I am wondering how many members of the staff belong to this group. I should also like to know whether the national museum subscribes to this journal, the editor of which is a professor of archaeology at the University of Montreal.

Miss LaMarsh: I understand that Dr. Taylor of the national museum is a member and that the other three directors are not.

Mr. Herridge: Does the museum subscribe to this publication as one of its official periodicals?

Miss LaMarsh: I am informed that it does.

Mr. Herridge: I am very happy to hear that.

Miss LaMarsh: I am not aware of how much commission goes to the hon. member or how much credit he gets, but the museum does subscribe.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, why does the minister not bring her officials down to the floor? Previous governments have always brought their officials to the floor so that members could get immediate answers. This present type of affectation follows the line of thinking that legislation can be put through without the help of officials. This is really nothing more than plain nonsense.

Miss LaMarsh: A few moments ago the hon. member was complaining that I was looking up to the gallery for guidance.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 8 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 12—Remuneration and expenses of members.

Mr. Lambert: I am interested in this clause because there seems to be an inconsistency in so far as clause 13 is concerned. Let me refer to the last four lines of clause 12 which states that each member of the board or of a consultative committee is entitled to be paid by the corporation such travelling and living expenses incurred by him in connection with the performance of his duties. If we look at the bylaws we find in clause 13 (d) that the board may fix the remuneration and travelling and living expenses to be paid to members of the board as provided in this act and to members of consultative committees other than members of the board. There seems to be an obvious gap in that either the intention is that the members of the consultative committees shall not be paid remuneration or shall only be paid under clause 13(d). The permissive clause is clause 12. If it is the intention to pay these people who are members of consultative committees, it is not provided under clause 12. However, the bylaws purport to say this could be done. I suggest to hon. members that there is conflict here.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Miss LaMarsh: Clause 12 reads as follows:

Each member of the board—

That is, other than those who receive a regular salary.

—shall be paid by the corporation . . . such remuneration as is fixed by bylaw of the board, and each member of the board or of a consultative committee of the board is entitled to be paid by the corporation such travelling and living expenses incurred by him in connection with the performance of his duties as are fixed by bylaw of the board.

Clause 13 (d) reads as follows:

13. The board, with the approval of the minister, may make bylaws—

(d) fixing the remuneration and travelling and living expenses to be paid to members of the board as provided in this act and to members of consultative committees other than members of the board;

Mr. Lambert: With the greatest respect, Mr. Chairman, clause 12 authorizes people to be paid remuneration and expenses but there is no provision in clause 12 for the payment of remuneration to members of consultative committees. If there is no such authorization there is no possibility of a bylaw under clause 13 granting such remuneration. You can have it one way or the other.

Miss LaMarsh: It is not intended to pay remuneration to members of consultative committees; it is to be paid only to members of the board. Subclause (d) of clause 13 deals with this question. If you do not have authority under clause 12 you cannot pay them under the provisions of clause 13.

Mr. Lambert: Then fix the remuneration, travelling and living expenses to be paid to members of the board. As the bill is drafted, this provision applies to members of consultative committees other than members of the board. There is no limitation in the bill as drafted.

Miss LaMarsh: Remuneration will be paid only to persons authorized under clause 12.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 13—Bylaws.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I think we should again look at subclause (d) of clause 13. The word "remuneration" applies to members of the board and to members of consultative committees. It is surely not the intention to put the members of consultative committees on salary. The intention as expressed in clause 12 is that they shall receive their travelling and living expenses. This is just a matter of redrafting subclause (d) to limit the remuneration part to members of the board. If this clause were stood for a minute or two I think the officials might very well correct the drafting, which would save our having to do it across the floor of the house. I suggest that we deal with the following clauses.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I cannot agree with my hon. friend. Clause 13 (d) of the bill deals with one group, namely, the members of the board, and it fixes the remuneration, travelling and living expenses as provided in the bill. Clause 13(d) then refers to members of consultative committees other than members of the board. The bill does not provide for them to receive remuneration for the time they are there but applies only to travelling and living expenses.

Mr. Lambert: The minister has got it wrong.

Miss LaMarsh: No, Mr. Chairman, I have not.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, surely the clause fixes the remuneration, travelling and living expenses to be paid to members of the board. That is the first group. Then surely the intent, as the clause is now worded, is to fix the remuneration, travelling and living expenses to be paid to members of consultative committees. How else are we to read this paragraph? I think it should read something like this; "fixing the remuneration to be paid to members of the board as provided in this act and travelling and living expenses to be paid to members of the board and to members of consultative committees."

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, the members of consultative committees are not to be paid remuneration. That is not the intention of this legislation. They are to be paid only travelling and living expenses. Only the members of the board are to receive a per diem as remuneration. That is what the clause says.

Mr. Churchill: I do not want to get into a dispute about this, Mr. Chairman. I have suggested that this clause be stood. The officials could look at it, and if from their lofty post they decide that the minister is right and we are wrong, we will have to accept their verdict. But at the moment this clause is not very clear to us. Why can we not stand it? There are eight or ten clauses to be dealt with; we could consider them and come back to clause 13. In the interval we might receive some advice in this respect.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that clause 13 shall stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Clause 14 agreed to.

On clause 15—Agent of Her Majesty.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have one question to ask the minister in connection with this clause. When can we expect a new building for the museum? This question has been raised several times. Can the minister give us any idea of the target date toward which she is working in this respect? Many other buildings have been constructed that we could very well have done without. We have been waiting for this building for a number of years and the fact that it has not been constructed has been responsible for a number of resignations.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, my target was 1967, and I have obviously missed it.

Mr. Orlikow: Has the minister a new target, and can she tell us how many of the directors of the museum have resigned because they say commitments were made by various governments that a new building would be erected? How many more directors are likely to resign if a new building is not erected?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the first part of the question I may say that I am not sure what the new target is. The building will be erected as funds become available. With regard to the second part of the question, I think three or four directors have resigned in the last five or six years. I cannot give the reasons for all the resignations, but certainly none of them was happy about the facilities they had. So far as the third part of the question is concerned, I hope no more directors will resign for this or any other related reason.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I am a little dense. The minister says her target date was 1967. Obviously that has gone. Is there another target date? There is not a freeze on all building. I am not at this time going to be critical of the amount of money which is being spent across the street for the performing arts centre. Perhaps we could have got by with spending $30 million rather than $42 million and could have used the money thus saved to build a museum. I ask the minister whether there is now any target date set for the museum, or is this project to be one of a list which we will one day consider?

Miss LaMarsh: No, Mr. Chairman, I think it is pretty high on the postponed list. I do not think it is in never-never land by any means. As I explained before lunch, we have been looking at other possibilities and perhaps having in centre town a display area and other buildings which are less expensive per square foot outside the core of the city for research and laboratory work. It depends upon the economy. No one wants to see the cultural institutions pinched off. I am sure everyone agrees that when there is only a certain amount of money there are probably higher priorities then the provision of such a new building. However, a number of projects have been postponed.

One of the things I had hoped to see established this year was another project which would have come under this bill. I refer to the first national zoological gardens. However, that also does not have the highest priority although it was first recommended in the Massey commission report. Nevertheless it seems to me incredible that a national zoo has never been created and, indeed, it would be necessary to do so to round out our series of museums. But this project, although it has been regarded with considerable favour and was almost accepted for 1967, has had to be postponed as well.

I think it would be unrealistic for me to give the hon. member a definite answer in reply to his question. What I can say is that as long as I am the minister in charge of this department this will be my goal for the current year and the next year, and if it keeps being postponed it will only be because I have to push against a substantial minister.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 16 agreed to.

On clause 17—Gifts, bequests, etc.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, clause 17 deals with the arrangements whereby the corporation may acquire by gift, bequest or otherwise any real or personal property. In the past the national museum has acquired artefacts which have been discovered in other parts of Canada, and it would appear from past experience that the areas in the provinces in which these artefacts are found have no say in their ultimate disposal. I should like to ask the minister whether, for example, in the instance of an early Indian mound located by archaeologists which, produces artefacts of considerable interest to that area there is any consultation with the province as to the ultimate disposition of these artefacts.

Miss LaMarsh: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. I was speaking to my parliamentary secretary about the answer to another question and I did not hear the latter part of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Dinsdale: Earlier in the discussion the minister intimated she thought the committee of the whole could deal adequately with the details arising from the bill before us. It is quite obvious that the committee is not having great success in this regard. I thought I had made my point quite explicit, and I agree with the hon. member for Carleton that it would be of considerable help, particularly at the committee stage when we are dealing with the details of the bill, if the minister could have the advice of her officials. I have been here for a period of 16 years and it has always been the custom as a courtesy, particularly to members of the opposition, to allow the officials of the department to be present on the floor of the house to advise the minister with regard to answers to some of the more obscure questions which arise. It is quite impossible, even for ministers, to be omniscient with respect to all matters relating to a department. Even Liberal ministers are not so omniscient; they have human frailties like the rest of us. I think there was every justification for sending this bill to a special committee where we could have examined in depth the important items arising from this bill and where we would have had direct access to the officials and their background of information.

The point on clause 17 which I raised previously arises from past experience. When artifacts are located in a region of Canada which are of special significance to the history of that area—I mentioned as an example the uncovering of an Indian burial mound which would reveal oll sorts of valuable archaeological artifacts—is there any consultation with the provincial government with regard to their ultimate disposal?

Miss LaMarsh: I would be very happy to have my officials down here but there happen to be four of them and it is customary to have only two on the floor. Two of them are museum directors, one is the director of the national gallery and the fourth one is the under secretary. I do not see any particular reason for having them down here unless there are details which cannot be answered by the usual procedure. This is not to say that I know everything, and the same can be said from having observed hon. members opposite at the time when they were sitting on the front benches on this side. I do not have that kind of arrogance.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Indeed, you do.

Miss LaMarsh: I do not feel arrogant about museums; I did not know anything about them. I do not suppose anyone could start out knowing as little about them as I did, but at least I wound up knowing more about them than some of the ministers who have dealt with this matter. I am doing what I can about it.

As I informed my hon. friend earlier, the material which has been collected heretofore has been kept in different parts of the museum. Some of it is on display in the science museum and some is on display in the national museum. I am sorry that when my hon. friend first raised the matter I was not certain to what he referred. I think it was during the time when he was responsible for the museum that certain funds were set aside for the purchase of sleighs, buggies and furniture which depicted the confederation period. I had not known of that, but those were in large part the materials which have created the confederation display of today and I think my hon. friend should be congratulated for the fact that his administration was sufficiently farsighted to provide for that several years ago.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, my question has not yet been answered but I will reserve it for another occasion.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 18 to 21 inclusive agreed to.

On Clause 22—Report to Parliament.

Mr. Lambert: I have one question for the minister. I should like a reassurance from the hon. lady that the report of the chairman of the board will be put before parliament and will be subject to examination by the public accounts committee. I recall that in 1958 or 1959 some questions were raised by the chairman of the Canada Council on whether the report of the council to parliament was properly subject to review by the public accounts committee. There was no insistence that it should not be but a doubt was raised about it. I should like to know whether the minister feels that any such doubt with regard to the report of the board has been removed and that quite properly the report of the board and the Auditor General's comments thereon shall be, in the normal course of events, subject to examination and discussion by the public accounts committee.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Miss LaMarsh: I believe there is no question that the board is subject to the usual reviews. The problem to which my hon. friend referred arose, I believe, from the rather special circumstances of the setting up of the Canada Council whose funds were initially and especially appropriated. It was not a matter of coming back to parliament. Only recently of course the Canada Council's funds have been augmented. There is no question about the fact this chairman's report will have to be to parliament and will be subject to the usual parliamentary and financial reviews.

Clauses 23 to 25 inclusive agreed to.

The Chairman: The committee will now revert to clause 13.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

On clause 13—Bylaws.

Miss LaMarsh: With respect to clause 13, I am informed that what I had advised is correct. However if the committee wishes to pay remuneration, travelling expenses and living expenses to both the board and the consultative committee, I have no objection one way or the other. Originally it was provided that only the board would be paid.

Mr. Lambert: This is what we mean.

Miss LaMarsh: The board would be paid travelling, living expenses and remuneration, and that the consultative committee would be paid living expenses and remuneration? This is what the legislation says.

Mr. Lambert: But it doesn't.

Miss LaMarsh: It may be that the committee would prefer to have the clause read this way: Fixing remuneration to be paid members of the board as provided in this act, and travelling and living expenses to members of the consultative committee other than members of the board.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the minister not depriving the members of the board of travelling and living expenses?

Miss LaMarsh: No; I said, fixing the remuneration of the members of the board, and travelling and living expenses.

Mr. Baldwin: If clause 12 is the governing clause, would it not be much simpler to say what you mean—fixing remuneration and travelling expenses to be paid pursuant to clause 12?

Miss LaMarsh: I am afraid I do not understand. I do not see anything wrong with clause 12. Then in clause 13, under paragraph (d), the same things which are provided under clause 12 could be incorporated in the bylaws of the corporation. Clause 12 provides for payment to members of the board under all three headings, and payments to members of the consultative committee under only two headings. Clause 13 says you can pass bylaws which fix the remuneration and travelling and living expenses to be paid members of the board as provided in this act.

Mr. Baldwin: That is pursuant to clause 12.

Miss LaMarsh: Then we have all agreed on what we want to have it say; and this is what it does say.

Mr. Baldwin: Since there is some ambiguity about it, I suggest we say in (d), referring back to clause 12 which is the governing clause, "fixing the remuneration, travelling and living expenses to be paid as set out in clause 12".

Miss LaMarsh: In order to arrive at some conclusion, I will be happy to accept that amendment if the hon. member will so move. As I understand it, the amendment will delete everything after the word "paid" in paragraph (d) and substitute the words "in section 12".

Mr. Baldwin: Since you may have difficulty in reading my writing, Mr. Chairman, the amendment would amend section 13(d) by deleting all the words after the word "paid" in line 36 and adding the words "pursuant to this act".

Mr. Bell (Carleton): With the greatest of respect, Mr. Chairman, if we pass this amendment we have put ourselves into difficulty. We would have now given the board the power, to pass bylaws fixing the remuneration of the various directors and officers. I fear this would be contrary to the other clauses passed earlier, which leave with the governor in council the power to set remuneration. I am afraid we would have to say "pursuant to section 12".

Mr. Baldwin: I am persuaded to go back to what I originally thought was correct and make reference to section 12 in the amendment.

Mr. Herridge: No wonder laymen cannot understand the law.

The Chairman: Order. It is moved by the hon. member for Peace River:

That section 13(d) be amended as follows:
By deleting all the words after the word "paid" in line 36 and by adding the words "pursuant to section 12".

Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Barnett: I have a question I should like to ask about clause 13, particularly as it relates to clause 22 which we have already passed. This clause provides that the chairman of the board will provide a report of all proceedings under this act within three months after the end of the fiscal year. I presume the term "proceedings" as used in clause 22 would include a report on actions taken by the board to develop or to amend the bylaws. My question is for clarification as to whether or not these bylaws will be public documents. The board, with the approval of the minister, may make bylaws. If the reference had been to the governor in council, the bylaws would in effect be orders in council and would be published. I should like to know whether these bylaws will be published in the Canada Gazette when they are passed by the board and approved by the minister.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Miss LaMarsh: I do not know whether it is a practice in other corporations to publish bylaws; I have never seen published the current bylaws of the national gallery, but I see no objection to that. It might be sufficient if I asked the first chairman of the board, whoever that might be, to make sure that the initial bylaws are incorporated in the first report.

Mr. Barnett: If I might pursue my point, I do not think that the internal business conduct of the board ought to be a matter for publication. Instead I think the people of Canada ought to know what are the duties of the director and heads of museums. Paragraph (e) makes an oblique reference to this matter.

On an earlier clause we talked about the policy of lending exhibitions or art collections to local museums. My interpretation may be wrong, but could not a bylaw be developed, under the authority of paragraph (e), to set up the policy of how the board would deal with such matters? That would be of great public interest and would provide members of parliament and others with information about such matters.

Miss LaMarsh: Clearly, the minutes of meetings and similar proceedings would not be published. Any report which the board would make would have to do with its responsibilities in fields of research, with respect to travelling exhibits, and that sort of thing. It would deal with the purchase account and what had happened to it; what each of the galleries bought, and that sort of thing. That is the meat of any report which the board would make every year.

People do not like to read bylaws, and I do not see where information such as my hon. friend speaks of would be of benefit, if it were contained in any report which might be printed with any bylaw.

Mr. Barnett: From my experience, many acts that parliament passes do not contain in them general guide lines. Regulations govern agencies or departments of government. That is the meat of the matter. Perhaps I am wrong in assuming that, in effect, the bylaws will be the regulations, as far as this operation is concerned. For example the regulations passed under the Aeronautics Act provide, publicly, details of the operation and administration of the act.

I am sorry, but I do not think the minister's answers were clear enough. I tried to make clear that I was not so much concerned with the internal business of the board. Often the real meat of any policy with respect to any such board is contained in an order in council.

Mr. Woolliams: An order in council is filed.

Mr. Barnett: Otherwise, we may wait for three months after the end of a fiscal year before obtaining a report on these matters. That is not satisfactory. We can always ask the minister questions in the house, when parliament is sitting; but we know the limitations of answers to questions asked on orders of the day. I am wondering, since in a manner of speaking this corporation is a public corporation whether provision has been made for the publication of bylaws to the extent that the board will deal with matters of public interest and concern.

Miss LaMarsh: I have never heard of any such publication. Perhaps other hon. members have.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time.

Mr. Churchill: By leave, now.

Miss LaMarsh moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): I intend to ask that this bill be passed on division. I do so to reiterate my grave concern that under this bill the national gallery may be done in the eye as the result of its being linked with the other museums. If there is any indication in the next few years that the national gallery has suffered by reason of this linking, I assure you, sir, that I shall be back to try to restore it to the status it must have in developing the life of this country.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I think it is only fair, and I am sure that regardless of their points of view all members in the opposition agree with what I have to say now, that we should express our thanks to the minister for her co-operation and willingness to accept amendments from the opposition side.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the hon. member for Kootenay West. Also, replying to the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton, I think anyone who has special areas of interest might rise and express the sort of reservation he expressed. Since his remarks were so aptly put I wish to say that my reservations will be to see that the natural history museum does not suffer at the expense of the national gallery.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): So long as members of the house remain militant in protecting each of the museums and galleries, none of them will suffer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Churchill: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

VISITING FORCES ACT

REPLACEMENT OF EXISTING LEGISLATION RESPECTING VISITING FORCES

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-3, respecting the armed forces of countries visiting Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the basic purpose of this bill is to repeal the Visiting Forces (North Atlantic Treaty Organization) Act, the Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act, and the Visiting Forces (United States of America) Act, and to replace them with one act which would provide for the rights, privileges and duties of the armed forces of any other nation when visiting in Canada. The Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act was enacted in 1932 as a result of the Statute of Westminster. It provides for the privileges, immunities and duties of visiting forces from other parts of the commonwealth when in Canada. Reciprocal legislation was enacted by nations of the commonwealth to provide for Canadian forces visiting those countries.

During the second world war, with many United States forces visiting Canada their position was provided for by an order in council under the War Measures Act. When at the conclusion of the war it became apparent that United States forces would continue to visit Canada from time to time, the Visiting Forces (United States of America) Act was enacted. There is no reciprocal United States legislation as under the law of that country a visiting force automatically carries with it the right to hold courts martial, administer discipline, and so on.

In 1949 Canada became a member of NATO. One of the agreements entered into at the time by Canada was the agreement between the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty regarding the status of their forces. This agreement provided for the status, privileges and duties of the armed forces of one NATO country when in another NATO country.

Canadian legislation was required to approve and implement this agreement. The legislation known as the Visiting Forces (North Atlantic Treaty Organization) Act was enacted for that purpose in 1951. At the time this act was drafted it was foreseen that the armed forces of non-NATO states might visit Canada from time to time and that provision should be made for the status of such forces in Canada. This was done by providing in the act that forces of non-NATO countries could be brought under the act by the governor in council, designating the countries from which they came as associated states under section 5.

Since the visting forces of NATO act was passed, armed forces of many non-NATO countries, particularly the emerging African states, have visited Canada for training and other purposes. It is therefore felt that it is not appropriate that the forces of these non-NATO countries should have their status in Canada determined by an act of parliament designed to implement the north Atlantic treaty. The government therefore decided that it would submit to parliament for approval a bill repealing all the existing visiting forces acts and providing for visiting forces in a uniform way. I may say that this is the course that has been followed by the United Kingdom and most other NATO countries requiring such legislation.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, could I at this point ask a question of the minister. I notice that he at all times referred to visiting forces, and in particular made reference to United States forces. Could I ask him whether this bill applies strictly to what he termed visiting forces? Does the minister differentiate between a visiting force and those forces who, though non-Canadian, are stationed in Canada? For example, United States forces are stationed in three parts of Canada to control nuclear weapons and warheads in this country.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I think there is a definition clause at the commencement of the bill. A visiting force means any of the armed forces of a designated state present in Canada in connection with official duties, and includes civilian personnel designated under section 4 as a civilian component of a visiting force. So I would imagine that they include these forces stationed in Canada. It would include forces in Canada for training, under some arrangement with the government. It also includes visiting forces to the country for a short period of time in the normal course of events.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, the three purposes that the bill will serve, as I see them, are all desirable. First of all, the three existing visiting forces acts are replaced by one act and this, as the minister said, will lead to uniformity of treatment as far as servicemen in forces of another country visiting Canada are concerned. It will also make for simplicity and is, I think, a reasonable and desirable step to take.

Second, the fact that any country can be designated for inclusion under the act and the servicemen of that country brought within the terms of the act provides for much greater flexibility. I think it is also an improvement of the situation and therefore something that should be approved.

Third, the inclusion of dependants under this bill will remove possible difficulties which could arise over the treatment of these dependants, and this is something I am also glad to see included within the provisions of the bill.

I have gone over the bill in detail and see very little in any of the clauses to which there is objection. Therefore I think it is desirable to pass the bill without undue delay.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, a moment ago I asked a question of the minister because I was anxious to receive an answer to my inquiry. However I hope that during discussion in committee the minister will give a further explanation.

Of particular concern to me is the position of United States forces who are not simply visiting Canada but are stationed in this country. I differentiate between visiting Canada and stationed in Canada, despite the definition the minister read in the bill.

Whether I like it or not, Mr. Speaker, by agreement we now have United States forces stationed in Canada. They are there because we have Voodoos and Bomarcs—there are two Bomarc stations in Canada—and U.S. officers have absolute control over nuclear warheads for this military hardware. At this moment I am not raising the question of United States control over warheads, but what is of concern to me is this: What exactly is the position of the United States officers who control the nuclear warheads for the Bomarcs and certain other armament for aircraft? Are they under United States martial control in any phase of their activities, or do they come under the supervision of Canadian authorities? Of this I am not yet certain. I realize they control the use of the warheads, but outside of their being stationed in Canada and not being described as visiting forces, are they subject, and subject only, to United States martial law and not Canadian law, either civil of military? I am not going to ask for an answer now, but I believe the minister will understand the clarification I desire, and I hope that at committee stage he will give an expanded answer.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order. It is understood that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I just wanted to say that I agree that this question should be answered at committee stage, but I think I should point out to him that in talking about this exclusive control he is stretching the point a bit. This is a joint control of the warheads.

Mr. Winch: The Americans have the key control, do they not?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): It is well known that any decision to fire a nuclear weapon is taken following joint consultation, and must be a joint decision.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Tardif in the chair.

[Mr. Winch.]

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Winch: Now may I have the clarification, and in asking for it I wish to say I have no intention of holding up the bill. I think I understand its basic principle, but I do know there is a joint agreement relative to the nuclear warheads which are now stored in Canada. I am told that the key control over their use rests in the hands of American officers stationed in Canada. The minister is shaking his head. I would point out that I have been on the defence committee for quite a while and have visited a number of countries with that committee, including some in Europe.

Although there may have to be a joint understanding as to a nuclear weapon being used, I know that in our own squadrons in Europe the key to the release mechanism of a nuclear warhead is kept in the hands of an American officer. Does the bill mean that Americans stationed in Canada will come only under their own American rules, regulations, courts martial or whatever, and in no way be obligated under our own Canadian civil or defence regulations and procedures?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, the Americans stationed in Canada, to whom my hon. friend refers, are subject to American military law, the same as Canadian forces stationed in Germany are subject to Canadian military law. They are not exempted from the Canadian civil law. This is an agreement between two countries for the purpose of administering justice within a certain confined military field. This is an exchange, in which we apply the American law in the case of the Americans, the same as the Germans apply the Canadian law in the case of Canadians.

I understand the hon. member's concern about atomic weapons but, with due respect, I do not think that is relevant to this particular bill. When he mentions Americans being subject to American law, that is relevant to the bill.

Mr. Churchill: Later in the bill we come to the question of service people from other countries attached to Canadian forces. Are there two types? Are there service people in this country not attached to Canadian forces but serving here in an official capacity on behalf of their own country and in co-operation with Canada, and are there people in this country who are actually attached to Canadian forces? Are there these two groups?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I am told there is only one case, that of British officers attached to Canadian forces. This is the only case where that applies.

Mr. Churchill: Then there are Americans here as visiting forces, but they are not attached?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Not attached.

Mr. Churchill: In order to have it on the record, may I ask the minister how many service personnel, from a designated or associate country, there are in Canada at the present time, either visiting or attached? Also, how many Canadians are serving in other countries, either as visiting forces or attached to the forces of those countries?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I would have to request the patience of the hon. member until this statistical information can be secured.

Mr. Churchill: The reason I asked this on clause 2 is that I know how rapidly the department acts, and I know that by the time we reach the last of the clauses the minister will have that information.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Thank you for the compliment.

Mr. Johnston: Does the bill set up two classes of possible deserters from the American armed forces, such as an American attached to a visiting force who deserts within Canada, and an American who deserts in the United States and comes to Canada seeking political refuge?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I believe, in the hypothetical case mentioned, that it would. Actually we are dealing here with people serving in Canada. In the case of a soldier seeking refuge in Canada, having deserted in the United States, I believe he would be dealt with under another jurisdiction, probably the Immigration Act.

Mr. Johnston: Under clause 10, for example, we could have the Canadian forces making every effort to apprehend a deserter from the American forces within Canada, yet an entirely different approach would be taken with respect to someone who had deserted elsewhere and then entered Canada.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I believe clause 10 says very specifically that it would be on the request of the commanding officer of the unit in question. In the hypothetical case submitted by the hon. member I presume this would not be at the request of the commanding officer, and therefore this bill would hardly apply.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, the point in which I am interested pertains to subclause (1) of clause 12 of the bill, which deals with the police functions of visiting forces. I would hope that the minister might consider this now and give us a clarifying statement when we reach that clause. Would the minister clarify the position of a member of the military police of visiting forces, such as we have in Halifax. If such a person is involved in what we now understand to be capital murder, what is the status of a Canadian citizen who might be involved in perpetrating a capital crime on such a visiting policeman?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, I understand that the hon. member is asking that I answer this question when we reach clause 12.

Mr. Forrestall: My purpose was to raise it now so that the minister could think about it and answer the question later.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask for further clarification of a matter in respect of a visiting member of the armed forces. Sometimes we have visits from warships of other countries. This year in particular we have had official visits from warships. However, let us take the situation which occurred this year in respect of an official visit to the port of Vancouver when, unfortunately, certain irresponsible individuals broke Canadian law. When they appeared in court they were released on the word of their commanding officer that they would be returned to Canada later to face trial; but they never returned. Just what is the situation in respect of a person who breaks the Canadian civil law while on an official visit? I am in support of this bill in priciple, but there are these little problems which we should like to have clarified. How is the law interpreted in a situation of that kind?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): My understanding is that he is not exempt from the Canadian law. If such a person breaks the Canadian law he is subject to that law. I do not see any problem in this regard. If a member of a visiting force breaks a Canadian law, the Canadian law can be applied.

Mr. Winch: What about the situation in Vancouver this year where a commanding officer said that the men would be returned for trial? The men in this case never did return for trial.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I am sorry. I cannot comment on that. I do not know of the incident in question.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 10—Arrest.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, there does not seem to be any reference in this clause to the situation of a member of a visiting force who may wish to become a political refugee or who may seek political asylum in this country. My interpretation of this clause—and I hope I will be corrected if I am wrong—is that if the officer commanding a visiting force requests the Canadian defence authorities to arrest a member of that visiting force, we are required to do so, or we may do so. It does not say that the man must be guilty, but he is deemed to be guilty of some offence. Where does this leave the political refugee who seeks asylum while in Canada?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): My understanding of this clause, Mr. Chairman, is that the minister may from time to time by general or special order direct the officers and men of the Canadian forces in this regard. So there is discretion. I would think that in a case of this nature the minister could use that particular discretion. He does not necessarily have to comply with the request of the commanding officer.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 agreed to.

On clause 12—Police functions.

Mr. Walker: Clause 12 gives the visiting police force a pretty broad authority to go anywhere and exercise policing functions. Do they require search warrants if, for instance, one of their men has taken refuge in a private Canadian home? Are the visiting officers required to follow the same procedures Canadian authorities would have to follow?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): My understanding is that they go according to the prescription of their own law. They actually apply their own law here within Canada. This is what the bill enables them to do.

So far as the query of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall) is concerned, the military police of a visiting force can only exercise the police powers of arrest over other members of the visiting force. However, all members of a visiting force have the ordinary powers of arrest that anyone in Canada has. They can arrest anyone who is committing an offence. This is contained in sections 434 and 436 of the Criminal Code. Section 434 reads as follows:

> Anyone may arrest without warrant a person whom he finds committing an indictable offence.

Then section 436:

> Anyone may arrest without warrant a person who, on reasonable and probable grounds, he believes (a) has committed a criminal offence—

I hope this clarifies the situation.

Mr. Forrestall: I do not wish to prolong this debate, Mr. Chairman. However, what I am curious about is the protection given to the man who, while under his own law, is a police officer or peace officer, and who may be killed by a Canadian citizen while in the discharge of his duties here in Canada. Dealing in terms of the bill which we had before us recently, is the Canadian citizen in the position of having committed a capital crime, and therefore subject to the death penalty.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I understand that the hon. member is asking about a police officer of a visiting force who may have committed a murder in Canada.

Mr. Forrestall: No, Mr. Chairman. I am referring to a police officer of a visiting force who is murdered in Canada. What is the status of the Canadian citizen who perpetrates that crime?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I do not see any problem in that regard. The Canadian citizen is subject to the Canadian law. Therefore, if he has killed a police officer it would be for the judge to decide how to apply the law. I believe the position in respect of such a person is very clear. The Canadian committed an offence against a Canadian law.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Winch: If the hon. member for York Centre had not raised this question I intended to do so, for clarification. I am intrigued by this same matter because, unless I misunderstood the minister, it is very disturbing. My understanding of what the minister said a few moments ago in answer to the hon. member's question is that a member of the military police of a visiting military force may enter a home in Canada without a warrant. That is the impression I gained from what the minister said, and I believe the member for York Centre has the same impression. If that is correct, we had better stand here for some time and talk a little bit about this situation. We do not allow these people in our own country to enter Canadian homes and make arrests without warrants. I hope the minister will clarify this situation, because no visiting military police from another country should have authority in Canada to enter a Canadian home or make an arrest without a Canadian warrant. I hope this will be clarified.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): There are two things involved. I do not recall the hon. member for York Centre suggesting that military police from a force visiting Canada could enter a home here without a warrant. I understood him to ask whether such an individual could arrest someone without a Canadian warrant, and I said that he would have to comply with the laws of his own country.

Mr. Winch: He would have to comply with the laws of his country, but not with our laws?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): He would have to comply with his own military law in respect of his own people, and that is what we have said from the beginning. My answer to the question as to whether a military policeman of a visiting force can enter a Canadian home in search of one of his own force members without a warrant is that he cannot. To do so would be an invasion of Canadian law, and we have provisions which require that such an individual must have a warrant or be accompanied by a Canadian police officer. This is how the situation would be handled.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 13 and 14 agreed to.

On clause 15—Claims against designated states.

Mr. Brewin: As a matter of interest I should like to ask how this clause works. It seems to suggest that if a member of a visiting force commits a tort or wrong within the scope of his duties he is deemed to have committed an offence as a servant of the crown under the Crown Liability Act. Presumably the crown is then liable to anyone who has been damaged or has suffered loss as the result of the commission of such act. Is there any provision or arrangement whereby, if the government of Canada has to pay out money in such a case, it can recover from the country whose visiting force is in Canada?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): This is derived from an arrangement within the NATO agreement. Under that agreement Canada is obliged to process claims against visiting forces in Canada in the same manner as in respect of claims arising out of the activities of our visiting forces outside Canada. This country assumes 25 per cent of the cost of settling such claims, and the country of the visiting force assumes 75 per cent. For the purposes of the Crown Liability Act, this clause would require the country of the visiting force, and its members, to be in the same position as the Canadian force, and its members, and would deem the property of the visiting force, in particular motor vehicles, to be owned by the crown.

The present wording restricts visiting forces liability to subsection 1 of section 3, and therefore prevents the application of subsection 2, which states that the crown is liable for damages sustained by reason of a motor vehicle owned by the crown being operated on a highway, in respect of which the crown would be liable if it was operated by a private person of full age and capacity. In order to put visiting forces in the same position as Canadian forces, thereby implementing Article VIII (5) of the NATO forces agreement, the opening words of clause 15 are not restricted to a particular section or subsection of the Crown Liability Act.

Mr. Brewin: I am not sure I heard the minister correctly. Did he say that the Canadian government pays 25 per cent and the foreign government of the visiting force pays 75 per cent; and does that include the judgment as well as costs?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): This would include all costs.

Mr. Brewin: Is there a similar provision applicable in countries in which Canada has visiting forces?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Yes, and I am given to understand that the same applies.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 16 to 20 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 21—Exception.

Mr. Harkness: What is the significance of section 13 of the Official Secrets Act, which does not apply in respect of a designated state?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): The explanation is that section 13 of the Official Secrets Act makes certain acts committed outside Canada triable in Canada, in so far as the security of Canada is concerned. It is not considered appropriate or necessary to extend this protection to visiting forces present in Canada.

Mr. Harkness: In other words, any breach of security by a member of a visiting force could be tried in the country of that force?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Yes.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 22 agreed to.

On clause 23—Service vehicles.

Mr. Deachman: Before this clause carries I should like to ask about the licensing of vehicles. I note that this clause exempts the vehicles of visiting forces from registration or tax or fee payable in respect of vehicles. What is done to enable police to identify these vehicles? I note that national defence vehicles in Ottawa carry a brown coloured licence plate. What is done specifically for identification purposes in respect of United States vehicles used by its forces stationed in Canada?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I must confess that I am stuck for an answer. I do not know.

Mr. Deachman: I note that this is not a revision of a former clause, but simply a renumbered clause. Perhaps the answer will be available this afternoon, before we complete our consideration.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I shall certainly try to get it on time.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 24 to 26 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 27—Application of section.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, we are now getting close to the end of this bill and I wonder whether answers are ready to the questions I put forward.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I am still waiting for the accurate figures, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member is dealing with figures and I should therefore like to have figures that are as accurate as possible. I am sure he understands the difficulty raised in his questions. I believe the hon. member has two sets of figures, and it is difficult to arrive at an accurate answer.

Mr. Churchill: I thought the minister had the answer at his fingertips. I will wait until we deal with clause 1.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 27 carry?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the word "temporarily" occurs in clause 2(a). I suppose there is no change here from the earlier acts. What is the practice in this regard? Does "attach temporarily" refer to a period of weeks or months, or does it go beyond this?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 27 carry?

Mr. Churchill: I am still waiting for an answer to my question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): This provision applies particularly to British officers who would be attached to Canadian forces for an undetermined period of time, which could be a month, six months or a year.

Clause 28 agreed to.

On Clause 29—Repeals.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I have a question on clause 29(2). I was looking at the north Atlantic treaty the other night. Will it be reprinted as an adjunct to this act, or does clause 29 mean it will stay as it is now, and as varied elsewhere, and that it will have to be referred to by searching in the back files?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I am sure it could be found in the regular documents of the Department of External Affairs. It is not the intention to print it with this bill, because the present bill supersedes it. Actually it is a combination of the three bills already in existence and is covered by the clause in this new bill.

Mr. Churchill: I was looking at the statute last night. I do not have it here, but it appeared to me that this was attached as a schedule to the original act. I ask the minister, where will it be in the future? Where will it appear in the revised statutes, if it does appear there?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, I am told it will not be in the statutes but will be attached to the treaties of external affairs, because it is part of a treaty that has been negotiated. We are covering it differently, with a bill encompassing all the situations in Canada.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, where does one go to get these external affairs documents? I have here a note that this was a schedule attached to the bill. It is an 18-page schedule. The north Atlantic treaty may be up for review, of course, and it should be readily accessible. I was wondering whether the department had given some thought to this matter.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I am told it is referred to as a treaty series and it is readily available to any hon. member at the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, in connection with clause 12, which prescribes the powers of a member of a visiting force in exercising police functions, and the power of arrest, can the minister assure us that such a person is not given powers in excess of those granted to Canadian police officers in the pursuit of their duty? I see that these powers will be prescribed by regulation and I should like to be assured that the regulations spell out that no more power is granted to a visiting police officer than is already granted to a Canadian police officer.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I have been referred to Queen's Orders and Regulations which say that a member of the military police of a visiting force may, in relation to any member of that force—therefore it applies only in this particular case—exercise the same police function as a police officer authorized by the Criminal Code, but only in relation to any member of that force.

Mr. Walker: I realize that, Mr. Chairman, but if a member of the visiting force is in a Canadian home, what is the situation?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): He is authorized to act only in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada. Therefore he has no special status.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to hold up the proceedings on this bill. It is the only defence bill we have had in the last four years with which we have been able to deal without controversy in some quarters of the house. The difference between this minister and his predecessor is so astonishing that I feel somewhat cramped in style.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I am beginning to worry.

Mr. Churchill: If this minister, who is so agreeable, will give me the information asked for at some subsequent date—

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I will.

Mr. Churchill: —I will have no objection to passing the bill right now.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I will with pleasure, Mr. Chairman, seeing the engaging smile of the hon. member, commit myself to bringing him this detailed and precise information in record time.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

An hon. Member: By leave, now.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask from the house leader the forecast for next week.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on Monday and Tuesday we will consider the resolution amending the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act; then the divorce resolution, followed by the second reading of the bill respecting the boundary between the province of British Columbia and the Yukon and Northwest Territories then the second reading of the Publication of Statutes Act; the committee stage of the C.N.R. bill; the resolution to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act and the resolution to amend the National Parks Act. Regardless of any progress that may be made on these items of legislation, we propose to resume the budget debate on Wednesday, and the purpose in introducing these resolutions is so hon. members will have an opportunity to see the bills at an early date.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, once the budget debate is started will it be carried on consecutively?

Mr. MacEachen: It is too far in the future to state with any assurance that that will be so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills and public bills.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO REDUCE VOTING AGE TO EIGHTEEN YEARS

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-14, to amend the Canada Elections Act (age of voters).

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order before we proceed with the bill. My recollection is that the house dealt with the age of voters about three weeks ago, and here we are presented with the same problem again. There may be other resolutions or bills on the order paper dealing with the same topic. I suggest to the Chair that it appears from my study of the order paper that 6, 10 or 20 hon. members could put on almost identical bills or motions referring to the same subject with regard to the reduction of the age of voters from 21 to 18, and there would then be no limit to the number of occasions on which this matter would be brought before the house.

I think this is not the intention in arranging the business of the house, and I should like to have some clarification on that point because I have a distinct recollection of entering into a debate on this matter just three weeks ago.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is quite correct in saying that this matter was dealt with in the private members hour on November 3 last, but as I recall it—I was not in the house on that occasion—the debate was not resolved; it had not come to a vote. Therefore the matter is in some ways still before the house. I think the hon. member is also right in suggesting there are a number of bills on the same subject. There are five bills which, although they vary somewhat, essentially refer to the same subject. The reason there are so many bills is the fact that there is great concern on all sides of the house that this matter be resolved at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Speaker, may I speak on the point of order that has been raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. I should like to point out that the hon. member for Prince has a precedent for what he is doing. I will not say it is a good precedent but it is there. In April of 1966 the house settled once and for all the question of capital punishment in a free vote. Nevertheless it was brought back inside of 18 months by a so-called government bill which was resolved by a free vote. So the hon. member for Prince has a precedent on which to hang his argument in opposition to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. As I said before, it is not a good precedent, but it is one.

An hon. Member: This is one way to hang the hon. member for York-Humber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair recognizes the importance of the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. When a similar subject was discussed at an earlier date no decision was reached, but I do recognize that there is a problem. Perhaps the house would permit the debate to proceed at this particular time, and in the meantime I will have a discussion with Mr. Speaker and the table officials concerning this matter. Would the house so agree at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. May I say before making my few remarks with regard to the subject matter of the bill, that I think the house could resolve this problem very easily if the government were to take the initiative of referring this, along with other bills—and even the notices of motions, of which the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) could also have indicated there are a number—to the committee on privileges and elections, thus ensuring that serious consideration beyond the general debate which takes place during the private members hour could be given to this matter.

I think the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre would agree that this is a matter on which the house is a good deal behind the rest of the country. There are only about four provinces left in Canada now which retain the voting age at 21. Three provinces, including my own province of Prince Edward Island, have now lowered the voting age in provincial elections to 18, and three others have lowered theirs to 19. I could reel off a list of countries which allow voting at the age of 18, so we are not exactly pioneering when we presume to suggest that in our wisdom we in Ottawa might decide that it is time for people at the age of 18 years and over to have the responsibility thrust into their hands to cast their ballots on election day.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre could also have suggested that possibly there is no issue which has been debated more in private members hour and in adjournment debates, or on which more questions have been asked in the question period, than whether or not the voting age is to be lowered. I believe I could point to at least a dozen definite specific times in the last six or seven years in which a debate has taken place on which there has been general agreement.

One might well ask why it is we have taken so long to deal seriously with this problem. Since I am a relatively new member in the house it is not possible for me to recall in person the various meetings of committees which have dealt with this subject, either in a general way or in detail, but I think I recall correctly that three or four years ago the committee on privileges and elections did suggest in its report that the voting age should be lowered to 18. If one committee of the house, meeting at an earlier time, has felt favourably disposed toward this issue, why is it that we are taking such an extremely long period of time in dealing with this problem?

I for one find it difficult to find any real explanation. It seems to me that there is no clearcut delineation in the whole matter of deciding when a person becomes mature or responsible.

Miss LaMarsh: It may not be at the same time.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Of course it would vary to a great extent, depending on the specific individual involved. But in our provincial jurisdiction there seems to be a good deal of difficulty with regard to the legal responsibility that people have in our Canadian society. Recently I was questioned by one of my constituents as to whether it would be a sensible and proper thing to advocate the lowering of the voting age to 18, while at the same time saying little or nothing about legal responsibilities. I thought it was an extremely good question because if we are asking for certain rights and privileges, by the same token we should also accept the responsibilities which come hand in hand with those rights.

When one tries to discover any universally accepted age of responsibility, he encounters a veritable legal jungle, and I am not even at the stage of a trooper when it comes to beating my way through the jungles of difficulties respecting legal responsibility. I do know there are various ages at which responsibility does occur for people in our society.

In most provinces at about the age of 16 one can obtain a licence to drive a car, which can be either a vehicle for pleasure or one that can do considerable damage. In most provinces, somewhere between the ages of 16 and 21, you can take the important step of joining in matrimony with some person. In most cases today, I think you can join the armed forces at the age of 17; and shortly thereafter, because you are a member of the armed forces, you can exercise the democratic right to vote.

There is a great deal of fog and confusion about this whole question. Perhaps our job here this evening is to try to point out what seems to me to be the basic difficulty many people in our society have today in determining whether we should be granting voting privileges at 18. I believe the heart of the difficulty is this: Many people are concerned about whether or not young people should be given this privilege to vote at age 18, because it is not taken for granted they are going to act responsibly. This is an intriguing argument, and of course it is used for a variety of situations.

From time to time, as a person grows toward maturity and adulthood, it is suggested that he is not yet responsible enough to have this or that particular privilege which may be open to him. I suggest that this is an extremely weak argument upon which anyone should base his opposition to a reduction in the voting age. It would seem to me that argument could be turned around and used against anyone who thinks it has validity. I suggest to hon. members that if young people from the early teenage years who now have access to so many facets of society are not responsible, and therefore should not be given the opportunity to vote, we must be very fearful of that situation. I suggest we cannot afford to have young people growing up who are not learning to be responsible by participating in the democratic process. I suggest to you, sir, that the people who are most irresponsible in our society have never really learned that to vote today is not so much a privilege as it is a responsibility.

If we talk about voting only in terms of its being the particular privilege of individuals in our society, we have lost one of the most important aspects of participating in the democratic processes available to us in our own country. It has always seemed to me that real enlightenment does not come until people become responsible, and that the sometimes erratic judgments people make of issues that are raised, and the opinions that they hold, are very largely the result of a lack of responsibility and a lack of participation. From time to time one hears suggestions and criticisms by newspapers and others about the lack of responsibility amongst members of this house. I think it would be interesting if we could allow the various editors and publishers of newspapers across the country the opportunity to sit in the house, and to function as living, breathing members of parliament for a period sufficiently lengthy to enable them to gain enlightenment about the responsibility resting upon a member of parliament in this place.

It seems to me, if one could use that analogy, the same thing has to happen if we are going to obtain more responsible democracy. We must allow more and more young people to participate early in the democratic processes. We have come to the conclusion somehow that there is really only one way in which people participate in the democratic process, and that is by going to the polling booth on election day to cast a ballot. We have deluded ourselves, Mr. Speaker, if we think that is the only aspect of participation that is really important. Anyone who has studied the history of civilizations knows that very often some of the most important things that happen to a society bear no relationship to the actual, recognized function of choosing or not choosing governments and representatives. If we are afraid to entrust young men and young women at the age of 18 with the exercise of responsibility at the ballot box, then we should be very fearful indeed of the great influence these people are already having on many of our social structures today.

I say to you, sir, it is inconsistent for us to establish the Company of Young Canadians or to send young people all over the world as representatives of either state organizations or church organizations, and then at this juncture say to them that this is where their responsibility ends. This kind of inconsistency, I am sure, flys in the face of many young people, and to which they can only reply, "Sham".

I do not plan to take up a great deal of time this evening because I am hopeful that we can either conclude the debate in this hour and have the bill passed—I am sure hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will agree with that—or else save the precious time in private members hour that might be spent in discussing this measure by referring it to the committee on priviliges and elections. If that is impossible because the committee has not been constituted, perhaps we could have some real commitment from a representative of the government toward this end. I believe it is the wish of members on every side of this house that we take action now in this parliament, so the next time a federal election is called all adults beyond the age of 18 will participate fully in that election.

I should like to quote a speech made by one member of this house on July 14, 1960, as reported at page 6277 of Hansard:

> There is a great deal to be said in the circumstances of today for the reduction of the voting age from 21 to 18, and most of the major arguments in favour of such a change were given by the hon. member for Assiniboia. The argument which I think must make the greatest appeal is that we do not hesitate as a state to call on young people to fight for our country and, if necessary to die for our country, as thousands under the age of 21 have done. We ask them to accept the supreme obligation of citizenship in this regard, irrespective of whether they are 21 or 20 or 19 or 18, so it seems to me that if we ask Canadians to take on that obligation the time has come when they should have the privilege of voting so they may do their share in determining the policies which might affect the situations in which they would be asked to share in this supreme obligation.

I agree with the words of the hon. member.

Mr. Churchill: What is the name of the hon. member?

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Right Hon. L. B. Pearson and I believe at the present time he is acting in the capacity of Prime Minister of this country. It is my belief he is of this same opinion today. Someone may interrupt and suggest that while he was in opposition he might be inclined to say one thing, and say something different when he is in office. Let me quote from some remarks he made while in office on November 18,

1963. I shall read into the record the question asked by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) and the reply of the Prime Minister as recorded on page 4858 of Hansard for that date:

I have a question for the Prime Minister. It arises out of the report in the newspapers of this morning that the right hon. gentleman expects to introduce legislation reducing the voting age from 21 to 18. I have such a measure standing in my name, being Bill No. C-60. I wondered whether the right hon. gentleman would consent to having this transferred to a government order, thereby saving the time and trouble of our overworked staff in preparing legislation.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, this party has been committed to the reduction of the voting age to 18 years of age for some years, and we are anxious to see that it is done as quickly as possible.

• (5:20 p.m.)

That was "as quickly as possible" on November 18, 1963, slightly over four years ago. I trust that the hon. gentleman and his associates will move as quickly as possible to see that necessary action facilitated.

Mr. Pepin: It is next on the list.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in entering this debate, because this is the first occasion on which an opportunity has presented itself for me to express my views on a subject which is of more than academic interest to many in Canada.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacDonald), the mover of this bill which is to amend the Canada Elections Act and lower the voting age from 21 to 18. That is a worthy objective, more especially since the hon. member himself is one of the younger members in the house. I extend to him my congratulations and good wishes. This bill is timely. I have reason to believe that this matter will be under active consideration by the government, if not during the present session, then certainly early in the new year. In any event, I am all for the principle of the bill.

One would have to take into consideration whether the 18-year-old is really interested in voting. Much to my disappointment—and no doubt the hon. member was disappointed—during the recent Ontario provincial elections qualified students at Lakehead University failed to be really interested in the elections, and only 27 per cent of those eligible turned out to vote. Similar experiences were found in other Ontario universities, and this brings the question of whether it is really worth while extending the franchise to include boys and girls of 18 years of age.

One explanation for the apparent lack of interest of university students in the issues of the Ontario provincial elections was that some students did not know about transfer arrangements, in spite of the wide publicity and appeals made on the campuses to register. For example, it was reported that at Glendon college, Toronto, the returning officer reported that special enumerators sat nearly all day in a room on the Glendon campus, and that of an estimated 60 eligible students, exactly 12 registered, or 20 per cent of those who could have qualified.

I am told that some student leaders suggested that the lack of interest was due to a dull campaign which focussed on uninteresting matters, including the future of Canada as a united country, and the crisis in housing. Why did not the probing students, who usually are very vocal on any and all political issues, ask questions about matters they care about?

One of our metropolitan dailies, in an interesting observation, reported that the oft reported leftist tendencies of university students led some to believe that the majority of students would vote for the New Democratic party candidates. On nearly all campuses in the province of Ontario the N.D.P. candidate ran third.

On the other hand, I believe that in the majority of cases an 18-year-old can be sufficiently responsible to express an intelligent opinion by means of the ballot box. In an election, every adult has one vote; as everyone knows, he has a direct influence on the outcome equal to that of every other elector. Degree of interest and intelligence are not taken into consideration. Such a system assumes the exercise of the suffrage by every qualified citizen; that is, it assumes the total involvement of the population in self government. Hence, voting entails a considerable responsibility as well as a privilege.

The franchise should theoretically be granted to every citizen. In practice, however, the application of this principle is not feasible. Obviously babes in arms are not capable of voting in an intelligent or responsible manner. The purpose of imposing qualifications on suffrage, then, is to limit to mature citizens participation in the collective decision. But, one may ask, who are "mature citizens"? Is there an examination which proves maturity? If so, is anyone capable of administering it? In the absence of both we have accepted the need for establishing some indisputable criteria which are related to mature judgment.

Age is beyond dispute and, to a degree, is correlated with maturity. So despite such objections as the fact that different people mature at different rates, and that there is little difference in an individual's maturity between his twentieth and twenty first year, the arbitrary age criterion has been accepted as necessary for practical considerations.

The next logical question is as to the age at which suffrage should be granted. The lack of consensus on this matter is evident in the fact that of the ten provinces of Canada, four—Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario and Manitoba—have adopted 21 as the voting age; the three provinces of, Newfoundland, Alberta and British Columbia have adopted 19 years, and the three provinces of, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Saskatchewan have adopted 18 years. The federal voting age is currently 21 years.

Hon. E. C. Manning, premier of Alberta for the past 27 years, has this to say of young people:

> The younger generation of Canadians is capable of political thought and action at a level of maturity much higher than that characterizing party politics in this country at the present time. Youth today is quick to detect, and is strongly repulsed by sham and superficiality. Young people who are looking for purpose, conviction, inspiration, and leadership in matters of private and national concern will not, nor should be expected to, be satisfied by gimmicks and slogans, cliches and promises, and slick but shallow promotional campaigns. There will be little room in the Canada of tomorrow for elections without issues, politicians without philosophical standards, parties without relevant policies, or citizenship without definition and purpose.

I feel that the lowering of the voting age should be accompanied by a program to increase political education. What is at present being taught in our high schools about civic responsibilties is not adequate, and I would suggest a course in citizenship and politics to give students greater knowledge of their responsibilities.

When considering amendments to and revisions in the Canada Elections Act, to eliminate discrepancies and discrimination in our present regulations, the necessary provision for patients confined to hospitals to cast their votes in a federal general election is of primary importance.

An active general hospital presents a problem. Very few patients are in hospital as long as six weeks, in which event it would become necessary both to enumerate them and to have them vote in a hospital poll. Of the few who are, it is usually impossible to predict which ones will be in hospital on election day, and therefore as far as I know none were enumerated in the last several elections. Some did remain in hospital through the enumeration and into the election period, and were therefore disfranchised. They may have been enumerated at their homes, and would have voted at their home polls if it had been physically possible. I presume the spouse at home might well have included the one in hospital in the residential enumeration. Most other patients were at home at enumeration time, but were admitted to hospital later. Neither group can vote in the hospital, although a poll is set up there to handle the few student nurses and other personnel living in hospital residences. The exception to this is the candidate's right to appoint two agents to vote in the poll and to represent him there.

There has been talk of a permanent voters' registry for all people. This would solve the problem, but it will likely take a long time and may be impossible. It is not an excuse for delaying action to protect the franchises of several specific groups. This measure can deal with hospital patients; other measures should be introduced to deal with university students, especially if the trimester system of university education becomes widespread.

It should be relatively easy to establish a solution for patients living in the same riding in which they are hospitalized. A simple method that occurs to me would be for the returning officer to contact the other poll by phone, and satisfy himself that this particular person was entitled to a vote. However this is not good enough to ensure against fraud and illegal voting.

Someone would have to obtain a slip from the district returning officer in the person's original poll. This could be delivered to the hospital in-patient, who would then present it to the district returning officer in a poll located in or adajcent to the hospital. One assumes he would be physically able to travel inside the hospital to the polling booth. A good number, perhaps 50 per cent are able to do so.

For those living in Fort William, for example, and then requiring hospitalization in a university centre such as Toronto or Winnipeg, the difficulties are rather formidable. The same system could be used; but the patient might find it more difficult to be sure which candidate was the better one, or the best one. It would also require making an application several days prior to election day, to allow for transmission of the slip from one district returning officer to another, via the patient. For those who might be living in the same city, but residing in one riding and staying in a hospital in another riding, the difficulties would fall somewhere between the situation I have already described. If a patient's relative, friend, or agent presented a request to grant the patient the right to vote in another poll, then the advance poll district returning officer could strike the name off the original poll list and issue a slip to this effect for transmission to the patient. The patient could then present the slip on election day to the district returning officer at the hospital poll.

I realize that this is not the object of the bill under discussion. Nevertheless I think that when considering any changes to the elections act these should include measures which will ensure voting facilities for every qualified voter, whether he is at home or temporarily in a health institution away from home.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I want to say unequivocally that I am in favour of the purposes of this bill, and if and when it comes to a vote I will certainly vote for it.

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my remarks in support of this bill will be confined to three or four minutes in the hope that we can get some action to advance it beyond this stage.

The argument made so well by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacDonald), whose bill this is, touched, very well I thought on the point that today's young people are a mature group quite able to take part in the electoral processes of our country. The hon. member also said that in the interest of democracy the voting age should be lowered. I would add to that the fact that in the majority of our provinces the voting age is now less than 21 years, which is the voting age in federal elections, and it has been for many years.

I want to draw to the attention of members one other fact which seems to me to be relevant, and that is that 50 per cent of Canadians are now under 25 years of age. Another fact which struck me as interesting is that the average age of members of parliament is 50 years and six months. I suggest that there is a disparity between those two age groups which this bill, if it were endorsed, would lessen.

I would just add one other suggestion or bring one other fact forward in support of the bill. In his bill the hon. member for Prince, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) in his, and my colleague from Springfield (Mr. Schreyer) in his, representatives of the three major parties, have all put forward the same proposition, that the voting age in the federal field be lowered to 18. I think, if I may make a suggestion, that action would be speeded up if in the event this bill were not sent to committee tonight, those hon. members got together and made an appeal to the administration to have the subject matters of all three bills referred to the committee on privileges and elections. However, I am hopeful that action will be taken on this particular bill, and I will therefore sit down and confine myself to these remarks.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief and will indicate the lively interest of the fourth party in the chamber in the subject matter that is now before us. I will not bother repeating any of the arguments that I put forward almost two years ago, when I made my maiden speech in this chamber, but would only point out that since that time absolutely nothing has been done to reform any part of the elections act. Two full years have passed, and we will be into another election with nothing done, unless some action is taken soon.

There has been no change in the age of voters, no change in the voters list, and no change in the rules and regulations relating to election expenses. There has been no change with regard to putting party labels on the ballots. In effect there has been no change at all. Is it any wonder that we find the provinces taking the initiative in holding a conference for the confederation of the future, and taking the initiative in almost every other field, when this chamber and this government seem totally paralyzed in effecting any of the necessary changes in this basic part of the democratic process?

I would urge that we pass the bill this afternoon.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr Speaker, I am not old enough to be repeating myself nor important enough to be quoting myself, but if I may forget myself for a moment I wish to say that I have in the past spoken in favour of such a measure. I entertain the same views now as I did then. I come down very strongly in favour of the point of view enunciated by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Johnston).

I have frequently asked when the committee on privileges and elections will have referred to it the Canada Elections Act. It is in that committee that all these matters should be discussed. The age of voters is one of the most important sections in the elections act. It has been traditional for years and years that, after an election, that committee goes over the elections act with a fine tooth comb, and in doing so it often finds a lot of unpleasant bugs in the machinery. But we have allowed two elections to pass without referring the act to the committee. It is regrettable that this step has been so long delayed.

Having been exposed to the university community ever since I came to this house—that is where I came from to this house—I am convinced that in this age group from 18 to 21 we often find young people with a more enlightened interest in politics and public affairs than they have in later years when they become involved with concerns closer to their own business. I have the greatest respect for the perspective and judgment of the younger people. Indeed I believe the younger people of the country can detect a phony far more quickly than their elders.

In these electronic days I think we have a chance to bring about a greater involvement of our younger people in our political processes than ever before. Two important political events have demonstrated this in recent times. The Progressive Conservative conference of September brought about tremendous involvement. People realized politics is important. The Confederation of Tomorrow conference, which I had the honour of attending recently, caused, prompted and stimulated a great involvement. The world around us is there to be participated in, and I think we should open the avenues to fuller participation by those in the age group referred to so eloquently by hon. members who have spoken. I would say that immediate referral of these and other matters to the committee on privileges and elections is the way to proceed.

[Translation]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to take the opportunity of this debate to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacDonald), who proposed to enfranchise Canadian citizens of 18 years of age.

Throughout the years, we have seen on parliament hill several groups of students and, as the hon. member mentioned earlier, owing to our modern media of communication, such as television and radio, Canadians in general and, more particularly, our young people, are fully aware of what is going on here in Ottawa. However, they often realize their inability to make present decisions, but wish, nevertheless, to participate in our political activities. In my opinion, the proper procedure would be to enfranchise our young people as soon as they are 18 years old.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, in supporting the remarks of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacDonald) who has proposed this resolution, I would simply like to say that I think members from all political parties, Social Credit, N.D.P., Liberals and Conservative, have seen an increased activity in politics on the part of our younger citizens, and these not only at the university level.

The hon. member who just preceded me spoke of the university students who are taking a greater and greater interest in the political process in Canada. But I will go even further. I think some of the most dynamic and interesting audiences for politicians today are in our high schools. They are really turned on, if that is the new expression, in terms of being involved in political activities. Because of modern communications, radio and television, much more so than when I was in high school or even in my early years of college, the young people are taking a real interest in what is going on here in Ottawa.

But this is not good enough. I have said many times before—and I do not think I am being negative or too pessimistic when I repeat it—that there seems to be a faulty dialogue between the elected and the electorate, because we have not lived up to the expectations of many of our people. Through the new electronic media that put people in instant daily contact with what is going on here in Ottawa, there is a sense of involvement and a desire to participate.

I have already mentioned this when speaking in French. In the final analysis people realize that although they cannot have their hands on the levers of power, they do want to be consulted and participate in the decision making process. I think we can provide this in no better way than by according the right to vote to the Canadian citizen of 18 years of age, who today is truly, and in a very positive way, involved in what is going on here in Ottawa.

I do not know if there are any statistics on the matter, but I believe more and more young people are visiting parliament hill. We see thousands of them here every year. There are hon. members present who have been here a lot longer than I, but it seems to me that the number of our young visitors increases every year. This is a good thing. It symbolizes the fact that there is this involvement, interest, and a desire to participate, and it again underlines the desirability of our moving forward as quickly as possible in this young country.

Statistics have already been given, but I do not think we should accord too much importance to them. We often draw a false line by talking about chronological age, dividing young Canadians from old Canadians, and saying we have such a such a percentage under 25, or under 30. I am not really interested in these statistics as such, and neither are many young people. But I do think the very general things I have mentioned here this afternoon underscore again and again the desirability of our according the right to vote to our 18-year-old citizens. If we do they will live up to their responsibilities in a dynamic, forward-looking country.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words in support of the principle of Bill C-14 introduced by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacDonald). I am not going to take up the time of the house by repeating all the very constructive and conclusive reasons and arguments that have been presented as to why this bill should be passed and not talked out, but there is one point I do want to make. It is that Canada in time of war not only expects but demands that youth, 18 years of age and over, shall not only offer but give their lives for this country.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, that being the established and recognized fact, it just does not make sense to me that anyone who is over the age of 18 years and wishes to live for his country should be denied the privilege and responsibility of voting for it. If we expect and demand that a person shall be willing to fight and die for his country if he is 18 years of age, then we should give him the right and responsibility of voting for his country if he is 18 years of age.

Some hon. Members: Question.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-P. Racine (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I should first of all congratulate the member for Prince (Mr. MacDonald) for having introduced the bill now under consideration.

I want to tell him that as early as 1960, when I was about his age, I introduced a similar bill in the house. Let us say simply that youths, those who are 18 years of age, are far more advanced today than we probably were at that time, and that was one of the reasons why I introduced the bill in the house.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member if he would permit a question?

Mr. Racine: Certainly.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): In view of the fact that the hon. member for Beauce has just mentioned that seven years ago he himself placed a bill on the order paper advocating the same matter which I have brought before the house, would he not be willing to have this question brought to a vote now, in order to expedite this matter and have it adopted? In view of what he has said I would expect that he would be in agreement with this.

Mr. Racine: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member, but I do not think that either he or I should take care of this. I believe the government should take care of it in the near future, or as soon as possible. This is not something which should come from either the member from Beauce or the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacDonald). I think the hon. member agrees.

Since I introduced the bill I have received a letter which I believe is interesting, and which I should like to read. It is as follows:

I feel very strongly in favour of this bill, but I did not realize how very involved the procedure of changing our laws is. Dr. Boyd Upper, of the Leader of the Opposition in Toronto, kindly took the trouble to inquire about this bill for me, and informed me of the way in which to contact you.

Many others of my particular age group—eighteen to twenty-one—have stated that they are in support of the idea that we have a right to vote too.

Then there is a paragraph in which I am very much interested:

There is only one difference, which is: We feel that not everyone who is eighteen should be allowed to cast a ballot, referring to those still in school. I feel, along with the others, that only those who are paying taxes in support of the federal government should be considered to have the privilege of voting.

[Translation]

I think many questions might crop up. In fact, for the information of the member for Prince, there were all kinds of objections in 1960. Among others, it was claimed that young girls were not interested in politics; so, having minors vote was not favoured. However, it was deemed profitable for boys and it was agreed that they should vote at the age of 18.

It was also said that to allow voting at 18 years was a good principle, because too many people between the ages of 21 and 35 neglected this important civic duty. And so, the number of electors would be increased.

Mr. Speaker, there is one thing though that I would like to discuss. It is said that those who pay taxes will have the right to vote. At this stage, I honestly wonder if some of our university students really take seriously the role they should play. For instance, when political personalities, when members of parliament visit the university, I wonder if those same students act as seriously as they should.

We now know—and we actually see this in our areas—that those who work, who are married, who pay taxes, are much more versed in political affairs; in short that they contribute in a special way to the study of such problems as may exist.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether it would be desirable to grant the right to vote to young people at the age of 18.

In any case, let us say that today's youths are much more developed than we were at their age, and that, normally—

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mr. Racine: No, no. I feel that young people, as I suggested back in 1960, should have the opportunity to participate, to some extent, in our activities.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Question.

Mr. Racine: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

[English]

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman has talked it out.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour allotted for private members business has expired.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the acting house leader. In view of the fact that the subject matter of Bill No. C-5, a bill identical to the one we have been discussing in the past hour, was referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections on June 23, will the acting house leader ascertain, between now and Monday, why that committee has not met to deal with this matter.

Mr. Pennell: I will bring it to the attention of the house leader, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

WATER RESOURCES

PEMBINA RIVER—TABLING OF REPORT OF INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like leave to table copies of the report of the International Joint Commission on the co-operative development of the Pembina river basin, dated October, 1967.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONCLUDING EVENTS ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might revert to motions for a moment. I am sorry I missed your calling of that item.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I thought it might be of some interest to hon. members to have a brief statement of our plans for the centennial year end program on parliament hill.

Members in all parts of the house have been very generous in their attendance at, support of and praise for centennial celebrations to date and I should like to thank them for all this. I hope there will be general agreement that we should close out the year on a high note—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Miss LaMarsh: My resignation does not go with it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Miss LaMarsh: As I say, I hope there will be general agreement that we should close out the year on a high note, pointing clearly toward the promise of the second century which lies ahead of us.

To that end the centennial commission has arranged for two major ceremonies to be held this month on parliament hill. The first of these will take place this Friday, December 8, beginning at 3.30 p.m. Its prime purpose will be to launch a national "help a child" program to encourage young Canadians through their schools to make a special contribution to assistance programs for children in less fortunate parts of the world. I should hope the house would agree with me that it is appropriate, especially at this time of year, that we turn the accent of our centennial celebrations, which have been mainly introspective to date, to the broader world horizon and to recognition of the fortunate place we as Canadians have in that horizon.

While the ceremony on Friday will include particular reference to the "help a child" program for the national capital area, this is, I should stress, a national program, and centennial commission officials already are co-operating with the provinces in encouraging participation by schools and school children from one end of the country to the other.

While in a sense, Mr. Speaker, this is a very solemn undertaking, we have planned Friday's ceremony to take into account as well the festive season which is upon us. It will be centred about the lighting of the monster Christmas trees on parliament's lawns and will include a fireworks display, appearances by several National Hockey League stars and entertainers, and carol singing; as well, I understand, as a special visit from that elderly gentleman known as St. Nicholas.

The second ceremony, as might be expected, will be to formally close out the year on the evening of December 31. This occasion will feature an address to the nation via television by His Excellency the Governor General, as well as a religious ceremony, choral singing and a fireworks display. It also will provide a final focus on the centennial flame, which has shone so brightly as a beacon of our celebrations throughout the year.

As a final note I might add that during the period between December 15 and 30 the commission also has arranged for regular performances such as were held on the hill during the summer months, to be staged by major bands and choirs from the national capital area.

Mr. Speaker, while both the major ceremonies will be televised by the C.B.C., it certainly is our hope and desire that as many Canadians as possible will come to parliament hill to share directly in these events with us. I would then like to issue a very special invitation to all members of this chamber and the other place, all of whom will be receiving written invitations to both events, to help us celebrate the close of this most eventful year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

OT-4 ENGINE DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Question No. 504—Mr. Douglas:

1. How much money has the Canadian government provided for the OT-4 development program conducted by Orenda Limited of Malton, Ontario?

2. How much money has the United States government provided for the OT-4 development program conducted by Orenda Limited of Malton, Ontario?

3. Have any of the OT-4 engines been completed and put into use and, if so (a) how many have been completed and what use is being made of them (b) what is the record of performance of these engines in comparison with other engines of similar horsepower?

4. Why did the Canadian government decide to discontinue financial assistance to the OT-4 program?

5. What were the "other developments" referred to in the answers given by the Minister of Industry to questions asked in the house on October 17, 1967, as recorded on page 3167 of Hansard for that date?

6. What specific steps are being taken to ensure that the engineering design team at Orenda Limited remain in Canada?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): 1. At the time Canadian government financial support was withdrawn, i.e., 30 September, 1967, the Canadian government had expended $10,090,000.

2. As of 30 September, 1967, the United States had expended $5,593,000.

3. (a) As of 30 September, 1967, 14 engines had been built and two others were in assembly stage. Of the 14 engines built, seven have been used for test-bed development at Orenda, and seven for trial installations. The seven installations are: two in United States navy minesweepers; three in United States army tracked vehicles and one, plus one spare replacement, in a commercial truck. (b) Not being a production engine it is difficult to compare OT-4 performance with other types of engines of similar horsepower. In terms of its performance objectives, however, the OT-4 had not achieved its design power output and fell short of its target on specific fuel consumption but its reliability was about normal for its development status. It was not expected, however, as a production engine, to be sufficiently competitive with the current diesel engines of comparable power in respect to specific fuel consumption and selling price per horsepower.

4. Following appraisal of a comprehensive market study undertaken by an independent consulting organization of Orenda marketing plans, of United States military engine requirements, and of the status of the OT-4 development program, the Department of Industry concluded that: (a) The OT-4 was not expected, by 1975, to be fully competitive with diesel and other engines in terms of cost and performance; (b) While there might be, in time, an adequate overall market potential for industrial gas turbines in the OT-4 power range, the volume achievable by the OT-4 would not, in the opinion of the department, be commensurate with the development and preproduction investment involved; (c) A partnership arrangement between Orenda and a company having the necessary skills in volume production, international marketing and after sales service was considered by both Orenda and the Department of Industry to be necessary. No such arrangement appeared to be within reach; (d) An adequate industrial return to the Canadian economy on the proposed continuing Canadian government investment in the program did not appear to be achievable.

This decision of the Canadian government to discontinue financial assistance was taken in the light of the fact that neither the United States government nor Orenda were prepared to put additional funds in the program.

5. The OT-4 design was conceived in the early 1960's and during its development cycle many product and performance improvements were incorporated. In recent years, however, the age of the design concept placed constraints on the developer to incorporate advanced componentry and materials without major redesign. It is considered that, by 1975, the earliest time by which the OT-4 would be available in quantity for the industrial turbine commercial market, simpler and less expensive engines of comparable performance will be available based on more advanced components and materials.

6. Efforts by my department and industry aimed at retaining the OT-4 engineering design team in Canada are continuing. To date, approximately 25 per cent of the OT-4 professional engineering personnel have been offered alternate positions within the Orenda organization and another 45-55 per cent have been or will be offered positions with a number of other Canadian companies.

It has not been customary to require the C.B.C. to disclose fees paid to individuals.

2. The corporation has no record of payments to representatives of the organizations in question.

INDUSTRY ASSISTANCE FOR GREY AND BRUCE COUNTIES, ONTARIO

Question No. 595—Mr. Loney:

Is it the intention of the Department of Industry to provide a program of assistance to encourage industry to locate in the slow growth areas in Grey and Bruce counties?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Portions of Grey and Bruce counties are included in the Canada manpower centre areas of Owen Sound and Collingwood which have been designated since August 5, 1965, as areas eligible to receive assistance under the area development program. This program has helped to bring a number of new industries to the counties as well as a number of significant expansions to existing businesses. On October 31, 1967, the government announced that the C.M.C. areas of Owen Sound, Collingwood and Midland will be removed from the list of designated areas effective December 1, 1967, because of improved employment conditions.

The remaining portions of Grey and Bruce counties are located in the Walkerton, C.M.C. area which has not met the criteria for designation relating to conditions of high unemployment and under employment.

3. Has the government in any way authorized Hudson Bay Company personnel to take possession of government cheques addressed to Indians and, if so, under what authority have such authorizations been given?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): 1. Yes, when the need has been established for a Post Office, serious consideration is given to any application from a resident who is prepared to accept the Postmastership and is in a position to provide the necessary accommodation to house the operation.

[Mr. Béchard.]

2. No. In no circumstances does the Post Office Department authorize clerks in Hudson Bay Company Trading Posts to open mail addressed to Indians.

3. No. The Post Office Department has not, in any way, authorized the Hudson Bay Company personnel to take possession of government cheques addressed to Indians.

RETURNS NOT FILED UNDER CORPORATIONS ACT

Question No. 671—Mr. Caouette:

1. During each of the last three years, how many companies neglected to file their annual reports in accordance with section 125 of the Canada Corporations Act?

2. Were there prosecutions in accordance with subsection 4 of section 125, and (a) if so, how many (b) if not, were reasons given in each case and what were they?

Hon. John N. Turner (Registrar General): 1. For 1965, 495; for 1966, 441; for 1967, 1,150.

2. No. The department instead of proceeding under the provisions of subsection 1 of section 125 is, since the amendments of July 1, 1965, to the Canada Corporations Act, dissolving defaulting companies pursuant to subsections 10, 11 and 12 of section 125 of the act.

Since this program started, 602 companies have already been so dissolved and because of the further amendment made in Bill S-10, which received royal assent on November 6, 1967, the compagnies in default for the years 1965 and 1966 will be dissolved unless they comply before the expiry of the statutory period of two years. The number of those in default for one year will decrease before the date of publication in the Canada Gazette because the department is sending private notices to each defaulting company.

3. Not applicable.

Mr. Bruce S. REVISION OF R.O.P. PROGRAM

Question No. 700—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Has the Minister of Agriculture made any plans for the revision of the R.O.P. program?

2. If so (a) what precisely is the nature of such plans (b) when will they become effective (c) what advantages are foreseen in their institution?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): 1 and 2. The Minister of Agriculture has no precise plans for revision of R.O.P. programs except that recently announced for the R.O.P. dairy program; namely, the extension of recording to unregistered animals in herds on R.O.P. testing. However, all R.O.P. programs are under continuing review and at the present time the R.O.P. dairy program has received study through the national milk recording conference and the advisory board for R.O.P. dairy cattle, both of which were held last month. The dairy farmers of Canada are following up the results of the milk recording conference and through a committee intend to bring in recommendations for a plan which will unify the milk recording now carried out under all dairy herd recording programs.

Question No. 724—Mr. Reid:

1. What was the amount paid to the province of Ontario for construction of the trans-Canada highway from the east boundary of the town of Keewatin to 400 feet east of the east branch bridge?

2. Did the agreement provide for the future maintenance of the section to be the sole responsibility of the government of Ontario?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1. $556,026.

2. Yes.

STERLING HELD BY BANK OF CANADA

Question No. 728—Mr. Laprise:

1. How many pounds sterling were held by the Bank of Canada at the time of its recent devaluation?

2. How many pounds sterling did the Bank of Canada buy and sell during the two previous months?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1 and 2: The Bank of Canada maintains working balances with central banks in a number of countries, denominated in the currency of the country concerned, through which are passed all transactions of the bank in that currency on account of itself, of the government of Canada and of other customers. Similarly a number of central banks carry accounts with the Bank of Canada denominated in Canadian dollars.

Balances carried in such accounts are related to the type and number of transactions involved and to the various services rendered free by the central bank where the account is carried.

The information about its foreign currency assets and liabilities which the Bank of Canada publishes in its weekly and monthly statements is specified in Schedule B of the Bank of Canada Act. It has not been the practice nor is it considered appropriate to give such information in relation to individual currencies.

NAVAL MINE COUNTER MEASURES

Question No. 730—Mr. Ormiston:

1. What is the extent of Canada's mine counter measure force?

2. What types of vessels are used for this kind of operation?

3. How many ships are capable of being used in this capacity?

4. How many are employed at present?

5. What is the present complement of officers and men employed in this mine counter measure force?

6. Is there a standard type of equipment used by allied navies?

7. How many aircraft are employed in this work?

8. Where are personnel trained in mine counter measure work?

9. How long has this force been in existence?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Ocean, coastal and inshore minesweepers and minehunting ships are used in mine countermeasures. As it would take a great deal of time to mount an effective mining offensive, the particular capability of minesweeping in the RCN is considered to have a relatively low priority as compared with other tasks assigned to the Canadian armed forces. However, men are still being trained in mine clearance which is principally a diving operation, and divers attached to the diving units of the R.C.N. undergo such training with the United States navy. The R.C.N. also has six coastal minesweepers, one of which is being used for training while the other five are being held in reserve. The techniques of mining and minesweeping are changing and continuing study is being given to these developments to determine what capability would be most effective in the years ahead. For example, an R.C.N. officer has recently attended trials to examine the feasibility of using helicopters in minesweeping. A NATO committee is endeavouring to establish standard equipment for mine countermeasures.

APPLICATIONS TO TEACH IN NATIONAL DEFENCE SCHOOLS

Question No. 732—Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway):

1. Does the Department of National Defence accept applications to teach in defence department schools from men teachers up to the age of 60 and not accept applications from women teachers after the age of 40?

2. If so, will the government consider eliminating the age differential respecting applications from men and women teachers?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): 1. In Canada, the engagement of teaching staffs for Department of National Defence dependants' schools in Canada is under the jurisdiction of the local school board that is appointed to administer the school under the applicable provincial regulations.

In so far as outside of Canada is concerned, the Department of National Defence accepts applications from sponsoring school boards in Canada on behalf of teachers in their employ who are interested in teaching at a Department of National Defence dependants' school overseas. Such teachers are not engaged by the Department of National Defence, but are loaned by their employing boards for assignment overseas under a two-year loan of service agreement. Age limitations have been established for female teachers between 23 and 40 years of age and for male teachers between 23 and 60 years of age.

2. Consideration has been given to eliminating the age differential between male and female applicants, but it is not intended to change the existing age limitations at this time.

Parliament has also approved committing authority of $200,000,000 under the act. As of 31 October, 1967, an amount of approximately $135,000,000 has been encumbered to cover specific commitments to pay grants on projects approved subject to compliance with the act and regulations. 2. What was the total amount of the area development grant payable under the Area Development Incentives Act to the R.C.A. Co. in respect of their new television tube factory at Midland?

3. Is this amount payable the maximum permissible development grant under this act?

4. What is the estimated amount of income tax forgiveness under the three year tax holiday provided under the area development program for the R.C.A. Co.?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): 1. The approved capital cost of the facility for purposes of the Area Development Incentives Act has not yet been determined pending examination of final accounts submitted by the company to the area development agency.

[Mr. Côté (Terrebonne).]

2. The total amount of the grant payable under the act cannot be determined until the allowable capital cost is verified.

3. See 2.

4. The three year income tax holiday under section 71A of the Income Tax Act was an optional benefit until the expiry date of the provision on March 31, 1967. An applicant could not take both benefits. In this case, the company applied for a capital grant under the Area Development Incentives Act.

HOUSING STUDY OF ISOLATED COMMUNITIES

Question No. 755—Mr. Nielsen:

1. Has the firm of Moody, Moore and Partners of Winnipeg, architects and consulting engineers, yet completed the first phase of the housing study of isolated communities including some Indian communities in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, which study was undertaken on behalf of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

2. Has any initial design or designs of prototype housing appropriate for such communities been prepared and/or submitted to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): 1. By arrangement with the firm of Moody, Moore and Partners this work is now being carried out by the Winnipeg firm of Kennedy Smith Associates. The first phase of this housing study is completed.

2. The first phase report has been received by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It classifies and comments on some 40 communities visited. It suggests a number of physical groupings of housing and communal facilities that might have application to some of these communities. It comments on existing housing and makes suggestions towards improvement by siting, layout and construction techniques.

C.M.H.C. have made additional moneys available through part V of the National Housing Act for printing 500 copies of the report so that these can be made available to those concerned with these communities and reserves.

[English]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I should like to ask that question No. 310 be withdrawn. It is somewhat complex and requires too much research.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED FEDERAL LIAISON WITH COMMITTEE OF PREMIERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the success of the confederation of tomorrow conference and the promise for the future contained in the establishment of a continuing committee of provincial premiers, as announced on Thursday last, I wonder whether the Prime Minister could give us an indication as to whether the government will find it possible to establish effective liaison with this committee.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we already have a section in the Privy Council office which is concerned with liaison with the provinces in respect of matters of this kind. I am not sure whether this establishment of the new provincial organization requires special liaison but I would be very glad to look into it. This is something we certainly can consider at the first federal-provincial conference. We might even consider it next week, though we will not be dealing then with this specific matter.

Mr. Stanfield: Without being controversial but referring simply to the fact that so far as the conference is concerned liaison has been at the official level on the part of the government of Canada, will the government consider the establishment of liaison at the ministerial level?

Mr. Pearson: I would be glad to consider that as well, Mr. Speaker. In the past the President of the Privy Council has been responsible for liaison on that level. This has been particularly true in recent years. It may well be that the developments of the last few months will require some alteration in this procedure so that liaison can be established on a rather more formal basis.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

POSSIBLE DISCONTINUANCE OF INTERNATIONAL SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister regarding reports that the international service of the C.B.C. is to be discontinued at the end of this month. In view of the fine service which has been rendered by this program in making known the views and attitudes of the Canadian people to other people in all parts of the world, is it the intention of the government to silence the voice of Canada at the end of this month?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I am perhaps as aware as any member of the use and importance in the past of the work of this broadcasting organization in short wave communication to other countries. Naturally we are looking into the operations of all government agencies with a view to cutting down expenses wherever that is possible. I can assure my hon. friend that no decision has been taken to abolish this service.

Mr. Douglas: Will the government be making a statement in the house far enough in advance of the actual discontinuance of this program to give members an opportunity to express their opinion in respect of this very important decision?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker; especially in view of the newspaper comment I think it is important to make an announcement of this kind as quickly as possible. It is my hope that this can be done this week during the debate on the budget.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a further supplementary question of the right hon. Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received representations of any kind from interested groups in Canada who are vitally interested in the international broadcasting service being continued because of the valuable work it has been doing?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received a great many representations. Indeed, every time it is rumoured that we are going to reduce or cut back a service or look at it on the ground of expenditure, I receive a great many representations.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With regard to the representations which the Prime Minister will consider, would he have the government look at the 1966 white paper on broadcasting, issued by his own government, which stressed its conviction of the importance and value of the international service?

Mr. Pearson: I am also aware of that, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED TRIPS TO CUBA BY QUEBEC SEPARATISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Last Friday, I had the occasion to appear on television, in Sherbrooke, with two well-known separatists from Montreal. Is this government aware that well-known separatists are constantly going to and fro between Quebec and Cuba and does the minister know about the true purpose of these visits to Cuba?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have had some reports about that situation and I may be able to add something tomorrow or Wednesday.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? Could the hon. minister check whether the Russian diplomatic bag, for example, is not used to transport money to help finance the separatist movement in Montreal?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly look into the matter.

[English]

RUSSIAN PROTEST RESPECTING INCIDENT AT OTTAWA EMBASSY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask whether the Soviet government has yet replied to the Canadian note reported to have been delivered on Saturday, in which the charge was rejected that recent demonstrations at the Soviet embassy in Ottawa were carried out with "government connivance".

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian note was delivered on Saturday. It was in reply to a note that had been sent earlier to the Canadian government by the government of the Soviet union. I hope there will be no further notes on this matter.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REPORTED DECREASE IN STARTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the latest report from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, which shows that in the third quarter of this year housing starts fell by 11.2 per cent, and that October was the fifth month in a row during which centres with a population of over 10,000 showed a decrease in housing starts, would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline what he and his department intend to do to overcome this serious trend?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Not necessarily on motions, Mr. Speaker, because I do not know where the hon. member got his figures. Housing starts in the month of September were a record high in Canadian history.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nicholson: And housing starts in the month of October ran them a close second.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister like me to send over the figures that were issued today by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, so he can become aware of what is going on in his own department?

Mr. Nicholson: The minister does not have to read them; he has the figures here in his hand.

Mr. Hees: I would like to make the minister aware of the figures for his own department.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

PROTESTS RESPECTING LAY-OFFS OF SHOP WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received any communication in protest against the closing of main shops of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Montreal, Winnipeg and Calgary, affecting approximately 4,000 men including a considerable number in Fort William, for the period of the last week of December? If so, does the minister intend to approach the management for reconsideration of this move which, if carried out, will undoubtedly cause undue hardship to our already hard pressed railway employees?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): To the best of my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, no such protest has been received in my office.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question on this subject, and I address it to the Minister of Labour. If these lay-offs take place, will any compensation be paid to the employees for the time they will lose between Christmas and New Year's?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): If they are entitled to unemployment insurance benefits, they will get them.

Mr. R. K. Andras (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question, which arises from the comments made by the hon. member for Fort William, is directed to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister in the course of investigating this protest also investigate the substance of comment by the railway unions to the effect that this lay-off has been designed by the C.P.R. management to offset or recover the cost of retroactive wage increases owing employees from August 1 as a result of recent wage settlements?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, if there is an investigation, then of course that question could be included. I understand there was consultation between the company and the unions affected and there seemed to be a fair measure of agreement between them in respect of this proposal. That would seem to be the reason no protest has been received to date, but of course I would be interested in examining the allegation made by my hon. friend.

[Later:]

Mr. Norman Fawcett (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour which is related to the question asked by the hon. member for Fort William with respect to the laying off of C.P.R. shop men. It is the same question that I directed to the minister on Friday last. I should like to ask the minister whether, in the event that these laid off employees are not covered by unemployment insurance, any arrangement has been made for compensation of the employees.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, not unless it has been made by the company concerned, and that is a question that should be directed to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Fawcett: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I direct that question to the Minister of Transport.

[Later:]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a further question to the Minister of Transport regarding this matter of the C.P.R. laying off shop employees. Since this move affects some 4,000 employees, who are not likely to be covered by unemployment insurance because of the short duration of the lay-off, can the minister have an investigation made to determine whether the right of these men to be paid on their holidays, Christmas day and New Year's day, will be affected? Can he also ascertain whether there is any justification for this lay-off between Christmas and New Year's?

Mr. Hellyer: I will be glad to pass on that question to the management of the railway company. I think I should tell the hon. gentleman, however, that an effort was made by the railway and its employees to seek periods of temporary lay-off which would avoid laying off some of the employees on a permanent basis. I was given to understand that a considerable amount of accord had been reached between the two groups, and that this procedure was preferred to the alternative, which would have been permanent lay-offs. I understand this was the mechanism approved by the majority of the workers themselves in an effort to share the consequences of a reduction in the work available. If that is the case, I think the hon. gentleman would applaud the co-operative attitude of this kind, and I am sure he does.

Mr. Douglas: Would the minister find out from the representatives of the workers whether this was indeed a mutually satisfactory arrangement, or whether it was an arrangement instituted solely by the management of the C.P.R.?

Mr. Hellyer: Normally when the union is not reasonably satisfied it proceeds directly, or indirectly through the good offices of my colleague, to make its dissatisfaction known. Since in this case I had not received any direct representations from the union, or indirect representations through the offices of my colleague, I assumed there had been at least a considerable degree of accord between the parties involved.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): May I ask the Minister of Transport if these lay-offs by Air Canada, the C.N.R. and other government agencies are the result of the Minister of Finance urging that there should be a slackening in the economy, though goodness knows it is slack enough in the Atlantic provinces at the present time?

Mr. Hellyer: Certainly not, Mr. Speaker.

MEDICINE HAT—REDUCTION IN SERVICE RESPECTING FRESH FLOWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): My question is to the Minister of Transport. I want to ask the minister whether he has received representations from the Western Florists' Association complaining of serious cut-backs in the C.P.R. service carrying fresh flowers for Medicine Hat and, if so, what he has done about these representations.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): To the best of my knowledge no representations have been received, but I would be glad to check with my office. I try to send as many flowers as I can to my friends out there locally; if there is a problem of transportation involved with respect to the surplus I shall be glad to see what I can do to assist.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST THAT PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE MEET IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Because of lay-offs and dissatisfaction with l.c.l. rates in the maritimes, will the minister now respond to the request of the Atlantic members that the transport committee complete its coast to coast survey by travelling to Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated last week, this is under consideration. I cannot see any reason why the committee should not travel to Atlantic Canada, but I would like to report to my hon. friend after I have had a chance to get a definitive word from the committee.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

QUEBEC—PROPOSED DISTRIBUTION BY PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare with reference to a report in the Ottawa Journal of Saturday, December 2 that Hon. Jean-Paul Cloutier, minister of family and social welfare of the province of Quebec has announced that his government is ready to assume the distribution of the federal government family allowance cheques. Can the minister say whether agreement has been reached on this, and whether this would apply to all the provinces if they so desired?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there has been an exchange of correspondence between the government of Canada and the government of Quebec. The government of Quebec expressed its readiness to assume responsibility for the administration of the federal family allowance program in that province.

After careful consideration it was our decision that it would not be desirable to alter the present arrangements in the administration of federal family allowances.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The minister stated earlier that following consultations with the province of Quebec, the federal government decided to keep its jurisdiction in the field of family allowances. During those consultations, did the minister and the government reach a decision about a possible increase in the family allowance rate in Canada?

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the appropriate minister has heard the representation made by the hon. member.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think the minister was just about to answer; he had to pause for the translation of my question.

Mr. MacEachen: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO BOXING DAY HOLIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the appropriate minister. I apologize for not giving him notice, but my question is the result of a telephone call from one of the officials of the Public Service Alliance just prior to my arrival in the house.

Will the employees of the Public Service Commission, including employees of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, be given Tuesday, December 26 as a holiday? This information is urgently required in order that those concerned may make their holiday and travel arrangements for the Christmas season.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this question as notice, and I will answer my hon. friend later this afternoon.

[Later:]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, in answer to a question asked a few moments ago by the hon. member for Kootenay West may I say that Tuesday, December 26, 1967 is not a holiday for public servants in Canada, who receive 10 statutory holidays during the year, somewhat more than received by most people in industry.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister bring the house up to date on the situation between Greece and Turkey, and on the position of the Canadian troops who form part of the UN peace keeping force in Cyprus, as a result of last week's developments?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to report on the position of the Canadian contingent other than that our troops there are carrying out their duties. Yesterday morning the Secretary General appealed to the governments of Greece, Turkey and Cyprus to end any threat to the security of each other. This was necessary because of last moment hitches in what was thought likely to be an agreement on the part of all concerned.

The Secretary General also indicated that his good offices would be available to all the parties, if considered desirable, with respect to United Nations efforts in the supervision of disarmament or in practical arrangements for internal security.

The response of the governments of Turkey, Greece and Cyprus has been positive, and I hope it will be possible to begin very soon the withdrawal of national forces from Cyprus and the de-escalation of some of the military measures that have been taken recently in the area. However, the fact is that at this moment agreement between the parties is not complete on all points and I regret to say that relations have not improved between the two communities in Cyprus.

Mr. Lambert: May I ask a supplementary question. Since Canada is a Nato ally of the two countries involved, has this government brought its own views before them to impress upon Greece and Turkey the necessity of arriving at a just settlement and de-escalation in the area?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We certainly have and I reported to the house on this a week ago. Our efforts included direct telephone communications between myself and the foreign minister of Turkey at a time when we were greatly concerned about possible military action. We have been in continuous consultation all along with the representatives of the United States and Britain, with Mr. Vance, the special emissary of the United States government, and Mr. Rolz-Bennet, the representative of the Secretary General.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask a supplementary question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of reports that Archbishop Makarios is objecting to an increase in the strength of United Nations forces, will the minister assure the house that in the event of the United Nations extending the mandate in Cyprus this house will be given an opportunity to discuss the terms of that mandate, and whether it has been extended sufficiently to provide security for the Canadian forces who are part of the United Nations peace keeping force there?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If I were to reply directly to that question I would be indicating the nature of the objections being registered by one of the countries concerned. I think, in the interests of a settlement, it would not be appropriate for me to do so. I will, however, bear my hon. friend's question in mind and at the appropriate moment will respond to it.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of reports that an expanded United Nations force in Cyprus is being contemplated, can the minister advise the house whether Canada has been requested to supply additional personnel?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Canada has not been asked. I would ask my hon. friend to note what I said a moment ago to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

NATO—POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF FRANCE FROM POLITICAL FIELD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I wish to direct to the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question related to the one asked by the hon. member for Edmonton West. At the present time France retains its membership in the political arm of NATO. Has the Canadian government received any information that would indicate that France intends to consider withdrawing entirely from the North Atlantic Treaty Organization?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, sir.

INDUSTRY

ASSISTANCE FOR CONSTRUCTION OF OIL REFINERY IN ATLANTIC AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. I pose this question because of continuing difficulties in the economic field in the Atlantic provinces. Can the minister advise if as a result of difficulties that have arisen between the government and British American Oil Company regarding loans to assist in the construction of an oil refinery in the strait of Canso area, construction of such a refinery will be delayed and in fact might possibly be abandoned?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps it would be wrong to describe the situation as difficult, or to indicate there are difficulties on the part of either of the negotiating parties. Normal negotiations are going on, and I would be rather less pessimistic than the hon. member has indicated he is.

THE MINISTRY

RETURN OF TRADE MINISTER FROM EXPORT PROMOTION TOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister advise the house when the Minister of Trade and Commerce will return from his overseas trip so he can answer pressing questions relating to wheat exports?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I am afraid I misled the house the other day, when I said he would be back within a week or ten days. His itinerary covered more countries than I realized at the time. I am told he will be back at the end of this week. Meanwhile his trip has been most successful in the promotion of Canadian exports.

Mr. Pascoe: May I ask a supplementary question. Is the government aware of the drop of nearly 100 million bushels in wheat deliveries by farmers this crop year because the elevators and terminals are filled?

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps this is a good reason why the Minister of Trade and Commerce should travel in foreign countries.

AIR CANADA

PROTESTS RESPECTING LAY-OFFS OF SALES EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has he received any objections from the Canadian Air Line Employees Association about the lay-off or dismissal of sales employees in both Montreal and Toronto? In any case, is he aware of this termination by Air Canada? If so can he inform the house the reasons for it, and whether additional sales employees were recruited in the last two or three months before these terminations took effect last Friday?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have received representations from the Canadian Air Line Employees Association in which they raised a number of questions including those just posed by my hon. friend. I think I might just quote, in part, an answer that has been given to me by the company to forward to the employees association:

> Air Canada indicates that it will be increasing its efforts in the very difficult task of forecasting manpower needs with the hope that it can identify more effectively those cases which might lead to a surplus. It is the company's opinion that the future trend will be a more pronounced seasonal fluctuation calling for the use of some summer staff to be recruited on a temporary basis.

Mr. Knowles: Who wrote that; Paul Martin?

Mr. Hellyer: The management of Air Canada. The answer to the last question posed by my hon. friend is that I believe they did recruit some employees not too long before the lay-off occurred. This is to be regretted and I hope it will be possible for the management in the future, through improved planning, to avoid this kind of situation.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that some of the employees released were hired by Air Canada without being informed that their job was to be temporary and that they left other work to take on these jobs, and in view of the fact some of the hiring was apparently done in connection with Expo which everyone knew would come to an end, will the minister submit to Air Canada the need for better planning, and particularly the need to give consideration to the plight of employees who have been laid off under these circumstances?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to pass along these representations to Air Canada, together with those I have already received on the same subject.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): May I ask a supplementary question. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the rather unfortunate reference last evening on the Ed Sullivan show to the safety record of Air Canada?

Mr. Hellyer: No, it has not, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

BEEF PRODUCTS—OPPORTUNITY FOR INCREASED SALES TO U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the United Kingdom has prohibited the importation of beef and beef products from the Argentine, has the minister made any arrangements through his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce to export Canadian beef and beef products to this large potential market?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): No specific additional measures of which I am aware have been taken, Mr. Speaker, by reason of the prohibition of Argentine meat, but we are continuously attempting to broaden our markets not only in the United Kingdom but elsewhere. We will certainly be pleased to take the hon. member's suggestion into consideration.

Mr. Hales: Can the minister say whether our trade commissioner there has reported?

Mr. Greene: I have not received any report as yet, but I will be glad to take the hon. member's question as notice.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AGRICULTURE

REPORTED DEVELOPMENT OF LOW GRADE HIGH YIELD WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. D. McLelland (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. May I ask the minister to inform the house and the many interested farmers in western Canada whether the Department of Agriculture has developed a new variety of low grade wheat that will be made available to farmers for use as seed in order to produce a low grade, high yielding wheat?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to take the hon. member's question as notice. I do not know of anything specific that he may have in mind, but if there is I will take the question as notice and report to him.

PURPOSE OF OTTAWA VISIT BY U.S. SECRETARY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister any information he can report to the house on the visit of the United States secretary of agriculture, Mr. Freeman, to Ottawa over the week end?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Freeman did not think very much of the game, Mr. Speaker.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

CONSIDERATION OF PROPOSED REDUCTION IN VOTING AGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his capacity as government house leader. Is he now in a position to answer the question I put to the Solicitor General at six o'clock on Friday last?

Perhaps I might give the essence of my question. In view of the fact that the subject matter of Bill No. C-5, a bill calling for the lowering of the voting age, had its subject matter referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections on June 23, could the house leader tell us why the committee has not met to deal with this term of reference?

[Mr. Greene.]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the committee is master of its own destiny. I would of course be glad to follow up the matter with the chairman of the committee to see whether it would be possible to discuss the bill.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question or as a point of order, may I ask the minister whether he is aware that the committee has not even met yet and that the chairman of the committee has not been named? We are usually told that these things have to originate with the government house leader, who calls the committee together in the first place.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of all the points my hon. friend has made.

NOVA SCOTIA

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING STEEL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask whether he can give the house any information at this time concerning the position of his government with regard to the steel situation at Sydney. If the Prime Minister is not able to do so now, when might he be in a position to give this information?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to my last statement. The premier of Nova Scotia, as my hon. friend knows, is convening his legislature today in regard to this matter. I received a message from him a week or so ago saying that he would be getting in touch with me and hoping we could meet at the earliest possible date. I have indicated that I would be very glad to do this but that the premier might like to wait until he finishes the session of the legislature, when we will meet at once.

TRADE

ASSISTANCE TO INDUSTRIES AFFECTED BY GENEVA NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. In view of the fact that in three and a half weeks the Kennedy round tariff reductions start coming into effect, could the minister advise the house when he expects to make a statement to parliament and to the Canadian people as to what steps the government intends to take to ease the impact on industries adversely affected by these tariff reductions?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, we are still working on formulating a satisfactory plan.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. When does the minister expect to make a statement regarding agricultural producers who are similarly affected?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I did not get the import of the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Hees: Could I have the minister's answer again? It was impossible to hear.

Let me start all over again, Mr. Speaker. I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture based on my question to the Minister of Industry. In view of the fact that in three and a half weeks the Kennedy round tariff reductions start coming into effect, when does the minister expect to make a statement to the house regarding the steps the government intends to take to ease the impact on agricultural producers who are adversely affected by these tariff reductions?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, at the recent conference we did have considerable discussion with the producers about the impact of the Kennedy round decisions on agricultural producers. We will be continuing these discussions with farm organizations, and will certainly take any action within the authority available to us in respect to any changes that have to be made in the agricultural industry.

Mr. Hees: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the importance of this matter to all agricultural producers in Canada, will the minister make a statement in this regard before these tariff reductions come into effect?

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I had a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture, but I should like to direct it to the Minister of Finance. Is there any possibility of postponing the commencement of the Kennedy round of tariff reductions from January 1, 1968 to a later date?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have entered into an agreement to bring the results of the negotiations into effect as far as we are concerned on January 1. If we did not do so we would be breaking our agreement, and other countries would not give us the advantage of the changes they have made in our favour in their tariffs.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, and is related to that posed by the hon. member for Northumberland. In regard to the statement the minister is going to make shortly about the Kennedy round tariff reductions, will the minister be in a position at that time to give encouraging news to the steel producers of this country who are being faced with a serious problem as a result of the Kennedy round, with the country being flooded with steel produced with cheap labour, which of course makes for serious competition for our own steel producers.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the arrangements with respect to the importation of steel and the proposals in relation to dumping have already been announced.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT BY U.S. RESPECTING INSPECTION OF NUCLEAR CENTRES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. With regard to the announcement on Saturday by President Johnson and the welcome news that the United States has decided to enlarge and to clearly indicate its policy on inspection of both private and public nuclear reactor centres in the United States, I wonder whether the government of our country has expressed its own reaction to this new step that has been taken by the United States government.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We have been urging this on a number of governments during the past three years, particularly during our discussions on the non-proliferation agreement in Geneva.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): In view of the present situation at Geneva and the likelihood that no agreement will be reached during the present session of the United Nations, is the Canadian government giving consideration to any new proposal which it might advance at Geneva in order to facilitate the reaching of a settlement there?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the desirable thing to do now, if we could get agreement, would be to transfer the place of discussion from Geneva to the United Nations, and this we have been urging. Whether this will be done depends on the attitude of other countries.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Is the Canadian government also urging that other nuclear powers might participate in the discussions either at Geneva or in New York.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, the three nuclear powers, the United States, the Soviet union and Britain are of course participants in the disarmament discussions of the 18 at Geneva. They would be participants in the United Nations discussions, as would France. Regrettably, China would not.

HOUSING

ATTENDANCE OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT AT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Has the government made a decision as to whether members of parliament may attend the forthcoming conference on housing and urban development, either as delegates or as observers?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): There is no reason whatever why members of parliament should not attend the conference public sessions. I hope and believe that at least some of the sessions will be public.

FISHERIES

POSSIBLE EFFECTS OF RUSSIAN UNDERWATER EXPLOSIONS IN NORTH PACIFIC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries whether the international north Pacific fisheries commission has any studies under way in connection with underwater explosions being set off by the Soviet union in the north Pacific south of the Aleutians and, if so, whether he has any information he can give the house as to the possible effect of these explosions on the north Pacific fisheries.

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): I have no information as yet as to the effect such explosions may have on the fisheries of the north Pacific, but I will inquire and report to the hon. member.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROVISION OF EMPLOYMENT FOR HERRING FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and ask whether he is in a position to give the house any information about the plans his department has with respect to providing alternative employment for the herring fishermen and shore workers on the west coast who are dependent upon the herring fishing industry.

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): I was asked a similar question a few weeks ago, and I replied then that the question of providing alternative employment for the fishermen and workers laid off on account of the situation in that industry was being studied by the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. May I ask whether we can expect him to come to a conclusion about this before the herring fishing is supposed to resume on January 7?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are doing everything in our power to try to find some work for these men, and I hope that we shall soon have a report.

We are just as interested as anyone else in the house that all workers should be employed in Canada.

[English]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): A supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. Has the hon. gentleman received any reply from the Minister of Fisheries or his deputy with regard to the representations which I understand he made in connection with a program to assist the herring fishermen on the west coast?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): As hon. members probably know, the Minister of Fisheries has been away from the house for a few days. He returned today for the first time. The representations, which I assured the hon. member and others would be made, have been made to the minister and his deputy minister. However, I understand that the minister has not yet received a full report from his deputy. I believe he may be in a position to report on the subject tomorrow.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS AND DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS TO CLARIFY BOARD POWERS, PROVIDE FOR APPEAL DIVISION, ETC.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act to clarify certain powers of the board; to provide for the appointment of two vice-chairmen in lieu of one; to provide for an appeal division of the board; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, the amendments proposed in the resolution take cognizance of the reality and of the force of very important changes that are current in the Canadian industrial relations environment. The purpose of the amendments is to clarify the powers and to facilitate the work of the Canada Labour Relations Board in the light of these significant changes to which I have referred.

Most hon. members will recall that the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, commonly known as the I.R.D.I. act, came into force on September 1, 1948. It is now in its twentieth year without amendment of any kind. The Canada Labour Relations Board was established on the effective date of the legislation, September 1, 1948. I might say it was established as the successor organization to the Wartime Labour Relations Board which did such a good job for Canada during the war and the important post-war years.

This board administers the provisions of the act concerning the certification of bargaining units and, because this work takes a fair amount of time, I mention also the revocation of certifications and the review of earlier decisions. It also deals with the writing of provisions for incorporation into collective agreements that fix a procedure for the final settlement of disputes concerning the meaning or violation of such agreements. It also deals with the investigation of complaints referred to it by the Minister of Labour that one party or another has failed to bargain collectively in good faith.

The board consists of a chairman, one vice chairman and eight members, four of whom represent the employees and the other four represent the employers. The present chairman has had a board background of experience in this field. He has served as deputy minister of labour and as vice chairman of the Canada Labour Relations Board before taking over its chairmanship in 1964. The vice chairman of the board is a senior civil servant. He is the deputy director of investigation and research in the Department of the Registrar General. The vice-chairman does not participate in the work of the board if the chairman is available. He acts as the presiding officer only in the absence of the chairman.

The history of this board is rather interesting. During the war years there were four labour groups of appreciable size in this country, the old Trades and Labour Congress, the Canadian Congress of Labour, the railway unions, and what were called the Canadian Catholic unions in the province of Quebec. There were Teamsters and other organized groups, but the four that I have mentioned were the four major groups of organized labour in this country.

When the Canada Labour Relations Board started to function in September, 1948, representation on it was substantially the same as on the Wartime Labour Relations Board. There was one representative of the Canadian Trades and Labour Congress, one of the railway unions, one of the Canadian Congress of Labour, and one of the Canadian and Catholic unions. When the Canadian Labour Congress, the C.L.C., came into being it provided the unions affiliated with it with three representatives, whereas the Canadian and Catholic unions, now the C.N.T.U., continued to have only one representative.

During the 20-year period that it has been functioning the board has done yeoman service for the people of Canada. It might be said that the philosophy of the board has been the administration of the provisions of the act and the determination of each particular case on its merits. During these 20 years the growth of collective bargaining has greatly increased the work of the board. I shall give some figures to illustrate this. During the period prior to 1966 the average number of applications dealt with by the board per annum, in round figures, was about 100. In the last two years applications have averaged in excess of 140 per annum, an increase of roughly 40 or 45 per cent. In addition, and this is something I stress, rivalries among labour unions have placed increased pressures on the board.

The amendments covered by this resolution are designed to assist the board to deal with these new developments. I think I should state at this stage that no change in the representative character of the board is proposed, such as the three representatives from the C.L.C. and its affiliates and one representative from the C.N.T.U. If the resolution and the bill based thereon are accepted, the board will continue to represent equally the interests of employers and employees.

The amendments, however, do propose some new elements. First, they are designed to clarify the provisions in the act relating to the appropriateness of bargaining units. They also deal with the character of unions involved in applications for certification or designation.

It is also proposed that there be two vice-chairmen of the board as against one under the present act, and that the board be empowered to sit in panels. With the increase in work to which I have referred, the desirability of having the board sit in panels, as do so many of our courts, has become self-evident. On occasion there are a series of appeals. Unfortunately they may all come at the same time. If one relates to a problem in Ontario, another to a problem in British Columbia, another to a problem in the Atlantic provinces, another to something which is peculiar to the prairie region and yet another relates to the province of Quebec, it would certainly be desirable that the board sit in panels, just as the Supreme Court of Canada does on occasion, and as do our provincial courts of appeal when they sit in divisions. That is one reason it is desirable that we have two vice-chairmen instead of one.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question for clarification? Does the amendment indicate the composition of each panel, that is, whether or not a member from a particular part of the country or a particular organization should sit on a panel when a particular part of the country or organization is involved?

Mr. Nicholson: No, no more than does the Supreme Court of Canada Act make such provision in respect of the allocation of work by its members. That is handled by the chief justice. However, I believe my hon. friend who is a distinguished member of the bar knows that when an appeal from the province of Quebec comes before the Supreme Court of Canada the chief justice, as presiding officer of the court, will make sure that if it is at all possible all three members of the court from the province of Quebec will sit on the particular panel.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister whether that means that if certification were applied for by the C.N.T.U. the two members who were representatives of the C.N.T.U. would be on that panel?

Mr. Nicholson: This will become clearer when the bill itself is actually before the house, but I would hope that if there are three representatives from the C.L.C. as against one from the C.N.T.U. there might be a pattern established so there will be a balance in representation; in other words, that there would be one from each respective group, depending on the particular problem being discussed.

As I say, not only is it desirable to enable the board to sit in panels so that possibly three differents matters might be considered at one time but also so that one panel may sit in the maritimes, one in Ottawa, one in western Canada and possibly one in some part of Quebec. This would enable the work to be done with greater dispatch.

In addition it is proposed that an appeal division of the board be established. The appeal division will become operative to deal with appeals from rulings involving a determination of the appropriateness of the bargaining unit, that is, where an employer operates in more than one establishment or operates in more than one geographical area within Canada. It could be possible, if the full board sits as a panel, that the appeal would be taken to the appeal division. There may be various types of appeal. The nature of the appellate tribunal to be provided for here will be known as soon as copies of the bill have been distributed.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, would the minister permit a question? Will all members of the board be eligible for appointment to the appeal division?

Mr. Nicholson: It would be possible that the chairman or a vice chairman who did not take part in the original panel might be a member of that board, but not the other members of the board. If the chairman had presided at the panel hearing he might not wish to sit on the appeal. This sometimes happened in the Atlantic provinces when I was a young, practising lawyer. I think it is highly desirable that we should avoid that. I would expect that where cases of serous differences arise the chairman, in anticipating such a situation, might assign one or other of the vice chairmen and then make himself available to chair the appellate division.

Mr. Lewis: I am sorry to interrupt again, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate that we will have the details when the bill is before us but I wonder whether the minister would inform us, since the appeal division will be part of the board, if that means that all the members of the appeal division will be taken from among the members of the board or is it the intention under the bill that additional persons will be appointed?

Mr. Nicholson: The intention under the bill is that two additional persons will be appointed as public interest representatives, if I may use such a term.

Mr. Lewis: I understand that they would not be members of the Canada Labour Relations Board.

Mr. Nicholson: They would be members of the board but members only of its appeal division. They would be appointed as representatives of the general public. It would be the intention of the government to select these two public interest members on the basis of demonstrated ability and stature in industrial relations in Canada and from among those persons generally regarded as impartial between labour and management. This is more in line with the course, I might say, that the United States has followed in connection with its board. It is also in line exactly with what the government has done in setting up the public service arbitration tribunal. If you look at section 60 of that act you will see that it is not necessary to have nominees from either of the large labour groups or organizations, nor is it necessary to have a nominee from the chamber of commerce or the Canadian Manufacturers Association.

Mr. Lewis: I am sorry to interrupt again, Mr. Chairman, but will these additional members be permanent members of the appeal division or will different members be appointed for each appeal.

Mr. Nicholson: They will be permanent members, but not full time members. At the same time the amendment is also intended to clarify the authority of the board to make certain rules governing its procedure. If it is to establish panels and if there is to be an appeal division to deal with certain types of appeals, then I think it is highly desirable that the regulations and bylaws governing their activities should be modified and brought up to date.

At this stage I should like to repeat what I have said on previous occasions. It is my intention to move as soon as possible that this bill be referred to the appropriate committee of this house, the committee on labour and employment, for detailed discussion clause by clause. It certainly is the very sincere wish of the government that all those who have a vital interest or any real interest in these amendments should present their views before the committee when the opportunity to do so arises.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, could the minister tell us whether the intention is to refer this matter to the committee before or after second reading?

Mr. Nicholson: I would hope at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. McCleave: Will it be before second reading is completed or will it be after second reading?

Mr. Nicholson: It would be my hope that it would be before second reading—right away.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, in view of what the minister has said, that the house will not be asked to approve the principle on second reading before every opportunity has been given for representations to be made in committee, I certainly do not intend to take up too much time at this stage. However, there are a number of questions which came to my mind while the Minister of Labour was making his remarks in respect of the proposed amendments which are set out in the resolution.

• (3:50 p.m.)

The minister said that the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act has not been amended or changed since its inception in 1948. This points up the fact that it must have been a good act at least so far as the people involved are concerned and consequently no amendments have been necessary. Evidently the minister is not now proposing any changes to the act itself except in respect of the Canada Labour Relations Board. This act has a different application in respect of the Canada Labour Relations Board than in respect of other things it covers. The minister is not proposing any amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. All he is proposing is amendments affecting the Canada Labour Relations Board.

I felt that as the minister gave the history of this board he seemed to be following a tortuous path, particularly when he explained why amendments were necessary. He said there were a greater number of applications being made, but to my knowledge the board has never complained. Any time I have spoken with the members they seemed to be perhaps the most satisfied members of any board and have enjoyed their work. They are dedicated people who have spent many years accumulating experience, and on only rare occasions have their decisions been appealed. I suppose it is true that there is always dissatisfaction on the part of those who have not been successful in their applications for certification but generally speaking this board has been looked upon as fair and just in its decisions, which have been readily accepted.

This board has always had as members people representing management and labour organizations who have been recommended by management and labour. The turnover of personnel has been very minor over the years. This is probably because of the very good work done by the board. There has always been rivalry between applicants for certification as to who should represent an organization. This will be true no matter what board or commission makes the appointment. In any event good judgment must always be used.

In the past it has been the practice that large organizations like the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, junior chambers of commerce, the Canadian Labour Congress, railway unions and the C.N.T.U. have, on the basis of their membership, been represented on this board as well as on others. For this reason I want to know what the problem is now which makes it necessary to make these drastic changes.

The minister has agreed to send the bill which will follow this resolution to a committee before second reading, at which time perhaps these questions can be asked and answered. This is a very wise move and I hope that the good judgment of the minister in sending this matter to a committee before second reading in order that members may acquaint themselves with the facts before voting on the principle will set a precedent that other ministers will follow in future.

Mr. Lewis: Somebody will persuade him to change his mind.

Mr. Starr: Perhaps someone persuaded him to bring in these amendments, but the minister is using good judgment in committing himself to this committee that he will send his bill to a standing committee of the house prior to second reading. He is the only minister who has used good sense in this regard so far.

Mr. Nicholson: I am sure the hon. member for Ontario will recall that I did this on a prior occasion at his suggestion.

Mr. Starr: The minister is consistent in using good sense, and it is about time other ministers started to do the same in respect of other bills. I am sure if they did we would experience greater progress in the house.

The Canada Labour Relations Board has never had any interference from any minister. I know that I did not interfere with its operations when I was the minister. It seems to me that there is now to be direct interference as a result of the amendments proposed by this resolution. The minister is the sponsor of this resolution but whether or not he is the author of these amendments is not known. Perhaps we will find that out during the committee meetings.

Mr. Marchand: Does an amendment to a law constitute undue interference with a board?

Mr. Starr: That is what we will find out when we get to the committee. The minister has said that the first purpose of the amendments is to clarify certain powers. In my experience as Minister of Labour I was never approached by anyone, not even by members of the board, who felt that clarification of the board's powers was needed. Unless some unforeseen circumstances have developed since 1963 which make this clarification necessary I see no apparent reason why it should be done now. This is one of the things we want to find out. Have the members of the Canada Labour Relations Board asked the minister to introduce these amendments in order to clarify their powers?

There is now one vice chairman on the Canada Labour Relations board. He does not act unless the chairman is away. There has never been any problem in this regard, but I see that now there are to be two vice-chairmen. I suppose they will have to toss a coin to see who will take the place of the chairman when he is away. Perhaps it is anticipated that the present vice chairman is going to be away a great deal of the time and that the second vice chairman will act as chairman when the chairman is away.

Apparently there is to be an appeal division of the board, which now consists of eight members and a chairman, representative of all major unions and employers in Canada. If an applicant for certification is unsuccessful he will have the right to go to this newly constituted appeal division. I am sure we will find that all the decisions of the Canada Labour Relations Board will be appealed. There is always a loser in an application for certification. These appeals will be made to two strangers to this board. Very likely they will be people who have not had any experience with the Canada Labour Relations Board.

Mr. Whelan: That is not what the minister said.

Mr. Starr: That is exactly what he said. He said the appeal division would consist of three members, a chairman and two others, who would not be members of the Canada Labour Relations Board. So we will have a situation where two people can overrule a decision of nine just and fair representatives of our leading unions and our leading manufacturing association in this country.

• (4:00 p.m.)

I still maintain that practically all the decisions made by the board will be appealed. I think this is a mistake. However, we will have an opportunity to discuss it in committee. The largest labour organization in Canada is the Canadian Labour Congress and the government confers with it in respect of representation on all these boards. I have not yet heard the Canadian Labour Congress criticize the Canada Labour Relations Board in any way or ask for any amendments of the type the government proposes to make to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. We will have an opportunity in committee to find out what is the thinking of the Canadian Labour Congress.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): The Minister of Manpower and Immigration does not like the board.

Mr. Starr: If the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the employers and the unions have not protested, who has? Who wants these amendments to be made? These are questions that must be answered. We hope the Minister of Labour will be more specific in answering them when we are in committee.

What will these amendments mean to the board? What will they do to the Canada Labour Relations Board? Will they have the effect of emasculating the board? Will they have the effect of ruining the reputation of the board, which has had such a wonderful reputation since 1948? Will these amendments mean that chaos will be created in the labour movement? These are questions that come to my mind, Mr. Chairman.

I hope the minister is not being made a tool in respect of the amendments that are now proposed. We congratulate the minister on his thoughtfulness and reasonableness and hope that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is not now talking him out of sending this bill to committee before second reading, because the minister has given his word and is a man of his word. The minister is also a man of integrity and I am sure he will not allow the Minister of Manpower and Immigration or the government house leader to talk him into not keeping his word to this committee.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, it is in this particular case, even more than in many others, difficult to discuss the resolution without having before us the details of the bill. But I must say it seemed clear to me as the minister was speaking that the government was indulging in a subterfuge to do something which it does not dare or does not have the courage to do straightforwardly and in the open.

It may well be that claims that ought to be met have been made by certain organizations. I personally do not know of them, but there may be some. If the government is of the opinion that they ought to be met the minister and the government ought to present amendments to the act which say just that, and they should not indulge in subterfuge and things much less than honest in presenting this resolution and the proposed bill to parliament.

The minister says there is something wrong with the representatives on the board. We say to him first, with respect and with kindness, that he ought to be a little more accurate. When the board was established there were on it representatives of the Trades and Labour Congress, the Canadian Congress of Labour, the railway unions and the organization that preceded the present C.N.T.U. At that time I think it was still the Canadian and Catholic Unions. There were these four organizations represented.

When the C.C.L. and the T.L.C. combined the same situation prevailed. The minister ought to know that before he starts talking about three members representing the C.L.C. It may be that the union the present railwayman on the board represents is affiliated with the C.L.C.—frankly, I do not at the moment recall—but this was the case before. Prior to the merger of the C.C.L. and the T.L.C., the railwayman on the board may well have also represented a union affiliated at that time with the T.L.C. What you have now on the board is precisely what you have always had. When the T.L.C. and the C.C.L. combined, the members who represented those two organizations represented the one organization.

As a matter of fact, as the minister ought to know if he does not know it, the two members of the board who were nominated by the C.L.C. were in fact representative of what were previously the C.C.L. and the T.L.C. If my memory serves me right, Mr. MacDonald and Mr. D'Aoust are the two members nominated by the Canadian Labour Congress. Mr. D'Aoust is an ex-officer of what used to be known as the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and Mr. MacDonald is an ex-officer of what used to be known as the Canadian Congress of Labour. They are both now in the C.L.C. The present combined organization represents the same people represented in the old organizations. What in unjust in this situation? What is unfair in it? What is the minister or anyone else complaining about?

In any case, Mr. Chairman, if the minister and the government had the courage to do what they apparently intend to do—although I am not quite clear about it—let me point out to them that the legislation says nothing about where the representatives are to come from. It merely says that the board shall consist of a chairman and not more than eight other members, four representing employees and four representing employers. Within the confines of this legislation a change can be made in the representation if in the government's view that is necessary. But the government, not having the courage to do that, proposes that there be panels in order to achieve the representation that it thinks ought to be there in particular cases. In this way the minister will introduce the rivalry which he regrets exists in the labour movement among the members of the board itself. If that will not destroy any possibility of impartiality of the board, I should like to know what will.

It is true that members of the board are appointed from many groups in the community, but the intention of the legislation and my experience in appearing before the Canada Labour Relations Board as well as before other boards in this country lead me to know as a fact that after some time on the board those men originally representing particular groups follow a pretty consistent pattern of decision-making and precedents and take into account the interests of the community and of industrial peace in this country. Before the merger of the Trades and Labour Congress and the Canadian Congress of Labour I have known C.C.L. members of the board to hold against affiliates of that organization; I have known T.L.C. members of the board to hold against affiliates of that organization. I have known in respect of the Ontario and Manitoba boards, before both of which I have appeared, and am also aware from the decisions of all other boards in Canada which I have read, that where the labour member comes from frequently does not determine the decision which he supports. The importance of this is that from the start you try to get all members of the board to be as objective and impartial as human beings can be and to develop a sense of responsibility for the community and for the whole field of industrial relations.

What does the minister now propose? He proposes to make sure that the members of the board who happen to be from the C.L.C. will remain at all times C.L.C. partisans, that the members of the board who happen to represent the railway unions will for all time remain railway partisans, and that the members of the board who happen to represent the C.N.T.U. will for all time remain C.N.T.U. partisans, regardless of the objective facts and principles of the situation. If I understood the minister correctly, he is setting out deliberately to destroy any possibility of impartiality and objectivity by the members of the board.

The minister then said he wants to clarify the definition of an appropriate bargaining unit. Again let me remind him that the present definition is in the widest possible terms.

A unit means a group of employees, and a unit appropriate for collective bargaining means a unit appropriate for such purposes, whether it be an employee unit, a craft unit, a technical unit, a plant unit or any other unit, and whether or not the employees therein are employed by one or more employers. When the minister says he intends to clarify the definition, I suspect that what he really intends to do is not to clarify but to confuse the section and to insert into it a limiting term which will tie the hands of the Canada Labour Relations Board.

The minister spoke about the establishment of panels. I cannot understand his aim in doing so because I know the act and the regulations fairly well. Let me remind him that at the present time there is a section in the act which permits the board to authorize any person or board to exercise or perform all or any of its powers or duties under this act relating to any particular matter. What the board has always done is to have an investigating officer examine the membership and so on of an organization applying for certification. Let me also remind the minister that under the rules of the board made pursuant to the act the quorum of the board may consist of only three persons, namely the chairman or vice-chairman and one member representing each of the interests. Again I cannot help but suspect that the establishment of panels would not assist the board in doing its work.

As one of us here know, such as the hon. member for Ontario and others, the Canada Labour Relations Board has not sat for more than two days a month in years. It is only very occasionally that the board sits for more than two days a month. I am not aware of any backlog of work that it may have, and if there is such a tremendous amount of work all it has to do is to sit an additional day a month. There is nothing in what the minister has said or in what any of us know about the working of the board which would justify the setting up of panels, the result of which would be a division of the interests of the board rather than a development of its jurisprudence in these matters.

There are panels under the Ontario labour relations board which sit every day of the week. In fact two or three of these panels sit every working day of the week. This board has an agenda which requires the meeting of these panels. I challenge the minister's statement that there is any backlog of work in the Canada Labour Relations Board which could not be tackled by an additional day or two a month of sittings by the board. Instead of sitting two days a month it could sit three or four days a month and if there is any backlog of work it could thus be easily taken care of.

Panels are not needed for that purpose. The minister wants to set up panels for the purpose of dividing the members of the board into sheep and goats. He wants panels for the purpose of emphasizing and underlining the rivalries which he regrets. He wants panels for the purpose of destroying the possible objectivity and impartiality of the board. He does not need panels to get the work done. That could be done by an extra day or two of sittings by the board.

The minister spoke about an appeal division. All of these points will no doubt be dealt with again by other hon. members, but let me say a word on this matter. Let me remind the minister that the philosophy behind all the labour relations boards in Canada and in the United States is perfectly simple and valid. It is that the labour relations board should be practical, should consist of men and women with practical experience in the labour relations field, and should be representative of the two interests concerned, namely, management and labour. It is that such a practical board, representing the people with whom the board's work is concerned, should be given the widest possible discretion to discover, on the basis of its practical experience, the best modus vivendi and modus operandi in the labour relations field, and the best way in which to do the work which will encourage peace and minimize the possibility of labour unrest.

For that reason, when the wartime board was first set up—and I will be glad to be corrected if I am wrong—a provision was inserted in the act whereby no lawyers were allowed to appear before the board. I am not concerned at the moment about whether I am right or wrong in this. What I am concerned about is the philosophy which was represented by that provision, namely, that the board's operations should be as informal as possible and as uncluttered as possible with legalities and the ordinary confining rules of evidence which necessarily govern proceedings in a court. The purpose behind the philosophy was that the functions and operations of the board should be informal and should stem and derive from the practical experience of its members, and that the board should seek to be as impartial as possible.

This is why the act under discussion, as well as every other labour relations act in Canada with which I am acquainted, and I think I am acquainted with every one, contains a provision whereby the decisions of such boards cannot be appealed before the courts but are final and conclusive for all the purposes of the act. This is also why the present statute contains a provision that the board may reconsider any order or decision it has made. It is a simple philosophy that instead of appealing to another body which may impose on the board considerations and principles which the board has decided are unwise from its practical experience, the board is given an opportunity to reconsider any decision it has made, and if there are additional arguments or new evidence it is given authority under the act to vary or revoke any decision or order it has made. So far as is possible the act intended to keep the board free from legal formalities and from the procedures of appeal as well as free from interference from outside. It was to be a board that could work out on a practical basis, on the basis of its own experience, the kind of industrial life to which it has authority to direct itself.

I cannot help but suspect that this appeal board is not being set up for the purpose of appeal in any real, meaningful sense at all. This appeal board is not to meet a pressing necessity that exists, because the right to reconsider is there. Again, I cannot but suspect that this is also a subterfuge for a government not having the courage to change the composition of the board itself. I feel that by having an appeal division the same objective will be achieved in a roundabout way.

I have not heard from any labour source, unless I have failed to read everything I have received—not even from the C.N.T.U.—any request for an appeal board. I doubt very much that any responsible spokesman for labour, no matter what organization he represents, will look with anything but dismay at this proposal for an appeal division. You will have the imposition on the practical experience of the board of the actions of two people from the outside who will sit in appeal. You will have a constant flow of appeals from the board to this appeal tribunal because, as the member for Ontario so wisely said, there is always a loser in these cases. The loser in almost every case will go to the appeal board, so it will be the appeal board that will make the policies of the board rather than this body composed of the representatives of management and labour.

We will have to deal with the bill in greater detail when it comes before us. I should like also to join the hon. member for Ontario in congratulating the minister for undertaking to send the bill to committee before second reading. If he can accomplish that, it will be worth doing.

I want to say in conclusion—

Mr. Nicholson: What I think the minister said was that he would send the substance of the bill to the committee, and I hope that can be accomplished.

Mr. Starr: Don't back away from it now.

Mr. Lewis: The question was, would he send the bill to the committee before second reading and he said yes, he would. As a matter of fact, I have some sympathy for the minister because I do not know whether the rules permit that.

Mr. Starr: Yes, it has been done before.

Mr. Nicholson: I agreed to send the subject matter of the bill, not the bill itself.

Mr. Starr: Before second reading.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I do not know whether I am right in saying so but I believe this matter should be decided in the house when the Speaker is in the chair, and not in committee.

Mr. Lewis: As a matter of fact, I was going to say I wanted to pursue this argument at a more appropriate time. I reiterate that I join with the hon. member for Ontario in congratulating the minister upon undertaking, as I suggest, that the bill would be sent to a committee before second reading. I want to say that there are many areas in this act that do need amendment, and I am thinking of the conciliation procedure for the settlement of disputes and the whole machinery for avoiding labour strikes. The part that does not need amendment is the part that deals with certification and the Canada Labour Relations Board. Because of the objective which the minister has not been frank enough to put before the committee, the section to which we will be moving amendments is that section which experience and practice have shown works so well now for the people of Canada, for labour and management.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, this resolution is obviously the result of pressure put on the government by the labour unions which complain that they are badly treated or misunderstood by the Canada Labour Relations Board.

For example, the C.N.T.U. has complained many times about the Canada Labour Relations Board, and today the government is presenting the following resolution, and I quote:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act to clarify certain powers of the board; to provide for the appointment of two vice-chairmen in lieu of one; to provide for an appeal division of the board; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), who just resumed his seat, said that this resolution may have been introduced to please a given group or trade union. He was probably referring to the C.N.T.U. which had difficulties with the C.B.C. on a few occasions, but he did not want or he avoided to mention the C.N.T.U.

A moment ago, he expressed his lack of confidence in the introduction of a bill to improve labour and industrial relations, to clarify certain powers of the board, to provide for the appointment of two vice chairmen in lieu of one, and also to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Mr. Chairman, we find it difficult now to discuss this proposed measure which will be introduced, since it is not the bill itself that has been put before us but the resolution preceding the introduction of the bill in the house. Therefore, even if it is possible to guess at some of the provisions of the bill which will follow the resolution, we must wait until the bill is introduced in parliament to discuss them.

The hon. member for York South says that this bill should put a stop to the increasing number of strikes in Canada, but we are now witnessing rather difficult industrial relations, labour-management relations in England. In fact, there have been strikes in the nationalized railways as well as in other nationalized or public industries. There again, the theory of socialism, of the labour state was applied, and that does not seem to have settled many things. To have, in Canada, an organization, an industrial relations board or an employer-employee relations board that would act efficiently, study both sides of the question, consider objectively the existing problems or those that might crop up, I believe it would be a good omen.

I also think the minister is right in proposing his resolution and seeking authority to introduce a bill which we may discuss with all the necessary leeway and move amendments if we are not satisfied with its contents.

I believe we should support the immediate adoption of this proposed resolution.

Mr. Chairman, I shall await the bill which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) intends to introduce before making further comments.

• (4:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon the Minister of Labour introduced a resolution to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and gave specific details of the content of the bill and the purpose of the resolution. He pointed out that this act has not been amended since 1948. He also pointed out that the realities of the economy and of the labour market in Canada have changed considerably in these 20 years. He stated that the main purpose of the resolution and the bill to follow was to meet two problems, the increasing rivalry between trade unions, and the increasing work load of the board.

I was somewhat surprised to hear the hon. member for Ontario, a former minister of labour and chief critic of the Conservative party on labour matters, ask who wants amendments. He stated he did not know anybody who wanted the act amended and he questioned the resolution and the proposed changes. It seems to me the hon. member for Ontario must restrict his reading to English newspapers in Ontario. As one who would be a natural choice for minister of labour if he were re-elected to office, which is doubtful, he should be aware of the widespread criticism of the present composition of the board and the resultant injustice to French Canada in the set-up of the board.

While his leader was in French Canada over the week end preaching that we must give consideration to the two founding language groups in Canada, the hon. gentleman is telling us here that there is no criticism of this act in Canada. I should like to read a brief extract from the memorandum submitted to the government by the Confederation of National Trade Unions in which it is stated:

> The act must be amended in such a way that when the two organizations—
>
> The C.N.T.U. and the C.L.C.
> —are in conflict over a question on which the board must make a decision, the two unions be represented equally.

This means in practice, Mr. Chairman, that there must be more representatives from the C.N.T.U. and less from the C.L.C. The minister has stated that there will be no change in representation on the labour relations board but that new methods would be devised to deal with this problem.

I think we must do something to correct the great feeling of injustice on the part of many trade unionists in the province of Quebec in relation to the board. One long-standing principle of British justice is that justice must not only be done but that it must be seen to be done. According to a great number of people in the trade union movement in Quebec, justice is definitely not seen to be done as far as the Canadian Labour Relations Board is concerned, especially in the matter of jurisdictional disputes.

As we all know, there are four representatives from labour and four representatives from the employers on the board. Of the four labour representatives, two are from the Canadian Labour Congress, one is from the railway unions and the fourth is from the C.N.T.U. In some of the decisions about which the C.S.N. has complained, three of the representatives—the two C.L.C. representatives plus the representative of the railways —have voted against the position taken by the C.N.T.U.

There is also another reason that the number of chairmen should be increased. At the moment, of the nine members of the Canada Labour Relations Board only three are French speaking. If there is going to be equal justice in this country for those who are French speaking as well as for those who are English speaking, then there must be a greater degree of bilingualism among the members of the Canada Labour Relations Board. So far there has not been this degree of bilingualism, the type of bilingualism that the leader of the official opposition has been preaching about since his election but which his chief labour critic does not seem to favour too much. At the present moment, Mr. Chairman, if a union which basically is comprised of French speaking members appears before the Canada Labour Relations Board it must engage a lawyer to represent it who speaks good English. It must make sure that all its representations to the board are understood by the board.

With regard to the method of appointment to the board, it seems to me that while persons from English speaking Canada can be appointed to the board without the necessity of their knowing French, a French speaking member must know English before he can be appointed. Is this the type of justice we are trying to promote when we speak, as the Conservatives do, about respect for the two founding language groups in Canada?

No, Mr. Chairman, there is dissatisfaction with the present setup of the Canada Labour Relations Board. It is not simply that we must make amendments to satisfy one group; we must also be sure we have fair play and that we have justice, especially in the matter of jurisdictional disputes, from the Canada Labour Relations Board.

The Canadian Labour Congress dealt with this question in their last brief to the government of Canada. On page 28 this statement appears:

> We wish to reiterate the position taken by us before the cabinet committee that we do not propose to accede to any change in the composition of the board which would reduce the number of congress nominees and add to that of the confederation. We say this secure in the knowledge that we are indisputably the major trade union centre not only in Canada as a whole but in the province of Quebec as well. The congress alone has members in every part of Canada. We do not propose to subordinate ourselves to a minor organization merely to satisfy the aspirations of its leaders.

As far as I can see, Mr. Chairman, legislation of this nature is not meant to satisfy the aspirations of a minority but to bring about greater fair play and justice. It also seems to me that the Canadian Labour Congress, which is the major labour group in Canada, should not condone the principle of the majority dictating to the minority. There should be justice for minority groups in Canada and recognition of their point of view by boards set up by the federal government.

I should like to quote some of the points made by the C.S.N. in an addendum to their brief to the federal government last year. They say:

> We have frequently had considerable difficulty before the C.L.R.B. A federal body must accept the realities that exist in the country. If this is not done, and if the employees concerned by this matter do not obtain justice, the C.N.T.U. will seriously question its participation in the federal organizations, in the future—

A federal body like the C.L.R.B. cannot directly or indirectly be made the tool to shackle a free union for the benefit of an American union that is unacceptable to its members.

The latter point has reference to a situation where a large number of French speaking employees of the C.B.C. in Quebec rejected the previous union which was dominated by U.S. interests.

I suggest that there is much room for improvement in our labour relations law. The government has appointed the Woods commission to bring forward far reaching changes in the law, but in the meanwhile there are other changes that can be made to effect greater justice and fair play to other groups in Canada, whether they be from Quebec or from outside Quebec.

The minister must be commended for bringing forward this measure. I know that all members of trade unions, whether they belong to C.L.C. affiliated unions or to C.N.T.U. affiliated unions, will appreciate a greater flexibility in questions involving jurisdictional disputes, panels and appeals, thus ensuring a more complete hearing and greater justice than is the case at the moment. This will do much to unify and consolidate the labour movement in Canada.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to answer immediately the point made by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce who has just resumed his seat. I doubt that anybody in this chamber would object in the slightest to any change which might be necessary in order to give fair representation on this board to French speaking members. If that were the purpose of the bill to be introduced by this resolution and if it were clearly set out in that form, I doubt that any member of this house would have any objection to raise.

But it is not necessary to change the legislation in order to achieve the admirable objective stated by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. There is no need whatever to bring in legislation for that purpose. The government already has the necessary authority to do what is described. There is nothing in the act to prevent it. But if this were the purpose of the bill, why does the minister not tell us? He mentioned no such thing.

The answer is, of course, that the bill does not do what the hon. member has suggested. It does not provide for any additional French speaking members. Indeed, it provides for nothing which relates to the observations made by the hon. member who has just resumed his place. I can only suggest that this is another red herring introduced to prevent our looking very closely at the legislation.

I wish to deal with just one aspect of the resolution and that is the proposal to set up an appeal division. I cannot imagine anything more damaging to sensible decisions in connection with labour legislation than the setting up of an appeal division, a hierarchy of appeals within one single board, especially when this board is dealing with a relatively narrow subject matter. I myself had a good deal of experience a number of years ago with the first labour relations court ever set up in Canada, the Ontario labour relations court which was brought into existence in 1943. I appeared as counsel for a number of the parties before that court. The court did its best. On a number of occasions it rendered decisions favourable to labour, decisions which were regarded as fair.

My point is this. Representatives of both labour and management were agreed that the proceedings of the court were utterly unsuitable for dealing with labour relations matters, and the court was abolished within a short time. What were the reasons for doing so? They have already been indicated by my hon. friend from York South. They are that it is absolutely essential when dealing with labour relations to establish a tribunal which can act quickly and can act on practical grounds, not on the basis of legalistic considerations.

What is the purpose of the legislation now proposed? It is to provide a board which can promote the process of collective bargaining and lead to industrial peace. The main function of this board is to determine who shall represent the workers. If there is to be a hierarchy of appeal procedures set up within this board and if, as is possible, the position is made still more complex by further appeals to the legal courts of the land, we may easily reach a situation which has already been reached in the United States where after a union has applied for certification legal proceedings can drag on for four years, by the end of which time it is possible that the organization concerned no longer exists or the parties have long settled their differences without benefit of the procedures of the law. It is totally wrong to introduce here arguments which are appropriate to the constitution of courts. We are not constituting a court in this instance. Yet we create, in effect, a court if we induce public spirited people from outside to hear appeals from decisions of the Canadian Labour Relations Board or any division of it.

The minister showed his tendency to think in lawyer-like terms when he referred to the Supreme Court of Canada and suggested that the Canadian Labour Relations Board needed additional panels because they are needed in the Supreme Court of Canada. But the Supreme Court of Canada has to hear appeals in connection with totally different systems of law and it is obviously appropriate in this instance that the court, or the majority of the court, should be trained in whichever legal system they are administering. But here we are dealing with industries which are by definition national industries of national scope. It would be an extraordinary thing were two different groups dealing with the same code, the same system, to apply it in different ways in different parts of the country.

Above all, the proposal to introduce a hierarchy of appeals represents the introduction into the field of labour relations of a concept which has no place there. It could only lead to delay, confusion, frustration and jealousy; it could only make the whole operation fail to do its job in promoting peaceful labour conditions.

When I see such poor reasons advanced in favour of this resolution as those which have been given us so far, I am bound to repeat the question asked by my hon. friend from York South: What are the indirect purposes behind the introduction of this resolution? I do not think we have been given any frank statement. The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce suggested a grievance on the part of the province of Quebec. If the purpose of the resolution is to remedy this grievance, let us hear from the minister and consider whether there is a better way of doing it than by messing up legislation which has worked reasonably well in the past. We are all interested in the terms of the bill itself but I express a great deal of reserve about this legislation, relieved only by the undertaking that the subject matter will be referred to a committee of the house where it can be fully examined before second reading.

• (4:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take part in the discussion at this stage. I thought we would have the opportunity of speaking on second reading. If this bill is referred to a committee, I hope it will be after the house had had the opportunity to decide on the principle of the bill. However, as we do not seem to be quite decided yet, I should like to make a few remarks.

It was mentioned, that the field of labour relations is very specialized. It has brought about the establishment of special courts, either for certification or for conciliation. Surely, as was mentioned, the problems involved are not only legal problems, but first of all economic and social problems of a very special character which ordinary courts are not prepared to consider objectively.

In discussing such a bill, however, one can be sentimental or even angelic Mr. Chairman but I think that, at the present time, it is not the government that is evading the issue but those very people who would have this house believe that arbitration boards, labour relations boards are not what they are, that is to say, organizations representing interest groups. And that is not hypocrisy; that is just the way it is.

It happens, for instance, that labour representatives on conciliation boards, if my information is good, never signed a minority report favourable to the employer, and I have no recollection of having seen a representative of the employer signing a minority report favourable to the workers. Even if they are very objective, that never happened.

I have never seen, in the Canada Labour Relations Board, members of the Canadian Labour Congress voting against one of their unions concerned, when it was in conflict with another union. It happened that the members of the Canadian Labour Congress divided when they had to deal with two requests coming from their own central committee, but never in the case of one request only coming from a union under the congress. Evidently, it is entirely coincidental.

There is, of course, that objectivity the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) mentioned. However, his objectivity is only in his head because in practice—and apart from that—the act did not want those people to be objective in the sense that is expected of a judge in a regular court. In fact, there was so little desire for them to be objective that the board was set up on a parity basis: four representatives of the employers on one side and four representatives of the workers on the other. Why was that? If those people are objective, why are they chosen thus on a parity basis in each group? Because it is a well known fact—and the hon. member for York South knows it as well as I do—that those people represent various interests. It does not mean that they are dishonest, but they are there to represent the interests of their central committee and their affiliated groups and when they do that, they comply with the spirit of the act.

Why say in this house that we are trying to destroy the present objective character of the Canada Labour Relations Board?

Mr. Lewis: Because it is the truth.

Mr. Marchand: It is not true. We want simply to make sure that some present-day wrongs cannot be committed by the board whose members represent interested parties, which is quite normal.

Moreover, I think, personally, that such a representative character of labour relations boards should be maintained, for this is a tried and true formula in the labour relations field. However to say that we would destroy the objective character of the board, just because we want, in some cases, to balance out the board in order to prevent any wrongdoing, is just too much. This argument would hold, perhaps, for someone who has never seen a labour relations board in operation, but I disagree, being quite aware that the people who represented my local within the Canada Labour Relations Board spoke for my local, just like others spoke for the F.Q.W. and employers' representatives spoke for management. In my estimation, there has never been any question of some other form of objectivity in the act.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, to talk about a subterfuge, is really to go a little far. In fact, when a labour union, which is not represented on the board or has a minority representation, comes before this body and sees its case lost from the beginning or cannot obtain justice, because of the interplay of interests and the natural tendencies and concepts of the representatives, I think that any impartial and fair person should be ready to reconsider the structure of this board—bearing in mind the cases I have referred to—in order that all the Canadian citizens, all the organizations—not only a few, but all—may be assured of a fair treatment by the Canada Labour Relations Board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I am not speaking only of the unions affiliated to the C.N.T.U. but of all those which, by accident or in conformity with the constitution of the board, are not represented on this board, because—and our friends in the New Democratic party surely know this as well as I—there are various interests in the labour field. There are the interests of the unions and those of the employers. Because of the differences which exist between the labour unions in Canada, there are presently many cases where the employers, and not the union representatives, decide what union will be recognized. As soon as the union group is divided, the balance of power rests with the management. Is that normal? Is that what we want? Is that the power we want the management to have? The right to make the decisions for their employees, for their union? The opposite is true in other sectors of the economy, Mr. Chairman.

Without mentioning any name, I know that when an employer enjoys a normal and friendly relationship with a labour organization, it is customary for that employer, within the Canadian Labour Relations Board, if that organization has some interests to promote, to support—unless there are policy objections—the union applying for certification, because it is, of course, indirectly in its interest. It is normal. We wanted it that way, so let's not bring up questions of objectivity.

Why, Mr. Chairman, are ministers asked to divest themselves of private interests, of directorships in companies? Is it because the House of Commons does not trust the objectivity of the present ministers or those who might be appointed eventually? It is not for that reason, but because if they had private interests, their objectivity would be in danger.

That does not mean that the members of the board are dishonest people; let no one put in our mouth things we have never said. Personally, I think that the members of the board are honest people, whether they belong to the Canadian Labour Congress or they are appointed by employers. I think that most of them—all those I know, anyway—are people upon whom I would rely in any case, except in cases where they have private interests. It is normal then for the legislator to balance the representation within the board so that the interests at stake are not sacrified to the process of law. That is all we want to do; we are seeking to preserve the principle of representation of the parties concerned within that board. However, it is impossible to have them all represented on the C.L.R.B.

There is, at present, the main labour organization, the Canadian Labour Congress. On the other hand, there is the C.N.T.U. which has only one representative. There are also other unions, which may be bona fide unions or still to be established, and which are not represented on the C.L.R.B. Does this mean that because they are not represented on the C.L.R.B. they will not have the same privileges as the unions affiliated to the C.L.C.? Does this mean that some citizens, some free organizations in Canada will not be treated like the others? Does the house want to treat various groups differently? I do not think so.

I know full well that certain groups were defeated before the Canada Labour Relations Board strictly bcause they did not have representatives to fight for their interests. It is obvious. Everyone knows it. Look around and see how the world of labour insists that it must be represented everywhere. Is it because labour fears a lack of objectivity on the part of those who are appointed by the government? No. It is because they have interests, points of view and is just what those boards need.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this resolution is precisely to see to it that the structure of the board will ensure fairness, not just accidentally, but because it is made up of good men; indeed, its structure should at least ensure balance in every case, especially in cases of conflict.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been mentioned—

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I did not understand, but what structural change has been suggested?

Mr. Marchand: I beg your pardon.

Mr. Lewis: What structural change in the board has been suggested, I have not heard anything about it.

Mr. Marchand: It is in the resolution before us, Mr. Chairman—excuse me if I remained standing—where it is mentioned that an appeal division of the board will be provided. For the benefit of the hon. member for York South, this changes the structure, as a matter of fact, it is a new structure. That is why I say that we have tried to create a structure that would really guarantee impartiality.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I am sure of one thing, and it is that a body, like the Canada Labour Relations Board, or any other body set up to render justice in Canada, must provide guarantees of impartiality, and this board, just like any government department, must not belong to any particular organization. Nobody has the right to monopolize the labour relations boards or any other organization dealing with labour relations. Unfortunately at the present time, it is too often the case. This is the condition which we wanted to correct.

There has been some reference earlier to the splitting of competing unions and to the fostering of division in labour ranks.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that the arguments of upholders of labour unions are very weak when they depend on the law to bring Canadian unions together. I question very much their judgment and their wisdom. The labour movement itself can unify not only its structure but also its bargaining units. When the labour movement must rely on legislation to achieve such unity, I find it extremely weak and disappointing, because under this resolution and later, under the bill, nothing will prevent the unity of the labour movement from trying to have bargaining units of the size they choose.

On the other hand, efforts are made to maintain privileges and particularly to cover the voices of some who are being heard and who, on occasion, are being flattered for other purposes. But when a practical problem arises, it does not work any more, it is good only for statements of principles.

When the special status and the two nations theory or the awareness of various environments in Canada are involved, it always goes well in principle, but as soon as an attempt is made to alter legislation so as to eliminate excessive privileges, to correct abuses, then the question of objectivity and the traditions in the labour world are invoked.

To my mind, Mr. Chairman, the greatest tradition in the labour world is to seek justice not only for such and such a labour organization but for all labour organizations and for all workers.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I earnestly hope that students of this matter will take the trouble to read side by side the speeches that have been made today by the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Particularly I would ask those who read their speeches to note the purpose of this legislation, first as given by the Minister of Labour and now as given by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. We were told by the Minister of Labour that there were administrative reasons, a backlog of work and things of that sort. When my colleague the hon. member for York South suggested there was a certain amount of subterfuge the Minister of Manpower and Immigration came clean—

Mr. Marchand: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I did not speak about the panels at all. I think the Minister of Labour referred to the panels.

Mr. Nicholson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I know the hon. member wants to be fair but if he will look at what I said he will find that I referred to the fact that as a result of the historical background there would be three members on the board from one organization as against only one from another. Not only must justice be done but it must appear to have been done. That is the import of the statement of my colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Knowles: I still think it would have been better had the ministers compared notes before they spoke rather than attempt to rationalize their speeches afterward. The main purpose of the speech of the Minister of Labour seemed to be to indicate that there were administrative difficulties and a backlog of work and certain other problems to be solved. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration came clean and told us that in his view the general purpose of the legislation is to alter the balance of labour representation so far as the Canada Labour Relations Board is concerned.

The main thing that is wrong with this legislation is that it has been drawn in a dishonest fashion. I say to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration that he is trying to have it both ways. Either the appeal provision and the panels that the Minister of Labour proposes to set up do what the Minister of Manpower and Immigration wants, namely, redress the imbalance, in which case the Minister of Labour is misleading us, or they do not, in which case the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is misleading those who wish this to be done.

I suggest that the proposal by the Minister of Labour that this matter not proceed to second reading but rather be referred to the committee on labour and employment is a good one. I believe in that case we could persuade the government that the bill ought to be torn up and drawn over again. If the purpose of the bill is what the Minister of Manpower and Immigration says it is, then let it be drawn in that way. If there is a backlog which cannot be taken care of by extra days of sittings in the month or if there is a need to get other people on the board to represent other groups, then let them increase the size of the board. The more we look at the proposal and the more the minister tries to justify it the more this legislation appears to be one of these attempts to do indirectly what the government is not prepared to do directly. The best thing we can do in respect of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act is to keep the subject matter before the committee until the government decides to bring in a properly drawn piece of legislation or until the session ends.

Mr. Lewis: Until we have an honest piece of legislation.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): You have not seen it.

Mr. Knowles: The Postmaster General had a piece of legislation which we did not get an opportunity to see either, but we have had statements from the two ministers telling us what this legislation contains. The Postmaster General is quite right; we have not seen the legislation. All we are going to see now is draft legislation. I hope that in that form we will be able to do something about it.

There is another point I should like to make when we are discussing the amendments of the Minister of Labour. We want to complain bitterly and strenuously about the things the Minister of Labour is not bringing forward. May I remind him that four years ago this very month, in November, 1963, his predecessor, the then minister of labour and present Minister of National Health and Welfare, assured us that at the earliest possible moment the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act would be brought before parliament for amendment with respect to matters that needed amending.

May I remind the minister also that two years ago this month, in November, 1965, the Freedman commission published its report in which there was spelled out a whole new concept of the rights of workers with respect to their jobs. I need not go into the details of the Freedman commission report. In the main, while admitting that management had certain rights, it stated that when it came to technological changes the least that should be done is to make them negotiable with the workers. The right of the workers to their jobs was spelled out very clearly in the Freedman report. We tried to get something done about that report when we had other legislation before us but we were put off and told that this was something which was related to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and could come in the future. Here we are, two years since the Freedman report and four years since the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his former portfolio assured us that this act would be amended, and we now have before us only the unnecessary proposals mentioned today.

In the meantime the urgency of these other problems has grown. Only a few days ago my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North, asked a question about what was happening to a skilled group of employees, namely the railway telegraphers in the city of Winnipeg and other places who are being laid off because of technological changes. The purport of my colleague's question was, will the government in the near future be bringing forward legislation to implement the recommendations of the Freedman commission? This question was asked on November 27 and is recorded in Hansard on page 4716. The minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, no legislation is contemplated for introduction at this session to implement any such recommendations.

We have heard questions today about lay-offs by the Canadian Pacific Railway to take place between Christmas and New Year's. Also alluded to today by the leader of this group was the question of whether the timing of these lay-offs between Christmas and New Year's will affect the right of these men to pay for Christmas day, Boxing day and New Year's day. This brings up the whole question of the difficulties the Department of Labour has had in administering the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, particularly with regard to both general and annual holidays.

The minister may say that this is another piece of legislation and not the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. Let me remind him that not only do some of us think that these various pieces of legislation are related, but when the Canada Labour (Safety) Code was passed by this parliament last session it contained section 30 which gave the commission that is revising the statutes of Canada the power to put into one statute of Canada the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, the Canada Labour (Safety) Code, the Female Employees Equal Pay Act, the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act and the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. In other words, by bringing that section before us the minister himself admitted that these various pieces of legislation are integrally related.

It is in respect of some of these other pieces of legislation that we are having difficulty in interpreting the Canada Labour (Standards) Code and in getting the government to move on the Canada Labour (Safety) Code. Something desperately needs to be done about these matters. We get nothing out of the minister about these other problems, yet he comes along today with this piece of legislation that is totally unnecessary.

May I take a moment or two longer to emphasize the seriousness of the problem created by technological change and what it means to some employees. I mentioned the small group of railroad telegraphers who have been told by the C.N.R. that their positions will be eliminated. The employees concerned feel that this is in violation of a clause of their contract and that they should be protected against this kind of thing by labour legislation. I also think they should be protected. In the meantime all the company says to these employees, who at the moment are skilled persons with average earnings of $3.07 an hour, is that there are certain positions in the Canadian National services which are vacant and that they may be able to pick up some of these jobs.

What are some of the positions that these $3.07 an hour telegraphers are being told they can get? There are positions in dining cars at $1.99 per hour and positions as labourers at the Fort Garry hotel in Winnipeg at $1.28 per hour and so on. As a matter of fact the communication from the C.N.R. to these employees lists a whole page of various jobs that are open, but they all range from $1.28 per hour up to around $2 per hour. None of them equals the $3.07 an hour they are now receiving.

Undoubtedly the lay-offs the railways are making at Weston shops at Winnipeg, Ogden shops at Calgary, Angus shops at Montreal, and at Fort William and other places are due in part to automation and technological progress. If there is one overriding factor that faces us so far as the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act is concerned it is the need for inclusion in that legislation of something along the lines of the recommendations of the Freedman commission report. Yet despite the fact that for four years we have been told that this legislation was going to be amended and despite the fact that the Freedman report has been around for two years we can still get nothing out of the minister or the government on this very important matter.

The Minister of Labour and his colleague who is now sitting with him, no doubt briefing him on a few procedural rules, go about the country making speeches. The theme of many of the Minister of Labour's speeches is positive industrial relations in the new environment. I have read many of them with interest and I suggest there is a need for positive industrial relations. There is a need for the government to get into the picture and help solve problems rather than fight battles, and I am using some of the minister's own words. One of his interesting statements was to the effect that there is a greater need for more fire prevention officers than firemen. This speech was made in Vancouver on November 7 of this year.

The minister also referred to the task force on labour relations set up by the Prime Minister and headed by Dan H. D. Woods. In the speech he made at Vancouver on November 7 the minister said he was hopeful that we would have the advantage of at least an interim report of the Woods task force within the next few months. If we are going to have any further delay in amending the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act we should at least wait until we have the benefit of the Woods report. But no, we have nothing advanced on the basis of the Freedman commission report and we have nothing proposed by the government to deal with the serious problems facing railroad telegraphers and the others I have mentioned. No attention is being paid to the suggestions that may have been made to the government by the Woods commission. Instead, we have this piece of legislation today. This is something that the Minister of Labour did not make clear, but it has been made clear by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Therefore, I join with those who have said it is unfortunate this legislation is before us at this time. If it were to carry in its present form, far from doing the things the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and others hoped it might do I suggest it would make the job of the Canada Labour Relations Board impossible, and the reasonably satisfactory job of certification the board has done would become impossible. The net result of all these changes will not be good and will be inimical to labour relations in this country.

For these reasons I am glad the Minister of Labour has made it clear that instead of proceeding with second reading of this bill at the present time the subject matter will be referred to the committee on labour and employment where I hope we will be able to do a real job on it.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I think this is an appropriate time for me to rise, because it is obvious from what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said that the intention of his segment of the opposition is to use the fact that the bill may be sent to the committee as an excuse to defeat this legislation. Obviously the purpose of that part of the opposition is to destroy the bill. If that is the intention let me remind hon. members that I made it clear this afternoon that this matter could be dealt with in another way. What I said in answer to the hon. member for Halifax was that I hoped this bill would be referred to the committee at the earliest possible moment. In answer to a further question by the hon. member, who asked if the bill would be referred to the committee before or after second reading, recalling what had happened on an earlier occasion when a bill in which I was interested came before the house and was referred for clause by clause discussion to a committee of the house rather than to committee of the whole, I expressed the hope that in this case we would follow such a course. If the hon. member has in mind that by following this course he is going to destroy a bill that the government thinks is urgently needed at this time I can only say that his hope will not materialize, and the sooner that fact is understood or appreciated, the better.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, will the minister explain what he means? I am a little slow catching some of these nuances.

Mr. Nicholson: For the benefit of the Leader of the Opposition may I say that on an occasion a year or so ago—

Mr. Stanfield: No, Mr. Chairman. My question is, what does the minister propose to do now?

Mr. Nicholson: When the bill comes up for second reading the subject matter will be dealt with in the light of the observations made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre this afternoon.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, do I understand that the minister, using his own method of interpreting my speech, is withdrawing the clear commitment that he gave to this committee?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Stanfield: Certainly he is.

Mr. Marchand: No, that is not what he said.

Mr. Nicholson: There are a few comments that I feel I should make before this resolution is put to a vote. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, commenting on alleged differences in the remarks made by my colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and myself, picked certain statements out of context. I would like to make it clear that when I was dealing with the motion I dealt with all four aspects that are covered in the motion. I referred to clarification of the powers of the board, and I gave an indication of why changes might be needed. I then referred to the history of the board and said there were three votes to one when it came to certain votes within the board. Without questioning the integrity of individual members of the board the fact that I mentioned there were three votes to one is an indication that the government feels that in the opinion of some people at least justice must not only be done but it must appear to be done, and when you get three votes to one this question is bound to arise in the minds of some people.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration dealt with one aspect only; I dealt with all four aspects of the matter. I dealt with the necessity for clarification and the desirability of appointing an additional vice chairman. I will be perfectly frank and say that one reason I think this should be done is that perhaps 35 or 40 per cent of the applications that come before the board are from French speaking parts of Canada, and neither the chairman nor the vice chairman speak French. Let us be frank, realize this, and agree that in fairness we should have a second, a bilingual, vice chairman so that at least one of the three senior officers of the board has a knowledge of our second language.

Mr. Lewis: No one objected to the second vice-chairman.

Mr. Nicholson: I did not go into detail in this respect because I said the appropriate place to go into it in detail was in committee when the bill was before it. I dealt with the advisability and desirability of having panels. Panels work well in other tribunals and there is no reason why they should not work here. The work of the board has, as I have already mentioned, increased by about 40 per cent, and having regard also to the changes that have taken place in industrialization in Canada there are good reasons why one panel of the board might not necessarily sit in Vancouver and another in the maritimes or the prairies of western Canada. There is no reason why the whole board should be taken out to these areas when it could sit as a panel, for example, where there is one matter of special interest to workers in the province of Quebec. We do not need the whole board to deal with that question. A panel could deal with the particular problem and another panel could be dealing with a matter of greater or lesser importance in another part of Canada.

The board is comprised of very busy men. It is true they usually sit for only two or three days each month. But they are busy executives as well as labour leaders. If they are to devote more and more time to the work of the board we are not likely to obtain the same calibre of men as we have had on the board. There is an advantage in having them sit in panels as do our courts. No one suggests that we do not get, from any one of the two or three divisions of the court of appeal of the province of Ontario or any one of the two or three divisions of the court of appeal of the province of British Columbia, the same justice as if the full court was sitting. There is an appeal from these courts to the Supreme Court of Canada. They frequently sit in divisions or panels to take care of situations that arise in different areas.

Nobody is trying to suggest for one moment, and certainly the Minister of Labour is not trying to do so, that one of the difficulties we are attempting to overcome in this legislation is not to make sure that not only will justice be done when the board decides something but that it shall appear to be done. That is one of the basic questions at issue today.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, would the minister permit me to ask him a question arising out of his discussion of justice being done and the matter of balance? For the information of the committee, could the minister inform us from what sources the present employer members were appointed?

Mr. Nicholson: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I believe the views of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce are sought. Usually they nominate one member. The views of the Canadian Manufacturers Association are also sought. They nominate a member. The views of the railways are taken into consideration and they nominate a member, although the railway employer representative has been on the board since 1944, I think, when it was originally constituted as the wartime labour relations board. There has never been any change there. He is getting on in years but is still doing pretty effective work, I believe. He is over 80 years of age. There has been no change in that representation for 24 or perhaps 25 years.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I want to make it perfectly clear at the outset that I am not opposing the passing of the resolution and as far as I know none of my associates are opposing its passage. But I must say to my old friend the Minister of Labour—and anything I say, of course, does not reflect on him—in any personal sense—that I am appalled at what I have seen here this afternoon. The minister gave an assurance as to what the procedure would be, that the bill would be referred to committee after first reading. I do not think there is any question at all as to what the assurance was. One could not help but notice certain conferences taking place after the assurance was given, and now the minister has withdrawn that assurance.

I can only say in a spirit of friendliness to my hon. friends opposite that this sort of behaviour, this giving of assurances and then failing to carry them through, is of course one of the principal reasons why there are few people in the country who have any confidence in my hon. friends opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: When they give an assurance to the committee they should carry it through. As far as I am concerned, all this has nothing to do with the merits of the resolution and I do not propose, as I say, to vote against it because of the withdrawal by the minister of an assurance he gave to the committee.

• (5:30 p.m.)

As I said to the minister in all seriousness through you, Mr. Chairman, the minister, having made this statement to the committee, should stand by it. It was right of him to have made it in the first place, but now he should stick to his guns. Such action would reflect more credit upon his associates and himself rather than for him to waffle because some of his colleagues have spoken to him and have advised him against this move.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I should simply like to draw attention to the actual words I used which were: "It would be my hope that it would be done before second reading."

Mr. MacEachen: I think the comments of the Leader of the Opposition require some clarification. To describe the statement made by the Minister of Labour as an assurance is going a bit far. The minister stated that it would be his hope to send the bill to a committee right away, and it is obvious that by "right away" he meant before second reading.

There are only two motions that can be moved. One is for the minister to say: "I move that bill X be referred to the committee", which under standing order 77 would be ruled out of order immediately, and the second motion would be to move that the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be sent to a committee. We know that this has been done on several occasions, but it has been done in a spirit of co-operation when members of the house were more interested in studying the clauses of the bill than in destroying it. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggests we should refer the bill to the committee where it will be torn up and destroyed. My hon. friend then complains when the government refuses to do so.

Mr. Knowles: That is not what I said.

Mr. Lewis: He suggested the government should be persuaded to bring in a new bill.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, so that it could be destroyed in the committee and another bill brought in with different purposes. I think it is going a bit far to suggest that the minister should move that the bill go to a committee before second reading when notice has been served by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the purpose of the exercise is to destroy the bill.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether, as leader of the house, he is not perfectly aware that he did not enumerate all the alternatives available to the Minister of Labour and to the government? It is perfectly possible for the government to give notice of a motion that the standing committee have referred to it the subject matter of a bill. This would not destroy the bill but would refer its subject matter to the committee, and its place on the order paper would not be affected. The minister carefully omitted that well understood and frequently used device by which the subject matter of a bill is in fact referred to a committee without there being any necessity for the formal motion that the bill be not now read a second time or any other formal proceeding which would delay or prejudice the bill in any way whatever. The simple course available to the government is to support the undertaking of the minister without prejudicing the progress of the bill through the house.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, we have not opposed sending the bill to a committee. The minister is proposing the reference of the bill to a standing comittee after second reading in the house. What is not being agreed to, and I think we should be clear about it, is the reference of the subject matter to a committee before second reading when it is the clear intention of at least one group in the house to destroy the bill. The only course which the government would have open to it subsequent to delaying tactics in the committee would be to start afresh. My hon. friend has suggested another procedure. Quite frankly I would be happy to consider if if he would give us one or two precedents.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I suggest it is monstrous for any minister to suggest that merely because two speeches have been made by members of the New Democratic party—and I will not deal with the merits of those speeches—the government will withdraw the clear and specific commitment made by the Minister of Labour. There is no question that it was made. Further, I want to leave this thought with the Minister of National Health and Welfare who has suggested two alternatives. I say to him there is a third alternative, namely that with unanimous consent it is possible to sent the bill to a committee for consideration without prejudicing its place on the order paper. I am quite sure from what has been said that the members on this side would be agreeable to doing this if the minister were prepared to go ahead with his original commitment to refer the bill to the committee before second reading.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a few words to this interesting debate.

because it was I who raised the question originally. There was not only one exchange involving the Minister of Labour but two. The first one has already been referred to, but I should like to point out that at least twice during his speech, to which the Minister of Labour was listening very attentively, for Ontario made the following points. First of all, immediately after my exchange with the minister the hon. member for Ontario said: "Mr. Chairman, in view of what the minister has said"—that the house would not be asked to approve the principle on second reading but that every opportunity would be given for representations to be made in committee—"I certainly do not intend to take up too much time at this stage."

May I also say parenthetically that a great many members of the party to which I belong at that point decided to refrain from making representations and to let the hon. member for Ontario speak for us inasmuch as we would have the opportunity to discuss the bill in committee. The Minister of Labour did not rise to speak when the hon. member for Ontario made that point and he did not object to it. Later in the same speech—

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, is the hon. member reading from a document which is available to members of the house?

Mr. McCleave: I am reading from the running copy of Hansard which I have temporarily purloined from a privy councillor.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, is it the practice of the house to allow members to make use of the blues? If that is to be the procedure in the house, may we all have copies of the blues so that we can follow the text?

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member will have the blues soon enough.

The Deputy Chairman: I am informed that it has not been the practice of the house for members to read from the blues, which are not an official document. Since I did not object when the minister did so perhaps the hon. member should also be allowed to do so so that both sides can be heard.

Mr. Lewis: I suggest that the hon. member for Halifax should refer to what was said from memory.

Mr. McCleave: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I do not quarrel with the decision of the Chair but I have had a chance to refresh my memory. The second time that the hon. member for Ontario made the point to the Minister of Labour he said, and I recall his words very well, that he had agreed to refer the bill to follow this resolution to a committee before second reading. He said, as I recall his words: The minister has agreed to send the bill to follow this resolution to the committee before second reading. Twice the hon. member for Ontario used the phrase "before second reading". I raised the question twice and used the words, "before second reading".

• (5:40 p.m.)

Then there was an exchange involving the hon. member for York South who referred to all the friendly arm twisting that was going on involving the Minister of Labour and his colleague the house leader as well as the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. An attempt was made to change the meaning even though the Minister of Labour said that he had followed exactly this course on a previous occasion and he did not see why he could not do so now. It is a shame the blues are not distributed to every member in the house because the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra would have to eat his words. We were told one thing this afternoon, and now they turn around and deny what they told us.

Mr. MacEachen: Tomorrow we will all have an opportunity of reading Hansard and checking more carefully our recollections of what was stated. I have stated, as the Minister of Labour has done, the reason for not sending this bill to a committee before second reading. I base my conclusion upon two lines of action. The hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Peace River have stated it is possible to move a motion that will allow this to happen, namely, that the bill may go to a committee before second reading without the bill losing its position on the order paper. This suggestion is worthy of consideration and will be considered. We cannot consider any of these devices until the order for second reading is called.

It has to be made quite clear, Mr. Chairman, that the government, as the minister stated, is ready to have this bill go before a standing committee after second reading. There is a debate on whether it should happen before or after second reading and there is a very important principle involved, as has been declared by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. As far as we are concerned we are prepared to have this bill go before a committee. If hon. members can bring forward a method that will retain the position of the bill on the order paper, then we will consider even taking the other course.

However, we are not going to put ourselves in the position, through some procedural device, of carrying out the declared objective of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which is to destroy this bill. He is entitled to do that and he has so declared. We are entitled also to protect an important piece of government legislation.

Mr. Nicholson: If my memory serves me right, on the earlier occasion that I referred to when certain other legislation came up I cannot say whether it was done by unanimous consent but the resolution did not lose its place on the order paper. I can assure you of that. What has disturbed me is the alarming declaration by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that he and his group are determined to destroy this bill. If that is his purpose, then that certainly was not in line with the pious hope I expressed earlier today.

Mr. Stanfield: One of the troubles with this government is that when anything happens to alarm them they change their minds and their positions.

Mr. Knowles: Like most members of the House of Commons—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the way the old leader carried on.

Mr. Ricard: It was effective in 1958.

Mr. Knowles: There are mutterings coming from the Secretary of State for External Affairs which I cannot hear but I am sure they are interesting. As I was saying, like most members of the House of Commons I like to think I carry some weight around here. I did not know I carried so much that I could scare the government away from a position in half an hour.

Mr. Churchill: If you can scare them they are in bad shape.

Mr. Knowles: I hope the remark of my neighbour, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, reached the record. He said that if I could scare the government they are in bad shape. Apparently I have, and they are. Let a couple of statements be clear. The Minister of National Health and Welfare tried to tell us two or three times what the Minister of Labour said. He even read from the blues, which is not permitted. I do not have any blues so I will not read from them.

An hon. Member: You are in the blues.

Mr. Knowles: I have not even seen the blues. The Minister of National Health and Welfare tells us that the Minister of Labour said he hoped the matter would go to committee as soon as possible. He stops with the word "hoped". Most of us were here and we heard the exchanges that took place. When the minister was asked by the hon. member for Halifax whether he was willing for it to go before or after, he said before. Several times during exchanges with the hon. member for Ontario the minister said, yes, before. On one occasion when he was put into a bit of a corner he said, the subject matter. Well, that is clear; the two things mean the same thing, sending the bill before second reading or sending the subject matter of the bill. It means sending the bill or its subject matter to a committee before the bill has had approval in principle on second reading.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that when we see Hansard tomorrow it will be very clear that the Minister of Labour made a commitment to this committee that the bill would be sent before we had the debate on second reading. Now, for the Minister of Labour to say that commitment is altered because of one speech of mine—boy, I am going to buy copies of Hansard for today and send them all over the country. One speech, and I have altered the position of the government. I hope I can do that tomorrow on something else.

An hon. Member: Stanley for leader.

Mr. Knowles: Pas encore.

An hon. Member: Jamais.

Mr. Knowles: Jamais, oui. The Minister of Labour likes to quote the sentence in which I said I was against this bill and if we got it in committee we would tear it up. He suggests that I stopped there, but I did not stop there. I still believe that this bill, as the minister has outlined it to us, should be torn up and that it should be replaced by a better bill that would deal with the problems that are posed by the minister as well as by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. We should have a bill that deals with the important and pressing problems which I outlined a few minutes ago. To suggest, however, that because I want to get the bill drastically altered in committee the government has a right to go back on its commitment to the committee of the whole is another subterfuge and, as the Leader of the Opposition says, is another example of the reason the Canadian people do not have confidence in this government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the position of the government was clear when the Minister of Labour stated it. He repeated it three or four times. I suggest that commitment should be carried through and that this bill, before second reading, must go to a committee so the committee can produce a much better bill than the one which has been proposed this afternoon.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I am going to let the house leader in on a little secret. I watched him skittering around from seat to seat at the end of the speech delivered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stated that when we got the bill in committee we would do a job on it. The Minister of Labour interpreted these remarks to mean we were going to do a hatchet job on it, which may or may not be the case. As most hon. members know, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been the whip of our party for quite a while. Traditionally, of course, the whip is a person of whom we stand in awe. I should like to let the Minister of National Health and Welfare know despite this I am apparently not as much afraid of him as is the minister.

I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has in part at least, put in perspective what he said, if the minister will consider the full context of his speech rather than simply the last few sentences. He dealt with what we in this party often view as a vacuum in a piece of government legislation. The minister will recall that the hon. member dwelt at some length on the fact that there was no suggestion that any of the principles of the Freedman commission report would be included in the bill.

I share his disappointment that in respect of matters that are really important to the working people of this country the proposal in the resolution, as we understand it, is so barren. I am sure that this disappointment is shared by all members of the New Democratic party in this house. I do not think the Minister of Labour should construe the closing remarks of the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as meaning that the members of this party are not prepared to give fair examination to the proposals in the bill when we see it, because this we always seek to do. When we express reservations, as did the hon. member for Greenwood, about the advisability of there being an appeal division, we do not necessarily mean we oppose the idea of a second vice chairman.

Anyone who has been in this house for a little while and has observed what has been happening understands perfectly well the situation we are in. Apparently the practical suggestion of the Minister of Labour caught certain of his colleagues a little off base. It seems to me that the house leader became somewhat confused by the haze created by the smoke from the fiery speech made by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and really did not keep in perspective what has been happening on this side of the house.

I was about to say that I hope the house leader will sober up but I will say "sober down" because this conveys the sense of my meaning a little more accurately. I hope he will not seek to circumvent the statement that we clearly understood the Minister of Labour to make as to his intention. I also hope he will realize that if he does seek to do so at this stage of the proceedings it will only result in needless misunderstanding when we deal with very important questions in the whole field of labour relations and collective bargaining in this country, some of which are perhaps dealt with in the minister's bill but many of which, from the context of the resolution, obviously are not.

My own feeling for what it is worth is that the minister's proposal would enable the labour and employment committee to do something it has not had the opportunity to do for quite a long time, namely, to explore the many important questions surrounding collective bargaining relationships between management and employee as they affect the I.R.D. Act in a broader way than would be the case if we were to confine ourselves to a cursory consideration of the bill after second reading.

I think that the original attitude of the Minister of Labour when he made this suggestion is much more likely to bring positive results than the course he is being pressed to pursue, if I am not mistaken, by his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I hope that during the dinner recess the government house leader, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, will sort this thing out in a spirit of parliamentary co-operation, somewhat in the vein suggested in an earlier speech by the new leader of the official opposition. As a result the committee would be able to approach examination of what is contained in the minister's bill not without differences of view but in a proper parliamentary spirit, at the same time enabling the members of the committee and perhaps some of the representatives who may appear before it to put forward their views in a broader context than might otherwise be the case if we dealt with the matter as the house leader seems to desire, purely within the narrow context of what will appear in the bill after second reading.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Nicholson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-186, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), Immigration, British Columbia—non-participation in refugee settlement plan; the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Keays), Canadian National Railways—transportation of live chicks—lower St. Lawrence; the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman), Post Office Department, Vancouver—employment of postal truck drivers.

Pursuant to provisional standing order 6(1) it being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

DIVORCE

MEASURE RESPECTING GROUNDS, JURISDICTION, JUDGES, ETC.

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting divorce, the grounds thereof, the jurisdiction of the courts, and for the appointment of certain persons qualified to sit and act as judges and for their remuneration while so acting and for certain other provisions in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, for a long time divorce has rightly been a matter for concern to the Canadian people.

We felt duty bound, as a government, to reform divorce laws, to try and bring them more in line with the present social climate, without, for all that, runnng against the demands which are normal and worthy of respect of those who have reticences on that subject.

In trying to draft the present bill we met with two types of difficulties. The first, Mr. Chairman, is related to the field of federal-provincial relations and the second were mainly connected with the matter of conscience troubling a number of Canadians who expressed their views either through the various Churches or outside of them. Those Canadians are anxious, just as I am, to modernize the divorce laws of our society, while complying, at the same time, with that basic requirement that the present government considers essential, namely the necessity of surrounding the family with maximum protection.

With regard to the problems of the first group we proceeded as follows. Starting from the fact that under the Canadian constitution, divorce and marriage fall clearly and squarely within the jurisdiction of the central government we decided against shirking our responsibilities and we drew up an act dealing with the divorce problem, attaching to the solution of that problem measures of a corollary nature, that is which cannot be separated from the effects of a broken marriage as such.

We did so, Mr. Chairman, respecting as much as possible the current traditions and laws in the various provinces. The province of Quebec is known to have, in the field of marriage, a certain number of laws contained mainly in the Civil Code and forming part of the traditions in that province; it was essential that they should be respected.

But it should be remembered that other provinces too have had for a very long time their practices and their courts which, in the field of divorce had adopted certain procedures to which we wanted to bring some degree of uniformity while bringing them up to date.

In regard to the second roup of problems, dealing with those I have included under the heading of problems of conscience and problems often referred to by religious organizations and by the churches, we have done two things. We have introduced in our legislation which Parliament will have the opportunity to see in a moment, special sections requiring the Court and the lawyers themselves to seek to reconcile the parties.

And we have also introduced in our legislation the concept of "the marriage breakdown" which is a concept that the churches themselves, in their joint briefs, have recommended.

This means, Mr. Chairman, that in this bill, we are taking into account, not only of the social problems which had to be solved but of the spiritual and moral problems and of the constitutional and legal problems.

[English]

This bill, Mr. Chairman, represents an attempt to codify and extend the present laws of divorce applied in Canada along the lines recommended in the final report of the special joint committee on divorce dated June 27 last. That report contains some 21 recommendations respecting the subject of divorce and related matters. The bill adopts many of these recommendations, some of them in a modified form. In certain instances, the recommendations of the joint committee have not been adopted and with regard to other matters a somewhat different approach has been followed. We shall, of course, be considering these matters in more detail at later stages.

Speaking in more specific terms, I should say something about the grounds for divorce as contained in the bill. Hon. members will be aware that there has been a good deal of debate in recent times respecting the desirability of one comprehensive ground for divorce, namely marriage breakdown. My colleagues and I are aware that views to this effect are widely held by well-meaning people in this country, and indeed many of the Christian churches have advocated this approach.

While recognizing that this viewpoint has much to commend it, the bill has not been prepared on this basis, but retains the traditional marital offences as grounds for divorce, and includes as well a modified concept of marriage breakdown as a new ground for divorce. In so far as we are concerned with grounds for divorce, the bill can be fairly described as a composite one, recognising both marital offences and marriage breakdown. In this respect, the conclusions of the joint committee that breakdown could not constitute the sole and comprehensive ground for divorce, have been adopted.

The new marriage breakdown principle contained in this bill, since it is to be administered by the existing courts in accordance with our well established judicial traditions, shies away from the vesting of any broad, undefined and uncontrolled discretion in the courts, in favour of a definition of legal rights by parliament. The result is that, the so-called inquest approach to divorce is rejected in favour of the customary judicial approach by which marriage breakdown will be established by evidence or proof of the existence of specified matrimonial situations.

For these reasons the government considers it desirable to maintain the administration of the divorce laws in the established courts of this country, to be administered pursuant to the rules or principles of law laid down by parliament, rather than invest a broad and uncontrolled administrative discretion in some new courts or tribunals.

Notwithstanding that hon. members will find that the grounds for divorce are being substantially extended by the bill, they will find that the bill is not simply or merely a divorce bill in the traditional sense. It is also a reconciliation bill, in that it imposes stated duties on both the legal profession and the courts in relation to the matter of reconciliation, and these provisions have been included in the hope that as many as possible of the broken marriages that come before the legal profession and the courts can be saved.

The government is fully conscious of the important public interest that exists in our society in relation to the maintenance and continuation of marriage and the family unit, where this is possible. The salvaging of marriages is at least as important as the burying of dead marriages that cannot be salvaged. However, a bill directed to the subject of divorce is not necessarily the most appropriate or only vehicle that can be employed to strengthen and give substance to the marriage estate. The government recognizes that financial assistance and encouragement may well be necessary to develop adequate counselling and other agencies that are necessary to deal with faltering or broken marriages, and it is the intention of the government to keep this most important matter under continuous review.

The bill also contains provisions dealing with the law of domicile in so far as the existing law on this subject affects the position of married women in our society. An attempt has been made to place the married woman in a position equivalent to that of her husband for the purpose of obtaining a valid decree of divorce both within Canada and abroad.

No comprehensive bill on the subject of divorce would be complete without provisions for alimony, or pension alimentaire as the civil code of Quebec puts it, and for maintenance and the custody, care and upbringing of children. The bill therefore contains provisions dealing with these matters as corollary relief to petitions for divorce. Alimony, maintenance and custody orders made under the provisions of the statute will be enforceable by law throughout the whole of Canada upon being registered in the superior courts of this country.

The bill also contains provisions that will have the effect of abolishing parliamentary divorce, as we now understand it. In this regard we have departed a little bit from the report of the joint committee, but I think it is a step that this parliament is prepared to take. Therefore the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act is to be repealed and divorce jurisdiction in respect of the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland will be vested, at least temporarily, in a new divorce division of the Exchequer Court of Canada.

I mention that this jurisdiction might be temporary because the bill also contains a provision which will enable the jurisdiction to be transferred from the Exchequer Court to the Superior Court of Quebec and to the Supreme Court of Newfoundland by a proclamation issued by the governor in council on the respective recommendations of the lieutenant governors in council of those provinces. The idea is not to force upon any province a mode of procedure in the courts that it is not prepared to attain, but to suggest that, when these provinces are ready, we are ready, and that in the meantime we take out of parliament this outmoded way of proceeding, whereby divorces for two provinces had to be dealt with by one of the houses of parliament.

Consequential amendments are therefore proposed to the Exchequer Court Act. These amendments will establish a divorce division of that court, with special provision being made so that any person who holds, or who has held office as a judge of a superior or county court, may by special request sit and act as a judge of the divorce division. A special provision for the remuneration of such persons has been included to assure the judicial independence of such persons at all times. I am sure hon. members will realize that this is the reason we are proceeding now by way of resolution rather than by introducing a bill right away.

The bill will also contain detailed appeal provisions and a number of other matters that do not need to be discussed at this stage. However, it should be mentioned that there is a clause in the bill which will prevent it from coming into force for at least three months after it has been assented to. This provision has been inserted to permit the holding of such discussions or conferences as may be necessary to facilitate implementation of the new laws throughout the country.

[Translation]

I should like to mention here, Mr. Chairman, that such period of consultation should also allow the federal government and the provinces to discuss an extremely important other problem, that of judicial separation.

Hon. members will see that in this bill, we have dealt with divorce only; the problem of judicial separation has been, for the time being, I hope, temporarily set aside. Hon. members will readily realize the reason why we have chosen to proceed in this way. If we had included the matter of judicial separation in this bill, as it would have been easy to do when drafting this legislation, this bill would have raised very complicated problems of implementation in a number of provinces.

I do not refer here, Mr. Chairman, to constitutional problems because, although the matter is debatable, we feel that the judicial separation comes under federal jurisdiction, since it falls readily—

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Would the minister permit a question at this stage? Would he be prepared to say at this time whether or not the government has adopted as being valid the opinion given by E. A. Driedger who, in response to a request from the committee, furnished a legal opinion dealing with matters which are ancillary or related to the problem of marriage and divorce? The minister's answer might be helpful in discussing this matter at other stages.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Trudeau: As the hon. member knows, this question of judicial separation is one which draws different opinions from different constitutional authorities. For my part, I am on the side of the opinion which was alluded to by the hon. member; but as the hon. member knows, there are courts in this country which have decided otherwise—not the Supreme Court, but there are provincial courts which have decided otherwise.

Although I do not think that is binding on the government, the argument I was explaining in French, in order to justify not including that part of the provisions in this bill now are arguments of a pragmatic nature.

The provinces have procedures now for judicial separation—that is, most of them do. Even the province of Ontario, which has no law in that regard, has the possibility of solving by contract the problems arising from separation. To implement a bill which would include judicial separation at this time could have meant a very long and justifiable series of consultations with the various provinces. In my estimation that would have meant that such a bill could not be adopted as quickly as I hope this parliament is ready to adopt this present bill. It was my hope that, by dealing strictly with the matter of divorce in the bill, we would be able to get it through the house fairly soon with the co-operation of hon. members, that we would have this law on our statutes, and that we would then, as we negotiate with the provinces the applicability of the law and the change in the court set-up which it will entail in some provinces, tackle the problem of judicial separation, which is a much more difficult problem in pragmatic terms.

I am not talking of the constitutional argument now, but rather in terms of the different kinds of laws or practices which apply in different provinces. It has always been recognized that divorce is strictly a federal matter but, as the hon. member realizes, the question of judicial separation is one which is debated. I have made up my own mind, but the Supreme Court of this Country has never declared what the law in this regard is, in the final analysis. It is normal in an area like this that there would be provincial legislation in some cases, because they had the law prior to the B.N.A. Act, and these laws continued after confederation. For this reason we thought it more proper to approach the second problem, that of judicial separation, by consultation. The civil code of Quebec now deals with the matter of judicial separation. However, as hon. members will remember, the civil code of Quebec dates back to 1866, one year before confederation. Had we adopted anything without going through this type of consultation in respect of judicial separation, we would have been changing part of the civil code of the province of Quebec.

As I say, we could do this constitutionally, but this is not the kind of thing we should like to do without a great deal of prior consultation, especially due to the fact that the province of Quebec now is in the process of redrafting its civil code and the chapters on marriage. This type of argument is also true in respect of some of the other provinces which have varying provincial laws on matters of maintenance, the consequences of a judicial separation, and so on.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, that is why we have thought it simpler, in this bill, to deal only with divorce proper and its immediate aftermath. This three month period, following the enactment of the bill, shall be used not only to consult with the provinces, but also to discuss the extremely important matter of legal separation.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, in just a few words I should like to indicate that we on this side of the chamber approve of reforming the divorce law, and consequently look forward to receiving the bill and examining it in detail. I do not propose to make any comment upon what the minister has indicated will be contained in the bill because, since the bill is already drafted, obviously anything I said would not in any event affect the measure as introduced. So, I should like to say simply that we will approve of the resolution and look forward to seeing the bill.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I should like my first words on this matter to be those of relief and pleasure at being in this house when, at long last, a measure of reform of our divorce law is to be brought before the house. I should like to congratulate the minister on having the honour to be the one who is introducing this legislation.

The archaic divorce laws we have had have caused untold misery to many thousands of Canadians. This measure of reform is long overdue. As the minister pointed out, parliament has had jurisdiction over this matter for over 100 years and yet has never boldly exercised it in any way. It has legislated in a piecemeal way, usually merely by introducing the existing laws of England at particular stages of our history.

Mr. Chairman, not having seen the bill, I do not think at this stage it would be appropriate for me to enlarge on this matter at any length or comment at any length on what the minister has said. I think perhaps it is a truism, although one which I think ought to be said, that, notwithstanding the pessimists, marriage is thriving in Canada, fortunately very many Canadians find in the marriages and families a very great source of happiness. All of us must be concerned that we do not do anything to undermine or defeat the institution of marriage.

I believe we also must recognize that, despite any individual views of our own, none of us has any right to impose on others views which no longer are socially acceptable. One thing on which most, if not all, of us will agree is that the present law is entirely unsatisfactory. The single ground of adultery is a superficial and inadequate ground. It leads not only to the commission of the offence but also to fabrication and perjury which are a disgrace to the courts. There is also the problem of those persons who, finding marriage unacceptable or impossible, form common law unions, stable unions which can never be normal unions so long as divorce is what it is at the present time. There is the problem of children of such unions.

The minister has said that by and large the report of the joint committee, on which I happened to be a member, will be largely accepted. I cannot refrain, however, from expressing a measure of regret that the legislation is not accepting the clearcut choice which exists between the two basic theories in respect of the dissolution of marriage. One is that the grounds of matrimonial misconduct upon which divorce can be based should be enlarged. The other is that the dissolution of marriage should be based upon the declaration that the marriage is dead; that is, that the marriage has broken down, and that there exists no longer any hope of reconciliation.

This is not divorce by consent; it is divorce by judicial decision. The mind of the judge would be directed to the question of whether there is hope of reconciliation, and not to the hopeless and futile exercise of deciding whose misconduct was responsible for the breakdown of the marriage. We would have much preferred to see the government accept the recommendation made initially by the United Church and concurred in by many other churches. This is the recommendation that breakdown be the sole ground for dissolution of marriage. When I say "we" I am not of course speaking for my own party; I am speaking for some of us who were members of the committee, who looked into this matter and heard the representations which were presented. The reasons for stressing breakdown are many. I will not enlarge on them here. I feel, under the compromise choice that the government apparently has adopted, that lawyers will still advise their clients to go on the simple ground of matrimonial misconduct and that we will still be back to the same old questions.

Mr. Trudeau: Would the hon. member permit a question. As a lawyer, does he not think it is preferable that parliament should indicate to the courts the grounds which the lawmakers themselves feel indicative of a breakdown, rather than leave to the court the administrative freedom to make this kind of decision; is there not a question of legal propriety involved in this?

Mr. Brewin: I think not. I believe the courts are perfectly competent to determine whether the marriage is in fact dead, for the many different reasons which may have resulted in this unhappy outcome. I think once you specify grounds you limit the grounds. Once the marriage has broken down, then I suggest the marriage is dead and it is the duty of the court to dissolve it.

Let me suggest that the basic ground involved in the breakdown of a marriage should be the finding of a court that there is no hope of reconciliation. The causes for that situation may be very many, including adultery, cruelty, desertion or a hundred and one other things. Once this fact, the fact of breakdown has been established, whatever the reason may be, then the court should be empowered to take action on that finding.

It is my personal belief that the courts can determine this question just as well as they determine today whether a mother or father under certain circumstances will make the best and most responsible individual to raise the children. This is a very general question, but I believe the courts can determine it, and should have assistance from social workers and others who have studied the background of the marriage in question.

Mr. Trudeau: Could I ask the hon. member another question? If our bill included the marriage breakdown concept would the hon. member see any objection to keeping also the other concept of marital offence?

Mr. Brewin: Yes. I wish I had time to go into this at length, and perhaps on second reading I shall attempt to do so. I recommend that the minister should look again, as perhaps he has already done, at the very excellent survey of this whole subject called "Putting Asunder", which is a report made by a committee appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury. That committee comprised a number of judges, sociologists, lawyers, groups of doctors and other people who, having had a law which enlarged the grounds for matrimonial misconduct on which divorce was based since 1937, came to the conclusion after careful study that this is not the best approach, but that the best approach was based on the principle of marriage breakdown, the other things being symptoms rather than causes.

Mr. Allmand: May I ask the hon. member a question? If we accept the marriage breakdown concept, is the hon. member not afraid that different judges in different parts of the country will devise their own philosophy of marriage breakdown with the result that in some jurisdictions it will be easier to obtain a divorce than in others, because in some areas there will be more liberal minded judges?

Mr. Brewin: I am not quite sure whether the hon. member is a lawyer, but if he is he will know that of course the personalities of judges differ. But there are rights of appeal, and jurisprudence can be developed on this subject just as well as on other subjects, such as the meaning of cruelty. I take it that the act will include cruelty as one ground for divorce. This is also a vague and general provision, yet the courts have to determine what is cruelty. One judge may recognize cruelty much more easily than another. I think this is inevitable in any human judicial system. I do not think this is a good enough reason to reject the concept of marriage breakdown.

I was attempting to deal briefly with a summary of my reasons for thinking the marriage breakdown concept is the best approach. In my view, and in the view of others, this system gets away from the present requirement for sordid proof of adultery. That is my first reason. The second is that it would afford in all cases the necessity of the court seeking a reconciliation, or at least the determination that the parties cannot be reconciled. I had hoped to hear the minister say that some such provision would be included in the bill, but I cannot judge the bill until I see it. In any event, the whole concept of breakdown necessarily involves in almost every case a judicial investigation of the question of reconciliation.

Finally, this concept gets away from the false notion of a breakdown of marriage based upon matrimonial misconduct where one party blames the other, which is totally unreal I suggest in 99 out of 100 cases. The view I have expressed is not my own view or the view of a few people. It was supported before the committee by the United Church of Canada, the Anglican Church of Canada, the National Council of Women, the Canadian Mental Health Association, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canadian Comittee on the Status of Women and a number of lawyers and individuals who appeared and gave evidence. It is not in any light-hearted way that we put this suggestion forward.

I can understand that it is perhaps difficult to break away from traditions of the past, but I should like to express my regret that the government has not seen fit to accept what we believe to be the best approach, and has accepted what we consider to be the second best approach. This is not the time to go into this matter in great detail, but I should like to give the committee the definition taken by the law reform commission in England as to what a good divorce law should be. Good divorce law should seek to achieve the following objectives: to buttress rather than undermine the stability of marriage and, when regrettable the marriage has broken down, to enable the empty legal shell to be destroyed with a maximum of fairness and a minimum of bitterness, distress and humiliation.

I believe this bill will go some way in that direction, but there are improvements which can be made. It is my hope that the minister will be flexible, as I think he usually is, and will listen to suggestions that may be made at the committee stage. I understand there is to be provision in the bill for dealing with problems regarding the maintenance of a divorced spouse and children. This is as it should be and I hope there will be effective means for enforcement of any order that may be made in that respect.

We in this party and the people of Canada generally await with interest the specific wording of the bill. I have criticized the choice of the government and I will stick to that criticism. I regret that it has accepted something I think is second best. Nevertheless I should like to end as I began, by saying I think the minister shoul feel proud and honoured to be introducing in this house the first comprehensive measure on divorce reform this parliament has ever seen.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words about this bill related to our divorce laws.

If I understood the minister's remarks correctly a few minutes ago, he stated that his bill was not meant to promote divorce as such, but rather to improve the current situation in Canada.

Now, if this is the purpose of the resolution and the bill to follow, I should say immediately that I support the minister, for I, too, believe that our divorce laws may need some improvement and amendment.

However, to improve the situation in a permanent and efficient manner, the government should particularly try to eliminate or prevent the causes of misunderstanding between members of the same family. Now, I think that poverty and destitution are the main factors of disunion, which unfortunately lead too often to a separation or a divorce. Those are two of the main reasons for disunion or misunderstanding, and I think the government could eliminate those points further by adopting truly social measures.

There are other causes as well. For example, I often see heads of families forced to go quite a distance to earn a living for their families and they are therefore unable to go and see their wife and children very often.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, that is often another cause of disagreement and quarrel within large families, and I think a way might be found to prevent this. Today, heads of families are often forced to work far from home, in large as well as small towns. Moreover, the wives leave to seek outside work in order to make ends meet. Quite often, the husband and wife do not work the same hours; one works in the daytime, another at night, and sometimes vice versa. This means that sometimes they do not see each other for weeks. I think that there also social organizations should exert themselves on correcting this irregular situation.

There is a third cause which I would like to mention to the minister to-night, I mean alcoholism which is already widespread and is spreading even more, and which is a main cause of divorce, of discord. Alcoholism is spreading more and more in our country and we notice that it sows the seeds of discord in homes and entails poverty. So when the wife—sometimes it is the husband, because alcoholism is spreading more and more among women—is weary of such of life, she is prompted to request divorce.

So, I think we could almost completely eliminate the situations due to alcoholism by organizing an efficient war on this national plague. I understand that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) would find a reduction in his revenue, but I think that the whole population of Canada would gain considerably.

The best way to fight divorce is to eliminate its causes as much as possible. Obviously, there will always be some, but several can be eliminated if we work at it efficiently.

Whatever the bill the minister may introduce in the house, I hope that he will respect the sacred nature of marriage, the very basis of any society. In fact, if we go back in history we realize that the peoples, who are said to be the least civilized, attach great importance to matrimony and were respectful of it. So, we, who claim to be civilized, should be capable of bringing down the necessary legislation, effective legislation to improve the situation of our Canadian families.

[English]

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that as the Minister of Justice spoke this evening his words were accompanied by a flutter of hope across this country from all those people who have waited so long for action in this regard, the people who have written to us as members of parliament, the ones who have signed their names and the ones who have not, and the ones who have been voices in the night on telephones wondering when something was going to be done, and hanging up in the midst of the explanation that it would take quite a bit of time before something could be done. I am sure that along with hope, scepticism will come from the thought that this chamber will spend too long debating a bill which I am sure will achieve a great measure of agreement across the country.

Surely by now we can separate the moral standards that individuals or groups of people might demand of themselves from the standards that should be written into the law of a land that has become increasingly secularized. I was pleased to hear that the minister added the marriage breakdown concept to the grounds for divorce, thereby going beyond the report of the committee.

[Mr. Laprise.]

Mr. McCleave: That is not correct.

Mr. Trudeau: That is quite correct.

Mr. Johnston: I hope this chamber will not spend too much time in a contentious debate as to who is right or wrong and who has gained or lost in this regard, because surely if we pass the bill it will be given the test of time. If the grounds spelled out in legalistic terms are no longer necessary, their use would wither and the use of the marriage breakdown concept would grow; on the other hand, if it proved too contentious the reverse would be true and one would wither and the others grow.

I would add only one more thing, namely the wish that somehow we could prepare the sort of legislation that would make marriage itself a little more difficult to enter into, even as we are about to make it easier to dissolve. Surely one of our problems is that it is far too easy to enter into this most important contract, and subsequently to spend far too long trying to dissolve a contract that should never have been entered into in the first place.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, many of us have waited a good long time for this particular night. Quiet though the atmosphere be, it is a source of satisfaction to many in this chamber and many in the other place. In my own case I have been interested for a period of nine years in this subject, and I see members around who have been interested in divorce law reform much longer than I have. I know that in the other place new measures were introduced as far back as the start of the second world war, and foundered when they came over to this chamber.

I would like to compliment the Minister of Justice, a member of the swinging set, if I may say so, for bringing in the legislation. As I understand his remarks, the bill is largely based on the report of the divorce committee. The chief author of that report is our oldest parliamentarian, Hon. A. W. Roebuck, who will shortly celebrate his ninetieth birthday and who threw all his energy into about two years of intensive work to make this legislation possible.

There are five points I would like this house to consider. I am going to make a suggestion as to how we could tackle divorce reform and put it on a more systematic and less of a centennial basis than we have in the past. With regard to the question of grounds for divorce, I think the Minister of Justice said that the legislation followed pretty well the report of the divorce committee. I would appreciate it if he would indicate whether that is true or not.

Mr. Trudeau: Fairly well, but not completely.

Mr. McCleave: The minister says fairly well, but not completely. I can understand that. There are in the committee report some grounds for divorce that probably would not appeal to all hon. members or to certain members of the government. I hope that when we deal with the bill before us there will be a free vote on each of the grounds set forth in the committee report, so that the conscience of the members can be exercised in individual cases. For example, if the bill were to include divorce on the ground of illness—and I do not know if that is contained in the legislation, but it certainly was in the committee report—then I believe it would be more satisfactory if we had the opinion of some 200 members of the House of Commons with regard to that particular ground for divorce than only the opinion of the smaller group on the committee.

• (8:50 p.m.)

The hon. member for Greenwood has flogged one ground for divorce which has been pretty well kicked around during the year of committee discussion, that is the addition of a brand new approach, namely that of marriage breakdown as a specific and individual ground.

I wish to point out to the committee that this has been thoroughly touted and that the ideas of the hon. member for Greenwood, attractive though they may appear to be, have been shot down by a rather impressive commission of hard-nosed people in the United Kingdom who have examined the problem of marriage breakdown. The ideas that the hon. member put forward have also been snowed under by any group that I have heard discussing this matter in the House of Commons.

But be that as it may, whether one considers marriage breakdown as a ground for divorce, or recognizes the recommendations contained in the report, I would suggest that in examining all the possible grounds for divorce the only one that has been left out is that of people living together in conditions of extreme incompatibility. I believe that every other situation which could arise is covered first, in the committee report, where it mentions adultery, rape, sodomy, bestiality, cruelty, desertion, non support, bigamy, non-consummation; and then there is recognition that marriage breakdown can arise for five reasons, namely illness, criminality, imprisonment, alcoholism, drug addiction, desertion and separation. I suggest that possibly we were not exact enough to rescue men from marriages in which the female partner is a practising lesbian, but I think this can be cured by a simple amendment, if it is not already contained in the legislation before us.

The second point deals with the rights of women and children, and I am glad the Minister of Justice clearly indicated that these are ancillary rights which can be dealt with in divorce cases.

The third point on which I should like to comment briefly is one on which action is now being taken. The woman in this country have been at a disadvantage in the past by being tied to her husband's domicile, with the exception of the 1930 amendment regarding desertion, and it is a welcome change that this defect in the legislation is being overcome.

The fourth point is the question of court procedures. We are pleased that the Quebec and Newfoundland cases will be booted off parliament hill. The last time they were swiped they were kicked from the Senate building over to the west block and in my opinion there is no reason why they should not go into some building outside parliament hill. I share the hopes of the Minister of Justice that the Quebec and Newfoundland cases will eventually find their way into the courts of the respective provinces. I think the formula he suggests in that regard is an appropriate one. It is difficult not to support it in view of the fact that it must cost the litigants who come before us anywhere from $1,000 to $1,500 above and beyond what they would pay in the courts of other provinces if they were not living in Quebec or Newfoundland. Since there is little enough money in any marriage, if there is any money to be spread around it should go to the women and children and to the establishment of new homes. This is a step in the right direction. I hope the minister has included the hearing of cases in county courts, as I gather is the case. The committee felt that this would make it financially easier for the petitioner to have their cases heard.

Finally, the fifth point is on the reconciliation and saving of marriages. I must confess that I think the committee did not get its teeth properly into the subject. I believe action should be taken in the house with regard to the question of saving marriages. Although we must not forget that parliament cannot legislate good marriages, perhaps we can take certain steps, which suggest themselves on the basis of experience in the United States for example, to help, counsel and possibly to same marriages. My own studies in this field indicate that only 10 per cent of divorces can be warded off in this way, but when we consider that there are 8,500 divorces in the whole country and that this number is bound to double under the new legislation, even 10 per cent is a worthy objective.

Finally, I suggest to the minister that after a reasonable period of five years during which time this legislation would be in effect, judges should be consulted on how they feel the law could be strengthened. When the committee was meeting I know that any time I spoke to a judge about the divorce problem and about how it should be dealt with, I received good advice from him which I passed along to the committee. I think there should be more liaison with the judges on this matter. Further, I should like to suggest to the minister that social workers and other persons working on the matter of reconciliation should be consulted to see how effective we are in this area.

May I conclude by saying that the legislation has been a long time in coming, but I am very satisfied that it has.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Chairman, I intend to be very brief and to add only a few remarks to what has already been said on the important resolution before us. This is a historic night for thousands of Canadians, when finally the parliament of Canada is devoting itself to passing a resolution dealing with divorce reform.

Many of us on both sides of the house have worked for many years toward amending our laws on divorce. Speaking of myself, shortly after I became a member of the house I joined many others in introducing private members bills on the subject, in the hope of getting the government to take some action in this regard and to introduce divorce reform measures.

I wish to congratulate in the fullest posible terms the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons which has examined this subject, and to compliment the Minister of Justice and the government for having the courage to deal with the subject and to introduce a bill. It has always been said, certainly to me, that divorce reform was some sort of Canadian sacred cow with which politicians could not deal. I know that I have had many politicians with long experience say to me: Young man, you should not talk about divorce reform or urge that we deal with it; it will get you into nothing but trouble. I do not believe it is a sacred cow. I am delighted to learn that the Minister of Justice does not think so, and has had the courage to present a resolution covering a very comprehensive divorce reform measure.

In the past, of course, this government has attacked a number of other things that have been regarded by Canadian politicians as sacred cows, things with which governments should not deal. I refer to the flag, the anthem and many other subjects. I am delighted to learn that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice are prepared to tackle controversial subjects which it was always thought governments would be well advised to leave alone. All of us who have had any dealings with divorce, either as lawyers, members of parliament or members of a committee, know the tremendous heartaches, hardships and suffering which result from our present stupid and antiquated divorce laws.

We have in British Columbia, the province from which I come, a divorce act which came into force on November 18, 1857. In my view it is one of the greatest centennial presents we could give to the people of Canada when, 110 years later, this parliament is finally bringing into force a new divorce act. As I say, we have been dealing with a divorce act in British Columbia, and in most of Canada, that is 110 years old. I know there are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who will express their thanks to the Minister of Justice and to this parliament for finally getting around to dealing with this subject of divorce reform. There are many Canadians, I believe, who feel that what takes place in this chamber is quite removed from the ordinary problems of life, and that parliament is sometimes rather remote from the ordinary difficulties many people have. I believe that in this measure we are debating tonight we are showing the Canadian people that we, as individual members of parliament, are concerned with the problems which affect ordinary people, such as deserted wives and uncared for children.

As I say, I should like in a very few minutes to record my appreciation to the government and the minister for introducing this measure. We are of course discussing a resolution which precedes a bill, and should not deal with the details of the bill which will follow. I only hope the bill will receive speedy passage through this house, so the people who are suffering under our present divorce laws will be able to receive some relief under the new act.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate parliament on the step being taken tonight. During the last ten years we have sat in this house for many hours discussing the problem of divorce. I think we have raised this problem, from the point where divorce was a dirty word which no one would use to the point where the situation became so bad that all the news media in the country were pointing out to members of parliament that we were many years behind the times, and the need for reform was urgent. Reform was acceptable to the people but members of parliament were still dragging their feet.

There were many members of parliament who participated in the divorce blockade a number of years ago. I think of the hon. member for Halifax who spoke a few minutes ago, who took one side, and I took the other. I believe this controversy brought about the acceptance by parliament of the fact that the problem should have been solved many years before. I can remember a prime minister one night almost getting down on bended knee and talking about the 1500 people who were involved in divorce bills. He said the fact we were holding up these divorces might mean many children would be born out of wedlock. Well, Mr. Chairman, I think the government has finally decided to do something for these people. They have decided to take a look at the neglect that has occurred in the field of social legislation for many years, and which has produced hardship for many people.

Let me say that on many occasions the hon. member for Skeena and I wondered whether or not we were right in taking advantage of the very unusual circumstances which allowed us to hold up these divorce bills, in the hope that eventually parliament would reach the conclusion something had to be done about the situation. I am happy to have been able to be in this parliament when the government finally decided to introduce this measure. I certainly appreciate the things that have been done by many people over the years. I am thinking of people in the news media who wrote articles and who appeared on television interviews to discuss this controversial problem. Eventually every person in the country obtained sufficient knowledge to enable him to decide whether or not to support our archaic social laws, or whether they should be changed.

I am proud also that the present Minister of Justice has continued a concession made by a former minister of justice. It was the late justice minister Favreau who introduced the first change by establishing procedures for divorce in the Exchequer Court, rather than the parliamentary procedure, thus making possible the end of the blockade. This course had been advocated many years before by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who has always been impressed with the idea of having the Exchequer Court as the divorce court for those provinces that did not have divorce courts.

Mr. Chairman, we are delighted with this resolution; but we should also speak about the other social problems we must face. I am thinking of the discussions that took place during those years when we fought for divorce reform. I know there were many members who believed as firmly as I did that divorce reform was absolutely necessary. During that period the news media were willing to publicize many of these social problems, and I am pleased to note the Minister of Justice is going to do something about them.

I can remember the time when "divorce" was a bad word and we used to pass divorce bills 100 at a time. Nobody cared about them, and cared less about whether the children would have any maintenance. I remember one case in which the hon. member for Timmins and I were interested. The husband had accumulated a million dollars by investing $25,000 that his wife had, but in attempting to get rid of her he was providing nothing for her. If he had been successful he would have turned her out on the street without a cent, and this because of the action of this house.

I think it is safe to say that abortion is another matter the minister will have to look at. I am not referring to aborting a mother for clinical reasons; I am referring to abortion in cases where it is a question of the woman not wanting to have a baby.

We will have to look at the problem of homosexuality from the point of view of at least allowing acts between two consenting adults conducted in private, as is now the case in Britain. I am also sure we will come to legalize birth control. Another area we will have to look at is what in my opinion are the crazy social laws of the church which were introduced four or five hundred years ago. These were enacted into legislation in Britain, and we have inherited them. The province of Quebec is even further behind because they inherited similar laws from France, and the Napoleonic code was even more archaic in outlook that the British law.

Since we have provided some relief in the matter of divorce, as the hon. member for Greenwood stated I think we might as well go all the way. When a partnership breaks down it might as well be dissolved. That is true of any partnership. I sympathize with the Minister of Justice. He did ask the hon. member for Greenwood whether he thought the courts were sufficiently equipped to handle the question of marriage breakdown. Personally I should like marriage breakdown to be the only ground for divorce. It cannot be an added ground; either it is a legal partnership which is continuing, or it is one that has broken down and should be dissolved. I do not think you can have it both ways.

I too am wondering whether the courts are sufficiently equipped to provide the kind of surveillance that would be required in cases of marriage breakdown. This also raises the question of what the courts have been doing hitherto. I have talked to a lawyer who has handled hundreds of divorce cases and it is his opinion that less than 10 per cent of these cases actually involve adultery. Everyone in court has known that the litigants have been telling lies. I feel safe in making that statement because at one time the hon. member for Skeena and I sent out 1,400 letters to respondents and corespondents, and we found that at least 400 of the names were fictitious. Some addresses did not even exist. I am sure the judges who tried these cases also knew they were false, and that most of the cases were rigged. Even where adultery was involved the woman in question was not the intended future partner of the respondent, but a woman who had been hired for a few dollars. Everything was a nice neat little package.

I am very proud that the minister appears at last to have taken the step of deciding that the federal government will have a say in the disposition and maintenance of children of divorced parents. Children are part of a marriage, and under the terms of the British North American Act they come under the jurisdiction of the federal government in such cases.

I wish to say very little more, Mr. Chairman, except that it gives me a great deal of personal satisfaction that the government is now introducing this legislation. I suggest to the minister that he will find himself in the same position as the former minister of justice, both of them being Catholics and coming from the province of Quebec. We were very worried about the position that might be taken by other agencies in that province, but I was pleased to find, after talking to the former minister of justice that he had not received one complaint about the change that was made during his term of office. For 50 years advisers to the minister of justice had argued that divorce by parliament was an exception to the rule: that divorce through the courts was not a right. But as I anticipated, the minister experienced no complaints, because the social reality of the situation demanded a change.

I think the minister has given a Christmas present to the 500,000 people that the Canadian Bar Association state are engaging in common law relationships. The value of this the minister will not realize until he starts to receive the mail that I am sure will flow when the legislation is passed. I am also sure that these relationships that have been established but not legalized will in most cases be legalized, and will probably become lasting unions which will be a credit to Canada. If the minister of immigration has been happy over the years at the arrangements that have been made to legalize the position of Chinese immigrants, I am sure the pride of the Minister of Justice will be that much greater because of the role that this legislation will play in the lives of a large number of people.

Parliament itself is to be congratulated on this proposed change, as are the members of the divorce committee and the members of the press who gave the buildup that has been necessary to bring about this social change. I could single out many who made a great contribution to the step that members of parliament are taking tonight. The role played by the communications media in establishing this social change has often been ignored.

This recognition is long overdue. Members of parliament are now striking out in a new direction and bringing in new legislation, not necessarily because it has been tried and tested in other countries but because we in Canada have decided it is good for Canadians. For this, parliament should be congratulated, and I hope that during the next ten years I am here I will see other social problems, that hitherto have been taboo, dealt with as realistically as the minister has dealt with this particular social problem.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to be very long. I had not intended to take part in the debate at all until I heard the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. I think everyone in the country is glad that this measure has finally come before the house. I think the country is ready for this change and I am sure the whole house will co-operate in passing the best possible bill.

I did think that the members of the house and the people of the country might take umbrage at the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, who said that this government was not afraid to tackle sacred cows. The hon. member took a partisan approach, and then had the effrontery to liken this measure to the flag debate, for one, an occasion when the government had the stupidity to make a political football out of something that meant a lot to many people of this country. The government handled the matter very ineptly and made a great fuss about it when there was no need to. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, having shown an inclination to make a political football out of this matter, evoked the unfortunate reminder that this is a government that is accident prone and chooses the hardest possible way to do things.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Perhaps right now would be a good time to put in a little reminder that this is a subject of great importance to many people in this country. It is one with many aspects. Many people who are not themselves interested in obtaining divorces are watching very carefully to see how parliament will handle the issue. I suggest that the spirit in which the minister began the debate is the proper one, and that all hon. members of the chamber will co-operate—though we would be more confident of a successful outcome if we could forget the unfortunate predilection of this government for mismanaging an affair, no matter how well begun.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Trudeau thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-187 respecting divorce.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BRITISH COLUMBIA-YUKON-NORTHWEST TERRITORIES BOUNDARY ACT

ADOPTION OF BOUNDARIES AS SURVEYED AND MARKED

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-19, respecting the boundary between the Province of British Columbia and the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

Mr. Dinsdale: I presume that on this important and historic occasion the minister will have just a brief word to say.

[Translation]

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, the bill now before us is simply designed to define the boundary between British Columbia and the Yukon and Northwest Territories. It is not an extraordinarily important event in the legislative technique, because if you recall, last year I introduced similar bills in the house to define the boundary between Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba and the northern territories.

My hon. friends might be more interested to know that the bill was discussed in the other place on June 30 and on November 7, 1967 and that it was passed on November 8, 1967.

There is no change in the boundary itself, since the 60th parallel of north latitude is already indicated as the boundary in that area in several documents as for instance, the Imperial Act of 1866, the Yukon Act and the Northwest Territories Act. As a matter of fact, these acts provide that the northern boundary of British Columbia is the 60th parallel of north latitude.

It is not a question of changing but of defining. Before this, as there were no markers on land, it was very difficult if not impossible to identify the boundary. It can be easily imagined that it may be extremely difficult for hunters, prospectors, or prospective buyers of land, for mining companies to make proper identification and it is easily understood that it must be useful for the federal and provincial administrations to know just where their jurisdiction begins and where it stops.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: You mean, for the tax gatherers.

[Translation]

Mr. Pepin: From that point of view, among several others, of course.

That area over which I had the pleasure of flying last summer has been developed over quite a number of years. It will be recalled that in 1898, it was the scene of the Gold Rush; it will also be remembered that in 1943, the Alaska highway was built through it. But it is mostly since 1947, due to exploration work for gas and oil in the territories to the south and to the gradual extension of that exploration and development to the north, that this area has become important and will become even more so in the future.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of defining the land boundary rather than changing it.

As early as 1898, the federal Department of the Interior had started the work, which lasted from 1899 to 1908, but most of the surveying has been done since 1943. In that year, the Privy Council, with the agreement of British Columbia, instituted the commission on the boundary between British Columbia, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, instructing it to survey those boundaries and to report to the parliament of Canada and to the legislature of the province of British Columbia.

The commission comprised the surveyor general of Canada, as usual, and the surveyor general of British Columbia. The commission undertook the survey of the boundary in 1945 and pursued the work from 1945 to 1959. Six hundred and twenty-two miles of boundary were surveyed; there are 39 miles more to survey at the western extremity. Those 39 miles lie on extremely difficult glacial terrain which holds no immediate interest for the mining industry in particular.

When the work was completed, the commission wrote its report, dated February 15, 1966. This report included a map showing the location of the surveyed boundaries and the monuments placed on the ground for site identification. This document was tabled in the House of Commons on December 14, 1966.

It may perhaps be asked—I see that some hon. members are absent, fortunately —under what constitutional authority the federal government engaged in boundary surveying. The answer to that will be found in the British North America Act of 1871. Indeed, the act provides that the parliament of Canada may from time to time, with the consent of the legislature of any province, increase, diminish, or otherwise alter the limits of such province, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the said legislature, i.e., with the consent of provincial authorities.

By applying these provisions now, we can substitute the line of monuments on the ground for the abstract mathematical concept of the sixtieth parallel of north latitude, mentioned in particular in the Imperial Act of 1866.

The British Columbia legislature passed an act entitled: An Act of Consent respecting the Adoption of the British Columbia-Yukon-Northwest Territories Boundary, which was sanctioned on March 23, 1967. Therefore, the conditions imposed by the British North America Act of 1871 have been fully complied with, and there only remains for the house to pass, if it will, the bill introduced tonight.

• (9:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Basford: Would the minister permit a question? The premier of British Columbia—who now prefers to be called prime minister, but I will settle for premier—has often said that he would like to annex the Yukon territory. I take it from the minister's statement that the purpose of this bill has been consented to by the province of British Columbia, and that the bill will serve to protect the citizens of the Yukon from premier Bennett?

Mr. Pepin: I have no particular comment to make on that, except to say that the legislation presented tonight is not a revolution. It is a clarification of facts already acknowledged in previous legislation.

Mr. Terence Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): I think the minister referred to something like 39 miles. Knowing that there are in that area where the borders of British Columbia, Alberta, Yukon and the Northwest Territories meet, a number of new oil wells, and a lot of active interest in them, may I ask if there is anything serious enough in this change of boundaries that may affect rights to drill that have been given by any of the provinces or any of the territories?

Mr. Pepin: I do not think the hon. member should worry about that, because the 39 miles are at the western end of the border. It is at the other end of the line, and not on the British Columbia-Alberta border at all.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): The hon. member for Brandon-Souris.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, when I suggested to the minister that this was an occasion of some historic significance I was not of course indicating that this was something that would go down as one of the great events in Canadian history. I was merely suggesting that what is being done here tonight through this bill is the culmination of work that goes back through the annals of Canadian history to the year 1899. Following the gold rush and the rapid increase of population in the Yukon territory, and the establishment of that territory out of the Northwest Territories, it became necessary to delineate the line of demarcation between the province of British Columbia and the new territory.

It is an interesting observation with respect to the difficulties of Canadian terrain that the process of marking out the boundaries on the ground has been taking place, off and on, ever since that time. It is also of historic significance, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford) has indicated, that tonight we are recognizing an agreement reached between the Yukon territory and the province of British Columbia. It is most significant that British Columbia concurred in the delineation of this boundary before the parliament of Canada concurred. Of course, coming from the prairies I have to make the observation that the prairie provinces, of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, always being agreeable on matters which are in the best interests of Canada, preceded the province of British Columbia in giving their concurrence to this matter.

I do not think anything else needs to be said tonight, but I would like to congratulate those Canadians over the years who have been responsible for the accomplishment of the very difficult task of actually marking out the boundaries on the ground. In this connection I refer to the geological survey of Canada, and the men associated with that survey who have worked on it down through the years. I refer also to the survey and mapping branch of the minister's department, and to the work done by Dr. Lamb, the dominion archivist.

I also wish to pay tribute to Don W. Thomson who in his recent excellent book, "Men and Meridians," has covered the history of this boundary demarcation. It was my privilege to be associated with Mr. Thomson, who because of his grasp of resource affairs, was loaned to the Resources for Tomorrow Conference for a short time. His knowledge of the subject has certainly been demonstrated in his recent book. Through this bill we are merely agreeing with a piece of work that has been done against the formidable barriers of Canadian geography and geology, and I can assure the minister that the members of the official opposition give the bill their wholehearted support.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rose a few moments ago, not for the purpose of making a speech but out of curiosity to seek an answer to a question. This matter involves the province of British Columbia and the territories of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. I am aware of the bill that was passed in the British Columbia legislature, I think in April of this year, giving consent to the boundary change. May I ask the minister whether the federal government took the position that it was deciding this matter on behalf of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, or was it submitted in any way to the councils of those territories?

I ask this question because we hear so much about their desire for democratic rule. These councils exist. They are part appointed, and part elected. Was consideration given to allowing the Yukon council and the Northwest Territories council at least a nominal share in a decision on their own boundaries?

Mr. Pepin: I am not aware of that, Mr. Speaker, I will inquire and give an oral or written answer to my hon. friend.

Mr. Winch: Is it not reasonable that at least they should have been invited to participate?

Mr. Pepin: This is a perennial question, usually raised by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), inquiring whether the Yukon council and the Northwest Territories council have been invited to this or that. I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has followed the custom of saying that for the time being in these matters the federal government acts for the governments of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. I presume the same thing was done in this case.

Mr. Winch: Do I gather that the minister has said that although we do have semi-democratic organizations in control of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, the decision on boundaries was made by the federal government without any submission to the territorial councils?

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that if the hon. member wishes to ask questions, questions which I think are very interesting, he should let the bill pass on to committee stage, where all these questions would be in order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Possibly I should point out that if the minister continues answering questions he will close the debate.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to enter a debate on this measure, which is rather a routine one and which has been agreed to by the government of British Columbia; but the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford), in his usual farsighted way, with his comments on some remarks made by the premier of British Columbia has raised a technical debate to a different level altogether. One thing the premier of British Columbia has always been is a visionary. Unlike so many such individuals, as a visionary he has seen many of his fondest dreams come true, or is seeing them now in the process of being completed. Having done so many different things which have been of great benefit to that great province which I, along with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford), am happy to represent, it is not surprising that he should occasionally look at the geography of that part of Canada and see the natural extension that the Yukon territory makes with the province of British Columbia.

While there never has been any question of any forceful decision in this matter, there has I think always been a rather fond hope that some day the people of the Yukon would see the benefits that have accrued to the people of British Columbia with the government they have, and that there would be an automatic expression or wish that the territory and the province be united.

I was very pleased to hear the minister read the act of 1871 which indicated that it would be constitutionally possible for the federal government to agree with the provincial government to extend its boundary. There is very logical extension. We heard mention of the Alaska highway. Members of the house know that hundreds of miles of that highway are in the province of British Columbia and many more miles of it are in the territory. It would seem natural for a development of that nature to be under one jurisdiction. Certainly with the great power development which has been suggested for the Taku river, for instance, and the developments which are under way in that corner, including the province of British Columbia, the Yukon territory and part of Alaska, again the working out of a joint arrangement in which there would be one administration rather than two would be desirable.

Within the last few days we have had a little book distributed to members of parliament called "Blueprint for Autonomy 8 Steps to Provincehood". This was distributed by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I admit that he neither made any comment nor endorsed the views expressed therein. It made most interesting reading because it is a demand for immediate autonomy; in fact it is a demand for a sort of Yukon power approach. The first of the eight steps to provincehood is "Create an Impasse".

I believe, and I am sure many members will agree with me, that one of our problems in Canada is that we are over-governed, that we are probably too blessed in the number of provinces, and that the development of the north really does not need the setting up of a complete provincial structure. We would hope that the infinitesimal populations will grow in the north; but that growth will not be assisted by all the trappings and expense of a provincial system of government that neither they nor the country as a whole will be able to afford.

I do not believe this whole question should be treated as lightly as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard seemed to treat it. The possibility of removing a boundary should always be maintained, whether it is newly drawn, newly photographed or newly surveyed. Artificial boundaries should not prevent the natural development of the great west of this country. While I do not wish to hold up this bill, this is a thought I should like to leave with you. It has been agreed that this is a logical, sensible, technical bill. Nevertheless we should keep in the back of our minds some of the potential development which is possible and hope that we will not add to the difficulties of fulfilling the great vision of the premier of British Columbia, and I am sure of many citizens of the Yukon territory as well.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a few words about this bill, which as a logical and technical piece of legislation has the support of the whole house. I should like to thank the minister for his brief and precise explanation of the circumstances surrounding the introduction of the bill. I am glad to know, as the bill indicates, that the legislature of British Columbia has given its blessing to the boundary between the province of British Columbia and the Yukon territory.

Without a doubt this has been a very necessary undertaking. There are few people, apart from those associated with this type of work, who realize the amount of planning, office work and field work which goes into an accomplishment of this type. I have had considerable experience with survey crews working in very difficult mountain terrain. I am sure that in this instance the field crews must have encountered problems which were never reported in the newspapers or known to members of the house.

I support the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) in his expression of appreciation for the work these people do, which very often goes unrecognized because it is not the type of work which attracts publicity. I trust that the minister will convey to his staff, particularly the field staff, the appreciation of parliament for the work they have done in this regard.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to underline what the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) said in respect of this bill. So far as any determination of this matter by the council of the Yukon territory or the council of the Northwest Territories is concerned, I know that if the hon. member for Yukon had been here this evening he certainly would have raised this matter because he has long been a champion of the necessity of both of our territories obtaining a greater degree of self government. If the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange) were here this evening I am sure he too would express a similar thought.

It may well be in the strict legal concept of a political entity that the minister is correct in intimating that the council of the Yukon Territory and the council of the Northwest Territories have no business making a decision or determination about this question. However, since we are embarking hopefully on a course of self government and later provincehood status for the territories, I believe they should be given some opportunity to express an opinion about this question. After all, it is the land territory of both the Yukon territory and the Northwest Territories that is involved.

With all respect for the admiration the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Johnston) has for the premier of British Columbia—an admiration which all members of the Social Credit party do not share—

Mr. Patterson: And which some other people, not Social Crediters, share.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Howard: Including the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson). He is not a Social Crediter, and whether he ever was is a debatable point. Regardless of the admiration the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke exhibits for the premier of British Columbia, without whose help he may not even be here, the fact of the matter is that there are other political entities involved, namely the Yukon and Northwest Territories. The least that should have occurred in trying to maintain the strict legality of the relationship between these political entities is the affording of an opportunity to the councils to express their opinions about this matter. This bill suggests in its preamble that the legislature of the province of British Columbia has consented to these alterations. It seems equally fair that the councils of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories should have been afforded the same courtesy, and should have been in the position to determine whether they agree with what is put before us now.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make sure that the questions I asked and the answer I received have not muddied the record. I did not quite understand the minister. Did he say tlat the only difficulty in respect of this boundary between British Columbia and the Yukon relates to the western end, rather than the eastern end where the boundary exists between that province and the Northwest Territories? If that is correct, that is all I want to know.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order. If the minister answers this question he will close the debate.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Let me assure the hon. member that what he has said expresses exactly the intent of what I said. I could send the map I have to the hon. members for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent) and Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) who have both been so kind during this debate. Perhaps I should exercise the judgment of Solomon by giving them each half of it.

In relation to the question regarding consultation with the councils of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) just phoned the surveyor general of Canada who tells us that this point was raised with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I have been informed by the minister that the commissioner was involved in this border clarification.

I will write to the hon. members who have raised this question, giving them full details. I must say that the position of British Columbia and the Northwest Territories is far from being the same, because the British North America Act of 1871, to which I referred, makes it necessary to get the consent of the province involved, but does not obviously say the same with regard to the Northwest Territories.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Tardif in the chair.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On clause 2—Boundary declared.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask one question in respect of clause 2. It is my understanding that some papers concerning this matter had to be signed on behalf of British Columbia, and I should like to know whether they were signed by W. A. C. Bennett, the premier, or the pompous ass who calls himself the prime minister.

Mr. Pepin: I will have to check, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I think that expression, which I shall not repeat, should be struck out of Hansard. We may not approve of provincial premiers or members of legislatures, but I doubt very much if we should speak disrespectfully of them here in this house, and I ask that the statement be withdrawn.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Fortunately or unfortunately I did not hear the expression. If there is no protest, I do not imagine that it should be withdrawn.

[Mr. Pepin.]

Mr. Churchill: I am not clear as to your ruling, but premier Bennett of British Columbia was called a pompous ass. I am sure no one would want that appellation attached to him, not even the Chairman. I think the expression should be withdrawn. Surely this is not good appearing in a public document such as Hansard, which is read rather widely across this country. This is an insult to a distinguished politician.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I did not hear that expression, but I am sure that if the hon. member said the premier of British Columbia was a pompous ass he will want to withdraw the remark.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry, sir, but I did not know that such an expression was out of order in this House of Commons. As far as I am concerned there is only one prime minister in Canada, and that is the prime minister in the federal House of Commons.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I missed the proceedings on second reading of this bill. I should like to make one or two comments before the title carries, as a result of my experience as a member of the northern affairs committee when I visited the city of Whitehorse. Let me say at once that I am glad this bill will carry, and that it fixes the boundaries between the province of British Columbia, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. When I was in Whitehorse I discovered a good deal of concern among the residents there that the premier of the province of British Columbia had some interest in abolishing the boundary. With the passing of this bill and with the statement in the preamble that the province of British Columbia is in agreement with and consents to this survey, I assume the premier has abandoned what I described when I was in Whitehorse as being one of his wilder schemes.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Fulton: By leave, now.

Mr. Pepin moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

• (10:00 p.m.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Tomorrow?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If there is any question about the business for tomorrow, perhaps it could be asked now.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will begin with second reading of the Publication of Statutes Act. Then we will deal with committee stage of the C.N.R. bill; and then I would like to call the budget resolutions appended to the notice paper of Votes and Proceedings of June 1, 1967. These are the resolutions relating to the earlier budget.

Mr. Knowles: Budget No. 1.

Mr. MacEachen: If these items are disposed of tomorrow we would have an opportunity to consider calling second reading of the two bills that were given first reading today, namely the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and the divorce bill, or resuming the budget debate. I would be happy to consult tomorrow morning or mid-day with the house leaders as to what their preference might be in this regard.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to disrupt the otherwise even tenor of our ways that has been established just recently, but I was under the impression that it has been agreed that the budget resolutions of June 1 would be deferred until after the adoption of the motion of the Minister of Finance now before the house. I understood the resolutions arising out of that motion and those now on the order paper would be agreed together. If there is agreement to the contrary, I beg the pardon of the house leader; but that was my understanding. I wonder whether the house leader would defer consideration of those resolutions until there has been a further opportunity of discussing this question tomorrow.

Mr. MacEachen: I would be quite happy to consult with hon. gentlemen tomorrow, Mr. Speaker. I had assumed I would be free to call these resolutions after the budget presentation had been made, but there may be a misunderstanding and I would be happy to consider this matter tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

IMMIGRATION—BRITISH COLUMBIA—NON-PARTICIPATION IN REFUGEE SETTLEMENT PLAN

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in 1960 during world refugee year the then Conservative government embarked upon a program of bringing, initially, 100 tubercular families to Canada and asked the provinces to participate with the government on a proportionate basis. The premier of British Columbia, the same gentleman who today is the premier of that province, spurned that offer, refused to participate in the joint venture and after a few agonizing and embarrassing moments of reflection embarked upon a grandiose scheme to buy food in British Columbia and distribute it to the starving peoples of the world. In fact, in a press release in May of 1960 the establishment of the world relief fund of the province of British Columbia was announced, and the then minister of health and welfare, Eric Martin, became its chairman. An amount of $50,000 was contributed by the provincial government by a special warrant and a commitment was made to match, dollar for dollar, every dollar that was contributed by the general public up to an amount of $475,000 which, if the full contribution were made, would raise about $1 million.

The world relief fund of the provincial government was heralded with great fanfare when it was announced, and then was immediately forgotten. Articles written in newspapers since that time have all pointed to the fact that the $50,000 has not been touched, and that the province has not embarked upon any world relief fund.

As late as this year Mr. Tom Berger, M.L.A., who was a member of this house, asked some questions in the British Columbia legislature as to whether or not the money was still there. The answer he received was that the $50,000 was still there, that no payments had been made out of it and that it did not seem likely that any payments would be made from that fund. We do not know where it went; it is still there in trust. However, this points up the deceit which the premier of British Columbia used at that time to cover up his lack of desire to participate in a very worthwhile program to assist the tubercular refugees from other countries to come to Canada, where they may receive some medical and other assistance.

The other day the Minister of Manpower and Immigration announced a government sponsored program to bring 50 handicapped refugees to Canada, most of whom are tubercular cases. He announced that eight provincial governments would participate with the federal government in bringing these unfortunate souls to Canada, where medical and other assistance may be provided for them. Once again the province of British Columbia has failed to participate with the government of Canada in this very humane and worthwhile venture.

I submit that this indicates a lack of interest on the part of the premier of my own province, in an extremely worth-while venture. All I can do is to hope that publicity will be given to the manner in which he has treated his own world relief fund which he announced in 1960; the fact that it did not get off the ground and that no one in his government tried to make it work; the fact that Eric Martin, the then minister of health and welfare admitted he was at fault in not doing anything to bring the program into effect; and the fact that the premier has once again spurned the participation of his province in an extremely worth-while and humanitarian project.

Perhaps all we can do is to hope that if these facts are given some publicity the premier of British Columbia will be shamed, together with the government of Canada, into participating in this venture, and in giving some assistance to unfortunate people from other countries.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have been asked by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to take note of the remarks made by the hon. member for Skeena this evening. I should like to indicate to the hon. member that it would be somewhat difficult to determine just what responsibility the minister has in this regard. I do feel, however, that the hon. member is making a contribution to the program by bringing this matter to the attention of the house, notwithstanding the fact that it would be difficult for the minister to take any action. I am sure the minister is hopeful that the new program will be universally accepted by the premiers of the various provinces. I am sure the hon. member's remarks may have the desired effect.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—VANCOUVER—EMPLOYMENT OF POSTAL TRUCK DRIVERS

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to put a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) concerning the plight of the employees of a company in Vancouver which, for many years, as a private company has hauled the mail for the post office, and which company bears the romantic name of the Pony Express. I want to turn first to a letter which I received from an executive of that company on April 30, and which reads in part:

> —the Canada Postal Department proposed to enter into the trucking business July 1 in the city of Vancouver by taking over 25 per cent of the work at present held by a long established trucking company with a view to possibly doing all the work.

When I received that letter I promptly wrote to the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté) and asked him for particulars of the matter. I received from him a letter which I should like to read in part:

> The present practice of handling this mail has been done by contract and not by post office employees except in the city of Windsor, Ontario. Long range plans of the Post Office Department have included for some time a study of the economics involved in taking over the service ourselves. The strike by employees of the Montreal contractor early in December last year emphasized the vulnerability of the department in this area. While the Post Office Department was in no way involved in the dispute between mail chauffeurs and the contractor, nevertheless, the strike resulted in considerable disruption of the mail service not only in Montreal but across the country because Montreal is a key distributing point. Preliminary study would indicate that it may well be more efficient and more economical to have the department operate its own vehicle service.
> The only satisfactory method of establishing the economics and practicality of doing the job ourselves is to conduct an experiment and we picked two major post offices—Montreal and Vancouver—as suitable for pilot plant study.

I now want to refer, sir, to a further letter I have received from an officer of the Pony Express company regarding this contract. It reads in part:

> Pony Express Limited has been the mail contractor since 1911, and despite the fact that they, the employees, consider membership in the teamster's union essential for their welfare, not once has the mail in the greater Vancouver area been delayed or held up since the company contracted to do any of the services under discussion. In fact, to the contrary, with the aid of the teamster's union and despite many local labour disputes and strikes, mail at all times has been delivered by Pony Express couriers, when in many instances post office employees have refused to cross picket lines.

At another point, the letter reads:

> I understand that Mr. Côté has stated that "in the interests of progress" any Pony Express employee was free to apply for the position of postal chauffeur. I ask you, sir, is it logical or sensible for any man in this province to apply for the same job at a lower rate of pay?

I have learned recently that this experiment, as it is called by the Postmaster General, went forward despite the protests of this company, a company that has served so well and despite troubles that have existed in the postal department. Those who have been deprived of their jobs have made application to the Post Office Department for the position of postal chauffeur. I now find that some members have had their applications to become postal chauffeurs rejected, on the basis that they live outside the area served by the Vancouver post office, although they have worked for Pony Express for many years while living at these addresses, and while handling these duties in a satisfactory manner.

What I want to ask is this: I ask the Minister of Labour tonight what can be done specifically for these employees. I hope he will be able to give a satisfactory answer.

The other question I want to put to the government is this: Why is it necessary to continue with an experiment of this nature in order to correct what is considered to be a disruptive situation between labour and management in the Montreal area? Why must we in Vancouver, where the work of hauling the mail has never been handled more satisfactorily, be penalized because of these particular difficulties? I would ask the government to review the whole matter and not to deprive of work the Pony Express, and those employees who have worked so faithfully carrying the Queen's mail. I ask the minister to see what can be done to right what is an obvious injustice.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with that part of the question which is directed to the Minister of Labour and to say that I have had occasion to investigate the circumstances referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. I am convinced that those employees of the Pony Express who are affected in this particular case have done an outstanding job over the years. In my opinion, based on my investigations to date, it would be most unfortunate if the five or six employees of the Pony Express who live in what I might call the metropolitan area of Vancouver are not able to perform their work as postal chauffeurs by reason of the fact that they do not happen to live in that part of the postal area referred to by the hon. member.

I might say that not only have I taken the matter up as Minister of Labour—because an important principle relating to employment is involved here—but I have also taken up the matter as a member of parliament representing that part of Vancouver where the main post office in question is located. I have had a particular interest in the matter and have taken it up with the deputy postmaster general and with the chairman of the public service commission with a view, I hope, to assuring that the five or six employees of Pony Express will not be deprived of their opportunity to qualify as postal servants in the employ of the Post Office Department.

This is particularly important today in view of the trend toward urbanization. People in outlying communities today find that through no fault of their own they are engulfed by neighbouring metropolitan areas or surrounding municipalities. It would seem unfair to deprive these people—after all, they are all Canadians—of their right to work, by virtue of some regulation that has been followed by the Civil Service Commission over a period of years.

I can assure the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra I am encouraged to believe some progress is being made, but I cannot give him the affirmative answer he would like to hear tonight. With regard to the second part of the question, which was not referred to in the matter about which I was given notice to speak tonight, the only person who could deal effectively with it is the Postmaster General, who unfortunately is not here.

Motion agreed and the house adjourned at 10.21 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, December 5, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

AGREEMENT TO REVERT TO MOTIONS LATER THIS DAY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to seek the approval of the house to revert to motions at 5.30 this afternoon in order that the Prime Minister may make a statement and the party leaders may comment at that time. If this is agreeable I should like to have it made an order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the house will revert to motions at 5.30 this afternoon?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-186

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in order to clarify the somewhat ambiguous situation which developed in the committee yesterday, with consent I should like to move the following motion seconded by Mr. Nicholson:

That the subject dealt with in Bill C-186 be referred to the standing committee on labour and employment for consideration; provided, however, that despite this motion the said bill shall remain on the order paper as an order for second reading without prejudice to the right to make or proceed with the motion for such second reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the Minister of National Health and Welfare have leave to present this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN EIGHTH AND NINTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (Saint-Henri) moved that the eighth and ninth reports of the standing committee on transport and communications, presented to the house on Thursday, November 30, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

SUBSTITUTION OF MAPLE LEAF FOR EFFIGY OF QUEEN ON STAMPS

Mr. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Laurier) moved for leave to introduce a bill respecting Canadian stamps.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, it is high time that the citizens in our country, English or French speaking, cut the umbilical cord with their mother country and become truly Canadians, in co-operation with other ethnic groups: Unity in diversity.

This bill is a consistent follow-through to Bill No. C-167, first reading of which I moved on October 10, last; the explanations then supplied concerning our search for a clearly Canadian identity apply to this bill.

[English]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There has been no clear explanation as to what this bill intends. The hon. member talks about cutting an umbilical cord, but what does he intend to do in respect of our stamps? I should like to have a clear explanation.

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the explanatory notes of that bill read as follows:

The purpose of this bill is to replace the effigy of the Queen which appears on certain Canadian stamps by the stylized maple leaf which adorns the Canadian flag.

[English]

Mr. Churchill: I object.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Contrary minded will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion lost.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister and ask whether in the course of his comments on the so-called B and B commission report later this afternoon he would include a statement as to what the government proposes to do with the report, and the measures the government proposes to take in connection with the subject matter of the report.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be making a very short statement this afternoon when the report is tabled. My hon. friend of course realizes, or will realize when he reads the report, that this is a very important, comprehensive document with a great many recommendations. It would be very difficult in the few days since the receipt of the report to give any final verdict on the government's reaction to all those recommendations, but I will indicate the steps that we propose to take to give consideration to the report.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY AS TO AGENDA FOR DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the right hon. Prime Minister about the agenda for the federal-provincial conference which is to be held early in the new year. In view of the fact that the letter of invitation which the Prime Minister sent to the premiers, dated August 15, mentions only a proposed bill of rights, could I ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to widen the agenda for the conference so as to deal with some of the problems which were posed by the confederation of tomorrow conference and which still have to be resolved?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): In the invitation to the conference it was suggested to the premiers that while we had called this conference to discuss a very important constitutional matter, a federal bill of rights, we would welcome any suggestions the provincial governments might make as to the widening of the agenda, because we did not wish to restrict it in any way. I may have one suggestion to make with regard to that matter this afternoon when I make my statement on the B and B commission report.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister whether it will be possible to have a copy of the agenda made public prior to the conference; and is it the intention of the government to present a statement setting forth the particular parts of the constitution which may have to be revised in order to give the federal government the necessary powers to develop a viable and expanding economy? I would also ask whether such a statement will be made prior to the conference.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, so far as making public the agenda before the conference meets is concerned, I have no objection whatever to that. I would wish to wait, of course, until we get the views of the provinces as to what they would like included in the agenda. I hope this will be done in ample time for the agenda to be made public before the conference meets. As far as the other part of the question is concerned, I should like to look into the possibility of a statement being made along the lines suggested before the conference opens.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Has there been a decision, or is the question still under discussion, as to the extent to which the conference will be held in public?

Mr. Pearson: No decision has been taken on that point; that will have to be decided by those participating in the conference. I would be very glad to take that up well in advance of the meeting so the greatest possible publicity can be given to this meeting.

[Later:]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister relating to the constitutional conference. Does the Prime Minister have in mind seeking the opinion of the house prior to the conference on any of the questions to be discussed with the provinces?

Mr. Pearson: That would depend, of course, to some extent on the date which is agreed upon. It is conceivable, though I hope it will not happen, that the house may not be sitting on that date. I have suggested to the provinces that the conference might meet in the first week of February; I shall be glad, if parliament is sitting before that—and it may well be sitting before that—to consider the possibility of a day being set aside in the Commons to consider the matters to come before the conference.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPLICATION TO STAFF OF BILINGUAL BONUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Minister of National Revenue.

Is he studying or considering, at the present time, the feasibility of granting the 7 per cent bonus to all bilingual employees of the Canadian parliament?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): The employees of parliament fall within the purview of the Speaker rather than that of the government of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: I should like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Are parliament employees considered as federal employees or are they not?

[English]

Mr. Benson: The conditions of employment of House of Commons staff are under the direction of the Speaker, as I indicated.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXPO '67

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GRANTING OF SEVERANCE PAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): I had intended to direct my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce; perhaps in his absence I could direct it to the Prime Minister. It is based on a press report that severance pay is being granted to Expo workers. Could I ask whether it is the intention of the government to advise the house as to the reason for these payments, reportedly in the amount of $4.5 million, and what the federal share would be?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I would have to look into that matter, and I shall be glad to do so.

MANPOWER

PAYMENT OF SUBSISTENCE ALLOWANCES DURING CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is it the policy of his department to cut off for two weeks at Christmas and the New Year the living allowance paid to those taking adult occupational training courses under government sponsorship at technical institutes across Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think I have already explained the policy of the government to the house.

Those who are assigned to these training courses are, according to our way of thinking, simple workers: they are not people who are going back to school, but workers. They play an essential role in our economy and must therefore be treated like other workers: They must have the same holidays and receive allowances which are in a way comparable to those of other workers.

If courses are given during the holidays, these workers will receive allowances, just like those who work in a factory. If there are no courses, naturally, they will not receive allowances, but they may be eligible for unemployment insurance.

[English]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): In view of the fact that most of the students taking these courses were formerly unemployed, and since many of them are married and have families, would the government not reconsider its policy so the living allowance could be continued? Otherwise it is going to be a grim Christmas for many of these students across the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I think it is incumbent on the provinces to organize courses so that the situation described by my hon. friend does not take place.

[English]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): May I ask a supplementary question. Is the minister aware that the students operating under the old part V program, and in the same courses as students operating under the new part V program, will be paid a subsistence allowance during the holiday period? This is creating a morale problem. Would the minister agree to do something to remove this discrimination?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that there are differences between the two programs. As you know, the previous program No. 5 will be expiring at the beginning of next year, but as long as it has not expired, the conditions will unfortunately be somewhat different, and there is nothing we can do about that.

[English]

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Speaker, I did not hear what the minister said. Did he say they would be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits from the time they were cut off from these grants?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, those who have accumulated enough credits under the Unemployment Insurance Act may be entitled to their unemployment insurance benefits if they do not get retraining allowances.

[English]

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO INCREASE CAPITAL INVESTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of a statement by the Economic Council of Canada that businessmen are not planning sufficient capital investment during the next five years to keep the economy growing to its full potential, is it the intention of the government to introduce measures in the near future to induce the necessary additional capital investment?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada gave similar information to the finance ministers' meeting recently. We have not yet had an opportunity of discussing with the council the reasons for this, but I can assure the hon. gentleman and the house it will be the intention of the government to promote the maximum amount of business investment and the most prosperous conditions in the country.

Mr. Hees: Will the minister assure the house that he will report back to the house when he has had an opportunity of carrying on these further discussions, and then outline the intentions of the government in this regard?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the government's policies in all these respects are revealed from time to time. I do not believe it would be appropriate for me to make a special report to the house on this matter.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I should like to direct this question also to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a survey prepared by top economists with the Royal Bank of Canada, the University of Montreal and two large Canadian industries, which predicts a business recession next year?

Mr. Sharp: No, I have not seen this particular prediction. I have seen many on the other side, and I am sure the views of economists on the outlook, as usual, are quite confused.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): In view of the minister's reply, will the minister now admit he is an economist?

Mr. Sharp: No, I would never admit that.

FINANCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE IN BANK INTEREST RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance based on the announcement yesterday by a number of chartered banks of an increase in their prime interest rate. In view of the almost simultaneous announcement of a record level of profits for chartered banks, has the minister made representations to the banks urging that degree of restraint he has urged upon other sectors of the economy such as labour and business?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): My question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. If the minister has not already done so within the last few hours, in view of the fact that the president and directors of the Cape Breton Development Corporation are having a meeting in Sydney tomorrow can he take the house into his confidence and advise who will be the other two members of the corporation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the appointment of Mr. Douglas Fullerton was decided this morning by cabinet. I still have one member to nominate but I am having a bit of trouble because I have to appoint a chairman before I appoint the fifth director of the corporation.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I thank the minister for his reply, particularly the reference to Mr. Fullerton. When will he be in a position to name the vice president of coal operations and the vice president of industrial development?

Mr. Pepin: I would not like to violate the legislation, which says the vice president is appointed by the president.

[Later:]

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): My question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and relates to previous questions about the Cape Breton Development Corporation. May I ask the minister if Mr. Robinson Ord of the Cape Breton Development Corporation has said who shall be the vice presidents of coal operations and industrial development?

Mr. Pepin: I am aware that the president has a number of names he is studying, but I do not think he has yet made a final decision.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the decision be made solely by Mr. Ord or will it be made by the board that the minister was so slow in setting up?

DIVORCE

REQUEST FOR FREE VOTE ON PROPOSED LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roger E. Régimbal (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister indicate whether it is the intention of the government to allow a free vote on the divorce bill which is now before the house?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the divorce bill is a government bill and I think should be treated as such.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

REPORTED PROPOSAL TO INCREASE AMOUNT OF CONTRIBUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is it a fact that all payments to the Canada pension plan are to be increased in the near future?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that might be a good question for the order paper.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO SIGNING OF INTERNATIONAL GRAINS AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. D. McLelland (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce perhaps I could direct my question to the Prime Minister. According to news reports released yesterday only 32 of the 70 countries eligible to sign the international grains arrangement in Washington have done so. Could the Prime Minister inform the house why the other 38 countries have been reluctant to sign this agreement to date?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should not like the fact that they have not yet signed to be taken as implying that they are reluctant to do so, but I will be glad to look into this question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

WATER RESOURCES

PEMBINA RIVER—RATIFICATION OF AGREEMENT FOR DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of external affairs. Before I pose the question I should like to thank him for his courtesy in supplying me with a copy of the report of the International Joint Commission on the Pembina river development. My question in this. Could the minister give the house some idea when the agreement relating to the co-operative development of the Pembina river basin will be ratified by the two governments?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend has indicated, the report has just been received by the two governments from the commission. As far as Canada is concerned we will do our best to give the report the quickest possible attention. I am sure this will also be the attitude taken by the government of the United States. We will then be in a position to give a definitive reply.

WOMEN

INQUIRY CONCERNING APPOINTMENT OF REPLACEMENT TO ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. About ten days ago I asked whether, in view of the fact that one of the members of the royal commission on the status of women had tendered his resignation, it was the intention of the government to appoint a member to replace him. The Minister of Industry informed me that this particular question was still under consideration. Is the Prime Minister now able to give me an answer to the question?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Not at the moment, Mr. Speaker, but I hope to be able to make an appointment before long because I think it is time the lone male member of the commission had a little company.

[Translation]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Following the statement made by a Canadian general last week to the effect that the army should take up arms to bring to heel the Quebec independentists, could the minister tell us if that is the policy of his department or if that is only the opinion of an individual or if that is meant as a provocation to Quebec nationalism?

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The question is out of order.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

PROTEST RESPECTING LAY-OFFS OF SHOP WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Ballard (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the answers given by him yesterday in connection with the lay-off of C.P.R. employees in Montreal, Winnipeg and Calgary I wonder whether he could report today that an investigation has been made and, if so, what are the results of the investigation.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, all of the information was referred to the Canadian Pacific Railway, as I undertook to do yesterday. Obviously I have not yet had a reply.

Mr. Ballard: A supplementary question. I wonder whether the minister could indicate whether the regular employees who are laid off will be paid for the statutory holidays that fall within the lay-off period, such as Christmas and New Year's day.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I have just indicated that I do not have a reply to that question.

POLLUTION

SUDBURY, ONT.—SULPHUR DIOXIDE LEVEL AT INTERNATIONAL NICKEL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bud Germa (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will the minister undertake a survey to determine the effects on workers of long term exposure to high concentrations of sulphur dioxide fumes at the International Nickel Company plant in the Sudbury district?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is a good question for the order paper.

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Would the minister tell us whether the sugar beet producers may expect their subsidy by Christmas, and what is the amount of this subsidy per ton?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I announced the sugar beet policy the other day in the house.

Mr. Ricard: I wish to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I asked the minister whether the sugar beet producers could expect their subsidy before Christmas. I know the minister made a statement, but my question is quite different from the reply he has just given.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, in my report to the house the other day, I said that the producers could expect to receive their subsidy.

[English]

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT MEETING OF INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. Is the Canadian government or Air Canada represented at the current meeting of the International Air Transport Association in Manila?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Sherman: A supplementary question. Is the Canadian delegation undertaking any initiative toward obtaining a revision of trans-Atlantic air passenger rates so as to correct the rate schedule, which currently discriminates against many Canadian passengers who do not live in either Toronto or Montreal?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice.

Inquiries of the Ministry

MALTON—DANGER IN APPROACH OVER ISLAND AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Do the new regulations concerning air safety, which the minister announced, prohibit aircraft of Air Canada and other commercial airlines from approaching Malton airport in Toronto in a way that will bring them in low over the island airport, which presents a hazard to such aircraft?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): That will be a good question for the order paper, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nesbitt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the matter may be lightly treated by the minister, but it is a matter of urgency, and my question concerns a hazard to human life, possibly even that of the minister. Could he answer the question more precisely now?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what prompted me to say what I said in my last answer. I want the answer to be in precise detail so as not to mislead my hon. friend.

APPLICATION BY ITALIAN LINE TO FLY ROME-TORONTO ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack A. Irvine (London): I have a question to address to the Minister of Transport. Has the government received an application from the Italian government for flying rights with respect to the Rome-Toronto route? If so, what steps does the government plan to take to protect reciprocal Canadian airline rights?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this question cannot be dealt with properly on orders of the day. I can assure my hon. friend that when additional landing rights are granted to foreign carriers in Canada, the rights of Canadian carriers will be protected. We shall make certain that we obtain full benefits from the country that requests additional rights, in exchange for those rights that we give up in this country.

Mr. Irvine: I was not speaking of landing rights, Mr. Speaker. I was speaking of flying rights. I understand that Alitalia has applied for permission to fly the Rome-Toronto route.

Mr. Hellyer: That is exactly what I was referring to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I suggest to the hon. member that this would be a good question to discuss at ten o'clock.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

CONSTRUCTION IN U.S. OF PROTOTYPE SAFETY CAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, now that the state of New York has just unveiled a model prototype safety car, the first such safety car built by a public authority with public funds, can the Minister of Transport assure the house that he will establish a close working liaison with the appropriate officials in New York state in order to co-operate in the completion of this venture and to continue the liaison already established by the National Research Council?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We will want full information with respect to all developments in the field of auto safety, certainly including developments in the state of New York.

[Translation]

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT RESPECTING ABORTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice.

Last Friday, I inquired about the introduction of the comprehensive bill to amend certain sections of the Criminal Code, and I implied from his answer that this bill would also include a provision concerning abortion. I wonder therefore whether the minister does not feel it may be useful and necessary to introduce a separate bill on abortion?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the government has undertaken to introduce a legislation designed to bring the Criminal Code up to date with regard to abortion, so as to bring our statutes more in line with our modern society.

The procedure suggested by the hon. member should perhaps be considered, but I do not think it would be the most efficient way of ensuring the adoption of such a measure.

I take this opportunity to assure the hon. members that our bill on abortion is one that, to my mind, should win the favour of all reasonable persons. It reflects the needs and the morals of our times.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question?

Like the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Régimbal) who put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister a while ago, may I suggest that we agree on a free vote on this important matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, all votes are free in the sense that each member must vote; however, in the more restricted sense to which the hon. member is alluding, I am not, for my part, authorized to answer a question like that one.

[English]

MANPOWER

REPORTED SPEECH BY MINISTER RESPECTING TRAINING PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In his speech to the Liberal Association of St. Paul's riding in Toronto, the minister is reported as blaming provincial delays for the marked slow down of the manpower training program. Will the minister take the first opportunity on motions to specify which provincial governments he means, and what delays he claims they are responsible for?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I said in the house at least five or six times what I said in Toronto.

[English]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REPORTED DIFFICULTIES RESPECTING MANPOWER TRAINING PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the minister assure the house that any solution arising out of discussions currently taking place in an attempt to resolve the manpower training crisis among the Sioux Narrows Indians will apply to our Indian citizens in all parts of Canada who are suffering from a similar disability owing to the changes which were introduced into the program by the government last April?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the so called disability of the Indian people was much distorted by earlier reports. A good deal of progress has been made in taking up the slack. We have made it plain to those concerned that if the programs which are offered by the Department of Manpower and Immigration are inadequate, our department will take up the slack in that regard.

SHIPBUILDING

INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE TO NOVA SCOTIA INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the economic disaster facing one of our oldest industries, the wooden shipbuilding industry of Nova Scotia, which has been hit by a lack of orders and staggering costs, what action does the government plan to alleviate the serious unemployment that is developing in that industry?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): I think the hon. member is well aware that the government has taken action to assist the wooden shipbuilding industry of Nova Scotia. As a matter of fact over $3 million in subsidies will be paid to that province to cover the cost of wooden fishing vessels which will be built during the current fiscal year. It is our intention to continue that subsidy program.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the minister's remarks, but a serious situation is developing. Would he give consideration to calling a meeting with his provincial counterpart to discuss this urgent matter and the best course to follow in order to solve the unemployment problem as soon as possible?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the minister has heard the representation of the hon. member.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST THAT PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE MEET IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Would he undertake to convene the standing committee on transport in the Atlantic provinces in the near future, in order that that committee might hear and discuss the problems of those provinces?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that question has been asked two or three times in the last few days, and it is under consideration. I think at the moment the chairman of the committee is in New York at the United Nations. The committee has much work to do before the end of the present session. I shall be glad to discuss with the chairman the possibility of doing what the hon. member suggests at some time in the future.

Mr. Starr: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister object to such a meeting taking place in the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Hellyer: I have no personal objection, but this is a matter for the committee.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): But you have a vice chairman.

Mr. Hellyer: All I can say is that I shall consult with them. That is the limit of my prerogative under the rules.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): My question is supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Ontario. Could the Minister of Transport indicate to the house what reply he received from the Atlantic area transport commission which studied problems of maritime transportation? A couple of days ago in the house the minister said he would ascertain whether it would be useful for the standing committee on transport and communications to go down to the maritimes and study transport problems down there.

Mr. Hellyer: I expect to be meeting with them some time next week, Mr. Speaker, and at that time I shall be in a position to discuss with them my hon. friend's question and several others.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY— INQUIRY AS TO NEXT STEP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): My question is for the Minister of Public Works. Since only 17 shopping days are left before Christmas I wonder if the minister could advise this house and the people of Prince Edward Island whether we may look forward, before Christmas, to a report on the next phase of the construction of the Northumberland strait crossing.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I doubt if the engineering reports will be sufficiently advanced for that gift to be made to the people of Prince Edward Island before Christmas.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister be a bit more specific and advise us when we might expect a report on the redesign or other aspects of the Northumberland strait crossing.

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker. I am happy to say that the engineering work is proceeding very rapidly, but I cannot forecast the time of its completion.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise on a point of order. Last night I indicated to members of the house that I would consult with house leaders today as to a suitable order of business. As a result of this consultation I would like to advise the house that as the first order of business today we are calling the committee stage of the C.N.R. bill, to be followed by the second reading and committee stage of the divorce bill.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

The house resumed from Tuesday, November 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-151, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system for a period from the 1st day of January, 1967 to the 30th day of June, 1968 and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company—Mr. Chrétien (for the Minister of Finance)—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose on Tuesday, November 28, clause 4 of the bill was under discussion.

[Mr. MacDonald (Prince).]

On clause 4—Issue of securities.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, before this legislation passes I would like to speak about the effects, if any, which the over-all capital expenditures of the C.N.R. are having on freight rates and about the new environment which we are told is developing for the transport industry generally.
